FOREWORD

More than ten years have passed since the first edition of this Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement was published. The decade since 1991 has seen momentous changes in the lives of people and in church and society on all levels, changes which have left their mark on the ecumenical movement as well. The end of the bipolar confrontation during the cold war and the emergence of the process of “globalization” are only two of the significant features of this new era at the beginning of the 21st century. Ecumenically we see, on the one hand, a new emphasis on traditional denominational identities and, on the other, a return of religion into the public space, combined with a growing emphasis on inter-religious dialogue.

If it was a risk to publish a Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement a decade ago because of the ever-changing character of the ecumenical landscape, it is even more of a risk to publish a second edition now when many of the traditional orientations of ecumenism are challenged or called into question. A new generation has moved into the positions of leadership in the churches for whom the ecumenical struggles and advances of earlier periods are no longer part of their personal memory, but at best a significant feature of recent history. Ecumenical leadership formation has become a priority in all churches and regions.

Since its first publication, this dictionary has become an indispensable tool for all those who search for basic information and reliable orientation in the highly complex environment of contemporary ecumenism. The writers and editors have carefully reviewed and updated the original entries and added a substantial number of new ones. Together they have produced a resource reflecting the richness and diversity of ecumenical thought and action, of events and persons.

As my predecessor, Emilio Castro, wrote in his preface to the first edition: “The energy of the ecumenical movement has always been the creative visions, solemn covenants, courageous engagements and fervent prayers of countless women and men, churches and groups. But the ecumenical story is also one of meetings and reports and documents, programmes and declarations and statements, theological convergences and pastoral guidelines. As this movement has, by God’s grace, grown and expanded, the amount of written material with which one must be acquainted in order effectively to build on the past would fill a good-sized library. For those without ready access to such documentary resources, this Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement will be indispensable; even for those who have such access it will provide a reliable starting point for their explorations.”

May this revised second edition of the dictionary once again prove to be a source of inspiration and reliable orientation for all those who have accepted the call to the unity and renewal of the church as a personal commitment. Together with the readers and users of this dictionary, I pay tribute to the editors and contributors for their dedication which has made this second edition possible. Their efforts are a living testimony that, in spite of all setbacks and uncertainties, the ecumenical movement remains the decisive impulse for the future of the church.

PREFACE TO THE SECOND EDITION

On its original publication in 1991 this Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement was given a gratifyingly positive reception. For some time a new edition has appeared desirable, and it has now become possible. Without changing the basic character of the work, the editors have carefully considered which of their own entries required updating and offered authors the opportunity to do the same. They have also omitted or replaced certain articles, and added over 40 new ones.

In the intervening years, turns of thought and event have occurred whose outcome it is too early to predict. In the WCC arena, some have detected and sought to promote a “paradigm shift” in the ecumenical movement from Christocentrism to an intentionally more expansive Trinitarianism, from the history of salvation to care for the planet, from reconciliation among Christians to common life in the entire human household; others have called for a “return” to scripturally based concerns for the unity of the church and the spread of the gospel; in any case, much of the 1990s was devoted to looking for a “common understanding and vision”, and the search has continued since the Harare assembly of 1998. In Faith and Order, reflection on ecclesial unity has focused on the concept of koinonia; while Pope John Paul II in his encyclical letter Ut Unum Sint (1995) re-affirmed the “irrevocable commitment” of the Roman Catholic Church to ecumenism and invited the leaders and theologians of the churches to “a patient and fraternal dialogue” about the possible exercise of a universal ministry of unity in a new situation.

On the ground, inter-religious strife, particularly between Christians and Muslims, has rendered dialogue in this area both more necessary and more difficult; while the question of a “theology of religions” has emerged into prominence among Christian thinkers. Geopolitically and economically, the phenomenon of a “globalization” originating chiefly from North America has been both welcomed for its material advantages and questioned on account of its ideological accompaniments and ecological consequences. Socially and morally, matters of gender relations, human sexuality and bio-ethics have deepened or multiplied tensions and controversies not only between the churches but also within them. In Europe, the historic churches have undergone a steep statistical and cultural decline in the face of both secularism and “new religious movements”; while in parts of Africa and Asia, the number of Christians, often of a broadly “Pentecostal” kind, has grown rapidly. The collapse of the Soviet empire has brought with it both evangelistic opportunities and territorial competition among the evangelizers; while the situation of Christians and other religionists in China has attracted worldwide concern about their treatment.

The six editors undersigned wish to thank contributors who have met their requests for revisions of the original articles or for fresh compositions. Warm thanks are also due to many members of the WCC staff for advice and in some cases updating texts. A number of friends of the Council have also provided invaluable help in the preparation of this edition.

Jan Kok, publisher of the World Council of Churches for nearly 30 years and originator of the first edition of this dictionary, ended a long and courageous struggle with cancer early in 2002, less than a year before this second edition is to see the light of day. An early death robbed us also of the literary skills and encyclopedic knowledge of Marlin VanElderen, and the new edition is dedicated to the memory of this dear friend and colleague who played such an important part in the production of the first edition. In the circumstances, we have been particularly appreciative of the willingness of Craig Noll to place his editorial competence in the service of this enterprise.

INTRODUCTION

If church history continues to be written, future historians will almost certainly regard the ecumenical movement as one of the most remarkable features of Christianity in the 20th century. To a degree never witnessed before, Christianity became a worldwide religion, spread over the whole inhabited earth. And an unprecedentedly large number and range of Christian communities, hitherto separated by doctrinal and institutional factors, set about a serious process of consultation, cooperation, communion and even union among themselves, inspired by the prayer of the Lord that his followers “be one”, “so that the world may believe” (John 17:21).

A hundred years is a long time for the duration of any “movement” in history. Memories fade, and apparently secure results are forgotten. After a century, it seems wise to draw together a record of this period, while some of the participants who have devoted the greater part of long adult lives to the cause of Christian unity are still present in the flesh. There is, moreover, much work still to do; several traditionally controversial issues remain unsettled among the churches; new questions arise for the Christian faith as a global culture develops with its own characteristics in economics, geopolitics, the religious field, science and technology, information and communication; the kingdoms of this world have not yet become the kingdom of God and of his Christ (Rev. 11:15). To take stock of the past, to interpret the present and to look forward into a new stage of Christian existence are therefore indispensable exercises. This dictionary is intended as a contribution to these ends.

In its beginnings, the modern ecumenical movement was largely the work of Christians in Protestant churches, Reformation and Free, who were committed, in the words of John R. Mott around the turn into the 20th century, to “the evangelization of the world in this generation”. Then, and increasingly, the Orthodox churches began to play a significant part, notably in the sequel of the Ecumenical Patriarchate’s proposal, after the first world war, for a “league of churches”. After initial suspicions, and then cautious beginnings after the second world war, the Roman Catholic Church at the Second Vatican Council recognized that other Christians, by baptism and faith in Christ, enjoy “a certain, though imperfect, communion with the Catholic Church”, and that their churches and ecclesial communities are “not without significance in the mystery of salvation” – so that finally the way was open for Orthodox and Protestants on their side to take the Roman Catholic Church seriously as an ecumenical partner. By enlisting contributions from Protestants, Orthodox and Roman Catholics, and now Evangelicals and Pentecostals, the dictionary seeks to show how the ecumenical movement has been perceived and lived within various confessional perspectives.

Much of the history of the ecumenical movement has to be focused on the World Council of Churches, for this has been since its foundation in 1948 the institution in which the earlier “Faith and Order” and “Life and Work” movements coalesced, and since 1961 the evangelism and mission represented by the former International Missionary Council. Further ramifications have brought into the purview of the WCC such matters as adult and theological education, medical care, international law and politics, social ministries, public media, and dialogue with people of other living faiths and ideologies. The Roman Catholic Church, which numbers the majority of Christians among its adherents, is not a member of the WCC but is engaged at many levels with its work. Rome has also conducted bilateral dialogues with several of the other Christian World Communions through their respective organizations, and most of these other communions have in turn conducted such dialogues with several respective partners among their own number. This “classical” ecumenism has its critics within all camps, but most notably among Evangelicals who actively oppose some tendencies within the larger movement, and among Pentecostals who have tended to ignore it. More recently, there are some promising signs of change in these directions; and for their part, the WCC and the long-established Christian world communions need the contributions of the Evangelical and Pentecostal visions. The dictionary gives perhaps most attention to studies and activities sponsored by the WCC, but it also devotes considerable space to the ecumenical interests of the Roman Catholic Church and of other Christian families, and it seeks to take account of criticism addressed to classical ecumenism.

At its best, the ecumenical movement has been a search for unity in the truth as it is found in Jesus (Eph. 4:21) and into which the Holy Spirit leads (John 16:13). It has not been a matter, on the one hand, of creating a super-orthodoxy uniformly formulated or, on the other, of doctrinal compromise or indifference. Rather, the churches have together searched the scriptures, the venerable Tradition of the church, and the belief and practice of the contemporary communities with the aim of reaching a “common expression of the apostolic faith today” (to adopt the title of a Faith and Order study). The dictionary contains many articles on doctrinal themes, showing how the churches have converged in their teachings on God, Christ, the Holy Spirit, the church, redemption and salvation, grace and faith, the word and the sacraments, and the last things, while indicating also the continuing bones of contention in such matters as pastoral authority and the constitution of ordained ministry.

At its best, the ecumenical movement has embodied a search for the will of God in every area of life and work. It has been a matter neither of a pretentious “building of the kingdom” nor of a quietism that remains unmoved by the world’s needs. Rather, the churches have sought to engage in the studies and action for the furtherance of “justice, peace and the integrity of creation” (to use the title of the programme set out by the Vancouver assembly of the WCC in 1983). The dictionary contains many articles on social, political, legal, cultural and ethical issues from perspectives within the Christian faith.

At its best, the ecumenical movement has sought to discern, proclaim and participate in the Triune God’s eternal and constant purpose for humankind and the mission of God to the world. It has not been a matter either of weakening witness to Jesus Christ or of refusing the truths that can be found outside the institutions of Christianity. Rather, participating churches, whether members of the WCC or not, have “confess[ed] the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour” and looked to “fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit” (to use the words of the membership basis of the WCC). The dictionary contains many articles on aspects of evangelism and mission, of worship and prayer, of education and renewal in the churches, of care for the needy and the place of the poor in church and society, of witness to the powers that be, and of communication to the world and dialogue with those of other faiths and outlooks.

In the nature of the case, the ecumenical movement is a movement of people. It was the vision of committed individuals that led to the formation of the WCC. Once the Council was established, it was led and served by men and women from many parts of the world. The dictionary must commemorate them and all others who contributed to major ecumenical developments. But any list that is drawn up of such architects and pioneers of 20th-century ecumenism is bound to be incomplete and appear arbitrary. The editors are aware that theirs is, and they hope that the biographical sketches that are included in the dictionary will be seen as a few standing for the many. The index of names allows the reader to trace at least some of the contributions of figures who are not themselves the subject of an independent article.

Ecumenism exists at global, regional and local levels. As a contribution to the sharing of information throughout the churches, the dictionary contains not only articles of direct universal interest but also descriptions of ecumenical relations and activities in the several regions of the world. Moreover, our contributors have been encouraged to include, with inevitable selectivity, examples from very local situations.

Under the ecumenical umbrella, many special interests are at work: liturgists, ecologists, feminists, and several more. Much more often than not, the writers asked to contribute to the dictionary on these subjects have been chosen from among those sympathetic to the respective causes.

Articles in the dictionary are of several kinds. The longest type survey a major doctrinal theme, an entire area of activity; through manifold cross references in the body of the article (marked by an asterisk at the first occurrence) and a final listing of the principal related articles, they direct the reader to detailed items in the debate or to matters of related interest. Articles in the medium range look at more restricted but still weighty topics. Many of the shorter articles provide for quick reference on a precise question. The bibliographies have favoured publications in English, while not neglecting studies in other languages for which there is no English equivalent; they are not exhaustive, and the items they contain have often been chosen precisely because they yield further bibliographical information.

The editors themselves learned once more what it means to engage in team work. After seeking advice on contents and authorship from a widely representative larger board, the six co-editors corporately established the list of articles and of contributors to be invited. Then each editor took under his or her wing a batch of entries matching their own respective interests and competences. Very roughly speaking, Nicholas Lossky attended to the Eastern churches and some of the dogmatic concerns close to Orthodox hearts; José Míguez Bonino to the area of church and society and to matters of moral theology; John Pobee to geographical and cultural variety and to issues in theological education; Tom Stransky to institutional histories and to matters of specifically Roman Catholic concern within the ecumenical movement; Geoffrey Wainwright to doctrinal issues in faith and order and to the dialogues among the Christian world communions; Pauline Webb to mission and evangelism, communication and renewal. Each editor, however, had the opportunity to make suggestions of detail for all the articles. Much of the minute biographical and bibliographical research was originally done by Ans J. van der Bent, on the basis of suggestions from contributors and editors. For this second edition, Pierre Beffa has brought the bibliographies up to date. The services of the WCC Library and the Language Service have been invaluable.

A word on illustrations. The subject matter of the articles in this dictionary does not lend itself easily to illustrations, and the choice made for the first edition was not always a happy one. It was therefore decided to include only photos – where available – of figures who served in their several generations and now rest from their labours.

NOTES FOR THE READER

The arrangement of entries in the Dictionary is alphabetical. An asterisk in the text refers the reader to a substantial (though not necessarily major) mention of a word to which an entry elsewhere corresponds. At the end of many articles, “see also” sends the reader to yet other entries closely connected to their main themes. There are no cross references to personalities; here readers may consult the index of names.

Some overlapping of information in articles related to allied subjects has been retained to allow readers to find all the basic information on a specific subject in one article, without having to refer to others.

Quotations are short, and have been used only where they support a particular line of argument. The use of footnotes has been avoided: reference to works cited in the bibliographies are indicated by the name of the author(s) or title of book(s) in brackets in the text. Other references, also in brackets, give author’s name, title of work, and year of publication.

Bibliographies with entries include mainly English works. Where these are translations from other languages, this is indicated by “ET”. Some titles have been included because they themselves contain useful bibliographies. Older references are cited if they are still considered basic works.

In the biographical sketches, only the person’s major writings are cited.

Articles about sub-regions (e.g. South Asia) are alphabetized under that region (i.e. “Asia: South”). In a few cases, a single country constitutes a “sub-region”; other than these, there are no entries for individual countries.

Information of a general nature, which can be found in encyclopedias and other reference works, has not been included.

The editors have used inclusive language as much as they felt possible and certainly in cases where a text has been translated from another language. Some authors have maintained the traditional use of the pronouns “he/him/his/himself” when referring to God; others have avoided this use.

The length of time it has taken to collect all the articles, revised or newly written for this second edition, has meant that some texts are more up to date than others. This is inevitable in a project involving so many authors and areas.

The list of contributors gives the title and position of authors as known at the time of publication. The identifying sentence is followed by the title(s) of the article(s) written by that author. (Contributions by the six editors are included in this list.)

The editors believe that this second edition of the Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement will be a useful and reliable reference tool for many years to come. They would be grateful to be notified by users of any errors which may have found their way into the text, as well as to receive suggestions for improvements in succeeding editions. These should be sent to the Publications Editor, World Council of Churches, P.O. Box 2100, 1211 Geneva 2, Switzerland.

ABORTION

THROUGHOUT the Old Testament numerous passages attest to the sacredness of human life within the womb (Job 31:15; Isa. 44:24, 49:1,5; Jer. 1:5; Ps. 127:3). In contrast, references to abortion are extremely rare. The most important such text is Ex. 21:22-23; even here, however, the reference is indirect. The text stipulates that if a miscarriage results when people are fighting, the guilty party shall be fined; if, however, the woman is killed, the assailant shall “give life for life”. According to the talmudic interpretation of this passage, feticide – unlike homicide – is not a capital offence, since the fetus does not become a person prior to its emergence from the womb. Before birth the fetus is an organic part of the mother. While abortion is thus distinguished from murder or homicide, it is always a matter of extreme moral gravity in Jewish thought; when abortion is permitted, it is generally justified on grounds of compassion for the mother.

There are no explicit references to abortion in the New Testament. Nevertheless, the early church consistently condemned it in opposition to widespread abortion and infanticide in the Greco-Roman world. Christians found indirect support for their stand in the Septuagint translation of Ex. 21:22-23, which – unlike the Masoretic text – made a distinction between a “formed” and an “unformed” fetus and on this basis made even the accidental destruction of a “formed” fetus a capital offence. Tertullian held that the fetus is fully human from the moment of conception. Abortion was morally permissible, he believed, only when necessary to save the life of the mother. Augustine distinguished between the destruction of an “animated” and an “unanimated” fetus. Although he condemned abortion at any stage, he did not consider it homicide prior to animation (quickening).

In the 13th century Thomas Aquinas, following Aristotle, held that the infusion of the rational soul occurred about the 40th day following conception for males and about the 80th day for females. Aquinas’s doctrine of infusion of the soul – like Augustine’s earlier teaching concerning animation – provided the basis for a distinction in moral gravity between an earlier and a later abortion. Such a distinction was officially dropped by the Catholic church in the 19th century. In 1869 Pope Pius IX extended excommunication as the penalty for abortion to include the abortion of any embryo. The 1917 code of canon law required that all aborted fetuses must be baptized, clearly implying that the unborn fetus is fully human from the time of conception. This position was re-affirmed by Vatican II in Gaudium et Spes (1965) and by Pope Paul VI in Humanae Vitae (1968).

Luther and Calvin held that the fetus is both body and soul from conception. Both opposed abortion at any stage. Well into the 20th century, the major branches of Protestantism were closely aligned with Catholicism in this regard. Subsequently, many Protestants and some Catholics have begun to reinterpret the traditional Christian teaching concerning abortion in the light of a number of deep-rooted cultural changes, including new attitudes towards authority,* the growth of cultural pluralism,* a revolution in sexual morality, feminism,* and dramatic new reproductive technologies (see bio-ethics).

Theologians and churches have responded to these movements in a variety of ways which can best be understood in terms of a continuum. Well known is the traditional Roman Catholic rejection of any form of abortion, which Vatican II equates with infanticide as “abominable crimes” (nefanda crimina: GS 51), a position that the Vatican representatives at the Cairo and Beijing conferences strongly supported. The catechism of the Catholic church (1996) affirms that “human life must be respected and protected absolutely from the moment of conception” and that consequently “formal cooperation in an abortion constitutes a grave offence”. As an authority for such a position it quotes the statement of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Donum Vitae III, “Among... fundamental rights... one should mention in this regard every human being’s right to life and physical integrity from the moment of conception until death”, and that therefore “respect and protection... must be ensured for the unborn child from the moment of conception”. Many Protestants continue to defend a similar view, generally supporting anti-abortion legislation and defending the fetus’s right to life. At the opposite end of the spectrum is a second group which advocates the legal and the moral right of the woman to choose whether or not to have an abortion. A third group occupies the broad middle ground between these polar positions. While they differ widely among themselves, those who embrace this position believe that abortion may sometimes be morally justified. For them, abortion is not morally neutral; neither is it murder. While it is always evil, it is sometimes justifiable as the lesser evil or, alternatively, as the most responsible option available. In this view, primary responsibility for the abortion decision rests with the woman.

The WCC has not made any significant statement about abortion beyond recognizing that it presents a serious ethical problem and that most churches are opposed to it (Salonika 1959, Louvain 1971, Nairobi 1975). In the context of a discussion on family planning and population policies, the WCC’s Christian Medical Commission rejected the use of abortion as a means of population control (Zurich 1973). The Roman Catholic Church-WCC Joint Working Group document on “The Ecumenical Dialogue on Moral Issues: Potential Sources of Common Witness or of Divisions” (1995) highlights abortion as one of these potentially church-dividing issues.

In the abortion debate it is important to distinguish clearly between the moral and legal issues involved. Support for the right of a woman to choose an abortion does not in itself imply moral approval. Closely related to the question of a woman’s right to choose is the issue of public funding of abortion for the poor. Those who support such funding do so on grounds of social justice.

In addressing the abortion issue, the churches are confronted with the need to seek ways to alleviate the underlying causes and to provide alternatives to abortion through family planning, adoption and financial assistance. The most basic challenge to the churches is to nurture a fundamental respect for human life, including that of the unborn, both among their members and in society at large (see life and death). This respect – rather than the enactment of either restrictive or permissive legislation – is a prerequisite for the goal of preventing abortion without coercing women.

ABRECHT, PAUL

B. 9 Dec. 1917, Cincinnati, OH, USA. Abrecht joined the staff of the WCC in 1949 as secretary for the study programme on Christian Action in Society, and became director of the Department (later Sub-unit) on Church and Society in 1954, a post he retained until his retirement in 1983. In this capacity he organized three ecumenical study projects: “The Responsible Society” (1949-54), “The Common Christian Responsibility towards Areas of Rapid Social Change” (1955-61), and “The Future of Humanity and Society in a World of Science-based Technology” (1969-79). He was also responsible for the organization and follow-up of the world conference on “Church and Society” (Geneva 1966). Secretary of the Ecumenical Commission on European Cooperation, later the Committee on the Christian Responsibility for European Cooperation, 1950-62, Abrecht was greatly influenced by the Oldham-Visser ‘t Hooft emphasis on ecumenical “study” of controversial social questions, and he enlisted contributions to ecumenical social thinking from talented Christian laypersons in economic, political, industrial and scientific disciplines. From a Baptist family, Abrecht did post-graduate studies in economics at the University of California, in theology at Berkeley Baptist Divinity School, and in Christian ethics – under Reinhold Niebuhr and John Bennett – at Union Theological Seminary, New York. He edited the WCC’s periodicals Background Information (1959-69) and Anticipation (1969-83), and was author of The Churches in Rapid Social Change (London, SCM Press, 1961). ## ACADEMIES, LAY LAY ACADEMIES are church-affiliated conference centres where individuals and social groups meet for encounter, dialogue, research and reflection-for-action. The oldest “academy” was founded in 1915 at Sigtuna, near Stockholm, by Manfred Bjorkquist, but most came into being in Europe after the second world war, many between 1945 and 1955. A European association of academy directors was established in 1956, and the Ecumenical Association of Academies and Laity Centres in Europe now includes some 90 centres in 20 countries, among them a dozen Roman Catholic and two Greek Orthodox member centres.

The term “academy”, used when the first German institute was opened at Bad Boll in 1945 by Bishop Theophil Wurm, one of the leaders of the Confessing Church,* expressed the original working philosophy of such centres: “dialogue on the world’s agenda”. It derives from the Greek philosophical tradition, where Plato is said to have educated his students in dialogue while walking in the forest akademeia. The initiative for establishing academies was a response to the failure of the German churches to prepare themselves and their members to resist the ideological and political trends of fascism and Nazism and to render a prophetic witness. Academies were thus supposed to serve as centres of education – originally for laypeople but later for “the whole people of God” in order to awaken their conscience in political and social matters towards a “spirituality for combat”. Daily worship, Bible studies and theological discourse have always been basic elements in their conferences, seminars, workshops and consultations. Hospitality and sharing have also remained vital elements in the process of education and communication, predominantly led by lay experts from various fields.

Partly independently, partly through the sharing of experiences, insights and resources, lay academies also emerged in Asia, Africa and North America. In Asia they began working during the later 1950s and early 1960s in Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Indonesia and India. In the 1960s Africa followed with centres in South Africa, Lesotho, Benin, Nigeria, Cameroon, Tanzania, Kenya, Zambia, Ethiopia and Madagascar. The centres call themselves “Christian academies”, “ecumenical centres”, “institutes for the study of church and society” etc., and their programmes focus, according to their context, on issues arising from industrialization, nation-building and urban-rural problems, as well as on intercultural and inter-religious dialogue.

A first world conference of lay academies, organized by the WCC in 1972 at the Orthodox Academy in Crete, led to the formation of the World Collaboration Committee for Christian Lay Centres, Academies and Movements for Social Concern (WCOLC). Following the European association, regional associations came into being in Africa (Association of Christian Lay Centres in Africa – ACLCA) and Asia (Association of Christian Institutes for Social Concern in Asia – ACISCA), in North America (Ecumenical Christian Association of Retreat and Renewal Centres and Leaders in North America – NARDA) in 1980, in the Caribbean (Collaboration for Ecumenical Planning and Action in the Caribbean – CEPAC) in 1985, in Latin America (CONOSUR) in the early 1990s, and in the Middle East (Association of Training and Retreat Centres – MEATRC) in 1996.

At its 20th gathering in October 1997, WCOLC adopted the name OIKOSNET – “a global ecumenical network of laity centres, academies and movements for social concern working for just, participatory, sustainable and inclusive communities”. In conjunction with the WCC, it now relates to some 600 centres around the world, encouraging communication within the network through the interchange of information and experience, developing programmes in international studies, research, training courses and staff exchange, offering consultative and advisory services on personnel and programmes, and building relations with other agencies sharing similar concerns.

Following Vatican II, growing cooperation between the WCC and the Vatican Consilium de Laicis led to a jointly organized world conference on “New Trends in Laity Formation” in 1974 at Assisi. In 1976 WCOLC organized the first world courses for leaders in lay training (CLLT), which has become a regular annual project of the WCC and the regional associations.

The mission of the laity* has figured prominently on the ecumenical agenda from the very beginning. One of the institutional first-fruits of this was the Ecumenical Institute at Bossey,* whose first director, Hendrik Kraemer, wrote an influential book on A Theology of the Laity. Kraemer’s associate Suzanne de Diétrich developed a specific Bible study model (“the Bible in the one hand, the newspaper in the other”) which became prominent in the work of lay academies. The WCC’s Evanston assembly (1954) emphasized the role of the laity, which was confirmed at New Delhi (1961), where the ecumenical study on “The Missionary Structure of the Congregation”* was initiated. Lay academies have played a vital role as instruments for the churches to put this mission into action.

The lay issue assumed new prominence on the WCC agenda after the Canberra assembly in 1991, and a world convention for laity centres, academies and movements for social concern was organized by WCOLC at Montreat, North Carolina, USA, in 1993. The theme was “Weaving Communities of Hope”. About 250 participants from laity centres in 70 countries joined for encounter, exchange and joint planning for action. The conference message, in the form of a “Letter to All God’s People”, confirmed the solidarity within the Network of Hope in all its particularities. Translated into more than a dozen languages, the letter inspired a number of new laity projects, including the Idris Hamid Institute in Trinidad, a worldwide training course for women, joint projects between centres in North and South.

A document from the Crete consultation (1972) stated: "Our task is liberation and social transformation... our centres have a great opportunity to become places where there is a creative 'doing of theology'... We also have a responsibility in the further training and re-orientation of the ordained ministry and leadership of the church." In pursuing these aims, lay academies have widely followed the principles of "Oldham's method", thus continuing and deepening the concerns of Life and Work through dialogue and confrontation (see study as an ecumenical method). They have become prominent agencies for ecumenical learning through relating local and regional concerns with global perspectives and challenges.

Consequently, after the fall of the Berlin wall in 1989, many churches in Central and Eastern Europe started to establish and organize lay training institutes. With the advice and support of the Conference of European Churches, centres were opened in Hungary, Romania, the Czech Republic, Slovenia, Poland, Lithuania, Estonia and Russia.

AFRICA

AFRICA, the second largest continent, offers a tremendous diversity of climates, vegetation and cultures, and of human and natural resources. The human resources include Caucasoids, Hamites and Negroids, who live in more than 50 countries, each with its own history. Recent research maintains that the first fully sapient human being emerged in Africa somewhere between 200,000 and 100,000 years ago.

A major reality of Africa today is the legacy of colonialization, particularly by England, France, Germany, Portugal and Spain. About 200 years of colonialism linked Africa ineradicably with European nations, linguistically, culturally and economically. While English, French, Portuguese or Spanish have become second languages in many African countries, some 2000 African languages hold their own as vernacular. To this may be added Arabic. The principal religions are African Traditional Religions (ATRs), Christianity and Islam. These have not lived in watertight compartments but have interacted with each other, principally because traditional African thought and religions, having cultures of hospitality, tend to absorb ideas from elsewhere. Pluralism and diversity thus mark not only Africa as a whole, but also its various sub-regions and even local communities. This fact itself prescribes an ecumenical task – how to avoid violence and unnecessary strife, to seek unity without loss of identity and integrity, and to cherish mutual respect and support in spite of diversities and differences.

The creation of nation states out of congeries of tribes and ethnic groupings has made more evident Africa's brokenness. The new tribalism and tensions between neighbouring nations and tribes plague the new states. Neither the African politicians in power nor the Organization of African Unity (OAU) has been able to forge a unity of Africans across differences of tribe, race and gender. The OAU was established in 1963 as a symbol of unity and mutuality and as an instrument of decolonization and the new order in Africa, but after four decades it is still struggling politically and economically to find its identity and proper place in the modern world. A new organization, African Union (AU), created in Lusaka, Zambia, in July 2001, is a fresh attempt towards finding an African political and economic identity. In addition to this all-Africa attempt at forging links between countries, there are also sub-regional attempts such as the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), the Southern African Development Community (SADEC), and the Maghreb Union. These, for all their teething problems, serve as reminders that the economic and political health of African states cannot be achieved by individual efforts alone but only in concert with other states. The task is made more difficult because the churches, which claim to be committed to reconciliation,* are themselves tribal churches, and they fail to translate their rhetoric into action. For example, in the 1980s the Methodist Church of Ghana was in the throes of a struggle between the Fante and the Ga. The central issue was: From which tribe would the president of the conference come? In the 1990s the churches of Rwanda and Burundi were torn apart by tribal conflict between Tutsis and Hutus, plunging the whole Great Lakes region into an armed confrontation which is still going on.

South Africa has been a special story. Until about 1994, in the name of the ideology* of apartheid,* its government divided the nation along racial lines and consigned all but whites to a life of misery and poverty. Racism* was the principal ecumenical issue here; it has brought the churches at home and the world church together, to work on the legacy of problems left by that iniquitous system.

Rwanda and Burundi in the mid-1990s offered another illustration of the cutting edge of the contemporary ecumenical agenda. There tribalism expressed in bitter struggle between Hutus and Tutsis issued in widespread intertribal massacres, in which some church leaders were identified as active participants. This has thrown into sharp relief the urgency of the churches and the ecumenical movement working together to secure mutual respect for the common humanity of all in spite of differences of ethnicity and denomination.

THE HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN AFRICA

Africa's history has been much influenced by the North in cultural development, economics, politics and religion. Belgian, British, French, German and Portuguese colonialism* left indelible marks on the political and economic organizations and ideologies, with varying implications for church-state* relationships, a vital ecumenical issue in Africa. In colonial times, Christian missions in some countries appeared to be ecclesiastical fronts of the North Atlantic colonial incursions. This encounter with the North was a mixed blessing. It brought Africa into contact with modernity and a bigger world, but also contributed to its under-development. The culture of modernity, fuelled by the dream of progress and built on the foundations of science and reason, may serve tremendous social and cultural developments. But in the process many Africans have been disoriented by the growth of great cities and urban life.

Christianity, of course, was in Africa long before colonialism. North of the Sahara it was present in the Maghreb, Roman North Africa, by A.D. 180, and in Egypt from the earliest times. Egyptian Christianity, said to go back to St Mark, grew into a dynamic force, with its famous catechetical school in Alexandria producing such theologians as Clement, Origen, Dionysius of Alexandria and the great Athanasius. Today, in the face of Islam, the Egyptian church is relatively small. Similarly, Islam all but wiped out the Christianity of the Maghreb, which produced martyrs like Perpetua and Felicitas (d.203) and thinkers such as Cyprian of Carthage and Augustine of Hippo. Here one finds today only a struggling band of Christians within an environment politically, economically and culturally dominated by Muslims.

North African Christianity fell before Islam partly because the church was bitterly divided between Donatists and Catholics. That division was symptomatic of a deeper failure truly to engage the native Berbers. Rather, Christianity imposed a Latin culture on them and responded insufficiently to Berber spirituality, religious epistemology and ontology. The ill-will created in the Berbers opened the gates to the Muslims.

This history raises the missiological and ecumenical issue of whether the people of Africa must become Europeans to be adjudged Christian. Must the African be Christianized, or must the Christian faith be Africanized? This issue continues today in pleas for African and black theologies and in the discussion of indigenization (see theology, African). There can be no reconciled church as long as a faith captive to an alien culture* is imposed on a local people. The ecumenical imperative of ensuring that in the oikoumene and around God's throne no race is excluded (cf. Rev. 7:9ff.) has become more urgent because of the changing demography of world Christianity, whose centre is located in the churches of the South, especially Africa. Among other things, this calls for a renewal of the ecumenical movement whose structures were created when the North was the centre of world Christianity.

In Africa south of the Sahara, Christianity came in fragmented form in the 19th and 20th centuries from the churches of Europe and North America. The denominationalism* of the Northern countries was transported to the South, even though the original causes of the division were not part of the experience of Africans. Often there was no love lost between sister churches. In Portuguese Africa (Mozambique and Angola), and also in the former Belgian Congo, Roman Catholics used the privileged position arising from their intimate connection with the colonial administration to the disadvantage of Protestants. In British colonies, Anglicanism, though not officially established as in England, still had an advantage over other denominations.

Furthermore, the missions, partly as a result of comity agreements ("denominations by geography"), resulted in tribal churches, compounding social divisiveness in nations welded from loosely knit collections of tribes. In Uganda, for example, political parties have followed the Protestant-Roman Catholic divide: the Uganda People's Congress, which is Protestant, particularly Anglican, was nicknamed United Protestants of Canterbury, while the Democratic Party, being Roman Catholic, was nicknamed Dini ya Papa (the religion of the pope). Acrimony, divisiveness and hostility have been the result of differences in belief, doctrine and sacramental practice, with far-reaching consequences for national political life. Thus the pursuit of the ecumenical imperative is hardly ever a purely theological issue.

Christian missions were influenced by a crusader mentality. The missionaries viewed Africans as having no valid religious insights at all. They also practised a kind of social Darwinism, which held that peoples of the tropics conducted their business so badly that peoples of the temperate zone had a divine right to manage their affairs for them, including exploiting their resources. For such reasons Christianity as represented by historic churches looked foreign and oppressive – a sore for African Christians and a whipping boy for African politicians. African Instituted Churches* represent a response to the foreignness and oppressiveness of historic churches, providing "a place to feel at home". These churches are at once a renewal* movement in the church and a further fracturing of the una sancta. The quest for the selfhood of the African churches, the tabernacling of the Word in Africa, is thus a key issue in ecumenism. Africa desires its rightful place in the oikoumene, a place that respects and responds to the identity and integrity of Africa, as well as its hopes and fears.

Christian missions introduced or became closely involved in Western education and health care in Africa; and ecumenical efforts in Africa have expended considerable energies and resources on institutions of social service. The idea of ecumenism can thus easily be reduced to the transfer of material resources from the churches of the North to the churches of the South. As Africa has gone from crisis to crisis, besieged by famine and drought, floods and violations of human dignity through dictatorships, the valid involvement of the ecumenical movement in social services has loomed much larger than it should, producing a distorted impression of ecumenism.

On the other hand, this involvement in social services has spread the Christian conscience beyond Christians themselves. The church has consequently become "a third race", a new culture. In places it may be the only force besides the political party in power. Since many of the politicians have been reared in the church, they are often not unsympathetic to the churches. The net effect is that churches have become influential, though often not sensitive to the pluralism* of society and the consequent need for tolerance of others and for dialogue between diverse religions and cultures (see dialogue, interfaith).

Hence the changing face of the ecumenical debate. Earlier discussions were shaped by a culture ensouled with the idea and ideology of Christendom. Today, the Christendom ideology cannot be granted a privileged position but must yield to the culture of religious, social and political pluralism. The Christian churches' self-understanding as people of God cannot be looked at in an exclusive sense. Because Christianity is growing faster in Africa than in other continents, the future of world Christianity may well depend on how African Christianity develops.

While ecumenical circles and the churches of the North seek and treasure the insights of a buoyant African Christianity, a critical issue is how these insights are appro-appropriated. The tendency is still to do so by agglomeration – “Let us add on Africa” – while leaving the ground rules unchanged. For example, global ecumenical meetings operate according to parliamentary procedure, which is quite alien to Africa. Although there is a “democratic” vote, the decisions seldom become the agenda of the region.

Another difficulty is the type of issues taken up ecumenically. The date of Easter or Christmas, for example, is not a live issue for most Africans, who are unlikely ever to encounter Orthodox Christians who celebrate Easter or Christmas on a different date. Some ecumenical discussions thus introduce issues to Africa which would not otherwise be on its agenda. This argues for a clear distinction between ecumenical issues best handled at the local or regional level and those introduced at the global level, though it is important that local and global ecumenism be dynamically related.

ISLAM IN AFRICA

Like Christianity, Islam has a history of rich involvement and rapid growth in Africa. It arrived in the area south of the Sahara before Christianity. Through trade, principally along the gold, ivory and slave routes across the Sahara, Islam was in West Africa in the middle ages, leading to the establishment of the Ghana, Mali and Songhai empires. Long before the Portuguese appeared on the east coast of Africa, the Arabs had established commercial and connubial relations with the Bantus from Sofala to Somalia, leading to the rise of Islamized African communities called habashis. Statistically, Islam has maintained a strong presence in the population of Africa, at present only slightly less than that of Christianity, as the table opposite indicates.

Christianity and Islam are rivals in Africa because both have become imperialized. Christianity became the official religion of particular nations and empires such as Armenia, Assyria, Byzantium by the 4th century, as it would be later in Belgium, Portugal and Britain. Soon after the Prophet's death in 632, Islam became identified with the caliphate, which ruled a vast empire from the western Mediterranean to central Asia. These two religions are also rivals because both are missionary religions.

Muslims have widely criticized Christianity for corrupting itself into a Western religion, unfaithful to the simple teaching of a semitic prophet. The crusades from the 11th to the 13th centuries largely did away with the respect enjoined by the Qur'an for 'ahl-al-kitab, the people of the book – Jews and Christians. Christians in some countries were marginalized as minority communities (e.g. Copts in Egypt) and subjected to social legislation, and they closed in upon themselves.

The ecumenical perspectives of both the Qur'an and the Bible have been compromised by subjecting their socio-political teachings to the interests of particular empires and nations. A key issue for African ecumenism is relations between Christians and Muslims in places such as northern Nigeria, Sudan and Gambia: how to recognize the legitimate place for Christians and other non-Muslims in predominantly Muslim societies, and what it means today for a Muslim to call Christians and others 'ahl-al-dhimma, people of protection, who have full rights to the protection of the Islamic state. A similar issue arises for Muslim minorities in predominantly Christian societies. Ghana is one of several African nations to seek a solution by declaring itself a secular nation, despite evidence of vibrant religiosity of one type or another. The practical question remains as to how Muslims and Christians can live together so that they show they worship the one God, the Creator, respect freedom of conscience* and religion, and promote the culture of peace and solidarity.

ECUMENISM IN AFRICA

There are three kinds of ecumenism in Africa. First is the unstructured and natural ecumenism which happens in the nuclear or extended family, which may often include Christians, adherents of an ATR and even Muslims. These different religious affiliations do not lead people to opt out of family obligations and involvements. The rites of passage – birth, puberty, marriage, death – bring the family together, transcending religious affiliations. At these points, the divisions of religions and churches appear as alien and unnatural impositions on Africans. The other side of this is that “natural ecumenism” excludes those outside the kin group, thus giving it only limited ecumenical significance. Yet it is fair to speak of an ecumenical element in traditional African society. An Akan (Ghanaian) proverb states that “we are each and every one a child of God and no one is a child of this earth”; thus, in spite of differentiation, no one may be excluded from the one household of God.

A second form is enforced ecumenism. Harsh circumstances, from natural disasters to political oppression, have forced African churches and religions to come together to work for survival. A statement on “Renewal out of Africa”, issued by an all-Africa consultation on ecumenical theological formation in August 1995, noted that “when the church focuses on the needs of the world, its pain and suffering, denominationalism becomes relativized and ecumenical commitment is strengthened”. The dictatorship of Kwame Nkrumah (1957-66) forced the Protestant churches and Roman Catholics to work together to seek the dignity and peace of the Ghanaian people. When Idi Amin Dada banned 28 Christian denominations in Uganda in 1973 for alleged subversive activities, some of the groups came together under the wings of the Anglican church. In the face of the lawlessness of the government, Roman Catholic and Muslim leaders sent a joint memorandum to Amin in 1976, documenting their claim that the regime was responsible for the killing, disappearance and flight of hundreds of thousands of Christians. Perhaps the best-known example of enforced ecumenism was the cooperation of the South African Council of Churches and the Catholic bishops conference of Southern Africa to combat apartheid.

There is another type of enforced unity, illustrated by the decision of President Mobutu of Zaire in 1970 to oblige all the Protestant churches to form a united Protestant church, the Eglise du Christ au Zaïre (ECZ), which would be the only Protestant church recognized by the state. However, the ECZ member churches (communautés) retained their previous ecclesiastical traditions, structures and fraternal ties. Such enforced ecumenism is of limited value because the basic differences remain untouched. When the pressure is taken off, the separate groups generally revert to denominationalism.*

Third is structured ecumenism, consciously or unconsciously taking its impetus from the Edinburgh conference of 1910 and the modern ecumenical movement. A good illustration is the creation of more than 30 national Christian councils in Africa. In Ghana, for example, the Christian council was set up in 1929 to foster and express the unity* of the church, to uphold the principles of comity among the churches, to enable member churches to consult together concerning their Christian witness* and service, and to promote study of how social and cultural changes in national life affect the task of the church. The Uganda Joint Christian Council was founded in 1963 to assist churches to come together to listen to the voice of Christ and of the Holy Spirit, a voice of love, forgiveness and understanding. It has become the visible expression of the desire of Ugandan Christians to forget the past and to work together for a better future.

As a result of being together in the councils, churches have begun union discussions. Some have been successful, as with the United Church of Zambia; others have failed, as in Ghana and Nigeria. Such negotiations have been the brainchild of European missionaries and have been influenced by the experience of the united Church of South India. But this model, growing out of the European Protestant ecumenical orthodoxy of the 1930s, may not be suitable for the present time. Meanwhile, the councils themselves, locked into social services, have often become little more than development agencies, thus losing their strictly ecumenical raison d'être.

In recent years structured ecumenism has taken shape in sub-regional instruments, including the Fellowship of Christian Councils in West Africa (FECCIWA) and the Fellowship of Councils of Churches in Eastern and Southern Africa (FOCCESA) (since 1999 FOCCISA: Fellowship of Christian Councils in Southern Africa).

Following discussions during an international consultation of national Christian councils in Hong Kong in 1993, FECCIWA was inaugurated in February 1994; its founding members were the councils of Gambia, Ghana, Liberia and Sierra Leone; Togo, Senegal, Benin and Nigeria joined later. The goal was to build links for stronger fellowship, witness and action among the councils of churches in West Africa in the face of rampant crises in various countries. At the inauguration David Dartey of the Ghana Christian Council said: "We have become more and more aware that our individuality cannot save the world for us. We need to pull together as we deal with life issues. This is the essence of ecumenism... How do we..., a unique ecumenical body, face the prevailing challenges as an organic union with a unity of purpose and mission of facilitating the liberation of the peoples in our part of the world?"

FOCCISA for its part brings together councils in Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Namibia, South Africa, Swaziland, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe. It operates a documentation and information centre (EDICESA) and a resource and training centre. Such sub-regional ecumenical bodies may prove to be an important network for the future, providing the space needed to debate ecumenical issues. Many national councils of churches have become channels for resources from Northern agencies; and some agencies have themselves become operational in certain countries, making them hesitant about a church or ecumenical identity, especially if their resources derive from government. In any case, the pursuit of social action has led to a tendency among NCCs not to debate ecumenical issues as such.

Other structured ecumenical expressions in Africa include Bible societies,* churches' medical associations, ecumenical study groups (as in Kampala) and Christian literature associations, which promote joint publication, distribute literature and encourage local writers. Multimedia of Zambia prepares Bible study materials and coordinates Bible study groups. A Christian service committee of the churches in Malawi includes both Protestants and Roman Catholics who work for integral human development, motivating churches and their members for obedience to Christ through service in society. Mindolo Ecumenical Foundation and joint or united theological colleges (Trinity College in Ghana; Trinity College, Umuahia, Nigeria; United Theological College, Zomba, Malawi; Protestant Faculty of Theology, Yaoundé, Cameroon) were established to foster ecumenism through training together persons for different denominations. Many of these institutions appear to be in crisis because the churches' commitment to them is less than to their own denominational colleges and Bible schools.

The constituencies of most of Africa's ten national or sub-regional associations of theological schools encompass Protestant and Roman Catholic seminaries, Bible institutes, university departments of religious studies and other programmes of theological studies. They sponsor conferences and institutes and publish Bible commentaries and studies in Christian education and church history which take the African context seriously. Such efforts foster ecumenical perspectives and spirit. Six continent-wide associations foster cooperation between church-related institutions of theological education and ministerial formation.

Theological education in Africa is so conscious of the pluralism of society that it is more inclined to pursue a curriculum of "religious studies" than of "divinity", which is typically sectarian and almost exclusively devoted to Christian theology. Even those institutions which retain the term "divinity" take religious pluralism seriously. These departments of religious studies introduce students to the entire religious dimension of human life, with all its personal, social and philosophical aspects, and seriously engage indigenous African religions, the scriptures and the historical development and theologies of the main religions in Africa. Above all, these departments seek to bring together persons of different faiths in fruitful human encounter.

The Project for Christian-Muslim Relations in Africa was founded in 1960 (under the name Islam in Africa) as a channel for exploring the concerns and responsibilities of African churches in their relationships with Muslims. It reflects the challenge of the large-scale movement of people and ideas across communal and international frontiers and brings the insight of faith and commitment to bear on shared ideals and common failings. Its study of the impulses which motivate and inspire committed people to engage in mutual sharing and exchange has made an important ecumenical contribution.

There are several continent-wide ecumenical bodies. The All Africa Conference of Churches* (AACC), with headquarters in Nairobi, was inaugurated in Kampala in 1963 as an organ of pan-African cooperation. Over the years, despite problems of mismanagement, the AACC has become an instrument of ecclesiastical cooperation and political influence as well as a public expression of the maturity Protestant Christianity seeks. But it too labours under the legacy of history, principally the multiplicity and poverty of the local churches and the formidable language divide between French, English and Portuguese. With an organizational structure and style of operation based on the WCC model, the AACC is struggling to find its own identity as an African ecumenical body.

Evangelicals* founded the Association of Evangelicals of Africa and Madagascar (AEAM) in 1966. Although not known for its openness to non-evangelicals, AEAM is a seminal embodiment of ecumenism in that its membership includes people from various denominations who cooperate and share fellowship. In local areas, however, its churches often function as para-churches. Influenced heavily by its moneyed supporters from the North, the AEAM too needs to find its African identity.

There is also a pan-African Roman Catholic organization, the Symposium of Episcopal Conferences of Africa and Madagascar (SECAM), inaugurated by Pope Paul VI during a 1969 visit to Uganda. Its secretariat is in Accra, Ghana. SECAM has considered some ecumenical themes, such as human rights in various African countries.

Ecumenism in Africa is taking its own course and shape, with denominational consciousness still much in evidence. Mostly it takes the form of occasional celebrations of unity at assemblies, but it is also expressed in meaningful practical cooperation at the national and international levels. Critics may observe that African churches are at a disadvantage in international ecumenism, because its structures and styles are very alien to most of them. The agenda is often not theirs, and even when it is Africans are often addressed in a paternalistic manner. Some of the structures, such as the councils of churches, do not seem to reach the grassroots, and the funds for ecumenical projects often come from overseas. But there are also some bright spots. In South Africa in the 1980s, for example, the Pretoria Council of Churches, especially under the leadership of Nico Smith, was revitalized as an instrument for uniting local churches in their action both in society as a whole and in the black townships. It was motivated by a clear vision of the need for Christian unity and united social action, identifying needs of people such as those imprisoned without trial, bringing pressure to bear on the authorities, arranging legal representation and sending field workers to visit those in distress and need in their homes.

Equally significant was an experiment in integration and reconciliation through sharing of meals together in one another's houses in a country where persons of different races have not normally shared communion. Such koinonia has fostered bonds between churches and races, creating a deep sense of religious commitment and political awareness.

African ecumenism is fragile and has shortcomings. Nevertheless, the ecumenical efforts are a measure of the growing consciousness of the church in Africa, of a shared identity as Christians despite differences of language and denomination, and of the celebration of unity, common faith and commitment in spite of diversity.

AFRICAN INSTITUTED (INDEPENDENT) CHURCHES

THE INITIALS AIC, as the designation of a genre of African expressions of Christian faith of a great variety, are themselves understood in different ways: "African Independent Churches" signals that they are independent in their origin and organization, though since the historic churches founded by missionaries in Africa are at least juridically independent from their mother churches, this description is somewhat confusing. "African Instituted Churches" signals that they came into being by the initiative of Africans.

A range of other names indicates the variety in the genre. "Separatist churches" underscores that they have broken away from historic churches, e.g. the Church of the Lord (Aladura) broke away from the Church Missionary Society in Nigeria. "Spiritual" or "Pentecostal" emphasize the Holy Spirit and experiencing Pentecost anew, and offer a range of techniques for the emotional enhancement of religious experience (e.g. Musama Disco Christo Church, which broke away from the Methodist Church of Ghana). The "Ethiopian movement" emphasizes the importance of Africans controlling their own affairs in both religious and secular spheres. "Zionist churches" (e.g. the Christian Catholic Apostolic Holy Spirit Church in Zion, founded between 1917 and 1920 by Daniel Nkonyane) are primarily interested in the adaptation of Christian teaching and liturgy to indigenous cosmology and ways of worship; they stress expressive and emotional phenomena and cater to the strong fears of witchcraft among Africans.

Scholars have suggested other interpretative names for AICs of different types, such as "Witchcraft Eradication Movement", because of this preoccupation with exorcism by the power of the Holy Spirit.* "Messianic movements", built around a messianic leader, serve both as compensation for thwarted social aspirations and as an agency of socialization. In fact, except for Limba, founder of the Church of Christ in South Africa, such leaders have not normally claimed the title Messiah. "Prophetic movements" are so called because they are built on a strong leader, a prophet. This is possible in part because of the scarcity of leadership, which encourages persons with initiative to claim authority. Some AICs are called "apostolic churches", and the Church of the Twelve Apostles of Ghana, for example, includes apostles in its ecclesiastical polity. "Syncretistic movements" reflects a judgment that these churches mix Christian beliefs with traditional African customs and ethos; the designation "naturistic movements" similarly highlights the mixture of Christian belief and traditional African cosmology. These names are not mutually exclusive; two or more may be applied to the same church.

In 1981 AICs constituted 15 percent of the total Christian population in sub-Saharan Africa. At present, assuming a growth estimated at more than 2 million per year, their adherents probably number over 83 million, thus constituting a significant section of African Christian demography.

The AIC represents first of all "a place to feel at home". Western missionaries were largely negative about African culture and Africans were alienated from the gospel dressed in European garb. To that extent, the AICs represent an indigenizing movement in Christianity. They in effect protest the verbal and cerebral mode which puts Western Christianity beyond the reach of people's comprehension and experience. Instead, the AICs offer a celebrative religion, making considerable use of symbols, music and dance. Thus they represent cultural renaissance in reaction to the cultural imperialism of the mission work of the historic churches.

Second, while Western churches emphasize Christology, the AICs make the Holy Spirit the focus of belief and practice. While they firmly believe in the person of Jesus Christ,* they appear more at home with the Holy Spirit, especially since Christ has ascended into heaven. This affirmation of the Holy Spirit does not just emphasize sanctification,* as in Methodism, but also points to the Spirit as power made manifest in healing, exorcism, glossolalia and mission. This emphasis on the Spirit asserts both continuity and discontinuity with the many spirits of the heritage of traditional African religious epistemology and ontology. It also represents an experiential supernaturalism which takes seriously the promise of Christ to send his Spirit. To that extent, the phenomenon is a protest against the tendency of the historic churches to institutionalize every manifestation of the Spirit.

Third, the AICs represent a radically biblicalist movement. Taking off from the Protestant claim that the Bible is an open book for individual interpretation, the AICs have seen the Bible as a source to legitimate a wide variety of basic Christian patterns, often of special relevance to local conditions or of special appeal to local people. Thus in Southern Africa the biblical stories regarding the bondage of Israel have become a paradigm for their circumstances. Old Testament accounts of polygyny (e.g. Solomon) and taboos are very much of interest to them. The importance of dreams, visions and trances as media of God's revelation* (cf. Gen. 40; Matt. 1:18-24) is stressed. The penchant for such visitations reflects the mysticism of the AICs, an experience of the divine on earth.

Fourth, the churches of the West and their daughter churches in Africa have the stamp of individualism, which characterizes society after the industrial revolution. That goes against the ethos of African societies, which proverbially view life in communitarian terms. The AICs thus act as a surrogate or auxiliary tribe, creating a self-selected community (e.g. Holy Apostles of Aiyetoro in Nigeria). This sense of community is manifested in pilgrimages to their holy cities, mutual aid in resources, and the sharing of a common vocabulary.

From the foregoing, it can be argued that the AICs represent a renewal movement, particularly in terms of effective evangelism,* better communication of the gospel than was received from the churches founded from the West. For the Pentecostals in particular, glossolalia is a supernatural way by which God wishes the so-called heathens to be converted to Christianity. Indeed, the expectation of a speedy parousia of Christ is a reason for Pentecostal missionary engagement.

Since the historic churches have at best been suspicious of AICs, regarding them as a heathenization of Christianity, it is not surprising that they have rarely found a place in the ecumenical movement. The WCC currently includes only two: the Church of the Lord (Aladura) from Nigeria, which claims a membership of over 1 million, and Eglise du Christ sur la terre par le prophète Simon Kimbangu (EJCSK, Church of Christ on Earth by the Prophet Simon Kimbangu), or Kimbanguist Church, from the Democratic Republic of Congo, which claims a membership of 5 million.

In South Africa the Interdenominational National Ministers have sought to bring together ministers of historic churches with those of AICs. However, there are some notable obstacles. Many AIC leaders are unable to participate in the business of regional ecumenical bodies because of the language used (English or French). On the other hand, AIC leaders complain that they are seldom if ever elected to executive positions in these bodies. Ecumenism for the AIC is based on a different model: the masses of people who unite in prayer, rather than the institutional leaders. Ecumenical relations between historic churches and the AIC are thus largely limited to cooperation in specific ventures.

On the other hand, African Instituted Churches have made efforts to create their own ecumenical networks. For instance, in Zimbabwe in 1972 independent churches created the ecumenical movement of Zimbabwean independent churches known as Fambidzano (cooperative of black – Shona – churches). These churches train their pastors through theological education by extension programmes. In 1978, the Organization of African Instituted Churches (OAICs) was founded in Cairo and registered in Kenya as an international organization. The OAICs works through seven regions, with its headquarters in Nairobi. The regions are represented in the governing body, the general assembly. The OAICs has four programmes: theological education by extension, participatory development, women's issues, and research and communication services. OAICs is an associate member of the All Africa Conference of Churches and is in working relationship with the World Council of Churches.

The phenomenon of AICs on the world ecclesial stage poses a number of issues. Their vibrancy and growth call for a new approach to the tests of being church. How may we find appropriate categories to describe and evaluate their life and mission? There are difficult epistemological considerations to be taken seriously when making abstractions about the meaning of a belief system, especially by those who do not subscribe to it. Second, their presence is a reminder of the limits to well-worn theological approaches. The AICs' constituency is largely non-literate and poor, and they do not respond to neatly defined and articulated theological positions.

AIDS

THE ACQUIRED immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) caused by infection with the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) was first diagnosed in the USA in 1981, although it had been spreading silently for several decades before. It has now reached all continents and assumed epidemic proportions in many countries. By the end of the year 2000 more than 36 million people were living with an HIV infection and some 22 million had already died of AIDS. In the hardest hit regions, particularly in the southern part of sub-Saharan Africa, 20-30% of the adult population are currently infected and more than 13 million children have been orphaned. It is not only the major cause of premature death; it is beginning to destroy families and communities, with severe consequences for the economy and the social coherence of these nations.

A global response to the pandemic began to evolve in the mid to late 1980s, and laid the foundation for continuing national and international efforts. Governments and civil society organized prevention campaigns, addressing the main ways of HIV transmission: sexual intercourse (heterosexual or homosexual); sharing of blood-contaminated needles (mainly in the context of intravenous drug use), blood and blood products; and mother-to-child transmission during pregnancy, delivery or breast-feeding. The United Nations has tried to coordinate these efforts through a co-sponsored programme called UNAIDS.

Prevention efforts have evolved considerably since the early 1980s, away from an exclusive focus on individual behaviour change towards a greater understanding of the societal context for HIV-related risk behaviour. For example, it is widely acknowledged that unless women's rights and dignity are promoted and protected, individual women cannot make and implement free and informed choices about their sexuality, including choice of partners and use of condoms. To address this problem, a consultation organized by the WCC in 1995 created an ecumenical platform of action: "Women's Health and the Challenge of HIV/AIDS" (see Love in a Time of AIDS). More generally, it has become clear that as the HIV/AIDS epidemic matures in a community or country, it affects increasingly those who were already marginalized, discriminated against or stigmatized within the society before HIV/AIDS arrived. The recognition that lack of respect and lack of human rights constitute the societal root causes of vulnerability to HIV/AIDS has slowly transformed strategic thinking about the problem. Efforts are now under way to identify and respond to these root causes while at the same time continuing traditional risk reduction programmes involving information and services.

Churches all over the world have been actively involved from the outset in providing care for people affected by HIV/AIDS. However, they have had considerable problems to address the underlying issues, in particular sexuality, gender relations, discrimination and the unconditional acceptance of People Living With AIDS (PLWAs). The WCC's executive committee issued the first prophetic statement on HIV/AIDS in 1987: "The AIDS crisis challenges us profoundly to be the church in deed and in truth: to be the church as a healing community. AIDS is heart-breaking and challenges the churches to break their own hearts, to repent of inactivity and of rigid moralisms" (Contact, 1987, 7). As it became increasingly imperative to equip the churches better to respond to this crisis and to work on the theological and ethical questions related to HIV/AIDS, the WCC formed a working group that produced a comprehensive study and an official statement, adopted by the central committee in 1997. The statement asked all member churches to "provide a climate of love, acceptance and support for those who are vulnerable to, or affected by, HIV/AIDS" and to promote compassionate care. It emphasized the need for effective prevention and acknowledged all proven methods including sexual abstinence, mutual fidelity, condom use, and safe practices in relation to blood and needles. This document has been very important for the ecumenical movement but still needs to be fully implemented in most member churches.

The Roman Catholic Church has initiated many excellent programmes and been in the forefront of the care response. However, it has always strongly discouraged the use of condoms because of long-held moral traditions prohibiting the use of contraceptives and out of fear that their indiscriminate use might encourage promiscuity. This view has also been shared by a number of other churches. Recently there has been an open discussion about this question among Catholic ethicists and it is to be hoped that the future will see less dogmatic debates and more joint actions of churches and governments.

There has been remarkable scientific progress in the treatment of HIV/AIDS in recent years. The first drug proven to reduce the replication rate of HIV became available already in 1986. But a breakthrough occurred in 1996 when a cocktail now known as highly active antiretroviral therapy (HAART) became available. It is not a cure in the sense that it cannot eliminate the virus from the human body, but it increases significantly life expectancy and quality of life for those PLWAs lucky enough to live in affluent countries that can afford the exorbitant costs of such drugs (more than US$10,000 annually per patient). The price and insufficient health infrastructure make them up to now virtually inaccessible for more than 90% of HIV-infected people who are living in less affluent countries. Recently international efforts have led to reduced prices for these countries, but it needs stronger action by national governments and the international community to overcome this gross inequity and to provide accessible and affordable treatment for all people in need. The recently formed Ecumenical Advocacy Alliance will provide much-needed public and political support for this crucial goal.

Several factors will determine the future of the HIV/AIDS pandemic. As effective prevention strategies are well established by now, the political will to support these approaches is crucial. The UN Special General Assembly on HIV/AIDS in June 2001 demonstrated the unprecedented international attention given to this issue, and provided a unique opportunity to political leaders in the North and the South to express a renewed commitment. Religious organizations and churches in particular have the capacity to influence the behaviour of people so as to render them less vulnerable to HIV, and to promote an attitude of care and love. Uganda is an example where close cooperation between government, churches and other NGOs has led to a reduction of infection rate of about 50%. The joint efforts resulted in delayed sexual intercourse among young people (abstinence), reduced number of casual sex partners (fidelity), and an increase in condom use. The challenge is to replicate this successful model in other countries and regions.

The HIV/AIDS pandemic has challenged communities, nations and global society. Insights from experience in confronting HIV/AIDS are not only essential for progress against this specific epidemic, but have helped achieve a broader understanding of the societal and human rights basis of vulnerability to preventable disease, disability and premature death.

ALEXIS I (SIMANSKY), Patriarch of Moscow and All Russia

B. 9 Nov. 1877; d. 17 April 1970. From 1945 to 1970, he was patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church. After studies in law and then in theology, Alexis became a monk in 1902, a priest in 1903, and bishop of Tikhvin in 1913. Exiled from 1922 to 1926, on his return he took over leadership of the diocese of Novgorod, then moved to Leningrad as metropolitan in 1933. In 1943 he reached a modus vivendi with Stalin on relations between church and state. After long negotiations the ROC joined the WCC in 1961 at the New Delhi assembly. Alexis was the first patriarch to send observers to the Second Vatican Council.*

ALIVISATOS, HAMILKAR SPIRIDONOS

B. 17 May 1887, Lixourion, Greece; d. 14 Aug. 1969, Athens. Alivisatos was a member of the WCC central committee from 1948 until his death, and vice-chairman of the sub-committee on "intercommunion" of the Faith and Order commission, at the time of preparations for the 1952 Lund conference. An Orthodox lay theologian, he obtained his doctorate on John Chrysostom from Athens university in 1908, then studied church history in Berlin and Leipzig under Karl Holl and Adolf von Harnack. Returning to Athens in 1918, he became professor of canon law and pastoral theology at the university. He was particularly concerned with the renewal of the church, the training of priests and the social commitment of Christians. He attended the Stockholm 1925 and Lausanne 1927 conferences, and many of the major ecumenical meetings which followed. In 1936 Alivisatos organized the first international congress of Orthodox theology in Athens, of which he became president. He frequently criticized the WCC for its one-sided Protestant outlook, and pleaded for a more active participation of the Orthodox churches in the ecumenical movement. He was active in the ministry of education and as state representative on the holy synod.

ALL AFRICA CONFERENCE OF CHURCHES

THE AACC is a pan-African organ of cooperation which seeks to provide a common sense of direction for African churches. Its constitutional preamble and statement of basis read: "Believing that the purpose of God for the churches in Africa is life together, in a common obedience to him for the doing of his will in the world, the churches and the national councils of Africa subscribing hereto have constituted the All Africa Conference of Churches as a fellowship of churches for consultation and cooperation within the wider fellowship of the universal church... The All Africa Conference of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and only Saviour according to the scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit." This self-description closely parallels the WCC basis.*

Such an all-Africa organization became possible only in the years after the second world war, when African nationalism gathered momentum. Ghana became the first independent black African nation (apart from Liberia and Ethiopia) in 1957; in the next ten years many more nations became independent, though it was not until March 1990 that the last colony, Namibia, achieved that status. In 1994 South Africa, whose policy of racial separation was divisive both politically and in the church, disavowed apartheid as a national ideology and became integrated with the rest of Africa and African institutions. Such political developments inevitably affected things in the religious sphere, for African Christianity had largely been seen as another aspect of colonization.

As these developments were taking place in Africa, the WCC was seeking to address issues of war and injustice through witness, study and service rooted in faith commitment. But in an age of growing nationalism, the WCC could not operate directly in Africa, and it became clear that a regional Christian agency was needed, especially as intergovernmental regional associations and programmes were assuming increasing significance.

Already in 1958 a conference in Ibadan, Nigeria, considered how the churches could best meet the challenges of African nationalism and impending nationhood. It set up a provisional committee, chaired by Sir Francis Akanu Ibiam, a Nigerian, to prepare for the first AACC assembly, which took place in Kampala, Uganda, in 1963. Kampala adopted a constitution, appointed the Ghanaian-born S.H. Amisshah as first general secretary, and located the secretariat at the Mindolo Ecumenical Foundation in Kitwe, Zambia, from where it was transferred in 1965 to Nairobi. At this point two other bodies were incorporated into the AACC – the African Sunday School Curriculum Project and the Ecumenical Programme for Emergency Action in Africa.

Currently the structure of the AACC includes a general secretariat which comprises the general secretary, an office of international affairs, information and linguistic services, public relations, and finance and administration. The selfhood of the church unit includes evangelism and Christian education, women's work, youth work, and interfaith and human resources development. The refugee and emergency unit provides general assistance through national Christian councils, leadership development, employment and self-help projects, education and training, awareness-building, and emergency service and emergency preparedness. Research and development consultancy deals with programmes and projects for development, partnership in development, situating development in the framework of African history and community, development exchange (experience sharing), development education and special projects. The communication training centre is concerned with consultations, radio broadcasting, audiovisual aids, creative arts and personnel training. The structure is programme-oriented, with the staff travelling to work with church and community leaders in identified areas of greatest need.

One of the success stories of the AACC has been its communication centre. AACC's broadcasting audiovisual services has accepted students from all over Africa, including some government employees, for courses in broadcasting, script-writing, photography and related areas. Another accomplishment was the AACC's role in the Addis Ababa negotiations which led to the reconciliation of warring factions in the Sudan in 1973.

As an ecumenical body the AACC has many links with other ecumenical bodies, such as the WCC and councils of churches overseas, with partner churches and with agencies in other areas of the world. Financially, it remains too dependent on overseas partners, since the poverty of African churches affects the ability of many of them to face up to their financial responsibilities. As a result, African churches may to some extent be said to be in the grip of a dependency syndrome.

Africa is a vast continent. A pan-African organization can be effective only in relation to the local church,* which the AACC considers its vital cell. Local Christian councils are therefore very important to the AACC. For example, since 1989 the national councils of Southern Africa and the AACC have together taken responsibility for coordinating ecumenical emergency work in the sub-region. Similar developments in other sub-regions represent an effort by the AACC to bring the ecumenical movement face to face with local needs and innovative solutions.

But on a continent riddled with linguistic, tribal and ideological differences, there is particular concern that regionalization does not degenerate into regionalism. The AACC has thus given a certain emphasis to all-Africa events (e.g., for women, youth and students, and lay and ordained leaders) to explore the church's mission for today. The hope is that at these meetings the diverse peoples of Africa will share their spiritual and cultural resources, learn from each other's knowledge and experiences, identify common problems and participate in finding possible solutions.

The theme of the 1992 AACC assembly in Harare, was "Abundant Life in Jesus Christ"; five years later its last assembly of the century, in Addis Ababa, had the more sobering theme "Troubled, but not Destroyed". These words, as it were, gathered up the woes of Africa in the last few decades – in Sudan, Rwanda-Burundi, Liberia, Zaire, Nigeria, the flashpoints of internecine strife, abject poverty. The first assembly of the third millennium, in 2002 in Yaoundé, will take place under the theme "Come, Let Us Re-build".

The AACC has been criticized for inefficiency. But it continues to take significant ecumenical initiatives, of which a notable recent case is its effort to broker reconciliation in Rwanda.

ALLEN, ROLAND

B. 29 Dec. 1868, England; d. 9 June 1947, Kenya. Allen was an Anglican missionary to China and proponent of reforms in missionary principles and practices which would focus on establishing independent and indigenous churches. His major books, Missionary Methods: St Paul's or Ours? (1912) and The Spontaneous Expansion of the Church and the Causes Which Hinder It (1927), argued that not allowing new Christians to run their own churches was in effect to deny the power of the Holy Spirit. Churches would grow in God's own time as a "spontaneous" process; meddling and control – especially financial – by missionaries would only hinder this process. Allen's missiology has been especially influential in the development of the Three-Self (self-governing, self-supporting, self-propagating) movement in Chinese Protestantism. See David Paton ed., Reform of the Ministry: A Study in the Work of Roland Allen (London, Lutterworth, 1968).

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL (AI) is an international human rights* organization and movement which works to ensure that the 1948 United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights is respected. AI seeks the release of prisoners of conscience and fair and prompt trials for all political prisoners.

It campaigns against torture* and ill-treatment, "disappearances", political killings and the death penalty and is involved in refugee* work and in human rights education.

In 1961 the British lawyer Peter Benenson published an "Appeal for Amnesty" on behalf of political prisoners. Originally planned to run for two years, the appeal received such wide support that in 1963 the AI permanent secretariat was set up in London. Its work developed rapidly, at first mostly in Europe and North America, later in other continents. In 1977 AI won the Nobel peace prize and in 1978 the UN human rights prize. By 1997 AI had 1 million members and supporters in 162 countries, with amnesty groups in more than 80.

AI's constitution defines its mandate and working principles. AI does not take a stance on the political intentions and objectives of the governments it addresses regarding their observance of human rights. It campaigns for the release of political prisoners regardless of their political, religious or other conscientiously held beliefs or their ethnic origin, sex, colour, language, national or social origin, economic status, birth or other status, provided that such prisoners have not used or advocated violence.

Strict financial rules safeguard AI's independence. It does not accept financial support from governments, and donations from its members and supporters may not exceed a stipulated amount or be designated for specific countries. Money raised by the sale of materials or received from bequests or fines from lawsuits helps to fund the work.

AI tries by all means at its disposal to draw public attention to those people whose rights are being violated. Its work is directed foremost to governments, reminding them of the obligations they themselves have undertaken to protect human rights (through conventions, declarations, etc.) and publicizing cases of violations. In 1991 AI expanded its mandate to include human rights abuses by armed opposition groups. The AI research department in London makes reliable information rapidly available. The secretariat "adopts" a prisoner before he or she is allocated to a national AI group, which then works for his or her immediate and unconditional release.

Other AI means for effective protection of human rights are: publication of an annual report on the development of human rights, country by country; campaigns against the use of torture and the death penalty, against extra-judicial executions and against the “disappearance” of persons; international campaigns concerning specific countries; urgent actions where people are under acute threat through human rights violations; and limited financial help to some prisoners or to their families.

The end of the bipolarized political world in 1989 led to the formation of new AI structures in Central and Eastern Europe, Asia and Africa, struggling for the universality and indivisibility of civil and political as well as social, economic and cultural rights.

The increasing conflicts between nationalities and ethnic groups in the 1990s have led to more and more serious human rights violations, especially in countries with collapsing state structures. The 1997 AI report defined the protection of refugees as its central challenge.

AI has formal international relations with the UN, UNESCO, the Council of Europe, the Organization of African Unity (now African Union) and the Organization of American States; it also cooperates in regional human rights work.

ANATHEMAS

AN ANATHEMA is a formula pronouncing a ban and so excluding sinners from the fellowship of the church and delivering them up for punishment by God.

In the Old Testament herem means something which is under the ban or intended as a sacrifice. It is withdrawn from human use and delivered over to God irrevocably. In the New Testament anathema can mean an offering (Luke 21:5), a curse (1 Cor. 12:3), a curse called down on oneself (Rom. 9:3), and above all a curse by which someone is excommunicated and hence cut off from Christ: if anyone “should proclaim to you a gospel contrary to what we proclaimed to you, let that one be accursed” (Gal. 1:8). And “let any one be accursed who has no love for the Lord” (1 Cor. 16:22). Here Paul probably is using a sacral formula of condemnation taken over from Judaism, in order to express complete separation from Christ, spiritual death and final condemnation.

With the synod of Elvira (around 300) the anathema became a formula of excommunication in the linguistic usage of the church. It added a solemn curse to excommunication,* thus increasing its gravity. In 343 the synod of Gangra produced for the first time the formula, “If anyone... anathema.” The anathema later became an intensified form of excommunication: while simple excommunication (excommunicatio minor) meant only a bar on receiving the sacraments and exclusion from the fellowship of the saints, the anathema meant a complete separation from the church as the Body of Christ.

In dogmatic pronouncements, positive statements of the right doctrine are juridically protected by an accompanying rejection of the opposing position. Most often this is conveyed through the use of the formula si quis dixerit... anathema sit (If anyone says..., let them be excluded). This was the form adopted, for instance, by the council of Trent* in its confrontation with the Reformation, which it condemned as heretical. It should be noted that at this period the concept of heresy* had not yet been so sharply outlined and legally defined in the sense of false doctrine: any separation from the one church and any opposition to its authority was regarded as heresy. Thus not every anathematization by Trent was directed against a false teaching. Infringement of church regulations on discipline were also anathematized, and those who supported these were excluded from the fellowship of the church.

In so far as an anathema relates to ecclesiastical regulations, it can be revoked (as with the Tridentine canon in Enchiridion Symbolorum, no. 1811). With an anathema condemning a false teaching, the first question must be historical: What was it directed against? In many instances, individual sentences torn out of their context, or even mere misunderstandings, were condemned. Doctrines which today are not advanced by the other church were repeatedly anathematized. The formula si quis dixerit... anathema sit opens up ecumenical opportunities in all these instances. It does not assert that anyone is actually teaching a position declared to be wrong; the anathema does not excommunicate anyone by name. Thus the study of the joint theological commission of German Catholics and Protestants entitled "Lehrverurteilungen – kirchentrennend?" (Condemnations of the Reformation era: Do they still divide?, K. Lehmann and W. Pannenberg eds) reached the conclusion that almost without exception the doctrinal condemnations of the 16th century no longer apply to the other church and cannot continue to legitimate excommunications dating from the Reformation period. Those censures which still apply even today have in the interval come to be seen within such a broad framework that the commission concluded that they need not divide the church. In 1994 those conclusions were accepted by the Lutheran churches in Germany and by the German Catholic bishops conference. A corresponding affirmation was made at the international level in the "joint declaration" on the doctrine of justification signed by representatives of the Lutheran World Federation and the Roman Catholic Church in October 1999 (see Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue).

In a common declaration issued by Pope Paul VI and Patriarch Athenagoras on 7 December 1965, the mutual excommunications of 1054 were "erased from the memory" of the church, a step that has not yet led to the restoration of communion* between Rome and Constantinople. In the Leuenberg concordat of 1973, European Lutherans and Reformed included in their establishment of mutual pulpit and altar fellowship the declaration that the mutual condemnations of the 16th century "no longer apply to the contemporary doctrinal position of the assenting churches". The commission for Oriental Orthodox-Orthodox dialogue* concluded in 1993 that both had maintained the orthodox teaching in Christology and that the "removal of anathemas" should follow.

ANGLICAN-BAPTIST CONVERSATIONS

THE LAMBETH conference of 1988 invited the Baptist World Alliance* to enter into conversations with the Anglican Consultative Council,* which the general council of the BWA in 1991 unanimously agreed to do. Further encouraged by the Lambeth conference of 1998, these conversations in fact began in 2000.

In an innovative procedure, the small permanent team from each side is joined for particular meetings by representatives from the country and region in which the gathering takes place (in England, with Britain and Europe; in Myanmar, with India, Korea and Australia; in Kenya, with Uganda, Zimbabwe, South Africa and Nigeria).

ANGLICAN COMMUNION

THE ANGLICAN communion, as described by the Lambeth conference of bishops of 1930, is "a fellowship, within the one holy catholic and apostolic church, of those duly constituted dioceses, provinces or regional churches in communion with the see of Canterbury". These churches "uphold and propagate the catholic and apostolic faith and order as it is generally set forth in the Book of Common Prayer". They are "particular or national churches and, as such, promote within each of their territories a national expression of Christian faith, life and worship". "Anglican" refers not to language or culture but to common ancestry in the Church of England. Today, on account of the varied courses taken by prayer book revision, one has to omit the reference to the Book of Common Prayer, but in other respects the description stands.

The Anglican communion began its separate life in the reign of the English king Henry VIII (d.1547). In 1533-34 the Church of England defied the pope and unilaterally asserted its autonomy under God as a local expression of the universal church. This step hardly altered the outward appearance of the church; the old mass, for instance, remained its central liturgy throughout Henry's reign. But the principle of autonomy was an explosive force which led to more profound and extensive changes.

In the reigns of Edward VI (1547-53) and of Elizabeth I (1558-1603), the Church of England followed largely Protestant ways and separated itself from the Church of Rome in doctrine and ethos as well as in structure. The cornerstones of this settlement were the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion, which rooted the church in the life of the one nation, brought the whole country (in theory) into the one liturgical usage, and stamped an Anglo-Saxon literary style on Anglican worship for future generations. The changes, of course, were originally intended only for the one Anglo-Saxon nation of England.

How did this singular development become a worldwide "communion"?* From the same period, a parallel church in Ireland also became separated from Rome and reformed by monarchical decrees, though the bulk of the Irish people refused to separate themselves from the pope. Another independent Episcopal church developed in Scotland by the late 1600s – not established by law as the Church of England was. During the 18th century this church devised its own eucharistic rites and thus demonstrated its substantial independence from the Church of England, while it retained profound family ancestries, resemblances and ties in common with that church.

From 1633 onwards, the bishop of London had charge of all Church of England congregations beyond the shores of Britain, whether in the American or other colonies, or on the continent of Europe. No bishop of London ever visited such overseas congregations. Thus when in 1776 the American colonies declared their independence from England, the Church of England congregations there faced a crisis. The church in America suffered severe setbacks in the immediate post-war years because of its former association with the British crown and the number of clergy and prominent laity who had been loyalists during the war. Nevertheless, the church soon established its own separate identity. While no longer wanting to be viewed as under the British through the bishop of London, they also did not want to lose the principle and practice of episcopacy.*

Thus, the Connecticut clergy elected Samuel Seabury to be their bishop, and sent him to London for consecration in 1783. The archbishop of Canterbury could not legally give consecration without exacting an oath of loyalty to George III. Not wanting to swear loyalty to the king, Seabury was consecrated instead in 1784 in Aberdeen by three Scottish bishops who had no state connection. Seabury was the first Anglican bishop consecrated for service outside the British Isles.

In 1789 the American Anglicans formed a general convention. The convention modelled its church constitution on the new civil one, authorized a separate prayer book, and declared themselves the autonomous "Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States" ("Episcopal Church" has now become the official alternate name). Thus another adult member of the communion came to be. In 1910 this US church's general convention initiated a commission to bring about a worldwide conference of "all Christian communions" for "questions of faith and order", and later sent delegations to Europe and the Middle East to issue invitations, which in 1927 resulted in the first Faith and Order conference.

Slowly Anglicans in other nations or colonies followed the American pattern. They were settlers on plantations or belonged to companies with private chaplains, or they were the evangelistic result of Anglican voluntary overseas missionary societies of clergy and laity, such as the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (1699), the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (1701) and the Church Missionary Society (1799).

The growing Anglican communities asked the Church of England for bishops. They were consecrated for Nova Scotia (1787) and for other Canadian provinces soon after, and then for Calcutta (1814), Jamaica (1824), Australia (1836), New Zealand (1841) and various parts of Africa from 1853 onwards. Because they were ministering in English colonies, these bishops and their dioceses were viewed as in some respects part of the Church of England, though their structural and organizational problems were very complex. In New Zealand the first bishop, Selwyn (1841-68), held a synod of church people, though such a move was impossible in England itself. In South Africa in the early 1860s Gray, the bishop of Cape Town, attempted to depose the bishop of Natal, Colenso, for heresy.* Colenso appealed to the judicial committee of the Privy Council in London, which in 1865 confirmed him in his episcopate.

At this Colenso decision, agitation arose in the Anglican churches around the world. The church in Canada proposed a common conference “of the members of our Anglican communion” to consider common problems; the archbishop of Canterbury would convene it. From this came the first Lambeth conference in 1867, with 76 bishops in attendance (Lambeth palace is the archbishop’s residence in London). The conference took great care not only to tiptoe around the case of Colenso (who was not invited) but also to ensure that the status of the proceedings was not that of a deliberative synod, but only of a consultative conference.

Since 1867 Lambeth conferences have been held every ten years, except during the two world wars. The conference’s authority remains consultative, not legislative or executive. The archbishop of Canterbury issues the invitations, and thus he decides in doubtful cases who are proper members. To this day, over against this consultative character of the Lambeth conferences, the self-governing churches of the Anglican communion individually enjoy an autonomy comparable to that which the Church of England claimed for itself at the Reformation.

Since the second world war more and more autonomous provinces (or churches, like the Church of England, comprising more than one province) have been created; today there are 38. In recent years inter-Anglican structures or agencies have appeared: at present, the Anglican Consultative Council* and the biennial primates’ meeting in addition to the Lambeth conferences.

It is very difficult to measure the strength of the Anglican churches. In England, because of the state establishment of the Church of England, all the baptized are traditionally viewed as Church of England persons unless they themselves indicate otherwise. This measure would indicate 20-30 million members, far more than the number who worship on Sundays (attendance is under 1 million). In other provinces, a roll of members may reflect actual church strength more accurately. Similarly, the ratios of bishops to congregations, bishops to clergy, and bishops to lay worshippers vary enormously, and one can gain no good comparison of strength from the numbers of bishops. Thus, for example, it was reckoned in the past that the US bishops made up too high a percentage of the Lambeth conference, but in recent decades the bishops of Africa, Asia and Latin America have caught up with them.

Overall, the communion has over 800 active bishops, and perhaps 70 million active or semi-active worshippers. There are discernible signs of a slowly ageing active membership in the more Western parts of the communion, and of continuing growth in many parts of the two-thirds world, particularly in Africa.

The Anglican communion faces grave questions of unity, identity and calling. The lack of central decision-making means, e.g., that the ordination of women* to the presbyterate or episcopate is approved and practised in some parts of the communion and not in others. Liturgical revision is pursued on a province-by-province basis. Reunion with other Christian denominations, which is in theory central to the calling of Anglicans, seems to throw up great trouble when it actually becomes imminent. Internal tensions – such as the ordination of women, and especially their ordination as bishops, and issues of sexual and marital norms and disciplines – threaten the unity of the various provinces. And the communion still wrestles with a problem of its cultural conditioning which arises from its original provenance in England, its conservatism in relation to distinctively Anglo-Saxon ways, and its continued role for the see of Canterbury. Within it Catholic and Reformed (and charismatic) understandings of Christianity and the church* live alongside each other, now in tension, now in some kind of fusion, but rarely truly resolved.

ANGLICAN CONSULTATIVE COUNCIL

IN RESPONSE to an increasing need for stronger international bonds within the Anglican communion,* the 1968 Lambeth conference inaugurated the Anglican Consultative Council (ACC), which met for the first time in 1971. Although its London secretariat is small, it has responsibility for the support of instruments of Anglican unity: the archbishop of Canterbury, the Lambeth conference, the primates meeting, and the ACC itself. It has no legislative authority.

Each province provides an ACC membership of one bishop, one presbyter and one layperson but the number is in fact determined by the size of the 38 autonomous provinces or churches of the communion: in 2000, a total of 91 members. Convened under the presidency of the archbishop of Canterbury, it meets approximately every two to three years, each time in a different part of the world, and issues a report of each meeting. At the 1988 and 1998 Lambeth conferences, the archbishop of Canterbury invited the ACC members to participate with the bishops. The ACC budget is supported by the provinces and by the Compass Rose Society.

ANGLICAN-LUTHERAN DIALOGUE

TWO MAIN factors prompted Anglican-Lutheran convergence. First, the worldwide expansion of both traditions brought them into new local contact. Second, this mutual re-discovery fitted well with the ecumenical strategy expressed by the 1888 Lambeth Quadrilateral.*

PHASE 1: 1909-39

In 1909 the first official Anglican-Lutheran dialogue occurred in Uppsala between the Church of Sweden and the Anglican communion. Discussion centred mainly on the fourth point of the Lambeth Quadrilateral concerning ministry and succession (see apostolicity, episcopacy). The findings were accepted by the Lambeth conference in 1920 and the Swedish bishops in 1922. Anglicans declared that the Swedish church had a true succession of bishops and an orthodox doctrine of the ministry, and that its clergy should be allowed to preach in Anglican churches. Both sides approved eucharistic hospitality and agreed to participate mutually in consecrating bishops.

Similar dialogue was held in 1933-34 by the church of Finland and in 1936-38 by the churches of Latvia and Estonia with the Church of England. Although episcopal succession had been briefly interrupted in Finland and Latvia, it was now decided to restore a common episcopal ministry. On this assurance eucharistic hospitality was approved. Anglo-Scandinavian theological conferences began in 1929 and still meet biennially, Anglo-Nordic-Baltic since 1989.

PHASE 2: 1947-90

In 1947 dialogue began between the Church of England and the churches of Denmark, Iceland and Norway, whose episcopal succession had been interrupted at the Reformation. Mutual eucharistic hospitality ensued in the 1950s. In 1964 theological conferences began between the Church of England and the Evangelical Church in Germany (Federal Republic), including Lutheran, Reformed and United churches.

In 1968 the executive committee of the Lutheran World Federation* (LWF) and the Lambeth conference agreed to launch a worldwide dialogue. This began in 1970, and its first-fruits were the 1973 Pullach report, which registered substantial agreements on sources of authority, the church,* the word and sacraments,* apostolic ministry and worship. Differing convictions were recorded about the historic episcopate. After this, regional Anglican-Lutheran dialogues developed separately in Europe and the USA.

The European commission met during 1980-82 and added further substantial agreements on justification,* baptism,* eucharist,* spiritual life and liturgical worship, ordained ministry and episcopacy,* and the nature of the church. These findings were published as the 1983 Helsinki report. It claimed that no serious obstacles remained in the way of full communion* and recorded similarities of stance towards witnessing to the gospel in modern Europe. It recommended joint Anglican-Lutheran celebration of the eucharist and occasional mutual participation in presbyterial and episcopal ordinations. Anglo-Scandinavian pastoral conferences began in 1977 and continue biennially.

Lutheran-Episcopal dialogue in the USA began in 1969. The Missouri Synod took part but did not endorse the conclusions. In 1982 the three bodies which later formed the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America agreed with the Episcopal Church to recognize each other as churches in which the gospel was preached, to encourage common action between congregations, and to establish interim sharing of the eucharist (see intercommunion).

These regional achievements were summarized in the 1983 Cold Ash report by a joint working group. This acknowledged the helpful influence of multilateral Faith and Order* discussions and bilateral dialogue* with the Roman Catholic Church. It defined the goal of full communion and described the stages by which this could be reached. It recommended creating a joint body to foster Anglican-Lutheran relations at world level, and this has functioned since 1986.

In 1987-88 the Church of England held new talks with the Evangelical Church in both German republics, culminating in the Meissen declaration. This was approved in Germany and England in 1990, and established an interim sharing agreement which significantly increased cooperation, but did not achieve full interchangeability between episcopally and non-episcopally ordained ministers.

PHASE 3: 1990 ONWARDS

During the 1990s a major advance occurred in the publication of three concordats which overcame the remaining difficulties about bishops in historic succession. A fresh approach had been suggested by the 1988 Niagara report, which viewed episcopate (“oversight”) in the light of the church’s mission* and of the ministry of the whole people of God.* It showed how seriously episcopate was regarded at the Reformation and urged that responsible solutions adopted at times of emergency should be evaluated positively. It saw succession as consisting not primarily in an unbroken chain of ordinations but in maintaining the presiding ministry of a church standing in continuity of apostolic faith. It summarized Anglican-Lutheran doctrinal agreements to date and posed key questions about the reform and renewal of the episcopal office. Anglican churches were challenged to recognize the authenticity of Lutheran ministries, and Lutheran churches to conform to the Nicene canon requiring that a bishop be consecrated by at least three bishops. The Niagara report set out practical steps for realizing full communion.

On this basis conversations between the four British and Irish Anglican churches (England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales) and the eight Nordic and Baltic Lutheran churches (Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden; Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania) resulted in the Porvoo declaration.* This acknowledged one another’s churches and ministries and, most significantly, “that the episcopal office is valued and maintained in all our churches”. By 1996 this declaration had been approved by ten of the participating churches (not Denmark and Latvia), thus placing them “in communion”. The signatory churches accepted various practical commitments including the interchange of baptized members and episcopally ordained ministers (without re-ordination) subject to local regulations; mutual participation in the ordination of bishops; and the establishment of appropriate forms of collegial and conciliar consultation.

A similar, though not identical, Concordat of Agreement in the USA proposed recognizing the authenticity of existing ordained ministries, ordaining all future bishops in historic succession, and gradually establishing “full communion”. After narrowly failing to secure the necessary special majority on the Lutheran side, these proposals were simplified and clarified in the document "Called to Common Mission", which was then approved by the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and the Episcopal Church in the USA. Its provisions came into effect from January 2001 and are in process of implementation.

In Canada the proposed Waterloo declaration was published in 1997, and similarly envisaged the interchangeability of existing ordained ministries within the framework of a commitment to value and maintain the historic episcopate in future. This was welcomed in principle by the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada and by the Anglican Church of Canada with overwhelming majorities, and in 1998 the latter body's general synod gave preliminary approval to a canon which would allow Lutheran pastors to serve without re-ordination. With minor amendments the declaration was approved by both bodies meeting at Waterloo in 2001.

Whilst only these three concordats have so far been designed to achieve full communion, Anglican-Lutheran dialogue continues to gather momentum in other regions, especially in Africa, Australia, Brazil, Germany and Southeast Asia. Fresh stimulus towards a common understanding of diaconal ministry was given by the 1996 Hanover report on "The Diaconate as Ecumenical Opportunity".

ANGLICAN-METHODIST DIALOGUE

IN 1988 THE BISHOPS of the Lambeth conference recognized "with regret that there is no international theological dialogue between the Anglican communion and the World Methodist Council" and requested "the Anglican Consultative Council* to initiate conversations with the WMC with a view to the beginning of such a dialogue". The WMC welcomed this opening, and a dialogue was begun in 1992.

The historical background in Anglican-Methodist relations is complex. Methodism* started as a movement of evangelical, sacramental and moral renewal* within the Church of England. Its chief organizer, John Wesley (1703-91), professed continuing allegiance to the Church of England; but the para-ecclesial structures he created made an eventual separation almost inevitable, and after Wesley's death British Methodism developed into distinct denominations, spread throughout the land, though not so numerous in membership as the mother church. In North America, with the independence of the United States and the breaking of political and ecclesiastical ties to the British crown, Wesley's people very soon constituted themselves as the Methodist Episcopal Church (1784), and the new denomination came to outnumber the Protestant Episcopal Church (i.e. the Anglican body in the USA).

Throughout the 19th century, missionaries and emigrants from both Britain and America established Anglican and Methodist churches in other parts of the world, and in the 20th century some of these churches have engaged in union negotiations and plans, usually with Christians of other traditions also. In the Church of South India (1947) and the Church of North India (1970), Methodists (of British provenance) and Anglicans united in episcopally ordered bodies with Christians of Presbyterian, Congregationalist and (in North India) believer-baptist traditions; some provinces of the worldwide Anglican communion, however, showed themselves hesitant about establishing full fellowship with these new churches.

In England, a two-stage plan for Anglican-Methodist unity – a growing together through a period of intercommunion, to precede full organic union – was approved by the Methodist conference but twice failed to achieve sufficient majorities in the assemblies of the Church of England (1969 and 1972). The main obstacle was the method and understanding by which British Methodism would “take episcopacy into its system”, i.e. acquire a ministry recognized by the Church of England to be in the “apostolic succession” it claims for itself. In 1982 a proposed “covenant” – this time including also the United Reformed Church and the Moravian Church – broke down on largely similar grounds.

In the USA, Methodists and Anglicans have largely lacked the “special relationship” which has sometimes been felt to obtain in England. But the Episcopal Church (i.e. Anglican), the United Methodist Church and three African-American Methodist denominations have all participated in the wider Consultation on Church Union.*

The issues with which the Anglican-Methodist International Commission had to deal were, therefore, both familiar and delicate. Work proceeded quickly, and a final text appeared in 1996 under the title “Sharing in the Apostolic Communion”.

Judging that there existed sufficient “agreement in the core of doctrine”, the commission concluded by requesting the Lambeth conference and the World Methodist Council to “affirm and recognize” that “both Anglicans and Methodists belong to the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church of Jesus Christ and participate in the apostolic mission of the whole people of God”; that “in the churches of our two communions the word of God is authentically preached and the sacraments instituted by Christ are duly administered”; and that “our churches share in the common confession and heritage of the apostolic faith”. Since canonical authority resides with each Anglican province and each member denomination of the WMC, the international commission also requested the Lambeth conference and the WMC to establish a joint working group to “prepare a way of celebrating this mutual recognition” and to “prepare guidelines, in full accordance with the principles agreed in the report of the Anglican-Methodist International Commission, whereby the competent authorities at appropriate geographical levels would be enabled to implement” the component features of “growth into fuller communion between Anglicans and Methodists in faith, mission and sacramental life”, namely: “the mutual recognition of members; eucharistic communion going beyond mutual hospitality; mutual recognition and interchangeability of ministries and rites; structures of common decision making”. Among the “principles” of the report are recognition of “the historic episcopate as one sign of the continuity, unity and catholicity of the church” (70) and – without calling into question “the ordination or apostolicity of any of those who have been ordained as Methodist or Anglican ministers according to the due order of their churches” – the expectation that “following the mutual recognition of our two churches, a bishop of the historic episcopate as we have described it will always take part in the ordination of ministers of the word and sacrament by the laying on of hands” (80).

At Rio de Janeiro in 1996 the plenary assembly of the WMC adopted the requested resolutions. In 1998 the Lambeth conference gave the report a more guarded reception: noting that “the relative development of relationships between Anglicans and Methodists varies very considerably” from region to region, the Anglican bishops recommended further study of the report at regional levels, with a view to developing, “where” and “when appropriate”, “agreements of mutual acknowledgment” (not yet “recognition”), albeit monitored by a global joint working group that would look forward to “the reconciliation of churches and, within that, the reconciliation of ordained ministries and structures for common decision making”.

New proposals for a covenant were to be brought to the British Methodist conference and the general synod of the Church of England for consideration in 2002 and possible voting in 2003; the covenant would entail mutual “affirmation” and a common “commitment” to greater sharing in life and mission as steps towards “full visible unity”, although no change in structural relationship between the two churches was planned for the moment. In Ireland, Methodists and Anglicans were already to sign a similarly phrased covenant in September 2002.

ANGLICAN-MORAVIAN CONVERSATIONS

In 1986 the Moravian Church in England invited the Church of England to explore the possibility of moving into “full communion”. Official conversations were set up after reaching a clear understanding of how each church views the notion of “full communion”. A distinction was made between the goal of “full, visible unity”, which is sought with all Christians everywhere, “visible unity” as a relationship in faith, sacraments, ministry, structures and mission, to be lived with one church in any particular place, and significant “steps and stages” which can be taken on the way to visible unity.

The 1995 report of the conversations, The Fetter Lane Common Statement, sets out a portrait of full visible unity drawing on many ecumenical texts, including the 1991 Canberra statement, “The Unity of the Church as Koinonia: Gift and Calling”. Next come agreements in faith, harvesting the results of international, bilateral and multilateral dialogues, made relevant to the very particular history and relationships of Anglicans and Moravians. The text then outlines issues that still need to be faced, including the reconciliation of ministries (both bodies have a threefold ministry* but Anglicans have not recognized Moravian orders on account of an historic interruption in episcopacy*) and how minority and majority churches can move to visible unity without the smaller church losing its own distinctive ethos and tradition. On the basis of the agreements set out, both churches affirmed in the summer of 1996 “The Fetter Lane Declaration”, consisting of a series of mutual recognitions and commitments. A Moravian contact group has been established to give oversight to the new relationship. Wherever there is a Moravian congregation in England, the intention is to establish a formal Local Ecumenical Partnership.* In this way Anglican-Moravian relations in England will take on a distinctive intensive quality. Although the Moravians are numerically small in England, this new official relationship represents an important step on the way to the visible unity of the two churches and marks the first time the Church of England has formally committed itself to another partner within England.

ANGLICAN-ORIENTAL ORTHODOX DIALOGUE

THE HISTORIC Oriental Orthodox churches are the Armenian, the Coptic, the Ethiopian, the Syrian and the Indian. Separated from the great church, some as early as the council of Chalcedon* (451), they were largely ignored by Roman Catholic and Byzantine Christianity until “rediscovered” between the 16th and 18th centuries by European Catholic missionaries who sought to unite them to the papacy. In the 19th century Protestant missionaries built hospitals, colleges and schools in an attempt to win the Oriental Orthodox for the churches of the Reformation. By contrast, the Anglican churches have sought, in friendships extending over more than a century, to support rather than to absorb the Oriental Orthodox.

A further ancient church, the Assyrian Church of the East,* broke its official relationship with the churches to the west of it at the council of Ephesus (431). Once numbering millions of faithful, it has been reduced through persecution to fewer than a million members. Here again the Anglican church made a unique contribution in the 19th century: the archbishop of Canterbury’s Assyrian mission was sent to Kurdistan at the repeated request of the people themselves, not to draw them from their church and customs, but to give them the means of restoring their ancient church to a state of efficiency.

In 1908 the archbishop of Canterbury, Randall Davidson, formed a commission chaired by Bishop John Wordsworth of Salisbury to examine doctrinal oppositions and consider and report on reunion and intercommunion with other churches. The first head of a church to meet and discuss doctrinal matters with the Anglicans in this framework was the Syrian Orthodox Patriarch Moran Mor Abdulla II, during a visit to England in December 1908. For a variety of reasons, impetus was lost on both sides until the 1980s, when the archbishop of Canterbury, Robert Runcie, and the other Anglican primates asked Bishop Henry Hill of Canada to make a number of semi-official visits to the heads of all the Oriental churches in their homelands and to the catholicos patriarch of the Assyrian Church of the East (resident in the USA).

During the sixth assembly of the WCC (Vancouver 1983), with the cooperation of Paulos Mar Gregorios, metropolitan of Delhi (of the Syrian Orthodox Church of India), a meeting was arranged between representatives of all the Oriental churches and Anglicans from England, Scotland and Canada, chaired by the archbishop of Canterbury. The Oriental Orthodox – and the Assyrians who were also present – accepted an Anglican invitation to a theological forum in St Albans, UK, in October 1985.

Discussion at this forum, under the presidency of Samir Kafity, Anglican bishop in Jerusalem, centred on friendship and practical aspects of cooperation, reaffirmed at the Lambeth conference of 1988, such as the development of theological dialogue, establishment of post-graduate theological scholarships, the possibility for some Anglican ministerial students to spend time in Oriental Orthodox theological institutions and monasteries, assistance to theological seminaries of the Oriental Orthodox churches, especially in building up their libraries, exchanging of journals and magazines published by the churches of the two communions, and the establishment of regional coordinating bodies to promote understanding and cooperation among the churches. Noting the particular issues and tensions facing the various Oriental Orthodox churches, Runcie told them, “Your churches are at the interface of some of the greatest issues facing the world today... Anglicans salute your courageous witness. I hope this forum will mark the beginning of a more coordinated Anglican sense of solidarity with you as brothers in the faith. And I believe we are one in faith.”

Archbishop Runcie had further meetings with the patriarchs of these churches, and in July 1997 he and the Coptic Pope Shenouda III signed a common declaration of the Nicene faith, touching on past misunderstandings of the incarnation* of our Lord, “who is perfect in his divinity and perfect in his humanity in a real and perfect union without mingling or commixture, without confusion or change, without division or separation. His divinity did not separate from his humanity for an instant. He who is God eternal and invisible became visible in the flesh, and took upon himself the form of a servant.”

The Lambeth conference of 1988, in welcoming more Oriental Orthodox observers than at any previous Lambeth conference, thus regaining the momentum from 1908 and 1920, expressed the desire “that in view of the importance of Anglican-Oriental Orthodox relations, the Anglican Consultative Council* enter into consultation with the relevant Oriental Orthodox authorities with a view to the forum being upgraded to a formally organized commission” (Resolution 5:9). Meetings of the international forum in Egypt (1989) and England (1993) focused on the production of an agreed statement on Christology, but final agreement has been elusive. At the Lambeth conference of 1998 it was noted that the Oriental Orthodox “are uneasy about what may lie ahead in the Anglican communion. In addition to the new context brought about by the ordination of women in many Anglican provinces, they are concerned about current Anglican debates concerning homosexuality, abortion and other ethical issues.”

Regional forums, principally in the USA, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and Europe, have grown fruitfully; and there are now more Oriental Orthodox students studying in Anglican seminaries and universities than ever before.

ANGLICAN-ORTHODOX DIALOGUE

THERE WERE a few mostly individual contacts between Anglicans and Orthodox from the 16th century to the 19th. Although the two churches were largely ignorant of each other, there was no legacy of mutual hostility. After the first world war contacts became more official as the Ecumenical Patriarchate sent a delegation to the Lambeth conference of 1920, a pan-Orthodox delegation attended that of 1930, and in 1931 a joint doctrinal commission met to discuss the differences between the two churches. It was agreed that the basis of any eventual communion* between them should be a union of faith.* Anglicans had earlier pressed for intercommunion* and recognition of Anglican ordinations, which Orthodox had insisted could come only after doctrinal agreement.

Agreed statements on the mystery of holy orders (see ordination), the eucharist,* holy tradition (see Tradition and traditions), justification* and other matters were drawn up at the Bucharest conference of 1935 between Anglican and Romanian Orthodox theologians. The Romanian Orthodox Church subsequently joined other Orthodox churches which had earlier provisionally recognized Anglican ordinations.

The developing theological dialogue was interrupted by the second world war. Then in 1956 an Anglican-Russian Orthodox theological conference was held in Moscow. When Archbishop Michael Ramsey visited Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras in 1962, the two leaders agreed to begin setting up a joint doctrinal commission. From 1966 to 1972 the two sides met separately to prepare the dialogue.

Anglican-Orthodox joint doctrinal discussions began in 1973. Annual meetings of three sub-commissions followed. The work of this first phase of the official dialogue was drawn together in the Moscow agreed statement of 1976. The titles of its seven sections indicate the subjects covered, on which a measure of agreement was recorded: (1) the knowledge of God, (2) the inspiration and authority of scripture, (3) scripture and Tradition, (4) the authority of the councils, (5) the filioque* clause, (6) the church as the eucharistic community, (7) the invocation of the Holy Spirit in the eucharist.

Symbolically significant was the agreement among the Anglican members that for historical and canonical reasons the filioque should not be in the Nicene Creed.* The first section recognized the difficulties caused for some Anglicans by such traditional Orthodox terms as "divinization", and by the distinction between the essence and energies of God, although agreement on the underlying truths was acknowledged. The fourth noted the traditional Anglican emphasis on the first four ecumenical councils,* compared with Orthodox insistence on the equal importance of all seven. Anglicans agreed that the veneration of icons* was not to be rejected but held it could not be required of all Christians.

In 1977 the dialogue ran into trouble over the ordination of women* to the priesthood, which the Orthodox members realized was now a reality and not just a possibility in Anglicanism. At a special meeting in 1978 the Orthodox made clear their opposition to the ordination of women, but their hope that this would influence any decision at the forthcoming Lambeth conference would be disappointed. Some of them felt strongly that the discussions should now be seen only as an academic and informative exercise, and no longer as an ecclesial endeavour aiming at the ultimate union of the two churches. But a series of visits to the Orthodox churches undertaken in 1979 by the Anglican co-chairman revealed that the Orthodox churches as a whole wished the dialogue to continue. A steering committee that year agreed that the full commission should continue its work.

In 1980 the second phase of the discussions began. Its work was summed up in the Dublin agreed statement of 1984. It contained three main sections, each with several sub-sections: (1) the mystery of the church: approaches to the mystery, the marks of the church, communion and intercommunion, wider leadership within the church, witness, evangelism and service; (2) faith in the Trinity, prayer and holiness: participation in the grace of the holy Trinity, prayer, holiness, the filioque; (3) worship and Tradition: paradoxis-Tradition, worship and the maintenance of the faith, the communion of saints and the departed, icons.

The statement revealed a useful measure of agreement, although it was clear that further work was needed on several issues, among them the way in which the two churches conceived of the unity* and holiness* of the church.* The Orthodox regarded the Orthodox church as the one true church of Christ, which is not and cannot be divided. The Anglicans saw divisions as existing within the church. The Orthodox could not ascribe sinfulness to the church, while Anglicans saw the struggle between grace and sin to be a characteristic of the church on earth. The statement included an epilogue, summarizing points of agreement and disagreement, and those requiring further exploration. The discussions so far had shown that, specific issues apart, Anglicans as Western Christians had a different approach in general to that of Orthodox.

The commission did not meet again in full until 1989. Meanwhile a new Orthodox co-chairman had been appointed, Metropolitan John (Zizioulas) of Pergamon. In spite of further difficulties caused for the Orthodox by the consecration of the first woman bishop in the Episcopal Church (USA) and the varieties of interpretation among some Anglicans of basic Christian beliefs, the Ecumenical Patriarchate and most of the other Orthodox churches remained firmly committed to the dialogue. The reconstituted commission met in June 1989 in New Valamo in Finland. Its title was altered to International Commission for Anglican-Orthodox Theological Dialogue. After fruitful discussion the meeting drew up a programme for the third phase of the dialogue, concentrating on ecclesiology and beginning with an examination of its roots in the doctrine of the Trinity* and in Christology. Since then the commission has met regularly, and in 1998 produced an interim agreed statement on “The Trinity and the Church”, “Christ, the Spirit and the Church”, and “Christ, Humanity and the Church”. Its discussions in 2001 were to concern ordained ministry in the church.

ANGLICAN-REFORMED DIALOGUE

THEOLOGICALLY, both Anglicans and the Reformed are indebted to such Reformation figures as Martin Bucer, Peter Martyr and John Calvin. Historically, if some parts of the two communions have had little contact with each other, elsewhere they have known one another perhaps only too well. In any case, the problems and opportunities of present-day relationships between Anglicans and Reformed (Presbyterians and Congregationalists) are profoundly marked by British history.

The Church of England remains the church “by law established”, and its Articles of Religion (1562) acknowledge the monarch as the temporal head of the church. The 16th-century political conviction was that national unity would be cemented by religious uniformity; but to the separatist precursors of Congregationalism, the state church was antichrist, the monarch having no proper authority over the worship and ordering of Christ’s church (see church and state).

Some 17th-century Independents, like their Presbyterian counterparts, did not object to the establishment of religion, provided the polity was of their favoured kind. After the Cromwellian era, the English monarchy was restored in 1660, and between that date and the passing of the act of uniformity in 1662 almost one-fifth of the clergy (including 172 Congregationalists and over 1700 Presbyterians) left or were ejected from their livings. They refused to give their “unfeigned assent and consent” to the Book of Common Prayer, to submit to re-ordination if they had been non-episcopally ordained and to abjure the solemn league and covenant (1643). The fact that the act of uniformity did not apply to the “foreign reformed churches” in England did not go unnoticed.

The toleration act of 1689 accorded limited and conditional freedom to many Dissenters. Over the next 200 years, the social and other disabilities suffered by Nonconformists were gradually removed, and calls for the disestablishment of the Church of England began to subside. However, the theological questions remain: Who are the church? How are the "crown rights of the Redeemer" to be secured in his church? What is the proper relationship between church and state? Since there are Reformed establishments of varying kinds in Scotland and some of the cantons in Switzerland, and Lutheran ones elsewhere, these questions are of some general ecumenical significance.

Among other traditional difficulties between Reformed and Anglicans are the Reformed opposition in some quarters to confessional subscription (by no means necessarily a cover for heterodoxy) and the Reformed resistance to insistence upon episcopal ordination (see episcopacy, ordination), often coupled with a deep suspicion of sacerdotalism (see priesthood). While many Reformed churches value the pastor pastorum, they fear the sectarianism which attends the elevation of questions of church order* above the gospel. The Anglicans are variously puzzled and appalled by the diverse theologies and ecclesiologies, and by the propensity to secession, displayed by the Reformed family. The Reformed may appear as less than serious about the catholic heritage of faith* and its symbols, as taking liberation to the point of licence, as inadequately sacramental and, in doctrine, as varying from the cerebral (whether conservative or liberal) to the innocent or the perverse. (On this last point, Anglicans risk a tu quoque.)

Nevertheless, Anglicans and Reformed have managed to cooperate in the Religious Tract Society (1799), the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804), the Evangelical Alliance (UK 1846, USA 1867) and, more recently, in local and regional councils of churches* and in the WCC. They have united – with others also – in the Churches of South (1947) and North (1970) India; they have entered into a covenant* in Wales, though the covenant proposed by the (English) Churches' Council for Covenanting failed (1982). There have been Anglo-Scottish Anglican-Presbyterian conversations and, within Scotland, conversations including also the Methodists, although none of these has led so far to union. Anglican-Reformed union negotiations have failed in Nigeria, Ghana, Sri Lanka, the Sudan, Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

God's Reign and Our Unity is the report of the international dialogue (1981-84) sponsored by the Anglican Consultative Council* and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.* The report analyzes the obstacles to union between the two families, sets the traditional ecclesiological problems within the context of the common call to mission,* and concludes with nine specific, challenging recommendations, including the advocacy of reciprocal communion* as a means to unity,* where visible unity is seriously sought. The report raises, but does not treat in detail, the questions of establishment and of the ordination of women* to the ministry (where practice varies in both communions). To date the report has prompted more favourable comment than widespread action.

ANGLICAN-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

THE CONTEMPORARY Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue must be understood against the background of the break in communion* in the 16th century between what were to be known as the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) and the Church of England. This came about over a period of time, for reasons which are both historically and theologically complex.

Among the cluster of events which consolidated the break was the act of supremacy of Henry VIII in 1534, which confirmed the king and his successors as "the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England, called Anglicana Ecclesia". A revised version of this act was passed by Elizabeth I in 1559 declaring the queen to be "the only supreme governor of this realm, and of all other of her highness's dominions and countries as well in all spiritual and ecclesiastical things or causes as in temporal". This legislation deprived the pope of any jurisdiction in the Church of England. Important also was the publication in 1552 of an English ordinal for the consecration of bishops, priests and deacons. The decisive event from the side of Rome was the promulgation in 1570 of the bull Regnans in Excelsis by Pope Pius V, which excommunicated Queen Elizabeth and absolved her subjects of allegiance to her.

These events and their repercussions led to an almost complete estrangement between the RCC and the Church of England until the 20th century. The most momentous event for relations during the intervening period was the promulgation in 1896 by Pope Leo XIII of the apostolic letter Apostolicae Curae. This letter focused the reasons for the estrangement and also specified the issues that had to be faced between Roman Catholics and Anglicans when relations gradually warmed and theological dialogue began. Apostolicae Curae solemnly ratified the consistent practice of unconditionally ordaining Anglican clergymen who wished to be priests in the RCC, judging Anglican ordinations to be "absolutely null and utterly void". The core of Leo XIII's position was that the 1552 ordinal embodied an understanding of the ordained ministry which was in conflict with the teaching of the Catholic church, since it deliberately excluded all reference to the sacrificial nature of the eucharist* and of the priesthood.* This rendered the ordinal defective both in its form and intention, so that ordinations in which it was used were invalid. Apostolicae Curae elicited a response from the archbishops of Canterbury and York in 1897 in which they stated that the intention of the Church of England in its ordinations was precisely to confer the ministry that was instituted by Christ.

The period since Apostolicae Curae, however, has witnessed a slow but sure development in contacts and exchanges between the two communions. Between 1921 and 1925 a series of meetings between Catholics and Anglicans were held in Malines, Belgium, under the presidency of Cardinal Mercier. Official contacts began only after the Second Vatican Council* (1962-65), at which Anglican observers were present throughout. Vatican II developed the theological principles which gave the RCC a clear dogmatic basis for its ecumenical relations with other Christians. After the Council one of the first ecumenical initiatives was with the Anglicans, who now formed a worldwide communion of independent provinces, united in the fact of their communion with the archbishop of Canterbury. Archbishop Michael Ramsey of Canterbury visited Pope Paul VI in 1966, and together they committed their churches to "a serious dialogue which, founded on the gospels and on the ancient common traditions, may lead to that unity in truth for which Christ prayed".

A preparatory commission worked in 1967-68 to produce the Malta report. The first full commission (ARCIC-I) met between 1970 and 1981 and addressed itself to those matters which were historically divisive between Anglicans and Roman Catholics and which figured in the negative verdict on Anglican orders by Leo XIII, namely eucharist and the ordained ministry, together with the question of authority* in the church. The purpose of the dialogue was to reach agreement in faith which would establish "unity in truth". The fruits of the dialogue were published in 1982 in the final report of ARCIC-I, comprising statements on eucharistic doctrine, ministry and ordination,* and authority, together with elucidations. On eucharist and on ministry and ordination, the commission claimed to have reached "substantial agreement" in the sense of unanimous agreement "on matters where it considers that doctrine admits no divergence". The claimed agreements on eucharistic doctrine and ministry and ordination were especially significant, since the judgment of Apostolicae Curae was based precisely on there being a conflict between Catholics and Anglicans on these matters in the 16th century, which was reflected in the ordinal of 1552.

The final report was duly submitted to the authorities of the Anglican communion and the RCC. The former gave its verdict at the 1988 Lambeth conference, which recognized ARCIC's agreed statements and elucidations on eucharist, ministry and ordination as "consonant in substance with the faith of Anglicans" so that "this agreement offers a sufficient basis for taking the next step forward towards the reconciliation of our churches grounded in agreement in faith". The authority statements were recognized "as a firm basis for the direction and agenda of the continuing dialogue on authority". The Roman Catholic response, published in 1991 by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF), called the final report "a significant milestone in relations between the Catholic church and the Anglican communion" but judged that "there still remain between Anglicans and Catholics important differences regarding essential matters of Catholic doctrine". Basically the Roman Catholic response, while praising the achievement of ARCIC, did not find its claim to have reached "substantial agreement" as justified. In September 1993, the co-chairmen of ARCIC-II sent to the Pontifical Council on Christian Unity a text of "clarifications on certain aspects of the agreed statements of the eucharist and ministry" in response to the CDF request. These were well received by the Pontifical Council, whose president, Cardinal Edward I. Cassidy, responded in March 1994 that they had indeed "thrown new light on the questions concerning eucharist and ministry in the final report of ARCIC-I for which further study has been requested", adding that on these issues "no further study would seem to be required at this stage".

During this process of reception and response, the second commission, ARCIC-II, was already continuing the work of the authors of the final report of ARCIC-I. It had been set up in 1982 by Pope John Paul II and Archbishop Robert Runcie of Canterbury "to examine, specially in the light of our respective judgments on the final report, the outstanding doctrinal differences which still separate us" and "to study all that hinders the mutual recognition of the ministries of our communions".

of the Reformation. In 1986, it produced an agreed statement on this topic entitled "Salvation and the Church". This was followed by an ecclesiological study which sought to address some of the questions raised in relation to the commission's earlier work. The fruit of this study was a report entitled "The Church as Communion", finalized in 1990. The commission then turned its attention to moral matters, an area widely perceived as seriously divisive between Catholics and Anglicans, producing in 1993 a report entitled "Life in Christ: Morals, Communion and the Church". The report addressed squarely the differences between the RCC and the Anglican communion on key moral questions but expressed the view that Catholics and Anglicans "derive from the scriptures and Tradition the same controlling vision of the nature and destiny of humanity and share the same fundamental moral values". The commission then began further study on the question of authority, seeking to make further progress on what was the most difficult of the issues addressed by ARCIC-I. By the time of its report "The Gift of Authority" (1998), ARCIC-II believed that its work had resulted in "sufficient agreement on universal primacy as a gift to be shared" for the commission to be able to propose that "such a primacy could be offered and received even before our churches are in full communion". This ministry would "even now help to uphold the legitimate diversity of traditions, strengthening and safeguarding them in fidelity to the gospel"; it would "promote the common good in ways that are not constrained by sectional interests, and offer a continuing and distinctive teaching ministry, particularly in addressing difficult theological and moral issues".

The work of ARCIC-II has been overshadowed, however, by developments in the Anglican communion relating to the ordination of women.* By the time of the 1988 Lambeth conference, six provinces of the Anglican communion had ordained women to the priesthood, and subsequently other provinces, including the Church of England, have gone ahead with women's ordinations. The impact of this on the ARCIC conversations had been summed up in the joint statement of Pope John Paul and Archbishop Runcie at the time of the archbishop's visit to Rome in 1989: "The question and practice of the admission of women to the ministerial priesthood in some provinces of the Anglican communion prevents reconciliation between us even when there is otherwise progress towards agreement in faith on the meaning of the eucharist and the ordained ministry."

It is clear that the path to fuller communion is longer and harder than some may have initially imagined. Nevertheless, the commitment of both sides to the search for fuller communion remains steadfast, and both Anglican and RCC authorities have called for greater exploration of the possibilities of cooperation and common witness* currently available.

ANOINTING OF THE SICK

TWO PASSAGES in the New Testament speak of anointing the sick: the apostolic ministry of healing (Mark 6:13) and the presbyterial rite of anointing (James 5:14-15). Prayers for blessing oil for this purpose are found in the early liturgical sources of both the Eastern and Western churches: the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus (c.215), the prayer book of Serapion (c.350), the Gelasian and Gregorian sacramentaries.

Virtually all the Eastern churches anoint the sick with oil. The rituals for administration are usually based on the Eastern Orthodox Euchologion and when fully implemented are very elaborate, involving seven priests, a deacon, a choir and a representative congregation. The mystery of "prayer oil" (euchelaion) intends the spiritual, physical and mental healing of the sick person.

For the first 800 years in the Western church, anointing with oil was used as a rite for the sick. The bishop was expected to bless the oil; the oil once blessed could be applied by presbyters or by laypeople. Pastoral changes during the Carolingian era and the subsequent theological speculation of the scholastics served to transform the rite into a sacrament for the dying called extreme unction ("last anointing").

The reformers of the 16th century repudiated this practice, since it lacked a dominical command of institution. According to John Calvin and Martin Bucer, anointing the sick belonged to the gift of healing of apostolic times, which was not communicated to later generations; furthermore, the extreme unction of their day scarcely resembled the anointing advised by James. The single exception was the optional rite of anointing retained in the first Anglican Book of Common Prayer of 1549, which in the wake of criticism was deleted from the office of the visitation of the sick in the 1552 prayer book and only restored in the 20th century.

For the Church of England, the convocations of Canterbury (1935) and York (1936) officially approved services for the "administration of holy unction and the laying on of hands". The Authorized Alternative Services (1983) also included anointing within its ministry to the sick. Anointing of the sick has also been incorporated into the prayer books of other Anglican churches, notably in the USA (1928 and again in the 1977 revision), Scotland (1929), South Africa (1954) and Canada (1962, 1983).

At the Second Vatican Council* the Roman Catholic Church initiated a development which has led to the recovery of the original tradition of anointing. The 1972 Ordo unctionis infirmorum eorumque pastoralis curae, to be translated and adapted by the local churches of the Roman communion, envisions anointing as a sacrament* to be administered to those whose health is seriously impaired by sickness or old age. The priest is to anoint the forehead and hands with olive or other vegetable oil, while using a new prayer formulated from the epistle of James, the teaching of the council of Trent,* and the earlier Rituale Romanum of 1614. One of the most successful of the post-Vatican revisions, the anointing is frequently celebrated within a communal service now sanctioned by the new code of canon law.

Finally, the anointing of the sick is also provided for in the Book of Occasional Services, a companion to the Lutheran Book of Worship (1982); in the Book of Worship of the United Church of Christ (1986); and optionally in the "services for wholeness" provided for use with congregations or individuals in the Book of Common Worship (1993) of the Presbyterian Church (USA). All anointing rites surveyed seem to be cast in the format of a visitation for the sick, which also includes a ministry of the word, confession and absolution, the laying on of hands, intercessory prayers for the sick, and sometimes holy communion afterwards.

ANTHROPOLOGY, CULTURAL

IN RECENT years cultural anthropology has emerged as one of the major paradigms for understanding human beings and the mission of the church. Its particular contribution is deep ethnographic studies of different peoples in order to build bridges of understanding between them, and the use of intercultural comparison to develop broad theories of human organization.

Anthropology in Britain had its origins in the broad Christian humanitarian movement of the 19th century, which was concerned with the welfare of natives in the colonies. In 1843 there was a split over how to protect their rights between those who wanted to grant them immediately the full "privileges" of Western civilization and those who wanted to study them before seeking to "raise and protect them". The latter party formed the Anthropological Association in 1863, and eventually found their home in universities.

In the late 19th/early 20th century, anthropologists such as E.B. Tylor (1832-1917), Sir James Frazer (1854-1941) and Lewis Henry Morgan (1818-81) postulated the evolution of societies from savagery to civilization, attributing this to the growth of human rationality from pre-logical to logical. Influenced by this theory, many missionaries assumed the superiority of Western civilization and saw their task as civilizing as well as Christianizing the people they served.

After 1930 the theory of evolution came under attack and, after a fierce battle, the term "civilization" was replaced by "culture". Cultures were assumed to be sui generis, and their preservation an unquestioned good. Introducing change from the outside was condemned.

Two schools of thought emerged after the first world war: social anthropology, pioneered in Britain by A.R. Redcliffe-Brown (1881-1955) and Bronislaw Malinowski (1884-1942), and cultural anthropology, emerging in North America under the leadership of Franz Boas (1858-1942), A.L. Kroeber (1876-1960) and their followers. Redcliffe-Brown and Malinowski, who both did anthropological fieldwork, learned to know other peoples personally as fully human beings. Drawing on Durkheim, they argued that systems of relationships are the foundation for human life, and that these obey laws discoverable by empirical observation and human reason.

Social anthropologists studied tribes in Africa and the South Pacific islands which were living, functioning realities. They saw each society as unique, bound in more or less successful adaptation to a particular environment. Each was homogeneous, and could be explained fully in terms of "social facts". Each was made up of parts that "function" to maintain a harmonious, balanced whole. Societies were seen as morally neutral. Religions and other belief systems were seen as social constructs needed to maintain the social order. For people in one society to judge those in another would be ethnocentric and imperialistic, for there are no moral or cognitive universals by which to evaluate cultures. Social anthropology tends towards social reductionism, and a static view of societies that sees change and conflict as pathological. It has a weak view of history and culture and has to wrestle with its own view of cultural relativism.

Social anthropology has had a deep impact on missions. Liberation theology, the church growth* movement, and the emphasis on “people groups”, “mass movements” and receptivity/resistance show how social dynamics play a major role in the growth and organization of the church.

The pioneers of cultural anthropology studied the North American Indians whose cultures had been scattered. The questions they faced had to do with cultural change and collapse. For these scholars, culture – the beliefs and practices of a people – was the basis for human organization. Cultures were not seen as bounded, tightly integrated units, but as dynamic systems of symbols, rituals, myths, beliefs and world-views. They saw culture as constantly changing, and change as potentially good. This gave rise to the field of applied anthropology which seeks to introduce change with a minimum of cultural dislocation. Christian missions have drawn widely on its insights in developing culturally sensitive outreach and church planting.

Cultural anthropology in turn gave birth to descriptive linguistics, which has enabled scholars to analyze oral languages. In mission, this led to new methods of language learning and dynamic-equivalent Bible translations. Other offspring were the in-depth study of cultures as seen by the people themselves and analysis of cross-cultural communication. In mission this led to a growing rejection of colonial attitudes, to training culturally incarnational missionaries and to working towards partnership in mission. It also led to concern for the contextualization of the gospel not only in worship forms, church polity and evangelistic methods, but also in the development of local theologies.

ANTHROPOLOGY, THEOLOGICAL

IN THE BROADEST sense, the word “anthropology” is used for a wide range of studies which have for their subject matter the human being, as viewed in one aspect or another. “Theological anthropology”, traditionally called the “doctrine of man”, is the study of the human being in relation to God* or in the light of a particular theological or religious context. In Christianity, many theologians have maintained that we do not know God “in himself” but in his relation to us, so that all Christian theology is concerned with the human as well as the divine, so much so that Karl Barth said that “theology would be better called “theanthropology””.

Christian anthropology has its roots in the Bible, particularly in the teachings about creation* and incarnation.* According to the biblical doctrine of creation, the universe is dependent for its being on a more ultimate reality, namely, God. This is true also of the human being, who is part of the creation. So perhaps the first truth we learn about the human reality is its finitude: it is not self-originating, and its meaning must be sought beyond itself. Yet although the human being belongs to the creation and thus stands over against God, humanity is accorded a quite special place in the creation, for in creating the human race God was aiming to bring into being a creature “in his own image” (Gen. 1:27). There has been much debate as to what this “image” is – some have seen it as dominion, others as rationality, others as freedom or even a limited share in the divine creativity. Or the word “spirit” may be used to express this reflection of the divine in the human, where “spirit” is understood as the capacity to reach out beyond actuality to new possibilities. Karl Rahner, for instance, writes: “Man is spirit, because he finds himself situated before being in its totality, which is infinite.” So we have to ask whether there is a contradiction here. The human being is said to be finite, yet reaches out towards the infinite!

The same contrast appears in the alternative story of the creation in Gen. 2. There God creates the man “of dust from the ground”, so that humanity is very definitely described as part of the finite creation. Yet it is immediately added that God “breathed into his nostrils the breath of life”. Although it would be a mistake to read this in any pantheistic way, it does imply that God has imparted to the human being a special gift that makes the difference between the human and the non-human creation – one that may be called “spirit”. So from the beginning there has been in humanity, if not a contradiction, then at least a polarity – the finitude of the dust conjoined with a reaching out for the infinite.

In speaking of this polarity, we are acknowledging that in humanity there is a duality, but not a dualism. The duality is represented in the Genesis story by the “dust from the ground” contrasted with the “breath of life”, and this may be understood as a whole series of polarities – finitude contrasted with the desire for the infinite, reason contrasted with passion, individuality with sociality, the anxiety that comes from death-awareness with the hope that reaches even beyond death, the acceptance of responsibility with the experience of moral impotence, and so on. These violent polarities in the human being have been taken by some philosophers to mean that the human being is an accidental product of the world process, hopelessly involved in internal conflicts, a “useless passion”, in the notorious phrase of Jean-Paul Sartre. But it can equally well be argued that these polarities are themselves part of the meaning of being created “in the image of God”, for God too has been visualized as a “coincidence of opposites” (Nicholas of Cusa), though it has been held that in God the opposites are reconciled in a perfect unity. It can also be argued that it is the very presence of polarities in the human being that makes possible human transcendence, the plasticity of human nature which is not fixed like the nature of an inanimate object but can move to different and, we may hope, higher levels of being.

The duality (or, better, polarity) in the human being as portrayed in the biblical teaching is quite different from the dualism found in Gnosticism, Manichaeism and some modern Eastern religions. In the dualistic view, a human being is compounded of two quite different substances: a material body and an immaterial soul or spirit. The body is held to be evil – or, in any case, of inferior worth – while the soul alone constitutes the truly human element. This view in turn usually (though not always) leads to an ascetic mode of life. But on the biblical view, the material world including the body is good and deserving of care. The fall of human beings into sin* is not the contamination of pure spirit by an alien matter but the fall of the unitary psychosomatic human being. But it must be acknowledged that Christian theology has always been somewhat confused on these matters. While the creation stories and likewise the teaching about resurrection* imply that the body is an original and authentic constituent of a full human being, there have been subsidiary and apparently incompatible beliefs about the “implanting” and the immortality of the soul as a substantial entity distinct from the body.

Related to the duality or polarity that is characteristic of human life is the matter of sex – human beings are either male or female. The sexual difference is not, of course, distinctive of humanity, for the great majority of living organisms are sexually differentiated. But from the point of view of theological anthropology, what is of interest is not the universal biological characteristics of sexuality but rather the important point that when God carried out the intention of forming a creature in his own image, he did not create a solitary individual human being, but a human couple. “So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them” (Gen. 1:27). Among modern theologians, Karl Barth has best brought out the significance of these words. From the first, the human being has been a being-in-relation, or, as the matter can also be expressed, there has never been an “I” without a “Thou”. Sexuality is understood here as the primordial form of sociality. Now if humanity is made in the image of God and if this image requires for its manifestation not just a solitary human being but human beings in community, then this suggests that individuality and sociality, which occur as polarities in every human being and are often in tension with one another, are mysteriously united in the infinite being of God. The insight is already present in the Genesis story, though it was only many centuries later that it came to be theologically formulated in the Christian doctrine of the Triune God (see Trinity).

There are other interesting points to be gathered from these early chapters of Genesis, but one which is of fundamental importance is the teaching that this human community speedily fell into sin. The very plasticity of human nature, the fact that it is capable of transcendence and of growing into the image and likeness of God, implies ineluctably that it must also be capable of regression and of falling away from its possibilities. Ironically, the temptation to which the human couple succumbs is "You will be like God" (Gen. 3:5). The human race was destined for partnership with God in building up the creation but was not satisfied with this finite share in the image of likeness and sought rather to become what in modern times Nietzsche called the Übermensch (superman) who dispenses with God and claims the universe as his own. So in spite of all the tremendous claims that the theological anthropology of the Bible makes for humanity, it declares that this greatest work of creation has been flawed, that our actual humanity fails to coincide with the image or archetype which the Creator intended and made possible. A Christian anthropology must therefore always oppose facile optimism about the human race as embarked on an inevitable progression towards a utopian society to be devised by its own cleverness and philosophies which claim that the human race has within itself the resources for its own salvation.* Any view which ignores the universality of sin in human affairs is unrealistic.

Yet the same plasticity of humanity assures the possibility of repentance and renewal. At the centre of Christianity is the doctrine of incarnation, of the Word made flesh, and this is at the same time the re-creation of humanity. Again Barth is worthy of study, for in expounding his theological anthropology, he focuses attention on Jesus Christ* as the "true man". The "true humanity" of Jesus Christ is more original than sin as the clue to answering the question, "Who or what is man?"

There have, of course, been quite sharp differences on anthropology during the course of Christian history, but these differences have not been so extreme that there is no possibility of reconciliation. Friedrich Schleiermacher claimed that there are two views of humanity so extreme that they must be excluded from Christian theology – that men and women are so good that they have no need of salvation, or so bad that they are incapable of receiving salvation. But there are many possible positions between these extremes.

The Augustinian-Calvinist position has laid great stress on human sinfulness, even on "total depravity". This teaching has been influential chiefly, though not exclusively, among Protestants, who in turn have accused Roman Catholics of leanings towards Pelagianism or at least towards synergism. But in practice many theologians follow a middle course. It is interesting that there was strong emphasis on sin in the theologies of the earlier part of the 20th century, whereas from about 1960 onward that theme has been muted, and we hear more of hope and transcendence. While the reasons for this are not clear, it does seem to indicate that what is at stake is a difference of emphasis rather than something more fundamental.

Another difference (most clearly seen between Western and Eastern Christianity) is between world affirmation and world renunciation. While the doctrine of creation pronounces the material world and the body to be the work of God and fundamentally good, it may be asked whether the churches of the West with all their affluence have come to over-prize the material. The churches of the East have been more ready to acknowledge the temptations of worldly well-being, and they provide for the West a warning "sign of contradiction".

But there is also at the present time a large measure of convergence on the anthropological question. This is because there has emerged since the time of the Enlightenment a new secular interpretation of the human reality (see secularization). It is in opposition to this view that Christian theologians of different traditions have been forced to draw together. The most threatening feature of this secular anthropology is its treatment of the human being as a part of nature,* to be studied in the same way as one studies any natural phenomenon. This has curiously contradictory consequences. On the one hand it leads to a diminution of our respect for men and women as persons, for it excludes such “mythological” ideas that they may be created in the image of God, and it has no categories for dealing with what personalist philosophers have called the I-Thou relation. Yet if this view has demeaned humanity in some respects, it has exaggerated its status in others, for in leaving God out of account, it pushes humanity into the place which Nietzsche had claimed for the “superman”, who takes over control from the God who is no more. Many secular thinkers have revolted against this absorption of human beings into the realm of natural phenomena (e.g. the existentialists), and quite naturally they have had an attraction for theologians. The early Marx too was seeking a more human role for the workers in industrial societies, but this phase passed, and the collapse of Marxism in Eastern Europe today is in large measure due to its failure to protect the values of personal life. Thus a major challenge to the churches today is to work out together a convincing anthropology which will be true to the Christian faith and at the same time will meet the deepest needs of men and women for self-understanding.

ANTICHRIST

“ANTICHRIST” is the biblical name given to the mysterious figures who “in these last days” deny and oppose Christ, in the Johannine epistles (1 John 2:18-19, 4:3; 2 John 7-10); the Beast, worker of wonders and seducer in Rev. 13 and 17, and in 2 Thess. 2:3-10 the Man of Sin or Rebel who will lead the great apostasy or revolt before Christ's second coming. There are some roots in Jewish eschatology, influenced by Persian and Babylonian myths of the battle between God and the devil, a struggle pictured in Dan. 7.

Throughout the history of the church the antichrist has been named and interpreted as a person already on the scene (from Nero to Napoleon, from Hitler and Stalin to Saddam Hussein); also an institution, from the Roman empire to the United Nations; or the papacy itself, according to the Albigenses, the early Waldensians, John Hus in Bohemia, John Wycliffe in England, Martin Luther in Germany, and some 19th-century Protestant missionary societies; or a movement (New Age, new world order, feminism, secular humanism, rock music; also the ecumenical movement, with the WCC as an instrument of Satan); or a world faith (Islam); or simply the personification of all that is evil.

The antichrist is an essential actor in modern premillennialist apocalyptic scenarios, especially as drawn by Christian fundamentalists.

ANTISEMITISM

ANTISEMITISM concerns political, social and economic agitation and activities directed against Jewish people, including speech and behaviour derogatory to people of Jewish origin. The hostility towards Jews denoted by the term (coined by Wilhelm Marr in 1879) was justified by a racist theory that peoples of so-called Aryan (Sanskrit, “noble”) stock are superior in physique and character to those of Semitic stock. The Nazis used the term “Aryan” to mean white and non-Jewish.

While the theory of racial superiority has been used to justify the civil and religious persecution of Jews throughout history, the Jewish community, as an available and often isolated minority, has been a frequent target especially in periods of social and economic instability and crisis when frustrations are deflected onto scapegoats.

Anti-Jewish agitation has existed for several thousand years. The Bible reports it. Jewish tradition sees in the person of Amalek the prototype of anti-Judaism (Deut. 25:17-19). The declaration of Haman to King Ahasuerus (Esth. 3:8-9) is a classic example of anti-Jewish incitement: "There is a certain people scattered and separated among the peoples in all the provinces of your kingdom; their laws are different from those of every other people, and they do not keep the king's laws, so it is not appropriate for the king to tolerate them. If it pleases the king, let a decree be issued for their destruction." In the Roman empire the Jews' devotion to their religion and their special forms of worship were used as a pretext for political discrimination; for example, very few Jews were admitted to full Roman citizenship.

Since the 4th century, Christians have regarded Jews as the killers of Jesus Christ, God-killers (deicidi). With the eventual civil domination of Christianity throughout the Western world, discrimination against Jews on religious grounds became universal and systematic. Social anti-Judaism appeared. Jews were segregated in ghettos, required to wear identifying marks or garments, and economically crippled by restrictions imposed on their business activities. Forced baptisms, public burnings of the Talmud and other Jewish books, and many massacres, especially during the crusades,* remain an indelible part of the history of the Jews in Europe.

The French revolution and the age of Enlightenment increased the separation of church and state and gave rise to modern nation states. In Western Europe this contributed to a gradual integration of Jews into the political, cultural and economic realm of society, though their acceptance by the non-Jewish majority was superficial and ran in cycles, depending on economic and social conditions. In Eastern Europe the system of isolating Jews as an alien economic and social class was never broken. The persecution of Jews culminated in the 1880s in a series of organized massacres or pogroms. Later attacks were stirred up by a forged Russian publication, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion (1905), which purported to detail international Jewish conspiracy to dominate the world, under an emerging antichrist,* the messiah of the Jews.

Antisemitism exploded under the Nazi regime. Hitler announced a "final solution" of the Jewish problem: the annihilation of the Jewish community. By the end of the second world war, about two-thirds or 6 million of the Jews of Europe had been exterminated by massacre, systematic execution and starvation. Recently, small groups of neo-Nazis and white supremacists in different parts of the Western world have been primarily responsible for antisemitic propaganda and acts of vandalism, such as defacing or setting fire to synagogues and desecrating Jewish cemeteries, and physical violence against Jews.

In the Middle East, a new form of anti-Jewish feeling was generated as a result of the escalation of anti-Zionism after the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948. Particularly after occupying the West Bank and Gaza in 1967, Israel encroached on Arab land, displacing many Arabs. This aroused opposition that has sometimes used antisemitic stereotypes inherited from the West.

Polemic writings in Islam against Jews and Judaism, focusing on the Jewish rejection of Muhammad, have complicated the history of Jews and Muslims. But besides these dissonances and negative interaction, there are also confluences and positive interchange because of the kinship between Jews and Muslims as Semitic peoples. For most of the middle ages the large majority of Jews lived under Islamic governance; those who lived in Christian countries of Europe were a minority. One of the most creative parts of Jewish history took place in Islamic lands. Renowned synagogue theologians wrote their principal works in Arabic. There was little Jewish writing in Latin in the midst of medieval Western Christianity.

The Jewish-Christian dialogue cannot ignore antisemitism. As anti-Judaism it has been part of the church since its earliest generations. Christian theology gradually articulated what Jules Isaac called a “teaching of contempt” of living Judaism. What had belonged to the people of Israel became the property of the church. God had repudiated the election of the Jews and chosen the church to replace them as the new people of God, the new Israel. Centuries of anti-Jewish teaching contributed to the endurance of antisemitism in society.

After the second world war, the dialogue between Christians and Jews led to a changed climate. The WCC’s first assembly (Amsterdam 1948) declared: “We call upon the churches we represent to denounce antisemitism, no matter what its origin, as absolutely irreconcilable with the profession and practice of the Christian faith. Antisemitism is a sin against God and man.” In the Second Vatican Council (1962-65), the Roman Catholic Church formally repudiated the charge that all Jews are responsible for the death of Christ and thus are rejected or accursed by God.

Christian churches have made significant statements on antisemitism in recent decades, articulating a commitment to denounce antisemitism wherever it appears and to deal with prejudices. Yet Christians must still contend with the underlying roots of anti-Jewish teaching. The Christian claim of being the people of God, the followers of Jesus, the Messiah or the Christ, seems to dispossess Jews of their self-understanding and thus leave seeds of anti-Judaism untouched and potentially virulent. The self-understanding of the church is not independent from what it thinks about the Jews. If while antisemitism is condemned at one level, its seeds remain in place at another, are Christians left with the paradox of condemning something they justify theologically?

AOTEAROA NEW ZEALAND

NEW ZEALAND, or Aotearoa (in Maori), began its Christian history on two distinct levels – mission church and settler church. Among the indigenous Maori people there were three early competitors: Anglican, Methodist and Roman Catholic. From the 1830s, Maori evangelists of all three allegiances were taking the gospel throughout the land, and the vast majority of Maori conversions were made by other Maori. By 1860, mission work was widespread, particularly in the more densely populated North Island. A few of the tribes adopted a single form of Christianity, but many remain deeply divided denominationally to this day.

In the South Island, with fewer Maori, denominationally oriented colonies were established – Presbyterian at Dunedin (1848) and Anglican at Christchurch (1851). Elsewhere, settler churches reflected the nationality of the immigrants. Anglicans were most numerous, Scottish Presbyterians second, with Irish Roman Catholics third and Methodists fourth. This ratio lasted until recent times, when Roman Catholics overtook Presbyterians as the second largest denomination. Active participation in all four of the major denominations has continued to diminish.

The treaty of Waitangi, signed in 1840 by a large group of Maori chiefs and the crown representative, gave Queen Victoria sovereignty and protected New Zealand from French colonialism, but it also established a bi-cultural foundation for future Aotearoa New Zealand society.

The Anglican, Methodist and Catholic missionaries sought to build a Maori church, and ministry to the smaller settler community was secondary. But as clergy began to arrive for the settler community, competition developed for control of church leadership, especially because of the valuable land holdings. When national church bodies were established, the Maori were forgotten. The 1857 constitution of the Anglican church has no Maori signatures; although Maori probably made up the majority of Anglicans in the country, it was assumed that the Church Missionary Society would take care of them. But the settler structures soon found the missionary establishment too threatening, and Maori concerns found little support until well into the 20th century. The first Maori Anglican priest was ordained in 1853, but it was only in 1944 that the first Maori was ordained as a Catholic priest and in 1950 that a Maori was received into full connection with the Methodist conference.

Tribal concerns soon outweighed those of the denomination. Attempts were made to create indigenized forms of Christianity, two of which survive today. The Ratana Church, emerging from the Methodist tradition under the leadership of a powerful healer and preacher, has gained a central position in Maori political life and remains strong. The more syncretistic Ringatu Church comprises a smaller but often more nationalistic membership.

In 1928 an Anglican bishop of Aotearoa – a bishop for all Maori, though only a suffragan to the bishop of Waiapu – was appointed, as much to stem the tide of the Ratana movement as to respond to the concerns of the Maori. Fifty years later the creation of the Maori section of the Anglican church gave the Maori bishop joint jurisdiction with each diocesan bishop. The Presbyterian Maori synod was formed in 1954, the Methodist Maori division in 1973, and the Maori council of the Roman Catholic Church in 1983.

A national council of churches was formed in 1941 and it established a Maori section in 1945. In 1982 the Maori in virtually all the major churches, including the RCC, founded a Maori Council of Churches – Te Runanga Whakawhanaunga I Nga Haahi O Aotearoa. The national council of churches was replaced in 1987 by the Conference of Churches in Aotearoa New Zealand (CCANZ), intended as a truly indigenously expression of the ecumenical journey that could ground ecumenism in local realities. While the RCC joined in organizing and funding the CCANZ, the congregational polity of the Baptists, Congregationalists and Associated Churches of Christ – all members of the former NCC – made it impossible for their national unions to accept the goals of the new body. While the Baptists and Congregationalists remain outside the conference, a new category of associate membership enabled the Associated Churches of Christ to affiliate with it.

Between the mid-1960s and mid-1970s Anglicans, Associated Churches of Christ, Congregationalists, Methodists and Presbyterians were involved in church union negotiations, but this narrowly failed to secure Anglican approval, even though the Protestants accepted the Anglican insistence on the historic episcopate. A similar fate in 1980 befell a proposal for a covenant and unification of ministries. Many “cooperative ventures” nevertheless sprang up at the local level.

Five Aotearoa New Zealand churches – Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist, Associated Churches of Christ and Baptist – are members of the WCC and the Christian Conference of Asia;* the Salvation Army, Congregationalists and Quakers belong to the latter. Despite the country’s location between Australia and the Pacific, Aotearoa New Zealand is not involved in any Pacific ecumenical body. Presbyterians, Methodist and Catholics maintain confessional and missionary ties with Polynesia, and Anglicans with Melanesia. CCANZ made statements about the 1987 coup d’etat in Fiji and the ensuing religious extremism; and Methodists in Aotearoa New Zealand have tried to help relax tensions within Fijian Methodism. Inter-Polynesian tensions in Auckland have also elicited denominational attempts at mediation. Some CCANZ and denominational leaders have expressed the hope that the country’s growing role as a Pacific nation may lead to some sort of South Pacific ecumenical body in the future.

At the beginning of the new millennium, ecumenism in Aotearoa New Zealand is in sad retreat. In 1999, the Roman Catholic Church withdrew from CCANZ, and although there have been new members among the smaller denominations, the financial commitment to CCANZ from the larger denominations has diminished.

APARTHEID

THE NATIONAL party of South Africa was elected to power in 1948 in a white minority election on a platform of apartheid (lit. "apartness") as a basis for protecting white power and privilege. The relationship between apartheid as a political ideology entrenched in law and earlier forms of racial segregation is a complex one. South African history comprises various initiatives by whites to exclude others from having rights in a common society. For example, the land act, as the foundation stone of the entire apartheid system, became law in 1913, restricting blacks (who constitute over 80% of the population) to 13% of the land surface.

The theological controversy around apartheid is commonly traced back to the debate in the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk (NGK) in 1829. The synod of that church found it to be theologically wrong that "persons of colour" should be prevented from sharing in holy communion with whites. Then, in 1857, the synod ruled that "as a result of the weakness of some", segregation should be permitted.

Support for segregation and apartheid within the Afrikaans Reformed churches developed into an involved ideology in subsequent decades, culminating in the 1974 report of the NGK, Human Relations and the South African Scene in the Light of Scripture, which provided explicit biblical and theological legitimation of apartheid. This contributed directly to the declaration of heresy against this church by the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* (WARC) in 1982. A revised document, entitled Church and Society, was published in 1986. It moves away from the theological white nationalism of the Verwoerdian-Vorster era of apartheid, but it failed to move the NGK towards the complete eradication of apartheid either in church or in society.

Member churches of the South African Council of Churches and others like the Roman Catholic Church have rejected apartheid on theological grounds but often were implicated (if only by default) in the practice and implementation of it. At the world level, several churches have also rejected apartheid, declaring it a sin in its persistent disobedience of the word of God, a heresy (WARC 1982), a status confessionis (Lutheran World Federation* 1977). After the Cottesloe* consultation (1960), the NGK withdrew from the WCC, which has issued several resolutions condemning apartheid as "a sin which, as a fundamental matter of faith, is to be rejected as a perversion of the gospel" (central committee 1980). On a practical level the WCC, through its Programme to Combat Racism,* implemented and recommended to the member churches and to social institutions measures such as disinvestment (1972), discouraging of white immigration to South Africa (1972), refusal of bank loans (1974), and the application of comprehensive sanctions (1980). The Roman Catholic Church also expressed its rejection and, as part of ecumenical national councils, participated in such direct anti-apartheid actions. But there can be no doubt that the brunt of the struggle against apartheid was shouldered by the people in South Africa and by their lay and religious leaders.

Statutory apartheid ended with the first democratic elections in April 1994, leading to the inauguration of President Nelson Mandela on 10 May of that year.

In 1995 the South African government set up a Commission on Truth and Reconciliation chaired by Archbishop Desmond Tutu, which had as its aim to gather as much evidence as possible on human rights abuses in South Africa during the apartheid period and to enable the people of South Africa to move towards a reconciled future based on the recognition of the truth of the past. It presented its seven-volume report to President Mandela in October 1998. In his address to the assembly of the South African Council of Churches in August 2001, WCC general secretary Konrad Raiser said that the Commission's process and report was "a model of the way in which a society can face up to the painful and destructive memories of the past, and practise reconciliation and restore justice".

APOSTASY

THE WORD (from the Greek apostasia) means publicly relinquishing one religion for another. The biblical authors use "apostasy" specifically in the sense of falling away from one's religion, rejecting one's faith. Thus Antiochus Epiphanes seeks to get the Jews to apostatize by forcing them to sacrifice to idols (1 Macc. 2:15). The apostle Paul is accused of apostasy by the Jews (Acts 21:21). The apostasy of those who are not true Christians will precede the coming of the antichrist* (2 Thess. 2:3; cf. 1 Tim. 4:1; Heb. 3:12). When Christians were persecuted by the Roman empire, several types of apostasy were distinguished: sacrificati acquiesced in sacrificing to idols, traditores handed over the sacred books to the persecutors, thurificati acquiesced in burning incense before the images of the false gods or the emperor, libellatici obtained false certificates testifying that they had taken part in the worship of idols, acta facientes contrived to be mentioned in the public records as having renounced their faith. A notable 4th-century instance of apostasy was that of the Emperor Julian (361-63), Constantine the Great's nephew, who came to be known as "the Apostate".

Apostasy in the early church led to very severe penalties in canon law.* Clergy who had apostatized because of human fear were repudiated by the church. Clergy who disowned their clerical status as such lost it; if they repented, they were received back as laity. Those who had apostatized and had forced others to do so were excommunicated (see EXCOMMUNICATION) for ten years if they were of the laity. According to Basil the Great's canon 73, those who repented after apostatizing had to remain among the penitents ("mourners") for the rest of their lives and were re-admitted to communion* only just before their death. Later apostates were punished by the confiscation of their property, exile and sometimes death.

Abandonment of one Christian confession for another has also been called apostasy. In the past such a move could lead to the stake; and it is still regarded by the church as apostasy, and therefore subject in canon law to penalties, which are all the more strict because the transfer can be regarded as heresy* if there are significant doctrinal differences between the confession left and the body joined. When there is a return to the church that has been left, rites of reconciliation* are accompanied by rituals for the abjuration of heresy.

The churches permit apostates to be reconciled with their faith. The rites vary, depending as a rule on whether the apostate is a minister of the church, a religious, or a layperson. The former public penalties have been replaced by others within the church courts. In the Orthodox church, repenting apostates, just like heretics and schismatics, are anointed with holy chrism during the ceremony by which they return to the church.

APOSTLES' CREED

SINCE THE early centuries of the Christian era the creed known as the Apostles' Creed has been the confession of faith (or symbol) professed in the Western churches by those receiving baptism.* The Eastern churches had formulations of the baptismal creed very similar to the Apostles' Creed. Adolf von Harnack and Hans Lietzmann traced it back to the 2nd-century church of Rome. Whether or not this is correct, it is already found in outline by the end of the 2nd century (e.g. Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.10.1). Well attested in Rome, Milan and Aquileia, Dalmatia and Africa at the end of the 4th century, it received its final form (textus receptus) some time between the 7th and 9th centuries.

From the beginning of Christianity the content of the profession of faith* at baptism has been regarded as belonging to the heart of the apostolic Tradition. The 3rd-century Syriac Didascalia (6.12) attributes the formulation of the rule of faith to the apostles; and at the end of the 4th century, Ambrose of Milan (Letters 42.5; Explanation of the Creed 2-3) and Rufinus of Aquileia (Commentary on the Apostles' Creed 3) regard the baptismal creed of the Roman church as the work of the apostles, hence its name.

The Nicene Creed,* received by the churches of East and West, is similar in structure to the Apostles' Creed but has an important addition on the divinity of Christ, made by the council of Nicea* (325), and another on the equality of the Holy Spirit* in relation to the Father and the Son, made by the council of Constantinople* (381).

The Apostles' Creed is Trinitarian in pattern, i.e. it is structured upon the persons of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. The central, Christological part dealing with the work of Christ is the most developed. The mention of the Holy Spirit is followed by the reference to the church,* in which the Spirit is at work, and to certain essential points of the Christian faith. The Apostles' Creed is not an exhaustive statement of the Christian faith; it says nothing about scripture, the eucharist,* ministry* or justification.* As these points of the Christian faith were not the subject of controversy in the early church, they required no further explanation and are taken for granted here as being derived directly from scripture.

Compared with the Nicene Creed, the Apostles' Creed has ten distinctive features. (1) Unlike all the Eastern creeds, it affirms the faith in the Father, Son, Holy Spirit and church without stressing their oneness (see 1 Cor. 8:6; Eph. 4:5-6). (2) It distinguishes between conception through the Holy Spirit (Matt. 1:18; Luke 1:35) and birth through the Virgin Mary. (3) It affirms that Christ descended into hell (see Phil. 2:10-11; Rom. 10:7; Acts 2:24; 1 Pet. 3:19), thus indicating the universality of the salvation* he effected. (4) It proclaims that Christ is risen "from the dead" (Luke 24:46). (5) It underlines the divinity of the glorified Christ, stating that he is seated at the right hand of God, the Father Almighty (Matt. 26:64 par.). (6) It highlights faith in the holiness and hence the divinity of the Spirit by repeating at the start of the third section the opening affirmation of the creed, "I believe...". (7) It professes the church as holy (see holiness) and catholic (see catholicity), expressing by the use of this second adjective the belief that, animated by the Holy Spirit, the church alone is established for the salvation in Christ of all human beings (see Eph. 1:22-23, 3:10-11). (8) It mentions belief in "the communion of saints", i.e. among Christians who are all members of the one body of Christ (see 1 Cor. 10:16-17). (9) Whereas the Nicene Creed affirms that we "look for the resurrection of the dead", the Apostles' Creed, countering the Gnostic heresy, speaks of "the resurrection of the body" (Luke 24:39; John 6:51-56; Acts 2:30 [Western text]; 1 Cor. 15:36-39). (10) The statement of belief in the Holy Spirit is followed without transition by belief in the church, in the communion of saints,* the forgiveness of sins, the resurrection* of the body, and the life everlasting, thereby making it clear that all these are manifestations of the Spirit: the entire life of the church and of the Christian believer, right up to its final consummation, is under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

The Apostles' Creed has a special ecumenical value. In the Lambeth Quadrilateral* of 1888, the Anglican communion deliberately added it to the four fundamental articles of Chicago (1886) "as the baptismal symbol", while considering the Nicene Creed "as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith". The Lausanne Faith and Order conference of 1927 placed the Apostles' Creed alongside the Nicene Creed as the common expression of the Christian faith. It recognized that although the Eastern Orthodox church gives no place to the Apostles' Creed in its rites, it agrees with its teaching. This was repeated at the Edinburgh conference (1938), and then at the third assembly of the WCC at New Delhi (1961). Traditionally the baptismal symbol of the Roman Catholic Church, the Apostles' Creed has also since Vatican II* been introduced as an alternative to the Nicene Creed in the celebration of the eucharist.

APOSTOLIC TRADITION

"TRADITION"* is a dynamic concept and presupposes a double movement, of receiving and transmitting. The apostolic Tradition is the gospel, the word and event of salvation,* entrusted by Jesus to the disciples he had chosen as its witnesses so that they in turn might hand it on with authority* (see Matt. 28:18-20; Acts 1:21-22). In 1 Cor., the term refers to the teaching Paul transmitted to the church in Corinth (11:2), especially concerning the Lord's supper (11:23) and the event of Christ's death and resurrection (15:3) (see common confession, creeds, eucharist). Paul, the last to be favoured with an appearance of the risen Christ (15:8), had himself "received" the apostolic witness which he "handed on" to the Corinthians (15:3-7). What Paul received and transmitted was the gospel (15:1); it was also the meaning and manner of celebrating the Lord's supper (11:20,24-26), the central act of the life of the community Paul had founded at Corinth. The context of 1 Cor. 11 shows that the apostolic Tradition has a "centre" – the gospel of the saving passion of the Lord (11:23-26; cf. 15:1-8) – and a broader context of practices which the apostle bases on the mystery of Christ (11:2-16).

The pastoral epistles do not use the terminology of "tradition", but the idea itself is everywhere implicit. Once again the gospel is the centre of the message (1 Tim. 1:15-18; 3:16-4:6) and connected with it, the context of ecclesial life, though with a new emphasis. False teachings oppose the gospel transmitted by the apostle. This authentic apostolic Tradition is referred to three times as a deposit – that which "has been entrusted" (1 Tim. 6:20; 2 Tim. 1:12,14) – associated with the idea of keeping or guarding, and fairly close to the Jewish idea of tradition (Ceslaus Spicq). But what is transmitted and guarded is, above all, the gospel. The organization of the church and the norms handed down by Paul for this purpose are meaningful only in reference to the transmission of the unique gospel (see church order, church discipline).

THE TRADITION OF THE CHURCH

From the sub-apostolic age onwards, works like the Didache formulated the norms of Christian and ecclesial life as apostolic Tradition. The spread of the Gnostic heresy during the 2nd century, which appealed to secret traditions of the apostles, led the mainstream church to define the apostolic Tradition in more precise terms by establishing which writings were of apostolic origin and could and should be read in congregations, thus forming the "canon"* of the New Testament. At the same time, norms emerged for interpreting these writings in harmony with the prophecies in the Jewish scriptures which foretold the Christ and his work of salvation (see hermeneutics).

Around 180, in a work entitled Against Heresies, Irenaeus of Lyons established rules for discerning the authentic Christian message in opposition to the errors of the Gnostics. He insisted that the church throughout the world has always had a single and unique rule of faith,* whose articles constitute the substance of what would become the baptismal creed (see creeds), "for although the languages of the world are dissimilar, yet the import of the Tradition is one and the same" (1.10.2; see catholicity). The sole content of the Tradition is the preaching of the apostles deposited in the scriptures, interpreted by the bishops instituted in the churches by the apostles (3.3.1; see teaching authority, episcopacy). This interpretation goes beyond a simple exegesis of the prophecies recorded in the Old Testament or of the New Testament writings, for, as already in Paul's case, reading scripture in accordance with the apostolic Tradition has concrete implications for the life of the churches and the behaviour of the Christian. In opposition to the secret traditions the heretics claimed to have received from the apostles, Irenaeus asserts the public character of the Tradition and denounces all forms of esotericism. This Tradition is not necessarily written, for the "barbarians who believe in Christ... having salvation written in their hearts by the Spirit without ink... carefully preserve the ancient Tradition" (3.4.2).

This concept of Tradition was developed by subsequent Christian theologians and polemicists (Tertullian, Hippolytus, Origen). Some of them listed the unwritten traditions in force in ecclesial life deriving from the apostles (Tertullian, Concerning the Crown 3-4; Hippolytus in his Apostolic Tradition, where ecclesiastical organization derives from the apostles by tradition; the Syriac Didascalia; and church orders based on these writings). At the beginning of the 5th century a principle was formulated which is rooted in this conception of the intimate bond between the heritage of the apostles, scripture (as read in the universal tradition of the church) and ecclesial life: namely, the normative character of the life of prayer of the universal church for the faith (see lex orandi, lex credendi).

WRITTEN TRADITION AND UNWRITTEN SECRET TRADITION

With Basil of Caesarea (d.379), there is an appreciable development in the concept of apostolic Tradition. Despite the arguments used in anti-Gnostic controversy, Basil distinguishes between the tradition of the kerygma (preaching), open even to the unbaptized, and that of the dogma* (doctrine), reserved for the initiated, those partaking of the sacraments* (On the Holy Spirit 27.66). Basil derives this distinction from the apostles and fathers, who from the beginning arranged all that concerns the churches; in fact, these unwritten secret traditions mainly concerned the rites, formulas and prayers used in the celebration of baptism* and the eucharist.* He was alone in his day in developing this distinction between two kinds of tradition; and he affirmed that “both have the same force for the faith”.

NICEA II, THE REFORMERS, TRENT

The council of Nicea II (787) legitimated the reverence offered to the holy images by the Tradition of the church, which was seen as comprising both written and unwritten elements. The former is the gospel and the writings of the holy fathers, to the latter belong the holy images and the veneration accorded to the book of the gospels and to the cross. Christian antiquity, especially in its Greek and Oriental form, did not always distinguish clearly between scripture, commentaries on it and the various traditions which constituted the fabric of the church's life. The Tradition appeared rather as a living continuity with the church of the apostles and fathers, with scripture at its heart.

A clear distinction between scripture and the traditions began to establish itself in the West in the 12th and 13th centuries with the desire for a life in accordance with the gospel sine glossa, first with the scholastics, then with John Wycliffe and Jan Hus, who rejected traditions which contradicted scripture and the pure gospel and identified the apostolic Tradition with scripture (see Tradition and traditions), thereby laying the foundations for a pivotal principle of Luther and Calvin: sola scriptura, on the basis of which every tradition which appeared not to be founded directly on the canonical text of scripture was rejected. While Calvin often quotes the fathers, he does so in order to explain the pure gospel which the apostles deposited in writing as “sure and genuine scribes of the Holy Spirit” (Institutes 4.8.9).

In reaction, the council of Trent* in 1546 affirmed that “the truths and rules” of the gospel are preserved “in [all] the written books” of the OT and NT “and in the unwritten traditions which, received by the apostles from the mouth of Christ himself or from the apostles themselves, have come down to us in the Catholic church in unbroken succession” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum, 1501). The council refused to set scripture in opposition to the apostolic Tradition but wished also to maintain the position of Basil and Nicea II. Post-Tridentine theologians often misinterpreted Trent's juxtaposition of scripture and oral traditions as pointing to two sources of the Christian revelation* – some going so far as to assert that truth is “partly” in scripture and “partly” in the unwritten traditions.

SCRIPTURE AND TRADITION IN THE CONTEMPORARY ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

Emergence in the second half of the 20th century from the blind alley of four centuries' conflict between Protestants and Catholics is due partly to a better acquaintance with church history and partly to ecumenical contacts with Orthodox. Eastern Orthodox teaching remained in fact a living reality in the churches of the East, which attach particular importance not only to the teachings of the councils and the fathers but also to the celebration of the liturgy as living and authoritative witnesses to the apostolic Tradition. Orthodox participation in the work of the Faith and Order* commission and in the debates of Vatican II* helped to get the dialogue moving again.

The fourth world conference of F&O (Montreal 1963) produced a report on "Scripture, Tradition and traditions" which, by starting from the Tradition of the gospel (the paradosis of the kerygma; see Tradition and traditions), considerably transformed the approaches to the problem.

In November 1962 the Second Vatican Council rejected a draft text entitled "The Sources of Revelation" and then drafted and promulgated another entitled "The Word of God" (the constitution Dei Verbum). It outlines the central place of scripture in the life of the church, the relationship (concordance) between scripture and Tradition, and the role of the magisterium* (the teaching of the bishops, councils and the pope) in the authentic interpretation of the word of God.* The originality of this text lay in its recalling that the apostolic Tradition had preceded the scriptures of the NT (para. 7), and that the apostolic Tradition embraces the whole life and faith of the church and is continued in the church (para. 8). Scripture and Tradition, "flowing out from the same divine well-spring, come together in some fashion to form one thing and move towards the same goal. Sacred scripture is the speech of God as it is put down in writing under the breath of the Holy Spirit. And Tradition transmits in its entirety the word of God which has been entrusted to... the successors of the apostles so that, enlightened by the Spirit of truth, they might faithfully preserve, expound and spread it abroad by their preaching. Thus it comes about that the church does not draw her certainty about all revealed truths from the holy scriptures alone. Hence, both scripture and Tradition must be accepted and honoured with equal feelings of devotion and reverence" (para. 9). In no way, however, is Tradition a "source" of revelation independent of scripture.

That the problem of the Tradition has largely been settled is recognized in numerous subsequent bilateral dialogues (Anglican-Lutheran 1972, paras 32-44; Anglican-Orthodox 1976, paras 9-12; 1984, paras 47-52,90-92; Anglican-Roman Catholic 1981, para. 2; Disciples-Roman Catholic 1981, paras 46-56; Lutheran-Roman Catholic 1972, paras 14-34; 1980, paras 62-65; 1984, para. 57; Reformed-Roman Catholic 1977, paras 25-30). The 1991 Singapore report of the Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue* was entirely devoted to "The Apostolic Tradition". Following the official responses of the churches to the Lima document on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry,* further clarifications were suggested on the relationship between church and word of God, scripture and Tradition (see Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry 1982-1990, pp.131-42); and following the world conference on F&O at Santiago de Compostela in 1993, these led in part to A Treasure in Earthen Vessels: An Instrument for an Ecumenical Reflection on Hermeneutics (1998).

APOSTOLICITY

ALTHOUGH the concept of apostolicity is not found explicitly in the New Testament, the basic range of ideas it expresses appears in such passages as Acts 2:42 ("They devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching and fellowship, to the breaking of bread and the prayers"), John 20:21 ("As the Father has sent me, so I send you") and Eph. 2:20 ("built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, with Christ Jesus himself as the cornerstone"). Together with unity,* holiness* and catholicity,* it is one of four concepts traditionally regarded as marks or essential qualities of the church.*

Although some Protestants explicitly reject the notion of (Roman) catholicity, all churches claim to be apostolic in the broad sense of the word. Apostolicity is not an essentially contested concept to the same extent as catholicity is. Nevertheless, to the extent that the apostolic succession of bishops, guaranteed (as has often been claimed) by the laying on of hands, is treated as a necessary condition of both catholicity and apostolicity, there is still a sharp contrast between many Protestants on the one hand, and the Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican and some Lutheran churches on the other, which have bishops and also claim to have preserved the apostolic succession intact. Many Protestants stress instead their faithfulness to the pure doctrines and biblically legitimated practices of the original apostles as the main (if not the sole) criterion of genuine apostolicity.

The uncontroversial aspects of apostolicity were summarized by a WCC Faith and Order consultation (Chantilly 1985) as part of the study "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today". The church is apostolic (1) in that it recognizes its fundamental identity with the church of Christ's apostles, as presented in the NT; (2) in its faithfulness to the word of God lived out and understood in the apostolic tradition, guided by the Holy Spirit throughout the centuries and expressed in the creeds; (3) by its celebration of the sacraments instituted by Christ and practised by the apostles; (4) by the continuity of its ministry (whether in the apostolic succession or otherwise is not specified here because it is dealt with elsewhere; see further below), initially taken up by the apostles, in the service of Christ; (5) by being a missionary church which, following the example of the apostles, will not cease to proclaim the gospel to the whole of humankind until Christ comes again in glory. The trend in current ecumenical thinking is to see the basis of what is now called "our unity in the apostolic faith" in the Old and New Testaments, the Apostles' Creed* and the Nicene Creed,* and in the two dominical sacraments of baptism* and the eucharist,* all as interpreted primarily by the classical ecumenical councils.*

In addition to the problems posed by the historic episcopate and the apostolic succession guaranteed by the laying on of hands, a number of other issues also arise with respect to the content of the "apostolic faith", e.g. which councils are indeed ecumenical (and should therefore be received by the whole of the undivided church); whether or not the two Marian dogmas belong to the basic apostolic tradition; whether the filioque* clause should or should not be included in the classic credal statements of the church.

THE CONCEPT OF APOSTOLICITY THROUGH THE AGES

As a basic concept, "apostolicity" (from the Greek apostellein, to send out on an errand or a mission) is intimately related both to the message and to the bearers of the message. The original messengers were the apostles mentioned in the NT. There were also Jewish emissaries who taught in the synagogues and collected taxes to support the rabbis. In late Judaism, however, the task of the shaliach was an ad hoc ministry, not transferable to others; nor did the Jewish shaliach have an explicit ecclesiastical status or role. His authority, precisely defined by the one who sent him, ended when he had accomplished each mission.

Jesus was sent by the Father; in turn, he called, commissioned and sent out his own disciples to proclaim the coming of the kingdom of God* and to teach the radical ethic of the kingdom. After Jesus' death and resurrection, however, the main task of the apostle was to proclaim that Jesus had indeed risen from the dead. Paul uses the noun "apostle" to denote those sent out by local churches (e.g. Titus in 2 Cor. 8:23). In the primitive church, there were more apostles than the original twelve called by Jesus, e.g. the successor of Judas, and Paul himself. Peter was often regarded as the first of the apostles; hence the development of a Petrine ministry in the Roman Catholic Church (see primacy).

Although it is sometimes argued that the apostolic ministry of the original eye-witnesses was unique and not directly transferable to successors, few Christians would deny that the church is apostolic in the sense that it is built on the foundation of the original apostles (to the extent that it proclaims their message and performs the same essential tasks). In this sense, the notion of apostolicity is “absolutely basic to the church’s comprehension of itself”, as J.N.D. Kelly insists (One in Christ, 1970). Furthermore, the second generation of Christian teachers and evangelists (appropriately called the apostolic fathers) believed they were acting “in the manner of an apostle”, as Ignatius claimed in the 2nd century. Nevertheless, Ignatius did not say that he was acting in an official capacity or by virtue of an explicitly apostolic status; indeed, he clearly states that he was not acting “as an apostle” (Letter to the Trallians 3.3).

In other words, the quality or attribute of apostolicity is primarily an attribute or quality of the whole church. Its ministry is apostolic because the church itself is (or should be) apostolic. Its teachings are apostolic because, as Justin tells us (First Apology 66.3), they are the “memoirs” of the apostles. The church is therefore apostolic to the extent that it participates in the original mission which Jesus entrusted to his own disciples. Those whom Jesus originally commissioned and sent out were commanded not only to teach all nations but also to baptize them in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:19). They were also commanded to commemorate the Lord’s death “until he comes”, i.e. by celebrating the eucharist in remembrance of Jesus.

But if apostolic ministry involves the right kind of proclamation and the right kind of sacraments, what is the right kind of teaching and sacraments? To counteract heretics and schismatics, lists of authoritative writings circulated, showing which scriptures had been produced by the original apostles or were believed to have originated from an apostle. In this way, the principle of a canon* of scriptures eventually emerged. Apostolic teachings were also officially codified in the form of creeds* such as the Nicene Creed and the Apostles’ Creed. The latter was not (as was once believed) composed by the original apostles, but its common name does illustrate that authoritative witness is indeed supposed to be apostolic.

Derivation from the original apostles thus became an essential criterion of what is genuinely apostolic. Thus it is not surprising that in the disputes with heretics and schismatics at the end of the 2nd century, Irenaeus and Tertullian began to stress not only the continuity of authentic Christian teaching with the original apostolic preaching but also the historical links in the processes of tradition which eventually go back to the original apostles. Irenaeus states that “those who were appointed bishops in the churches by the apostles and those who have been their successors down to our own day” not only possess “true knowledge” but also preserve “the ancient structure of the church throughout the world, and the character of the Body of Christ according to the successions of the bishops to whom they entrusted the church which is in every place” (Against Heresies 3.3.1, 4.52.2). Hence the importance which came to be given to Tradition (see Tradition and traditions) – the process of handing on the original apostolic message – and to the authoritative interpretation of the original message, whose meaning was now the subject of theological dispute. The process of interpretation also generated traditions, i.e. authoritative interpretations of the original message. Authentic interpreters could trace their line of succession right back to the original apostles, while ecumenical councils were also regarded as authentic interpreters of the same apostolic tradition. Succession lists were soon drawn up in order to demonstrate which bishops were entitled to claim that their sees were apostolic. The so-called apostolic succession by laying on of hands thus came to be seen as a guarantee of authoritative apostolic teaching and validly performed sacraments.

While Tertullian had insisted that every local church founded by an apostle or sharing in the same apostolic faith is indeed an “apostolic church”, Cyprian, Jerome and Augustine virtually identify the apostolate and the episcopate.

During the Reformation,* many Protestants saw the accumulation of “innovations” over the centuries as contradicting the traditional assumption that only the faith and practice of the original apostles is authentically apostolic. They applied the criterion “by scripture alone” to determine which doctrines were pure and which practices genuinely apostolic. Apostolic succession was no longer believed to guarantee the purity and the continuation of apostolic faith and practice – hence the rejection of both apostolic succession and the office of bishops. Since then, episcopacy,* ministry and ordination* have been controversial issues between many Protestants and the episcopal churches. The question of whether apostolic faith and practice could legitimately “develop”, raised by Cardinal Newman in the 1840s, became a crucial ecumenical issue.

APOSTOLICITY IN RECENT ECUMENICAL THINKING

While there is ecumenical consensus on a wide range of issues relating to the apostolicity of the church and substantial progress on the issues of development of doctrine and the precise relationship between apostolic witness and apostolic succession, these issues have not yet been finally resolved. Development of doctrine has been discussed primarily by Anglicans, Lutherans and Roman Catholics, especially in the US. The key questions – the precise criteria of legitimate and illegitimate developments and who decides what the criteria should be – cannot easily be answered as long as either the NT church or the classic conciliar period is regarded as absolutely normative. There is no consensus on the disputed question of the relationship between continuity and change in the Christian church, except that it is impossible simply to repriminate whatever is regarded as the normative period.

This particular issue, however, has been placed in a new context by the growing realization that apostolicity is a process with both historical and eschatological dimensions. Even if the structures of “apostolic ministry” which soon developed in the early church have been preserved intact, the fullness of church unity, holiness, catholicity and apostolicity will not be realized until the advent of the kingdom of God. This recognition relativizes the previous assumption that a particular church has been or is a “perfect society” (in the sense of ecclesiologically correct, as distinct from morally perfect – a rather different matter). No single church is invulnerable to criticism; all, therefore, need to change. “Normative periods” can no longer simply be appealed to in order to unite divided churches or to realize the fullness which unity, holiness, catholicity and apostolicity ultimately seem to require. The notion that the church has ever been undivided and completely perfect (in an ecclesiological sense) is increasingly regarded as a historical myth.

The ecumenical discussion of the relationship between apostolic witness and apostolic succession has primarily taken place in the Faith and Order process which produced the Lima text of 1982 on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (BEM).* Basically, the solution offered to the still-divided churches assumes that what has traditionally been called apostolic succession does not necessarily guarantee faithfulness to apostolic faith and practice, though the recovery of the traditional threefold ministry (including bishops) could properly be regarded as a sign that apostolic continuity has been preserved in practice. The role of charismatic and prophetic leadership is also stressed. In the first place, however, it is the Holy Spirit that keeps the church “in the apostolic tradition until the fulfilment of history in the kingdom of God” (M34). Most important, it is “the apostolic tradition of the church as a whole” which is now regarded as the “primary manifestation of apostolic succession”, though the ministerial succession (by laying on of hands) is also treated as “an expression” of both the permanence and the continuity of the original apostolic mission. The orderly transmission of the ordained ministry not only emphasizes the vocation of the minister but also expresses the continuity of the church throughout history. Ministerial structures which do not serve the apostolic faith ought to be reformed (M35).

While BEM explicitly states that apostolic continuity has been preserved in churches which did not retain “succession through the episcopate” (M37), it also expresses a hope that non-episcopal churches will accept “episcopal succession as a sign, though not a guarantee, of the continuity and unity of the church” (M38). In other words: “The church as the Body of Christ and the eschatological people of God is constituted by the Holy Spirit through a diversity of gifts or ministries. Among these gifts a ministry of episcopate is necessary to express and safeguard the unity of the body. Every church needs this ministry of unity in some form in order to be the church of God, the one Body of Christ, a sign of the unity of all in the kingdom" (M23). Finally, in order to proceed to the mutual recognition of ministries, it will be necessary for those churches which have preserved episcopal succession to recognize the apostolicity of non-episcopal churches and their ministers; while churches which lack episcopal succession are invited to strengthen and deepen their own apostolic continuity by recovering what is called "the sign of the episcopal succession" (M53).

ART IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

ART AS A MEDIUM of ecumenical communication was not much evident in the initial period of the ecumenical movement. The main medium of expression was verbal, either through speeches at ecumenical meetings or printed reports and study materials.

While theological emphasis on the proclamation of the word of God reinforced the importance given to biblical preaching and Bible study in the pre-television era, involvement in mission fields led some early pioneers to try to make the arts once again relevant to the expression of the faith. Daniel J. Fleming published Each with His Own Brush: Contemporary Christian Art in Asia and Africa (1938), and Arno Lehmann introduced artistic expressions of Christian faith from the third world in Die Kunst der jungen Kirchen (1957) and Afro-asiatische christliche Kunst (1966).

In assemblies and major ecumenical conferences, the presence of Orthodox representatives with their colourful icons* not only attested to a long Christian tradition but also awakened the artistic sensitivity of many other participants. The WCC's Uppsala assembly (1968) broke with the dominating verbal way of communication through the stimulating Czech puppet film Homo Homini and a dramatic presentation led by Olov Hartman.

The Nairobi assembly (1975) was not only filled with the sound of African drama and music but also enriched by powerful African artworks related to the theme "Jesus Christ Frees and Unites", exhibited in various parts of the conference centre where the assembly met. There were also enlarged reproductions from Christian Art in Asia. One of the most striking and challenging artworks was Brazilian sculptor Guido Rocha's "The Tortured Christ", which vividly depicted the agonizing cry of oppressed and captive people.

Preparations for the Vancouver assembly (1983) included publication of a set of 14 pictures to promote the discussion of the theme, "Jesus Christ - the Life of the World". Visual symbols and images were also taken more seriously by the assembly itself than at previous ecumenical gatherings. A native arbour, "a sacred meditative area among the trees", was set aside, and a 15-metre totem pole, carved by Native Canadian prisoners, was raised (later permanently located in the grounds of the Ecumenical Institute at Bossey), not only to remind participants of the spiritual quest through the ages but also to show concern for the land claims of all indigenous peoples. A major Asian Christian art exhibition included 50 original works by 22 Asian artists. There was also a film festival and a children's art exhibition on assembly themes.

What was most significant about the Christian art at the Vancouver assembly was that it was treated not as a side show but as central to the life of the assembly. The vibrant experience of worship in a large tent was an occasion of celebration that used all the gifts of God, including visual art and music. With the aid of a film on Andrey Rublyev's famous 15th-century icon of the Trinity, the assembly was led in a meditation on the Triune God, the ultimate ground for both the unity of the church and the renewal of the human community.

At the seventh assembly (Canberra 1991) a large and colourful artwork on the theme by Wenten Rubuntja, one of the outstanding contemporary Australian Aboriginal artists, was placed at the centre of the assembly hall. In the tent where daily worship took place, several powerful Aboriginal paintings stimulated the creative spirit of adoration and communion. Similarly at the eighth assembly (Harare 1998), in a striking reversal of the normal sequence, an artist's rendition of a typical Shona stone sculpture, commissioned for a pre-assembly poster, was later carved by a Zimbabwean artist and served throughout the assembly as a pointer to the theme "Turn to God – Rejoice in Hope", before being presented to the WCC as a gift from the host churches. In the assembly worship tent, a large wooden cross provided a dramatic Christian image in an African idiom.

In 1978 the Christian Conference of Asia* sponsored the first consultation in Bali for Asian Christian artists, which resulted in the formation of the Asian Christian Art Association and the establishment of a quarterly journal, Image: Christ and Art in Asia.

Various fascinating African Christian art works were compiled by Josef Franz Thiel. On the world level, two books written by Hans-Ruedi Weber show the ecumenical relationship between Christian faith and the visual arts.

In recent years, with the universal trend in communication of combining message and image, audio and visual media, the churches at both regional and world levels have intensified the combined effort to use music and visual images, dance and drama in the life and mission of the church. Also there has been a noticeable concern to revitalize the traditional indigenous artistic expressions in the worship life of congregations. An example is seen in the church in Bali, Indonesia, where the offering ceremony is performed by dance with music played on traditional Balinese musical instruments.

There is need for an ecumenical enquiry into the kind of church architecture which can facilitate integrating, relevant and participatory worship. In order to begin to address this need, the Christian Conference of Asia has undertaken a project on church architecture.

ASCETICISM

CHRISTIAN asceticism is as old as the church. In the biblical accounts of the temptation of Jesus in the desert are found all the elements later used in the ascetic traditions: the isolation of the desert, a harsh and discouraging environment which puts one entirely at God's mercy and where one cannot escape God's presence; fasting, which indicates that we seek to live by God alone and not by what we can do ourselves; meditation on scripture, the key to distinguishing between spirits (1 Cor. 12:10); temptation; and the power of the Spirit, guiding the soul safely despite all the promptings of the Enemy. This is the opposite of the path of pride, violence and self-glorification; in fact, it is the way of the cross in the footsteps of Jesus.

This way of following Christ was first experienced in the persecutions during the earliest centuries of the church. Its ideal is martyrdom,* undergone not arrogantly but with forgiveness for the persecutors. After the peace of Constantine in the 4th century, the monastic life embraced a new way of following Christ (intended to be just as radical), with self-denial and an opening of oneself to the mercy of God through all of everyday life.

Some of the desert fathers and their followers deliberately subjected themselves to great sufferings to renew the power of the spirit over the body and so come closer to the angels, who are bodiless spirits and see

God. But sometimes the only purpose of that suffering was to enable them to be one with the suffering Christ and show him the genuineness of their love.

The search for an austerity which would detach one from the attractions of the flesh and the refinements of civilization led to vows of chastity, which called for complete commitment to the age to come, poverty and effective care for the poor, and obedience to a chosen or simply accepted guide.

Another line of tradition in Eastern and Western monasticism is the quest for purity of heart and continuous prayer, two aspects of the same mystery. Purity of heart, removing every obstacle to the pursuit of love towards God and one's fellow human beings, comes more from our experience of God's mercy than from extended efforts at self-purification. It develops through setting the heart on guard against proud and vain thoughts, doubts, grudges, desires for revenge or domination, and progresses through compassion for all God's creatures, to a desire for the salvation of souls. From this perspective, it is apparent that we need not reach God through great works: total confidence in his love and loving faithfulness in small things also lead to that end. This is the fruitful path of spiritual childhood, well illustrated for modern times by Thérèse de Lisieux.

Constant prayer would make it possible to have real contact of the whole person with God, because it harmoniously eliminates the conflict between head and heart. This prayer is the antidote to every kind of modern depression, to the grip of ideologies and systems and to a naive and sentimental credulity which might otherwise distort our faith. If that faith remains living and true, our common enterprises as Christians of different churches will have their source very close to God and will be safe from rivalries, discouragements and activism. Perhaps we shall then together be able to discover fruitful solutions to the problems of our day, including the divisions among Christians.

Followers of Christ are called to remain in company with God, in the radiance of his splendour, to reject pride and hatred, to consider others as greater than we are, always to hope and to impart hope, to devote ourselves to serving the poor and to being witnesses in this world of a merciful and forgiving God. Our prayer life should be like a great retreat, detaching us from comfort, the consumer society, prejudices and collective selfishness, so that together we may listen to the word of God* and, in the face of temptations, discover the way Christ marks out for us today. "If any want to become my followers, let them deny themselves and take up their cross daily and follow me" (Luke 9:23).

ASIA: CHINA

NESTORIAN Christianity, introduced into China in the 8th century, disappeared with the demise of non-Chinese hegemony because most of its adherents were not ethnic Chinese. Nor did a 13th-century Roman Catholic mission attempted by John of Mountcorvo show any lasting results. More successful was the 16th-century approach by the Italian Jesuit Matteo Ricci, due to the missionary practice of accommodation, an attempt at interfaith dialogue* and adoption of indigenous Chinese forms of worship, customs and culture.* Ricci was ahead of his time; his methods soon led to the rites controversy between the Vatican and the Jesuits and eventually to the banning of Jesuit activity in 1702 by the pope. The principle of missionary indigenization, raised for the first time by Ricci's work, continues to influence both Roman Catholic and Protestant missiological discussion.

In 1807 Protestant missionary Robert Morrison was sent out by a society that was at the time non-denominational. Indeed, the largest of all societies in terms of missionary personnel, the China Inland Mission (now the Overseas Missionary Fellowship) has always been non-denominational. In the numerous areas where CIM worked, the churches it set up were not allied to a Western denomination except in west China, where Anglican CIM workers were concentrated.

Beginning about 1873, an independent Christian movement with Chinese leadership arose. Represented by such indigenous churches as the Little Flock (1924), the True Jesus Church (1917), the Jesus Family (1926) and independent gospel halls, this movement tended to be biblicist and ethnocentric in orientation and highly critical of the theologies and politics of the mission-related denominations. Today, as earlier, the inheritors of this independent church tradition are the most reluctant ecumenists.

All this must be seen against the backdrop of the larger story of the struggles of Chinese people – the moral and political bankruptcy of the Ch'ng dynasty, the humiliations of the unequal treaties with Western colonial powers, the republican revolution, the partition of China by the warlords, the desperate and unsuccessful attempts at reform, the anti-Christian movements, massive famine and starvation, the complete breakdown of the social and political fabric, the Japanese invasions, the founding of the People's Republic in 1949 and the regimentation of life under communist rule.

None of these circumstances encouraged ecumenism. The situation is further complicated by the popular perception of Protestantism and Catholicism as two different religions, one worshipping the King Above (Shang Di), the other the Heavenly Lord (Tian Thu). Still, there have been significant if sporadic signs towards oneness and ambitions if ambiguous attempts at unity.* There were missionary conferences in 1877, 1890 and 1907, comity agreements and cooperation in publishing of Bibles, tracts and other literature. Cooperation in education, especially at the university level but also in secondary schools and theological education, began very early and was seminal in forming the church leaders who led the church unity movement after liberation. The influence of the YMCA* and the YWCA* was always a unifying factor. Other pre-liberation expressions of ecumenical life included relief programmes and joint evangelistic campaigns in the cities, with common planning and exchanges of preachers. In the 1940s the relief programmes produced the first working contacts between Protestants and Catholics, one step towards unity.

The beginning of the ecumenical movement in China thus goes back earlier than the founding of the National Council of Churches (NCC) in 1922. The NCC included perhaps half of the Protestant Christian bodies, mainly the more liberal ones, though some did not join for non-theological reasons, especially the deep hesitation of the Chinese to centralize power.

The Church of Christ in China was formed in 1927. A united church, composed of Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists and Baptists, it became the largest church in China, with about 120,000 members.

When the WCC was founded in 1948, four Chinese churches were founding members, and T.C. Chao, a noted theologian at Yenching University, was elected one of the six presidents. Chao resigned in 1952 in protest against the WCC's approval of UN intervention in the Korean war, and Chinese participation in the WCC soon dwindled and then disappeared for more than 30 years.

When the communists came forcibly to power in 1949, they drastically reduced the number of churches throughout the country and sent pastors and priests to farms and factories. But there were two other developments: the founding of the Three-Self Patriotic Movement and the Catholic Patriotic Association (CPA). The former was conceived in 1951 but formed in 1954 as the only legitimate umbrella grouping for Protestant activities. The parallel CPA held its first national congress in 1957. Both movements were formed at the behest of the government and not as expressions of ecumenicity. Nor did the denominations die out immediately with the founding of the two movements: most existed formally until the cultural revolution (1966). Ties with foreign churches were severed in 1951, after the outbreak of the Korean war, but even before that church workers and Buddhist and Taoist clergy were being "laicized", and some were imprisoned. In any case, with the founding of the Three-Self Patriotic Movement, Chinese Protestantism entered a post-denominational period.

The formation of the CPA meant that the government had decided to split the RCC. Pope Pius XII, on the other hand, also forced the issue of which side the Roman Catholics must take, under pain of excommunication. The CPA thus co-exists with an underground Roman Catholic Church which has consecrated more than 50 bishops, thus compounding the delicate situation between the two, though neither side has declared the other schismatic.

From 1966 to 1976, during the cultural revolution, organized religious life was impossible. Church premises were taken over and public worship was stopped, forcing Christians to meet in homes. But the cultural revolution and other anti-religious campaigns had a positive ecumenical influence in terms of human relations. Personal contacts and friendships among Catholics and Protestant clergy in prison have helped to change the previous mutually hostile images. Contacts established in the working meetings of religious leaders by the bureau of religious affairs have also helped, and with Buddhist and Muslim leaders as well. But formal Roman Catholic-Protestant conversations are still non-existent, though in Hong Kong, for practical reasons, informal talks occur. The house church* movement, which has always been a part of Chinese Christianity, assumed an important new role. New communities of faith, consisting of Christians from different traditions, came into being all over the country.

In 1980 another important stage of the story of China began, as the nation opened its door to the world once again. Public worship resumed, first among ethnic Koreans in Shenyang and a few churches in Shanghai. In its first meeting for 20 years, the Three-Self Patriotic Movement announced two historic decisions: the formation of the China Christian Council (CCC), which would henceforth be responsible for the churches' pastoral and theological needs, and the acknowledgment of the legitimacy of the house churches: "All Christians, whether worshipping in church premises or at homes, [should] share in the same mind, looking towards Jesus."

Since then the China Christian Council has helped to re-claim, restore and re-institute thousands of congregations, set up 14 Bible schools and a seminary, and established other support ministries. There is now a common hymnal and a common catechism as a common offering to the churches. Ties with overseas churches both mainline and evangelical, and with ecumenical organizations, were re-established. In 1981 an official delegation of the CCC, led by Bishop

K.H. Ting, met with the leadership of the Christian Conference of Asia in Hong Kong. Soon afterwards, official contacts with the WCC began. In 1989 the CCC sent an official delegation to the WCC world mission conference in San Antonio, Texas, USA. Two years later, after intensive discussions, a Chinese delegation, led by Bishop Ting, attended the WCC's seventh assembly in Canberra. The China Christian Council – seen as a uniting church in process of formation rather than as a national council of churches – was one of seven new members welcomed into the World Council.

Although there was a great deal of support among Christians for the CCC's intensive effort to establish itself as a united church, the attempt was finally postponed due to a strong minority opposition. The Christians of the Little Flock tradition recognize the local church* as the only genuine form of the church. While participating in the CCC, they could not envisage being part of a nationwide church. In the end, the CCC chose not to go ahead with a plan that would exclude the dissenters. A contributing factor to the hesitancy in some quarters is the traditional suspicion many Chinese Christians harbour towards the idea of episcopacy.*

In 1984, the Amity Foundation was formed, inspired and led by Christians. Given the Chinese churches' adherence to the principle of self-support, it was seen as a new instrument to facilitate Christian involvement in China's modernization, particularly in education, health and social work. The foundation has received much personnel and financial support from both within and without China, and with the help of the United Bible Societies* it has built a printing plant in Nanjing which has turned out 1 million copies of much-sought-after Bibles.

Despite the difficulties, the 1980s were probably the most encouraging and fruitful period for Chinese Christianity in a century. Faith took root, witness* matured, the churches grew, and a spirit of ecumenicity slowly but surely took hold. Then in June 1989, the army crushed the pro-democracy demonstrations in Beijing, and similar protests were suppressed in the major cities in China.

Many Christians had been involved in the popular movement for democracy. Yet church growth is still reported to be high: an increase from some 3 million in 1980 to over 20 million in 2000. According to the CCC, the new conversions are largely the result of faith healing experiences.

Relations between the church in China and the church in Hong Kong were broken off in 1956, to be re-established only in 1981 with the visit to China of a delegation of the Hong Kong Christian Council. Since then the CCC and the churches in Hong Kong have regularly exchanged visits of pastors, academics and lay people. Then in 1997 and 1999 Hong Kong and Macau reverted to Chinese rule, and Hong Kong became a special administrative region. In order to promote mutual understanding between the churches in the two territories and to strengthen contact and exchanges, the CCC adopted a policy of "mutual non-subordination, mutual non-interference and mutual respect". With regard to Taiwan, the establishment of ties with the church was to depend on that country not supporting independence or pursuing a two-Chinas or one-China-and-one-Taiwan policy. Such a course of action was considered to be against the will of the people and Christians on both sides of the straits.

Bishop Ting, who had served concurrently as the head of the CCC and the Three-Self Patriotic Movement, retired at the sixth Christian conference in December 1996. The conference adopted the revised Chinese Christian Church Order, which provides guidelines for the running of the churches and the organization of church affairs in the different parts of the country.

The issue of religious freedom in China has endured for over 50 years of communist rule. The severe restrictions applied from the 1950s to the 1970s were lifted with the opening of China to the outside world in 1979. In April 1999, the crack-down on the Falun Gong attracted the attention of the international news media. While article 36 of the 1982 constitution guarantees freedom of religion, the place of religion in China must be understood within the framework of communist ideology. The management, regulation and control of religion and religious activities is the responsibility of the Religious Affairs Bureau (RAB), which was set up to unify groups and individuals outside the Chinese communist party, and which has taken a more direct administrative role and imposed a tighter rein on the churches. Interpretation of the constitution differs between provinces depending on the RAB official concerned. The CCC has evolved quite a good relationship with the RAB and is able to work without much hindrance, subject to the limitations of a socialist society.

ASIA: NORTHEAST

THIS ENTRY covers Japan, Korea and Taiwan; see the previous entry for China.

JAPAN

Although Japanese imperial court chronicles report a visit by Nestorian Christians in 736, there is no record of their activities in Japan. The first missionary to Northeast Asia was Francis Xavier in 1549, but in the 17th century the Catholic church disappeared from Japanese history not only because of severe persecution but also because of rivalry between the Jesuits and other orders. Japanese ports were closed to foreigners in the 17th century, except for Dutch traders, who were allowed into Nagasaki; they were considered anti-Catholic and did not engage in mission work.

The first Protestant missionaries who came to Japan in 1859 believed in cooperation in mission. The first Japanese Protestant church, founded in Yokohama as the Japan Christian Catholic Church, was affiliated with Presbyterian and Reformed missionaries who sought to work with US Congregationalist missionaries to create united churches, but the Congregationalists rejected the plan for union. As other missionaries arrived, foreign denominations were transplanted onto Japanese soil.

The spirit of unity stayed alive in evangelistic and educational work, including the Sunday school and Kingdom of God movements. A federation of Christian churches in Japan was formed in 1911, and the National Christian Council (NCC) of Japan was organized in 1948. Although Protestant churches were eager for unity on the eve of the second world war, the formation of the United Church of Christ in Japan came about because of pressure from the militarist government, which sought uniformity of Christians in the interest of wartime cooperation.

After the war, Anglicans, Lutherans, Unitarians and other denominations left the United Church, and parts of the Baptist church, Salvation Army and other churches also became separate denominations. Remaining in the United Church were other Baptists, most Presbyterian-Reformed, Methodists, Congregationalists, Disciples, Evangelical United Brethren and some others.

Over the next 40 years, the United Church repented of its collaboration with the militarist government and strengthened its inner unity. Although it is now financially independent, its schools and other institutions continue to employ many foreign fraternal workers in the conviction that this ecumenical presence is important for Christian education.

The churches are concerned about the plight of refugees and migrants, particularly the burakumin and other minority groups such as Koreans and the Ainu (see minorities), in face of the hostile policy of the government. The NCC has organized public lectures on Japan's outward "internationalization" which belies the domestic reality of exclusion and isolation of foreigners, and the subtle and not-so-subtle forms of discrimination they face in everyday life. To respond to the needs of foreign women, particularly those in the entertainment industry from countries like the Philippines and Thailand, the Japan Women's Temperance Union has founded a House in Emergency of Love and Peace (HELP): it caters to the needs of victims of domestic violence, trafficking, invalid marriage, HIV/AIDS and statelessness, and helps women who have entered the country illegally.

The NCC's 1998 mission conference put emphasis on a new kind of missionary work when it said: "As we continue to become aware of the dangers for those who are marginalized, as we sympathize with those who have been abandoned..., this is where we affirm our ecumenical action."

The NCC's assembly in 2000 re-affirmed the emphasis on mission. It also expressed concern about the Japanese Diet passing the revised US-Japan defence agreement; attempts to revise the peace clause in the constitution; the unwillingness of the government to pay compensation to the victims of the Japanese imperial army, including the "comfort women"; and government attempts to distort past history through the educational system by re-writing school text books.

Many Japanese Christians have been actively involved in the work of the Christian Conference of Asia (CCA) and the WCC. Among the ecumenical issues they are concerned with are the controversies around emperor worship and Shintoism as a state religion, and interfaith dialogue.*

KOREA

Protestant Christianity was introduced to Korea in 1884 by US Methodist and Presbyterian missionaries. When Japan colonized Korea in 1910, the churches were persecuted for their leadership in the independence movement. After the second world war, the country was divided at the 38th parallel. The churches in South Korea grew rapidly, with some of their leaders taking important roles in the democratization of the country. The Presbyterian Church, however, has divided into numerous smaller denominations, most of them conservative and remaining outside the national council of churches, which coordinates ecumenical efforts in the country.

Working in close cooperation with the CCA and the WCC, the NCC has provided significant leadership both nationally and internationally. Through the difficult years of the people's struggle against dictatorship, the NCC and the churches were a rallying point for democratic forces in the country. The church's influence among students and intellectuals was largely due to its stand against militarism* and state control. A number of the church leaders who were in the forefront of the pro-democracy movement suffered years of imprisonment. The CCA urban rural mission programme was involved in the organization of workers who were often exploited in the name of national development. The emphasis on indigenization led in the 1960s to the birth of minjung theology.*

Christians in North Korea were long isolated from the outside world. Beginning in the late 1970s, the (North) Korean Christian Federation has had some contact with foreign Christians, which accelerated in the mid-1980s and led to a series of meetings with South Korean church leaders on the reunification of the country. Those sponsored by the WCC dealt with such sensitive issues as separated families, strengthening ecumenical relations, and exchange of information. In 1988 Protestant and Roman Catholic church buildings were put up in Pyongyang, the first since the independence of Korea.

At the end of 1997 Kim Dae Jung was elected president of the People's Republic of Korea, and several ecumenical leaders were appointed to the administration. President Kim's "sunshine policy" of engagement with North Korea received the full support of the churches. In June 2000, he made a historic visit to North Korea; but a return visit to South Korea by the North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il, and indeed the peace initiatives of the South Korean leader, have suffered a setback with the election of George Bush as US president.

However, re-unification remains high on the churches' agenda. In March 2000 over 200,000 Koreans, including clergy and laypersons, joined hands in several cities, and 333 leaders of the seven participating religions signed a declaration for reconciliation and peace.

On Easter Sunday 2001 a prayer service for Christian unity at the Korean Orthodox cathedral in Seoul brought together people from Presbyterian, Methodist, Anglican, Evangelical and Assembly of God churches and the Salvation Army.

TAIWAN

During the 16th and 17th centuries, Portuguese and Dutch occupied some parts of Taiwan but did not leave much Christian impact. Catholicism was re-introduced into Taiwan in the 18th century.

In 1865 the British Presbyterian Mission began work on the island, and it was soon followed by Canadian Presbyterians. Since that time, the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan has accounted for the majority of the Protestant population, although after the Nationalist Chinese retreated to Taiwan other denominations began missions there.

During the 1970s the Nationalist government forced the Presbyterian Church to withdraw its membership in the WCC, but this was later restored, and the church is actively engaged in ecumenical work. The national council of churches in Taiwan, whose membership includes the Roman Catholic Church as well as Protestant churches and organizations, coordinates ecumenical relationships.

At the beginning of the new millennium, Taipei's relations with Beijing remain tense, a tension escalated over the new US administration's decision to sell sophisticated arms to Taiwan. In view of Beijing's insistence on a one-China policy, international ecumenical relations continue to remain a major source of concern for the Presbyterian Church in Taiwan.

In Taipei in April 2001, the first national prayer breakfast meeting – an initiative of clergy and legislators to unite business, government and academic leaders in corporate prayer – was held in the presence of President Chen Shui-Bian and Cardinal Paul Shan of the Roman Catholic regional bishops' conference.

ASIA: SOUTH

THE SOUTH ASIAN region – the Indian sub-continent and the islands surrounding it – includes seven nation states: Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Nepal, Pakistan, Sri Lanka and the Maldives. Despite diversities of geography and physical features, customs and practices, there have been long periods of shared history, culture, art, music, rites and rituals, religious beliefs and practices throughout this region, not least due to the movement of people.

Historically, the sub-continent was divided into different kingdoms and territories, which were governed both by local rulers and by invaders from outside the region. South Asia has always managed to incorporate into its local and regional ethos the strong outside influences to which it has been constantly subjected, thereby producing creative new synthesis. The region struggles to maintain its unique character by preserving the ancient socio-religio-cultural ethos in the midst of modern technological development.

Artists have traditionally enjoyed high positions in South Asian societies. Philosophers, poets, musicians and dancers have held seats of honour in royal courts. Folk art, folklore and dances, associated with particular communities and closely linked to popular religiosity, have survived the turmoil of the changing times to provide elements of community bond.

South Asia is the birthplace of Hinduism, Buddhism, Jainism and Sikhism, and continues to be home to a large population of Muslims, Christians, Parsis and adherents of several other primal religions. Christianity is not new to this region. There is a strong tradition and consciousness of the apostolic origins of the Christian community in the evangelization by the disciples of Jesus Christ. St Thomas is believed to have arrived in India in A.D. 52 and subsequently to have been martyred and buried in Mylapore; there is also a less strong tradition regarding St Bartholomew. Until the 16th century the majority of the Christian community was made up of St Thomas Christians, and they are today divided into communities of Catholics, Orthodox, Church of the East, Mar Thoma and the Church of South India (formerly of Anglican churches).

Following the voyage of the Portuguese sailor Vasco da Gama to India in 1498, missionary activities by the Roman Catholic Church expanded the Christian community. The Roman Catholic mission's early success was ascribed to St Francis Xavier, who landed in Goa in 1542. The first Lutheran missionaries, B. Zeigenbalg and H. Plutschau, sent from Halle, Germany, under the patronage of King Frederick IV of Denmark, arrived at Tranquebar, on the south-eastern coast of India, in 1706, introducing Protestant Christianity to the sub-continent. William Carey, a Baptist missionary who came to India in 1793, further strengthened Christian mission in the Indian sub-continent. Indeed, the work he and his colleagues carried out from Serampore, near Calcutta, and his global vision for a Christian outreach gained him the title "the father of modern missions". Subsequently, missionaries from nearly every Christian tradition have worked in the region and many continue to do so today.

The introduction of Christianity to the sub-continent resulted in a number of social and cultural interactions and confrontations between the people of the region and those coming from outside. The missionaries' establishment of schools on the Western model, hospitals and other social and charitable institutions, with support from churches abroad or colonial powers, created a social ferment that led to many changes in society. The traffic, however, was not always one-way: challenges from the local cultures and religions led missionaries and local Christians alike to rethink the Christianity that had been brought from the West. Within the Indian Christian community a number of individuals and groups made attempts to indigenize Christianity. Most of the attempts to start indigenous churches were short-lived due to opposition from the missions and lack of local support.

Some Protestant denominations have come together as united churches after years of negotiations motivated primarily by the vast challenge for evangelization in the region: the Church of South India, inaugurated in 1947, incorporates former Anglicans, Congregationalists, Methodists and Reformed/Presbyterians in South India and the Jaffna area of Sri Lanka; the Church of North India (1970) incorporates Anglicans, Baptists, Brethren, Congregationalists, Disciples of Christ, Methodists and Presbyterians; the Church of Pakistan (1970) incorporates Anglicans, Lutherans, Methodists and Presbyterians; the Church of Bangladesh, which was a part of the Church of Pakistan, became autonomous after the formation of Bangladesh in 1972. The representatives of the Church of North India, the Church of South India and the Mar Thoma Syrian Church have worked together in a joint council to promote greater unity in the hope of one day forming a united all-India church. In evaluating the achievements of these united churches, a major question is whether they have become truly indigenous Christian expressions or have remained at the level of successful local attempts to form an interdenominational unity. They have retained their relation to the Christian World Communions* according to the denominational heritages incorporated into them.

Christians in South Asia have been active participants in national councils of churches, the Christian Conference of Asia, the World Council of Churches and the various Christian World Communions. In so doing, they have made significant contributions to regional and local discussions of church unity, faith and order, contextual theology and interfaith relations. Outstanding world ecumenical leaders from South Asia have included V.S. Azariah, D.T. Niles, Sarah Chakko, P.D. Devanandan, Samuel Parmar, M.M. Thomas, Paulos Mar Gregorios, J.R. Chandran and S.J. Samartha.

Politically, all the countries in the region except Bhutan and Nepal share a common colonial past under different European powers. The independence enjoyed by these countries during the past half century has resulted in many socio-economic and political reforms. Economically, however, South Asia remains one of the poorest areas in the world, and the situation of millions of people there has been aggravated by the present trend of globalization and the free market economy. The division of the population between the small percentage who are economically very well off and the vast majority of the poor and marginalized has shattered some of the dreams that prevailed during the struggle for independence in the 20th century.

BANGLADESH

Formerly known as East Pakistan, Bangladesh came into existence in 1971 when it broke away from West Pakistan after the civil war. It is the world's most densely populated and one of its poorest nations. Islam was declared the state religion in 1988; and in the mid-1994 threats against the Bangladeshi woman author Taslima Nasrin, following a fatwa (religious edict) issued by Islamic clerics, were widely covered in the international media. According to political observers, while 85% of the population is Muslim, Islamic radicals command no more than about 10% of popular support. There are small Hindu and Buddhist minorities, and Christians make up only 0.3% of the population. The activities of the churches, the Bangladesh national council of churches and the national Christian fellowship of Bangladesh (which brings together several Protestant churches and a number of mission bodies and agencies) in the larger society focus on education, health, relief and rehabilitation responding both to the frequent natural disasters and more general socio-economic needs.

BHUTAN

Bhutan is a landlocked Himalayan kingdom located between India and Tibet, governed by a constitutional monarchy. The official religion is a Tibetan form of Buddhism known as Lamaism. The small number of Christians in Bhutan, mainly from India, are involved in education, health and development programmes. Evangelistic work and proselytism are prohibited in Bhutan.

INDIA

Since becoming independent in 1947, India has succeeded in maintaining what is recognized as the world's largest democracy. After centuries of mission work, the Christian community today makes up a little less than 3% of the population. Despite a good record of Christian unity and collaboration, especially in the first half of the 20th century, loyalties to much of the inherited ecclesiastical characteristics and theologies still present a considerable obstacle to achieving the goal of an authentic indigenous church. However, there are vibrant efforts to articulate and promote theologies from hitherto marginalized and oppressed communities, including Dalit theology, Adivasi/tribal theologies, women's theology and eco-feminist theology, and many of these achievements have involved interdenominational and in some cases inter-religious cooperation and collaboration. Impressive contributions in worship and liturgical materials, Christian art and church architecture have reached beyond the local context to enrich the Asian and global communities of Christians as well. It should be noted that these innovative achievements of Christianity in India are paralleled in other Christian communities of the subcontinent.

Among many socio-economic and political issues facing India, the growing strength of Hindu fundamentalism has become a major current concern for Christians and others in India. The dismantling of the Babri Masjid in Ayodhya by Hindu militants in 1992, which received worldwide attention, is a concrete example of this force. Christians were among those who spoke out in public solidarity with the Muslims in this case. Some states, despite the constitutional guarantees of religious freedom and liberty, have enacted legislation prohibiting proselytism; and the late 1990s saw an alarming upsurge of inter-religious violence in some parts of the country. This new situation gives an added impetus to ongoing inter-religious dialogues, bringing in the dimension of peace and reconciliation as an important ingredient alongside philosophical and doctrinal debates.

MALDIVES

This country is an archipelago, consisting of about 1200 small coral islands (of which about 220 are inhabited) in the Indian Ocean some 600 kms southwest of India and Sri Lanka. Because these islands are low-lying, the Maldives is one of the small island nations to draw international and ecumenical attention in recent years because of the serious potential threats posed to their very existence by rising sea levels associated with global climate change.

Local tradition holds that in the mid-12th century the ruler, who was a Buddhist, and the people were converted to Islam. The Maldives came under Portuguese rule from 1558 to 1573, was a protectorate of the Dutch in the 17th century and of the British from 1887 until achieving full political independence in 1965. In spite of these contacts with European colonial powers, the Christian impact on the community is very minimal. Almost the entire population are adherents of the state religion, Islam, with a few hundred expatriate Christians.

NEPAL

Nepal is the world's only Hindu kingdom and most of its people are adherents of Hinduism. The Christian mission begun in the early 1700s by Capuchin fathers from Italy came to an abrupt halt in the 1760s when the founder of modern Nepal, Prithivi Narayan Shah, expelled the missionaries and the small Christian community. Until 1951 state policy firmly excluded all outside contacts, due to fear of both European colonialism and Indian influence. While this halted Christian activities, people in the border areas were evangelized, especially when they went to India for work or trade. The revolution which established constitutional monarchy and democratic government in 1950-51 created openings for Christian presence in Nepal, particularly in the areas of education, health and community development.

A significant feature of this involvement has been the collaborative nature of work carried out through the ecumenical United Mission to Nepal since 1954, a coordinated effort of several churches, mission agencies and groups. Obligated by the situation in the country, it has sought to avoid introducing denominational Christianity with external missionary leadership and to promote a self-supporting, self-propagating and self-governing Christian community. However, further democratization and greater openness since 1990 have brought an influx of mission personnel, money and material aid from outside, independent of the United Mission and creating unhealthy dependence and the establishment of several new Christian groups and denominations.

PAKISTAN

In 1947 Pakistan came into being as a result of the partition of what had been British-occupied India into two independent nation states. Pakistan was founded as a separate nation for Muslims and today 97% of its population are Muslim. The mission work by Nestorian Christians in the 8th century and by Jesuits in the late 16th century did not have much impact, and the majority of Christians in Pakistan come from the region of Punjab. Their conversion to Christianity was the result of "mass movements" in the 19th and the early 20th centuries.

The country's decision to become an Islamic republic (1956), nationalization of private and Christian schools and colleges (1972-74), and the introduction of separate electorates (1985) have made the situation difficult for Christians (about 2%) and for other minority religious communities in Pakistan. The Islamization programme of President Zia ul-Haq (1977-88) including the introduction of sharia laws, placed the religious minorities and women in a difficult situation. A blasphemy law enacted in 1995 allows the death penalty for anyone who makes derogatory remarks about the prophet Muhammad, and a number of Christians, including children, have been victims of this. Despite external pressure, the law could not be repealed because of pressure from the Islamic militant lobby.

Nevertheless, Christians in Pakistan have continued to play a significant role in education, health and community development, human rights, and in working towards greater inter-religious understanding. At the height of the conflict in Afghanistan in the 1980s, Pakistan was burdened with 3 million refugees some of whom are still living there. The churches responded to the needs of the refugees through ecumenical cooperation and collaboration.

SRI LANKA

This island nation in the Indian Ocean gained its independence from British rule in 1948, changing its name from Ceylon to Sri Lanka in 1972. Of its multi-ethnic population, about 74% are Sinhalese, with Tamils (18%) forming the second largest community. The Buddhist population (68%) is predominantly Sinhalese; Hindus (13%) and Christians (8%) are mostly Tamils. This religious division contributes in some ways to the ongoing ethnic tension in the island, which has escalated since 1983. The attempt by the majority to build a nation on the Sinhalese Buddhist culture is resented by the Tamils as discriminatory. Nearly 25 years of civil war have brought great suffering to the nation as a whole, most acutely to those living in the Jaffna peninsula.

During successive colonial periods, European powers introduced the denominations predominant in their own countries to Sri Lanka: the Portuguese, Roman Catholics; the Dutch, Reformed; and the British, Anglicans and Methodists. Christians and churches in this struggling situation have sought to promote healing and restoration through programmes of relief and rehabilitation, movements for interethnic and inter-racial harmony, peace and justice, inter-religious dialogues, advocacy and action for justice and greater understanding, and ecumenical solidarity in seeking to persuade politicians to find just and democratic solutions for the country's plight.

ASIA: SOUTHEAST

IN ECUMENICAL usage, Southeast Asia includes the countries of the Indo-Chinese peninsula (Cambodia, Laos, Malaysia, Singapore and Vietnam), Myanmar (Burma), Indonesia, the Philippines and Hong Kong. All except Thailand came under Western colonial domination between the 16th and the 20th centuries, in most cases providing easy access for Christian missions and ensuring the churches they planted both social prestige and power for the duration of the colonial era. Yet in most Southeast Asian countries Christian missions were not able to influence seriously their vast populations, probably because other religions brought in earlier from outside, primarily Buddhism and Islam, have penetrated so deeply into the cultural psyche of these peoples. Culture* and religion* have blended together in a way that has resisted massive conversions; and Christianity often came to this part of the world ensconced in an eschatological worldview and a pietistic-moralistic ethos that obscured the meaning of the gospel. On the other hand, there are many stories of love and sacrifice on the part of Christian missionaries, which allowed the gospel to find powerful expression within Southeast Asian culture.

The Philippines is an exception to this general description, as it had never come under the full sway of any other major religions and its spiritual culture thus offered no resistance to Christianity. When the Philippines finally launched a revolution against Spain, its revolutionary leaders were sophisticated enough to distinguish between the gospel and those who sought to abuse it.

Numerically, therefore, Christianity is a minority religion in Southeast Asia. The only country where Christianity is predominant is indeed the Philippines, where about 85% of the population is Christian. Indonesia has the largest Muslim population of any country in the world, though Christianity exerts an influence disproportionate to its numbers, perhaps because there was a highly educated group of Christians in influential positions when the country wrested independence from the Dutch. Malaysia is an Islamic state which prohibits Malaysians from converting to Christianity. Myanmar and Thailand are overwhelmingly Buddhist countries and pose no restrictions on evangelism politically and socially, although their peculiarly tolerant spirit resists the conversion* experience. Singapore has many faiths – Islam, Christianity, Hinduism, Buddhism, Confucianism and Shintoism – and religion is tolerated as long as it remains privatized. Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia are predominantly Buddhist societies with some Christian presence.

After the second world war, a strong pressure for self-determination swept through Asia. Sensing that the Asian peoples would no longer tolerate foreign domination, the European powers granted their colonies political independence, but only after ensuring that they would enjoy favourable terms with them in trade relations. These economic arrangements, and the imposition of Western democratic structures that were not sufficiently rooted in the countries' cultures or traditional power structures, created complex socio-political problems. Much of the countries of Southeast Asia have had difficulty achieving economic stability because they have remained dependent on the former imperial powers. The colonial masters had established an elite who saw that they could achieve enormous wealth and power by serving the interests of their former masters rather than those of their own people. This spawned great socio-political problems, widened the gap between rich and poor, and unwittingly provoked radical movements that favoured communism.

In the late 1960s, Southeast Asia, like other under-developed areas, plunged into national development programmes which often favoured the dependent-economy syndrome fostered by the powerful countries of the West. The creation in 1967 of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) to promote a united effort for economic growth, development, peace and security helped several countries in the region to enjoy substantial growth in the 1980s and 1990s. A few were able to pull themselves out of poverty – notably Singapore, Malaysia, Hong Kong and Taiwan – but millions of Southeast Asian people were pushed down deeper into it by the development process. Efforts among some restive Southeast Asian populations to dismantle socio-political structures subservient to the West risked drawing them into the East-West ideological conflict until the break-up of communist systems in the Soviet Union and Eastern and Central Europe. The end of the cold war intensified the efforts of economic globalization in the region, bringing with it both positive and negative results.

The young and small Christian churches which live and witness in this cultural and socio-political context have themselves not been exempt from ideological polarization. Some churches claim an apolitical stance in the social and political maelstrom, a few self-consciously position themselves within the ideological conflict, others see their mission simply as rendering service to the poor* and remaining in solidarity with them. In this situation, the Christian Conference of Asia (CCA) has played a theologically avant-garde role. It sees its mission as the inculturation of the gospel in Asian cultures, engagement in interfaith dialogue,* holistic proclamation of the gospel, solidarity with the poor in their struggle for justice and human dignity, and the search for the unity* of the church through acts of diakonia* and a deeper understanding of its various symbols. It has taken the lead in doing contextual theology in Asia, developing new forms of worship and spirituality, grappling with the complex realities of poverty, injustice and religiosity, and developing an Asian identity for the church.

The CCA was expelled from Singapore in 1988 because the government interpreted its acts of solidarity with the poor as a threat to national security. Other Southeast Asian countries, though not as politically unreceptive as Singapore, are also marked by ideological conflicts where one side or the other may find certain ecumenical activities and engagements uncongenial.

Globalization has brought its challenges. The financial crisis of 1997 plunged the entire region in a turmoil from which it has yet fully to recover. The country most affected has been Indonesia, where the social and political costs are tearing communities apart. The debt once-thriving economies like those of Thailand and Indonesia have incurred through IMF rescue packages will take many years to repay.

Militarily, Southeast Asia remains a potential flash-point. In the wake of the cold-war period, new intrastate and interstate disputes and tensions have emerged, e.g. China's rising prosperity and growing military muscle, and the future military role of Japan, particularly after the signing of the revised US-Japan defence agreement.

The region is also having to deal with religious activism, intolerance and violence. Religion has recently come to play a dominant role in civil and political life, challenging the secular and pluralist basis of the state. Christians, in a minority except in the Philippines, are sensitive to these developments, particularly in relation to the church's mission. The CCA's mission conference in 2000 recognized these concerns and the fact that witnessing to the faith in a pluralist context is a major challenge for the churches of the region.

The independence of East Timor involved the staff of the Communion of Churches in Indonesia in providing pastoral care to the people when East Timor came under attack from local militias who had the backing of the Indonesian armed forces.

In early 1999, violence between Christians and Muslims broke out in the Malukas, leaving hundreds of people dead and churches, mosques and property destroyed. Church leaders have been part of several government and private initiatives of inter-religious dialogue to restore peace and normalcy between the two communities.

In the southern Philippines the Estrada government hard-line position against the Moro Islamic Liberation Front raised fears that political conflict in Mindanao may disintegrate into yet another Christian-Muslim confrontation. With the change of regime, peace has been restored, with the strong support of the churches.

The Council of Churches in Malaysia, representing the minority Christian community, has regularly participated in inter-religious dialogue, as well as dialogue with the government on issues relating to the rights of the religious minorities.

Thus the peoples of Southeast Asia are still struggling for genuinely democratic societies. An urgent ecumenical task is finding a theological as well as political vision that can transcend ideological tensions and participate in the Asian task of breaking Western economic, political and cultural domination by creating a church that is Asian.

ASSEMBLIES OF GOD

FOUNDED IN Hot Springs, Arkansas, USA, in April 1914, the Assemblies of God (AofG) is probably the largest of the classical Pentecostal denominations with nearly 28 million members and adherents in 1996. Pentecostals* generally trace their origins to the work of Charles Fox Parham (1901-1906) and William Joseph Seymour and the Apostolic Faith Mission at 312 Azusa Street in Los Angeles (1906-1909). Parham viewed himself as an "apostle of unity" and Seymour proclaimed that one of the goals of the Apostolic Faith Mission was "Christian unity everywhere".

At its organizational meeting, the AofG stated through its general council that it had no intention of ever becoming "a human organization that legislates or forms laws and articles of faith and has unscriptural jurisdiction over its members and creates unscriptural lines of fellowship and disfellowship". Such actions were "contrary to Christ's prayer in St John 17, and Paul's teaching in Eph. 4:1-16". However, in 1916 the AofG adopted a statement of fundamental truths which clearly located it within the historic Trinitarian Christian faith. Emphasis would be placed on evangelism and mission: the proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ in the power of the Holy Spirit. The AofG, like other Pentecostal groups, viewed itself as part of a greater restoration in which God was actively participating, and therefore as standing at the threshold of eternity.

In keeping with its missionary concerns, the AofG joined the Foreign Missions Conference of North America (FMCNA) in 1920, thereby becoming also members of the International Missionary Council (IMC)* in 1921.

In 1941, the AofG became a founding member of the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE) in the United States. Membership in the NAE precluded membership in the National Council of Churches (NCCCUSA) when it was formed in 1950, but the AofG continued to work with a variety of programmes in the NCC, including Church World Service. After the second world war the AofG, through its European field secretary, also worked closely with the offices of the WCC even before the first assembly (1948).

With the rise of the cold war, many Pentecostals, fundamentalists* and Evangelicals* came to link efforts towards visible Christian unity with communism as signs of apostasy and of the imminent return of the Lord. While the AofG maintained relations with both the NCC and the WCC, it did so largely through its Division of Foreign Missions (DFM) and did not keep its larger constituency fully informed – a pragmatic approach that would work only as long as it was not discovered. And while the DFM was working closely with the larger ecumenical community, the AofG's weekly Pentecostal Evangel was moving the denomination towards Evangelicalism; a steady flow of articles and news items from the NAE spoke of the ecumenical movement in increasingly suspicious terms.

In 1961 fundamentalist preacher Carl McIntire accused the AofG and its superintendent Thomas F. Zimmerman of duplicity and compromise with the ecumenical movement. Zimmerman, at that time president of the Pentecostal World Conference* (PWC) and of the NAE, was further embarrassed by the very visible itinerant ministry of an AofG minister, South African David Du Plessis, who was actively involved with a burgeoning charismatic movement* within the historic churches and publicly endorsed the ecumenical movement as a work of the Holy Spirit. In response, the AofG broke all ties with ecumenical partners, it defrocked Du Plessis and enacted a bylaw which "disapproves of ministers or churches participating in any of the modern ecumenical organizations... in such a manner as to promote the ecumenical movement".

By 1965 the AofG had chosen a narrowly defined form of ecumenism: identifying with other Pentecostals in the PWC, with US Evangelicals through the NAE, joining with other white US Pentecostals to form the Pentecostal Fellowship of North America (1948-94) and subsequently with African-American Pentecostals in the Pentecostal/Charismatic Churches of North America (1994- ). All these groups held the primary conviction that Christian unity is “spiritual”, though each has appealed to John 17:21 and argued for visible unity as part of its raison d’être. Issues of class, culture, training, doctrine and priorities still separate the AofG from many other Christians; in the NAE, however, they now constitute about 65% of the membership.

Despite this history, a number of AofG scholars and ministers are quietly rebuilding bridges to the larger ecumenical world. Much of the initiative has taken place under the auspices of the Society for Pentecostal Studies. While AofG members must participate in all ecumenical functions as individuals, they now take part regularly in the international Pentecostal-Roman Catholic dialogue,* the international Pentecostal-Reformed dialogue,* the NCC-Pentecostal dialogue in the US, various consultations of the NCC and the WCC, and in a dialogue with Roman Catholics in Springfield, Missouri, where the denomination is headquartered.

AofG members have served on the commissions on Faith and Order of the NCC since 1983 and of the WCC since 1991, and have represented Pentecostal interests among the secretaries of Christian World Communions* since 1993. The AofG has also been represented at the North American Academy of Ecumenists* since 1989.

In 1996, the AofG in Korea joined the National Council of Churches in Korea. Whether this bold and controversial move will encourage other national bodies to follow suit remains to be seen. Many within the AofG still suspect that anything suggesting movement towards some form of global Christian unity is a humanly contrived plan based on the lowest common denominator which will ultimately be used by some anti-Christian figure. But the rise of the charismatic renewal and the changes brought about by Vatican II* have opened others in the AofG to the possibilities which present themselves. Many AofG leaders are listening.

ASSOCIATION OF INTERCHURCH FAMILIES

FOUNDED IN England in 1968 in order to strengthen marriage and family life and promote Christian unity, the Association of Interchurch Families (AIF) offers a forum in which parents, children and young adults in interchurch families can share their experience and learn from one another. Most partners belong to different denominations – most often a Roman Catholic and a Christian of another communion.

The AIF provides a support network and an information service for couples, clergy and relatives, and gives interchurch families a voice in the churches by articulating their experience in all its diversity, focusing attention on their particular needs for pastoral care and affirming their gifts and their potential as a catalyst for wider church unity. All its activities are undergirded by prayer, worship and an interchurch marital and family spirituality.

AIF is pastorally concerned for mixed marriages in which denominational differences have been a factor in weakening the Christian commitment of one or both partners. Interchurch couples can be found at every point on an ecumenical scale which runs from competition, through co-existence, to cooperation, to commitment on the way to full communion. Most AIF members probably fall into the categories of cooperation or commitment. Partners at the “competition” stage often feel that their differences are too painful and potentially destructive to their marriage to risk open discussion of religious affiliation; those at the “co-existence” stage may be seeing the church as a sort of “club”, each with its own static life-style and rules, thus giving them little incentive to work for church unity.*

As the smallest local ecumenical partnerships,* who “live in their marriage the hopes and the difficulties of the path to Christian unity” (Pope John Paul II, York, 1982), interchurch families raise by their very existence ecumenical questions for the churches. On admission to the eucharist in the Roman Catholic Church, the 1993 Ecumenical Directory* opened up new possibilities for mixed marriages where the partners share the sacraments of baptism and marriage. Some AIF young people have asked for joint celebration of confirmation and respect from their churches for their sense of “double belonging”.

The AIF London office responds to many enquiries, and a network of local contacts throughout England offers couples information and support, raises awareness of interchurch family issues and works with local ecumenical officers and church marriage and family life officers. Since 1968 an annual weekend conference and day conferences have been organized. In some areas groups of interchurch couples meet regularly or occasionally for mutual support. AIF publishes Interchurch Families twice a year and a range of educational materials on such subjects as marriage, baptism, confirmation, sharing communion, funerals and church membership.

AIF also works with sister associations in Ireland (North and South), Switzerland, Scandinavia, Germany, the US, Canada and Australia, and it has contacts with interchurch families in other parts of the world. Since 1980 an English-speaking international conference has been held every two years; and in 1998 a global conference in Geneva brought together French-speaking foyers mixtes and English-speaking interchurch families.

ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST

THE OFFICIAL name of this church is the Holy Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East (ACE). “Assyrian” indicates that its liturgical and theological language is the east Syrian of Nisibis; “Church of the East” denotes its non-Graeco-Roman cultural identity and its political allegiances (it was originally the church of the Persian Sassanid empire, constantly at war with the Roman empire). While other Christians have often called it Nestorian, the ACE itself has never liked being designated by the name of the patriarch of Constantinople whose Christology, condemned at the council of Ephesus (431), it nevertheless received.

The ACE’s geographical position helps to explain its distancing itself from the churches of the Roman empire. In 410 it established a structure with a catholicos, or supreme head; in 424 it prohibited appeals to the Western churches; in 484 it received the Antiochene Christology, thereby breaking communion with those churches. All these acts betokened its loyalty to a ruling power by which it was nevertheless persecuted.

Although the Assyrian Church never enjoyed the support of a state, its missionary outreach was exceptional. By the 3rd century it was already present in south India; by 635 it had penetrated as far as Tibet and even China. At its apotheosis in the 13th century, at the time of the Mongol patriarch Yahballaha III, it had 250 dioceses from Cyprus to Manchuria and from Turkestan to Kerala and Java. But a combination of circumstances in the 14th century – a change of dynasty in China, and above all the conversion of the Mongols to Islam and Tamerlane’s savage persecution – led to the near annihilation of this church, which sought refuge in Hakkari (Kurdistan). In the 16th century, a group of its members attached themselves to Rome, giving birth to the Chaldean Church, while in India the faithful were largely Latinized (synod of Diamper). When they regained their autonomy, they attached themselves to the west Syrian Church, which belonged to an opposing Christological tradition.

The tragedy has continued in the 20th century. The 1914-18 war decimated the membership. Following difficulties in Iraq in 1933, Patriarch Shimun XXIII went into exile in the USA. A reform of the liturgical calendar in 1964 provoked a lasting schism, with two opposing leaders, Mar Addai (Baghdad) and Mar Dinkha (Iranian, resident in Chicago) gathering the majority of members. The church now has a membership of between 150,000 and 200,000, more than half of whom have left the Middle East.

The ACE joined the WCC in 1950 and sent observers to Vatican II. It has been a member of the Middle East Council of Churches* since 1995. The Christological declaration signed by Mar Dinkha and John Paul II (1994), followed by the setting up of a commission for dialogue between the two churches, shows that, though alone in its confession, the ACE is moving to break its isolation. The discussions with its partners will concern its shorter canon of scripture (which does not include 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Jude and the Book of Revelation), the absence of icons, its rejection of original sin, and the number of the sacraments. The Orthodox churches do not agree with its practice of allowing marriage after ordination.

In protest against the hereditary succession to the patriarchate (which was passed down from uncle to nephew – a system which lasted up to and including Mar Shimun XXIII), one part of the Assyrian Church attached itself to Rome in 1552, taking the name Chaldean Church. The main centre of its 400,000 members is Iraq, with lesser centres in Iran and Turkey, but there has been large-scale emigration to the West.

ASSYRIAN CHURCH OF THE EAST-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

THE ASSYRIAN Church of the East* is the modern continuation of the ancient church of the Persian empire which fell out of communion with the rest of the Christian world in the 5th century when, for political as well as theological reasons, it officially adopted Nestorian Christology. Thus it accepts only the first two ecumenical councils.* There were only sporadic contacts with Rome until the 13th century. In the 16th century a large section of the Assyrian Church of the East sought union with Rome and eventually formed what is now known as the Chaldean Catholic Church (see Eastern Catholic churches). Today the non-Catholic Assyrians are not in communion with any other church.

After many centuries of isolation, however, relations with the Catholic Church began to improve dramatically in the 1980s. The present patriarch, Mar Dinkha IV, visited Pope John Paul II in Rome in 1984 and participated in the day of prayer for peace at Assisi in 1986. In 1994 Mar Dinkha and Pope John Paul II signed a common declaration in the Vatican. The text affirms that Catholics and Assyrians are “united today in the confession of the same faith in the Son of God” and envisages broad pastoral cooperation between the two churches, especially in the areas of catechesis and the formation of future priests. The pope and the patriarch also established a mixed committee for theological dialogue and charged it with overcoming the obstacles that still prevent full communion.

The dialogue has been meeting annually since 1995. The first phase of its work, which concentrated on sacramental theology, concluded with the October 2000 meeting in Arezzo, Italy, and the approval of a common text, Common Statement on Sacramental Life. At the same meeting the commission began the dialogue's second phase, which was to focus on the constitution of the church and other ecclesiological questions.

The rapprochement between the two churches has found concrete expression in increased contacts and cooperation between the Assyrian Church of the East and its Catholic counterpart, the Chaldean Catholic Church. Mar Dinkha IV and Chaldean Patriarch Raphael Bidawid met in Detroit in November 1996 and issued a joint patriarchal statement pledging to work for the reunification of their churches by forming a joint commission for unity that was to elaborate a common catechism, oversee the foundation of a seminary in the US for both churches and develop common pastoral programmes. On 15 August 1997, the members of the holy synods of the two churches signed a joint synodal decree for promoting unity which re-stated the areas of pastoral cooperation envisaged in the joint patriarchal decree, recognized that Assyrians and Chaldeans should come to accept their diverse practices as legitimate, formally implemented the establishment of an Assyrian-Chaldean Joint Commission for Unity, and declared that each side recognized the apostolic succession, sacraments and Christian witness of the other. The text also spelled out the central concerns of both sides in the dialogue. It says that while both churches wanted to preserve the Aramaic language and culture, the Assyrians were intent on preserving their freedom and self-governance, while the Chaldeans affirmed that the preservation of full communion with Rome was among its basic principles.

ASYLUM

IN CURRENT usage, "asylum" (from the Greek asylon, place of refuge) refers primarily to the provision of protection to refugees. Lack of legal protection is a basic problem facing refugees who have fled their countries and can no longer count on their own governments to protect them.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights confers on individuals a right "to seek and enjoy" asylum. But in spite of other international instruments (the 1951 convention relating to the status of refugees, the 1967 declaration on territorial asylum), the right of asylum is not recognized by international law as an individual human right. The right to grant or to refuse asylum is the prerogative of each state.

Historically, asylum has had the meaning of sanctuary. In early civilizations, the tradition of religious protection was well known; temples and altars under the protection of a deity could provide refuge. The Israelites were told to create six cities of refuge where a person committing an unintentional homicide could escape blood vengeance (Num. 35:9-15; Deut. 4:41-43, 19:4-13). In the Christian church of the 4th century, bishops often provided sanctuary, a privilege that continued to exist, though in ever more restricted forms, until the establishment of national states in the 16th century.

Since the early 1980s, asylum has become an increasingly contentious political issue, particularly for governments of industrialized countries. The number of persons seeking asylum in Europe and North America increased dramatically, reflecting the fact that it was becoming more difficult for refugees to find protection in the countries to which they initially fled. With growing access to global means of transportation, many asylum-seekers began turning up at Northern borders and airports in search of security, provoking governments to impose new restrictions to limit the numbers admitted.

By the mid-1980s, governments were implementing so-called deterrence policies to prevent asylum-seekers from reaching their borders: visa restrictions on people travelling from conflict-ridden countries, fines on airlines transporting people whose documents were not in order and, in the case of the USA, the use of military ships to intercept boatloads of would-be refugees and return them to their country of origin. Northern governments developed agreements among themselves about the treatment of asylum-seekers; in most cases, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees was marginal to these intergovernmental consultations and agreements. The number of asylum-seekers reaching Northern countries had declined by the early 1990s, but the example set by industrialized countries was followed by governments of countries with far fewer resources and far larger numbers of refugees. By the late 1990s, governments around the world were replacing permanent asylum with temporary protection – allowing some refugees to stay until the violence which provoked their flight diminished. European governments admitted Bosnians on these terms; similarly, African countries began urging Rwandan refugees to return home as soon as a new government was in place following the 1994 genocide.

Throughout this period, asylum issues have been high on the agenda of the ecumenical movement. Participants in a major ecumenical consultation on asylum in Zurich in May 1986 struggled to find appropriate church responses to refugees with inadequate legal protection. Subsequently, national and regional ecumenical bodies grappled with asylum questions in their regions, setting up working groups and task forces. In December 1995, a global ecumenical consultation in Addis Ababa called on churches to stand up against the restrictionist asylum policies of their governments.

The WCC, in its 1995 policy statement on refugees and in its call for churches to express solidarity with uprooted people in 1997, took a leading role in lifting up the rights of asylum-seekers to tell their stories.

At the grassroots level, churches were challenged to respond to the needs of refugees whose claims for asylum had been denied by their governments. In the United States, the sanctuary* movement emerged in the early 1980s to shelter Central American refugees who were not granted asylum by the US government. By providing shelter and protection, churches and congregations not only accepted responsibility for the immediate legal and physical needs of individual refugees, but challenged the premises of US foreign policy. Several years later, individual European congregations began sheltering asylum-seekers who faced deportation from their countries. This sanctuary or church asylum movement continues to the present time in some European countries.

Since offering sanctuary to asylum-seekers is a form of civil disobedience, bringing the risk of fines and imprisonment, the sanctuary movement stirred up extensive debates in the churches on the legal, political and theological issues involved.

The erosion of asylum in Northern countries is a sign of the weakening of the international system created to respond to refugees. Ironically, it is the same European and North American governments who took the lead in creating this international system – buttressed by international conventions, national legislation and a United Nations agency – who are now implementing measures which may ensure its demise.

ATHANASIAN CREED

THIS TEXT, also known as Quicumque Vult, from its Latin opening words, is an outline of Trinitarian and Christological theology (including the filioque*) which is more a didactic poem than a creed. Its preface and conclusion state that belief in the truths it asserts is necessary for salvation,* and the text includes a series of anathemas.*

The Athanasian Creed has no connection with Athanasius of Alexandria. It is a product of the Western church, indebted to the thought of Ambrose, Augustine and Vincent of Lérins, and was probably composed in southern Gaul or Spain. Scholarship in the early 20th century argued for a date between 381 and 428; subsequent authorities, influenced by J.N.D. Kelly, place it later, probably in the late 5th or 6th century. The 7th-century synod of Autun referred to it as “the faith of St Athanasius”. By the next century it was accepted in the liturgical books of the Western church, and by the 13th century it was valued as the third symbol. The Eastern churches seem to have become acquainted with it during the filioque controversies.

In the Carolingian period the Athanasian Creed entered the breviary and from there passed into the Anglican tradition for feast days. In the Book of Common Prayer of the Church of England it is placed before the litany; in that of the Episcopal Church in the USA it is among the “historical documents”. Lutherans retained it as a statement of faith in the Book of Concord of 1580, and it appears in the 1978 Lutheran Book of Worship. But it never assumed much importance in other churches of the continental Reformation.

mation. It has appeared, without the filioque clause, in Greek and Russian Orthodox service books since the 17th century.

The Athanasian Creed is neither a doxological creed nor a narrative confession of faith. It is an intellectual and theological exposition. The unpopularity of its anathemas have led to attempts to remove it from the official books of some churches, and its theological and liturgical role in the churches today is minor. It is not regarded as an ecumenical resource, as is the Nicene Creed* of 381.

ATHEISM

THE GREEK WORD atheos (without God) is found in the Bible only in Eph. 2:12, where it is used to describe the darkness in which gentile Christians lived before their conversion. In general the Greeks used "atheist", often polemically, to describe a person who denied the recognized gods or otherwise deviated from prevailing religious customs. Thus not only Epicurus, a materialist, but also Socrates, a thinker with a philosophical faith, and Jews and Christians could be regarded as atheoi by their pious contemporaries.

In the modern sense of a general denial of God or godlessness, the term first crops up in European thought in the 16th and 17th centuries. Several different senses can be identified: theoretical atheism, arising out of an irreligious world-view (e.g. among the materialistic thinkers of the French Enlightenment or in the German League of Monists and other free-thinking circles); unformulated practical atheism, as an abandonment of any activity related to God (though without necessarily denying God in theory); programmatic atheism, a struggle against religion considered as alienation and demeaning (Feuerbach, Nietzsche); political atheism, to liberate humanity from exploitation by throne and altar (Marx, Lenin) and later to control citizens in totalitarian fashion by eliminating the "uncertainty factor 'God'"

(Stalinism and neo-Stalinism); psychologically motivated atheism, which sees religion as an illusion in which the "oldest, strongest and most imperious desires of humanity" (Freud) are projected; existential atheism, due to the experience of suffering or the will for unlimited freedom (Camus, Sartre); and finally, as an extreme form of atheism, the nameless and featureless secular approach which dismisses the quest for meaning. There is also the theological concept of atheism which distances itself critically from traditional theism in order to be able to "believe in God atheistically" (the "God is dead" school).

In its many guises, atheism today must be taken seriously as both a challenge to and partner of theology and the church. This is something relatively new. The assumption that humanity has an almost natural piety can be seen in the Bible, where the real challenge to Israelite and NT faith was the "gentile" belief in gods, not the absence of a God or gods. In church history up to modern times, this view prevailed, with the atheist being considered as a curious exception. But over the last few centuries, especially in industrial societies, the process of secularization* has led to secularism and the entrenchment of this world within its own bounds on the basis of the "dogma of immanence". On this view our cosmos and our history have no transcendence; and for more and more people atheism seems a more natural option than religion.

A distinction should be made between an atheism that is "methodological" and one that is part of a world-view. It is one thing to consider that God* never appears within his creation* as a tangible object of scientific study and that we therefore should carry on as if God did not exist; it is another to turn this principle into a philosophical dogma and advocate a "scientific atheism" as a philosophical system or basic existential attitude.

The engagement of Christian theology and the church with atheism has often taken place in a way that lacks relevance and contradicts the spirit of the gospel. Without recourse to any careful distinctions, the word has been applied as a term of abuse to describe and censure not merely explicit denial of God but any deviation from established doctrine. Arguments against atheism have been buttressed with repression, including political and physical means. Such responses ignore the fact that atheism arises not always as a purely arbitrary act but also in response to shortcomings in church theory and practice.

This is why ecumenical thinking today is striving for an attitude to atheism which is sensitive to different nuances. Although Vatican II,* in harmony with previous encyclicals, still condemns atheism because it “casts man down from the noble state to which he is born” (Gaudium et Spes 21), it reveals itself as self-critical in regard to how atheism comes about, and open to the need that “all men, those who believe as well as those who do not, should help to establish right order in this world where we all live together”. And the Faith and Order study document Confessing the One Faith (1991), recognizing the complexity of the challenges from atheism in its various forms, calls on Christians to “scrutinize the adequacy of their conceptions of God and of God’s relation to the world” (para. 23).

Thus in its encounter with atheism the oikoumene today is moving “from anathema to dialogue”. Here experiences from Eastern Europe are instructive and encouraging. The question of God and attempts to give a credible answer to it have in no way been superseded and settled in an ideologically and programmatically atheistic society. In the course of the Marxist-Christian dialogue,* a good number of atheists recognized that “God is not completely dead” (Vítězslav Gardavský) and Christians came to see that the gospel holds good for atheists too.

ATHENAGORAS I (Aristokles Pyrou)

B. 25 March 1886, Tsaraplana (northwest Greece, then under Turkish domination); d. 6 July 1972, Istanbul. Athenagoras was ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople (1949-72) and leading figure in the contemporary development of the Orthodox church and the ecumenical movement.

After studies in Halki, Pyrou became a monk and deacon, adopting the name of the 2nd-century apologist Athenagoras, who sought the Logos in the wisdom and poetry of the “heathen”. In Macedonia during the Balkan wars (1912-13) and the first world war he came face to face with human diversity, acquired a knowledge of Islam, and learned first-hand about atrocities and revolutions. After serving as secretary to the holy synod, he became metropolitan of Corfu in 1923. When Mussolini occupied the island, he intervened as “ethnarch” (defender of the community), and when Asiatic Greece collapsed under the Turks, he saw to it that the refugees had food, care and work.

In 1931 Athenagoras was named archbishop of the Greek church in America, then torn by political dissensions imported from Greece and swollen in numbers by refugees from Asia Minor. He instituted biennial meetings of clergy and laity (the latter in the majority) in order to define the main directions of pastoral work. A friend of Presidents Roosevelt and Truman, he supported their social policy, and when he was elected ecumenical patriarch in 1949, the US looked to him to foster Graeco-Turkish reconciliation in the face of communism. Six years later he was placed in a disappointing and dangerous situation when Turkish nationalists launched pogroms against the Greek Orthodox in Cyprus.

Athenagoras determined to “set aside all the cares of the world” to serve Christian unity by gathering together all the Orthodox churches in conciliar fashion. He secured the position of the Greek church in the WCC despite continuous obstacles and supported WCC membership for Eastern European Orthodox churches, ratified at New Delhi (1961).

Convinced that dialogue between Orthodoxy and the Christian West must also include the Roman Catholic Church, Athenagoras devoted himself to transforming relations that had long been marked by distrust and ignorance. Learning of Pope Paul VI's pilgrimage to Jerusalem in December 1963, Athenagoras proposed that leaders of all confessions gather there "to ask in common and fervent prayer... on our knees, with tears in our eyes and in a spirit of unity... that for the glory of the holy name of Christ and for the well-being of all humanity the way may be opened to the complete restoration of Christian unity".

Although the time was not ripe for such a meeting, the pope did agree to meet the patriarch, and on 5 and 6 January 1964 they exchanged blessings and the kiss of peace after reading Jesus' prayer in John 17. Thus began a "loving dialogue" between Rome and Constantinople and a genuine friendship between the two men, recorded in their posthumously published letters and declarations (see Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue). On 7 December 1965, during the Second Vatican Council, in which Orthodox observers took part, the anathemas* of 1054, which had symbolized the separation of Eastern and Western Christendom, were abrogated. In July 1967 Paul VI went to Istanbul and in a gesture of reparation knelt at the very place in St Sophia where the Roman delegates had brought the anathema.

At the same time the patriarch undertook to undo the estrangement among the Orthodox churches brought about by the system of "autocephalous" churches and aggravated by religious nationalism. After a 1950 encyclical failed to revitalize Constantinople's disputed rights as the primatial see, he began patiently and realistically to work out the idea of primacy as a sacrificial offer of service. He proposed (but never imposed) initiatives, travels and meetings (including pan-Orthodox conferences in the 1960s) which finally led to a consensus not so much primatial as a display of a universality and communion.

In October 1967 Athenagoras made a successful journey to bring together and consult with the Balkan daughter churches of Constantinople. Amidst enormous popular enthusiasm in Belgrade, Bucharest and Sofia, he preached the union of Orthodoxy in the service of Christian unity. Although the Soviet government compelled the Moscow patriarchate to sidestep the coming of Athenagoras, he nevertheless consulted it. With the agreement of all the canonical Orthodox churches, he then undertook to go to Western Europe in October-November 1967 as a "pilgrim for unity".

He began with Paul VI in Rome, where he celebrated a service of peace and forgiveness, venerated the tombs of Peter and Paul and received young people in an unforgettable service at St Paul beyond the Walls. Next he went to the ecumenical centre in Geneva, where he described Western Christianity as a fragmented whole which might be helped to reconstitute itself through a disinterested and peace-making Orthodox presence. Finally he was welcomed in London by the Anglican archbishop of Canterbury Michael Ramsey.

Athenagoras's vision was of an evangelical, eucharistic and conciliar church in which the various confessions would meet as "sister churches"* on the basis of the apostolic faith "in faithfulness to the traditions of the fathers and the inspiration of the Spirit", and around an axis of universal agreement, a renewed Roman primacy,* a “presidency of love” no longer above the church but in the centre of its fellowship and in its service. He distrusted abstract theological speculation designed to prove oneself right by discrediting others. Above all he wanted to translate ideas into the language of experience, holiness and service.

A preoccupation of Athenagoras was re-establishing eucharistic fellowship, which he saw not only as a confirmation of a re-established unity of the faith* but also as an anticipation of that unity, through the force of love, so that differences could be investigated, not simply by looking forward to the eucharist,* but under its light (see communion, intercommunion).

In June 1968 a pan-Orthodox conference at Chambésy near Geneva (where Athenagoras was determined to set up an Orthodox centre, a place where there was freedom and ecumenical contacts) resolved to call a council for aggiornamento (updating), which would be prepared by a whole series of conferences. For Athenagoras the realist, this apprenticeship to conciliarity* mattered more than the council itself.

The patriarch’s last years were difficult. Hardening of Soviet policy after the 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia brought intense conflicts between Moscow and Constantinople, paralyzing the preconciliar process. The crisis of faith that shook the Western churches and a corresponding increase in fundamentalism in Orthodoxy, in which the most moderate theologians could not accept the patriarch’s views on intercommunion, increasingly isolated him.

Athenagoras then tried to begin a dialogue in depth with Islam, as well as encouraging the reconciliation of Chalcedonian and pre-Chalcedonian Orthodox (see Oriental Orthodox-Orthodox dialogue) and outlining a deep and simple spirituality for people of today. He emphasized Christianity not as law but as creative inspiration (“knowing how to live”), the fellowship or communion of individuals and the miracle of living creatures, and the humble illumination of everyday life through the presence-in-absence of the unknown who has become our secret Friend and through the church, witnessing and praying for all and influencing the development of the universe and humanity through the attractive force of Christ’s resurrection.

AUSTRALIA

THE CHRISTIAN churches came to Australia with European settlement in 1788 – first the Church of England, then, as Irish settlers began to arrive, the Roman Catholic Church (the first public mass was celebrated in 1820), then, as other settlers came from England and Scotland, other churches and denominational structures.

Early church history in Australia was characterized by competitiveness rather than cooperation. Strong antagonism between Protestants and Roman Catholics was reinforced by nationalist divisions among Irish, English and Scottish settlers, arguments over privileges relating to land grants and education, and class divisions. There were also tensions within churches – between low- and high-church Anglicans, between the Presbyterian churches from England and those from Scotland, between Wesleyan and Free Methodists. The early 19th century brought more denominations: the Baptist and Lutheran churches, the Society of Friends and the Churches of Christ. The Salvation Army entered Australia in 1880. A Greek Orthodox Church was established in 1897. As frontier townships grew throughout the country, churches vied with each other to establish parishes, build churches and attract members.

In the second half of the 19th century, three colonial councils of churches were formed, in New South Wales, Victoria and South Australia, reflecting a felt need for a united church front against gambling, alcohol and the decline in church attendance, and for the strict observance of Sunday, the recognition of God in the draft constitution and the inclusion of the Bible in the curricula of government schools.

The Australian Student Christian Union (ASCU) was formed in 1896. Linked to the World Student Christian Federation, it gave students an experience of belonging to international and interdenominational Christian communities. The YWCA and YMCA were significant, too, in fostering an ecumenical climate around this time. International ecumenical events also influenced early Australian ecumenism. After several Australians attended the first world missionary conference (Edinburgh 1910), united missionary councils were formed in New South Wales and Victoria, later replaced by the National Missionary Council of Australia.

In 1946, representatives from the Anglican, Baptist, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian churches, the Churches of Christ, the Salvation Army and the Society of Friends held the inaugural meeting of the WCC (Australian section). After the Amsterdam assembly in 1948, the Australian Council for the WCC was formed, and in 1960 it became the Australian Council of Churches (ACC).

Work among refugees and migrants was a major role of the ACC from its inception. Besides helping with the re-settlement of thousands of people, the ACC influenced government policies and carried out church and community education programmes on these issues.

The waves of migration to Australia brought a growth in the number of Orthodox churches. The Greek Orthodox Church became a member of the council in 1958; seven other churches of the Orthodox traditions joined later.

The first national church conference, in Melbourne in 1960, brought together delegates and observers from 14 denominations and led to the formation of Australian Frontier, in which people from various walks of life and organizations worked together on problematic areas in society. The national conference also led to the formation of an ecumenical chaplaincy agency in the industrial work-place. Also in the 1960s, the ACC's Church and Life movement offered Christians in more than 2000 congregations their first in-depth encounter with Christians of other denominations in their local areas, stimulating local ecumenical cooperation.

Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches began discussing church union in 1901, but it would be 70 years before a revised basis of union was presented to the negotiating churches. The Uniting Church in Australia was inaugurated in 1977. Earlier, in 1966, two Australian Lutheran churches were re-united.

The Second Vatican Council* led to new links between the ACC and the RCC. A joint working group was formed in 1967 and over the next seven years studied such issues as baptism (1968), eucharist (1969), ministry (1970), Christian marriage (1971), authorities in moral behaviour (1972), and the person in church and society (1974). A 1976 statement on "Common Witness and Evangelism" was widely distributed. At the same time, cooperation was developing on social issues and in the area of aid and development. The ACC and RCC jointly sponsored a national conference on world development and the responsibility of the Australian churches in 1970, followed in 1972 by a national study programme involving thousands of Christians.

From its inception the ACC member churches saw it as a vehicle for their common prophetic witness. In the early years this focused on subjects ranging from the white Australia policy and unemployment to the introduction of television and the visit of Elvis Presley. By the late 1960s, Australia's involvement in the Vietnam war and compulsory national service was proving controversial for the churches. In 1968 the ACC issued a well-researched and highly respected report on "Conscientious Objection to Military Service".

The integration of the National Missionary Council into the ACC in 1965 heightened attention to the welfare of Aboriginal Australians and their struggle for land rights (see land), a concern which has remained at the forefront since then. A commission on Aboriginal development was established in 1970, and in the following years lengthy submissions on Aboriginal affairs and land rights were made to the government. In 1981 the ACC invited the WCC's Programme to Combat Racism* to send a delegation to Australia, and its comprehensive and challenging report had a good impact on the churches, community and governments.

The ACC also provided a platform for others whose voices are not normally heard. At a migrant women's speak-out in 1982, some 150 migrant women were able to communicate in their own languages. In 1986 hearings on peace and justice in nine centres around Australia enabled many groups to testify to their own experiences of injustice and concerns for peace. The ACC's commission on the status of women has done important work on the feminization of poverty and domestic violence.*

The WCC's seventh assembly in Canberra in 1991 was an occasion for all major Christian denominations to work together in its preparations and the assembly provided an impetus for ecumenical renewal in many local parishes and nationally.

In 1994 the ACC was replaced by a new national body, the National Council of Churches in Australia, which includes the Roman Catholic Church in its membership.

Australia has had difficulties in finding its place in the international arena. It represents the North in the South; it is both colonized and colonizer; it is geographically in the Pacific, but culturally not of the Pacific. Yet there is a growing awareness of its place in the Asia-Pacific region. The ACC was a founding member of the East Asia Christian Conference, later the Christian Conference of Asia.* Similarly, it helped to bring together the churches in the Pacific to form the Pacific Conference of Churches,* where it has observer status.

A significant area of ecumenical advance in Australia has been theological education. Colleges of divinity at major universities involve RC as well as Anglican, Orthodox and Protestant churches. United faculties take responsibility for ministerial training. There is ecumenical cooperation in religious education in schools and in the churches.

Much interchurch activity occurs through ministers' fraternals, industrial and hospital chaplaincies. Para-church groups, the charismatic movement and social action bring people together across denominational boundaries. Traditional ecumenical events such as the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity* and the World Day of Prayer* are celebrated. The publishing of an Australian hymnbook in 1977 was an important cultural and ecumenical development.

Churches which were largely Anglo-Celtic in formation and membership are being challenged in new ways by the multicultural nature of Australian society. New religious movements among Aboriginal Christians may prove to be another significant challenge to denominational isolationism.

In recent years the ecumenical movement in Australia is more visible in local groups united across ideological lines – such as movements for social justice, indigenous peoples' rights, environmental concerns – than in formal church structures.

AUTHORITY

THE WORD "authority" comes from Latin augere, cognate with Greek auxanein, "to cause to grow, to increase, to enlarge". This underlying sense of growth points to a dynamism in authority that produces, promotes and completes the bond which unites people (G. Fessard, Autorité et bien commun, 1969): if authority is needed and exercised among human beings, it is because they do not at once realize and achieve what they are to become on the personal and social plane. Each human being's desire is universal, which inevitably poses the problem of the progress of each with the co-existence of all. No social life can be established or maintained without some form of authority. The origins of societies of very different kinds show that at the basis of all authority lies a de facto power, employed either for the better (the "charism" of the born leader, the natural ancestor of the "saint"*) or for the worse (the brutality of the gang leader, the tyranny of violence), which always has a tendency to turn into de jure power. Institutional structures develop and regulate the common will to live. Paradoxically, the goal of authority is its own disappearance; the authority of parents and educators ceases when the child in its turn has become a free and responsible person. In the case of a society, the common good is never perceived or achieved by all so fully that authority can cease. The goal remains asymptotic. As long as it has not been reached, authority appears as the necessary mediator of the common good of the group.

In a Christian perspective, the ultimate ground of all authority is the sovereignty of God (Rom. 13:1), who wills the good of his creatures. God, however, also wills their salvation,* i.e. that humanity grow in life towards eschatological fulfilment. God therefore sent his Son in a humanity like ours in order to manifest and exercise his saving authority in human terms, in a visible and historical way. Of his own free choice, Jesus falls in with the anthropological laws that govern the genesis of all authority.

THE BASIS OF AUTHORITY IN THE CHURCH

Jesus appears as a charismatic leader who makes an unheard-of claim to authority (Matt. 7:29; Mark 1:22,27; Luke 4:32), sets his own word above that of Moses (Matt. 5:21-48, 19:8-9), claims authority to forgive sins (Matt. 9:1-8; Luke 7:48-49), commands with power unclean spirits, the sea and the winds (Luke 4:36; Matt. 8:27), calls on people to leave everything and follow him (Matt. 4:18-22, 9:9) and claims a unique relation with God, whom he declares to be his own Father (Matt. 11:27; Luke 10:22), designating himself as the Son. That authority is questioned by his contemporaries (Matt. 21:23-24 par.), but it compels recognition from those who follow him and is acknowledged as rightful authority in the light of Jesus' death and resurrection.* The risen Jesus can then send his disciples on mission* in the name of the total authority that has been given him in heaven and on earth (Matt. 28:18). Johannine reflection sees Jesus as having received from the Father authority to execute judgment (John 5:27) and power to give life (John 17:2). Jesus' authority is exercised for the sake of the growth of the kingdom, the common good of humanity of which it is the channel. The Revelation to John celebrates the Son as the Lamb sacrificed and victorious, on whom all authority and power has been conferred (Rev. 5:12).

Jesus gathered around him a community of disciples. After the ordeal of his passion, that community re-assembles through faith* in his resurrection and the strength of the Spirit received at Pentecost.* In the primitive church every baptized person has the responsibility, and as it were the authority, to bear witness to the truth of the message and to serve in the name of Christ both inside and outside the community. Within that communal group, the special authority of the twelve chosen by the Lord and bearing witness to his resurrection is confirmed. They have received the official mission to proclaim the gospel to every creature. The group of apostles is joined by Paul in virtue of the singular grace* he received of seeing the risen Christ. The authority of the Twelve, of the apostles and ministers who assist them in their task, is lived in an atmosphere of close fellowship with the community. According to Jesus' words, it is an authority of service (Mark 10:43-45), which must not follow the model of the political structure of secular society (Luke 22:25-26). This authority is based on the bond of the apostles with Jesus (in this sense it is a de jure authority); in its turn it is the basis of a ministry which consists in preaching the word, prayer and worship, and maintenance of the church community in a fellowship of faith and love. Paul claims this authority for himself (2 Cor. 13:10); it includes if necessary the duty of reproof (Titus 2:15). In another order of ideas, Paul commends obedience to the civil authorities because they are established by God (Rom. 13:1-3).

All Christian churches consequently acknowledge the authority and sovereignty of Christ over his church in the power of his Spirit. That authority is that of the gospel, which Origen identified with Christ himself and which is a power of salvation for the believer. It is attested in scripture, the authentic formulation of the word of God,* which demands both from the church as a gathered community and from every Christian the adherence of faith and obedience. ity exercised in the church can only be in the service of that faith and obedience.

DISPUTE ABOUT AUTHORITY

The question of authority was one of the earliest matters of dispute between the churches. This is not surprising, for separations always involve questioning the legitimacy of the authority of the existing church. Between East and West the dispute was more about the way authority functions in the church (more synodical, collegial, communal and respectful of local freedoms in the East; more centralized, personalized and “authoritarian” in the West).

In the 16th century the conflict about authority assumed strictly doctrinal significance, connected with the deep ecclesiological divergence between certain confessions and with different conceptions of the nature of the ordained ministry (see ministry in the church). In the name of justification* by faith and the incapacity of human beings to cooperate in any way in their salvation, the reformers – the Lutherans in particular – acknowledged the necessity of human authority for the good order of the church,* the correct proclamation of the gospel and the right administration of the sacraments,* but they did not accept that in these domains the church is the administrator of an authority derived from God himself, for the sake of the salvation of human beings.

The Roman Catholic Church (RCC) and the Orthodox churches (though authority assumes a different form with them) hold that this kind of authority is given to them by the will of Christ. So great was divergence on this issue in the West that the response on the RC side to the challenge of that authority was a stiffening and strengthening of the authority principle, together with increasing Roman centralization. By the late 19th century, the RCC could be described as a religion of authority in contrast to the Reformation churches, understood as religions of the Spirit, of conscience* and liberty.*

This divergence finds concrete expression in the understanding of the structure of the church, especially in the role assigned to the episcopal ministry as the ministry of “superintendence” and pre-eminently the ministry of authority in the church. The divergence extends to all the chief areas of this ministry: proclamation of the word, sacraments, government and maintenance in communion.*

For the RCC the ministry of the word includes not only the task of preaching but also the authority to interpret the scriptures correctly, in order to maintain the community in the truth of faith. The ministry therefore constitutes a magisterium (see teaching authority), which is exercised in regard to the scriptures, without standing above them. This magisterium pertains to the bishops in communion with the pope, acting either separately or assembled in a council. When an irrevocable and solemn decision is taken by a council, this is considered to be infallible (i.e. free from error, see infallibility/indefectibility), for the council is an organ of expression for the infallibility of the whole church, that which rests on the “supernatural sense of the faith which characterizes the people as a whole... from the bishops down to the last member of the laity” (Lumen Gentium 12). The First Vatican Council defined that the pope, as bishop of Rome, in virtue of his responsibility to maintain unanimity in faith among the churches, can on certain precise conditions himself commit the infallibility of the whole church.

The Orthodox churches share the ideas of episcopal magisterium and of infallibility (or, more exactly, inerrancy) but are loath to separate this exercise of authority from the “general consciousness” of the church (the synaisthesis, the Greek equivalent of the Latin sensus fidelium; see consensus fidelium), the primordial seat of Christian authority. For this reason the Orthodox link the infallibility of councils more with their reception* – it is discerned after the event and cannot be guaranteed beforehand. The Reformation churches generally reject the idea of an ecclesial magisterium in the name of the principle that scripture is its own interpreter and always produces anew its own correct interpretation. Doctrinal authority in the church is simply human and is judged by its fidelity to “the sovereign authority of the holy scriptures”.

The RCC claims for the ministers of the word and the sacraments an authority of a sacramental nature (often denoted by what has now become an ambiguous term, “power”), received by ordination,* which places them in the apostolic succession (see apostolicity). Ordained ministers thus act in the name of Christ and of the church, for the sacraments are acts of Christ, celebrated in the church by the power of the Spirit who is invoked. The Orthodox churches share this fundamental conviction. For the Reformation churches, the authority of ministers belongs above all in the place of ecclesial investiture, for the ultimate basis of all ministry is, most often, baptism.*

Finally, the RCC holds that its ministers have received an authority of jurisdiction (referred to in Matt. 16:18 and 18:18) over the members of the Christian people, which is exercised in the order of faith and life, in the service of their salvation. That authority is likewise necessary to the maintenance of communion among local and particular churches. That is why the councils of Florence (1439) and Vatican I* declared that the primacy* of the bishop of Rome confers on him a power of universal jurisdiction over pastors and faithful. The Orthodox churches, which share an analogous conception of jurisdiction, have historically always rejected this Catholic doctrine of the Roman primacy as extraneous to their tradition and to the practice of earlier centuries. The Reformation churches remain alien to the idea of jurisdiction, which attributed to the church an instrumental role in the domain of salvation.

While the Anglican communion has always sought to be a via media, its “comprehensiveness” in fact covers a very complex situation, which includes both “high church” (close to the Roman Catholic conception) and “evangelical” (close to Reformation ecclesiology) trends.

ECUMENICAL UNDERSTANDING OF AUTHORITY

Contemporary ecumenical discussions have devoted considerable attention to the question of authority in the church, examining it mainly in relation to the theme of ministries, which still constitutes a key obstacle to ecumenical progress. Before summarizing results, the chief dialogues and relevant documents may be listed.

International dialogues. To be mentioned here are the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC)

“Authority in the Church I” (Venice 1976), “Authority in the Church I: Elucidation” (Windsor 1981), “Authority in the Church II” (Windsor 1981), “The Gift of Authority: Authority in the Church III” (Palazzola 1998); the Lutheran-Roman Catholic International Commission, “The Ministry in the Church” (1981, esp. sec. 3); the International Commission between the Roman Catholic Church and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, “The Presence of Christ in Church and World” (1977, esp. sec. 2, “Doctrinal Authority in the Church”); the Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue, in its reports of Denver (1971, paras 99-118), Dublin (1976, paras 106-107), Honolulu (1981, paras 35-38), Nairobi (1986, paras 61-75), Singapore (1991, paras 53-98), Rio de Janeiro (1996, paras 53-72), and Brighton (2001, under the title “Speaking the Truth in Love: Teaching Authority among Catholics and Methodists”); the Anglican-Lutheran dialogue, Pullach (1972, paras 17-50); the Anglican-Orthodox dialogue, Moscow (1976, paras 1-18) and Dublin (1984, paras 21-30, 47-52, 90-92, 104-106); and Faith and Order, BEM (Lima 1982, esp. M15-16,19-25). The Roman Catholic-Orthodox International Commission is expected to tackle the question of authority in the church.

National dialogues. Here we may mention from the USA volumes 5 and 6 of Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue (P.C. Empie et al., eds): Papal Primacy and the Universal Church (1974) and Teaching Authority and Infallibility in the Church (1978). The French Groupe des Dombes* has produced “Episcopal Ministry” (1976, esp. n.32-49) and “The Ministry of Communion in the Universal Church” (1985) in Pour la communion des Eglises: L'apport du Groupe des Dombes 1937-1987 (1988).

The immense advances achieved in regard to the nature, basis and meaning of ministry and ministries in the structure of the church also represent progress on the question of authority, in particular as regards ordination, apostolic succession of ministry treated within the apostolicity of the whole church, the ecclesiological reference of the episcopal ministry, its symbolic function in the service of Christ's action for his church, and the traditional significance of the threefold ministry.* Openness to the idea of the sacramentality of the church, admittedly qualified and still hesitant, nevertheless allows hope for overcoming the fundamental difficulty concerning the nature of the instrumentality of the church in relation to salvation.

Another area of progress is that of dialogue on scripture* and Tradition (see apostolic Tradition, canon, Tradition and traditions), scripture and magisterium.* The whole state of the question has been completely transformed here since it has come to be recognized, on the one hand, that the composition of the New Testament belongs to apostolic church Tradition and the constitution of the canon to post-apostolic church Tradition and, on the other hand, that Tradition essentially consists in the transmission of the message of scripture and does not constitute another source alongside it. Thus Pope John Paul II, in his ecumenical encyclical Ut Unum Sint* (1995), could formulate the framework for further study as “the relationship between sacred scripture, as the highest authority in matters of faith, and sacred Tradition, as indispensable to the interpretation of the word of God”. Convergence is also emerging in regard to recognition of the authority of the creeds* and councils* of the so-called undivided church. As regards the magisterium proper, a conciliatory formula might be along the following lines: whereas the Reformation churches have one-sidedly maintained the church’s sole obedience to scripture, the RCC emphasis on the authority of the magisterium has been no less one-sided – to the extent that it seems to consider the magisterium as self-sufficient. A dialectic approach capable of integrating the two points of view would be to recognize that the authority of the church is a secondary norm (norma normata), bound by obedience to the primary norm of scripture (norma normans), but is no less truly a norm which, with the assistance of the Holy Spirit, provides in its most solemn pronouncements a guarantee of fidelity to scripture.

The dialogue which has advanced furthest towards agreement on the problem of authority is certainly the ARCIC. Its first Venice document (1976) starts from the Christian authority which is at work in the church through the action of the Holy Spirit.

It underlines the importance of the authority of holiness, and then acknowledges the authority attached to the episcopate of the ordained ministry, which is exercised conjointly with the community in a “permanent process of discernment and response”. It considers the authority which serves communion between churches in conciliar relations and even tackles the question of primate, regional and universal authority (Roman primacy). It also deals with authority in matters of faith, a point at which it gives an important place to the doctrine of reception. The Windsor document (1981) studies four particularly thorny topics: the interpretation of the Petrine passages in scripture, divine right, jurisdiction and infallibility. Almost two decades later, in “The Gift of Authority”, the renewed commission considered that it had attained a sufficiently common view on the question of the bishop of Rome’s universal primacy for it to propose the exercise and acceptance of such a pastoral and doctrinal ministry, so understood, even before the Roman Catholic and Anglican churches were in full communion.

The exercise of authority in the church also assumes concrete form which varies with cultures and historical epochs and which always to some extent reflects ways in which authority is exercised in civil society. This non-theological factor, extremely important as regards the image the churches present to one another and to the world, must also be subject to conversion. Each tradition has a tendency particularly to emphasize one of the three aspects – personal, collegial and communal – whose complementarity was recognized at the 1927 Faith and Order conference in Lausanne (cf. BEM, M26 and comm.). In a movement of ecumenical conversion, each confession owes it to itself to restore to a due place in its life and organization the aspect or aspects that it has a tendency to obscure.

AZARIAH, VEDANAYAGAM SAMUEL

B. 17 Aug. 1874, Tinnevely, South India; d. Jan. 1945, Dornakal. Azariah, a champion of ecumenism among the younger churches, served as YMCA secretary for a period. He was one of the founders of the Indian Missionary Society of Tinnevely in 1903, and later went as a missionary to work in the territories of the Nizam of Hyderabad, today part of the state of Andhra Pradesh. In a provocative address at Edinburgh 1910, he strongly criticized the unequal partnership between Western missionaries and their indigenous colleagues. He was consecrated bishop of Dornakal in 1912, the first Indian to become a bishop of the Anglican church. During the period of his services, the diocese registered phenomenal growth in numbers and activities. He was chairman of the National Christian Council of India, an influential participant in the International Missionary Council, and one of the leaders in the movement which issued in the Church of South India in 1947. He was present at Lausanne 1927, Oxford 1937, and Tambaram 1938. Azariah was an evangelist, a man of prayer, a tireless teacher, and an able administrator.

B. 23 May 1908, Keta, Ghana; d. 29 Dec. 1994, Accra. Vice-chairman of the International Missionary Council* in 1958, then its last chairman, Baëta superintended the merger of the IMC and the WCC in 1961. He served on the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs, and on the WCC central and executive committees, 1961-68. After his ordination in 1936, Baëta became synod clerk of the Evangelical Presbyterian Church, 1945-49. He was also chairman of the Ghana Christian Council and of the Ghana church union negotiations committee. A member of the legislative council of the Gold Coast, 1946-50, he later served on the constitutional assembly which prepared the way for return to civilian rule in 1969 after the overthrow of Nkrumah.

BAPTISM

TOGETHER with faith* in Christ, baptism administered in the name of the Holy Trinity – Father, Son and Holy Spirit – is regarded by almost all Christian communions as the basis of the Christian life and membership of the one church* of Christ. Unity* in baptism should thus be for all such disciples of the Lord Jesus the mark by which they recognize each other as members of the Body of Christ. The importance attached by Christians and their churches to baptism – reflected in the 1982 Lima text (*Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry**) and the responses to it – derives from the teaching of the New Testament and the practice of the first Christian community.

THE EVIDENCE OF THE NT AND THE FIRST CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY

We may consider here four different aspects of early Christian baptism.

Significance. Together with the proclamation of the gospel, with which it is closely linked, the act of baptism is presented in the NT as an essential mission,* entrusted by the risen Christ to his disciples so that all human beings might share in the salvation* he came to bring (Matt. 28:19; Mark 16:16; Acts 2:38, 10:47-48; Rom. 6:3-6). In John's gospel, the Lord affirms the necessity of baptism for entry into the kingdom of God:* "No one can enter the kingdom of God without being born of water and Spirit" (John 3:5). As at the baptism of Jesus (Mark 1:9-11 and par.), so too the baptism received by the disciples from the Lord closely connects the rite with the Holy Spirit* (Mark 1:8 and par.; Acts 2:38) and implies faith, which is itself a gift of the Holy Spirit (Mark 16:16; Acts 8:37 [Western text]; Rom. 6:8). Through the Spirit, the baptized person becomes a son or daughter in the Son, an adopted child of the heavenly Father (Rom. 8:15-17; Gal. 4:5-7; Eph. 1:5), a child of God (John 1:12). Buried with Christ in baptism, the baptized person has died to sin,* partakes of the life and resurrection of the Lord (Rom. 6:3-11; Col. 2:12) and, with other baptized persons, becomes a member of Christ's Body (1 Cor. 12:12-13). For the baptized, this means a new birth (John 3:5). This rite of baptism is a mystery or sacrament* because it was instituted by the Lord as a visible and effective sign of the regeneration of those receiving it and of their incorporation in the church as the Body of Christ. The responses to BEM show the churches to be largely agreed on this as the meaning of baptism.

The baptismal rite. Baptism is a washing with water accompanied by a word (cf. Eph. 5:26). This "word" can be understood as a confession of faith in the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit (see Trinity), mentioned in all baptismal rituals back to Matt. 28:19 (cf. Didache 7.1). Jesus was baptized by John in the Jordan. During the first centuries the Christian tradition retained the practice of baptizing in running water, usually channelled into a pool or basin known from earliest times as a baptistery. In any case, the rite had to be performed with water, even still water, as became customary in most churches very early on (already accepted in the Didache 7.2). BEM declares that “baptism is administered with water in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit” (B17).

Gift of the Spirit. The gift of the Spirit which accompanies the baptismal rite seems to have been mentioned variously from very early times, as attested in the Acts of the Apostles. The apostles Peter and John come to Samaria so that the Spirit might “come” on those evangelized and baptized by Philip (Acts 8:16-17). In the case of the Ethiopian eunuch (8:29-38), however, and above all of Saul (9:18-19), the Spirit appears to have been given prior to baptism. During the “Caesarean Pentecost”, Peter baptizes Cornelius and his household because they have just received the Holy Spirit (10:45-48, 11:15-17). This variety ultimately lies behind the observation in BEM that “Christians differ in their understanding as to where the sign of the gift of the Spirit is to be found” (B14).

Communion. The NT provides no clear evidence of newly baptized persons participating immediately in the eucharistic celebration after receiving the baptism with which the gift of the Spirit is linked (cf. 1 Pet. 2:2-3), but all the baptismal orders of the patristic church attest the participation of newly baptized persons or neophytes in the eucharist* following their baptism (esp. in the case of the paschal vigil). As full members of the church, the Body of Christ, they partook of the Lord’s supper along with their brothers and sisters (cf. John 6:53). Linked in this way with the gift of the Spirit and the eucharistic meal, baptism constituted a single if complex unity regarded as “initiation” into the mysteries. In several places BEM hints at the restoration of that unity where it has been lost (e.g. B14 comm., E19 comm.).

BAPTISMAL CUSTOMS

Historically, the church has exhibited both uniformity and diversity in its practice of baptism.

The ancient custom. The first detailed rite of Christian initiation is found in the document identified with the Apostolic Tra- dition of Hippolytus of Rome (c. A.D. 217), which reports customs which were certainly earlier: a catechumenate including instruction, scrutinies, prayers and exorcisms; then the baptism of infants and adults, almost certainly in the night between Saturday and Easter Sunday. This rite began with the signation of the candidates and prayer over the water, over the oil of thanksgiving and over the oil of exorcism. The candidates renounced Satan and were anointed with the oil of exorcism. They were dipped three times in the water with the confession of faith (see common confession, creeds) in the form of questions and responses. After the water baptism there was a first anointing of the newly baptized ones with the “oil of thanksgiving” by a presbyter. Then the bishop laid hands on them to “make them worthy of being filled with the Holy Spirit” and again anointed them with the oil of thanksgiving. He then marked them with the sign of the cross and gave them the kiss of peace, after which they joined in the eucharistic celebration with all the faithful and received the communion in the body and blood of Christ.

The anointings. When and how the practice of ritual anointing was introduced into the baptismal rite is uncertain (see chrismation). There is not much evidence for it in the NT (perhaps 1 John 2:20,27; 2 Cor. 1:22; also Mark 14:3-8 and par., 16:1 and par.), but theologically it rests on the Christian’s participation in the anointing of Jesus the Messiah or Christ (cf. Isa. 61:1-2 = Luke 4:18-19; 2 Cor. 2:15); moreover it was the custom in antiquity for baths to be preceded by anointings with oil for detergent purposes and to be followed by anointings with aromatic and invigorative oils. These were given a spiritual significance in Christian practice.

Diversity of customs. The sequence of rites in Hippolytus appears to have influenced the baptismal practices of most of the churches in subsequent centuries, even though the twofold post-baptismal anointing is attested in the Roman tradition only. The early Syrian tradition, however, conferred the gift of the Spirit before the water baptism and for long knew nothing of any post-baptismal anointing with the “oil of thanksgiving”, called chrism or myron, i.e. aromatic oil. The same was the case in Constantinople down to the mid-5th century, as John Chrysostom and Proclus (d.446) testify. It also appears that a laying on of hands as sign of the gift of the Holy Spirit was not universal. The spread of the custom of post-baptismal chrismation in connection with the gift of the Holy Spirit appears to have been linked to the conflict with Messalianism and also to the use of chrismation in the reconciliation of heretics. Moreover, the diffusion throughout the Christian world of the mystagogic baptismal homilies and catecheses of such well-known bishops as Basil, Cyril of Jerusalem, Ambrose of Milan, John Chrysostom and Theodore of Mopsuestia helped to produce not only a more uniform theology but also a more uniform symbolism and practice of baptism.

Generalization of baptism and divergent customs. With the mass entry of pagans into the church from the 4th century onwards, a difference between East and West emerged, which was re-inforced by the reaction against Pelagianism. It was not always possible for the bishop to preside at baptism. Moreover, baptism came to be administered systematically to newborn infants. In the churches of the East, the post-baptismal anointing conferring the gift of the Holy Spirit was performed by the priest immediately after the baptism but with myron consecrated by the bishop. In the churches of the West, Rome, under Innocent I (401-416), reserved this gift of the Holy Spirit to the imposition of hands and the anointing performed by the bishop, while the priest continued to perform an initial anointing with chrism. In the West, therefore, the gift of the Spirit conferred by the bishop was deferred to a later date, eventually making it possible for persons baptized in infancy later to renew, in the presence of the bishop and the church, the profession of faith that had been made on their behalf in baptism. Because of the dominical precept concerning the necessity of eucharistic communion for participation in eternal life (St Augustine, Innocent I), communion came to be given prior to the gift of the Spirit by the bishop. It was, however, only in fairly recent times that this custom of eucharistic communion prior to the gift of the Spirit conferred by the bishop became general in certain countries. Despite usages to the contrary, the Roman Catholic Church has retained in principle the sacramental sequence of baptism, anointing for the gift of the Holy Spirit and eucharistic communion, as do the Orthodox and pre-Chalcedonian churches, and it is always in this sequence that it now administers them in the case of adult baptism.

*Chrismation and confirmation.** Essentially, the gift of the Spirit is linked to Christian baptism. In the "Catholic" churches, however, a specific rite marks this gift: the imposition of hands and/or anointing with chrism or myron. The different practices followed by churches in East and West in the administration of infant baptism have led to different theological emphases. The churches of the East have kept the celebration of baptism, confirmation/chrismation and eucharistic communion as an indivisible whole even for infants. Their emphasis has thus been not so much on the personal commitment of faith which is in principle presupposed in these sacraments but rather on the single whole they together constitute. On the other hand, the churches of the West, because of reserving confirmation/chrismation for the bishop, have usually allocated the rites of baptism, confirmation and communion to different times in a person's life and have come since the middle ages to attach considerable importance to the Christian's ratification of the commitment of faith made for him or her in infant baptism. The churches of the Reformation, abolishing the rite of anointing, have retained the personal commitment of Christians which "confirms" the promise made by other Christians for them in infant baptism. Among the Protestant churches, the heirs to the Anabaptist or Baptist traditions of the 16th century are unable to attach any significance to the baptism of an infant too young to make a personal commitment of faith and are themselves willing to baptize only at a later age, while "(re-)baptizing" those who have received infant baptism.

THEOLOGICAL ISSUES UNDERLYING DIFFERENT BAPTISMAL PRACTICES

Baptism conferred outside the full communion of the church. A controversy over this arose in the 3rd century between Rome and the churches of Africa led by Cyprian of Carthage (d.258). According to the Roman position (and its later refinements), if baptism is correctly administered – with water, in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and with the intention of doing what the church does – the personal status of the ministrant is of only secondary importance. Baptism administered outside the institutional bounds of the church can therefore be recognized as valid and even to some degree efficacious. Taking its cue from this theology, the Roman Catholic Church, along with many churches of the East, accepts the baptism of Christians of other churches, recognizing it as an important element in the ecclesial communion* which continues to unite Christians in some measure, despite their divisions. The Second Vatican Council* strongly emphasized this position (Unitatis Redintegratio 3-4, 22-23; Lumen Gentium 15).

But Cyprian and the bishops of Roman Africa affirmed that outside the church there can be no gift of the Holy Spirit or any sacrament. Almost all churches have in one way or another abandoned the rigidity of this position. From the position of Basil of Caesarea (d.379), who regarded the baptism given by certain Christians outside the great church as a special case, all the Orthodox churches have inherited an attitude towards the baptism of other churches which is often reserved. Some Orthodox churches recognize this baptism only “by economy”,* i.e. while seldom administering baptism to such Christians requesting admission to the Orthodox church, they refrain from official comment on the value of baptism conferred outside the Orthodox communion. Despite this, all the Orthodox churches now recognize that the practice of baptism with water in the name of the Blessed Trinity by other churches is a decisive factor for recognizing them as true Christian brothers and sisters and cooperating with them in the quest for the visible unity of all Christ’s disciples.

The ministrant of baptism. For the vast majority of churches, the ministrant of baptism should be an ordained minister or at least a baptized Christian. The Roman Catholic Church holds that, in an emergency, any human being (quicumque homo) can administer baptism, even one who is not baptized or even a Christian. The Orthodox churches do not accept this position.

Participation in the eucharist. If the baptism administered by other churches is in some way recognized, how can Christians from these same churches not be allowed to partake of the eucharist – which is the completion of baptismal initiation and does not as such require an act of faith different from that of baptism? The reply offered is that as the visible expression in worship of the fullness of the community’s faith, the eucharist can be shared only by those who are fully and visibly integrated into this community by complete communion in faith, sacraments and discipline.

The restriction of baptism to adults only. Discussion of this issue has made little progress on the theoretical side since the 16th century. Recent meetings between Mennonites and Lutherans in France have shown that the principles remain unchanged on both sides, though regret over the harshness of past condemnations (see the Augsburg confession, arts 9,12,14,16-17) and the desire for dialogue is expressed on both sides. The increasing frequency of adult baptism in all churches may eventually help to resolve this question. BEM seeks to make the most of existing agreements by affirming that “baptism is both God’s gift and our human response to that gift... Both the baptism of believers and the baptism of infants take place in the church as the community of faith” (B8 and 12).

“Baptism of the Spirit.” While Pentecostals see this as the foundation of the Christian life, it poses problems for other Christian communions. Useful clarifications have been achieved, but without settling all the basic questions.

THE ECUMENICAL SIGNIFICANCE OF THE COMMON BAPTISM

Under the combined pressure of the Orthodox churches and then of the Roman Catholic Church and the Second Vatican Council, the WCC’s Faith and Order commission attached increasing importance in the 1950s and 1960s to a common recognition of baptism by all the churches. Recognition of value to all correctly administered baptisms in other Christian communions amounts already to recognition of a measure of ecclesiality in the community administering such baptisms; it means recognizing a fundamental community of faith in Christ as unique Lord and Saviour, in the Trinity of the Father who sent his Son for the salvation of the world and bestowed the Holy Spirit, who enables us to call on the Father. It is also recognition of a certain degree of communion in the one Body of Christ, the church. Many of the dialogues between the Christian communions have dealt specifically with the question of baptism. In 1987 the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches produced a document devoted solely to this theme: "Faith, Sacraments and the Unity of the Church".

The challenge of the tension-laden words of BEM remains: "The inability of the churches mutually to recognize their various practices of baptism as sharing in the one baptism, and their actual dividedness in spite of mutual baptismal recognition, have given dramatic visibility to the broken witness of the church... The need to recover baptismal unity is at the heart of the ecumenical task" (B6 comm.). "When baptismal unity is realized in one holy, catholic, apostolic church, a genuine Christian witness can be made to the healing and reconciling love of God. Therefore, our one baptism into Christ constitutes a call to the churches to overcome their divisions and visibly manifest their fellowship" (B6). These themes have been taken up again by a Lutheran Strasbourg Institute symposium in 1996 ("Baptism and the Unity of the Church"), and by a Faith and Order study beginning in 1994 on the role of worship in the search for unity.

BAPTISM, EUCHARIST AND MINISTRY (the "Lima text")

MEETING in Lima, Peru, in January 1982, the WCC Faith and Order* commission gave final form to a text entitled Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry (BEM), which would in the succeeding years attract attention unprecedented in the history of the modern ecumenical movement, bearing out the conviction of the commission that it had recognized and formulated "a remarkable degree of agreement" in three areas of considerable controversy among the churches.

The meaning of baptism* was expounded as "participation in Christ's death and resurrection", "conversion, pardoning and cleansing", "the gift of the Spirit", "incorporation into the body of Christ" and "the sign of the kingdom". On knotty problems concerning the relation of faith,* water baptism and the Spirit, the Lima text declared that "baptism is both God's gift and our human response to that gift... The necessity of faith for the reception of the salvation embodied and set forth in baptism is acknowledged by all churches"; it emphasized that "both the baptism of believers and the baptism of infants take place in the church as the community of faith"; and, while noting that "Christians differ in their understanding as to where the sign of the gift of the Spirit is to be found", it claimed general agreement that "Christian baptism is in water and the Holy Spirit".

The eucharist,* or Lord's supper, is seen as "a gift from the Lord", and it is said that every Christian receives the "gift of salvation through communion in the body and blood of Christ". The "meaning of the eucharist" is expounded according to a Trinitarian and credal pattern as "thanksgiving to the Father", "anamnesis or memorial of Christ", "invocation of the Spirit", "communion of the faithful" and "meal of the kingdom". The text speaks of "Christ's real, living and active presence in the eucharist”, which is “the living and effective sign of Christ’s sacrifice, accomplished once and for all on the cross and still operative on behalf of all humankind”.

The section on ministry* begins with “the calling of the whole people of God” and locates the ordained ministry within that context. The ordained ministry is seen as a reminder “of the dependence of the church on Jesus Christ, who is the source of its mission and the foundation of its unity”. As an element within the broader reality of an “apostolic Tradition” that is transmitted in many ways, the “episcopal succession” is proposed as “a sign, though not a guarantee, of the continuity and unity of the church”; and it is claimed that “the threefold ministry of bishop, presbyter and deacon may serve today as an expression of the unity we seek and also as a means for achieving it”.

THE PREPARATORY HISTORY

The Lima text grew out of a long history of study and dialogue. The milestones of that history were four world conferences (Lausanne 1927, Edinburgh 1937, Lund 1952, Montreal 1963) and ten plenary meetings of the commission on F&O (from Chichester 1949 to Lima 1982, by way of Bristol 1967 and Accra 1974, which marked important stages in the development of BEM). There was an increasingly universal church representation in the process, with steadily growing involvement of Orthodox and, after the Second Vatican Council, of Roman Catholic theologians.

The history of BEM can be divided into two periods, each with a different style of working. The first period, from Lausanne to Bristol, developed in two stages: the period of doctrinal comparisons among churches intent on defining their own identity (from Lausanne to Lund) and that of common effort to build on the biblical and Christological bases (from Lund to Montreal). With a prelude at Aarhus (1964), which took up the themes of eucharist and ministry in the light of Montreal, the second period really got under way at Bristol, which resumed work on the relation between scripture and Tradition, and took up again the systematic study of the eucharist, but above all recognized that a sort of “ecumenical tradition” had evolved in the course of the various world conferences and plenary commission meetings of F&O. This tradition can be identified in the various final reports adopted by the delegates of the different churches (see Tradition and traditions).

Baptism and the eucharist were the subject of theological discussions from the very outset of the ecumenical movement. No important F&O conference ever took place without at least some reference to these two sacraments.* A common understanding of baptism was a major preoccupation between Lund and Montreal, which favourably received the results of the study carried out during those years as presented in the report “One Lord, One Baptism” (1961).

The study on baptism was resumed in 1967 at Bristol. A short analytical study produced by a consultation in early 1968 was commented on by a large number of regional groups; and a second international consultation two years later at Revnice, Czechoslovakia, discussed certain problems in greater detail. The findings of all this work were assembled in the report “Baptism, Confirmation and Eucharist”, submitted to the commission on F&O in Louvain (1971).

The special study of the eucharist had begun somewhat earlier. A series of consultations led to the report “The Holy Eucharist”, discussed in Bristol. At the request of the WCC’s fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968), efforts were focused on the question of intercommunion.* A consultation held in Geneva in 1969 produced the report entitled “Beyond Intercommunion”.

In the course of this work a proposal was made to compile two documents bringing together the agreements on baptism and the eucharist achieved in the ecumenical movement. In September 1971 the WCC executive committee decided to send two texts received by the commission on F&O at Louvain – “Ecumenical Agreement on Baptism” and “The Eucharist in Ecumenical Thought” – to all member churches for reactions and comments. In the light of the responses from the churches, the texts were then amended and again submitted to the F&O commission in Accra in 1974.

The study on ministry undertaken in response to the discussion at Montreal progressed in several stages. A first report, "The Ordained Ministry", was presented to the commission in Louvain. Judging that substantial progress had been made, the commission asked that the work be continued, and an international consultation in Marseilles in 1972 produced a text that was distributed to a large number of groups and theologians for reactions. In the light of their responses, the text was revised once more before being submitted to the F&O commission in Accra. The WCC central committee decided that the three texts should be published and communicated to the member churches.

The first drafts, drawn up by Max Thurian from 1967 onwards to serve as a basis in this search for convergences, consisted essentially in quotations from the official reports, organized around an intelligible theological structure. First came the text on the eucharist (1967), then the one on baptism (1968) and finally that on ministry (1972). A large number of theologians invited by Lukas Vischer, then director of the F&O secretariat, held a series of meetings to discuss these themes and to correct and complete the embryo BEM texts. After Accra (1974), the document was sent to the churches for their reactions. The evaluation of the amendments proposed by the churches (150 letters were received in Geneva) enabled a smaller steering group to bring the BEM text closer to the final form that it would receive at Lima in 1982.

The members of the BEM steering group were Vitaly Borovoy (Orthodox), Nils Ehrenström (Lutheran), Bert Hoedemaker (Reformed), Anton Houtepen (Roman Catholic), Max Thurian (Taizé), Emilianos Timiadis (Orthodox), Lukas Vischer (Reformed), Geoffrey Wainwright (Methodist). A number of experts were also involved in the work of the steering group, among them Nikos Nissiotis and John Zizioulas (Orthodox), Emmanuel Lanne and Jean Tillard (Roman Catholic), Günther Gassmann and Harding Meyer (Lutheran), and Günter Wagner (Baptist).

THE NATURE OF THE BEM PROCESS

The ecclesiological conviction underlying the composition of BEM is that when the churches, through their representatives, are gathered together by the WCC, they are no less churches than when making their decisions individually. Indeed, when a church is validly represented at a responsible ecumenical gathering, its tradition and witness are enriched by the contribution of the other churches gathered there. The sharing of the truth in love illumines and reveals the fundamental nature of each. This ecumenical action of the Spirit in the churches has forged what may justifiably be called an ecumenical tradition. This ecumenical tradition, guided by the Holy Spirit, is the fruit of a common "reading" by the various churches of holy scripture and of the great Tradition interpreting God's word, with a view to re-discovering the visible unity* willed by Christ.

It is important to be clear about the authority of the Lima text. It is intended as a theological service to the churches in ecumenical dialogue. It is in no way a complete dogmatic statement claiming to resolve the doctrinal differences that have developed between the churches in the course of history. The churches remain entirely free to accept, correct or reject the text.

In the interests of an objective and generous reception* of the document by the churches, it may be useful to mention a few ways of receiving it which would be neither too immediately critical nor too hastily authoritarian. With other texts on the same subjects, but with its special character as a broad-based ecumenical document, it could be a useful instrument in catechesis.* It could help pastors to give believers a sound basis for their faith. For the re-building of Christian unity it is indispensable that the people of God should hold a strong, simple faith. This document is a valuable expression of ecumenism at this level. A second area where the Lima text can be extremely useful is theological education for the training of the church's future ministers. Besides providing a sound basis for theological reflection, the document can also help to promote a healthy ecumenical attitude. It may also inspire liturgical reform* in the churches, where new worship texts may have to be composed. Finally, it can serve as a basis for reflection by local groups engaging in ecumenical dialogue, especially those for confessionally mixed households. Thus, without being imposed dogmatically, the Lima text may be received in a live way by the churches as a means of strengthening the common faith of Christian believers.

THE RESPONSES OF THE CHURCHES

By the middle of 1990, BEM had been translated and published in 35 languages, and the F&O secretariat had received responses from 190 churches, including the Roman Catholic Church, as well as from several councils of churches and numerous groups of theologians. The churches were asked to say how far they could "recognize in this text the faith of the church through the ages", what consequences they could draw from it for their relations particularly with other churches that "also recognize the text as an expression of the apostolic faith", what guidance they could take from the text for their life and witness, and what suggestions they could make for incorporation of BEM material into the ongoing project of F&O, "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today". An examination of the responses, published in the six-volume series Churches Respond to BEM, gives an indication of the degree of convergence in the faith and the steps still needed to arrive at full visible unity.

At its plenary meeting in Budapest in August 1989, the F&O commission prepared a brief message to the churches to accompany a full report on the BEM process and responses. This 1990 report contains an analytical description of the churches' responses to each section of BEM, proposes some initial clarifications called for in the responses, and sketches possibilities for further work on three more general issues frequently raised by the churches: the relation of scripture and Tradition, the nature of sacrament and sacramentality (including the relation of word and sacrament) and the need for common perspectives on ecclesiology. These themes have been treated at and beyond the fifth world conference on Faith and Order at Santiago de Compostela in 1993. Meanwhile many bilateral dialogues make positive use of BEM itself.

BAPTIST-LUTHERAN DIALOGUE

BAPTISTS and Lutherans both trace their origins to the 16th-century Reformation. Baptist roots are located in the Anabaptist wing of this movement. Anabaptists, who rejected infant baptism* and stressed conscious conversion* before baptism by immersion, were denounced and persecuted by the followers of Luther, Zwingli and Calvin. More recent Baptist origins lie in the 17th-century English separatist movement and in the work of John Smyth, who taught the baptism of adult believers as the basis of the gathered church.

Lutheran beginnings are found in the teachings of Martin Luther and of the Lutheran confessions, as brought together in the Book of Concord (1580). Lutherans stressed as the chief article of the Christian faith justification* by grace* through faith,* and rejected the view that faith can be a prior condition for baptism.

After the Reformation, there were few formal relations between Baptist and Lutheran churches. However, in the 20th century many Baptist and Lutheran churches joined the WCC and regional and national councils of churches, and encountered each other in the ecumenical movement.

The first international theological conversation between representatives of the Lutheran World Federation* and the Baptist World Alliance* began in 1986. Its aim was to clarify differences, convergences and agreements in thought and practice. Baptists were concerned about condemnations of their positions and practices in the Lutheran confessions; Lutherans, about Baptist reluctance to recognize infant baptism. The second meeting, in 1987, took up faith, discipleship and baptism. In 1988 the next session discussed the nature of the church. The fourth, and final, meeting in 1989 prepared a statement on authority for preaching and teaching, and on the condemnations.

National Baptist-Lutheran dialogues took place in the USA (1979-81), the Federal Republic of Germany (1980-81), and the German Democratic Republic (1982-83). All have focused on the theology of baptism and the condemnations. Recurring problems were the relation between belief and baptism, believer's baptism and infant baptism, and the understanding of church and sacraments.

Significant differences remain between the Baptist and Lutheran traditions, but the international and national discussions have resulted in greater understanding. The participants have been able to recognize each other's churches as true churches that live from the gospel.

BAPTIST-ORTHODOX RELATIONS

BAPTIST relations and contacts with the Orthodox church began in the 1860s and 1870s in Russia. During this period various religious groups influenced the Russian Baptist movement. The German Mennonites* emphasized Bible study during their worship hours (Stunden), as did the Molokans, a group similar to the Quakers.* With the concurrence of the Orthodox church, the British and Foreign Bible Society received permission to distribute scriptures, which resulted in the formation of Bible study groups in homes, and many people deserted the church in favour of these hours of Bible study. The influence of these groups, centred on the study of scripture, eventually led a group of young believers to form the first Russian Baptist Union in 1884. The Czarist secret police persecuted the groups, but this made them grow even more. Baptist leaders were imprisoned and their "leaders were exiled to Siberia and the Caucasus like common criminals", according to Baptist historian R.A. Torbet. Similar stories of early Baptist contact with the Orthodox came from Romania, the Ukraine and Bulgaria.

After the victory of Lenin and the Communist Party in 1917, Orthodox and Baptists suddenly found themselves imprisoned and suffering together. A certain understanding and cooperation developed during the period of communist persecution. However, in 1989 when the Berlin wall fell and freedom came to the former Orthodox countries of Eastern Europe, the relationship of Baptists and Orthodox reverted to an almost Czarist-like period of hostility. Hundreds of para-church evangelistic organizations based in Western countries entered the former communist countries. Although most of these groups were not related to the historic Baptist movement, they were described as sectarian proselytizers and "Baptistic". This resulted in further tension between Baptists and Orthodox, particularly in Bulgaria, Romania, Russia and the Ukraine.

Baptist leaders in these countries sought for dialogue and conversations with Orthodox leaders. Out of concern for Christian understanding, the Baptist World Alliance (BWA)* was asked to initiate official conversations with the Orthodox churches, through the Ecumenical Patriarchate. In 1994 a BWA delegation travelled to Istanbul and was received graciously by the synodical committee on inter-Christian affairs. Pre-conversations continue to be held, and it is hoped that these will eventually lead to full conversations. Discussions at Regents College, Oxford, in 1997 centred on the question of whether evangelism and missions are part of the "nature" of the church or "task" of the church.

Although ecclesiologically divided, Baptists and Orthodox theologians share a common faith in the Triune God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. As one Baptist leader said, "What the Baptists like about the Orthodox is that they are orthodox!" Both Orthodox and Baptist leaders pray that theological conversations will issue in a better understanding and mutual appreciation of each other's traditions and faith in Christ.

BAPTIST-REFORMED DIALOGUE

THE BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE* and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* sponsored a dialogue from 1973 to 1977. Prepared through official contacts in the preceding years, it was grounded in a centuries-long relationship.

The Swiss reformers rejected and persecuted the Anabaptist movement, so called by its opponents because the practice of baptizing believers on profession of faith was, from the Reformed point of view, doing "over again" (ana-) what had been done once for all in infant baptism.* While the Baptist churches today trace their direct origins not to the Swiss movement (now represented by the Mennonites*) but to independent churches in England, both the Swiss and English groups were convinced that infant baptism, whatever its intention, was quite other than New Testament baptism.

Yet the Baptists and one type of Reformed Christians – the Congregationalists* – were drawn together by suffering common persecution as radicals. They saw themselves as seeking to renew the local church,* on a NT model, as the place of Christ's rule over his people. In England John Bunyan pleaded that differences over baptismal teaching and practice ought not to divide Christians.

A review of these two interacting tendencies in church history was a main theme of the Baptist-Reformed dialogue. One of its recommendations was for dual practice, by which Christian parents could choose either to present their children for infant baptism or to seek a service of thanksgiving and dedication to their parental task, leaving to the children the decision to request baptism when they were able to do so on their own profession of faith.* Such a dual practice was already followed in some Reformed and United churches.

In 1982 a short consultation evaluated the responses of the churches to the report of this dialogue. Responses differed concerning the recommendation for a dual practice. Some saw it as a positive step in mutual recognition of well-grounded convictions, a recognition that each practice is supported by the evidence of some strands of scripture and tradition. Others considered it an uneasy compromise.

Despite this continuing disagreement, the dialogue has emphasized a common inheritance which owes much to the Calvinist understanding of systematic theology; it also shares an insistence on lay participation in church government and a resistance to focusing authority in the church in a personal episcopate (see church order).

The Baptist-Reformed dialogue has a particular place in the whole spectrum of bilateral dialogues* because it is a dialogue of the "radical" Reformation with the "classic" Reformation. Reformed churches – and, more recently, Baptist churches – have engaged in dialogue with those who stand, in the range of traditions, more on the wing of clerical authority and who emphasize the sacramental (Anglicans, Lutherans, Orthodox and Roman Catholics). The Baptist-Reformed dialogue has ensured both that the common radicalism of these churches has not been forgotten in the wider debate and that Reformed churches do not face only in one direction in their search for visible unity.*

BAPTIST-ROMAN CATHOLIC INTERNATIONAL CONVERSATIONS

THE FIRST international Baptist-Roman Catholic conversations took place 1984-88, co-sponsored by the Commission on Baptist Doctrine and Interchurch Cooperation of the Baptist World Alliance* and the Vatican Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity.* The overall theme was "Christian Witness in Today's World".

Goals included mutual understanding of convergences and divergences between Baptists and Catholics, establishment of relations and communication for mutual and self-understanding, identification of possibilities and difficulties for common witness, and addressing existing prejudices.

Previous Baptist-Catholic contacts included collaboration on social issues and encounters of theologians in Faith and Order settings. In the USA the Bishops Committee for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs co-sponsored dialogue with the American Baptist Churches between 1967 and 1970 and took part in organizing conversations between Southern Baptist and Catholic scholars beginning in 1978. More recently, a Catholic fraternal delegate has been invited to the quinquennial Baptist world congress, and a Baptist fraternal delegate has participated in assemblies of the synod of bishops in Rome.

In the international conversations, the overall theme and the first session on "Evangelism/Evangelization: The Mission of the Church" (West Berlin 1984) set a missiological direction for subsequent sessions on Christology, conversion/discipleship (Los Angeles 1985), the church (New York 1986), religious freedom, evangelism vs proselytism (Rome 1987). The final report of this series, developed at Atlanta, Georgia, USA (1988), gives a "common statement" which placed the findings in the context of fostering common witness.*

Setting a firm Christological foundation, the report states that "our common witness" rests on shared faith* in the centrality of Christ as revelation* of God and sole mediator between God and humankind. This common faith, proclaimed in the New Testament and expressed in the first four ecumenical councils,* should be the basis for discussion of remaining differences. On conversion and discipleship, the report notes that the mystery of Christ can ultimately be grasped only in faith and in the practice of Christian discipleship through faith and love.

Regarding the church,* these conversations, like other dialogues, explored the biblical notion of koinonia* and found "koinonia of the Spirit" (Phil. 2:1) a helpful description of a common understanding of the church. For Baptists, koinonia is expressed principally in local congregations gathered voluntarily under the lordship of Christ (see local church). They avoid structures which threaten individual freedom and local autonomy. For Roman Catholics, the koinonia which the Spirit effects in the local congregation is simultaneously koinonia with other local churches in the one universal church, expressed in spiritual and institutional bonds. These differences and the relationship of Spirit to structures need further discussion (see church order).

Concerning witness in the world, both Baptists and Catholics respond to the great commission (Matt. 28:16-20) through evangelism* or evangelization. Baptists prefer the term "evangelism" and emphasize free personal response of individuals to the gospel. Catholics apply the term "evangelization" to the "first proclamation" of the gospel to non-believers and in the wider sense to the renewal of humanity, witness and related factors. Study is needed to clarify the use of these terms, to help promote further common witness.

In a penitential spirit both Catholics and Baptists confess that competition and bitterness among missionaries have been stumbling blocks for those to whom the gospel is proclaimed. Distinguishing evangelism/evangelization from proselytism,* they confess that both have been guilty of proselytism in its negative sense and lament that division and strife between Christians "can be such a scandal that non-believers may not be attracted to the gospel". Both need greater vigilance in respecting religious liberty.*

Reactions to this first series led Baptist officials to conclude that a further round of formal conversations would not be immediately opportune, but joint discussions on specific issues concerning Roman Catholic-Baptist relationships resumed in 2000-2001.

BAPTIST WORLD ALLIANCE

THE BAPTIST World Alliance (BWA), the worldwide fellowship of Baptist believers, was formed in London in 1905, growing out of the desire for greater denominational unity that emerged from the missionary movement at the end of the 19th century.

Although originally seen only as a movement for fellowship, since 1945 the BWA has adopted a number of programmes whereby Baptists can support one another. Composed of 188 member bodies, called conventions or unions, Baptists work in more than 160 countries. There are 42 million baptized believers in BWA member bodies, with a community of at least 100 million.

The purpose of the BWA is set out in the preamble to its constitution, which states that it “exists as an expression of the essential oneness of Baptist people in the Lord Jesus Christ, to impart inspiration to the fellowship, and to provide channels for sharing concerns and skills in witness and ministry. This Alliance recognizes the traditional autonomy and independence of churches and general bodies.”

Five divisions carry out the work of the BWA: Baptist world aid, communications, evangelism and education, study and research, promotion and development. Three departments carry on significant work for men, women and youth.

The BWA has six regional fellowships of Baptist conventions: All-African Baptist Fellowship, Asian Baptist Federation, Caribbean Baptist Fellowship, European Baptist Federation, North American Baptist Fellowship, and Union of Baptists of Latin America. Each regional fellowship relates to the BWA through a regional secretary who lives in the area.

Every five years the BWA sponsors a Baptist world congress, attended by thousands from all continents. These congresses set the theme and programmes of the alliance for the next five years. Every Baptist member body can send council members, who have equal voice and vote.

BAPTISTS

THE MODERN Baptist movement began in 17th-century England. Separatists, unable to “purify” the Church of England, broke from the puritans and advocated separation from the state church (see church and state). Among them were those who became convinced that infant baptism* was contrary to scripture. In 1607, to avoid persecution, a group led by John Smyth and Thomas Helwys left Gainsborough, England, for Holland, where freedom of religion was flourishing. There, after further study of scripture, the whole congregation rejected their infant baptism and were baptized as believers in 1608. In 1611 Helwys and ten others returned to London to establish the first Baptist church on English soil.

During their stay in Holland these early Baptist believers had contact with the Mennonites,* who had also become convinced of the scriptural basis for believers’ baptism. The Mennonites and others were called Anabaptists, because they were accused of re-baptism – a charge they rejected because they did not consider infant baptism to be scriptural baptism. Thus, although not directly related to the Anabaptists, Baptists count this 17th-century movement as part of their spiritual history, and the rise of the Baptist movement must be seen in this context. With the rediscovery of the Bible through the Reformation, many former Catholic priests became even more radical than Luther in calling for reform. Seeing the danger of the union of church and state, they called for separation not only from the church but also from the state. Many, such as Balthasar Hubmaier, Felix Manz and Conrad Grebel of Switzerland, were persecuted, and some were killed for their convictions. Other representatives of this Nonconformist tradition of opposition to state control and infant baptism include the Waldensians of Italy, who trace their origins back to the 12th century.

Out of this small group of English Baptists, who were part of a spiritual movement for renewal, separation of church and state, believers' baptism, and a purified, conscious adult commitment to personal belief in Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour, a worldwide movement has developed. Today there are 42 million Baptist believers in 160 countries; if one includes children and the larger community of worshippers, they would number at least 65 million more, making the Baptists one of the largest Protestant groups in the world.

BAPTIST BELIEFS

In common with Christians around the world, Baptists hold the apostolic faith as expressed in the Apostles' Creed.* Although Baptists have many "confessions of faith", they hesitate to sign or quote a creed* because of their great concern for the freedom of the individual. The Baptist beliefs listed here are shared by many other churches; it is the combination of them which is distinctively Baptist.

Religious freedom for all. In 1612 Helwys wrote that the king of England "is but an earthly king...: for men's religion to God is betwixt God and themselves; the king shall not answer for it, neither may the king be judge between God and man. Let them be heretics, Turks, Jews or whatsoever, it appertains not to the earthly power to punish them in the least measure." Baptists defend religious freedom and liberty for all people in every country. The American Baptist Roger Williams wrote in the 1650s: "Man hath no power to make laws to bind conscience." Having suffered much religious persecution, Baptists are anxious to defend the rights of all peoples and religions.

Separation of church and state. A natural corollary of religious freedom is the separation of church and state. A.C. Underwood notes that the Anabaptists, in urging complete separation of church and state, "denied the right of the state to compel belief or regulate religion and therefore exercised their own discipline over their members, by the democratic action of each congregation, and excommunicated all who were guilty of grave moral offences". This doctrine is one of the great contributions of this tradition to church unity* and thus to the ecumenical movement; without it, governments would become entangled in trying to control efforts towards church unity.

Open communion. Many of the more credal churches do not invite Christians of other traditions to their celebrations of the Lord's supper (see communion, eucharist, intercommunion); for Baptists the only requirement is personal faith and trust in the Lord Jesus Christ. In 1673 the English Baptist John Bunyan wrote: "The church of Christ hath no warrant to keep out of the communion the Christian that is discovered to be a visible saint of the word, the Christian that walketh according to his own light with God."

Emphasis on the local congregation of believers. One cannot speak of a single national or world Baptist church. There are thousands of Baptist congregations around the world which are gathered into conventions or unions of Baptist churches. It is the Baptist belief that the local congregation is the Body of Christ in that area, but it does not reserve the right to call itself the church of any region or country, or of the world (see local church). Nevertheless, individual Baptist congregations form district associations, state and national conventions to enhance their missionary endeavours. The Baptist World Alliance* (BWA) is the world expression which unites Baptists in 160 countries for fellowship and witness.

Morgan Patterson has summarized the "Baptist way" in ten points: (1) the essence of the Christian faith is spiritual, personal and voluntary; (2) the scriptures are uniquely inspired and authoritative; (3) the church is composed of committed believers; (4) salvation is provided by the grace of God and is available to everyone through repentance and faith; (5) all believers are priests, with no intermediary other than Christ himself; (6) the scriptures command the observance of two ordinances, baptism and the Lord's supper, which are understood to be basically symbolic in meaning; (7) baptism is properly performed by the biblical mode of immersion; (8) the authority for the administration of the church is in the hands of the congregation; (9) religious freedom should be given to all to enable each person to respond to the leadership of the Holy Spirit; (10) the separation of church and state best guarantees liberty of conscience for every citizen.

Significant Baptists who have worked for church unity include John Bunyan, the author of Pilgrim's Progress, who did not want any bar to participation in the Lord's supper. William Carey, who went to India in 1793, has been called the father of modern missions and (by Ernest Payne) the father of the ecumenical movement. As early as 1810, Carey urged an ecumenical meeting representing all Christians, although it was not until a hundred years later, at Edinburgh in 1910, that this "pleasant dream" was realized. In more recent times, Billy Graham has represented the strong Baptist concern for world evangelization; all of his meetings are interdenominational and demonstrate a strong expression of evangelical ecumenism. Martin Luther King, Jr, carried on the strong tradition of Walter Rauschenbusch and the social gospel. Baptists believe that the Christian mission includes a call for justice and human rights for all. Numerous other outstanding Baptists who have contributed to the world missionary movement and wider witness of the Christian church could be mentioned: Johann Oncken, John Clifford, Adoniram Judson, Lottie Moon, Charles Haddon Spurgeon, Lott Carey, J.H. Shakespeare, Ernest Payne and Jimmy Carter.

BAPTISTS AND UNITY

While eager to cooperate with other Christians in mission* and evangelism,* Baptists' congregational polity makes them wary of structural integration (see church order). Some Baptists are critical of the World Council of Churches as "too political". Nevertheless, more than 20 Baptist conventions or unions are members of the WCC. While this represents only a small percentage of the 188 Baptist groups in the BWA, these 16 bodies account for about 45% of the 42 million Baptists in the world. Baptists in the WCC feel a responsibility for keeping alive the missionary concern out of which the WCC grew. It should be noted that only about 8000 of the 45,000 Protestant missionaries from the USA come from WCC member churches; many of the rest come from Baptist backgrounds.

An early theme of the ecumenical movement was "mission and unity". Baptists represent this strain within the ecumenical movement, whether expressed in the WCC or in the evangelical ecumenical movement of the Lausanne congress (see Lausanne covenant). Recent emphases on "mission and doctrine" sound divisive to Baptist ears. Where there is need for cooperation for evangelism and mission, Baptists will be involved. Where there is a call for structural unity or doctrinal unity, Baptists, mindful of their heritage, will be hesitant to join.

BAROT, MADELEINE

B. 4 July 1909, Chateauroux, France; d. 28 Dec. 1995, Paris. Barot was a leading figure in the ecumenical youth, student and women's movements, as well as in the French Protestant aid organization CIMADE,* especially in its work with internees during the second world war.

Born into a Protestant family, Barot became deeply involved in the Student Christian Movement while at the University of Paris. Studies in history and library science did not dampen her enthusiasm, which was always characterized by ecumenical concern and the desire to anchor Christian witness firmly in reality.

Appointed archivist at the French School in Rome in 1935, she witnessed first-hand the advance of fascism and Nazism in Europe. During these years, under the influence of the Confessing Church* in Germany, the World Student Christian Federation* was playing a significant role in equipping an entire generation, including Barot, to respond to the Nazi occupation of France.

At this time Protestants from Alsace and Lorraine were being evacuated to the south of France, away from the German frontier. When the joint committee of French Protestant youth movements was challenged by Suzanne de Diétrich to come to the aid of these people, the inter-movement committee for aid to evacuees, CIMADE* (Comité intermouvement auprès des évacués), was born. Barot was named its general secretary in May 1940 on her return from Italy, which had joined the war on the side of Germany. The appalling condition of foreigners marshalled in camps and their fear of being handed over to the Nazis was just becoming known. Barot immediately installed a CIMADE team in the vast internment camp at Gurs, near the Pyrenees, convinced that one ought to live alongside those whom one is seeking to help.

As the number of CIMADE teams working under Barot grew, they sought to support internees not only materially but also spiritually and culturally. When the deportation of political activists, gypsies and, above all, massive numbers of Jews began in 1942, CIMADE joined the resistance and worked clandestinely to help many to escape across the borders into Spain and Switzerland (in the latter case in close liaison with the WCC in process of formation and its general secretary, W.A. Visser 't Hooft). Many parishes answered CIMADE's appeal, hiding Jews on the run.

In 1945, after the liberation, two tasks confronted CIMADE and the churches in an exhausted France: reconstruction, with the resettlement of displaced persons, and reconciliation with the Germans. Evaluating its own role under the new circumstances, CIMADE emphasized relations with foreigners, uprooted people and refugees, as well as ecumenism, organizing encounters of Protestants, Catholics and Orthodox. Barot, however, was convinced that by remaining independent of the churches, CIMADE and similar movements could take greater risks and initiatives. At the world Christian youth conference in Oslo in 1947, Barot (who had chaired a section of a similar conference in Amsterdam in 1939) stressed how much young people in the post-war situation were looking for a new, more community-focused life-style for the Christian world.

Like many others during the war, Barot had shown that women are able to take on very significant responsibilities. At a time when the need for renewal of the church was evident, the post-war years clearly raised the issue of the place of women; in that connection Barot was called to the WCC's department on the Cooperation of Men and Women in Church and Society, which she directed from 1953 until 1966. Unafraid to face the many delicate discussions to which underlying theological differences gave rise during those years – particularly the question of the place of women in the ordained ministry – Barot also devoted much of her time to promoting the preparation of women for various ecumenical responsibilities.

Later she was appointed to the WCC's department on development education. The influence of the world conference on "Church and Society" (Geneva 1966) and the changes in perspective it produced, together with the dynamic unleashed in the Roman Catholic Church by the Second Vatican Council, led to the establishment of the joint body SODEPAX,* in which Barot also played an enthusiastic part.

Her years in Geneva enriched a wide-ranging network of contacts throughout the world, and after her retirement in France, she placed this at the disposal of the French Protestant Federation, the ecumenical anti-torture organization ACAT and, once again, CIMADE.

B. 15.11.1916, Barbados; d. 19 Dec. 1995, Barbados. Barrow was a president of the WCC, 1983-91. Associate director of the WCC Christian Medical Commission in 1971, she became its director, 1975-81. Her responsibilities included advising church-affiliated health institutions throughout the world on all developments in health care. She was among the first to study and work with alternative forms of health care for the underprivileged. Barrow graduated from the University of Toronto School of Nursing and from Columbia University, New York. She served as president both of the YWCA and of the International Council for Adult Education, and was permanent representative and ambassador of Barbados at the United Nations. At the close of her career, she was governor-general of Barbados. In 1985 she served as convener of the forum in Nairobi which marked the close of the United Nations Decade for Women.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

BARTH, KARL

B. 10 May 1886, Basel, Switzerland; d. 10 Dec. 1968, Basel. As a leading theologian, Barth had a decisive influence on the course of Protestantism in the 20th century, but remained a critical challenger of the ecumenical movement. He believed that authentic unity of the church would come about only if the church dared to be itself and to leave behind all self-righteous manifestations of power. Although from the early 1930s onwards he became a friend to W.A. Visser 't

Hooft, Pierre Maury and other ecumenical leaders, he was disappointed not to see a clear repudiation of natural theology in the Life and Work* movement, an attitude of uncompromising support for the Confessing Church* in Germany struggling against National Socialism, and an ecumenical reception of the Barmen declaration. He addressed Amsterdam 1948, inverting the theme to "God's Design and Man's Disorder", and participated in the meetings of the Committee of 25, which worked on the theme "Christ – the Hope of the World" for the Evanston assembly in 1954. Long critical also of the Roman Catholic Church, he showed an openness towards the movement of aggiornamento within Vatican II, warning the churches of the Reformation not to lag behind in their efforts towards renewal (see his Ad Limina Apostolorum, 1967). He lifted the dialogue between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism to a higher level. At the time of Uppsala 1968, Barth addressed a local congregation in Basel and asserted: "Anyone who says 'Yes' to Christ must say 'No' to the division of the churches."

Before he became professor of theology at Basel (1935-62), Barth was professor at Göttingen (1921), Münster (1925) and Bonn (1930). No other Protestant theologian of this century has produced so many works which were translated into so many languages. His Commentary on Romans (1919) led later to the development of dialectical theology. The formulation of confessional theology in the Barmen declaration was largely Barth's work. Between 1932 and 1967 he wrote the 13 volumes of his Church Dogmatics. His message was that God's sole revelation* is in Jesus Christ* and that the word of God is his one and only means of communication with human beings. Since humanity is utterly dependent on divine grace,* all its boasted cultural achievements are rooted in sin.*

BARTHOLOMEW (Dimitrios Arhondonis)

B. 29 Feb. 1940, Imvros, Turkey. Bartholomew was enthroned as 270th ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople on 2 Nov. 1991.

Arhondonis was given his ecclesiastical name of Bartholomew on the day of his ordination as deacon, shortly before graduating from the theological school of Halki in 1961 with honours. After further years of study in Rome, Bossey and Munich, he returned to Halki as assistant dean. Shortly after his ordination to the priesthood in 1969, Patriarch Dimitrios named him director to the private patriarchal office, then metropolitan of the ancient see of Philadelphia in Asia Minor. He served on the holy and sacred synod and in the private patriarchal office until acceding to the position of metropolitan of Chalcedon in 1990.

A member of the WCC's Faith and Order commission for 15 years, Bartholomew was a delegate to the Uppsala, Vancouver and Canberra assemblies of the WCC: at Canberra he was elected a member of the central and executive committees, posts he resigned on becoming patriarch. In 1990 he presided over the preparatory inter-Orthodox committee for the holy and great synod, which discussed the Orthodox diaspora. And after his accession to the position of patriarch, he convened the primates of the autocephalous Eastern Orthodox churches to the Phanar in March 1992: the gathering issued a statement covering a variety of issues, and was the first of a series – two others were held in 1995 and 2000.

Bartholomew has a particular interest in the environment: he gave the keynote address at the International Summit on Religions and Conservation in Japan in 1995, organized in cooperation with the European Union the second international symposium on the Black Sea in 1997, and has overseen several international environmental seminars on the island of Halki. He issues an annual encyclical on the environment every 1 Sept., which was designated by the 1992 summit as a day of prayer for the "preservation of God's creation".

In the aftermath of the destruction of the World Trade Center in New York City on 11 Sept. 2001, Bartholomew, in cooperation with the European Community, convened an international gathering on the peaceful coexistence and collaboration of the three monotheistic religions, which took place in Brussels.

YORGO LEMOPOULOS

BEA, AUGUSTIN

B. 28 May 1881, Riedböhringen, Baden, Germany; d. 16 Nov. 1968, Rome. Bea was the first president of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity,* 1960-68, and quickly became a confidant of Pope John XXIII. At the Second Vatican Council* he presided over the drafting of the documents on ecumenism, religious freedom and the relationship of the church to non-Christian religions, and co-presided over the drafting of the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation.

Educated in the Netherlands, Austria and Germany, Bea was ordained a priest in 1912. After studying classical and Oriental philology under Protestant scholars in Berlin, he taught Old Testament biblical exegesis in the German seminary in Valkenburg, the Netherlands (1917-21), before being called to Rome to supervise Jesuits who specialized in philosophy and theology, and to teach biblical theology and exegesis at the Pontifical Biblical Institute (1924-59); he was its rector, 1930-49. Already in 1935, Pope Pius XI approved Bea's participation in a congress of Protestant Old Testament scholars (Göttingen).

In the Roman curia* Bea was an active consultant to the holy office (now the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith) and to the biblical commission, and was president of the commission revising the Latin psalter. He was the confessor of Pius XII from 1945 to the pope's death in 1958. The pope chose Bea also to be the principal drafter of the encyclical on the promotion of biblical studies (Divino Afflante Spiritu, 1943) — the pre-Vatican Council II magna carta of biblical renewal.

The Jesuit Bea was strict in following a personal discipline of prayer, study and writing, and of ascetic living and diet. As SPCU president, he combined dove-like simplicity and serpentine wisdom in patiently working with his fellow Roman curialists, including those who opposed his vision, and in meeting ecumenical figures. Shy in temperament and ever a listener before his short, wise response, he calmly led the small SPCU staff through its nervous, unseasoned beginnings before Vatican II, during the council and its later implementations. Together with W.A. Visser 't Hooft, he received the peace prize of the Frankfurt Book Fair in 1966.

BEAUDUIN, LAMBERT

B. 5 Aug. 1873, Rosoux-les-Waremme, Belgium; d. 11 Jan. 1960, Chevetogne. Beauduin was a pioneer in the liturgical and ecumenical renewals of the Roman Catholic Church. After ordination in 1897, he joined a society of priests for the pastoral care of workers before becoming a Benedictine monk of Mont-César at Louvain (1906). A scholar and pastor, he was convinced that "the liturgy should be democratized", and in 1909 he launched annual liturgical weeks in Belgium under the theme Ut Unum Sint, "that they may be one" (John 17:21). Already Dom Lambert envisioned the unity of the members of the Body of Christ made visible in the eucharist celebration of the local church.

Appointed professor of ecclesiology at San Anselmo college (Benedictine) in Rome, he developed an interest in the liturgical and spiritual traditions of the Eastern churches. In 1924, Pius XI asked the Benedictine congregations to work for the reunion of the church of Rome and the churches of the East, and Dom Lambert returned to Belgium in early 1925 to found the "monastery" of union at Amay-sur-Meuse (moved to Chevetogne,* 1929): "a welcoming station on the road to union, the Emmaus where together with a burning heart we can listen to the words of the Master".

Already in Rome Beauduin had heard about the conversations initiated in 1921 by Cardinal Mercier of Malines, Belgium, bringing together a small group of Anglicans and Catholics determined to break the impasse created by Leo XIII's 1898 condemnation of Anglican orders as "null and void". Beauduin, who had been Mercier's confidant in resistance to the German occupation during the first world war, was asked by the cardinal to write a memorandum for the 1925 conversations, which became the draft of the final report in 1926. The central idea was of the Anglican church "united but not absorbed". Could not the see of Canterbury become a patriarchate, which the church of Rome would recognize as having the special jurisdiction of England's primatial see? Once united to Rome, Canterbury would be granted rights similar to those already enjoyed by the Eastern Catholic churches,* preserving "all her internal organization, all her historical traditions and her legitimate autonomy".

The confidential report received mixed responses from both Canterbury and Rome, but a complete negation from the two English cardinals, who were incensed by what they saw as meddling by the Belgian cardinal. When Mercier died in 1926, Beauduin lost his protector. Not long thereafter Pius XI issued the encyclical Mortalium Animos, on "true religious unity". For any non-RC church, the encyclical's strong accents on "return to Rome" meant precisely not union but "absorption" (see RCC and pre-Vatican II ecumenism).

Beauduin was one of the first Catholic theologians to acknowledge another church of the West as indeed bearing the marks of a church with its own autonomous traditions. For that conviction he suffered. In 1928 he was forced to resign as prior to Amay; three years later a Roman tribunal condemned him, and Cardinal Pacelli (later Pius XII) exiled "the monk of unity" to the abbey of Encalcat in southern France. He was permitted to return to Chevetogne only in 1951, at the age of 78.

As papal nuncio to Paris (1945-53), Angelo Roncalli (later John XXIII) became a friend of the "condemned monk", and in 1957 he acknowledged publicly that "the true method of working for the reunion of the churches is that of Dom Lambert". A letter from Pope John Paul II on the occasion of the 75th anniversary celebration of the Malines conversations in August 1996 cited the formula "the Anglican church united not absorbed" as "a fundamental principle of ecumenism". The inscription on the grave of the vindicated prophet in Chevetogne succinctly summarizes: Vir Dei et Ecclesiae, a man of God and of the church.

BELL, GEORGE KENNEDY ALLEN

B. 4 Feb. 1883, Norwich, England; d. 3 Oct. 1958, Canterbury. The first moderator of the WCC central committee and a leading British ecumenist from the 1920s through the 1950s, Bell has been called "the paradigm of creative dissent". The eldest of seven children, he was educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford. After study at Wells Theological College, under H.L. Goudge, he became a curate at Leeds parish church. In 1914 he became chaplain to Randall Davidson, archbishop of Canterbury, who believed ecclesiastical statesmanship to be "the art of the possible". Bell later wrote a magnificent life of Davidson (1935).

At the first post-war meeting of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches,* Bell came under the influence of Nathan Söderblom. He acted as a secretary at the Lambeth conference of 1920, was one of the initiators of the "Appeal" and thereafter edited the four volumes of Documents on Christian Unity, essential sources for the ecumenical historian. At 41, Bell became dean of Canterbury, where he fostered the arts and the use of drama in Christian worship, including John Masefield's Coming of Christ and T.S. Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral. In 1929 he became bishop of Chichester.

Bell's ecumenical work blossomed in the area of Life and Work,* with Stockholm 1925 as the conference which brought his skills to prominence. As a member of the commission on church and state (1935), he wrestled with what he thought to be the bankruptcy of social purpose in the church. His theological acumen revealed itself after Stockholm in organizing Anglo-German theological conferences at Canterbury (1927) and Eisenach (1928), which resulted in the symposium Mysterium Christi (1930). Concern for peace and arbitration were also characteristic of Bell at this time.

Hitler soon set Bell's agenda. Bell not only warned against the Nazis but forged links with Christians in Germany, especially the founders of the Confessing Church* like Bonhoeffer, to whom he was a true spiritual father. Bell, as chairman of Life and Work, supported the Confessing Christians in forthright resolutions at Fanø in 1934. Refugees, especially the so-called non-Aryan Christians, other victims of Nazism and German internees in Britain were a ceaseless concern. The later Interchurch Aid and Refugee Service (now Christian Aid) owed much to Bell, who sponsored the Christian Council for Refugees in 1938.

The most dramatic episode in Bell's career was his meeting in Stockholm in May 1942 with Hans Schönfeld and Dietrich Bonhoeffer, who convinced Bell of viable opposition to Hitler. Bell gave detailed information (a mark of the enormous trust put in him) to Anthony Eden, who did not act on it, but Eden had little room for manoeuvre and could not appear to be responding to "peace feelers". The resistance issued in the debacle of the Hitler "bomb plot" of 20 July 1944.

Bell never feared being in a minority. His keen sense of justice to non-Nazi Germans led to his speaking out in the House of Lords in 1944 in opposition to "area bombing" of German cities as incompatible with the doctrine of the just war. His aversion to mass destruction is supported by evidence that neither German industry nor morale was broken by bombing, but this was not clear at the time. Air Chief Marshall Harris thought he could win the war without an invasion of Europe. The loss of RAF personnel was heavy, as was the threat of the German V1 and V2 rockets. Bell appeared to some insensitive to the realities of total war. In this matter he was supported by A.C. Headlam, who had opposed him on Nazism and on proposals for a WCC. Many thought Bell should have succeeded William Temple as archbishop of Canterbury, but he was not a popular speaker and Temple clearly favoured Fisher.

Bell was prominent in the reconstruction of relationships with the German churches after the war and a witness with Gordon Rupp and W.A. Visser 't Hooft to the Stuttgart declaration* of October 1945, when the Council of the German Evangelical Church spoke of "solidarity of guilt". In England Bell was secretary to the Anglican panel in conversations with the Free churches after Lambeth 1920, episcopal secretary at Lambeth 1930, a keen advocate of the South India scheme and joint chairman of the first round of negotiations between the Church of England and the Methodist Church (see Anglican-Methodist relations).

Few did more to facilitate the launching of the WCC. After being chairman of the central committee from 1948 to 1954, he was honorary president until his death. His last sermon was preached at the tenth anniversary of the Amsterdam conference. In 1958 he was awarded the order of merit of the Federal Republic of Germany but he died before receiving it.

Bell saw the church* as the instrument of the kingdom,* the “sustaining, correcting, befriending opposite of the world”. The statement of the Oxford conference of 1937 was very much Bell’s stance, moulded by his incarnational Anglicanism. The aims of the ecumenical movement were “to secure that the church declares and maintains its vital interest as the body of the incarnate Lord in the community itself, in public as in private conduct, in the social, national and international affairs of men”. His Christianity and World Order and The Kingship of Christ encapsulate his theological stance.

A fitting epitaph is the scene in April 1945, when Bonhoeffer, before execution, cried out: “Tell him [Bell] that for me this is not the end but the beginning... With him I believe in the principle of our universal Christian brotherhood, which rises above all national interests.”

BENNETT, JOHN C.

B. 1902; d. 27 April 1995. Bennett was for 35 years a foremost contributor to ecumenical social ethics and a pioneer in the field. He studied theology and ethics at Oxford university, and his first role in the ecumenical movement was as secretary of the Oxford conference (1937) section on “Church, Community and State in Relation to the Economic Order”.

Drawn into the work of the newly established WCC in process of formation, Bennett was a member of the planning committee for the first assembly (Amsterdam 1948), with responsibility for the preparation of the assembly programme area on “The Church and the Disorder of Society”, chaired by Reinhold Niebuhr. He became the principal drafter of the assembly’s report on this theme. In 1949 he wrote a detailed statement on the meaning of the responsible society, a theme which was to be further developed at the WCC’s second assembly (Evanston 1954), where he was vice-chairman of the preparatory commission on social issues. In 1954 he was appointed vice-chairman of the newly created WCC department on Church and Society. In this role he helped guide the Church and Society study on the “Common Christian Responsibility towards Areas of Rapid Social Change” in Asia, Africa and Latin America, from 1956 to 1959.

In 1962 the central committee meeting in Paris agreed that a world conference on “Church and Society” be held in 1966. Bennett became one of the leaders of the planning group, editing the pre-conference study book on Christian Social Ethics in a Changing World: he perceived this assignment as an endeavour to hear new and creative theological thinkers on Christian social ethics. At the conference itself, he co-chaired the section on “Structures of International Cooperation: Living Together in Peace in a Pluralistic World Society". The conference provoked controversy but the reports on it by Bennett and others at the Uppala assembly (1968) were received with appreciation. This was Bennett's last official action as a leader of the WCC programme on Church and Society.

For Bennett, one of the most important consultations of his ecumenical career, and one which deeply influenced his further thinking about the Christian witness in relation to developing countries, was that on the theology of development, convened by the WCC-Vatican exploratory group on Society, Development and Peace (SODEPAX*) in 1971.

BERDYAEV, NICOLAS

B. 6 March 1874, Kiev; d. 23 March 1948, Paris, France. Involved in the study programme of the Life and Work* movement, in the Russian Student Christian Movement in exile and in the Oxford conference in 1937, Berdyaev attempted to persuade the educated class of his nation and abroad to give up its disregard of religion and to resume active participation in the life of the church. His numerous writings had a deep influence on Western Christianity and broadened the understanding of Orthodox thought and literature.

Originally a sceptic, of Marxist leanings, he found his way back to the Orthodox faith after the revolution of 1905. He was brought to trial by the church in 1914 for his non-conformist position in religious matters and he was saved from sentencing only by the onset of the Russian revolution. From 1922 onwards he lived as an émigré in Paris, where he interpreted the Christian religion in the light of modern intellectual interests, expounding a "spiritual Christianity" which has no need of doctrinal definitions. Often referred to as a "Christian existentialist", he was indebted for some of his ideas to Jacob Böhme, Immanuel Kant, Friedrich Nietzsche and Fyodor Dostoevski.

B. 11 June 1914, Appeltern, Gelderland, Holland; d. 17 Dec. 1995. Berkhof was a member of the WCC central committee, 1954-75, and played a major part in the Faith and Order* study on "God in Nature and History", 1963-68. He addressed the WCC's Uppsala assembly (1968) on "The Finality of Jesus Christ", another Faith and Order study. He served as pastor in Lemele from 1938, and in Zeist from 1944, then joined the staff of the Institute "Church and World" at Driebergen in 1950. From Driebergen, he moved to become professor of dogmatics and biblical theology at the University of Leiden in 1960.

BIBLE, ITS ROLE IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

A PARTICULAR type of Bible study has marked the ecumenical movement from its beginning. Its mood was expressed in a telegram sent by 500 Japanese students to a North American student conference in 1889, stating simply: "Make Jesus King!" This movement among students had started in Asian, North American and European student hostels, where young people from different churches gathered for prayer and Bible study, receiving a new vision of Christ's purpose for the oikoumene, the whole inhabited earth. Bible study not only served their own religious needs but led to Christian commitment, especially to missionary service abroad across cultural and denominational frontiers. In 1895 the telegram from Japan became a decisive factor in the creation of the World Student Christian Federation (WSCF),* which in turn served the ecumenical movement in all continents as the training ground for future leaders.

ECUMENICAL BIBLE STUDY

There are many ways of studying the Bible: listening to and praying the biblical message in the context of liturgical celebration, expository preaching on biblical passages, analyzing biblical texts scientifically, seeking guidance through personal biblical meditation, choosing proof-texts for supporting doctrinal or socio-political creeds. All these and other ways of using (and often, alas, misusing) the Bible can be found in the ecumenical movement.

No one has influenced the particular character of ecumenical Bible study more deeply than Suzanne de Diétrich. Her way of enabling successive generations of young people to study the scriptures – first with the WSCF, later at the Ecumenical Institute in Bossey – made a strong impact on the movement from the 1930s to the 1960s.

The Bible as primary norm. At the second world conference on Faith and Order (Edinburgh 1937) the section on "The Church of Christ and the Word of God" stated that the testimony given in holy scripture "affords the primary norm for the church's teaching, worship and life". This does not mean that all must have the same doctrinal understanding of biblical authority, but it does imply that all are ready to be guided, questioned and corrected by the biblical message in their various doctrinally and culturally conditioned situations. An anecdote from the WCC assembly in Amsterdam (1948) illustrates this priority vividly. When a participant insisted in one of the discussions that the Bible must be understood in the light of the later creeds, Karl Barth closed the book of confessional statements from which the speaker had argued and put his Greek New Testament on top of it. The Bible is the primary norm.

The Bible was given to the churches so that they may discover their vocation in today's world. Ecumenical Bible study is not an end in itself, nor can its impact and value be measured by the number of Bible quotations used in ecumenical texts. Rather, it is a continuing discipline and training for biblically informed thinking, acting and worshipping in the often unprecedented situations of today. When the Ecumenical Institute was inaugurated in 1946, W.A. Visser 't Hooft wrote: "The programme of the Institute has three basic subjects: the Bible, the world and the universal church." Bible study played an important role as gatherings at Bossey sought to discern the Christian vocation in the face of challenges arising from modern industrial society, new scientific discoveries or religious and cultural pluralism. Another effort to relate God's word to the modern world was the series of books Word for the World, commissioned by the Uppsala assembly in 1968. For each day of the year there is a biblical meditation on the left-hand page, while on the right appear questions raised and insights gained in the ecumenical movement. The authors represent all major Christian confessions and five continents.

Ecumenical Bible study is an enterprise of the whole people of God. All have something to contribute – those whose exegetical studies have given them a special knowledge of biblical texts in their original context and those whose involvement in today's struggles of faith has given them special insights into the biblical message for the present-day context. The best setting for this is small groups, where all can participate fully and doubts or critical questions can be frankly raised. Such Bible study often leads to spontaneous worship and corporate involvement in biblically informed action. After the second world war, such participatory Bible study occurred in ecumenical work camps; more recently, many church base communities* in Latin America and Europe have been involved in such Bible study. The life experience of their members, often in situations of oppression and struggle for liberation, becomes a commentary on the biblical stories.

Seeking God's word together leads to conversion and commitment. Common worship and biblical meditation during the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity* has led many Orthodox, Catholics and Protestants to a deeper commitment to local church unity. Bible study was a major motivation for missionary commitment in the former Student Volunteer Movement; it provides the same motivation today in the costly involvement of groups in urban-rural mission, in the struggle for safeguarding creation, in action groups for justice and peace, or in the struggle against racism and violence.

The biblical roots of the controversial WCC Programme to Combat Racism* (PCR) are not often recognized. The original programme of the Uppsala assembly (1968) had not included a session on racism, but the assassination of Martin Luther King, who was to have preached at the opening worship, and events in Southern Africa led to the addition of a special session on racism just before a previously scheduled dance-drama on the prophet Amos. The combination of the testimonies in that session with the message of the prophet Amos put the assembly before an inescapable challenge. The decision to establish the PCR came in part out of that biblical summons; as one person testified, "The word of God happened to us!"

COMMON BIBLICAL TEXTS, TRANSLATIONS AND STUDIES

Scholars from all Christian confessions have long worked together with Jewish scholars to reconstruct the most accurate possible original Hebrew and Greek texts of the Bible. As more ancient manuscripts are discovered, this process continues, though its ecumenical significance is seldom recognized.

Bible societies,* federated in the United Bible Societies (UBS), created in 1946, have pioneered in interconfessional cooperation (also with "evangelical" scholars) and trans-cultural work. The UBS was also the first international Christian organization to support a major project of the Amity Foundation in China: installation of a modern printing press in Nanjing, which since 1987 has been printing Bibles and educational material for the rapidly growing number of Christians in China.

After the Second Vatican Council cooperation between the UBS and the Roman Catholic Church increased. In 1968 the UBS and the Vatican Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity jointly published "Guiding Principles for Interconfessional Cooperation in Translating the Bible" (rev. ed. 1987). Bible translations published by the UBS are increasingly used by Catholics, and in the mid-1990s some 180 joint translations were in process.

Undoubtedly the most important of these common enterprises has been the Traduction oecuménique de la Bible (NT 1972; full Bible 1975). With the support of their respective church authorities, Protestant and Roman Catholic biblical scholars from the French-speaking world worked in interconfessional teams for translating, introducing and annotating all books of the Bible. To a lesser extent the Orthodox church and Orthodox biblical scholars also collaborated in this venture, which has given the French-speaking world a unique tool for ecumenical Bible study.

Such interconfessional Bible translation and annotation would be impossible without the growing collaboration among biblical scholars, who now not only work with the same biblical text but also use the same tools and methods of research.

ACCORDING TO THE SCRIPTURES

When the WCC was founded in 1948, Bible study had become such an integral part of ecumenical thinking, action and worship that it was not felt necessary to mention this in the WCC's constitution or basis. In 1953 the Church of Norway, influenced by the Reformation's sola scriptura, proposed that "according to the scriptures" be added to the basis; and this suggestion was incorporated into the expanded version of the basis adopted at New Delhi in 1961. An explanatory note specified that this phrasing, "used by the apostle Paul on a number of occasions, has found a place in the ancient creeds and in later confessions and directs attention to the authority the scriptures possess for all Christians". Thus the norm is not one particular confessional understanding of biblical authority but the common ancient Christian acceptance of the Bible.

The basis of the Evangelical Alliance (1846), a Protestant pioneer movement for church unity, stated that members must maintain "the Divine Inspiration, Authority, and Sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures" as well as "the Right and Duty of Private Judgment in the Interpretation of the Holy Scriptures". A much fuller authoritative statement on the role and interpretation of the Bible is the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation of the Second Vatican Council (1965), a document of deep ecumenical significance and the basis of the Pontifical Biblical Commission's 1993 statement on "The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church". While no similar authoritative statement exists for the whole of the ecumenical movement, this Roman Catholic document gives a survey of present methods and approaches for biblical interpretation with which many Protestant and Orthodox leaders of ecumenical Bible study could largely agree. It reflects not only recent Roman Catholic biblical scholarship but also a long ecumenical study process about the Bible.

The theme of the first major enquiry by the study department of the WCC (then still in process of formation), begun in 1946, was "From the Bible to the Modern World". The Wadham College statement on "Guiding Principles for the Interpretation of the Bible" (1949) strongly emphasized the unity of the Bible and reflected the biblical theology which characterized ecumenical discussions in the 1940s and 1950s. The commission on Faith and Order pursued this study and accepted in Montreal (1963) the report on "Scripture, Tradition and traditions". The Tradition (capital T) of the gospel, testified in scripture, is distinguished from the various traditions (small t) which developed in the process of transmission. The report acknowledges that scripture itself is the result of this process of transmission, and it emphasizes the role which culture plays in the transmission of faith. This conclusion led to a study of and report on "The Significance of the Hermeneutical Problem for the Ecumenical Movement", presented to F&O in Bristol in 1967, which addresses the theological pluralism in the Bible, reflecting "the diversity of God's actions in different historical situations and the diversity of human response to God's actions".

The report on "The Authority of the Bible", accepted by F&O in Louvain in 1971, is the most substantial statement arising from this study process. It examines how biblical authority relates to the present human experience. The authority of the Bible is seen as derived from God's authority, a force leading people to faith. It has a dynamic, relational character and proves itself to be authoritative in the life of the church. Accordingly, the inspiration of scripture is not affirmed as a dogmatic presupposition but as a conclusion of the fact that through the Bible God's authority is experienced in a compelling way. The Louvain report also documents the continuing reflection about the diversity of biblical interpretations and comments about the right use of the Bible in the church.

The study process then led to an examination of "The Significance of the Old Testament in its Relation to the New" (Loccum 1978), where the unity of the Bible is again strongly affirmed, but not in the sense of just one, all-embracing biblical theology. The complementarity between the two Testaments and the specificity of each are analyzed. The report also lists a series of new questions needing further ecumenical exploration. One of these was taken up in a consultation on "The Authority of Scripture in the Light of the New Experiences of Women" (Amsterdam 1980). Another concentrated on biblical and early church perspectives on faith (Rome 1983). In the 1990s Faith and Order took up again the question of ecumenical hermeneutics, and an initial study document, "A Treasure in Earthen Vessels", was published in 1998.

THE BIBLE IN THE LIFE OF THE WCC

It would be presumptuous to claim that the whole life of the WCC is guided by God's word. While the early leaders of the Council had been part of the biblical renewal in the 1940s and 1950s and were strongly influenced by the remarkable ecumenical Bible studies at the world conferences of Christian youth in Amsterdam (1939) and Oslo (1947), ecumenical Bible study during the initial period of the WCC happened at Bossey, during ecumenical youth meetings and in lay training courses, but had no place in more official programmes, including the first two WCC assemblies. It must also be acknowledged that when the Bible is quoted in WCC documents, the danger of proof-texting is not always avoided. Nor have the insights gained in the above-mentioned study process on the authority and interpretation of the Bible become fully operative in the life of the WCC.

From the beginning, working relationships were established with the UBS. From 1951 to 1968 UBS study secretaries worked in Geneva under a joint committee with the WCC. A study on "The Place and Use of the Bible in the Life of the Churches" led to a joint UBS/WCC statement on "The Bible in the Ecumenical Movement", received at the Uppsala assembly. This collaboration with the UBS, financed by the Bible societies, could easily have become an alibi for the WCC to initiate no work for helping its member churches to live "according to the scriptures". However, an experiment with participatory Bible study on the main theme during the New Delhi assembly (1961) elicited such positive responses that succeeding assemblies reserved time for such corporate reflection on God's word.

In Uppsala (1968) participatory Bible studies were held both in the plenary and in the six sections of the assembly. In Nairobi (1975) assembly participants divided into numerous small groups for Bible study and discussion, a pattern followed in Vancouver (1983), Canberra (1991) and Harare (1998). WCC world mission conferences and many other meetings, small and large, also set aside substantial time for corporate Bible study. Popular Bible study resources for use in local congregations were prepared on the themes of assemblies and conferences, and this material has been translated into or adapted in many language areas in different continents. The study material on "Images of Life" for the Vancouver assembly, published in more than 30 different language editions, included a set of photographs and artworks to stimulate reflection. The WCC Publications office has published a number of books to encourage ecumenical Bible study and biblical meditation.

The growing awareness of the role of the Bible in the ecumenical movement led in 1971 to the creation of a small Biblical Studies secretariat, which operated until 1990. Initially its function was mainly consultative, helping to strengthen the biblical orientation of various WCC programmes and pursuing studies on how various cultures influence the interpretative process. In response to increasing requests from member churches, national councils and theological education centres, the focus gradually shifted to the training of ecumenical Bible study enablers through national and regional residential courses, organized by the inviting bodies in all regions of the world. This training combined the teaching of biblical theology with exercises in a variety of Bible study methods: historical-literary analysis of texts; story-telling and drama; biblical meditation by using visual art, fantasy and mime; transforming biblical passages into songs, prayers and liturgical celebrations. What has been learned in different confessional and cultural milieus could thus be transmitted to Bible-study enablers around the world.

Much work is still to be done. The jubilee world assembly of the UBS in Mississauga, Canada (1996), called for the churches' stronger involvement in Bible study work in face of growing biblical illiteracy among many Christians and the spiritual thirst among many outside the Christian fold. Similarly the plenary assembly of the Catholic Biblical Federation in Hong Kong (1996) strongly emphasized the need for an increasing biblical-pastoral ministry. The WCC must strengthen work relationships with these two world organizations which serve the role of the Bible in the ecumenical movement. The special contribution of Orthodox churches with regard to biblical interpretation and meditation needs to come more strongly to the fore. Insights gained in Bible studies in the context of women's experiences and of oppression and liberation in Christian base communities can complement those from academic historical and literary studies of the Bible.

Current key questions in the ecumenical discussion of the role and interpretation of the Bible are the following: In a world shaped by the communication revolution, how can the Bible be faithfully translated from the print medium to audiovisual and electronic media? What guidance can be gained from the Bible for the encounter of Christians with people of other living faiths? As theologies developed in different cultural situations meet and challenge each other, what is our common understanding of the relationship between the gospel and cultures? How can the criterion "according to the scriptures" become operative in situations where biblical interpretations based on different confessional backgrounds and on different cultural contexts confront and contradict each other? Can a new type of biblical theology be found which takes seriously both the diversity and the unity of biblical faith traditions and which could help the ecumenical movement in its search for a common vision?

BIBLE SOCIETIES

BIBLE SOCIETIES are non-denominational organizations whose purpose is to translate, produce and distribute the Christian scriptures* in languages that people can understand at prices they can afford. By 2000 there were 137 Bible Societies throughout the world, linked through membership of the United Bible Societies, which had distributed nearly 25 million Bibles, 23 million New Testaments, and 580 million booklets and leaflets with portions of scripture.

The modern Bible Society movement began in 1804 with the founding of the British and Foreign Bible Society (BFBS). By confining itself to the distribution of the Bible only, "without note or comment", it hoped to enlist the support of Christians of all denominations. It inspired the formation of supporting branches in the United Kingdom, and of affiliated or independent societies overseas. By 1820 there were societies in France, Germany, the Netherlands, Scandinavia, Russia, Switzerland, Greece, Malta, Canada, the USA, the West Indies, South Africa, India, Ceylon, Malaysia and Australia. Their members were drawn from Anglican, Lutheran and Reformed churches and in some countries also from the Orthodox churches (Greece, Russia) and the Roman Catholic Church (Malta, Russia, Germany). Bible editions were published in translations approved by the various churches and according to their respective canons.

This fully interconfessional phase was short-lived: pressure from Protestant supporters of the BFBS, especially in Scotland, forced it to abandon publication of the deuterocanonical (apocryphal) books in 1826. Not all societies, however, accepted this decision. At the same time, successive popes began to issue attacks on Bible Societies as instruments of Protestant proselytism* and publishers of corrupted Bibles.

Although the societies continued to provide a field for joint work by Anglicans and Protestants, by the middle of the 19th century cooperation with Roman Catholics and Orthodox was extremely limited.

After the Apocrypha controversy the BFBS increasingly sent its own representatives to establish agencies overseas. The American Bible Society (ABS), founded in 1816, developed work in areas where US missionaries were serving, notably the Middle East, China, Japan and South America. In 1861 the Bible Societies in Scotland joined together to form the National Bible Society of Scotland and soon had agents in Africa and the Far East. The Netherlands Bible Society (NBS), founded in 1814, concentrated its overseas work mainly in Indonesia. The societies worked closely with Protestant missionaries and aided the development of Protestant churches, not only in non-Christian areas but also in traditionally Catholic and Orthodox countries.

After the first world war the societies began to look for ways of coordinating their work through "comity" agreements, through joint agencies in some areas and by setting up an international coordinating body, which finally came into existence as the United Bible Societies (UBS) in 1946. Since then, the larger societies have withdrawn from direct control of work in other countries and encouraged the development of autonomous national societies. The UBS provides information and technical assistance to all member societies and administers a world budget through which the richer societies support the less rich.

In 1804 it was reckoned that the Bible or some part of it had been translated into 67 languages. Largely through the work of the Bible Societies, that number rose to 200 by 1850, to 500 by 1900 and to 1000 by 1950. In the main the societies published translations made by missionaries and local Christians, sometimes giving translators financial assistance and specialist advice. The NBS was unique in sending out linguists to study indigenous languages and make Bible translations. The Württemberg Bible Society in Stuttgart (founded 1812) made a notable contribution through the publication of scholarly texts: Eberhard Nestle's Greek New Testament (1898, 27th ed., Barbara and Kurt Aland et al., 1993), Gerhard Kittel's Hebrew Old Testament (1937, revised by Karl Elliger and Wilhelm Rudolph, 1977), Alfred Rahlfs's Septuagint (1935), and Robert Weber's Vulgate (1969, 4th ed., Bonifatius Fischer et al., 1994). The UBS called on an international group of scholars to produce a new edition of the Greek New Testament (1966, 4th ed. 1993) and handbooks giving exegetical and linguistic help to translators.

A movement of biblical renewal in the Roman Catholic Church was given an increased impetus by the Second Vatican Council, which stated that "easy access to sacred scripture should be provided for all the Christian faithful" (Constitution on Divine Revelation, 1965). In turn, the Bible Societies began to re-affirm their original desire to serve all the churches by providing the Bible in the form that each communion required. Restrictions barring the publication of the Apocrypha were removed by the ABS in 1964 and the BFBS in 1966. Some 685 UBS translation projects were under way in 2001. Also working in close liaison with the UBS is the Catholic Biblical Federation,* which has cooperated in formulating a number of mutually agreed position papers, the most important of which is "Guidelines for Interconfessional Co-operation in Translating the Bible" (1968, updated in 1987).

An increasing number of Bible Societies have Roman Catholics on their boards and as staff members. Relations with the Orthodox churches are also close, with Orthodox staff and board membership in many countries. The Bible Societies, meeting in council in Chiang Mai, Thailand, in 1980, pledged their "openness to assist every Christian church with scripture publications that support, deepen and intensify the church's life and mission", thus echoing the vision of one of the first secretaries of the BFBS in 1818, of a Bible Society that "studies to unite the Christian world, by distributing among them, according to their respective versions, the common standard of their faith and their practice". Consistent with this goal, the UBS maintains a close working relationship with the WCC.

Bible translating and publishing agencies not linked to the UBS include the Gideons, the International Bible Society, Living Bibles International, the Scripture

WCC LIBRARY

The WCC library in Geneva, established in 1946, has over 50,000 titles of strictly ecumenical literature; its total holdings are over 105,000 volumes. Since 1986 the library has provided a computer service to researchers.

The library also houses the archives of the 20th-century ecumenical movement: Faith and Order, since 1927; Life and Work, 1925-48; the International Missionary Council, 1910-61; the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches, 1906-48; the World Student Christian Federation, since 1920; the World Council of Christian Education and Sunday School Association, 1907-71;

the German church struggle and relations between Geneva and the Confessing Church in Germany, 1933-45; the world conferences of Christian youth, 1939-52; the World Council of Churches "in process of formation", 1938-48; the WCC since 1948, including (1) correspondence and files of the general secretariat; (2) complete files of the first eight assemblies; (3) records of the central and executive committee meetings; (4) documents of WCC divisions, departments and secretariats, and of WCC units and sub-units from 1971 onwards; the Joint Working Group and SODEPAX; national and regional conferences and councils of churches. The WCC archives contain some 3 million documents (A.J. van der Bent, "Historia Oecumenica", The Ecumenical Review, 35, 3, 1983). Students and scholars have direct access to most of the records: they can consult the WCC Library web page and the on-line catalogue of more than 65,000 entries.

BILHEIMER, ROBERT

B. 28 Sept. 1917, Denver CO, USA. Already as a theological student at Yale Divinity School, Bilheimer began his lifelong ecumenical ministry. He was administrative secretary of the newly founded World Student Service Fund (1940-44), and associate secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions (1941-45). After his ordination in the Presbyterian church (1945), while the 30 year-old was national secretary of the interseminary movement, Wilhelm Visser 't Hooft enlisted him to be his administrative assistant for the final preparations of the WCC first general assembly (Amsterdam 1948), and later to be in Geneva WCC associate general secretary and director of the division of studies (1954-63). Bilheimer organized the second and third assemblies (Evanston 1954, New Delhi 1961). In 1960 he undertook the "mission of fellowship" to the WCC member churches in South Africa, culminating in the breakthrough Cottesloe* consultation and statement. With his worldwide ecumenical experiences and network of friends, he became the director of the international affairs programme of the National Council of Churches (USA), 1966-73.

His no-nonsense organization skills did not hinder his probing reflective mind or weaken his conviction that the ecumenical movement is primarily persons, not institutions, as evidenced in his personal account, Breakthrough: The Emergence of the Ecumenical Tradition (WCC/Eerdmans, 1989), and his editing of Faith and Ferment: An Interdisciplinary Study of Christian Belief and Practices (Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1983). As director of the Institute for Ecumenical and Cultural Research* at Collegeville, Minnesota (1974-84), the seasoned Bilheimer was able to share himself and faith-gazes into the ecumenical future with hundreds of varied Christian scholars and teachers, clergy and lay leaders.

BIO-ETHICS

THE SCOPE of bio-ethics includes all questions of right and wrong in decisions or behaviour arising in the scientific study and control of organic life. Biology, biochemistry and biotechnology are the life sciences within which bio-ethical questions arise. These have particular reference to medical practice: hence, biomedical ethics. But they refer also to modes of research in molecular genetics and the technical application of genetic knowledge to fields beyond medicine, such as agriculture, animals and pharmacology.

The beginning of the new era of bio-ethics can be dated to 1953 with the discovery of the structure and chemical codes of the deoxyribonucleic acid (DNA) molecule. In 1973 researchers announced that the 3000 million units of the human DNA, comprising 100,000 genes, were susceptible to manipulation, or engineering, which changes the very nature of cells. Using much simpler organisms, such as bacteria, fruit flies or mice, researchers opened new possibilities for enhancing human health and economy. However, they also created difficult problems for theology, ethics, ecology and social policy.

For theology, new meaning is given to the doctrine of divine creation,* both original and continuing. The wonder of life has become ever more wonderful as scientists explain the genetic nature of all organisms, human and non-human, and their evolutionary relationships and continuities. The biological uniqueness and free will of humans, as traditionally viewed, are thus called into question. Ethical issues are introduced or intensified by modes of assisted reproduction, genetic screening, abortion,* treatment or non-treatment of newborns, gene therapy and care of persons with disabilities. Ecological problems are caused by the ambiguities of value in engineering transgenic animals and plants, creating bacteria for specific purposes, and possibly disrupting the balances of ecosystems necessary to all life on earth. Social policies and laws are needed to assure that medical services of a genetic nature, along with all kinds of sophisticated devices and treatments, are accessible in a democratic way as economic resources permit; that human and animal subjects are protected; and that risks to human health and safety are minimized by regulation.

An ecumenical approach to bio-ethical issues will be shaped by a strong concern for the rights of women, oppressed minorities and impoverished people to participate in social and political decisions that affect their lives.

THE WCC

The WCC began considering some of these developments with a consultation on human experimentation at Bossey in 1968. From 1970, the Sub-unit on Church and Society convened several conferences of scientists, theologians and policy-makers to discuss genetics and the quality of life. The findings of a consultation in Zurich in 1973 constituted the biological and bio-ethical agenda for the world conference on "Faith, Science and the Future" in Cambridge, Massachusetts, USA, in 1979. Its report emphasized five points: (1) It warned against the ideology of eugenics based on false theories of biological inequities of human worth and implemented by coerced genetic selection. (2) While recommending genetic counselling for prospective parents and pre-natal diagnosis for pregnant women, it rejected "cost-benefit" reckoning as a determining factor for abortion. Here and elsewhere in

WCC discussions, abortion has been a very sensitive issue because of divided opinions over its moral legitimacy and its unique pertinence to women's rights. (3) The report accepted contraception and artificial insemination by the husband's sperm (AIH), but questioned the use of donated sperm or ova outside of the marital union (AID). (4) It accepted therapy for monogenic diseases by gene replacement in the body (somatic) cells of humans but rejected the modifying of sex (germ) cells in vitro. (5) Churches were urged to seek justice and equity in the allocation of all medical resources, especially those involving new genetic techniques.

The momentum from Cambridge led to a small consultation in the Netherlands in 1981 on "Ethical and Social Issues in Genetic Engineering and the Ownership of Life Forms". In a general context of concern for social and economic problems engendered by genetic science, the participants defended the integrity of human life and of the person against the reduction of human life to chemical-physical processes. Manipulations of germ-line cells, or the mixing of human and non-human DNA, could result in producing something less than human, they said. They advocated regulatory control of recombinant DNA technology at all institutional levels, especially when such would lead to monopolizing plant seeds, hybridizing human embryos for experimentation or preparing new organisms for biological warfare. Recommendations were made for continuing study of these issues both within the WCC and in cooperation with other churches and international organizations.

Some churches took up particular biotechnological issues during the 1980s, but limited resources prevented the WCC from carrying the international ecumenical discussion further until 1989, when the central committee referred a report on biotechnology to the churches and approved a set of recommendations. That report, setting the issues of biotechnology within the context of a theology of creation, treated six areas: human genetic engineering, reproductive technologies, intellectual property (patenting of life), environmental effects, military applications, and impact on the third world. Its recommendations called for prohibition of genetic testing for sex selection, commercialized child-bearing and the commercial sale of ova, embryos and sperm, patenting of animal life-forms, and use of genetic engineering as part of biological or chemical warfare research. Warning of the dangers of the use of genetic testing for "involuntary social engineering", experiments involving the human germline, embryo research and release of genetically engineered organisms into the environment, the WCC also called for further reflection and international controls in these areas.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

Deep differences between the Roman Catholic and Protestant teachings on procreation have prevented fully ecumenical studies of bio-ethics, though individual Catholics have participated in WCC conferences and at least one bilateral dialogue (Reformed-RC* 1976-79) has dealt with the difficult question of abortion. In 1989 a comprehensive statement on "Gott ist der Freund des Lebens" (God is the Friend of Life) was adopted in Germany by the Catholic Bishops Conference, the Council of Evangelical (Protestant) Churches, Greek Orthodox and other churches. In 1991 a dialogue on terminal care and death between the RCC and the United Methodist Church in the USA was completed.

Many consultations among Roman Catholics have resulted in formal pronouncements from the Vatican on bio-ethical issues. Pope John Paul II has spoken frequently about them. The Second Vatican Council* declared a categorical prohibition of "murder, genocide, abortion, euthanasia or wilful self-destruction" (Gaudium et Spes 27). The encyclical Humanae Vitae by Pope Paul VI (1968) clearly forbade contraception (see birth control). And a series of exhortations, declarations and instructions from the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith specified inhibitions against abortion (1974), euthanasia (1980) and artificially assisted reproduction (1987). However, papal statements on biotechnology and genetic intervention have been negative only in respect to putting human subjects at undue risk.

The rigorous position held by the Roman Catholic teaching authority (the magisterium) maintains a consistent ethic of defending human life in all circumstances from conception until natural death. Eastern Orthodox and many Protestant communions share much but not all of Catholic teaching. However, some Vatican instructions on bio-ethics, despite their canonical authority, are known to be widely disputed and disobeyed by church members. Differences among Catholics of belief and practice regarding contraception and abortion are paralleled in other Christian communities. Although these differences are formidable, the motivation of Christian unity and common witness impels the quest for ecumenical understanding if not unanimity in these areas. In this context the study of the Joint Working Group between the RCC and the WCC on the church-dividing potential of ethical issues (1987-95), with its guidelines for dialogue in this area ("The Ecumenical Dialogue on Moral Issues"), and the WCC's own work on ecclesiology and ethics (1993-96) seek to point a way forward in developing ecumenical approaches to ethical issues such as those raised by bio-ethics.

WORLD RESEARCH IN GENETICS

Over the next decade, research in molecular genetics accelerated, broadening the scope of biotechnology.

In 1997 a major scientific breakthrough in bio-ethics occurred when scientists in Edinburgh (Scotland, UK) were able to clone a sheep ("Dolly"). This development was indicative of the enormous advances made in the field of biotechnology in recent years and raises fundamental moral and theological questions, most especially, the acceptability of such cloning techniques in general, including their "cost" in failed experiments and their possible application to human cloning. These moral and theological questions also include the legitimacy of intervention in the "natural" genetic process through genetic engineering, the role of human beings as co-workers with a Creator God, the ethics of risk in relation to scientific and technological developments, and the inter-relationship between biotechnological intervention in human development and the theological understanding of the human being as "in the image of God". Here as in other areas of scientific and technological development, questions of a balance between innovation and development and public accountability and control are fundamental.

In the year 2000, the Human Genome Project made its ground-breaking announcement that it had completed the identification of the genetic sequences which determine fundamental human genetic characteristics. This scientific breakthrough will enable a range of future developments, including gene therapy, and pharmaceutical research and development. It will also raise acute ethical questions about the implications of human gene therapies, the patenting of the Human Genome itself and further research and development based upon it, and the potential social and ethical benefits and exploitation which could result from such research.

ONGOING DEVELOPMENTS

In the US an ecumenical and interfaith coalition prompted the federal government to make a study of the possible dangers of genetic engineering. A letter to President Carter from officials of the National Council of Churches, the US Catholic Conference and the Jewish Synagogue Council resulted in the government's publication of Splicing Life (1982), which has become a standard of thinking on the subject. In 1986 the NCC adopted a lengthy policy statement on "Genetic Science for Human Benefit", which gives theological reasons for considering the promises as well as the dangers of biotechnology. A large group of Protestant evangelicals, known as the American Scientific Affiliation, is also committed to the study of bio-ethical problems.

Similarly, the Science, Religion and Technology project of the Church of Scotland (which has worked in ecumenical partnership with other churches in Scotland) has developed considerable expertise in bio-ethics.

Proliferation in many countries of centres for research and teaching in bio-ethics and medical ethics and the formation of ethics committees in hospitals have given a prominent role to persons having religious commitment and theological expertise in these discussions. The implicit ecumenism expressed in these institutions is also revealed in the rapidly growing number of books and journals devoted to ethics in the life sciences.

Any survey of the vast field of bio-ethics will soon be rendered obsolete by the accelerated findings of scientific research. Procedures and techniques for assisting procreation, treating diseases or extending longevity change from science fiction to fact within a decade, and soon these methods become routine: in vitro fertilization, cardiac surgery and organ transplants, pharmaceuticals, intensive care units and artificial organs for human bodies.

As biomedicine, biotechnology and bioethics assume increasing prominence in all countries, Christian churches and their members acting individually must interact with highly competent colleagues who hold humane ideals but may lack religious commitment. Often it is difficult if not impossible to separate religious from secular dimensions within these discussions. Regarding the major concerns and contributions of Christian faith in these scientific and technological developments, ecumenical discussions have revealed some general lines of agreement. One is an unyielding commitment to the enhancement of human life and the protection of the integrity and dignity of all persons. Beyond the humanistic motive for this is the ultimate belief in the divine creation of each human being in the image of God and in the divine purpose to redeem each one from sin* and death through the saving work of Jesus Christ (see salvation). It is this faith, rather than a theory of vitalism or a philosophy of human rights, which is the Christian basis for maintaining the sanctity of human life.

Belief in the divine creation and redemption of human beings carries with it the mandate of responsibility to God for one's own life and for others' lives and for the created order itself. The WCC's emphasis on "the integrity of creation" is a reminder of human obligation before God. For Christians, then, bio-ethics implies a particular sense of fidelity to the perceived will of God, however debatable such perceptions may be.

The breadth and diversity of the ecumenical movement help to bring to the surface differing points of sensitivity about bioethical concerns. In the North, where technical development is advanced, ethical interest usually focuses on scientific laboratories and modern hospitals. For the majority of humankind, however, bio-ethical problems relate to much more basic areas of concern.

Questions of primary health care raise issues of "equal access" and "cost containment" for high-tech medicine which are unreal questions where sheer survival and the struggle for political and economic self-dependence are uppermost. Similarly, the potential for genetic engineering of staple crops, such as rice, could in theory offer the possibility of higher productivity and drought resistance. But for reasons relating to patenting and commercial interests, the cost of seed supplies (which would need replenishing annually) would be well beyond the means of small subsistence farmers in the poorest nations. Consequently, many ecumenical aid and development agencies have raised fundamental questions about the real applicability of this technology in meeting the food and agricultural needs of the poorest nations.

The universal church and the many churches of Jesus Christ have a special role in the human venture of finding healing and wholeness of life in freedom and fulfilment. All the emerging issues of bio-ethics are of concern to the whole Christian community.

BIRTH CONTROL

THE TERM “birth control” is variously used to refer to population control, birth spacing, fertility regulation, family planning and contraception. In this article it is used to mean the avoidance of pregnancy by either “natural” or “artificial” measures.

BIBLICAL BACKGROUND

The ability to love without producing children is a fundamental distinction between human beings and animals. Mutual attraction in human beings is triggered not by instinct but by a host of feelings and fantasies as well as family and social conventions. While there is some evidence from early civilizations of human beings seeking ways to make sexual love possible without the risk of conceiving an unwanted child, for thousands of years women and men accepted (and usually wanted) all the children nature gave them. Children were seen as blessing from God. The infant death rate was high, and many births were needed to ensure few survivors.

The Bible offers no explicit guidance in this area, but does have some significant suggestions by emphasizing that God is a God of life and that all things are bound together in this God (Deut. 30:19). From the time of the patriarchs, Israel – a small people, constantly threatened by its neighbours – wanted children at any price in order to retain the inheritance of the founding fathers and, some say, to see the promised Messiah. There was no greater spiritual misfortune or social shame than to be a childless widow or an infertile woman. Yet many biblical passages speak of love without speaking of children (e.g. Gen. 2:23-24; the prophet Hosea; Song of Songs; Eph. 5:21-33). With the New Testament and the coming of the Messiah, those who cannot have children are fully rehabilitated. Under the new covenant, children are blessing, a gift of God, but no longer a religious necessity.

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENTS

Natural family planning – observing the physical signs indicating a period of high fertility and abstaining from intercourse during that time – has been considered by the Roman Catholic Church as the only approved method of birth control. Although probably used in various ways for centuries, the scientific basis of this method was only described in 1972. Since then, many organizations related to the Catholic church have conducted programmes teaching this method to married couples and supporting them in its use. Studies by scientists around the world have proved that natural family planning can be effective and is attractive to many because it is without side-effects. Nevertheless, churches other than the Roman Catholic have not widely promoted this method.

The rapid development of generally safe and widely available methods of contraception has increased possibilities to liberate women and couples from conceiving unwanted children and the attendant anxiety. At first, churches, like many other religious groups, saw several risks in this: that of disobeying God, the actual giver of children, by artificially intervening in the divine mystery of procreation; that of selfishness, rejecting the prolific nature of life; and that of growing immorality as sexual relations became free of the danger of conception. Increasingly, it became evident that these opinions were at odds with the aspirations of couples (and above all women), scientific possibilities and social needs.

In 1992-93 a group of gynaecologists and midwives from developing countries organized a campaign asking people to write to the pope or Islamic religious leaders every time they saw a severe complication arising from the unavailability of contraceptives due to religious precepts. Their appeal for religious tolerance for contraception was published in medical journals; it is not known if the churches have reacted to it.

BIRTH CONTROL AND THE CHURCHES

Since the 1930s church opinion on birth control has generally divided into two groups, with Anglican and Protestant churches (except the most conservative) approving, supporting and favouring the use of contraceptives, and the official teaching of the Roman Catholic Church consistently opposing contraception by artificial means. The Orthodox churches tend to deal with this issue on a pastoral basis depending on the particular circumstances.

Pope Paul VI wrote in the encyclical Humanae Vitae that the church “teaches that each and every marriage act must remain open to the transmission of life” and pointed to possible negative moral consequences of artificial contraception – conjugal infidelity, corruption of youth and loss of respect for women. The encyclical has been vigorously debated in the Catholic church but remains the official teaching of the magisterium. Pope John Paul II’s encyclical Evangelium Vitae (1995) includes abortion and euthanasia among the phenomena that result in devaluation of human life and condemns them in the strongest terms. However, its discussion of contraception distinguishes between a “contraceptive mentality” and responsible parenthood. It endorses the “training of married couples in responsible procreation”, the use of natural methods of regulating fertility and the study and spread of these methods. Guidelines published by the Pontifical Council for the Family in 1997 reaffirm the Vatican’s total ban on contraception, but urge compassion towards married couples who use contraception, saying that “frequent relapse into sins of contraception does not in itself constitute a motive for denying absolution”.

Some methods used for birth control are also important in preventing sexually transmitted diseases, including AIDS. The use of condoms for this purpose has been widely promoted, eliciting statements by some churches, especially Catholic, in which the use of contraceptive devices is rejected even if the primary purpose is not contraception.

Recently there have been reactions from churches to “emergency contraception”, a term which refers to several contraceptive methods that can be used to prevent pregnancy after sexual intercourse has already taken place. These methods include special doses of normal birth control pills as well as insertion of an intrauterine device (IUD). They offer women an important chance to prevent pregnancy when a regular contraceptive method has failed, no method was used, or rape has been committed. The emergency contraceptive pills are not effective once pregnancy has begun; thus, medically speaking, they do not induce abortion. In 2000 medical boards in many countries announced plans to make the emergency contraceptive pills more easily available over the counter. Anglican church officials in the UK have denounced this plan, saying it will encourage sexual promiscuity; in Italy, the Vatican has insisted that this pill is abortive and has requested Catholic pharmacists to refuse to sell it.

THE CHURCHES AND INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES

The relationship of birth control to population policy is extremely controversial. The WCC’s fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968) urged the churches to resolve their differences about certain methods of population control; and in its report to the world population conference in Bucharest in 1974, the Council stressed the churches’ role in promoting “the acceptance and practice” of responsible parenthood by both husbands and wives, noting that this includes the right of couples to “the means of family planning acceptable to them in conscience”.

The most recent international forum for the churches to express their views on these issues was the UN’s conference on population and development in Cairo in 1994. The Vatican, in its character as state, had a voice in the decision-making processes and worked with special vigour to oppose references to abortion in the proposed programme of action. Other churches and the WCC had to make their opinions known through participation in an NGO forum. In Cairo the WCC delegation drew attention to problematic issues regarding family planning programmes which are vertically imposed, with statistical targets, or which promote contraceptive methods that pose threats to the integrity and health of women.

The variety of views among WCC member churches regarding fertility regulation was acknowledged; and while the use of abortion as a family planning method was rejected, it was stated that the unjust treatment and exploitation of women make legal recourse to safe, voluntary abortion a moral necessity. The WCC also emphasized the importance of a dialogue in a situation of growing polarization between Western industrialized nations and much of the rest of the world.

Many of these issues were discussed again during the fourth world conference on women (Beijing 1995). Its Platform for Action established a basis for a universal commitment – thus by churches as well – to address the difficulties women are facing, among them protection of human rights from the perspective of women and an emphasis on total health throughout the life-cycle of women.

THE WAY FORWARD

A WCC discussion paper, “Churches, Population and Development: Cairo and Beyond”, was sent to member churches in 1996 to stimulate further reflection and discussion and to suggest some specific actions they might take. The chapter on sexual and reproductive rights speaks of the need for holistic approaches to teaching sexual ethics and family planning, education on issues of gender equity and equality, and counselling services to meet the needs of adolescents. The paper also suggests that churches should oppose policies of mass media that transmit values that demean women, emphasize sexual violence and denigrate the individual dignity of women, children and men.

Within the Catholic church there have also been suggestions for greater dialogue with the leaders of other Christian communities and world religions, based on a shared concern for the future life-styles of younger generations. Organizations such as Catholics for a Free Choice are active in the efforts of having birth control approved by the Catholic church. The guidelines for ecumenical dialogue on moral issues from the Joint Working Group* between the RCC and the WCC recommend that “dialogue should replace diatribe”. Similar emphases emerge in the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission document on ethics.

Thus the policy bases for action by different churches and broad-based openness for ecumenical dialogue on these issues would seem to be established. While dialogue itself is an important form of action, the challenge now is to find concrete common projects for collaboration on the issue of birth control. One such project could be that natural family planning be seen as an important possibility in WCC member churches, drawing on the experiences of the Roman Catholic church in this area. Furthermore, the counselling of adolescents could be seen as a practical challenge important enough to unite the forces of different churches and “bring them closer to being fully church”.

BLAKE, EUGENE CARSON

B. 7 Nov. 1906, St Louis MO, USA; d. 13 July 1985, Stamford CT. Blake was general secretary of the WCC, 1966-72. In the years prior to this appointment he was a member of the central and executive committees, 1954-66; chairman of the WCC finance committee, 1954-61; and chairman of the Division on Interchurch Aid, Refugee and World Service, 1961-66.

After studies at Princeton Theological Seminary, he taught at Forman Christian College, Lahore, India (now Pakistan), 1928-29. He then served as assistant pastor in New York City, 1932-35, and as pastor in Albany NY, 1935-40, and Pasadena CA, 1940-51. President of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the USA (NCCC), 1954-57, Blake continued as a member of its general board until 1966. He was stated clerk of the United Presbyterian Church in the USA (until 1958, the Presbyterian Church in the USA) and was a delegate to the WCC assemblies in 1954 and 1961, to the general councils of the World Presbyterian Alliance in 1948, 1954 and 1959, and to the Faith and Order conferences Lund 1952, Oberlin 1957 and Montreal 1963. His proposal in 1960 for church union, made in a sermon at Grace Cathedral, San Francisco, developed into the Consultation on Church Union.*

Blake was an ardent advocate of the civil rights movement, particularly through his chairmanship of the NCCC's commission on religion and race, and in 1963 he was jailed for leading an anti-segregation demonstration. He spoke publicly against US involvement in the Vietnam war. He served on President Johnson's National Advisory Council for the War on Poverty, and was a trustee of various universities and institutes. In retirement Blake was active in several areas, including the work of Bread for the World, a US Christian anti-hunger lobby. He had remarkable administrative skills, which guided the WCC during the time when its structures required re-alignment and revision.

BLISS, KATHLEEN

B. 25 July 1908, London; d. 13 Sept. 1989. Bliss was a main speaker at the WCC's first assembly in Amsterdam in 1948, where she was chairperson of the committee on the laity. In a preliminary draft of the assembly message, she wrote, "We intend to stay together", a sentence widely quoted since then. She was a member of the central and executive committees, 1954-68, and was moderator of the Commission on Integration of the WCC and the World Council of Christian Education. She served on the British Council of Churches, 1942-67, and was general secretary of the Board of Education of the Church of England, 1957-66. Bliss studied theology at Cambridge and was lecturer in religious studies at the University of Sussex, 1966-73. She was the editor of The Christian News-Letter, 1945-49.

BOEGNER, MARC

B. 21 Feb. 1881, Epinal, France; d. 19 Dec. 1970, Strasbourg, France. A member of the WCC provisional committee, 1938-48, Boegner became a president of the WCC, 1948-54. He was president also of the Protestant Federation of France, 1928-61; the Reformed Church of France, 1938-50; the Comité inter-mouvements auprès des évacués (CIMADE*), 1945-68; and the French Student Christian Movement, 1920-39. Participating in Oxford 1937 and Edinburgh 1937, he was one of the founders of the WCC. After studying law and theology, he was ordained in 1905; he began his career as a pastor at Aouste-sur-Sye, 1905-11, and went on to become professor at the College of the Evangelical Missionary Society, 1911-18; he was then pastor at Passy (Paris), 1918-54. During the second world war, he intervened with great courage on behalf of Jews and refugees. From 1962 he was a member of the French Academy. Boegner did a great deal to promote the ecumenical movement in France and abroad. He was an observer at the Second Vatican Council and in 1965 addressed the gathering in Geneva at which Cardinal Bea announced the creation of the Joint Working Group.*

BONHOEFFER, DIETRICH

B. 4 Feb. 1906, Breslau, Prussia; d. 9 April 1945, Flossenbürg, Bavaria. Executed in the last days of the second world war in a vengeful act of cruelty by the Nazi regime, which he had contested since Hitler came to power in 1933, Bonhoeffer as a young man played a minor but significant part in the international relationships of German Protestants with the ecumenical organizations of the 1930s. After his death, however, the spiritual and theological inspiration of his last years, shining through his Letters and Papers from Prison and the biography by his close friend Eberhard Bethge, have proved to be of worldwide and lasting significance for many of the leaders and the issues in the continuing ecumenical movement.

Born into a large and influential family of intellectuals and professionals, Bonhoeffer was a successful theological student and quickly embarked on an academic career. Travels and study opportunities in Rome, Barcelona and New York opened him to other cultures, and the fire of Karl Barth's Christ-centred theology drew him into a passionate opposition to much in his own church, which flowered in a lifelong commitment to the Confessing Church.* Appointed in 1931 as one of three part-time youth secretaries for the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches* and for the Ecumenical Council for Life and Work,* he spent 1933-35 as pastor of one of the German congregations in London, devoting most of his energy to the struggles of the early stages of the Confessing Church and coming to know Bishop George Bell of Chichester, for whose prophetic leadership against Nazism Bonhoeffer provided much of the material and inspiration.

From 1935 he was in charge of an unofficial, later illegal, theological seminary of the Confessing Church in Pomerania, whose innovations in spirituality and community living are reflected in The Cost of Discipleship and Life Together. When this activity was totally proscribed, American friends invited him in June 1939 to the USA, but he was at once unhappy there and returned to Germany in August of the same year in order to face the dark days ahead among his own people. Family members then invited him into the demanding double life of a secret agent in the counter-espionage service, where a plot against Hitler was being prepared. This enabled him to visit W.A. Visser 't Hooft and Hans Schönfeld in Geneva, as well as church leaders in occupied Norway, and to meet Bishop Bell in Stockholm to appeal for British support for the plotters. He was arrested in April 1943 and spent the remaining two years of his life outwitting interrogators, and impressing his warders and fellow prisoners with his humanity and Christianity.

Much in the subsequent fascination with his legacy has focused on many-layered phrases such as his advocacy of radically new Christian responses to "a world come of age" or his practice of a "secret discipline" of meditation and prayer. His friends witnessed to the growth in less than 40 years of a remarkably rich and mature Christian, able to face with open mind and heart even the deepest ambiguities of human existence.

BOROVY, VITALI

B. 18 Jan. 1916, Byelorussia. Representative of the Russian Orthodox Church at the WCC, 1962-66 and 1978-85, Borovoy was a member of the Faith and Order* commission, then assistant director of the secretariat for F&O, 1966-72. He was an observer at the Second Vatican Council, 1962-65, a member of the Joint Working Group* of the WCC and the RCC, 1965-72, and of the annual meeting of the Christian World Communions,* 1962-85. Educated at Vilna Theological Seminary and Warsaw University, he was ordained in 1944 and became vice-dean of the Minsk Theological Seminary, 1944-54, professor of ancient church history at the Leningrad Theological Academy, 1954-62, and dean of the Moscow Patriarchal Cathedral and professor of Byzantine church history at the Moscow Theological Academy, 1973-78. From 1985 to 1995, he served as deputy chairman of the department for external church relations of the Moscow patriarchate, and professor of the history of the Western churches at the Moscow Theological Academy.

BOSSEY, ECUMENICAL INSTITUTE OF

BOSSEY refers to a place but also brings to mind people, namely the worldwide group of former participants in programmes of the World Council of Churches' Ecumenical Institute. The place is a quiet estate some 20 kms from Geneva, with the necessary proximity to yet distance from the busy headquarters of international Christian organizations, United Nations agencies and Geneva university with which the institute is academically related. Course participants – laity and clergy, students and leaders in church and society from all over the world – leave Bossey committed to the ecumenical vision. They are involved in difficult frontier situations, and in leadership positions in churches and in civil society on all continents.

W.A. Visser 't Hooft, who initiated Bossey, said at its inauguration in 1946: "The Institute's programme has three main subjects: the Bible, the world, the church universal.” In order to hold these vast focuses together and to initiate creative thinking and training, he called on Hendrik Kraemer and Suzanne de Diétrich as the first leadership team. In the post-war situation the programme concentrated on up to three-month courses for lay training and youth leaders. Alongside these shorter seminars on ethics were held for people from the same profession, e.g. teachers, medical doctors, trade-union leaders, social workers, artists, pastors. The study of different confessional families was also emphasized.

New demands of biblical faith and the changing situation in the world and the churches have led to several shifts in both the ways of ecumenical learning and the content of studies. Specialized one-week seminars now usually take up subjects of current ecumenical study and action projects. Since 1952 much time and energy has gone into the four-month session of the graduate school of ecumenical studies, which in 2000 became two sessions a year. Also in 2000, a master’s programme was begun in cooperation with the University of Geneva.

Each new director and team of resident teaching staff have contributed to the learning facilities and the range of explorations at Bossey. Thus in the 1960s and 1970s Eastern Orthodoxy and a strong interdisciplinary approach was emphasized under the leadership of the Greek Orthodox N.A. Nissiotis. When an Anglican from Kenya, J.S. Mbiti, became director, the accent shifted to intercultural meetings and the dialogue of theologies currently developing in different continents. The members of the present teaching team come from Africa, Eastern Europe, Latin America, the Pacific and the USA, and represent the Orthodox, Roman Catholic and Protestant traditions.

The primary learning experience at Bossey is the intensive community life where, in common worship, corporate and individual studies and many personal encounters, the participants teach one another. Often unconscious cultural and confessional presuppositions are questioned, and racial and sexist prejudices uncovered and struggled with. Deep convictions of faith confront each other and are tested. Gradually, through pain and shared joys a temporary, limited learning community grows in the search for a fuller truth.

BRASH, ALAN ANDERSON

B. 5 June 1913, Lower Hutt, New Zealand; d. 24 Aug, 2002, Christchurch. Brash was deputy general secretary of the

WCC and moderator of Unit II, 1974-78. For two periods he was general secretary of the National Council of Churches in New Zealand (NCCNZ), 1947-52 and 1956-64, and its first regional secretary, 1979-84. His work as interchurch aid secretary for mission and service of the East Asia Christian Conference, 1957-68, led him to become interim Asia secretary of the WCC’s division of Interchurch Aid, Refugee and World Service in 1965. This was followed by the interim directorship of the WCC's division of World Mission and Evangelism, 1966, and of the Inter-church Aid, Refugee and World Service, 1970-74, punctuated by a spell as director of Christian Aid, London, 1968-70. A delegate to Oxford 1937 and Edinburgh 1937, he has attended all WCC assemblies except Evanston 1954, publishing popular reports on Amsterdam 1948 and New Delhi 1961. Brash was moderator of the Presbyterian Church of New Zealand, 1978-79.

BRENT, CHARLES HENRY

B. 9 April 1862, Newcastle, Ontario, Canada; d. 27 March 1929, Lausanne, Switzerland. Brent studied at Trinity College, Toronto, and was ordained in 1887. A parish priest in Boston, 1888-91, he rose to become the Protestant Episcopal bishop of the Philippines in 1901, where he energetically combatted the opium traffic. His experience in this field led him naturally into the presidency of the opium conference at Shanghai, and in 1923 he represented the USA on the League of Nations Narcotics Committee. Elected bishop of Western New York in 1917, he was responsible for the Episcopal churches in Europe, 1926-28. On returning from the world missionary conference at Edinburgh in 1910, he spoke at the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the need for unity, and of his own conviction that a "world conference on Faith and Order should be convened".

Throughout the rest of his life Brent exercised a profound influence on the Faith and Order* movement, presiding the first world conference at Lausanne in 1927. At the same time, he participated in the world mission and Life and Work* movements, and in the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches,* travelling widely and addressing numerous gatherings. Brent was pre-eminently a man of prayer. His appreciation of traditions other than his own opened many doors of friendship to him.

BRETHREN

THE BRETHREN came into being in the late summer of 1708 near Schwarzenau, Germany. Five men and three women, all religious refugees, were baptized in the river Eder. One of them, chosen by lot, baptized Alexander Mack, their leader and first minister; Mack then baptized the rest. All eight had been influenced by the radical German pietistic renewal as well as by descendants of the 16th-century Anabaptists, the Mennonites.*

From the beginning, Brethren embodied a high doctrine of the church as a close-knit community whose life together is a means of grace,* not a loose association of like-minded believers. Brethren members who are baptized are the church. Creeds, liturgies, official hierarchies and buildings do not "make" the church the church. Rather, the church is manifest when members come together for worship or work dedicated to “the glory of God and our neighbours’ good”.

Brethren stress obedience to the teachings of Jesus and conformity to the life of early Christian communities. They practise adult baptism* by immersion, celebrate the love feast (with foot-washing according to John 13, a common meal and the bread and cup), greet one another with the “holy kiss”, anoint for healing, reconcile conflict according to Matt. 18:15-17, and teach non-resistance.

Religious persecution and economic hardship in Germany were among the problems that pushed the Brethren across the Atlantic, the last group in 1729. They first settled in Pennsylvania, soon spread along the Atlantic seaboard, then moved westwards by the mid-19th century.

The late 19th century was a time of church schism* and splintering that resulted in a number of Brethren bodies: the Old German Baptist Brethren, the Brethren Church, the Fellowship of Grace Brethren, the Dunkard Brethren, and the Church of the Brethren (the largest). In 1973 M.R. Zigler arranged a historic meeting of members of these bodies, “just to shake hands”. More meetings followed, giving rise to the comprehensive three-volume Brethren Encyclopedia.

Although the Brethren prospered and grew in their new country, they retained a certain isolation from US society. The revolutionary war deepened this isolation. Committed to non-resistance, the Brethren could not in good conscience either bear arms against the British or swear an oath of allegiance to the new government. They were thus accused of treason, severely fined and often brutally mistreated. During the civil war and the first world war, Brethren were fined and imprisoned for refusing to bear arms. Just before the second world war, the Church of the Brethren worked closely with Mennonites and Friends* to provide a service programme for their young men as an alternative to military conscription.

The Church of the Brethren (COB) began an organized response to needy peoples when collections for famine relief in Armenia were taken up in 1917. During the 1930s, a number of service opportunities developed, such as the sending of relief workers to Spain during its civil war. A heifer project provides farm animals for places of need; it is now an ecumenical service programme.

A Brethren Service Committee (1939) focused during the second world war on civilian public service, a cooperative programme of the Brethren, Mennonites and Friends with the US government. This programme provided civilian work of national importance for conscientious objectors to war. Brethren facilities at New Windsor, Maryland, are an ecumenical service centre, with offices for Church World Service, Lutheran World Relief, Christian Rural Overseas Programme and Interchurch Medical Aid. Other Brethren-sponsored agencies also became ecumenical, and many Brethren joined ecumenical agencies as staff workers during the 1940s through the 1960s.

The Brethren have a strong missionary spirit, inspired especially by the great commission in Matt. 28:19-20. This spirit led to the development of home missions from the earliest beginnings; interest in missionary activity outside the USA developed in the mid-19th century, focusing on India, China, Nigeria, Puerto Rico, Ecuador, Indonesia and Sudan. In 1955 a new foreign mission policy refocused mission from “parenting” to “indigenization”, initiating the process of passing leadership into local hands. In 1978 a Latin American mission strategy, “misión mutua en las Américas”, emphasized ecumenical planning, solidarity with the oppressed and mutuality in mission.

Among the Brethren bodies, only the COB is involved in the conciliar expressions of the 20th-century ecumenical movement, joining the US Federal Council of Churches (now the National Council of Churches) in 1941 and the WCC in 1948. It has participated vigorously in the work of both these councils, always making a contribution to their leadership and finances out of proportion to its size.

COB membership has declined significantly during the past 30 years (to 136,000 in 2000), and the membership is ageing, with the median age now in the mid-50s. As its past and present have depended on service rather than size, so does its future. For the enduring calling for Brethren as a servant people is to give birth to and let go of programmes for ministry and mission, so that the whole Body of Christ and all God's people may be blessed.

BUDDHIST-CHRISTIAN DIALOGUE

BUDDHIST-CHRISTIAN encounter, particularly through the monastic and the mystical, stretches back to the early years of Christianity. The form it has taken in more recent years – planned dialogue sessions and joint explorations into spiritual life and social action – must be seen in the wider context of interfaith dialogue (see dialogue, interfaith).

A great 20th-century pioneer of Buddhist-Christian relations was Thomas Merton, who sought an international and inter-religious monastic spiritual encounter, in line with the ancient tradition of dialogue through monasticism and mysticism. His death during the 1968 Bangkok meeting of “L'aide à l'implantation monastique” (AIM) served to stimulate further interest in this vision. In 1973, in Bangalore, AIM brought together Christian and non-Christian monks, one result of which was a series of East-West spiritual exchanges between Zen and Christian monks. In the 1980s and 1990s, inter-religious monastic dialogue, particularly between Buddhists and Christians, expanded further, within and across continents. A Bulletin on Monastic Inter-religious Dialogue is published regularly in Belgium.

Parallel to Thomas Merton, Christians were reaching out in new ways towards Buddhism in several Asian countries. In Japan, the Jesuits H.M. Enomiya Lassalle and J. Kachiri Kadowaki delved into the richness of Zen. The first of what became annual Japanese Zen-Christian colloquia was held in 1967. In Sri Lanka, the Catholics Aloysius Pieris, Michael Rodrigo and Antony Fernando, Methodist Lynn de Silva and Anglican Yohan Devananda studied Buddhism under Buddhists in a search for new forms of Buddhist-Christian community living and dialogue. In Thailand, Sr Theodore Hahnenfeld and Fr Edmond Pezet were part of the same wave; similar ventures towards an in-depth “dialogue of life” can be cited in other countries. In the Seimeisan Centre for Prayer and Inter-religious Dialogue in Japan, a Christian community and a Buddhist temple united in 1987 into a single “religious juridical institution”.

As academic research into religious pluralism* grew in the 1970s, new institutions were formed. Especially relevant to Buddhist-Christian encounter were the Ecumenical Institute for Study and Dialogue in Sri Lanka (formerly the Centre for Religion and Society) and the Nanzan Institute for Religion and Culture in Japan. The East-West religions project, started in 1980 by the University of Hawaii department of religion, with international and ecumenical dimensions, organized international Buddhist-Christian conferences on Buddhist-Christian renewal and the future of humanity (Honolulu 1980), paradigm shifts in Buddhism and Christianity: cultural systems and the self (Hawaii 1984), Buddhism and Christianity: towards the human future (Berkeley 1987). From them came some regional initiatives: a Japan chapter of the project (1982) which became the Japan Society for Buddhist-Christian Studies, and the North American Buddhist-Christian theological encounter group under Masao Abe and John Cobb (1983). Of particular importance was the 1987 conference, which drew 800 people from 19 countries and gave birth to the Society for Buddhist-Christian Studies to facilitate worldwide encounter. About every four years it co-sponsors an international Buddhist-Christian conference. In 1996 the topic was “Socially Engaged Buddhism and Christianity”.

In Europe, an important international Buddhist-Christian dialogue was held in Austria in 1981, convening Western theologians and their Asian Buddhist counterparts to discuss the theme of salvation, individual and social. Significant European centres include the Karma Ling Institute in France; De Tiltenberg in the Netherlands, which concentrates on Zen; Lassalle House at Bad Schönbrunn, Switzerland; and Voies de l'Orient, Belgium. In February 1996, the mission academy at the University of Hamburg hosted a meeting for European Christians involved in the study of Buddhism, resulting in the formation of a European network for Christian studies of Buddhism; in October 1997 this became the European Network of Buddhist-Christian Studies.

An important development in East Asia was the decision by institutions in eight countries to form a network of Christian organizations for inter-religious encounter: Inter-Religio. Included were the Tao Fong Shan Ecumenical Institute (Hong Kong), the Driyarkara Institute of Philosophy (Indonesia), the Institute for Oriental Religions (Japan) and the Inter-religious Commission for Development (Thailand). Buddhist-Christian dialogue is a central component in Inter-Religio's work.

Themes arising in Buddhist-Christian encounter include both philosophical and socio-political concerns. For example, topics discussed at the 1987 Berkeley conference included liberation theology* and Buddhism, Korean minjung theology* and Buddhism, religion and violence, agape and compassion, sunyata and kenosis, women in Buddhism and Christianity. Social engagement and peace-making featured in two 1988 conferences: "Wisdom and Compassion: The Message of Buddhism and Christianity for Our Times", at the Institute of Oriental Religions, Japan; "Buddhist and Christian in the Search for Peace and Justice", organized by the WCC in Seoul. The 1996 Chicago conference had working parties on a global ethic, politics and non-violence, environment and ecology, human rights and social justice. All these conferences have emphasized that personal and social transformation must go together, implying Buddhist-Christian action beyond the conference table in shared spirituality and struggle.

Conference topics within the European Network of Buddhist-Christian Studies have included "Buddhist Perceptions of Jesus" (1999) and "Christian Perceptions of the Buddha" (2001).

In many countries Buddhists and Christians are in fact involved together both in social action and the sharing of spirituality. Many informal Buddhist-Christian dialogue groups exist; and joint meditation retreats and reflection days take place at Buddhist and Christian centres. Buddhists and Christians have joined together in peace initiatives, for example, the annual inter-religious prayer for peace promoted by the Catholic community of Sant'Egidio.*

Yet in some contexts mistrust still remains, especially where the legacy of colonialism and the missionary enterprise makes Buddhists suspicious of any Christian initiatives. A key maxim is that of Sri Lankan Michael Rodrigo, pioneer of Buddhist-Christian dialogue: "Only after a dialogue of life is there dialogue of prayer and then of religious experience."

BÜHRIG, MARGA

B. 17 Oct. 1915, Berlin; d. 12 Feb. 2002, Binningen, Switzerland. A president of the WCC, 1983-91, Bührig was deeply involved in its initiatives on “Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation”. In 1939 she received a doctorate in German literature and modern history from the University of Zurich, where she also studied theology. Since 1946 she was engaged in ecumenical women’s work in Switzerland and Germany, and since 1954 in the worldwide ecumenical movement through the WCC’s department for the Cooperation of Men and Women in Church, Family and Society. Co-president of the Women’s Ecumenical Liaison Group (WCC and Consilium de Laicis, Vatican), 1968-72, she directed Boldern Academy (near Zurich), 1971-81, and was president of the Ecumenical Association of Academies and Laity Centres in Europe, 1976-82. Bührig described the basic tenet of her life as being “to love life passionately and to seek justice passionately”. She never sought a public leadership role, and it went against the grain to be part of any power and authority structures.

BULGAKOV, SERGIUS

B. 16 June 1871, Livny, Russia; d. 12 July 1944, Paris. Dean of the Russian Orthodox Theological Institute of St Sergius, Paris, 1925-44, Bulgakov had considerable intellectual influence in the West through his participation in the ecumenical movement, of which he was a warm but frequently a critical supporter. He was actively involved in the Anglo-Russian Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius (England). He strove to give a comprehensive interpretation of all the main traditional Christian doctrines in the light of the doctrine of “sophia”, the holy wisdom. Since he viewed Mary as the most perfectly created image of the uncreated sophia, he criticized the Faith and Order conference at Lausanne in 1927 for neglecting the veneration of the mother of God. His teaching was condemned by the Moscow patriarchate in 1935, perhaps largely on political grounds.

Bulgakov wanted to enter the priesthood, but became a religious and philosophical sceptic under the influence of G.W.F. Hegel and was active in Marxist political movements. Disillusioned after the 1905 revolution, Bulgakov slowly retraced his steps to the church. In 1917 he

CAMPUS CRUSADE FOR CHRIST

IN 1951 William R. Bright, 31, left the business world and founded Campus Crusade for Christ as an evangelical interdenominational organization at the University of California at Los Angeles. CCC soon expanded beyond universities to include work with high-school students, athletes, business and professional people, local churches, families, prisoners and others. Stressing discipleship and evangelism through one-on-one personal contact, CCC staff and programmes are found in more than 100 countries.

At the centre of CCC's identity is an evangelistic tool known as The Four Spiritual Laws, which explain in simple terms the gospel of Jesus Christ and the invitation to follow him as Lord and Saviour. Millions of copies of the 16-page wallet-size booklet have circulated, and many Protestant congregations use their own version. In some areas such as Mexico and the Philippines, the Roman Catholic renewal movement has adapted and incorporated The Four Spiritual Laws in its Christian life programme.

Since 1979, for mass evangelization CCC has used the film Jesus, which follows the life of Christ according to Luke's gospel. Available in more than 600 languages, Jesus has been viewed by an estimated four billion people, with tens of millions indicating a decision to follow Jesus Christ.

ROBERT T. COOTE

CANON

THE WORD "canon" derives from the Greek kanōn, a straight stick, measuring rod or ruler (cf. Latin regula); hence, a standard or norm. At the end of the 2nd century, Irenaeus, Tertullian and others spoke of the “rule of faith” or “canon of truth”, meaning the heart of the gospel as expressed in summary forms similar to the creeds.* From the 4th century onwards, conciliar decisions on doctrine and discipline were designated canons (see ecumenical councils). “Canon law” is the way most churches regulate their life (see canon law, church discipline); monastic rules may also be called canons. In the liturgy of the Roman (Catholic) church, the “canon” of the mass is a normative eucharistic prayer.

Ecumenically, “canon” is most widely used in connection with the scriptures of the church. Verbally, such usage goes back only to the 4th century, but the fact and idea of a “collection of authoritative writings” (intrinsic authority) or even an “authoritative collection of (such) writings” (extrinsically recognized authority) has been present to Christianity since its beginnings. To the scriptures of Israel – which it claimed for its own – the earliest church added writings that told the story of Jesus the Christ and recorded the preaching, teaching and life of the primitive Christian community. The question of which writings were to be properly so treated arose acutely in the mid-2nd century. The catholic “canon” established itself over against, on the one hand, the reductionism of Marcion (whose own canon comprised only a doctored Luke and a mutilated corpus paulinum) and, on the other hand, the pullulation of apocryphal gospels, acts and apocalypses that were largely Gnostic in character and, perhaps, the more recent oracles considered by the Montanists as further revelation. Positively put, the catholic canon consisted of those writings which had been accepted for reading in the worship of the church and, in the case of the “New Testament”, were held to be derived from an apostle or his surrogate (e.g. Mark writing for Peter, or Luke writing on the authority of Paul).

There was no conflict between such writings and authentic tradition. Indeed the scriptures* were intrinsic to the tradition – a vehicle for transmitting the Christian message and faith. Preaching, catechesis, sacramental rites, episcopal teaching and the confessions of martyrs and everyday saints were also instruments of the Tradition. But a special role and value attached to the scriptures – reflected in the care taken to protect them in times of persecution – as the permanent legacy of the original witnesses and of inspired writers who had been normatively guided by the same self-consistent Spirit as indwelt the believing community. According to an ecumenically influential formula of Oscar Cullmann: in establishing the principle of a canon, “the church, by an act of humility, submitted every later tradition that she would elaborate to the higher criterion of the apostolic tradition fixed in the holy scriptures” (La tradition, 1953). Thus the canonical scriptures of Old and New Testament constitute, for the continuing life of the church, the decisive written testimony to God’s history with Israel, the incarnation of the Son, and the mission of the Spirit. In times of doctrinal and ecclesiastical controversy, however, there has been conflict over their interpretation and over their operative relation to the other vehicles of tradition.

At the fourth world conference on Faith and Order (Montreal 1963), a remarkable convergence was registered between Protestants and Orthodox on Tradition (the “great Tradition”, which is to be distinguished from the particular ecclesiastical “traditions”, even if these are its channels) as the “paradosis of the kerygma”, the handing on of the message, “the Tradition of the gospel” – with the scriptures as a privileged and normative element within the Tradition. As “the Tradition in its written form”, the scriptures have “a special basic value” and serve as “an indispensable criterion” for distinguishing “faithful transmission” (Montreal 1963, paras 38-76). At the same time Vatican II, in line with the historical work of J.R. Geiselman on the limits of the formula of the council of Trent* concerning “scriptures and (et) unwritten traditions”, rejected a draft text on “the two sources of revelation” and adopted instead the constitution Dei Verbum, which was much closer to Yves Congar’s systematic notion that the scriptures and the oral-practical tradition of the church are diverse and interactive modes of transmitting one and the same gospel.

Thus there has been growing ecumenical agreement on the sufficiency of the scriptures, even if varying emphases continue to reflect historical controversies. The Protestant principle of sola scriptura was first erected against some practical and doctrinal traditions which were tolerated or even endorsed by the pastoral authorities of the medieval West but in the reformers' eyes contradicted the original gospel and faith. Understood absolutely, "scripture alone" implies that the Bible is self-interpreting, at least under the Holy Spirit's direct guidance; but in fact the "living voice of the gospel" (viva vox evangelii) is always mediated by preachers who actively expound – and therefore interpret – what they take to be the scriptural message within a variable cultural context. While continuing to insist on the primacy of the scriptures, ecumenically minded Protestants recognize that the church has willy-nilly a "teaching office" – and the issue is as to where such a magisterium is lodged (bishops, synods, professors, pope...). The Roman Catholic tradition has always recognized more openly the need for a teaching office and has been more willing to admit the fact of later "explication" or "development" of what was latently or germinally present in the apostolic faith recorded in the scriptures (not only as regards, say, the full formulation of the doctrine of the Trinity but also, controversially, the Marian dogmas and the "Petrine office" itself). On its side, however, Vatican II has insisted that the magisterium remains subservient to the apostolic witness (Dei Verbum 7-10).

While not all problems regarding the sufficiency of the scriptures in relation to Tradition have found an ecumenical solution, the more explosive question now may concern the integrity of the canonical scriptures. Although Christian churches differ somewhat over the extent of the OT (see Old Testament and Christian unity), they are officially just about unanimous over the composition of the NT, i.e. those 27 books whose precise listing is first found in Athanasius's festal letter for 367 (see New Testament and Christian unity). Nevertheless, three recurrent issues may prove disruptive.

One is the relation between the OT and the NT. If we adopt, say, the historical categories of "promise and fulfilment" or the theological categories of "law and gospel", the question in each case remains that of the kind and extent of continuities and disconti-nities between the Testaments. Answers affect not only the relations between Christianity and Judaism but also wider matters in the understanding of the history and nature of salvation.* These issues have been present since the beginning of Christianity and, after the rupture of church and synagogue, do not appear to have been directly church-divisive before the Reformation (and even in the 16th century the soteriological arguments were not primarily framed directly in terms of the relations between the Testaments). While these matters probably belong, among Christians today, to the realm of theological controversy rather than doctrinal conflict or institutional separation between the churches, the issue of the history and nature of salvation retains an explosive potential when what is at stake is the nature and practice of the Christian mission* vis-a-vis (in different ways) Jews, people of other faiths or the irreligious.

Second, given the dimensions and the diversity of the Bible, it is not surprising that Christians have looked for a substantive "centre" of the scriptures. If with Luther one takes "that which advances Christ" (was Christum treibt) as an interpretative principle, few Christians will disagree. But (to stay with the example) when Lutherans further define "justification through faith alone" as the "canon within the canon", other Christians will put forward other candidates (e.g. the motifs of "covenant" or "liberation" or "kingdom of God"). In striking harmony with the ancient "rule of faith" or "canon of truth", the Faith and Order project "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today" took the Nicene Creed* as its "theological basis and methodological tool" in seeking to present to our time and world a faith that is roundly and thoroughly biblical. The question remains whether different "interests" (justificationists, liberationists, pietists, liturgists, etc.) can be contained within this more complex hermeneutical grid, which is needed to catch the full range of the scriptural material and neglect or dismiss none.

A third issue affecting the integrity of the canon concerns the use of "historical criticism" in exegesis (see exegesis, methods of). Modern biblical scholarship has sought to "get behind" the inherited text to earlier stages in the transmission of the material and even to “what really happened”. The historical-critical approach is legitimated by an incarnational faith that takes human history* seriously. It does not of itself – despite its more sceptical practitioners – exclude the occurrence and perception of divine presence and action within that history. In fact it can help to make clear that the interpretation of events is part of history itself, so that words and deeds are “revelation”* only when they are received as such; and thus the way is open for the Christian community to accept certain writings – precisely on account of their interpretation of events – as “correct records” of God’s operation in and through Christ. Historical research has proved valuable ecumenically, in that it has shown the scriptures to be a privileged part of such an earlier and continuing Tradition which perceives, receives and transmits the gospel of Jesus Christ (see Montreal 1963). Yet while historical exegesis may help to illuminate the earliest stages in that process, the faith cannot be made to depend upon particular scholarly reconstructions and speculations (hypotheses that enjoy varying degrees of probability) concerning what preceded and surrounded the scriptural writings. Otherwise there would be as many churches as there are scholars.

Spiritual and ecclesial dissatisfaction with the uncertainty and fluctuation in the “results” of modern NT scholarship has more recently prompted some within the academic profession of exegesis to adopt a more “canonical” hermeneutics. While historical investigations are not abandoned, greater attention is now focused in a more literary way upon the final text of scripture as the church has received it (with the question of manuscript and textual variants rightly seen as a relatively minor one for most substantial purposes). Abiding by the decisions of the church(es) concerning the extent of the canon, exegetes seek to understand and interpret a particular passage or book in light of its place and function within the Bible as a whole. The flat, univocal reading of the scriptures that characterizes fundamentalism can be avoided by a recognition of differences in literary genre (not everything is intended as “historical reporting”, and history itself, as we saw, is a complex notion) and by allowing some passages to complement and even correct others (though the “canonical” school is less likely to scent “contradictions” within the scriptures than some historical critics or the most ardent advocates of a single “canon within the canon”). The way is still open, for example, for the careful detection of “trajectories” within the biblical material such as a mixed group of Protestant and Roman Catholic scholars in the United States found ecclesiastically promising in their work published as Peter in the New Testament (1973) and Mary in the New Testament (1978). Since the “canonical” method is in greater harmony with the way in which the scriptures have actually been read in the liturgical, homiletical and devotional life of the church, its practice also opens up the possibility of dialogue with past interpretations of the scriptures and thus a more integral relation between scripture and the continuing, enveloping Tradition. Herein resides perhaps its greatest ecumenical potential.

In the contemporary secular West, the whole notion of a literary, artistic, cultural canon – which was in any case a much looser notion than that of a scriptural canon within the church – has recently come under strain, even to the point of dissolution in the eyes of some. Excisions of the offending, the hegemony of a single and narrow hermeneutical principle, the addition of matter believed to have been neglected – all has been attempted without a communal consensus. Perhaps the nearest proposal for dealing with the scriptural canon in a similar way occurs in, say, the work of Rosemary Ruether: after rejecting any interpretation of the messiahship of Jesus that might offend a Jew (Faith and Fratricide, 1974, where 1 Cor. 1:23 goes unmentioned), Ruether proposes “whatever promotes the full humanity of women” as the criterion for taking or leaving scriptural material and looks to add from “pagan resources” what is otherwise missing (Sexism and God-Talk, 1983). Such proposals, however, present a wide variety of theological difficulties, and are thus unlikely to bring Christian unity closer.

CANON LAW

CANON LAW states the rules for institutional ecclesiology, which reconciles normative ecclesiological principles – taught as dogma* – with the ecclesiological maxims that touch the lives of the people of God in practice. According to this approach, true ecumenism requires two encounters – one covering the behaviour of church members as Christians, and the other relating to the dogmaticians of the various churches. The history of these two encounters shows that the problem of the institutional church is structural and ecumenical: If the gospel is to be preached and experienced, does it call for institutionalism in Christian life? With this question in mind, we may look briefly at the main stages in the history of the German Lutheran churches as an example of the path taken by the Reformation churches in their institutional history.

In the socio-political situation of the time of the Reformation, it became urgently necessary to transfer episcopate (oversight, or the ius episcopale) to the temporal prince, both because of the radical Lutheran idea of original sin* and because of the combination of the Thomist view of the non-sacramental nature of the episcopacy* with Luther's advocacy of the priesthood of all believers. This established the fundamental principle that any legal organization is contrary to the essence of the church, which generally made itself felt in the five following stages of church-state relations: (1) between the 16th and mid-17th centuries, when the church was governed by the sovereign princes of the territory (Landesherrliches Kirchenregiment, supreme ecclesiastical authority of the regional sovereign); (2) between the mid-17th century and 1848, when the church was organically incorporated in and served the state (Staatskirchentum, the system of the state church); (3) from 1848 until just before 1919, when the churches administered their own internal affairs and the state now had the right to inspect and supervise them only in matters of external order (Staatskirchenhoheit, the system of state church sovereign rights); (4) between 1919 and 1933, when the church made agreements with the state in the Weimar Republic (parallel to the Roman Catholic concordats), made possible by the constitutional process separating church and state; and (5) between 1933 and 1945, when the Protestant churches during the Third Reich contended with the implantation of Nazi ideology in a German national people's church which was to be the religious mainspring of the state (Kirchenkampf, struggle between church and state).

On the eve of the Kirchenkampf the tragedy of German Protestantism arose from its failure to create for itself a church law embodying the content of the Protestant faith, because it had always left its legal structure to the state. Since that time, German Protestantism has been re-discovering itself as its structures have come to be distinguished from those of the state. By comparison, it can be said (in J. Hoffmann's terms) that while the Roman Catholic Church is able to remain itself throughout the variety of its relations with the state (thanks to the institutional objectivization it worked out for itself through its canon law), the German Protestant churches are progressively discovering themselves in the actual evolution of these relations. The effort expended by Lutheran churches on re-integrating the institution of episcopacy in line with a practice like that of the RCC allows differences between the two to persist: Lutheran bishops are not legislators, they have no magisterium,* they do not belong to a higher order than the pastor, and they are not directly installed as pastors.

In the Orthodox churches between 381 and 1453 the church was sometimes absorbed by the state (Emperor Leo VI, for instance, represented himself as an external bishop, convening and presiding at councils, promulgating decrees and appointing bishops and patriarchs); however, entrusting this function of supervising the church to the emperor did not plunge the system into Caesaro-papism. On the other hand, in the Russian church, Caesaro-papism found its best expression in the Spiritual Regulation of Peter the Great (1721), which subjected the church to the state and replaced the patriarchate of Moscow by a synod of which the czar was the supreme judge. By doing so, the czar destroyed the reality of the episcopate: the church was no longer governed only by the bishops, and the synod became a body with power over the church and no longer within the church. Church law and the church as an institution no longer had their sacramental source in the episcopal office but in the secular order of the state. In 1917 the Russian church was able to re-establish the patriarchate of Moscow, and in subsequently coping with the atheist state – and by analogy to the state principle of socialization – it gradually re-discovered the sacramental basis of canon law, first giving expression to this in the synod of 1961.

Today the Orthodox Church of Russia, while declaring the law of the state to be canonical, has re-affirmed the special nature of the law of communion* (the law of grace as koinonia*) over against the secular right of association. On the local level and in its relations with the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, it tackles difficult questions similar to those experienced by the Eastern Catholic churches in their own context: What room must be made for political and national principles in the organization of the church? How are the rights of the Ecumenical Patriarchate to be defined in relation to those of the autocephalous sister church over its own members, especially in the diaspora? What is the specific nature of the unity of the Orthodox churches? Recent work done by the joint Roman Catholic-Orthodox theological commission has happily re-introduced the idea of the sacramental basis of church law, re-discovering in particular the sacramental character of episcopal jurisdiction and the Trinitarian eucharistic basis of the local church.*

The theory underlying the Roman Catholic Codex Juris Canonici of 1917 regards the church as a specific type of “perfect” society, so intended and founded by Christ and requiring law* by its very nature as a society.* The church was thus seen in terms of means and ends, and the ecclesiology of the code expressly favoured an individualist idea of the Christian life and of salvation.* In it Christians as individuals were confronted with a hierarchy that was regarded as extrinsic, and the fact that the church is a fellowship that is Trinitarian in its structure could not be institutionally expressed in the code; it forgot the law of grace.*

Vatican II* brought with it significant shifts. For the ecclesiology of the perfect society, essentially one of inequality, it substituted reciprocity in dignity and common action for the upbuilding of the Body of Christ among all members of the church. It re-discovered the sacramental basis of the episcopate – the basis for the power of order and of jurisdiction – and structurally it restored the importance of synodal practice at all levels of the church.

The code of canon law promulgated in 1983 is a compromise between that of 1917 and the contributions of Vatican II: in it the people of God is the fundamental visible reality of the church as communio, or fellowship, in which the members find themselves for the first time given rights and duties. Within certain limits the laity* are called on to participate widely in ministries contributing to the achievement of the church’s mission.* Synodal practice is implemented in new collegial structures, often of a consultative nature. Ecumenical concern has meant the opening up of various RC structures and institutions to the possibility of exchange and cooperation with equivalents from other churches. There is also the work pursued by the Joint Working Group between the RCC and the WCC.

To sum up generally: a fundamental ecumenical experience has been the re-discovery of canon law both as intrinsic to the Trinitarian communio, which gives the church a structure as a confessing church, and also as expressing itself in sacramental processes with an instituting function. Because institutional law gives expression to the statute or law of grace, it is primary, whereas law as legislation setting up norms comes only second. The “inductive” type of approach makes the local church a primary element of the church, restores the process of “reception”* of the laws to its rightful place and enables custom and jurisprudence to re-discover their legitimate creative capacity. This is an approach which cannot dispense with the gains from ecumenical exchanges among the people of God. If theologians and specialists in the social sciences are actively associated in working out church law, the various churches will then have more opportunities to develop an awareness both of the worldwide environment in which they live together and of the fundamental unity of their mission to proclaim the gospel at the dawn of the 21st century.

CAPITALISM

THE WORD “capital” is found in early economic thought as a description of one of the three principal factors of production, the other two being labour and land. It has generated two particular areas of debate: the economic return attributable to capital and the question of the ownership of capital.

In the neutral sense of the word, “capital” exists in all economic systems. However, the historical debate over economic return and ownership has led to the use of the word – and especially its derivative, “capitalism” – for those forms of economic systems in which most capital is privately owned, in which a return on capital (profit) for its owners is accepted, and in which the pricing mechanism is widely used to balance supply and demand in the market (hence the term “market capitalism”). While there are many variants of the capitalist system, these characteristics broadly separate it from command economies, in which the distribution of income and allocation of resources is determined by a local or a central planning mechanism without significant recourse to the market mechanism.

The economic, social and environmental consequences of this system, both within market capitalist societies and outside them, have been a constant concern at successive assemblies of the WCC, as well as in various Church and Society conferences and in the ecumenical development* debate beginning in the 1970s.

Although the emphases of the critique have changed over time, it has largely centred on three areas: (1) a view of the capitalist system as a whole in relation to the claims of systems based on alternative political precepts, such as communist/socialist systems; (2) an assessment of the workings of the capitalist system itself to see whether it creates injustices or impedes human development, whether its objectives are adequate and the means used to achieve them are fair, and whether its wider social consequences are acceptable; (3) a judgment of the capitalist system against the background of wider social, cultural and environmental issues, e.g. whether the system, which is largely determined by economic ideology, conflicts with wider social values; whether its operation is fair and just to the third world; whether its workings respect the environment; and finally, whether it is possible to formulate a new international economic order less open to criticism. As time passed, the third of these areas came to predominate.

The first assembly of the WCC (Amsterdam 1948) drew attention to the conflict between Christianity and capitalism. It argued that capitalism tended to subordinate what should be the primary task of any economy – meeting human needs – to the economic advantages of those who had most power over its institutions. It also argued that capitalism tended to produce inequalities and encouraged a practical form of materialism (particularly in Western countries, in spite of their Christian background) by placing the greatest emphasis on success in making money. Finally, it drew attention to the way in which the people of capitalist systems suffered from such catastrophes as mass unemployment.* The report concluded that, like communism, laissez-faire capitalism made promises that it could not keep, notably that if the emphasis is put on freedom, justice will follow as a byproduct of free enterprise.

The second assembly report (Evanston 1954) raised the question of the appropriateness of the capitalist system as a model for third-world development, but its main focus was on formulating a critique of the Western system itself. On the whole supportive of the system, it stressed that the church should be ready to welcome new initiatives in state control and industrial organization. The importance of efficient production and fair distribution was underlined, and the sins of waste and laziness were mentioned. The report criticized the existence of monopolies but recognized the contribution of the skilled executive and the virtues of responsible initiative and hard work. It also stressed the need to associate work with human dignity. Evanston warned against the accumulation of riches for their own sake, pressed for equity in distribution, underlined the need for the system to care for the disabled, urged more responsibility on the part of trade unions and drew attention to the need for those formulating national policies to be aware of the international consequences of their actions.

The third assembly (New Delhi 1961) stressed the need to see economic development as a process to create freedom (e.g. from hunger), but questioned whether freedom could be achieved in an economic model built around large-scale organizations. It warned against the danger of the Western capitalist systems creating the concept of an anonymous person and against the risks associated with technology (particularly in destroying freedom). Questioning the objectives of the present dynamic economies, New Delhi argued that the pursuit of maximum production for maximum consumption was no longer acceptable. Objectives based on that principle distorted and debased ethical values and created a society unable to cope with life other than that revolving around work. It also challenged the role of the welfare state in Western capitalist economies. Although recognizing that the welfare state had justifiably grown out of the failures of earlier capitalism, it questioned whether there was now too much security.

The fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968) took an optimistic view of capitalism in the sense of affirming the benefits offered by technology and economic growth but referred pessimistically to the failure of development programmes so far. It argued for an alternative framework based on the admission that the capitalist system had not yet come to terms with technology and had failed to construct workable transfer mechanisms for creating growth in the third world. The importance of the fourth assembly was in its special emphasis on the problems of development, as distinct from the problems inherent within the capitalist system itself.

The fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975) took as its main concern the way in which growth-oriented and affluent capitalist societies unduly dictated the fate of much of the rest of the world, largely by forcing it to adopt similar methods and objectives and similar ethical standards. It thus underlined again the failure of development policies and criticized capitalism for its bad effects in the third world, especially its built-in tendency to exploit others, leading to the uneven distribution of resources. While this exploitation had previously taken place through colonialism, the assembly said, it was now taking place through the operations of transnational corporations.*

Regarding proposals for a new international economic order – an alternative ordering of both national and international economic structures and systems – Nairobi questioned whether such a new order could be introduced without radical change at national levels. It also referred to the argument for limits to growth and particularly emphasized the need to pursue the ideas of the “appropriate technology” movement. It also raised the issue of the stewardship of nature.* (It must be remembered that this assembly took place in the aftermath of the 1973-74 oil price crisis.)

was the need for the church to demonstrate a concern for the poor,* to identify itself with the poor in setting its ecumenical priorities and to learn from the poor, particularly through a simpler life-style. The report set out four key criticisms of the present economic order: (1) calling the rich to repentance from slavery to possessions, (2) denouncing the concentration of goods in the hands of the few, (3) criticizing the arms race as a principal cause of the gap between rich and poor, and (4) commending the task of drawing value insights from poor communities.

The Vancouver report was also critical of technology,* noting its potential to be socially and environmentally destructive and a means of domination. It also argued that new technologies tend to encourage consumerism, are applied apart from any overall planning, are used to support harsh economic policies and, more particularly, have raised important moral and ethical issues, particularly in the field of biotechnology.

Already in 1937 the Life and Work conference on "Church, Community and State" in Oxford listed key criticisms of capitalist countries. First, the capitalist ordering of economic life tends to enhance acquisitiveness and set up false standards of economic and social success. Second, capitalist countries create indefensible inequalities of opportunity for education, leisure and health. The existence of economic classes was seen as an intolerable obstacle to human fellowship. Third, the formation of centres of economic power which are not accountable to any organ of the community produces a tyranny over human lives. Fourth, the forms of employment available to many people (if there are any jobs at all) prevent them from finding a sense of Christian vocation* in their daily lives.

The Church and Society conference (Geneva 1966) welcomed scientific and technological development as an expression of God's creative work by which men and women were helped to be free from unnecessary toil and poorer countries could be aided. But it criticized market capitalist economies for being unable to take adequate account of the long-range needs of society, grasp the advantage of large-scale rationalization, and regulate supply and demand where the market was insensitive to price changes. The capitalist system relied too heavily on the market for income distribution; it was weak at dealing with the production and allocation of public goods. Other issues raised included the ethical problems of consumption, the problems of controlling incomes to avoid inflation, the adjustment of working patterns to meet changing technologies and the adverse consequences of affluent life-styles.

A substantial critique of the market capitalist system came from the Church and Society conference on "Faith, Science and the Future" (MIT, Cambridge, USA, 1979). It attacked the notion of positive economics: the attempt to explain economic behaviour on the basis of a limited number of economic considerations such as revealed choice by individual consumers, free markets in which these choices can be satisfied, and the maximization of profits as a primary tool for allocating resources efficiently. The critique argued that while positive economics recognized that goals were required for the system, it assumed either that these were externally given or that they were embodied in the choices of individuals in the market place. This is too narrow an analytical framework and focuses too much on the individual as the key agent. From a Christian point of view, a more adequate emphasis would be on the concept of person – the difference being the recognition in the Christian view of the individual's social responsibilities. Moreover, positive economics seemed to move inevitably towards emphasis on continuous growth, increased production and capital accumulation. A perspective from political economy, which offered a broader view of economics and linked economic analysis with wider social goals, was commended as a better basis of evaluation.

With the benefit of hindsight, it is evident that the emphases in each of the reports cited in this overview bear a close relationship to issues of wider public concern in the secular world at the time. For example, in the assembly reports of the 1960s the concern over the functioning of the welfare state and the stress on the importance of economic growth reflected the principal issues of debate in the period now commonly regarded as the heyday of post-war economic growth and social democratic planning. In the 1970s, in reaction to the two oil crises, the ecumenical debates concentrated on the problems of finite and depleting resources and raising issues such as sustainability for the world economic and ecological systems. Increasingly, the reports reflected pessimism over the failure of the post-war development movement to evolve a method of closing the gap between the rich and poor countries of the world.

Along the same lines, ecumenical reflection on economics in the 1990s, evident in such WCC study documents as Christian Faith and the World Economy Today and Sign of Peril, Test of Faith: Accelerated Climate Change, can be seen as responses to the radical view of economics and society that has become commonplace in Western societies since 1980, advocating a return to pure laissez-faire economics and overtly commending a libertarian philosophy (whether secular or religious) underpinning the economic model – to the point of asserting that operating in the market is a moral activity and that market capitalism is a necessary basis of a democratic society. Theologically, the ecumenical critique has noted that this system is often presented as a total claim on human life and activity – a “religious” demand that verges on idolatry.

The collapse of the Soviet Union and its empire in the early 1990s seems to have justified the claim of capitalism to be the only possible alternative, while growing poverty* and marginalization in an increasing number of countries raise serious questions about the ability of the system to respond adequately to human need.

The nature and scale of this revolution is reflected in the massive amount of literature written in response. Broadly, this has welcomed the fact that the value presumptions of economic theory are finally being admitted, while arguing that evidence from history and from other regions of the globe demonstrate that there is no unique ideological basis for economic activity. The point is also being made that, no matter how difficult it is, given the pervasive nature of economic activity, it is essential for society at large to lay down the conditions which economic activity must observe. It is for society to set the goals, to select the means, to concern itself with the adverse consequences (such as global warming) and to choose good and reject bad ways of conducting business.

CARIBBEAN

ECUMENICALLY, the term Caribbean is used for the region which includes the islands of the Caribbean sea and several countries in Central and South America which border on the Caribbean. While it is a region of considerable diversity, including linguistic, there is a common history of colonialism, neo-colonialism, imperialism, exploitation and conquest, as well as resistance, dignity and struggle for sovereignty.

The religious background of this region is varied. The indigenous people, most of whom have disappeared (except for those still resident in Dominica and to a lesser extent in Trinidad) because of the harsh treatments meted out to them, had their own religious practices which were discouraged by the settlers who came into the region. The slaves who were subsequently brought into the area from Africa also had their own religions, but many of these rites and practices were also repressed since they were considered by the “historic” churches to be demonic. The European colonizers imposed their Christocentric religions on both the indigenous people and the African slaves, so that outwardly Christianity became the religion of the newly settled colonies. Anglicanism and Catholicism were the major expressions of the faith.

Catholicism emerged where the French and the Spanish colonizers were predominant. This is reflected especially in the French Antilles, Cuba, Trinidad, St Lucia and Dominica. The Church of England gained prominence in the British Antilles. These historic patterns remain much the same today. Other major Christian groups which came into the region, notably the Methodists, Presbyterians, Baptists and Moravians, came as missionary movements from the North.

After the period of slavery, the “indentured” workers brought from India, Java and China (the latter settled in Cuba) came with their own religions from their home countries. Therefore in countries such as Trinidad and Tobago, Surinam and Guyana, there are councils or inter-religious organizations which, from the point of view of the governments of the region, are even more important politically than the Christian councils themselves, since they represent the majority of the population.

In the initial period there was a certain ecumenical relationship among the churches as they worked for the common purpose of looking after the interests of the colonizers, providing education and other services required to maintain the status quo of stratified societies.

The present period in Caribbean religious and social history is marked by an emerging force which is changing the religious landscape of the region: Pentecostalism, one of the fastest growing religions in the region, which is drawing adherents from every sector of society. What was once seen as the poor people’s religion has quickly evolved into a sophisticated high-tech operation, with television and radio programmes covering the entire region. While much of it reflects North American influences, there is an attractiveness to the Pentecostal experience which is causing some concern to the more established churches in the Caribbean. Over the years many members of these churches have left and gone over to Pentecostalism.

The emergence of Pentecostalism in the Caribbean is creating its own pressure for the ecumenical movement in the region. For the most part, these groups have stayed outside the movement, preferring to form their own alliances with denominations with which they have more common interests. In the very few instances where they have joined local ecumenical bodies, they have stayed very much on the fringes. The challenge facing the ecumenical movement in the Caribbean is to find a way of remaining open to these Pentecostal bodies so that they can be afforded the opportunity to be part of the movement, recognizing that their influence on the social, political and economic life of the region will be significant.

Among the challenges the ecumenical movement is facing in the Caribbean, heightened by the effects of globalization, are the financial dependence on countries outside the region, drug trafficking and addiction, AIDS, emigration, cuts in the national budgets for education and health, unemployment, less resources for dealing with natural and ecological disasters, alcoholism, family disintegration, increased foreign debt and a higher cost of living. The churches together are called to overcome these challenges, in the firm belief that “the right hand of God is writing in our land, writing with power and with love”.

CARIBBEAN CONFERENCE OF CHURCHES

THE CARIBBEAN Conference of Churches (CCC) – which grew out of two separate agencies, Christian Action for Development in the Caribbean (CADEC) and Action for the Renewal of the Churches (ARC) – was set up in Kingston, Jamaica, in November 1973, with delegates from 37 churches signing the inaugural document. It is one of three regional ecumenical bodies with Roman Catholic membership (the others are the Pacific and the Middle East). Under the new constitution adopted in Havana in 1997, councils of churches are now accepted as “fraternal members”.

The chief governing body is the general assembly, which meets every five years; in the interim, the Conference is run by a continuation committee. The general secretariat is located in Trinidad, the easternmost Caribbean island, and three sub-regional offices located in Jamaica, Antigua and Trinidad and Tobago have been responsible for administering a number of territories in their area. However, the 1997 assembly also decided that the CCC would have to downsize and it is envisaged that it will operate through councils of churches or other ecumenical bodies in the islands and territories throughout the region.

The CCC's role is to serve the churches in the cause of unity, renewal and joint action; to assist national and local Christian councils to promote consultation and common action; to provide and encourage programmes of study, research and experimentation, in order to help the churches understand the decisive action of God in Christ in terms of their culture, experience and needs; to enable exchange of information and insights between member churches and national and local Christian councils; and to promote collaboration with agencies of the WCC, the Roman Catholic Church and other bodies.

Two media channels, Contact, a monthly newspaper, and "Caribbean", a radio broadcast which reached over 14 regional stations, formerly disseminated information in the region; they have now been replaced by Christian Action, a quarterly newsletter.

A documentation centre with nearly 1000 volumes on topics such as appropriate development, technology, tourism, church and society, women, youth, religion, government and politics, provides research services and is open to students.

Since the CCC comprises 34 member churches in 37 countries and functions in four major language areas, the issue of education is crucial. A textbook on Christian education called Fashion Me a People was designed for use in the churches and, where possible, in the public education system at primary and secondary levels.

The CCC endeavours to analyze the problems of poverty and under-development in the region, identify the contributing factors, assess the capacity of communities to provide solutions from their own resources, and help with funding and training where necessary.

The preamble to the constitution states: "We are... deeply concerned to promote the human liberation of our people, and are committed to the achievement of social justice and the dignity of all persons in our society. We desire to build up together our life in Christ and to share our experience for the mutual strengthening of the kingdom of God in the world." To achieve these objectives, apart from encouraging participation in joint worship and theological endeavour, the CCC through its agencies conducts national surveys, arranges consultations, collaborates with governmental and non-governmental organizations, and develops awareness through television, radio and education programmes.

In 1983 the mandate was formulated to include the "promotion of ecumenism and social change in obedience to Jesus Christ and in solidarity with the poor".

In collaboration with the United Nations Drug Control Programme (UNDCP), the Caribbean Conference has recently launched a Drug Demand Reduction Programme, aimed at greater awareness of the adverse effects of substance abuse and more responsible choices in this regard. It is also involved in the fight against HIV/AIDS, especially among young people, through educational consultations and seminars and the training of counsellors. It is a member of the Caribbean Community's (CARICOM) HIV/AIDS task force. Two other current programmes are uprooted peoples/Targeted Assistance for Montserratian Evacuees in the Caribbean (TAMEC), and disaster management.

The CCC has taken many initiatives in the areas of theology and Christian education, holistic development, youth and women's concerns, family life, human rights and communications. All stem from the assumption that, despite the divisiveness of a long colonial heritage, there is an authentic, unifying Caribbean identity through which Caribbean people must articulate their understanding of God's will for them and make their response to it.

CARITAS INTERNATIONALIS

A CONFEDERATION of 120 national organizations, the primary mission of Caritas Inter-nationalis (CI) is to assist the Roman Catholic Church as a whole to incarnate charity and justice in the world. This action ranges from emergency aid to long-range development, from health and social services for individuals to community organization, from rural outreach to urban centres, from social rehabilitation to prevention, planning and legislative advocacy.

Each national Caritas organization is autonomous; and in many countries the national organization is subdivided into diocesan- and parish-based organizations that work in close collaboration with the local bishops. The national Caritas organizations in turn receive their mandate from the national episcopal conferences. At the same time, Caritas collaborates closely on all levels with religious communities, Catholic lay movements, and others who sponsor similar socio-pastoral services in the community.

The general secretariat, headquartered in the Vatican, has three principal functions: spreading information within and outside the Caritas network, in order to deepen commitment and improve actions in charity and justice; coordination among CI members, especially in emergency projects; international representation of CI members and their joint interests before intergovernmental and other international religious and social service organizations (e.g. UNESCO, Food and Agriculture Organization, Council of Europe); and being strong advocates for the poor with these organizations.

Since Vatican II,* CI has promoted ecumenical collaboration. It was a founding member of the Churches' Drought Action in Africa and a member of the International Ecumenical Consultation Committee for Refugees. On the national and local levels, Caritas organizations often work together with other church partners to provide for essential needs, promote integral human development and advocate on behalf of the voiceless and disenfranchised.

CASTE

CASTE is a social grouping peculiar to Indian society. Varna and jati are two Sanskrit terms for this phenomenon, both translated in English as "caste". Varna (lit. "colour") refers to the classic fourfold division of the traditional society into Brahmins (priests), Kshatriyas (rulers and warriors), Vaisyas (merchants and peasants) and Sudras (workers and servants). This pattern, present in all the descriptions of the caste system, does not fully explain the existence of many thousands of small groups, or jatis (from Sanskrit root jata, meaning "born"), each with its own assigned position in relation to the rest of the groups.

The origin of caste is unknown, and the ambiguity of the term makes understanding the system and phenomenon difficult. A close link between caste and occupational differentiation is quite obvious. Each sub-grouping is assigned a particular job in the village. Inextricably bound up with the system of caste are the concepts of ritual purity and pollution. Some jobs are considered "impure", e.g. scavenging, handling dead animals and working with leather. The sub-castes engaged in these are considered impure and consequently contact with them is thought to pollute a higher-caste person. However, caste is not just based on occupation; and it is more complex than distinctions of race or class, though it shares some of the features of both.

Religion provided some legitimation to the caste system. Mythologies picture the origin of humankind in terms in which caste differentiations are implicit. Rigid prescriptions about food, dress, behaviour, occupation and social distance for each caste were enforced in the name of religion, and ritual fortified and perpetuated these divisions. The doctrines of karma and rebirth, linking faithful performance of one's caste duty in this life to the possibility of upward mobility in successive births, has tempered the severity of the caste system and in a sense justified caste practices in the popular Hindu mind.

Caste is thus a hierarchical system legitimated by tradition and religion, but in effect it functions as a social mechanism by which the dominant groups maintain their power and authority in the village. A harsh concomitant of this system is the marginalization of a section of the population as "casteless" – the "untouchables" who have been exploited for ages in Indian society. Although the inhuman aspects of the caste system are undeniable, in traditional society it did provide a sense of security and a source of a stable order.

From the time of India's independence, its leaders have introduced many legislative, administrative and social measures to end discrimination based on caste. Modern education, secular jobs and migration to urban centres have weakened the caste system in recent times. Dining together and other forms of social intercourse between castes are now fairly common, although intercaste marriages are still relatively rare and violence by upper castes against lower castes is not uncommon. Caste consciousness and caste as an identity principle continue to be strong among Indian people. Caste is a nexus of associative relationships which are reshaped by cultural, religious, psychological and economic factors, and there is no sector of life in India, private or public, that it does not permeate.

Caste has become one of the main organizing principles for the collective struggle of people for their rights. Considerations of caste have a great deal of influence in politics, and caste itself is being politicized. In a democracy, where numbers count, smaller sub-castes are merged into larger units and act as pressure groups. While the higher castes organize to consolidate their power, the lower castes and untouchables use their caste base for militant struggles for justice.

Gandhi used the term harijan (lit. "people of God") for untouchables and lower-caste people, but many of them reject it, calling themselves dalit. Dalit Christians have developed their own liberation theology – dalit theology – and have been organizing themselves to secure greater recognition in church and society. One of the incentives for converting to Christianity, Islam or, to a lesser extent, Buddhism has been the desire to escape caste-based discriminations. However, the caste ethos is so pervasive that it has made inroads into other religions, including Islam and Christianity. All the main religious divisions of India have in some way been affected by status evaluation based on the pollution concept. In the state of Kerala, for instance, separate churches have been formed for converts to Christianity from lower castes. Obviously, such divisions have an adverse effect on the fellowship in the church.

Studies on caste and its manifestations in the church and in society at large by the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society (Bangalore) have revealed several new trends in caste relationships as a result of the system's adaptability and demonstrated the deep influence of caste on the life of the churches in many parts of India. WCC studies on racial and ethnic relations in the 1960s did not deal with the issue of caste. In the 1970s, with the launching of the Programme to Combat Racism,* some interest was shown in the issue, but it was not followed up. The sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983) mentioned caste as part of the "web of oppression and injustice", along with racism, sexism and class domination, in addressing the issue of "Struggling for Justice and Human Dignity". Subsequently, the Council played an active role in supporting the development of a solidarity movement among dalits in India, and in seeking to draw the attention of the churches internationally to this issue.

CASTRO, EMILIO

B. 2 May 1927, Montevideo, Uruguay. Following a period as director of the WCC's commission on World Mission and Evangelism, 1973-83, Castro became WCC general secretary, 1985-92. He studied at Union Theological Seminary, Buenos Aires, 1944-50, and was ordained in the Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay in 1948. Under a WCC scholarship, he pursued post-graduate work in Basel in 1953-54 under the guidance of Karl Barth. Returning to Latin America, he was pastor of Methodist churches in La Paz, Bolivia, 1954-56, and in Montevideo, Uruguay, 1957-65. His church and ecumenical activities have been numerous: in Latin America, he has served as professor of contemporary theological thought at the Mennonite Seminary, Montevideo, 1959-64; chairman of the Fellowship of Christians and Jews, Uruguay, 1962-66; coordinator of the Commission for Evangelical Unity in Latin America (UNELAM), 1965-72; executive secretary of the South American Association of Theological Schools, 1966-69; and president of the Evangelical Methodist Church of Uruguay, 1970-72. Elsewhere, his ecumenical responsibilities have been with the Christian Peace Conference as vice-president, 1964-68, and as member of its working committee, 1968-69; and with the Agency for Christian Literature Development as chairman, 1970-72. He received a doctoral degree from the University of Lausanne in 1984. His attendance at many conferences has included the WCC assemblies of 1961 and 1968, the Life and Mission conference of the World Student Christian Federation in Strasbourg, and the 1966 Church and Society conference in Geneva.

CATECHESIS

CATECHESIS, used in the New Testament only in its verbal form, refers to oral teaching about the faith.* Later, it came to be applied to the specific teaching given to those preparing for baptism* (catechumens) or recently admitted into membership of the church.* Catechesis included the essential elements of the doctrine, liturgy and life of the church: the Apostles' Creed,* the commandments, the sacraments* and prayers (esp. the Lord's prayer). As the practice of infant baptism became more common, the institution of catechesis disappeared, but slowly a special instruction for children developed. This led in turn to the codification of such instruction in books known as catechisms,* especially at the time of the Reformation, e.g. Luther's small catechism (1529), the Heidelberg catechism (1563), and the catechism of the council of Trent (1566). Within Orthodoxy there was The Orthodox Confession of the Catholic and Apostolic Eastern Church (mid-17th century). While some of these catechisms are still in use today, many churches have felt the need for modern catechisms that would meet more directly the needs and questions of both children and adults.

Catechesis can be a means of perpetuating the division among the churches but can also contribute to the growth of their unity* and communion.* The synod of bishops (Rome 1977) on catechesis in our time insisted that catechesis must create and foster a true desire for unity and facilitate involvement in the ecumenical movement. Such catechesis would enable people "to understand better those Christians who belong to other churches or ecclesial communities while also preparing them for dialogue and fraternal relations with them". Or it could involve a teaching which emphasizes agreements and common witness,* rather than particular denominational understandings of faith.

Several churches now have such common catechetical programmes for Sunday and day schools which aim to bring to the fore agreements and not disagreements, common witness and not divided witness. Distinctions are being made strictly for interpreting church history rather than for characterizing the present situation. This common catechetical material is not always a sign of growing mutual understanding, acknowledgment and collaboration of churches which have been separated for centuries; rather, it is in some cases a response to pressure from a government or society for a common Christian witness* (e.g. in Kenya and Ghana). Others are unofficial statements of faith in catechetical form like the Common Catechism: A Christian Book of Faith (1975), by Roman Catholics and Protestants. How far the agreement reached in Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* will have consequences for the teaching of the churches and for their catechesis of baptism or eucharist is still uncertain.

CATECHISM

IN THE FIRST centuries of the church, the term "catechism" referred to the process or method of instruction for catechumens on their way to baptism;* later it was extended to encompass religious instruction in general, making the term largely co-extensive with "catechesis".* In the 16th century, however, "catechism" became identified almost exclusively with manuals of instruction in the basics of the Christian faith. In book form, the catechism became the primary instrument of religious education. Short catechetical summaries of faith are as old as the church, and some manuals were certainly used for catechizing in the middle ages, but not until the time of the Reformation (and the invention of the printing press) did catechisms proper flourish.

HISTORY, NATURE, USE

Attempts at manuals for instruction prior to Luther include the Children's Questions of the Bohemian Brethren (1502) and the Catechismus of Andreas Althamer (1528), the first book actually to carry the title "Catechism". But it was the two classic catechisms of Luther (small catechism, 1529; large catechism, 1530) which opened the floodgates for the proliferation of these catechetical manuals. The context of Luther's catechisms was clearly homiletical: they grew out of his preaching and were supposed to be used for and in connection with the sermon. These two catechisms themselves became the basis of many others. Reformed catechisms followed soon after, among them those of Martin Bucer (1537), John Calvin (1537, 1541-42), and Heinrich Bullinger (1561).

As the number of catechisms grew, their subject matter also expanded. The traditional core material of the catechisms consists of the creed, the ten commandments, the Lord's prayer and teachings on the sacraments (and, for the Roman Catholic tradition, the Hail Mary) – core elements of the church's doctrine, worship and life. Catechisms, however, rapidly became more and more detailed: Bullinger's Reformed catechism of 1561 contained nearly 300 questions, Joseph Deharbe's famous Catholic Catechism of 1847 had 750. Catechisms typically presented their material in question-and-answer form, with the student expected to memorize the answers.

Catechisms could thus serve both as a book of instruction for the catechized and as a manual for the catechist. Some Reformation catechisms were also clearly designed as confessions of faith and doctrinal statements and as such became part of the confessional documents (Bekenntnisschriften) of a particular tradition, as is the case with the Heidelberg catechism of 1563, Luther's two catechisms, which were included in the Book of Concord (1580), and the two catechisms compiled by the Westminster assembly (1643-53) (the shorter has been in regular use among Presbyterian, Congregationalist and Baptist churches). The Anglican Book of Common Prayer included a catechism before the confirmation service; it was used in the preparation for confirmation.

Roman Catholic catechisms flourished in the 16th century in response to the challenges of the Reformation. Those of Peter Canisius and Robert Bellarmine enjoyed a wide reception; and in 1566 the Catechismus Romanus, written under order from the council of Trent,* was published as a teaching instrument for parish priests.

As the number of catechisms grew and their subject matter expanded, apologetics began to play an increasingly important part. Catechisms became more and more consciously confessional, spelling out in detail the particular identity of one ecclesial tradition over against others. Often, catechisms came to be simplified compendia of scholastic theology. The emphasis lay clearly on intellectual adherence to a set of doctrinal propositions. (That catechisms were used not only for religious instruction can be seen by the fact that some of them contained alphabet primers or Latin grammars.) Yet despite the "confessionalism" of most catechisms, some ecumenical borrowing did take place: the Jesuit Edmond Auger, for example, consciously modelled his 1563 catechism on Calvin's catechetical work.

With Christianity's entry into non-Western countries, European catechisms were often simply transplanted directly. In some cases, translations into indigenous languages came within the first generation of mission work: in 1582-83 the third council of Lima provided for the translation of a catechism into the indigenous languages of Quechua and Aymara. In the early period of Jesuit missionary outreach in Japan, adaptations in content and language style to the Japanese culture were attempted – while at the same time a Latin guidebook for catechists was published under the title Catechismus Christianae Fidei in Quo Secta Japonenses Confutantur. Catechisms were never without culturally conditioned presuppositions (and weaknesses): in the USA, the Anglican "catechism to be used by the teachers in the religious instruction of persons of colour" from 1837 taught slaves very clearly that their state was ordained by God and that they should be content in it.

Both in Europe and the New World, catechisms were the prime instrument of religious education for nearly 400 years. With the introduction of compulsory education in the 18th and 19th centuries, the main use of catechisms came to be for religious education in schools; the method of learning remained that of memorizing and reciting the text. The Eastern churches generally remained without catechisms, except under Western influence (see e.g. the catechism of Metropolitan Platon of Moscow, d.1812).

CURRENT SITUATION

The 20th-century rethinking of catechesis and renewal in catechetical methods led to a new approach and orientation in the nature and use of catechisms. The traditional scholastic compendium gave way to a veritable flood of new catechisms which take account of the anthropological foundations and cultural context of faith as well as the biblical-narrative core of the depositum fidei and the liturgical life of the church. Most have moved away from the standard question-and-answer format to a more narratival, participatory and situation-oriented approach. Current catechisms typically adapt their structure, content and pedagogical techniques to the age group they are addressing and its psychological make-up. Catechisms for children, for example, generally use very simple language and a variety of images, stories and songs.

A clear innovation was the publication of the so-called Dutch catechism in 1966. This Roman Catholic catechism for adults is structured around two foci: the concrete situations and questions of life, and the witness of faith. This dialogical approach of relating human experience and the good news seems to have found acceptance in many catechisms over a broad range of ecclesial traditions. The German Evangelischer Gemeindekatechismus (1979; US ed., Evangelical Catechism, 1982) begins with human experience, then moves to information, reflection, discussion and personal appropriation. It includes pictures, meditative texts, prayers and songs from a variety of ecclesial, geographical and cultural backgrounds. Vamos Caminando (the English sub-title calls it "A Peruvian Catechism") is even more situation-oriented. With a clear view towards liberating conscientization, it starts with reflections on the daily life of campesinos in the northern Andes and evidences great appreciation for the local cultural context and its importance in the growth of faith. In this respect, it is typical of new catechisms in non-Western contexts, which are more often governed by basic life themes than by doctrinal concerns. There are, however, also catechisms which move in a more conservative direction: the 1986 catechism of the British Methodist church, for example, maintains the traditional question-and-answer format. The new Catechism of the Catholic Church (1993) takes its structure from the traditional division into doctrine, sacraments and commandments; it is intended as a reference book for national and diocesan catechisms.

An ecumenical Protestant-Catholic catechetical venture, edited by J. Feiner and L. Vischer, was published in 1973 under the title Neues Glaubensbuch, but catechisms on the whole have not been an area of extensive ecumenical initiative. With the growth of ecumenical commitment, however, polemics against other churches have been eliminated from most catechisms. Apologetic emphases have also given way to a renewed concentration on the basics of Christian doctrine, worship and life. (There are, of course, exceptions; e.g. the recent edition of A. Makrakis's The Sacred and Holy Catechesis of the Orthodox Church as Taught by the Holy Spirit and His Solemn Instruments from the Day of Pentecost to the Last Ecumenical Council, 1885, 2nd ed. 1969.)

FUTURE DIRECTIONS

A concrete outcome of the Faith and Order convergence document Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* and the study "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today" could perhaps be something like a "Basic Ecumenical Catechism", which could serve as a model and reference book for denominational catechisms. A number of fundamental questions related to the very nature of catechisms would need to be faced in undertaking such a venture, however. Catechisms are instruments for the transmission and explication of the faith. For most ecclesial traditions, they do not belong to the symbols of faith themselves. Moreover, they clearly presuppose a book culture. Thus in primarily oral cultures, with clearly established patterns of oral teaching, they may not be the most helpful tool for the faithful transmission of the gospel. Furthermore, in a post-book culture, as is beginning to appear in certain sub-cultures of the West, a catechism may not be a helpful tool either – for very different reasons. The fundamental question facing the churches is: What will best serve the transmission of the faith in the diversity of the one-church-to-be in the ages to come?

CATHOLIC BIBLICAL FEDERATION

THE CATHOLIC Biblical Federation (CBF) is a world fellowship of administratively distinct international and local Roman Catholic organizations committed to biblical-pastoral ministry. The CBF is responsible to the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity* (formerly SPCU).

Because the Second Vatican Council* had required that "easy access to sacred scripture be provided for all the Christian faithful" (Dei Verbum 22), Cardinal Augustin Bea, SPCU president, set up an SPCU office for common Bible work. In 1968 he convened a meeting of representatives of Catholic biblical associations, episcopal biblical commissions and religious publishing houses; on their urging, the SPCU, under its new president Cardinal Johannes Willebrands, founded in 1969 the World Catholic Federation for the Biblical Apostolate. In 1990 its name was changed to Catholic Biblical Federation.

In supporting the work of Catholic organizations for biblical-pastoral ministry, the CBF promotes translations and distribution of the scriptures; use, understanding and study of the Bible among clergy and laity; and pastoral care solidly founded on the scriptures. It also organizes, assists and maintains coordination centres for biblical-pastoral ministry and interdiocesan and international sharing of biblical courses, study materials and lectures. It cooperates in matters of mutual concern with the United Bible Societies and with organizations of other churches (see Bible Societies).

The CBF has two membership categories: full members are organizations officially entrusted by bishops conferences; associate members are other Catholic organizations in the biblical-pastoral ministry. Headquartered in Stuttgart, Germany, the CBF has 90 full members and 215 associate members in 126 countries. Its quarterly Bulletin Dei Verbum appears in English, French, German and Spanish. Its fifth plenary assembly was held in 1996 in Hong Kong.

CATHOLIC CONFERENCE FOR ECUMENICAL QUESTIONS

IN APPLICATION of the 1949 letter of the Holy Office Ecclesiae Catholicae, which permitted Catholic experts, with the approval of their local bishop, to participate in discussions “on faith and morals”, Johannes Willebrands and Frans Thijssen travelled through Europe to enlist RC theologians, historians, biblical scholars, liturgists and missiologists in taking seriously Protestant and Orthodox ecumenical efforts, especially WCC faith and order issues. With the approval of Rome, they founded the Catholic Conference for Ecumenical Questions (CCEQ) – at that time, Europe’s only transnational organization of Catholic scholars.

With a fluctuating list of 70-80 scholars, the CCEQ held nine study meetings in the 1950s and early 1960s: in Fribourg (Switzerland, 1952), Utrecht (1953), Mainz (1954), Paris (1955), Chevotogne (1957), Paderborn (1959), Gazzada (1960), Strasbourg (1961) and Gazzada (1963). Between meetings, an executive committee coordinated relations with the WCC and the different Vatican authorities. The president was Cardinal Willebrands, and his contact person in the Vatican, designated by Pius XII, was the Jesuit Augustin Bea.

The WCC’s general secretary, W.A. Visser ‘t Hooft, met often in confidence with his fellow Dutchman Willebrands. The WCC was able to turn to the CCEQ for advice, reports and studies. For example, the CCEQ prepared documents on the major themes of the Evanston (1954) and New Delhi (1961) WCC assemblies.

From this network of scholars came the original staff of Pope John XXIII’s Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, with Willebrands as the secretary, and most of its first body of consultants. Many CCEQ members were among the key drafters of several Vatican II documents, e.g. Yves Congar, Charles Moeller, Gustave Thils, Jérôme

Hamer, Balthasar Fischer, Karl Rahner, Johannes Feiner, Maurice Bévenot, Pierre Duprey and Emmanuel Lanne.

CATHOLICITY

LIKE THE TERM “Christianity”, “catholicity” is still an “essentially contested concept”. It has been claimed exclusively by Roman Catholics, some of whom have believed in the past that Roman was a fifth “mark” of the church in addition to the four traditional ones, i.e. one, holy, catholic and apostolic; Cardinal Bellarmine (1542-1621) thought the term “catholic” had been a synonym for “Roman” since at least the 12th century. On the other hand, Luther wanted to replace “catholic” with “Christian” in the translations of the classical Christian creeds,* as if the word had been spoiled by Rome’s departure from classical catholicity in introducing innovations not legitimated by the scriptures. The quality of catholicity has also been claimed by Anglo-Catholics as well as the advocates of Reformed Catholicity (e.g. in the Netherlands Reformed Church in the 1950s). Protestant advocates of Reformed Catholicity have been criticized as “Romanizers”; while puritans, evangelicals and liberals alike have argued that Roman “catholicity” is “a legalistic religion in which divine authority was falsely claimed for human ecclesiastical regulations”. Eastern Orthodoxy tends to understand the concept of catholicity in terms of the “fullness” of life received by way of the apostolic and patristic church. At the first assembly of the WCC in 1948, fundamental differences were noted between member churches which were “Catholic” and those which were “Protestant”: the former emphasized “the visible continuity of the church in the apostolic succession of the episcopate”, the latter “the initiative of the word of God* and the response of faith,* focused on the doctrine of justification* sola fide (by faith alone)”.

To remove “catholicity” from the sphere of ecclesiastical politics and theological dispute which has been its main context for about 1000 years, it is necessary to understand more precisely how this concept has been used in the past and to see how it is being re-defined and re-applied in the ecumenical process today.

HISTORICAL ANALYSIS OF THE CONCEPT

The adjective “catholic” is derived from the Greek adverbial phrase kath’ holou: “in general”, “universal”, “on the whole”, as opposed to what is particular, individual or partial. It also denotes “completeness” (the sense preferred by the Orthodox churches). Other than in Acts 4:18 (where it appears in the negative expression “not to speak at all”), the term is not used in the New Testament: hence the reluctance of Christians who reject non-biblical doctrines and non-biblical concepts to use it in practice. For most Christians, however, its use is legitimated by its occurrence in the Apostles’ Creed* and the so-called Nicene Creed.*

As early as the 2nd century the term was used to distinguish between the catholic epistles (which were addressed to the whole of the church) and letters written to individuals or to local churches. The catholic church was also conceived to be co-extensive with the whole of the world (the oikoumene): “the whole catholic church throughout the inhabited world” (Martyrdom of Polycarp 8.1). “Catholicity” almost always carried with it a qualitative meaning, and a normative sense attaches to it: “Wherever Christ Jesus is, there is the catholic church” (Ignatius, Letter to the Smyrnaeans 8.2). As early as about 150 it meant truly orthodox with respect to doctrines and beliefs. “Catholic” now denoted the one true church, as opposed to all other heretical or schismatic bodies (see heresy, schism). This notion was further strengthened during the conflicts with the Gnostics and Donatists.

All these nuances can be found together as early as 350, e.g. in the catechetical lectures of Cyril of Jerusalem: “The church is called catholic because it is spread throughout the world, from end to end of the earth; also because it teaches universally and completely all the doctrines which man should know concerning things visible and invisible, heavenly and earthly; and also because it subjects to right worship all mankind, rulers and ruled, lettered and unlettered; further because it treats and heals universally every sort of sin committed by soul and body, and possesses in itself every conceivable virtue, whether in deeds, words or in spiritual gifts of every kind” (lecture 18).

Universal extension, soundness of doctrine, adaptation to the needs of all sorts and conditions of men and women, together with moral and spiritual perfection – all are combined here to demonstrate what the complex concept of catholicity entails. A similar statement is found in the Commonitorium of Vincent of Lérins (before 450): “Within the catholic church itself the greatest care must be taken that we hold that which has been believed everywhere, always and by all. For this is truly and properly catholic, as the very force and effect of the word declares, which includes all things with practical universality. But this will be found precisely in this way, if we follow that which is universal, that which is ancient and that about which there is consent.”

Here, the notion of development of doctrine (which Newman subsequently applied to legitimate later Roman Catholic doctrinal innovations) is not entirely excluded, because there must also be progress in understanding, in knowledge, in wisdom. In the middle ages, however, there was little development with respect to the notion of catholicity, as these comments of Thomas Aquinas on the Apostles’ Creed demonstrate: “The church is catholic, i.e. universal, first with respect to place, because it is everywhere in the world... Secondly, the church is universal with respect to the state of men, because no one is rejected, whether master or slave, male or female... Thirdly, it is universal with respect to time. For some have said that the church should last until a certain time, but this is false, because the church began from the time of Abel and will last until the end of the world... [But] after the close of the age it will remain in heaven.”

However, Roman Catholics began to emphasize that “whoever does not agree with the Roman church is not to be considered Catholic” (a proposition stated explicitly by Pope Gregory VII in 1075). This position later allowed “Protestant” and “Catholic” to develop into antitheses when Protestants no longer agreed with Catholics, especially in Protestant circles which believed Roman Catholicism to be the cult of the antichrist* and in Reformed churches which abandoned such traditional structures as episcopacy.* The Orthodox churches also contested communion* with Rome as a criterion of catholicity, although some became "Uniate churches" by accepting the universal jurisdiction of the pope. Anglicans and some Lutherans, however, continued to accept the classical catholicity of the early church, while insisting that the Reformation was also necessary. Thus Melanchthon's De Ap- pellatione Ecclesiae Catholicae: "It is one thing to be called Catholic, something else to be really Catholic. Those are truly called Catholic who embrace the doctrine of the truly Catholic Church, i.e. that which is supported by the witness of all time, of all ages, which believes what the prophets and apostles taught, and which does not tolerate factions, heresies and heretical assemblies. We must all be Catholic, i.e. embrace this word which the rightly thinking church holds, separate from, and untangled with, sects warring against that Word."

Despite the schisms between East and West, Rome and the Reformation, a number of moderates in most Protestant groups and in the mainstream of Counter-Reformation Catholicism continually strove to reunite the divided churches by retrieving the classical understanding of catholicity before agreement with the see of Rome developed into a criterion of genuine catholicity and before Christianity was equated with the position adopted by the Roman Catholic Church (RCC). A statement of the irenic position is found in an Anglican report on "Catholicity" (1947): "In our divided Christendom we do not believe that any existing institution or group of institutions gives a full and balanced representation of the true and primitive catholicity. It is the recovery of the principles of that catholicity which is our quest."

But it was quite impossible to reunite divided churches as long as the RCC insisted that full communion with an unreformed papacy and agreement with the whole of Roman Catholic teaching were acid tests of genuine catholicity. For example, when Anglo-Catholics such as Edward Pusey began to advocate a dialogue with Rome, the holy office issued the following declaration in 1864: "No other church is Catholic except that which is built on the one individual Peter, and which grows up into one body closely joined and knitted together in the unity of faith and love." The response of the RCC to the ecumenical appeals by the patriarch of Constantinople and by the Anglican bishops in 1920, to the first meeting of Life and Work in 1925 and of Faith and Order in 1927, and to the semi-official Anglican-Roman Catholic conversations at Malines, in Belgium, in the early 1920s was negative (as is shown by the encyclical Mortalium Animos of 6 Jan. 1928). Nevertheless, at least some Roman Catholics were already willing to enter into a dialogue with non-Catholics in order to reunite divided churches. The main question was: When could such unofficial and semi-official contacts become official? And when would the RCC itself respond positively to the ecumenical imperative? This was eventually a two-sided process, because many Protestants remained unwilling to engage in ecumenical dialogue with the RCC before it had given clear indications that it was also willing to reform itself. This did not happen until the Second Vatican Council.*

In 1928 Karl Barth published an essay on "Roman Catholicism: A Question to the Protestant Church", in which he argued that Protestantism must allow itself to be critically questioned by Roman Catholicism. Barth believed that Roman Catholics, unlike liberal Protestants, had not abandoned the substance of the Christian faith. If forced to choose between Friedrich Schleiermacher, Albrecht Ritschl and Ernst Troeltsch on the one hand and Roman Catholicism on the other, Barth would choose the latter. Nevertheless, Roman Catholicism had failed to make the church subservient to the word of God. Like Protestant modernism, Roman Catholicism had ultimately made the church dependent upon itself. Paul Tillich would argue that "the Protestant principle" must ultimately be united with "Catholic substance". On the Roman Catholic side, moreover, Louis Bouyer argued in the late 1950s that the positive principles of the Reformation (such as the primacy of divine grace, the justifying power of faith, the unique mediation of Christ in the process of salvation* and the total sovereignty of God) could indeed be interpreted in a Catholic sense.

CATHOLICITY IN CONCILIAR AND POST-CONCILIAR ECUMENISM

The Second Vatican Council nuanced the Counter-Reformation understanding of Catholicism in a remarkable way. In Lumen Gentium (8) catholicity is no longer assumed to be Roman Catholicism pure and simple, but is treated primarily as an attribute of the church of Christ, which subsists in the RCC. The fullness of catholicity can be obtained only in full communion with Rome. But this does not imply that churches not in communion with Rome have not preserved at least some of the essential qualities of catholicity.

The Vatican II Decree on Ecumenism* states explicitly that essential features of Catholicism have been preserved in churches such as the Anglican communion and Orthodoxy (13,18). The entire heritage of the Orthodox churches "belongs to the full catholic and apostolic character of the church". It is also admitted that divisions in the church "prevent the church from effecting the fullness of catholicity", which makes it difficult for the church to express its "full catholicity". Furthermore, the manifold variety of local churches "with one aspiration" (i.e. which share the same purpose) constitutes evidence for the catholicity of the undivided church. Legitimate differences no longer impede full catholic unity: indeed, they actually "enrich and strengthen it" (13, 23). On this basis, A. Dulles has stated that Vatican II conceives catholicity in the mode of "reconciled diversity".* The main question now is whether practice will eventually confirm the theory.

In 1968 an 18-member joint theological commission, half Roman Catholics, half representatives of the WCC, produced a document on "Catholicity and Apostolicity". Its most important emphases are on pneumatology and Christology. The church attains catholicity to the extent that it expresses the truth and charity of Christ and the Holy Spirit. The full manifestation of catholicity, moreover, will not occur until the return of Christ in glory, which also adds an important eschatological dimension to the notion of catholicity. Four aberrations were signalled: the restriction of communion to certain races, nations or social classes; the formation of sects or parties within the body of the church; denominational pride to the detriment of others; and the misuse of the concept of catholicity in order to legitimate doctrines and practices which are not congruent with the Christian identity.

This is consistent with the report presented to the WCC's fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968) on "The Holy Spirit and the Catholicity of the Church". The gulf between Catholic and Protestant is now much less apparent than it was in 1948 at Amsterdam. Catholicity is defined as "the quality by which the church expresses the fullness, the integrity, and the totality of life in Christ". It is argued that catholicity cannot be separated from the notions of unity, holiness and apostolicity. There must also be a balance between continuity and renewal. Finally, in the ecumenical process, the church of Christ might achieve an even broader catholicity. "The purpose of Christ is to bring people of all times, of all races, of all places, of all conditions, into an organic and living unity in Christ by the Holy Spirit under the universal fatherhood of God. This unity is not solely external; it has a deeper, internal dimension, which is also expressed by the term 'catholicity'. Catholicity reaches its completion when what God has already begun in history is finally disclosed and fulfilled."

No one suggests, though, that Christians should simply wait passively until the second coming or until the end of time in order to create the right kind of catholicity in this world of space and time.

CENTRAL AMERICA

FOR YEARS ecumenism in Central America has not been a living experience, largely due to the type of Protestantism found there and the political convulsions that have racked the region since the 1960s. The last two decades have been marked by armed conflicts in pursuit of a just, alternative model of society, and militarization in the region has reached new heights. Nicaragua, El Salvador and Guatemala have been the scene of cruel struggles, which have been played out between the dynamic of hope and the reality of death and destruction.

A conservative ideological background in both society and church has blocked the acceptance of the presuppositions of the various ecumenically oriented movements, especially as the avant-garde organizations clearly question the social and ecclesiastical status quo. Because the conservatives, especially with the support of North American Protestantism, are more concerned with perpetuating their own institutions than with church cooperation, any ecumenical endeavour is considered dangerous, and the very word "ecumenical" is taboo.

The political situation and the struggles for change and social transformation have brought to light two attitudes among Christians in the region: involvement in the struggles and a clear option for change on the one hand, and absolute rejection of such efforts on the other. Ecumenical experiences in the region live with the same tension and consequently ecumenism is not among the priorities on any church agenda.

Three attitudes towards the ecumenical movement are discernible. First is outright opposition because the WCC is perceived as doctrinally deviant and politically leftist. This may be the majority position. A second attitude is openness to ecumenical issues, while carefully avoiding involvement in ecumenical activities or even using the word "ecumenical". This is the stance of the evangelical and socially "progressive" churches which are trying to protect those small spaces for cooperation and unity that have been won with considerable effort. Meanwhile, they are attempting to re-educate their congregations towards a better understanding of Christian unity: an excellent example of this effort is a pamphlet published by the Baptist Association of El Salvador. A third attitude is that of the official representatives and staff of regional and national ecumenical organizations: they proceed with their business with little concern for what the very conservative churches think about them.

The anti-ecumenical attitudes of the Protestant missions are in part in reaction to the historic churches. They were also influenced by their experiences of mission fields such as Asia and Africa. The decision of the Edinburgh conference of 1910 to exclude Latin America from the legitimate fields for Protestant mission was in variance with the vision of the evangelical and revivalist churches in the USA. To further their missionary strategy towards Latin America, these churches worked towards greater cooperation among themselves, and their efforts culminated in the Panama congress of 1916. However, actions did not match the rhetoric. The extreme individualism (and messianic self-awareness) of 19th-century US Protestant missions worked rather towards intensifying the differences. With few exceptions, their doctrinal tenets caused them to disparage the Catholic church for obscurantism and thus to paint the region in sombre colours: Latin America was a land of darkness and its people ignorant; what these countries needed was "the light of the Protestant gospel".

CATHOLIC-PROTESTANT DIALOGUE

If by ecumenism we mean a meeting of minds between the various confessions, then ecumenicity is non-existent in Central America. It has taken place neither at the ecclesiastical level nor by the initiative of the national evangelical alliances. Both the Catholic and the Protestant hierarchies have proceeded with their separate agendas, maintaining an ideological intolerance that has excluded the possibility of any kind of intrafaith dialogue.* The Roman Catholic Church, because of historical precedence, claims the right to control the religious needs of the people. Protestant churches consider themselves sent by God to re-evangelize the people with a purer and more practical gospel. These conflicting starting points account for Roman Catholic attempts to destroy the early Protestant movement in Central America, as well as for the pugnacious attitude of many Protestant missionaries.

The late 1960s and early 1970s saw various short-lived ecumenical and evangelical cooperative movements. On the ecumenical side, the best known was the Unión Evangélica Latinoamericana (UNELAM), whose first secretary was Emilio Castro. It was the fore-runner of the Latin American Council of Churches* (CLAI). The most successful evangelical movement was the Evangelism in Depth programme of the Latin American Mission, with headquarters in Costa Rica. For periods of about a year in each case, virtually every Protestant church and agency in Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala and Honduras worked together in a concerted programme of "saturation evangelism". From there the programme moved to several South American countries and to other parts of the world. However, there was never a willingness by the participating churches to engage in dialogue with the Catholic church.

After a period of stand-off since Vatican II,* relations with the Catholic church have worsened in recent years. For the most part, non-dialogue continues to be the rule in an era when Catholicism is losing ground and Protestant churches and groups are growing. This same phenomenon, however, has contributed to polarization within Protestantism itself.

Pentecostalism is present in a variety of forms in Central America. Its rapid growth has highlighted a number of questions, both for the historical Protestant churches and for the Roman Catholic Church. The Pentecostal phenomenon is another of the ecumenical challenges in the region; these churches have made an important contribution to the ecumenical movement in some countries (see Pentecostals).

Not everything has been negative. Outstanding Catholic and Protestant leaders have taken the risk of stepping across the boundaries of prejudice to engage in dialogue. Two early exponents of ecumenical dialogue were R. Kenneth Strachan, general secretary of the Latin American Mission and founder of Evangelism in Depth, and Augusto Cotto, a Baptist pastor in El Salvador. In 1964 Strachan discussed mission and evangelism with the staff of the WCC and its Commission on World Mission and Evangelism in the pages of the International Review of Mission. He also met with Catholics in a televised debate on Vatican II. More recently, other noteworthy Central American Protestants have taken similar risks. Outstanding in the Catholic church was Archbishop Oscar Arnulfo Romero. He did not hesitate to engage in dialogue with Baptists, Lutherans and other Protestants who shared his concerns over the political crisis in El Salvador.

Some efforts at intra-Protestant dialogue have been encouraged by the Confraternidad Evangélica Latinoamericana (CONELA) as well as by CLAI.

While efforts to involve the Central American churches in an ecumenical dialogue have not been successful, the work done by CLAI nevertheless deserves to be mentioned, notably its contribution to peace and to the development of Central American ministries. Outstanding here is a movement called Pastores y Pastoras Mesoamericanos, which seeks to encourage the churches to include on their agenda concrete action for reconciliation, women's participation, ecumenical dialogue, liturgical renewal, and so on.

At the end of the 1980s and the beginning of the 1990s, peace processes began in some countries in the region, first El Salvador and Nicaragua and subsequently Guatemala. This period saw an increase in interdenominational activities which, though not calling themselves ecumenical, did contribute in various ways to the life of the region. Numerous pastoral letters were sent, the divorce between faith and politics was largely overcome, and Protestants began to play a greater part in political life.

UNITY AMID TRAGEDY

The ecumenical spirit has sprung to life in Central America, paradoxically, in the midst of death. It is significant that the human suffering caused by natural disasters (hurricanes and earthquakes) has given rise to signs of true ecumenicity. While some of this response has been ephemeral, much has endured in every Central American country.

The region is highly vulnerable, and the handling of emergencies has been a recurring theme on the ecumenical agenda in recent years. The churches are usually the first port of refuge in cases of disaster so that training in preparedness for emergencies is important. During the 1990s considerable efforts were made, on a more or less ecumenical basis, for reconstruction in Central America, needed on many fronts: the effects of war, natural disasters, infrastructures and mental health. Institutions which may be mentioned are CEPAD in Nicaragua, set up after the earthquake in Managua in 1972, and CEDEN in Honduras, put in place after hurricane Fifi in 1974.

Ecumenical agencies that have been influential in South America have generally not been too significant in Central America. One reason may be that their agenda is too far ahead of the churches. These movements are largely directed from outside, and local participation in their activities, for the most part, does not represent church bodies. It may be too early to evaluate the impact of home-grown ecumenical agencies. Several, however, are worthy of mention. The Junta Evangélica de Servicio Social, long since suppressed by the army, was founded in Guatemala by lay theologian Julia Esquivel. The ex-Seminario Bíblico Latinoamericano, now Universidad Bíblica Latinoamericana, and the Departamento Ecueménico de Investigaciones, both of Costa Rica, the Centro Inter-Eclesial de Estudios Teológicos y Sociales in Nicaragua, with emphasis on theological education and development, the Comisión Cristiana de Desarrollo in Honduras, and the Conference of Evangelical Churches of Guatemala are only a few of the many ecumenical agencies in the region.

Especially worth noting is the formation of the Comunidad Cristiana Mesoamericana (CCM), which groups together the ecumenical bodies in the region to plan and reflect on mission in the present context, and in the light of the issues of concern to peoples of the region: peace, reconciliation, the new role of civil society, Christian solidarity and hope.

The ecumenical movement in Central America has taken shape in the midst of many constraints, and it faces many challenges: the environmental crisis, poverty, citizenship, violence, gender equity, democratization in the church, training of church leaders and management. The emphasis that CLAI and the WCC are placing on the need for local churches to play a more visible role in action for solidarity and commitment in their particular place is important. We are called to set aside our theological differences and prejudices and bear faithful witness to the gospel.

CENTRE SAINT-IRÉNÉE

THE CENTRE Saint-Irénée (CSI) is an interconfessional association, founded in Lyons, France, in 1953, for the reconciliation of Christians and the promotion of the ecumenical movement. The centre organizes correspondence courses in ecumenical formation of clergy and laity on historical, theological and biblical subjects; pastoral care of couples in mixed marriages* (interchurch families) in French-speaking countries, through catechesis, weekend retreats and group sessions; and ecumenical tours (in more than 60 countries), through which clergy and laity can experience the life of the local churches. CSI has two publications: Foyer mixte ministers to interchurch couples, Catholic-Protestant and Orthodox-Catholic; Chrétiens en marche circulates in 40 countries. The Centre maintains a library in Lyons, open to the public, with more than 25,000 books and 1000 periodicals.

CENTRO PRO UNIONE

THE CENTRO Pro Unione (CPU), located in the heart of Rome, was founded by the Franciscan Friars of the Atonement as an ecumenical research and action centre. Its purpose is to offer space for dialogue, study, research and formation in ecumenism.

In 1948 the Friars began collaboration with the Jesuit Charles Boyer, founder of the Unitas Association, and in 1950 with the (Dutch) Ladies of Bethany at Foyer Unitas, in welcoming (non-Catholic) Christians who were pilgrims in Rome for the Holy Year. In 1956 the League of Prayer "Pro Unione" was inaugurated to promote prayer for Christian unity; Paul Wattson, who initiated the Church Unity Octave in 1908, was the founder of the Atonement Friars (see Week of Prayer for Christian Unity).

During the Second Vatican Council* the CPU was the privileged location for conferences, press briefings and the weekly discussions between the Anglican, Protestant and Orthodox delegated observers and Catholic experts (periti) organized by the Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity.*

The CPU organizes an annual lecture series, a summer course on the ecumenical and inter-religious movements and scientific research projects. Pro Unione ecumenical gatherings welcome people from other Christian traditions. The semi-annual Centro Pro Unione Bulletin contains a multilingual bibliography on interchurch and inter-confessional dialogues, both national and international, as well as the texts of conferences given at the CPU.

The CPU has over 18,000 books and pamphlets, 300 periodicals (catalogued online through URBE, the Roman Union of Ecclesiastical Libraries), and 25,400 records relating to theological dialogues. It maintains a web site that contains the texts of agreed statements from bilateral dialogues.

Since its foundation the CPU has welcomed over 16,000 students and scholars to its facilities.

CHAKKO, SARAH

B. 13 Feb. 1905, Trichur, South India; d. 25 Jan. 1954, Lucknow, North India. Chakko was an ecumenical youth and student movement leader, first chair of the WCC's commission on the Life and Work of Women in the Church, and first woman on the WCC presidium (1951-54).

Born into a Syrian Orthodox family, Chakko studied history at Queen Mary's, a government women's college in Madras, taught for two years in a London Missionary Society high school, then earned a master's degree at Presidency College in Madras and was appointed to teach at Isabella Thoburn College, an ecumenical school under US Methodist auspices in Lucknow. In 1937 she undertook further study in the US at the University of Chicago and the University of Michigan. She was named principal of Isabella Thoburn in 1945.

Active in the Student Christian Movement of India, Burma and Ceylon, she attended student conferences in Java in 1933 and in San Francisco in 1936, and was part of an Indian SCM team that visited university students in China in 1946. She also served on the national committee of the YWCA of India, Burma and Ceylon and was a vice-president of the World YWCA.*

When Methodist bishop G. Bromley Oxnam asked Chakko to be a delegate to the WCC's first assembly in Amsterdam, she wrote back to say that she was not a Methodist (although she worshipped in a Methodist church in Lucknow). When he told her she was being invited to represent not the Methodists but the “younger churches”, she reminded him that the church to which she belonged was some 1600 years old. After Amsterdam – where she presented the report of the study committee on women – she took a leave of absence from her academic duties and during 1950 and 1951 worked full-time on behalf of the WCC’s new commission on the Life and Work of Women in the Church, arranging meetings and discussion groups and travelling widely through North America, Europe and the Middle East.

Though her health was impaired, she continued after her return to Lucknow in 1951 to attend and address international conferences and to make official visits to churches abroad, always encouraging a wider ministry for women. That same year when T.C. Chao resigned as president of the WCC, she was asked to succeed him, “in recognition of her exceptional service to the whole ecumenical movement”. It thus followed that the January 1953 WCC central committee was invited to hold its pre-Evanston assembly meeting at Isabella Thoburn College.

Named as a Syrian Orthodox delegate to the second assembly (Evanston 1954), she took an active part in its preparations. However, at the end of January 1954, as she sat down to rest during a basketball game with some students, she died of a heart attack. Tributes from around the world bore testimony to the impact of her short life.

CHALCEDON

THE CHRISTOLOGICAL heritage which the 5th century received from the 4th century was not completely thought through. The problem was to interpret more precisely the basically common belief in the incarnation* of God in Jesus Christ, after Arianism had been conquered (the true divinity of the Son was proclaimed at Nicea in 325) and Apollinarianism overcome (according to the council of Constantinople in 381, Jesus Christ is fully human, with body and intellectual soul). Of the two main Christological schools, one was particularly careful to ensure the unity of God and human being in Christ (esp. in Alexandria, but also partially in Syria); the other emphasized the unity of divinity and humanity and the distinction between the two (thus Gregory of Nazianzus and the Antiochenes, such as Diodore of Tarsus and Theodore of Mopsuestia).

A special problem was posed by the expression and use of the principal concepts hypostasis and physis, or “person” and “nature”. In 428-29 this resulted in the first major Christological crisis in the Eastern church. Nestorius wanted to emphasize that the two natures in Christ are unmixed, but this view was interpreted by Alexandria as a doctrine of two hypostases, or two persons. Through the intermediary of Apollinarians, Cyril of Alexandria received texts which circulated under the name of 4th-century fathers (e.g. Pope Julian, Pope Felix, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Athanasius) which included the characteristic formula of the Apollinarians: “the one nature (mia physis) of the incarnate God-Word”. He took over this mia physis formula as the criterion of orthodox Christology in the struggle against Nestorius.

Although Nestorius was condemned at the council of Ephesus in 431 for rejecting the council of Nicea and confessing the doctrine of two persons, he also tried in different conceptual language (though in an infelicitous manner) to express his loyalty to Nicea and to the true unity of divinity and humanity in Christ. The Antiochenes were especially scandalized by the anathemas of Cyril (see the third letter to Nestorius), in which they saw the doctrine of heretical monophysitism.

A second major crisis of Christology was brought about by Eutyches, who misinterpreted the mia physis formula of Cyril by saying that while Jesus Christ is consubstantial with the Father because of his divinity, he is not consubstantial with us because in him there is only one physis. At a synod convened in 448 by Patriarch Flavian of Constantinople, Eutyches was condemned.

The reaction came at the second council of Ephesus (449), under the leadership of Patriarch Dioscorus I of Alexandria, which condemned and deposed Flavian and Theodoret of Cyrus and rehabilitated Eutyches. Now the schism was imminent. From the Roman side, Pope Leo had written his famous tome to Flavian in 448, which caused particular offence because of the formula agit enim utraque forma ("each nature works what is proper to itself").

THE COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON (451)

In 450 Emperor Theodosius II, who favoured Patriarch Dioscorus, died. His place was taken by Emperor Marcian, who in 451 convened in Chalcedon, near Constantinople, the largest synod of the ancient church (there are about 450 signatures to the definition of faith).

Divisive elements in the definition of Chalcedon. Besides the deposition of Patriarch Dioscorus, the main scandal to the Alexandrian school was (1) the composition of a new formula of faith, which was seen as contradicting the prohibition of this by the council of Ephesus in 431; (2) the acceptance of the formula "one hypostasis in two natures" and the rejection of the Cyrillian-Alexandrian expression "from two natures"; and (3) the use of divisive terminology: whereas Alexandria adhered to the synonymous use of the terms physis and hypostasis for the teaching of the incarnation, Chalcedon, with Antioch, Constantinople and Rome, accepted the distinction of the two concepts in this area of incarnation just as in the doctrine of the Trinity. There was no attempt to analyze the concepts.

Unifying elements. (1) The Chalcedonian definition is based on those of Nicea (325) and of Constantinople (381), which have formed the most widely accepted doctrinal bond among Christian churches.

(2) Chalcedon acknowledged and used Cyril's Letter of Union (Laetentur) of 433, together with the symbol composed in 431 by the Antiochenes and later supplemented, although Cyril had modified the latter in a theologically significant way in his explanation of it (Grillmeier, I, [rev. ed.], 499-500). Such acknowledgments continued to keep the peace of 433 between Cyril and the Antiochenes.

(3) General agreement was accorded to Cyril's formula: "one and the same [Son and Lord Jesus Christ], perfect in divinity, the same also perfect in humanity, truly God and truly human, the same with a rational soul and body, consubstantial with the Father as to his divinity, the same consubstantial with us as to his humanity; like us in all things except for sin". The characterization of the unity by the four expressions "without confusion, without change, without division, without separation" also found general agreement.

(4) The chief expression which continued to offend the monophysites – "one hypostasis (person) in two natures" – was in fact demonstrably gained through a close interpretation of the main statements of Cyril by Basil of Seleucia (so André de Halleux). Basically a synthesis of Cyril, Antioch and Leo I was arrived at, but this was unfortunately not recognized at the time.

AFTER CHALCEDON

In the 5th and 6th centuries, the adherents of the mia physis formula, especially after its impressive interpretation and passionate defence by Severus of Antioch, bitterly opposed Chalcedon. Attempts at reconciliation, like the Henoticon of Emperor Zeno (482), failed. Under the Emperors Justin and Justinian a Chalcedonian revival took place, partially affected by violence. But the attempts at reconciliation through dialogue (with Severians in 532, with Nestorians in 561-62) also miscarried, just as the second council of Constantinople (553) could not win over the anti-Chalcedonians. Alexandria remained anti-Chalcedonian, despite imperial attempts to install Melkite patriarchs. The Syrians developed their own (Jacobite) hierarchy. Incapacity for dialogue and the lack of a method for analyzing different systems of language led to consolidation of the misunderstandings and hardening of the fronts.

Since 1971 ecumenical consultations between theologians of the non-Chalcedonian Oriental Orthodox churches and the Roman Catholic Church have been held by the Pro Oriente* foundation in Vienna. In 1974 the official joint commission of the Catholic church and the non-Chalcedonian Coptic Orthodox Church began its work. The main points of agreement are summarized in the declaration on Christology of this commission during its meeting in Vienna in 1976 and partly reflected in the general formula on Christology, signed on 12 February 1988 by Pope Shenouda III and Pro-nuncio Moretti at the St Anba Bishoy monastery (see Oriental Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue). Following unofficial preparatory conversations since 1964, an official joint commission for theological dialogue between Orthodox and the non-Chalcedonian Oriental Orthodox churches met successfully in 1985, 1989, 1990 and 1993 (see Oriental Orthodox-Orthodox dialogue).

A dialogue with the Assyrian Church of the East was started by Pro Oriente in 1994 and is ongoing. An important Common Christological Declaration between the Roman Catholic and the Assyrian Church of the East* was signed on 11 November 1994 in Rome by Pope John Paul II and Catholicos-Patriarch Mar Dinkha IV (see Assyrian Church of the East-Roman Catholic dialogue).

CHAMBÉSY

THE ORTHODOX centre of the Ecumenical Patriarchate, located at Chambésy, near Geneva, was founded in 1966 on the initiative of Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras and by decision of the holy synod. Originally housed in an old mansion overlooking the lake of Geneva, it moved in 1975 to new premises equipped with modern conference facilities.

The focal point of the centre's liturgical and spiritual life is the patriarchal church of St Paul, which hosts the Greek Orthodox parish of Geneva; other chapels are used by Arabic-, Romanian- and French-speaking communities.

The centre's constitutional purpose is to strengthen inter-Orthodox unity, promote Orthodox theology, worship and spirituality, facilitate ecumenical dialogue and cooperation, and foster interfaith understanding. Among its regular programmes are annual post-graduate seminars dealing with contemporary theological and socio-ethical issues. Their findings are published in the series Etudes théologiques de Chambésy.

Also located in Chambésy is the secretariat in charge of the preparation of the holy and great council of the Orthodox church. Chambésy has hosted eight pan-Orthodox pre-conciliar conferences, as well as numerous meetings and consultations related to the bilateral dialogues of the Orthodox church with the Roman Catholic Church, Old Catholic Church, Oriental Orthodox churches, Lutheran World Federation and World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

During the academic year 1997-98 a post-graduate Orthodox theological institute was inaugurated at Chambésy, associated with the theological faculty of the University of Fribourg and in cooperation with the autonomous theological faculty of the University of Geneva.

CHANDRAN, JOSHUA RUSSELL

B. 6 May 1918, Kadamankuly, South India; d. 27 Sept. 2000. Vice-moderator of the WCC central committee, 1966-68, Chandran played a key role in opening the way for new voices from third-world churches to be heard at the WCC's fourth assembly in Uppsala in 1968.

As president of the Asian chapter of the Christian Peace Conference, he was the representative of the Church of South India (CSI) at many ecumenical meetings. He was convener of the union negotiations committee of the CSI, and his long membership of the WCC's Faith and Order commission enabled him to bring the Indian experience to other churches engaged in union negotiations. He was also secretary of the Joint Council of the Church of North India, the Church of South India and the Mar Thoma church, and founder-president of the Christian Union of India.

Joining the United Theological College (UTC) in Bangalore in 1950, he became its first Indian principal in 1954. Later his teaching took him to professorships at Union Theological Seminary, 1964-65; at Louisville Theological Seminary, Kentucky; at Episcopal Theological Seminary, Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1972; and at Pacific Theological College, Suva, Fiji, after retiring from the UTC. He served as president of the Senate of Serampore College, 1968-71, and also of the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians.* His studies were in India, Oxford (England), Union Theological Seminary, New York, and the Chicago University Divinity School.

CHARISM(ATA)

A CHARISM is a manifestation of divine grace, a gift bestowed irrespective of merit or spiritual maturity, an endowment sometimes called a “gift of the Spirit” granted by the Triune God to individuals to enhance the life, worship and service of the people of God.* Those who receive such charismata are sometimes called charismatics. Modern social theory uses the term “charisma” to describe a quality of personality which enables an individual to attract the confidence of others and become a leader or authority figure.

The Greek term for “grace” (charis) lies behind the late and rarely used diminutive charisma (pl. charismata). Charisma appears in the LXX as a variant reading only at Sir. 7:33 and 38:30, and at Ps. 30:20 (Theodotion). While it is used by a few other writers, among them Philo, its meaning is most heavily influenced by New Testament usage. Except for 1 Pet. 4:10, it appears only in the Pauline corpus (16 times). Post-NT secular usage typically conveys the meaning of “favour” or “benefit”.

In Rom. 6:23, Paul uses the term broadly to describe the generous gift of eternal life granted by God in Jesus Christ (cf. 5:15-16). Rom. 11:29 describes the benefits of God’s covenant with Israel in terms of charismata. The locus classicus in the NT is 1 Cor. 12:4-11, occurring within Paul’s longer discussion (chs 12-14) of pneumatika (“spirituals” or “spiritual things”, hence “spiritual gifts”). In one sense, charismata is used synonymously with pneumatika, although the nuance conveyed by each term points in opposite directions. Pneumatika was a Corinthian term for phenomena such as speaking in tongues, words of knowledge and prophecy, by which “spirituality” was measured. The ability to speak in tongues had limited value in the community (1 Cor. 14:4-19), knowledge could lead to inflated egos (1 Cor. 8:1) and even prophecy needed to be tested (1 Cor. 14:29-32, 37-38; 1 Thess. 5:19-22). Paul’s designation of these same phenomena as charismata points not to the alleged spirituality of those exercising these gifts but rather towards the graciousness of the Triune God who supplies them “to each one individually as he wills”.

Within 1 Cor. 12 at least three lists of charisms may be found (vv.8-10,28,29-30); Rom. 12:6-8 provides yet another. The overlaps between these lists and Eph. 4:11 suggests that in Pauline thought dōrea and dōma are also synonymous with charismata.

The variations in number and sequence in these lists suggest that there is no normative catalogue and no attempt to communicate the relative value other than what is explicitly stated in the biblical text. The use of charisma in 1 Pet. 4:10 is consistent with Pauline usage, although the examples given suggest categories (speaking and serving) rather than specific charisms. Indeed, 1 Cor. 12:8-10 lists several “speaking” gifts (utterances of wisdom, utterances of knowledge, prophecy, tongues, interpretation of tongues). On the other hand, Rom. 12:7-8 appears to emphasize various “serving” charismata (service, contribution, giving of aid, acts of mercy). Other charismata include faith healings, miracles, the ability to distinguish or discern spirits (1 Cor. 12:8-10), apostles, teachers, helpers, administrators (1 Cor. 12:28), and exhortation (Rom. 12:8). Paul viewed celibacy as a charism (1 Cor. 7:7-8) and pointed towards martyrdom (1 Cor. 13:3) as a charism, a perspective cherished by Christians persecuted in the patristic period.

The range of charismata may be extended if one considers the empowering role of the Spirit within the whole of scripture. Hence, Bezalel’s craft (Ex. 31:3, 35:31-33), Samson’s ability to judge (Judg. 15:14-15; cf. 3:10, 6:34, 11:29), being able to provide counsel (Isa. 11:2), even certain musical abilities (evidenced by the close relationship between musicians and prophetic guilds in Israel) may qualify as charisms.

It is significant that all Pauline discussions of charismata are within the context of the metaphor of the church as the Body of Christ (Rom. 12:4-8; 1 Cor. 12:4-31; Eph. 4:4-16). The charismata are understood as graciously bestowed on individuals (indicative of diversity), given according to God’s sovereign will, but intended to meet the needs of the one Body (indicative of unity*). The tension between unity and diversity is mediated by love (1 Cor. 13), and the purpose for which these charisms are given is the common good (1 Cor. 12:7), care for one another (vv.25-26), upbuilding and encouragement and consolation (1 Cor. 14:3) and edification (v.5). Gifts are also viewed as being given to the church in the form of persons (e.g. apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers; Eph. 4:11-14), so that the saints may be equipped for the work of ministry. The proper exercise of all Spirit-bestowed charisms is ultimately intended to bring glory to God through Jesus Christ (1 Pet. 4:10-11).

The appearance of certain charismata within the history of the church has been both divisive and unifying. Debates have raged about whether certain gifts continue or have ceased to appear within the church (Augustine, Benjamin Warfield), what constitutes decent and orderly use of certain gifts (contexts seem to vary), how gifts are to be discerned by the community of faith (the role of experience is rationality), the relationship between nature and grace* in the appearance of these gifts (Aquinas; natural endowments and talents vs spontaneous interventions), the legitimate limits of experience (fanaticism or fervency vs rigidity) and the limits of authority (clergy vs laity) in the use of these gifts. But charismata have contributed greatly to grassroots ecumenism.

In the late 19th century, restorationist tendencies, which longed for a return of the church to its NT glory, a quest for the “apostolic faith” including its experiences and charisms, the divine healing movement and a shift by many from post- to pre-millennial eschatology contributed to a growing mood of expectancy regarding the appearance or re-appearance of more spectacular charisms. Out of this grew the Pentecostal movement, derogatorily nicknamed the “tongues” movement because of its emphasis upon the ability to speak in tongues as evidential of Spirit baptism.

Since the 1960s the charismatic renewal within the historic churches, East and West, has called the attention of the whole church to the range of charismata. The appearance of such phenomena as prophecy, healing and speaking in tongues within the historic churches has enabled previously sectarian Pentecostals* to look more favourably on the historic churches and to recognize more openly the role of the Spirit in the whole church through less spectacular gifts. In turn, many in the historic churches who have experienced some of the more spectacular charismata now look more favourably on the newer Pentecostal churches. Continued discussion between these groups is bound to enhance hopes for greater unity within the whole church.

CHARISMATIC MOVEMENT

THE EXPRESSION "charismatic movement" (or "charismatic renewal") refers to the movement of persons and groups who confess the availability of a personal Pentecostal experience of the Holy Spirit,* often accompanied by speaking in tongues and the appropriation of the spiritual gifts listed in 1 Cor. 12:8-10 (see charism(ata)). Participants commonly see the charismatic movement as a "second wave" of the Spirit, extending the first wave of the Pentecostal movement (see Pentecostals) but differing in refusing to organize into separate Pentecostal denominations and in being generally less dogmatic in formulating the core experience of the baptism in the Holy Spirit.

As with all grassroots eruptions, the boundaries of the charismatic movement are difficult to delimit precisely. Originally the term was used (by J. Stone and H. Bredesen in 1963) for Pentecostal experiences and phenomena occurring within the historic denominations. But by 1975 newly emerging groups of Christians in North America and Great Britain, outside the historic churches, were claiming the same spiritual experience but were clearly not Pentecostals. These so-called non-denominational groupings generally understood themselves as part of the worldwide charismatic movement.

By the 1990s, the charismatic churches and networks outside the historic churches formed the largest and fastest-growing segment of the movement. These independent groupings have been the most affected by new trends: theologies of restoration, the "signs and wonders" message of John Wimber, a prophetic current, and more recently the so-called "Toronto blessing". Much of this has tended to diminish the emphasis on "baptism in the Spirit", in turn facilitating a greater penetration of evangelical milieus by charismatic emphases and practices. Peter Wagner has labelled as "the third wave" this current among Evangelicals which welcomes charismatic gifts and the supernatural without accepting Pentecostal doctrine.

While the African Instituted (Independent) Churches* arising during the 20th century exhibit important phenomenological and spiritual similarities with the Pentecostal and charismatic movements, they are not normally considered part of the charismatic movement, whose African expressions have less positive attitudes towards traditional African religion than the AICs.

CHARACTERISTICS

The charismatic movement is characterized by vibrant praise, new power to minister and witness, contemporary hearing of the Lord, revived interest in eschatology and a conviction of the giftedness of each Christian. Charismatic worship praises God, with an emphasis on the lordship of Jesus, in songs, choruses and simultaneous vocal praise. Its impact on the wider church can be seen in increased emphasis on congregational praise and a vast dissemination of new songs of varied quality.

The charismatic movement is experienced as new power for the Body of Christ. Believers yield themselves to the risen Christ in being baptized in the Spirit. As a result, they experience new power in the preaching of the word, in evangelism, in intercession and in deliverance from evil. Charismatics emphasize the God-given equipping of the local church, the spiritual gifts of 1 Cor. 12:8-10, the ministries of Eph. 4:11 and the whole armour of God in Eph. 6:10-20.

Participants claim the abilities to hear the Lord and to speak his contemporary word in prophecy and other utterances. This revelatory work of the Holy Spirit in the Christian remains one of the less-examined aspects of the charismatic movement (see revelation).

The spread of the charismatic movement regularly gives rise to a heightened "end-times" consciousness. Occasionally this takes the form of predictions of an imminent end; more commonly, it leads to a re-discovery of the prayer "Maranatha, come, Lord Jesus".

Whether accepting or rejecting ordained ministry, the fundamentally egalitarian emphasis of the charismatic movement on the spiritual gifts of every participant challenges received patterns of clericalism, both Catholic and Protestant.

ECUMENICAL DIMENSIONS

The charismatic movement can be seen as re-capturing on a larger scale the ecumenical elements present in some parts of the original Pentecostal movement but later eclipsed. In this perspective, the Holy Spirit was poured out to revive all the (Protestant) churches. In the 1930s this original vision was revived in France through the ministry of Louis Dallière, a Reformed pastor in the Ardèche and founder of the Union de prière (1946).

In the 1950s, sporadic outbreaks of Pentecostal phenomena occurred outside the Pentecostal denominations: in circles praying for revival (Anglicans and Methodists in the UK), among those seeking a deeper spiritual life (Baptists in Brazil), in circles re-discovering divine healing (Episcopalians in the USA, Reformed in the Netherlands, Anglicans in the UK), and in milieus promoting a less cerebral view of the human person (Camps Farthest Out, USA). Only in the 1960s did these preliminary strands coalesce into one recognizable movement. Its inter-church character attracted attention.

In this process, significant roles were played by David Du Plessis of South Africa (Pentecostal), Dennis Bennett of the USA (Episcopalian) and Michael Harper of the UK (Anglican, now Antiochene Orthodox). For many grassroots Christians, participation in charismatic prayer meetings was their first experience of fellowship across church boundaries.

As the charismatic movement spread across the churches, its early informal structures were ecumenical. The Dutch quarterly Vuur (1957) had an editorial board from several church traditions; the US quarterly Trinity (1961-66), with a strong Episcopalian base, served charismatics from many Protestant churches. The Fountain Trust (1964-80), established by Harper to serve the charismatic movement in all churches in the UK, became a model for charismatic service agencies in Australia (Temple Trust) and New Zealand (Christian Advance Ministries).

The advent of Roman Catholic charismatic renewal in 1967 was dramatic evidence of the movement's ecumenical character and potential. More than others, Catholics interpreted their Pentecostal experience in ecumenical terms, seeing it as a providential result of the renewal thrust and ecumenical openings of the Second Vatican Council.* Particularly in North America, this inaugurated a phase of expanding denominational conferences with an ecumenical dimension.

Continental ecumenical gatherings for leaders in the charismatic movement began in 1972 in both Europe and Latin America. The European charismatic leaders conference merged in 1988 with the leaders' groups, formed by Harper, to organize the "Acts 1986" ecumenical conference in Birmingham, England.

The charismatic movement among Catholics spurred the rise of many new communities, mostly led by laypeople. Several were ecumenical in their composition and vision: the Word of God community (Ann Arbor, USA), the People of Praise community (South Bend and Minneapolis, USA), the Chemin neuf community (Lyons, France), the Alleluia community (Augusta, USA). These communities, called covenant communities in the USA, included married and single people, ordained and unordained, in a shared lifestyle based on the shared experience of new life in the Holy Spirit. Few of these communities have been able to sustain their Protestant membership and their ecumenical vigour.

The rapid spread of Catholic charismatic renewal led many in other traditions to integrate the movement into church life. The 1970s saw a proliferation of denominational service agencies in North America, a process followed worldwide by Catholics in the 1970s and in the 1980s by Anglicans and Protestants in Britain and Scandinavia. Ireland was the only country to establish an ecumenical national service committee, though this was later abandoned in the face of Catholic pressures.

The increased orientation of the mainline charismatic movement towards church renewal* has not notably accelerated positive responses from denominational authorities. Catholic episcopal conferences have been among the most positive, recognizing the charismatic movement among other organized movements and encouraging clergy participation and discernment. Many Protestant churches have been slower in welcoming the charismatic movement, though gradually it is finding acceptance in many countries. Official church reactions up to 1980 have been gathered in Kilian McDonnell's three volumes.

Catholic hierarchies in countries of the South have sometimes imposed tighter organization on the charismatic movement. In Latin America this reaction is associated with fear and distrust of Protestant charismatics and Pentecostals, in Africa with concern about losses to AICs with charismatic characteristics. Denominational tendencies in North America and Europe have caused some diminution in ecumenical thrust and fellowship, but the charismatic movement's original ecumenical vision continues to inspire many, as shown in the mammoth gatherings at Kansas City (1977), Strasbourg (1982) and New Orleans (1987), and the important Brighton conference on world evangelization (1991). The Alpha course from London, England, has given a strong impulse to interchurch cooperation since 1994.

POINTS OF CONTENTION

Like all spontaneous movements which appeal to the initiative and freedom of the Spirit, the charismatic movement has had its tensions, divisions and conflict. Five issues arise most frequently:

Baptism in the Spirit. While charismatics commonly posit this foundational experience as a "second blessing" after primary Christian initiation, Catholics and Protestants interpret it in different ways. Evangelicals commonly differentiate it from conversion-regeneration, though charismatics with a Calvinist theology are most opposed to a distinct post-conversion reception of the Holy Spirit. Catholics often explain baptism in the Spirit as a coming to conscious experience of those graces which sacramental baptism* has already conferred. Neither interpretation sufficiently recognizes the role of preaching a fuller message in Spirit baptism. Most charismatics do not accept the majority-Pentecostal doctrine of "initial evidence", i.e. that baptism in the Spirit must be attested by the physical sign of speaking in other tongues. However, many charismatics do expect glossolalia to accompany baptism in the Spirit, a feature that has caused concern to some church authorities.

Spiritual power versus holiness. Most charismatics understand baptism in the Spirit as power for ministry and service. However, some (Bethany Fellowship in Minneapolis, the Mary Sisters in Darmstadt) see this grace primarily in terms of new depth of relationship with the persons of the Trinity,* from which new power flows. This discussion echoes earlier debates within the Holiness and Pentecostal movements and is likely to intensify in the wake of serious scandals among prominent independent leaders.

Discipleship and apostleship. As in the Pentecostal movement, the charismatic movement has seen an association between the rediscovery of the spiritual gifts of 1 Cor. 12:8-10 and the ministry gifts of Eph. 4:11. Some circles, mostly non-denominational, believe God is restoring the proper order of the church under apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers. There is a tension between those who espouse this view of restoration and those who operate within traditional patterns of ministry and teaching. Many charismatic congregations have adopted pluralist patterns of church leadership, with teams of elders, a development which has led some British Baptist congregations, among others, out of their parent denominations. Other networks emphasize church authority, teaching that each Christian must be "discipled" by accepting the directive authority of a pastor for all major life-decisions. A number of Protestant charismatics have vehemently opposed the discipleship teaching, associated in the 1970s with Christian Growth Ministries (Fort Lauderdale, Florida) and New Wine magazine, and with Juan Carlos Ortiz from Argentina, as a betrayal of cherished Reformation principles.

Scripture and prophecy. The claim that God speaks also today as in New Testament times has caused controversy, particularly among those concerned to uphold the unique authority of holy scripture. The initial evangelical unease about the charismatic movement was rooted more in this fear of exalting contemporary experience above scripture than in difficulties with a “second-blessing”. This unease often diminishes as charismatic congregations and groups demonstrate their biblical loyalty. The theological issues raised here about the relationship between biblical and post-biblical times are similar to the long-standing debates concerning scripture and Tradition.

Personal and social transformation. The charismatic movement has re-inforced emphasis on personal conversion, and charismatics have often been uneasy with emphases which focus on structural reform. Some charismatic leaders recognize the need to overcome any charity-justice dichotomy, an ideal recommended in Charismatic Renewal and Social Action, by Cardinal Suenens and Dom Helder Camara (1980).

CHEVETOGNE

THE BENEDICTINE monastery of the Holy Cross in Belgium has been committed since its foundation in 1925 to the healing of Christian divisions, especially the schisms* between the church of Rome and the churches of the East. In 1924 Pope Pius XI requested the Benedictine congregations to foster this aim through prayer and studies. In response Dom Lambert Beauduin (1873-1960) founded a new priory at Amay-sur-Meuse; in 1939 the “monks of unity” moved to their present site at Chevetogne.

Dom Beauduin himself faced extensive ecclesiastical opposition because of the monastery’s approach and methods. In 1928 he resigned as prior, and in 1930 he went into virtual exile in southern France until he was permitted to return to Chevetogne in 1951. The monastery itself survived, including its quarterly Irenikon (1926), the first Catholic review devoted to ecumenism.

Among the more notable of the Chevetogne monks have been Clement Lialine (1901-58), who gave attention to the WCC in its formation stages and had friendly contacts with W.A. Visser ‘t Hooft and other early WCC leaders; Olivier Rousseau (1898-1984), who re-inforced the institutional and spiritual structures at Amay-Chevetogne to withstand the accusations against the monastery; Pierre Dumont (1901-70), specialist in Greek Orthodoxy; Emmanuel Lanne, a drafter of the Second Vatican Council’s Decree on Ecumenism* and the first Roman Catholic vice-moderator of the WCC Faith and Order* commission.

The monastery has two groups of monks, one of the Latin rite and the other of the Byzantine (Greek and Slavonic). They celebrate the daily liturgies in the two churches of the monastery simultaneously. Since 1943 Chevetogne has sponsored conferences on critical ecumenical themes, with internationally known specialists. The monastery has a hostel for guests, a library of over 100,000 volumes and a publishing house for works on history, ecclesiology, liturgy and spirituality. The monks are also responsible for directing the pontifical Greek college in Rome.

CHILDREN

THE CHURCH has from its very beginning concerned itself with children, including them in its ministry and its service through such activities as infant baptism, children's communion, children's catechism, Sunday school, religious instruction and confirmation classes. Churches have taken responsibility for nurture, guidance and welfare of children, not leaving these only to parents and society. Churches and missionary societies were often the first to care for orphans and abandoned and disabled children and to set up institutions for them: orphanages, schools, homes, centres, nurseries and hospitals.

When women and men opened schools on Sunday in the latter half of the 18th century in Britain, they were primarily motivated by a concern for destitute and illiterate children who were victims of the industrial revolution. This in turn stimulated the provision of day school education for all children, so that Sunday schools could concentrate more and more on competent Christian education. In the 19th century what had begun in Britain became a worldwide movement, leading in 1907 to the formation of the World Sunday School Association. In 1947 the association changed its name to the World Council of Christian Education* (WCCE).

Ecumenically the church's concern for children was lodged in the WCCE. Although the agenda of some pioneering ecumenical conferences included "education in relation to the Christianization of national life" (Edinburgh 1910) and "church, community and state in relation to education" (Oxford 1937), the child as such was not a focus in these discussions. Within the WCC, it was only with the integration of WCCE in 1972 that the long tradition and experience of work with children was taken up. Recognition of and participation in the International Year of the Child (1979) presented a timely opportunity for the ecumenical movement to make visible its concern for the child today and to give priority to this, "for the suffering of children today is such as to provoke our anger, and the love of our Lord Jesus for the little ones such as to provoke our penitent compassion" (WCC report on the International Year of the Child).

Ecumenical efforts to explore a new theological understanding of childhood were initiated by the British Council of Churches' 1976 report on The Child in the Church. A new role for the child within the community of faith was the focus of a conference in Evian, France, on "Children as Active Partners in the Congregation", jointly organized in 1980 by the WCC and the Lutheran World Federation. Jesus' words about the child (Mark 9:33-37 par. and 10:13-16 par.) speak not of the child's transformation to adulthood but the adult's transformation to childhood. Theological re-evaluation of the category of the child as a significant factor in understanding the Christian way of existence has drawn new attention to children's particular ways of living and believing and to their fundamental needs and interests.

This has led many churches to re-appraise their work with children and to change traditional patterns of church and congregational life, envisaging a community of faith in which adults and children, old and young, share experiences and learn from one another. At the sixth assembly of the WCC (Vancouver 1983), children from all over the world were present at the Bible studies, the worship services (leading some of them), a peace-and-justice event and an international day camp. At the eighth assembly (Harare 1998), one of the forums was on the dignity of children, and children from Zimbabwe took an active part in performing art offerings; several padares featured child rights, child abuse and exploitation, children and worship, and the hopes of children.

Any re-appraisal of church and ecumenical work with children must bear in mind the twofold task of ministry with children (child's nurture in faith, etc.) and advocacy for children (political, international, legal, etc.). The story of the trials and sorrows affecting children in today's world is endless; already in May 1974 UNICEF declared a "world emergency for children".

International understanding of children changed dramatically after the signing and ratification of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child in 1999. As a consequence, children are now recognized as having their own inherent rights to basic needs. This offers a small lifeline to children who are the victims of war, physical or sexual abuse and any other form of violence. The Convention also affirms the right of children to participate fully in the decision-making processes which affect them. Some churches have made strong efforts to ensure that the voice of children is now properly heard.

For the churches in the ecumenical movement there are many opportunities for fulfilling their commitment to God's promise to children, by engaging themselves or joining with others in advocating the needs and the rights of children in churches, homes, societies, as well as in schools and other learning environments.

CHRISMATION

CHRISMATION is the anointing or sealing in the post-baptismal rites of the Eastern and Oriental churches, in which the presider (usually a priest, but sometimes a bishop) anoints the newly baptized on the forehead, eyes, nostrils, ears and mouth (and in some rites on as many as 36 places) with consecrated chrism.

Originally, the rite was probably pre-baptismal and eschatological in character, drawing on the images of the seal on the foreheads of the redeemed in Revelation (7:2-8, 9:4, 14:1, 22:4) and the first-fruits of salvation* (2 Cor. 1:21-22; Eph. 1:13-14, 4:30). By the end of the 3rd century, the chrismation was post-baptismal and more pneumatic. As baptismal rites developed, there was an increasing tendency to identify one particular moment in the liturgy as the point at which the Holy Spirit* is given rather than the more ancient understanding, acknowledging the activity of the Holy Spirit throughout the rite. The chrismation occupies this place in Eastern and Oriental baptismal liturgies.

While apologists for the Eastern and Oriental rites have often suggested that chrismation is the equivalent of confirmation in the Roman rite, it would be more accurate to say that it parallels the first post-baptismal anointing of that rite, and that the Eastern and Oriental churches do not have a liturgical equivalent to confirmation. Nevertheless, a significant number of Eastern and Western churches consider the two to be equivalent, which influences their practice in the reception of converts.

CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE OF ASIA

THE CHRISTIAN Conference of Asia (CCA), founded as the East Asia Christian Conference (EACC), was the first institutionalized expression of regional ecumenism. Its origins may be traced back to the meeting of the International Missionary Council* (IMC) at Tambaram in 1938, though Asian delegates to earlier world meetings had already expressed the need for their churches to work towards greater unity in life, partnership in mission and autonomy in administration. Tambaram was the first world ecumenical meeting at which Asian participants formed the majority, and some of them called on the IMC to set up an Asian office.

In 1945 the IMC committee in Geneva considered a proposal from the Chinese and Indian national councils urging the formation of an East Asia regional committee, in order "(1) to promote and give expression to the spirit of Christian unity among the churches of East Asia; (2) to promote fellowship and mutual helpfulness among Christians in East Asia through conferences, exchange of delegations and such other measures as may be agreed upon; (3) to promote a sense of the responsibility of the churches in East Asia for the Christian witness and for the building up of the churches in this area; (4) to deepen the unity of the churches in East Asia with the world church; (5) to bring to the life of the world church the distinctive contribution of the churches in East Asia".

The joint committee of the IMC and the WCC decided in 1947 to set up an East Asia regional office, and the first meeting of Asian church leaders was held in Bangkok in 1949, with the theme "The Christian Prospect in Eastern Asia". In 1951 Raja B. Manikam of India was appointed East Asia secretary. A joint consultation of the Asia Council on Ecumenical Mission, the IMC and the WCC in 1956 resolved to convene a meeting of representatives of Asian churches and national councils so that they could decide for themselves what form regional ecumenism should take in Asia.

Prapat, Indonesia, was the venue of that meeting, held in 1957. Its theme was "The Common Evangelical Task of the Churches in East Asia". A core staff team – D.T. Niles from Ceylon, U Kyaw Than from Burma and Alan Brash from New Zealand – was appointed to organize the new ecumenical body. The Prapat meeting is now generally considered as the first EACC assembly, although the inaugural (now reckoned as the second) assembly was held only in 1959, at Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. Present at that meeting were representatives from 34 churches and 14 Christian councils from Asian countries and from Australia and New Zealand.

At the fifth assembly in Singapore in 1973, a new phase in the life of the regional body opened. It received a new name: Christian Conference of Asia. It was given a new structure and a new team to head its general secretariat. It saw the beginning of a more centralized administrative set-up. The CCA had previously maintained a small office in Bangkok, with quite a few of its large staff, many of them part-time, working out of their home countries; now the number was considerably reduced, and most moved to Singapore, where the CCA was based until December 1987, when it was "dissolved" by the Singapore government and the expatriate staff "expelled" from the country. The government – whose action was roundly condemned by churches and other ecumenical bodies – claimed that the CCA had breached its undertaking "not to indulge in any political activity or allow its funds to be used for political purposes". Thus, the CCA decentralized again, working from offices in Osaka (Japan), Hong Kong, Manila and Chiang Mai (Thailand). In June 1993, the CCA staff gathered again, this time in the CCA's newly acquired property in Hong Kong. The CCA centre is not only a place where programme staff can work together but also where Asian churches can come for fellowship and reflection on their missionary vocation.

Following the mandate of the Tomohon assembly in June 2000, and in response to challenging realities, the CCA felt the need to re-structure by bringing its programme desks into three programme areas – justice, international affairs, development and service (JIADS); ecumenical formation, gender justice, youth formation (EFGJYF); and faith, mission and unity (FMU) – and the general secretariat.

The CCA constituency which includes 100 churches and 15 national councils, is spread over a vast area from Japan in the north to Pakistan in the west and New Zealand in the southeast. According to its constitution, the CCA is "an organ of continuing cooperation among the churches and national Christian bodies in Asia within the framework of the wider ecumenical movement". Its functions are set forth as follows: (1) to develop effective Christian response to the challenges of the changing societies of Asia; (2) to explore opportunities and promote joint action for the fulfilment of the mission of God in Asia and throughout the world; (3) to encourage Asian contributions to Christian thought, worship and action throughout the world; (4) to develop mutual awareness, fellowship and sharing among the churches in the region and relationships with other regional conferences and the WCC; (5) to promote common study and action in such fields as evangelism, service, social and human development and international relations; and (6) to stimulate initiatives and experiments in dynamic Christian living and action.

The chief communication organ of the CCA is the monthly magazine CCA News. The annual observance of the Sunday before Pentecost* as Asia Sunday recalls the inauguration of the CCA on the eve of Pentecost in 1959 and celebrates the relatively new sense of solidarity among the churches in Asia.

Those who worked for the creation of a regional ecumenical body in the early years had three main motives. First, they hoped that Asian Christians would develop closer and more regular contacts with one another. Second, they wanted the churches to develop contextual theologies and ways of witness which would address the fast-changing social, religious and political situations of their nations and remain in dialogue with one another. Third, they wanted Asian churches to involve themselves more effectively in ecumenical thinking and action at the global level.

The first of these hopes has been realized. Asian Christians now meet in Asia, and not only in London, New York and Geneva. The increasing cooperation between the federation of Asian bishops conferences and the CCA augurs well for the future. In the area of contextual theology and witness too there have been significant gains, though the churches, as churches, have not always appropriated the new insights. A number of the study centres and people's movements that emerged during the last few decades have close links with the CCA, and they have been addressing the two basic realities of Asian existence – endemic material poverty and pervasive religious and ideological pluralism. Finally, ecumenical interaction between the regional and the global levels has been limited. Nor is there much evidence of dialogue among the various regions. That dialogue is crucial for the future of the ecumenical movement.

CHRISTIAN LITERATURE

THE CREATION, production and distribution of literature has been a concern of the churches since the early 18th century. The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (SPCK) was founded by members of the Church of England in 1698, and in the Nonconformist tradition the founder of Methodism, John Wesley, was himself writing and disseminating tracts as early as 1745.

In May 1799 after the annual meeting of the recently formed (1795) London Missionary Society, the Religious Tract Society (RTS) was born. In 1804, much the same group formed the British and Foreign Bible Society, for printing and distributing the Bible in Britain and abroad (see Bible societies).

The RTS was from the start essentially ecumenical, representing the main Protestant churches, Nonconformist and Anglican, in Britain. Over the next 150 years it published in over 200 languages, distributing millions of magazines to soldiers, sailors and prisoners of war. In the mid-19th century, 33 million tracts were being produced each year. Besides producing literature, the RTS gave financial support to similar work abroad; and by 1815 its grants went to organizations in countries as widely spread as Iceland, Gibraltar, Uruguay, Russia and South Africa.

A number of missionaries in Africa and Asia were instrumental in writing and disseminating Christian literature, initially using colporteurs, later the book bicycle and more recently the bookmobile. Such missionaries did much to spread literacy and in some cases developed written forms of local languages. By encouraging and assisting local writing and publishing, they made a lasting contribution to the language, literature, journalism, education and politics of their host countries.

The second half of the 19th century saw the creation of Christian literature societies in India, Africa and China, which amalgamated with the RTS in 1935 to form the United Society for Christian Literature (USCL). In 1932 the RTS adopted the imprint of Lutterworth Press, through which the USCL continued publishing general and religious books until 1984 when the press was sold.

Frank Laubach pioneered literacy programmes in the Philippines in the 1920s and 1930s, and in Latin America in the 1940s. In 1942 the Committee for Christian Literature of the Foreign Missions Conference in North America joined with Laubach's World Literacy Committee to become the Committee on World Literacy and Christian Literature (Lit-Lit). Supported by 45 denominational boards in the USA and Canada, Lit-Lit provided capital for publishing programmes and training in Asia, Africa, the Middle East and Latin America.

In Europe, the Bethel Consultation on Christian Literature agreed in 1962 to form a Supporting Literature Agencies Consultation (SLAC), to draw together European and North American agencies. Exploratory conferences in Asia and Africa were followed by a report to the WCC's Commission on World Mission and Evangelism in Mexico in 1963. Two years later the Christian Literature Fund (CLF) was launched, sponsored by the WCC, with an international ecumenical committee. It worked closely with SLAC. In 1970, CLF became the Agency for Christian Literature Development (ACLD); then in 1975 it merged with the World Association for Christian Communication* (WACC), becoming its print development unit.

In Britain the Christian Literature Council of the Conference of British Mission Societies (CBMS) supported publishing, printing and bookselling enterprises abroad. In 1964 Donald Coggan, then archbishop of York, challenged the churches to work together to combat the spiritual and intellectual hunger prevalent in many countries of the world. Out of this grew the Feed the Minds campaign, in which CBMS, SPCK, USCL and the Bible Society collaborated.

When this campaign concluded in 1967, USCL, SPCK and CBMS remained together under the umbrella of Feed the Minds. They were joined by SLAC to form the Joint Action for Christian Literature Overseas (JACLO) until 1983, when the mainstream British churches, the missionary societies and USCL joined to take forward the work and name of Feed the Minds. USCL, SPCK and WACC are all member bodies of Feed the Minds, along with the denominational and ecumenical missionary societies and institutions concerned with supporting indigenous and contextual literature.

CHRISTIAN PEACE CONFERENCE

THE CHRISTIAN Peace Conference (CPC) was formed in the late 1950s to provide a platform where Eastern European churches, church groups and individuals could come together to address urgent global political issues, especially the ever-present threat of nuclear catastrophe, as Christians and not just as loyal citizens of their countries. The Bandung (Indonesia) conference (1955) of nations which considered themselves non-aligned within the blocs dominated by the USA and the USSR and the aborted 1956 uprising in Hungary underscored the extent to which Europe was in the grip of the cold war.* The organized ecumenical movement was largely dominated by political and social ideas coming from the West.

In the autumn of 1957 two Protestant theological faculties in Czechoslovakia (Prague and Bratislava) came together to discuss a plan of convening the first CPC meeting in June 1958. The leading personalities were Josef Hromádka and Bohuslav Pospisil (both related to the Comenius theological faculty in Prague). Inspiring them was the original idea of Dietrich Bonhoeffer, who as early as 1934 had called for such a peace council. From the outset it was made clear that the CPC would not compete with the WCC but would complement its activities. The concept found a positive echo among Western church people and theologians, although the Westerners involved in the early years did not match the Eastern leaders in rank and influence.

The first three CPC meetings in 1958-60 and the first All Christian Peace Assembly in 1961 concentrated on the division between East and West and on issues stemming from the cold war. The 1961 assembly brought together 600 participants from 42 countries, including three delegates from the People's Republic of China who spoke bitterly of the pax Russo-Americana. The term "peace" was discredited because it was ideologically loaded. However, theologians such as Hans Joachim Iwand, Heinrich Vogel, Helmut Gollwitzer and Ernst Wolf understood that the question of peace in the presence of nuclear arms had acquired a new quality and had become a relevant theological issue. The basic focus in the initial stage was the struggle against atomic catastrophe, the ban of nuclear weapons and the effort to ease the cold war. Later the scope included the study of justice, freedom, new developing countries, the German question, disarmament and the peace service of youth. Unsuccessful efforts were made to secure the cooperation of the Roman Catholic Church.

The second assembly (1964) represented a major breakthrough. The participants from Latin America, Africa and Asia directed the CPC thinking towards third-world issues and shaped the CPC into a truly worldwide movement. The urgent needs of developing countries, the question of revolution and the growing unrest among students and young people became an integral part of the CPC agenda. The term "theology of revolution" was first coined in the CPC youth commission; and the CPC contributed substantially to the 1966 Geneva WCC conference on Church and Society.

The third assembly (1968) was marked by developments in Czechoslovakia. The Communist Party under Alexander Dubcek was developing a programme for "socialism with a human face". The abrupt end to this innovative experiment with the invasion by five socialist states on 21 August 1968 had far-reaching consequences for the CPC. Its president, Hromádka, wrote a memorandum which condemned the action of the five countries. The delegates from the Soviet Union produced a counter-memorandum. The stormy session of the CPC working committee in Massy (early October 1968) initiated a protracted crisis which led to dismissal of the general secretary, Jaroslav Ondra. A few weeks later, Hromádka also resigned. An effort by some CPC representatives to silence the dissenting voices led to another crisis, symbolized by the walkout of a number of Western and third-world participants in early 1970. So the CPC was dangerously weakened, and in some countries it never recovered from the events of 1968-69. The 1971 assembly was designed to overcome the crisis and to elect new governing bodies, eliminating the dissenters.

During the 1970s, the CPC was able to start important regional work in Asia (1975), in Africa (1977) and Latin America (1978); in addition, the work of women's groups made a notable contribution to the feminist cause. The CPC work would not have been possible without the participation and financial support of the churches in Central and Eastern Europe, especially the Russian Orthodox Church. But the location of its headquarters and leadership in Prague made the CPC vulnerable to massive interference by communist governments in its inner life. The CPC sometimes defended the policies of one power bloc, and the theological work so important in the initial stage became sterile or even neglected.

The 1978 and 1985 assemblies brought together many Christians from around the world (including China, Vietnam and North Korea). Despite its often one-sided statements, the CPC contributed to creating the atmosphere in which Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation* (JPIC) emerged as a major ecumenical theme in the 1980s.

The radical changes in 1989-90 and the demise of communism called into question the CPC's raison d'être. The legacy of its first president, Hromádka, was a challenge and called the CPC to repentance. For some time there was hope that, despite its limited resources, the CPC could make a meaningful contribution to addressing the critical issues facing churches and ecumenical organizations at the beginning of a new millennium: global economic justice, human responsibility for all creation, true partnership of women and men in church and society, disarmament, the ongoing struggle against racism and xenophobia. Unfortunately, this expectation did not materialize. Some activities in connection with the CPC may continue in Latin America and other continents. However, a small international office in Prague was closed early in 2001.

CHRISTIAN WORLD COMMUNIONS

SINCE THE SECOND half of the 19th century, churches which recognize a common history and confessional tradition though located in various countries have formed international associations or organizations, with varying aims: breaking down walls of national isolation, supporting the weaker churches, healing theological frictions or racial divisions: e.g. the Lambeth conference of bishops of the Anglican communion* (1867), the Alliance of Reformed Churches throughout the World holding the Presbyterian System (1875), the World Methodist Council* (1881), the Old Catholic Union of Utrecht (1889), the International Congregational Council (1891), the Baptist World Alliance* (1905), the World Convention of Churches of Christ (1930), the Friends' World Committee for Consultation* (1937), the Lutheran World Federation* (1947, though consultations began in 1923). Since 1979 the designation of these as "world confessional families" has given way to the current term Christian World Communions (CWCs).

It is important not to identify CWCs with these structured expressions, nor to generalize about them without taking account of their widely varying sizes and self-understandings. For example, the large Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, based in the USA with vigorous extensions in other continents, is not a member of the LWF. The BWA would collapse if it were to see itself as an instrument to bring about "the Baptist church". The Anglicans, Roman Catholics and Orthodox do not see themselves as members of "confessional denominations". The LWF and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches both have their central offices in the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva, but the staff and budget of the former is several times larger than the latter, even though the total membership of their member churches is comparable. And for explicit ecumenical activities, the largest staff and budget is that of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity* in the Roman curia.*

No label fits exactly the cluster of CWCs, nor would any of them press for more than a general description of the grouping as such. This hesitation for detailed self-description became more pronounced in 1957 when the general secretaries of some of these bodies began informal annual meetings. They were later joined by representatives from the Eastern Orthodox* Ecumenical Patriarchate (Constantinople) and the Moscow Patriarchate, from Oriental Orthodox churches,* and from the Roman Catholic Church* (through the Council for Christian Unity), as well as representatives from the Seventh-Day Adventist* General Conference, the Salvation Army,* the World Evangelical Fellowship,* the Pentecostal World Conference* and the WCC.* This loosely structured group, calling itself the Conference of Secretaries of Christian World communions (CS/CWC), still meets informally every year but issues no joint statements or press releases.

Each of the CWCs sees itself as promoting closer fellowship, not only among its own members but also among other Christians and communions who participate in the one ecumenical movement. But tensions have arisen. In the 1960 and 1970s, critics questioned the seriousness of the CWCs' ecumenical commitment. The East Asia Christian Conference assemblies of 1961 and 1964 denied that the Anglican and Protestant CWCs could fulfill any positive ecumenical function. The context was the formation of united and uniting churches* and the hindrance that some CWCs could be to the community of the church “in each place” seeking full fellowship with other local churches (see unity of “all in each place”). Some united churches, such as the Church of North India and the Uniting Church in Australia, intentionally maintain relationships with the CWCs with which their founding members were affiliated; others have deliberately cut off confessional ties.

So questions press. Is a “distinct” confessional tradition necessarily “divisive” within the ecumenical movement? Does confessional identity mean immutability in the self-understanding of a church and deny the self-critique of its tradition? Does “identity” not presuppose and include authentic change through purification?

A second context for tensions originated in the proliferation of international bilateral dialogues after the Second Vatican Council,* either with or without the Roman Catholic Church as a partner. Are these bilaterals competitive with or even counterproductive to the multilateral dialogues which take place in the context of Faith and Order? The WCC’s fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975) suggested that there be mutual agreement on “the unity we seek” and “the witness we bear in the world”, and that a structural way be found to coordinate the evolving results of the bilaterals and the WCC’s multilaterals. The CS/CWC now organizes periodic forums to analyze bilateral conversations and compare their results with the F&O studies. The fourth forum (1985) compared the WCC’s baptism, eucharist and ministry statement (BEM*) with the same three subjects in bilaterals; the fifth (1990) focused on the understanding (coherence or divergence) of the church; the sixth (1994) on the dialogues and their reception in the churches; the seventh (1997) on the emerging visions of unity; the eighth (2001) on the implications of regional agreements for international bilaterals.

The WCC’s eighth assembly (Harare 1998) judged that “a duplication of programmes and projects within the WCC and CWCs cannot be justified”, and called for an increase in the “level of mutual sharing”.

The assembly had investigated the possible direct involvement of CWCs in the WCC’s decision-making bodies, but it saw that “the present juridical and constitutional framework in which these ecumenical organizations operate prevents such direct roles”.

CHRISTMAS

CHRISTMAS is the annual celebration of the birth of Jesus Christ. This feast of the nativity is kept by almost all churches on 25 December. Its celebration in some Orthodox churches 13 days later than elsewhere is due to the current gap between the Julian or old-style calendar and the Gregorian calendar followed in other churches and in the civil sphere (see church calendar).

The origins of the feast and its date are contested among historians. While there is some evidence that Christ’s birth (and baptism) were earlier celebrated on 6 January (a date still kept for the feast among the Armenians), the date of 25 December for the nativity is attested from the 4th century (first in Rome, for the year 336). Two types of theory, not mutually exclusive, have been advanced for the fixing of this date. One is based on the supposed date of Christ’s passion on 25 March; if the earthly life of the Incarnate Son was to last a number of complete years, his conception must have occurred on 25 March and thus his birth on 25 December. The other assumes a Christian take-over of a pagan festival of the winter solstice, with Christ as “Sun of Righteousness" replacing the "Unconquered Sun", the name used in the solar celebration instituted by the Roman emperor Aurelian in 274. Although Origen had earlier dismissed the keeping of birthdays as a pagan affair, 4th-century Christians may in this case have been led by their own reflection on the mystery of the incarnation,* rather than simply imitating their pagan neighbours.

January 6 was left as the feast of the Epiphany, or "manifestation". In the Eastern churches, this is the feast of Christ's baptism, at which he was manifested as the Son of God (Matt. 3:13-17 and par.). In the West, the Epiphany is kept as the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, in the persons of the wise men or "three kings" (Matt. 2:1-12). Further liturgical associations of the feast bring in the wedding at Cana, where Christ's turning of the water into wine was the first of his signs to manifest his glory (John 2:1-11).

Historically, Christmas (and its "twelve days") has been a popular feast around which many folk customs have grown up. Today it is perhaps the most widely observed holiday in the world, kept also by many who are not Christian. Seasonal sentiments of "peace on earth" are expressed (cf. Luke 2:14). Gifts are exchanged (cf. John 3:16).

The year 2000 was promoted as the focus of a jubilee celebration of Christ's nativity (see, e.g., Pope John Paul II's apostolic letter of 1994, Tertio Millennio Adveniente).

CHURCH

AT A LUCID moment in the difficult study on "The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community", it was recognized in the WCC Faith and Order* commission that "in a divided Christianity, the existing churches" have "varying understandings of the nature, identity and boundaries of the church. The churches' differences come to expression in several ways: their perceptions of the character of the church as both the body and bride of Christ and a historic reality; the role they attribute to the institutional element that is necessary for any form of ecclesial life; the place they accord to the church in the saving activity of God; the sense in which the church itself may be said to be sacramental in character; the weight they attach to ecclesiology in their doctrinal schemes. Most concretely, the existing churches differ as to the persons and communities which are to be reckoned as belonging to the church" (Faith and Renewal: Stavanger 1985, 194-95).

It is in fact fairly easy for the churches to agree in describing what the church is and stating what the church is for: it is "people of God", "Body of Christ", "community of the Holy Spirit", privileged with anticipating God's kingdom in its worship (leitourgia) and meanwhile charged with proclaiming the gospel to the world (martyria, witness) and serving the needy among humankind (diakonia). A text of this kind, entitled "The Calling of the Whole People of God", is found in the first five paragraphs of the ministry section of *Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry** (1982) and has met with great approval in the responses of the churches to the Lima document. But when the church shifts from being the subject of the sentence to the predicate, it is much more difficult for the churches to agree in identifying who are the church. Different views on the identity of the church – on where the church is concretely to be found – are linked to differences as to its unity* and mission* – and therefore after all also to its nature (what the church is) and its relationship to the world and the human community in which it is placed (what the church is for).

A HISTORICAL AND SYSTEMATIC TYPOLOGY OF ECCLESIOLOGIES

Looking at the history and present state of Christianity, it is possible to detect some eight different intuitions or perceptions as to the identity, nature, unity and mission of the church. These arose in a rough historical sequence, although each has interacted with its predecessors and successors, and all are present today, although often in mixed form. The following are ways in which the fellowship of the church – the sacrament* of whose beginning is baptism* and the sacrament of whose continuance is eucharistic communion (see communion, eucharist) – has been defined and located.

1. In the view associated with Cyprian of Carthage (d.258), there is only one church, the “ark of salvation”, and its institutional and spiritual boundaries coincide. Any who fall away, whether into heresy* (failure of faith) or schism* (failure of love), lack the Holy Spirit* and drop into an ecclesiological void. The sacraments of the delinquent party are counterfeits; and when individuals are converted to the catholic church, they receive baptism (not re-baptism, since what they received in the other body was not in fact baptism at all).

The Orthodox and the stricter type of Baptists remain closest to this view. In the Anglican-Orthodox dialogue,* the Orthodox maintained that their church “is the one true church of Christ, which as his body is not and cannot be divided” (Dublin 1984, 9). The strength of this view in its pristine form resides in its witness to the ontological realism of God’s self-gift to “the one undivided historical church”: “We are not merely moving towards unity, but rather our very existence derives from the inseparable union between the three persons of the Holy Trinity given to us as a historical event on the day of Pentecost” (Nikos Nissiotis). Its difficulty, especially apparent in an ecumenical age, lies in giving an account of the prima facie presence of faith* beyond the bounds of one’s own community. In an exercise of “economy”,* the Orthodox have not always required baptism of those coming to them from at least certain other would-be Christian communities, while insisting that this is not a general recognition of the baptisms performed there in the absence of conversion to Orthodoxy.

2. According to a view indebted to Augustine (d.430), outside baptisms may be valid (at least in the sense that a convert will not be re-baptized, on the grounds that, whoever baptizes, “it is Christ who baptizes”), but they will not be “fruitful” before conversion to the true church. This view has the advantage of acknowledging Christ’s sovereignty over his sacraments, while retaining the importance of the ecclesial connection for their benefits; but it involves the problem of a gap, both notional and temporal, between “validity” and “efficacy”. Historically, the Augustinian position is characteristic of Rome. The council of Trent* anathematized any who should deny that baptism performed in water in the name of the Trinity* with the intention of doing what the church does was true baptism; but in cases where the persons baptized belonged to communities holding beliefs judged contrary to Roman doctrine, such baptisms could hardly be more than merely valid, since their efficacy for salvation would be immediately cut off by the anathemas* attaching to heresies and schism.

3. A view that elements of the faith persisted, even savingly, outside one’s own community eventually led some to the detection of “traces of the church” (vestigia ecclesiae) beyond their own institution. The classic Protestant reformers, and particularly perhaps Calvin (no doubt on a predestinarian base), were willing to recognize that there were Christians present within the unreformed Roman communion, which has not been left entirely without the means of grace (Institutes 4.2.11-12). Despite the bull Unam Sanctam of 1302, in which Pope Boniface VIII declared in face of “the Greeks” as well as of political resistance in the West that “it is altogether necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman pontiff”, the Roman church maintained an intermittent dialogue with the “Eastern churches” (with the ecclesial designation apparently acquiring increased substance from Leo XIII onwards, until indeed the designation by Paul VI of Constantinople as a “sister church” appears to transcend the vestigia ecclesiae model).

Eventually, and clearly from the 19th century onwards, Rome from its standpoint counted Protestants among the “separated brethren”, with an increasing emphasis on the family ties that still joined them to Rome across the division. Vatican II* declared that, by virtue of their baptism and the faith in Christ thereby signified, such individuals enjoy “a certain, though imperfect, communion” with the Roman Catholic Church (Unitatis Redintegratio 3). Even their communities that stem from the Reformation are “not devoid of meaning and value in the mystery of salvation” (ibid.; cf. 19-23). The scriptures and the rites, as well as the faith, hope and love, that are found outside the Roman Catholic Church, belong by rights, however, to the “one church of Christ”, which, according to Lumen Gentium 8, “subsists in” the Roman Catholic Church. The interpretation of Vatican II’s subsistit in is controversial even among Roman Catholic theologians; but it is in any case clear that other Christians and their communities have difficulty with the notion that they need the mediation of the Roman Catholic Church in order to be (part of) the church of Christ, and consequently with any interpretation of Vatican II’s idea that elements of the faith outside Roman bounds properly “lead back” to the unity with the RCC in terms of a restored unity in the RCC.

4. While the Protestant reformers did not abandon the institutional aspect of the church, a stronger emphasis was placed, particularly perhaps on the Lutheran side, upon the church as “event”. When the Augsburg confession declares in article 7 that “the church is a gathering of believers in which the gospel is purely preached and the sacraments are administered according to the gospel”, the direction of thought among Lutheran interpreters is less likely to be that of the church celebrating the word and the sacraments than that of word and sacraments constituting the congregation. This more punctiliar or episodic view of the church has the advantages of dynamism and of allowing for repeated correction of the church by God; but it has difficulty in concretizing a pastoral and teaching office for the sake of the continuity or identity of the believing fellowship in time and space.

5. A “branch theory” of the church has been most characteristic of Anglicanism. It may be as early as the prayer of Bishop Lancelot Andrewes (1555-1626) for “the church catholic: Eastern, Western, British”. Certainly the 19th-century Oxford movement and its aftermath thought in terms of the Greek, Latin and Anglican churches (see William Palmer’s Treatise on the Church of Christ, 1838). This model retains or revives something of the “substantialist” or “institutionalist” aspects of the Cyprianic. But it differs in holding that schism is, even if only temporarily, “internal” to the church. It may, in the end, prove to be the way by which at least the two “sister churches” of Rome and Constantinople find reconciliation between themselves.

6. Protestant pietism of the 17th and 18th centuries was the seedbed for a more subjective ecclesiology. Christianity appears as a religion of the heart, in which fellowship consists in a warm personal relationship with Christ and with the brothers and sisters. The church consists of “true believers everywhere”, and even though outward circumstances and differences over non-essentials may, as Wesley put it in his sermon on a “Catholic Spirit”, “prevent an entire external union”, they do not preclude a “union in affection”. This view is characteristic of many who in recent times have been called Evangelicals. It may serve as a valuable reminder that institutional unity without spiritual unity would be a mere facade; its weakness is that it tends to acquiesce too easily in visible disunity.

Avery Dulles has wondered whether the one-sided emphasis on the church as a “spiritual community” does not underlie “the repeated statements in WCC literature that the aim of the ecumenical movement is to manifest, rather than to bring about, the oneness of Christ’s church” (Theological Studies, 1972). Certainly the New Delhi 1961 description of the unity which is both God’s will and gift, for which we must both work and pray, speaks of its “being made visible as...” Yet this very formulation makes clear that classical ecumenism is not content with a merely “invisibilist” unity.

7. The great rise of Protestant missions in the 18th and 19th centuries brought an evangelistic model of the church into prominence. A sacramental symptom is the practice of what Methodists in particular, in an exaggeration of Wesley’s notion of the Lord’s supper as a “converting ordinance”, call “open communion”. In the 1950s and 1960s, this vision acquired a renewed eschatological intensity in the advocacy by the Dutch missiologist J.C. Hoekendijk of a sacramental banquet totally “open to the world”: “Communion as an eschatological sacrament is the representation of the kingdom in the world; it is impossible to lock up the kingdom in the church, it is equally impossible to make this sacrament of the kingdom a purely churchly event.” The attractiveness of this ecclesiology resides in its perception of the inviting character of the gospel and the welcoming nature of the church. The danger is that, since by receiving communion one becomes henceforth part of the proclaiming community, the identity of that body and its message may be obscured or lost through the immediate aggregation of persons who do not yet have the depth of understanding and commitment signified by baptism and the profession of faith.

8. With the Life and Work* movement, the last ecclesiological vision to be listed believes that “service unites”. This pragmatic or “secular” (Avery Dulles) approach finds Christian unity pre-eminently expressed in a diaconal ministry amid the needy of the world. Collaborators for justice* and peace* may celebrate their fellowship, as happened in places in the 1960s, with a holy meal on the march or on the barricades. The sacrament here helps to keep the Christological inspiration present to the participants and should in turn bring home to all Christians the social and ethical implications of their faith. The main problem with this view is that it minimizes the doctrinal and institutional components of Christianity.

SHIFTS IN ECCLESIOLOGICAL METHODOLOGY

Only when the institutions claiming to be church are deliberately aware, by virtue of this or a similar typology, of the diversity in their starting points is it possible to go beyond bland re-affirmations concerning the church as “people of God”, “Body of Christ” and “community of the Holy Spirit” that leave intact the problem of a divided Christianity. In the light of an awareness of their own starting points and those of the others, however, the churches are enabled to examine afresh the scriptural and traditional images with a view to re-discovering the nature, tasks and concrete location of the church. As part of a joint hermeneutical endeavour, conducted with a readiness for self-criticism and a willingness to look at others sympathetically, the churches now need to ask again where the agreed “marks of the church” are concretely to be found. Are they recognizable in my own community? In which other communities are they recognizable? What do these discernments mean for the restoration of fellowship, communion and unity?

Ecclesiology in fact became a key topic in both bilateral and multilateral dialogues and relationships in the 1980s. It is often said that the world conference on F&O at Lund in 1952 marked the end of “comparative ecclesiology” and the transition to a method whereby all ecumenical partners would focus together upon the Christological, Trinitarian, salvation-historical centre and source of the church. This concentration was valuable. But the convergences it produced – as most notably in the Lima text on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry – then make it necessary, precisely in so far as they appear to bring the possibility of unity closer, to integrate again, now in a more hopeful light, the questions raised by comparative ecclesiology. If so many of the churches’ responses to BEM asked after its ecclesiological implications, it was on account of not only its presuppositions but also its possible consequences. The preface to BEM itself put to the churches the question of “the consequences your church can draw from this text for its relations and dialogues with other churches, particularly with those churches which also recognize the text as an expression of the apostolic faith”. Concurrently, the international bilateral dialogues* among Christian World Communions* have recognized that as progress is registered towards agreement in the faith, so the presently divided communities, as carriers of that faith, are by that very fact coming ecclesially closer to one another and so need a doctrine of the church that holds open the prospect of mutual recognition and eventually unity.

ECCLESIOLOGY IN THE BILATERAL DIALOGUES

One of the first bilateral dialogues to give explicit attention to ecclesiology was the Old Catholic-Orthodox dialogue* (Chambésy 1977, Bonn 1979, Zagorsk 1981). In a section on “the boundaries of the church” (Bonn, 27-31), each party affirms, despite their present lack of communion with each other, that “from the day it was founded right down to our own days, the true church, the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church, has gone on existing without any discontinuity wherever the true faith, worship and order of the undivided church are preserved unimpaired” (29). To take account, no doubt, at least of their own situation vis-a-vis each other, the mixed commission tentatively asserts that “since it is impossible to set limits to God’s power..., it can be considered as not excluded that the divine omnipotence and grace are present and operative wherever the departure from the fullness of truth in the one church is not complete and does not go to the lengths of a complete estrangement from the truth” (30).

The Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue* began with a treatment of “The Mystery of the Church and of the Eucharist in the Light of the Mystery of the Holy Trinity” (Munich 1982): “The church exists in history as a local church... in a given place” (2.1), but it is already “eschatological” (2.2). There is a “Jerusalem from on high”, which “comes down from God”; a “communion which is at the foundation of the community itself”, so that “the church comes into being by a free gift, that of the new creation” (2.1). The church “manifests itself when it is assembled”, most fully in the eucharist (2.1). The eucharist includes “the proclamation of the word to the assembly, and the response of faith given by all” (2.2). “Each eucharistic assembly is truly the holy church of God, the Body of Christ, in communion with the first community of the disciples and with all who throughout the world celebrate and have celebrated the memorial of the Lord” (3.1). There are two conditions for a local church* to be “truly within the ecclesial communion”: first and fundamentally, “the identity of the mystery of the church lived by the local church with the mystery of the church lived by the primitive church”; and then, “mutual recognition today between this local church and the other churches... Each should recognize in the others through local particularities the identity of the mystery of the church.” This mutual recognition depends on “communion in the same kerygma, and so in the same faith”, and on “the will for communion in love and in service, not only in words but in deeds” (3.3).

Subsequent stages of the Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue on faith, sacraments and order (Bari 1987; Uusi Valamo 1988) worked towards achieving the conditions of such mutual recognition among the local churches of their respective communions. Then, however, geopolitical developments intervened to force the dialogue to concentrate on the very concrete ecclesiological questions raised by the re-emergence of the Eastern Catholic churches* in the former Soviet empire. A document produced at Balamand, Lebanon, in 1993 rejected Uniatism* as a “method of union of the past”. If unity is to be “re-established” between the “sister churches of East and West” (and division between them is “contrary to the nature of the church”), it will be by way of a “common quest for a full accord on the content of the faith and its implications” (6; 14; 15) through a theological dialogue in a context of love, trust and practical respect; it will entail the renunciation of mutually exclusive claims to be the sole locus of salvation (10; 13).

In 2000, independently of each other, authoritative sources among Catholics and Orthodox reiterated the basic ecclesiological positions of their respective churches. In the declaration Dominus Iesus, the Vatican’s Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith reasserted that the one church of Christ “subsists in” the Roman Catholic Church, while churches that have “apostolic succession and a valid eucharist” but are not in perfect communion with the Roman Catholic Church are considered to be “true particular churches”, in which the church of Christ is “present and operative”; other “ecclesial communities”, without “the valid episcopate and the genuine and integral substance of the eucharist”, “are not churches in the proper sense”, although the baptized in them “are in a certain communion, albeit imperfect, with the church”. In setting out “Basic Principles of the Attitude of the Russian Orthodox Church towards the Other Christian Confessions”, the bishops’ council of the Moscow patriarchate reaffirmed that “the Orthodox church is the true church in which the holy Tradition and the fullness of God’s saving grace are preserved intact”; however, “a divided Christendom” still contains “certain characteristics which make it one: the word of God, faith in Christ as God and Saviour come in the flesh, and sincere devotion”, so that “there remains a certain incomplete fellowship which serves as the pledge of a return to unity in the church, to catholic fullness and oneness”.

In the 1984 Dublin statement between Orthodox and Anglicans on “the mystery of the church”, the Orthodox affirmed their own identity with the one true church of Christ; but “at the same time they see Anglicans as brothers and sisters in Christ who are seeking with them the union of all Christians in the one church” (9). The two parties “are not agreed on the account to be given of the sinfulness and division which is to be observed in the life of Christian communities. For Anglicans, because the church under Christ is the community where God’s grace is at work, healing and transforming sinful men and women, and because grace in the church is mediated through those who are themselves undergoing such transformation, the struggle between grace and sin is to be seen as characteristic of, rather than accidental to, the church on earth” (99); consequently, “we disagree in our view of the relationship between the church’s basic unity and the present state of division between Christians. The Anglican members see our divisions as existing within the church, while the Orthodox members believe that the Orthodox church is the one true church of Christ, which as his Body is not and cannot be divided” (100).

In the Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue,* ARCIC I in the introduction to its Final Report (1982) revealed that the implicit leitmotif in its earlier texts on eucharist, ministry and authority had been “the concept of koinonia (communion)” in its Trinitarian, Christological and ecclesiological aspects: “Koinonia with one another is entailed by our koinonia with God in Christ. This is the mystery of the church” (intro., 5). This then set the context for the first statement of ARCIC II, on “Salvation and the Church” (Llandaff 1986). Ecclesologically, the most lapidary formulation in that text is the declaration that “the church is called to be, and by the power of the Spirit actually is, a sign, steward and instrument of God’s design. For this reason it can be described as sacrament of God’s saving work” (29). This is, first, an attempt to deal with the tension which ARCIC I’s co-chairmen had already recognized in 1976 between the ideal and the actual, a tension which affects the ecclesial life of both churches as well as the relations between them. The Llandaff text writes further to this point: “The credibility of the church’s witness is undermined by the sin of its members, the shortcomings of its human institutions, and not least by the scandal of division. The church is in constant need of repentance and renewal so that it can be more clearly seen for what it is: the one, holy body of Christ. Nevertheless the gospel contains the promise that despite all failures the church will be used by God in the achievement of his purpose: to draw humanity into communion with himself and with one another, so as to share his life, the life of the Holy Trinity” (29).

Second, the language of the Llandaff text about the church as “sign, steward and instrument” (29) – “of what it has received” (27) – is an attempt to overcome the historic Reformation controversy concerning “the role of the church in the process of salvation”: “As well as believing that Catholics did not acknowledge the true authority of scripture over the church, Protestants also felt that Catholic teaching and practice had interpreted the mediatorial role of the church in such a way as to derogate from the place of Christ as ‘sole mediator between God and man’ (1 Tim. 2:5). Catholics believed that Protestants were abandoning or at least devaluing the church’s ministry and sacraments, which were divinely appointed means of grace; also that they were rejecting its divinely given authority as guardian and interpreter of the revealed word of God” (7). Now the church is jointly affirmed to be both “evangelized and evangelizing, reconciled and reconciling, gathered together and gathering others” (28).

In viewing “The Church as Communion” (1991), ARCIC II spoke of it (without article) as “sacrament of the merciful grace of God for all humankind” (5). The “constitutive elements essential for the full visible communion of the church” comprised “the confession of the one apostolic faith”, “one baptism”, “one celebration of the eucharist”, “shared commitment to the mission entrusted by Christ to his church”, “shared concern” and “mutual forbearance”, “acceptance of the same basic moral values”, and “a ministry of oversight, the fullness of which is entrusted to the episcopate” (44-45). In “Life in Christ: Morals, Communion and the Church” (1994), the commission questioned whether the existence of divergent “practical and pastoral judgment” on such ethical issues as divorce,* contraception, abortion* and homosexuality* was “itself sufficient to justify a continuing breach in communion”, since (in the commission’s opinion) these differences occurred within “the same controlling vision of the nature and destiny of humanity” (1).

Ecclesiology is now recognized to be the “lodestone” (André Birmelé) of the international Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue,* which had in fact begun with “The Gospel and the Church” (Malta 1972). As interpreted in Birmelé’s very detailed study of the continuing dialogue (1986), there still remained “a basic difference” concerning “the nature of the instrumentality of the church in the transmission of salvation” (which ARCIC identified as a Reformation controversy). According to Birmelé, this difference remains divisive because it is not fully covered by “the even more fundamental... broad consensus” on the gospel and salvation in Jesus Christ: the problem is that ecclesiology is, in the Catholic view, integral to a sufficiently complete agreement on the matter in hand, whereas Lutheranism permits a variety of ecclesiologies, since the doctrine of the church is not itself a (primary) part of the gospel.

By the time of its 1994 report, “Church and Justification”, the Lutheran-Roman Catholic international commission believed that sufficient agreement existed on the doctrine of justification for justification to be used as a common critical principle throughout the realm of ecclesiology, for “all church doctrine, order and practice” (168). But significant differences were seen to remain when it came to the application of this criterion in such questions as the “institutional continuity of the church” (174-81), “ordained ministry as an institution in the church” (182-204), authoritative “church doctrine and the teaching function of the ministry” (205-22), “church jurisdiction and the jurisdictional function of the ministry” (223-41), with all these matters reaching their sharpest focus in the question as to whether “the episcopal office” in “historic... and apostolic succession” is to be judged “necessary” and “indispensable” (Catholic) or “important”, “meaningful” and “thus desirable” (Lutheran) in the service of the church and the gospel of salvation (193-204). For Lutherans, insistence on the necessity and indispensability of the episcopate endangers the “unconditional” gospel; for Catholics, the lack of the episcopate jeopardizes the churchly function of mediating the apostolic gospel. All these ecclesiological questions remained to be dealt with after the signing in 1999 of the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification between the Lutheran World Federation and the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, wherein the two parties declared that the mutual anathemas of the 16th century did not strike the current teaching of Catholics and Lutherans as represented in the document itself.

In the Lutheran-Methodist dialogue,* the Lutheran World Federation and the World Methodist Council were able to reach a mutually satisfying agreement on “The Church: Community of Grace” (1984). The leading statement is this: “The church is the community of Jesus Christ called into being by the Holy Spirit. Those who respond in faith to the gospel of Christ, proclaimed in word and sacrament, are brought into a new relationship with God and with one another” (28). The joint commission recommended that the member churches “take steps to declare and establish full fellowship of word and sacrament” (91), while admitting the need for further study on “forms of unity” (88).

Concurrently, the World Methodist Council conducted the ecclesiological phase of its dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church (see Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue) under the rubric of koinonia: “Because God so loved the world, he sent his Son and the Holy Spirit to draw us into communion with himself. This sharing in God’s life, which resulted from the mission of the Son and the Holy Spirit, found expression in a visible community of Christ’s disciples, the church” (Nairobi 1986, 1). Both the Singapore report of 1991 (“The Apostolic Tradition”) and the Rio de Janeiro report of 1996 (“The Word of Life”) were governed by that statement. Under its aegis the two sides sought to discern, from their respective standpoints, as common as possible a pattern of the Christian faith, worship, life, community and mission, while foreseeing that “when the time comes that Methodists and Catholics declare their readiness for that 'full communion in faith, mission and sacramental life' towards which they are working, the mutual recognition of ministry will be achieved not only by their having reached doctrinal consensus but will also depend upon a fresh creative act of reconciliation which acknowledges the manifold yet unified activity of the Holy Spirit throughout the ages. It will involve a joint act of obedience to the sovereign word of God" (Singapore, 94). Teaching authority* was the aspect of ecclesiology discussed in the Brighton report of 2001 ("Speaking the Truth in Love").

Meanwhile, in the Anglican-Methodist dialogue,* the international commission in its report "Sharing in the Apostolic Communion" (1996) recommended to its principals – the World Methodist Council and the Lambeth conference – that they make a mutual declaration, to be liturgically celebrated, that both Anglican and Methodist churches "belong to the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church of Jesus Christ" and "share in the common confession and heritage of the apostolic faith", and that canonical provisions be prepared for growth into a "fuller communion" that will include "agreement in core doctrines" (judged by the commission to exist at present), "common baptism" and "mutual recognition of members", "a eucharistic communion going beyond mutual hospitality", "mutual recognition and interchangeability of ministries and rites", "the fellowship of help, encouragement and prayer for one another", "collaboration in evangelism, mission and service", and "national, regional and local structures of common decision-making" (7; 95). While the World Methodist Council approved the report in 1996, the Lambeth conference of 1998 called for more work at regional level before any global steps towards not just the "acknowledgment" but the apostolic "recognition" of Methodist churches, reconciliation and unity.

Dialogues involving the World Alliance of Reformed Churches have emphasized the location and role of the church in the world. This was already the case of the first Reformed-Roman Catholic dialogue,* "The Presence of Christ in Church and World" (1970-77), and it continued in "Church as Community of Common Witness to the Kingdom of God" (from 1999). In the Anglican-Reformed dialogue,* the international commission's report on "God's Reign and Our Unity" (1984) saw the church as "a pilgrim people called to a journey whose goal is nothing less than God's blessed kingdom embracing all nations and all creation, a sign, instrument and foretaste of God's purpose 'to sum up all things with Christ as head' (Eph. 1:10). It is only in this missionary and eschatological perspective that the question of unity is rightly seen" (14): "The church is thus a provisional embodiment of God's final purpose for all human beings and for all creation. It is an embodiment because it is a body of actual men and women chosen by God to share through the Spirit in the life of Christ and so in his ministry in the world. It is provisional in a double sense: only part of the human family has been brought into its life, and those who have been so brought are only partly conformed to God's purpose. If they were fully conformed, they would be fully reconciled to one another. The quest for unity is one aspect of the church's acting out of her unceasing prayer: 'Your kingdom come'" (30).

The "theological conversations sponsored by the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Baptist World Alliance" (1973-77) showed an awareness that the issue of the nature and conditions of baptism is "central to the ecclesiological question, confronting the whole ecumenical movement, on the nature and understanding of the church" (intro.). "The Reformed tradition", which includes the baptism of infants, "emphasizes the community of salvation and thus the thought of the church as also a mixed body (corpus permixtum, see Matt. 13:24-30, 47-50)... The Baptist tradition emphasizes the aspect of mission and the thought of the church as 'gathered believers' committed to the task of proclaiming the gospel to each individual (see Matt. 28:16-20)" (8). The place and role of the church in the world are clearly at issue again here. Baptists and Reformed were able to note some practical convergences between them, e.g. the "dual practice" in some Reformed churches whereby "believer's baptism is as legitimate as infant baptism", and "the important fact that many Baptist churches admit other Christians, baptized as infants, to the Lord's supper on the basis of their personal faith in Christ and when they are in good standing with their own churches, a practice which is a de facto recognition of their Christian status" (17).

ECCLESIOLOGY IN FAITH AND ORDER AFTER BEM

Taking up the questions and requests of the churches in their responses to BEM, the WCC F&O commission at Budapest 1989 resolved to undertake a major ecclesiological study which would integrate at least some aspects of the projects on "The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community" and "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today".

A preliminary sketch proposed making koinonia* a major, though not exclusive, category: "Koinonia in the life of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit (see John 14:17; 1 John 1:2-10; 2 Pet. 1:4; 1 Cor. 1:9; 2 Cor. 13:13) is the life centre of all who confess Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour. They share and participate in the gospel and in the apostolic faith, in suffering and in service (2 Cor. 8:4; Rom. 15:26; Acts 2:32). This koinonia is lived in Christ through baptism (Rom. 6) and the eucharist (1 Cor. 10-11) and in the community with its pastors and guides (Heb. 13). Koinonia means in addition the participation in the holy things of God and the communion of saints of all times and places (communio sanctorum in the double sense of the word). Each local Christian community is related in koinonia with all other local Christian communities with whom it shares the same faith. In this koinonia they live the catholicity of the church... Such a koinonia is not an inward-looking group of believers, but a missionary community sent into the world to bear witness to God's love for humanity and creation." It was hoped that this would allow the integration – into "a convergent vision on the nature, unity and mission of the church" – of different, but potentially complementary, key conceptions and images that all belong to the common biblical heritage but have been particularly emphasized by different Christian traditions: the church as gift of the word of God (creatura verbi), as mystery or sacrament of God's love for the world, as the pilgrim people of God, and as servant and prophetic sign of God's coming kingdom (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, 1982-1990: Report on the Process and Responses, pp.147-51).

Under the guidance of work done in F&O, the seventh assembly of the WCC (Canberra 1991) adopted a brief statement on "The Unity of the Church as Koinonia: Gift and Calling". The fifth world conference on Faith and Order, held at Santiago de Compostela in 1993, was in fact conducted under the title "Towards Koinonia in Faith, Life and Witness". Section I devoted itself to a basic "understanding of koinonia and its implications". Section II took up the apostolic faith study under "Confessing the One Faith to God's Glory" and encouraged the churches in their continuing consideration of Confessing the One Faith (1991); and this was also seen as the area to which the called-for development of "an ecumenical hermeneutic" would most naturally be related. Under "Sharing a Common Life in Christ", section III sought to harvest the fruits of the BEM process and prepared the way for the 1994 Ditchingham conference and report "Towards Koinonia in Worship". Under "Called to a Common Witness for a Renewed World", section IV prolonged the theme of the church and the human community in its emergent shape as "ecclesiology and ethics".* Thus the principal functions of the church – martyria, leitourgia, and diakonia – were retained in interwoven fashion in F&O's continuing ecclesiological reflection as it now worked towards a major statement on "The Church as Koinonia".

Faith and Order's principal post-Santiago study on ecclesiology produced in 1998 an interim statement on "The Nature and Purpose of the Church". Some basic agreements were solidified: the divine origin of the church as the creation of the Word and of the Spirit (creatura Verbi, creatura Spiritus); the Trinitarian pattern of the church as "people of God", "Body of Christ", "temple of the Holy Spirit"; the calling of the church, as "a reflection of the communion in the Triune God", to be "the instrument" in fulfilling "God's design to gather all creation under the lordship of Christ" as it "participates in the mission of Christ to reconcile all things to God and to one another". It was noted that the notion of koinonia, in its “richness of meaning”, was being reclaimed in the ecumenical movement as “a key to understanding the nature and purpose of the church”, although the document admitted that some were asking “whether this notion is being called to bear more weight than it is able to carry”. In a new typographical device of “problem boxes”, certain “remaining areas of difficulty and disagreement” were detailed, some of them familiar, some partly resolved, some just emerging. The old included the following: the relation between the institutional dimension of the church and the work of the Holy Spirit; the church and sin (can the church sin, or only its members?); the propriety of speaking of the church itself in terms of “sacrament”; the varied understandings of “communion” and “visible unity”; the limits of legitimate diversity in regard to cultural expression, doctrinal emphases and confessional identity; the relation between the local and the universal dimensions of the church; the more precise understanding and practice of baptism, eucharist and ministry; the communal, personal and collegial dimensions of oversight, including the relation between conciliarity and primacy. Among the new problems: it was reported that in the matter of confessing the apostolic faith, churches now differed on whether it was “church-dividing, to understand the resurrection of Christ only symbolically; to confess Christ only as one mediator among others”; and that in the matter of ethics, “an increasing range of issues, including those of human sexuality, have polarized Christian communities and risk damaging or destroying the bonds of koinonia already existing”. Most fundamentally for the ecclesiological question, the 1998 statement recognized that “churches understand their relation to the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church in different ways”, and that “this has a bearing upon the way they relate to other churches and their perception of the road to visible unity.”

Perhaps the most promising feature in all this recent process is the repeated invitations to existing ecclesial communities to integrate current concrete achievements – such as convergence in liturgical understanding and practice, the establishment of concordats of communion in word and sacrament, joint engagement in evangelistic and social concerns and action, the creation of ecumenical parishes, and full constitutional unions at national levels – into their dogmatic ecclesiology and thence to make legal and practical provision for further growth “on the way to fuller koinonia” (to use the title of the official report from Santiago).

FROM DIVISION, THROUGH RECONCILIATION, TOWARDS THE KINGDOM

All the bilateral and multilateral reflections on ecclesiology recognize and try to give an account of a number of tensions that may in fact be variants of a single tension: between the ideal and the actual, the believed and the empirical, the already and the not yet. The four “notes” of the church – its unity,* holiness,* catholicity,* and apostolicity* – all labour under that tension: there is need for reconciliation and a manifest unity; there is an imperative to the conquest of sin and a growth in holiness; there is room for many forms of the true faith in a harmonious catholicity; there is a test of apostolicity to be applied to all intended embodiments of the gospel message.

According to the Toronto statement* of 1950, no church is required to give up its own ecclesiology for membership in the WCC. Ecclesiological dialogues, whether under the auspices of the WCC or not, show churches discovering the presence of Christian faith and life beyond their own boundaries, struggling to formulate an account of that fact which may in effect gradually modify their respective ecclesiological theories, and reflecting on the conditions and means of bringing all acknowledged Christians and their divided communities into the unity which the gospel entails. The Methodist-Roman Catholic report of Nairobi 1986 judges that “as we reflect on a re-united church, we cannot expect to find an ecclesiology shaped in a time of division to be entirely satisfactory”. Nevertheless, “our explorations towards a more adequate ecclesiology have begun and are helping us to give proper recognition to each other’s ecclesial or churchly character. They will also assist in overcoming our present state of division” (22). Not even an ecumenically formulated ecclesiology may be perfect, yet it remains the task of the ecumenical movement to fashion a faithful doctrine of the church that will best allow for the recognition of the Christian reality wherever it is found, for the reconciliation of those who have been divided, and for the life henceforth in a church that is seeking that perfection of unity, holiness, catholicity and apostolicity which will mark the completed kingdom of God.*

CHURCH AND STATE

THE TWO modern Christian terms refer to the distinctive practices, pieties and politics of communities of worship in relation to institutions of governance in a nation by law and social conventions. More broadly, the terms indicate that religion and politics are never identical but always shape each other accordingly as each is constituted.

In tribal and clan-based societies, religious traditions and a sense of a natural order of things are linked to political authority and tied into a common social fabric, way of life and ethnic identity. Enduring over long periods, these unities are subject to conquest or hegemony by more complex and dynamic systems of religious, social and political life. These traditions survive by mixing with dominant patterns of belief and power to form religious sub-cultures, which exist in every mixed society.

Complex civilizations integrate a number of tribal peoples into large systems in various ways. What is called Confucianism, for example, was for centuries the systematic extension of a particular spiritual-moral cluster of insights, loyalties and practices that imperial designs established over a vast region and many peoples. In practice, the emperor was guided in cosmology, ritual behaviour and policy by a "priestly" array of trained "literati" who administered the system and instructed the people in their moral and spiritual duties. All other groups, beliefs and centres of power were subordinated to the whole, sometimes in authoritarian, sometimes in totalitarian ways. Maoism continued the pattern in China by sharply restricting ideas of either independent churches or alternative political parties.

In contrast, what we call "Hinduism", the complex metaphysical-moral philosophies of India, stacked the peoples of the Indian sub-continent into a ladder of religio-ethnic "castes". Each caste* had a distinctive set of ritual behaviours, status markers and economic roles. Political rulers were subordinate to the “hierarchy”, the dominant, priestly Brahmins who developed this complex social spirituality and instructed the many regional maharajas, kings and princes who stood below them on the social scale, on political and sacred duties. Various gurus and local sadhhus nurtured comparable beliefs among the “lower” farmers, traders and workers. Each group had its own form of piety, interfamilial network and territory, and understood its place in the hierarchical arrangement. Tribal and landless peoples who did not integrate into the system were excluded from full participation in society, although current Hindu renewal movements are seeking to convert them – efforts opposed by Marxist “outcast” parties and non-Hindu religions.

The Buddhist protest against Brahmanic domination in favour of a more humanist enlightenment was the most important effort to reform that system. The Buddha thought that Hindu forms of piety were fruitless, and after a long spiritual search he discovered another way – a spiritual path focused in the inner state of consciousness. In time, Buddhism was largely driven from India, for it challenged the structured hierarchy of the society. However, Buddhist missionaries also carried hierarchical views into surrounding cultures. Although “truly enlightened” minds detached themselves from such mundane matters as politics, monks and nuns came to be viewed as “jewels in the crown of the king”. This tradition could, thus, adapt into a monarchical Thailand, an imperial Japan or a hierarchical Tibet.

In Islam, religion may relate to politics by legitimating support of imperial domination or hierarchical guide and by subordinating political authority to a legal system (sharia) or through flexible adaptations to existing regimes. Characteristically, the Sunni tradition inclines rule by the Caliph, the Shi’a by the Ayatollah, while the heterodox Sufi adapts to many settings. Still, Islam is closer to the tribal traditions where faith and politics are interwoven into a unified vision. However, that ideal is then projected as the ideal for all of humanity under the one Allah and his holy law. In principle, the Caliph, Ayatollah and mystical Saint all see political and religious leadership inextricably interlocked, cooperating to turn the “brotherhood of Islam” into a universal theocracy. Thus, Islam is not only hostile to the many deities of Hinduism, but to the godlessness of Confucianism and Buddhism, to the ethnocentrism of Judaism, and to Christianity’s separation of church and state which, they say, leads to the secularization of politics.

Tribal, imperial, hierarchical, personal-adaptive and theocratic patterns have, with nuanced variations, exemplified the most frequent attempts to integrate religion and politics into an encompassing civilization. The patterns are found also in the biblical record: in the twelve tribes of Israel, in the imperial Davidic dynasty, in the later priestly hierarchy of the Jerusalem temple, in the enlightened insights of “Wisdom” writings, and in the theocratic impulses of the prophets.

A model which is, in principle, distinct from these, however, appears in the Christian formation of the church.* Its establishment brought a revolution in social history. It formed a new centre for identity and society distinct from politics. It became a body of believers “called out” (ekklesia) and “called together” (synagogues) for worship and mutual edification, and “sent” in mission to all peoples. The new model modified existing ideas of assembly and gathering and human fulfilment.

This new community (koinonia*) understood itself as the Body of Christ in space and time. It is distinct from tribal identity (“God can raise up children of Abraham out of these very stones”, Matt. 3:9) and is not rooted in kinship connections (“whoever does the will of God is my brother and sister and mother”, Mark 3:34-35). People are baptized into the church, for birth does not confer religious membership as in tribal, Sinitic or Hindic societies; and social condition or genetic make-up does not determine status (“in Christ there is neither Jew nor Greek, slave nor free, male nor female”, Gal. 3:28). As an institution distinct from political authority, the church could not be identified with imperial or royal rule (“my kingdom is not of this world”, John 18:36). Of course, the church was to honour true and just political authorities, “appointed by God” and “not a terror to good conduct, but to bad” (Rom. 13:1-3). Thus the church could “render unto Caesar what is Caesar’s...”, but distinguish its duties under God from political rule (“but render unto God what is God’s”, Matt. 22:21).

Such Christian claims challenged traditional political legitimacy in all its models, but it did so with difficulty, for conversion does not destroy tribal identity, or cancel patterns of authority that reflect imperial authority, hierarchy or theocracy, or profound personal spiritual quest. As Christianity spread, it faced all these possibilities.

After Constantine had become the Roman emperor, he proclaimed toleration for all Christians of the empire (313) after years of persecution, and he sought their support. When Theodosius declared Christianity to be the official religion of the empire (380), the church had to decide how to relate to political power.

On the whole, the Eastern (Orthodox) churches bent towards the imperial model, while the Western (Catholic) ones leaned towards hierarchy, centred in the papacy. In both, the secular and the spiritual realms were linked, but two fateful developments took place in the West. After Rome fell, in 800 the pope crowned Charlemagne emperor, temporarily subordinating imperial authority to the church and its bishops. Later (962), Otto I revived a “holy Roman empire”. The Germanic ruler and his successors used the church to provide Christendom’s moral and spiritual inner fabric. This imperial pattern lasted, in name at least, until its final dissolution by Francis II’s abdication in 1806.

Christendom’s millennium of imperial/hierocratic interaction faced difficulties. In principle, both church and regime operated under the laws of God, for the purposes of God, and on behalf of the people. But in fact popes and kings engaged in endless jousts over who had the right to crown or excommunicate rulers, and who had the authority to appoint or remove clergy. Still, within this dual structure, the church cultivated the vision of a pluralistic commonwealth, a “Christendom” with many parts – craft guilds, charities, cities, corporations, universities and territories – all ruled by the twin powers of religious and secular authority working side by side under a higher law for an ultimate purpose – the salvation of humanity. Further, the terms of this rule were codified in canon law,* the first actual “constitutional government” in history. However, canon law was essentially the church’s law, although emperors called councils to elect or depose popes, and popes altered law to constrict rulers who acted against ecclesial interests.

The Reformation, in part, radicalized these developments. Luther publicly burned the book of canon law. The reformers engendered an intense new interest in the Bible, then made widely available through vernacular translations and new printing methods. The reformers also drew upon the humanist recovery of classical learning and the new interest in science, and helped generate a new nationalism linked both to a demand for cultural autonomy and a new individualism. Neither peoples nor persons wanted their beliefs or morals dictated by a distant hierarchy any more than they wanted to be ruled by the residues of old empires.

In these developments, a proto-democratic spirit was born. A common faith no longer held together the body politic, so new creeds had to be developed. Options proliferated. Each region had to decide which creed, now linked to national culture rather than to a supra-national canon law, should rule, and which part of the biblical heritage should be the model. Debate became sharp: which church is most faithful to scriptures, best supports the people, and should legitimate what political order?

A quick resolution of these issues was not possible. Not only did the Catholics mobilize political and military forces to constrain Protestant dissidents to preserve hierocratic standing, but Lutherans and Calvinists also tried to defend and extend their newly articulated faith, sometimes in theocratic ways. The Wars of Religion that swept the continent, and later the British Isles, forced all who tried to remain neutral to take a stance. These wars continued until the peace of Westphalia of 1648, which made the creeds “national” under the principle of “whoever reigns, his religion”. Here, then, was the establishment of modern notions of the sovereignty of the nation state and the acceptance of a pluralism of churches. These ideas deeply influenced colonial America. Each state had its own church!

Old models of religion and politics re-appeared in new constellations of church and state. But three movements sought more radical changes. One argued that certain teachings of Jesus demanded that the church and its members should have little to do with the state. Mennonites* and Friends* (Quakers), for example, held that since the state uses coercive force, believers should renounce participation, and instead show by example a genuine communal democracy among believers in the church. Such groups were harshly treated by those who held that believers must also be citizens and sometimes soldiers, but these groups also gradually evoked tolerance for religious minorities.

A second movement tended to “baptize” primal cultures by giving them spiritual legitimacy. The shattered hegemony of earlier models unleashed a host of new nationalisms. A politicized neo-pagan “tribalism” appeared in aspects of Catholic Iberia and Poland, Lutheran Germany and Scandinavia, Reformed Holland and Scotland, with the churches’ blessings. The terrors of, for example, Franco’s Spain, Hitler’s Germany and Botha’s South Africa revealed the subversion of Christianity by churches which embraced this tendency even as the prophetic critiques of them revealed the power of theological views of justice to provoke political resistance to it.

A third movement sought to divorce church from state by making faith entirely a matter of private conviction. In this view, religion might be permitted as personal belief; but the state was to be entirely secular, and neither religious symbol nor conviction could be allowed as a basis for public policy. So argued Roger Williams in New England. Elsewhere, instruments of state, including coercive force, were used to secularize society and the institutions which the church generated and protected: the family, hospitals, universities, etc. Indeed, secular terror was used to dispose of political leaders and clergy who claimed a holy public authority. Only two centres of agency were recognized: the individual and the state. This was the strategy of the French revolution, of one imposing wing of the Enlightenment, and later of Marxism-Leninism.

None of these movements has been embraced by the main Christian churches. They developed another approach. In constant interaction with other movements of modernity, but more informed by biblical ideas of the realities of sin, the necessity of government, and the promise of covenantal relationships, Protestants have developed constitutional democracies, with some national variations in form. In these the churches and the institutions they foster are separate from and protected by the state, yet have a duty under God to shape the moral and spiritual life of society, and are recognized as having rights that the state cannot violate or compromise. The state may reserve a right to supervise church institutions for reasons of health and safety and to judge criminal behaviour in or by some church. But the churches have a right to public worship, to shape personal conviction and piety, to advocate for civil liberties in the society, and to speak for or against the state, its leadership or its policies – so long as the church does not itself become essentially a political party which seeks to control state functions. In recent years this model has been officially embraced by the Roman Catholic Church and most Orthodox churches, and by many heirs of Roger Williams in the Baptist churches (see Baptists), as well as by some leaders from non-Christian traditions. It now has become the basic model, in principle, for the common life in the 148 constitutional democracies of the world’s nations. It is the presumed standard of the community of nations, most international agencies, and various “parliaments of religion”.

In many ways this is the prospect for the foreseeable future. Yet globalization brings not only new forms of economic, technological and informational interaction among the peoples of the world, it also modulates the idea of the sovereign nation state. Moreover, the churches have regained some sense of purpose as they stand face to face on the world stage with resurgent forms of tribalism, Confucianism, Hinduism, Buddhism and Islam for whom this pattern is a decided challenge. It is unsettled whether these resurgent traditions will embrace or repudiate church-state relationships that the constitutional democratic and the pluralistic, faith-based forms of civil society* have developed.

The future lies in part in the witness of the churches. It also lies in the justice of the international policies of democratic societies. But it also lies in the willingness of non-Western peoples to reform in their own tribal, imperial, hierarchical or theocratic patterns that have haunted the world for centuries.

CHURCH AND WORLD

FUNDAMENTAL to a biblical understanding of the relation between the church and the world is the Old Testament profile of the calling of Israel among the nations. The background of this calling is the divine concern for the world as a whole (creation,* restoration); the experiment of the covenant* is the election of one people out of and for the sake of "all nations".

The self-understanding of the New Testament community of believers in Jesus Christ – the people of God, the Body of Christ, the temple of the Spirit – presupposes this profile: the community is seen as a new form of the covenant among the nations and as the sign of the coming restoration. This position of the church determines its relation to the world: there is much hatred and hostility (a specific emphasis in the gospel of John and also in Paul's references to principalities and powers), but there is also a basic solidarity in suffering and hope (Rom. 8). The world is seen in the perspective of its createdness and fallenness, its relation to God (where the Greek word kosmos is used), or in the perspective of its impermanence, its contrast with the "age to come" (Greek aion). All these elements are implied in the NT concept of mission.* A vision of the church which is true to these biblical emphases will somehow integrate a reference to the "cosmic" context of creation and eschaton, a sense of a particular and distinct calling, and the basic conviction that it is in the life of the world that the signs of the kingdom* have to be made manifest.

HISTORICAL PROFILES

In the history of Christianity this basic biblical conviction has taken on different forms, institutionally and theologically.

Eastern Orthodox Christianity tends to interpret the nature of the church as a reflection of the mystery of the Trinity.* This mystery is celebrated in the eucharistic liturgy, and this celebration includes the whole created world ("the liturgy is the cosmos becoming ecclesia"). "Mission" does not refer in the first place to particular activities which the church undertakes in the world, but to the self-presentation of the Christian community as a "living icon of Christ". Because of this emphasis, a basic tension between the church and the institutions of culture* and politics is not a matter of principle.

In Western Christianity, the relation between church and world has developed in a more political-institutional way: there is a tension between faith* and culture, religion and society,* church and state.* Augustine's City of God is of paradigmatic significance in this tradition. In the course of post-Reformation history, at least four models have become distinguishable.

The Roman Catholic model emphasizes synthesis and continuity in the relation between the community of the people of God and the whole created world; in the encompassing framework of the divine law,* there is no ultimate contradiction between the fundamental tendencies in the life of the world and the revelation* which the church represents, although there is a duality: church and worldly institutions have distinct responsibilities.

The Lutheran model (sometimes called the doctrine of the two kingdoms; the relation of this doctrine to Luther's teaching is disputed) sees a fundamental distinction between the realm of faith and church community and the realm of public responsibility – on the basis of a fundamental discontinuity between human sinfulness and divine grace.* There are two ways in which God deals with humankind: organizing human life by restricting evil, and gathering a community on the basis of the gospel of justification.* When these are confused, the nature of salvation* itself is obscured.

The Calvinist model assumes a constructive tension between gospel and world: the world is being sanctified and transformed, both in individual lives and in social structures; the institutions of public life have a function of their own to perform in the encounter of revelation and human life. This model has occasionally stimulated ideals of a “Christian commonwealth”.

The model of the radical reformation sees a basic antithesis between worldly powers and the community of those who choose to follow the alternative of the gospel (see first and radical Reformation churches). The antithesis leads sometimes to virtually complete withdrawal of the church from the world, sometimes to creative forms of witness* on the basis of an attitude of non-resistance.

The development of Christianity in North America gives the impression of a melting pot in which all the available alternatives begin to look alike. The most important feature of this melting pot is disestablishment; separation between church and state is axiomatic, and all churches are “free” – including those which by tradition and conviction would opt for a form of establishment. At the same time, religion as such has an important function in culture and in public life, and many churches consider themselves as the guardians and representatives of this function. The interplay between these two factors – disestablishment and public function – has decisively influenced the conception of the church-world relation in North America.

While churches in the so-called third world have inherited one or more earlier models of the relation between church and world, new elements have influenced both missionary practice and theological reflection since the end of the colonial period. One is the minority position of the church in contexts where other religious traditions are present or even dominant; another is the new sense of national and cultural identity growing up in many countries in the struggle against Western dominance. A basic solidarity of Christians with nation* and culture thus goes hand in hand with a sense of competition with other religions, significantly influencing the way in which mission and ethics are conceived.

Given this historical plurality, theological reflection on the position and the calling of the church in the midst of and over against the realities of the world, in the broad frame of reference of creation and eschaton, must deal with the strengths and weaknesses of the various options. Behind common convictions about the church’s missionary task or political responsibility may lie widely divergent interpretations of the biblical structure. These divergences are clearly due in part to historical developments, but they are also obviously connected to differences in fundamental conviction about human nature, sin,* reconciliation* and redemption.* Thus the relation between church and world is not an isolated topic: dealing with it involves addressing issues such as the meaning of revelation and the nature of salvation.

THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

The ecumenical movement has grown at a period of important changes in the experience of the relation between church and world: the development of global networks of social and economic life, the force of secularization* which stimulates this development and meanwhile has become a dominating feature of Western culture, two world wars, the process of decolonization* and the emergence of many diverse liberation* movements. More specifically Christianity is beginning to experience within itself the effects of cultural diversity and the influence of worldwide economic and ideological developments. A rethinking of the church-world relation – more particularly, the nature of mission, the relation between general human history* and “history of salvation”, the relation of church, kingdom of God and humankind – has become necessary now that the “unity of humankind” has become a pressing issue. Various ecumenical involvements, such as the fight against racism,* the struggle against poverty,* the promotion of inter-religious dialogue* and critical reflection on the relation of women and men (see women in church and society), have emphasized this necessity.

Important developments in 20th-century theology have been instrumental in this process of rethinking. Henri de Lubac and Karl Rahner helped to transform the traditional Roman Catholic conception of nature* and super-nature and to define the church as the pioneer and sacrament* of a dynamic of grace* which pervades the whole of humankind. Karl Barth and Dietrich Bonhoeffer helped to break through the paralysis of thinking in terms of two realms by emphasizing the absolute priority of God's "mission" and the concreteness of worldly obedience to this mission. Johann Baptist Metz and Jürgen Moltmann have opened the eyes of many to the destructive effects of a "political religion" which legitimates bourgeois narrow-mindedness with an appeal to an unworldly gospel. Liberation theologians such as Gustavo Gutiérrez, José Míguez Bonino and Juan Luis Segundo radicalized this approach by linking theological reflection to the praxis of involvement in the historical struggle for the poor.* The cosmic aspects of Christology have been rediscovered by Asian theologians to the benefit of constructive thinking about inter-religious dialogue. And process theologians have consistently emphasized the open-endedness of human history and of God himself as involved in this history. On the strength of these and other contributions, and in the context of an unprecedented secularization – a loss of social and cultural support for the Christian faith which is both threatening and liberating – many Christians are rediscovering the nature of the church-in-mission and the relevance of a creation- and eschaton-oriented faith for the actual problems of humankind.

An impression of the harvest of this rethinking of the church-world relation can be gained by looking at several important ecumenical texts. While the Second Vatican Council's Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, Gaudium et Spes (1965), may not reach the level of later insights into issues of justice, peace and the integrity of creation in its analysis of the problems of global society, its theological structure has been very influential. The order of creation and the order of salvation are seen in close relation to each other; the humanity of humankind is both the purpose of creation and the challenge of the gospel; the church is the sacrament, the sign, of the unification of the whole of humankind in God. For the church this implies an awareness of its position in history and its character as a pilgrim people and a readiness to cooperate with many "worldly" movements serving the same purpose of humanity.

Crucial for ecumenical reflection on the nature of mission was the 1952 conference of the International Missionary Council* in Willingen, Germany. Various lines of thinking converged here: a biblical-eschatological vision of the relation of mission and kingdom of God, an effort to link the mission of the church to the signs of Christ's presence in secular history, and a battle against church-centrism in mission in favour of a "worldly" concept of salvation. Willingen helped to prepare the ground for the central role of the concept of missio Dei* (God's mission), which places the centre of gravity of all mission in God's plan of salvation for the whole world, rather than in efforts of expansion of the church or of Western culture.

The WCC study on "The Lordship of Christ over the World and the Church" (1957, 1959), a careful effort to summarize Protestant thinking on the church-world relation in a period of awakening social responsibility, tried to take up in a more dynamic fashion the traditional dualistic way of speaking about the negative situation of the fallen world and about the positive purpose of God. The world and the church are destined to become the one kingdom of God, each in its own way: the church's calling is to be a critical sign of salvation history among hostile powers, but in positive appreciation of what is given in creation.

Two reports of the WCC Department of Studies on Evangelism which greatly influenced the Uppsala assembly (1968) attempted to deal with the experience of secularization in a theologically constructive way ("The Church for Others" and "The Church for the World" – a quest for structures for missionary congregations, 1967). The relation between God and world is the decisive framework here for the definition of the “ex-centric position” of the church; the familiar sequence God-church-world should be changed into God-world-church.

The study document “God in Nature and History”, presented to the Faith and Order commission at its Bristol meeting (1967), sought to deal with the difficulties presented to the Christian faith by the development of modern science (see science and technology) and the experience of universal history. It tries to show that the biblical and the modern world-views, although not identical, are not totally incompatible; that technology is rooted in the desacralization of nature, which is an aspect of biblical thinking, and can therefore be approached with an open mind; that creation and salvation are decisive moments in a history of God with humankind that includes nature and is aimed towards consummation.

In the study document Church and World (1990), F&O presented the results of a study programme on “The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community”, itself the successor of the earlier (1970s) project “Unity of the Church and Unity of Humankind”. In focusing particularly on issues of justice and on the challenge of a more complete and authentic community of women and men, the document strongly affirms that search for unity and world-directedness are inseparable. The eschatological perspective – faith in the coming kingdom – is the binding element here. Both aspects of the church – “mystery” and “prophetic sign” – are to be understood in this perspective: what takes place in the church refers back to the world and forward to its final redemption.

Taken together, these examples show that the ecumenical experience has generally led to a more positive appreciation of “the world” and simultaneously to a more dynamic interpretation of the role of the church vis-a-vis the whole of humankind. A rediscovery of OT notions as well as of the cosmic significance of Christ may have contributed to this. Meanwhile, more radical questions regarding the survival of humankind and the sustainability of life on earth are likely to stimulate further thinking on creation and eschaton and might ultimately lead away from the Christocentric missionary paradigm which has tended to dominate ecumenical thinking until recently.

CHURCH AS INSTITUTION

THE INSTITUTIONAL nature of the church* has been the subject of WCC studies from both theological and sociological perspectives. The Theological Commission on Christ and the Church (1952-63) described the church as at once “essential and provisional” and (following Barth) as “event and institution”, while the study on institutionalism (1955-63) stressed that the church was not just a divine-human community (koinonia*) but an historical institution, similar in structure to other social institutions. A later study on Spirit, order and organization (1964-71) focused on the activities of the Spirit in transforming the forms and structures of church life; and one on the missionary structure of the congregation* (1962-67) pointed out that the structures of the church can help or hinder its missionary purpose (see mission). Protestant churches engaged in re-shaping inherited structures drew insights from this study and, increasingly, from the sociology of organizations, though these were often applied half-heartedly and sometimes without due regard to theological considerations.

A similar debate arose within the Roman Catholic Church after Vatican II,* which in Lumen Gentium put primary emphasis (following Yves Congar) on the church as the people of God,* yet also retained the traditional view of the church as a divine institution manifest in history through the Catholic hierarchy. The resulting ambiguity, together with uncertainty regarding the limits of permissible change, led to a tension between more traditional and more radical views of the church as institution. After the anti-institutional fervour of 1968, many Catholics were led to distance themselves from “the institutional church” and to set up church base communities* (CBCs, also known as basic Christian communities), most notably in the third world but also in Europe. During the 1970s, small Christian communities emerged in Protestant churches as well – some (like the CBCs) with a socio-political commitment, others with a more personal or charismatic orientation. These appealed to many (especially younger) Christians dissatisfied with the institutionalized character of the larger churches. In Latin America the rapid growth of CBCs – not so much to oppose existing church structures as to fill gaps left by a thinly spread diocesan system – accompanied the development of liberation theology.*

While some European observers see the institutional church as doomed, others (like the Catholic Karl Rahner and the Reformed theologian Jürgen Moltmann) believe that “double strategies” of church reform are necessary, both from below and from above. The Brazilian theologian Leonardo Boff encountered the opposition of the Vatican when he asked bluntly: Can the institutional church be converted? Boff himself believes that it can, that there is “a new way of being church” – one that is more flexible and more lightly institutionalized. Many third-world Christians would agree; and European CBCs have come to the same conclusion.

Gerd Theissen has shown that the original Jesus movement, like other protest groups, inevitably became institutionalized on its transference to Hellenistic culture. A similar process is visible today in many Pentecostal and charismatic churches. Some commentators point to a possible shift in the other direction, as “old-line Protestant churches” in the West begin to relinquish their establishment character and are revitalized by contemporary movements critical of hierarchies and bureaucracies. To contrast such movements with “the institutional church” is both inexact and confusing. In different ways, Ian Fraser, Christian Duquoc and Moltmann have insisted, like the earlier studies, that the church is both movement and institution, and that what must above all be avoided is a church institution which seeks to wield power and to control its members.

CHURCH BASE COMMUNITIES

CHURCH BASE communities (CBCs) consist of groups of Christian laypeople, generally poor, who meet regularly (once a week or fortnightly) in private homes or communal premises to hear and ponder the word of God,* nourish a spirit of fraternal community and undertake activities of Christian commitment in the world. These grassroots Christian communities represent a new pastoral experiment – or, better, a new comprehensive church movement – which arose in Latin America in the 1960s and spread worldwide.

The internal structure of CBCs varies considerably. Some consist of elementary groups of 10 to 15 – called biblical circles, evangelization groups or fraternal encounters – which meet, usually on their own initiative, in homes. Others initially form a community of families (15 or more) and meet in a chapel or communal premises. Both types have (1) coordination, (2) a programme of activities, including worship, formation, festivities and celebration of the sacraments, and (3) organization of the various services (lay ministries), such as care of the sick, catechesis, liturgy and administration within parishes, CBCs maintain with them a relation of communion and renewal.

The constitutive elements of every CBC are (1) the Bible,* heard and shared jointly and related to the life of the people, (2) the community, united and organized in its various services, and (3) concrete commitments for justice and solidarity which the community undertakes.

CBCs are thus communities (primary groupings in which relations of deep fraternal communion* prevail), church, or ecclesial (specifically Christian groups, which meet in church on the basis of the word of God), and base, or basic (elementary associations – as it were, church cells or miniature churches). Their starting point is the “basic” constituents of the church – word, faith, baptism, fraternal charity, service of others, etc. – and they constitute the base or basis of the church, which is the laity. This primary ecclesiological sense of the term “base” means “of the people”, “popular”. Because CBCs have emerged from the poor strata of the population, they are generally found in the countryside and on the outskirts of towns.

ORIGINS AND DEVELOPMENT

Social and religious factors influenced the emergence of CBCs in Latin America during the 1960s, the so-called decade of development.* This was a time of great economic progress and enormous social vitality, particularly on the popular level. That vitality, stimulated from above by populist governments, found expression in a great variety of social movements: trade unionism, basic education, communal organization, technical assistance and general human advancement. The triumph of the Cuban revolution (1959) served to hasten the process of popular ferment. This was the soil in which the CBCs took root. The end of the “development illusion” and the emergence of a different social consciousness (dependence*/liberation*) at the end of the decade, as well as the rise of military regimes, did not hinder but rather promoted the advance of CBCs.

The reaction of the church in this historical climate was complex. First, the crisis and breakdown of traditional pastoral practice in Latin America centred on the inability of the parish and clergy to reach the Catholic masses. This breakdown can be seen as a “negative cause”, prompting positive reactions in the direction of what eventually became CBCs. Second, the emergence of the social pastoral action of the church united activists and prophetic bishops such as D. Larrain (Talca, Chile), D. Helder Camara (Recife, Brazil) and others. Third, Vatican II’s powerful impulse for church renewal brought added justification to the nascent popular pastoral movement. Fourth, the Latin American bishops conference (CELAM) in its assemblies at Medellín (1968) and Puebla (1979) formally confirmed the existing experiment of the CBCs and relaunched it on a continental scale. Finally, the 1974 synod of bishops and Pope Paul VI’s 1975 encyclical Evangelii Nuntiandi recognized the validity of CBCs throughout the church.

Amidst this cultural, social and ecclesial ferment, thanks to the initiative of some priests, focal points of church creativity sprang into life all over the continent – and in the third world generally. The vanguard of this process was in Brazil, where the first CBC may be identified as that of St Paulo do Potengi, in the northeast, in the early 1960s. An emergency plan drawn up by the Brazilian bishops in 1962 on the recommendation of John XXIII launched the idea of CBCs as an innovative and promising pastoral project; and the general pastoral plan for 1966-70 presented CBCs as a pastoral priority on the national level.

The CBCs can be seen as a particular expression in church terms of the wider phenomenon of communitarianism. A chief source of the “communitarian principle” is the reaction against the anonymity of modern mass societies, kindled and symbolized by the revolutionary mood of 1968. This had its counterpart within the churches to the extent that they were perceived as rigid mass institutions. In the first world this desire for personal involvement through the medium of the community indubitably represents the most powerful factor in the communitarian phenomenon. That was subsequently reinforced in church circles by the influence of the CBCs of the third world. In Africa and Asia the process seems to have been similar. The example of the Latin American CBCs reinforced internal factors, among them African tribal culture and the social situation of religious minorities in Asia, leading to the emergence of their own CBCs. Whenever people meet together, wherever they are socially and wherever they are, in order to take up responsibility for their own faith and the demands it makes, a church base community has come into being.

CBCs AND THE INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH

The CBCs are offspring of the institutional church. In most cases the pastoral agencies of the church itself – priests, sisters, laity – initiated them and continue to run them.

The general pattern of relations between CBCs and the institutional church is as follows. At first the CBCs spring up in the margins of the institutional church, among the masses not reached by the church's pastoral ministry. A real process of ecclesio-genesis – a birth of the church – but in new patterns (new, that is, in comparison with the traditional type, not with the New Testament ideal): lay, popular, participatory, biblical, evangelical, prophetic, liberating. As they grow, the CBCs make their way into the domain of the existing institutional church, becoming influential in liturgy, catechesis and meetings. Then comes a period of conflict with the institution, for the “new way of being the church” (as the CBCs define themselves) clashes with the traditional centralizing tendency. Finally, if things go right (as has usually happened in Latin America), this new way is accepted by the church authorities and it tends to predominate in the structuring and general activities of the local community – parish, diocese, region, even country – though traditional clerical, sacramentalist and socially uncommitted forms of church organization may continue to exist, often scarcely modernized.

The ecclesiological status of the CBCs is actually no longer that of a church movement, but rather of the whole church in movement. The CBCs are not in themselves a new type of church, rather, they represent a comprehensive project or idea of the church, a new dynamic – in fact a “new mode of being”. The new church model, formed around the axis of the CBCs, comprises the whole force of the renewal and innovation emerging in the church institution: renewal of the traditional parish and its activities (catechesis, liturgy, sacraments, ordained ministries), emergence of new pastoral services (pastoral concern for the sick, for children, for Indians, for blacks, for workers, for human rights), rescue of popular religion and piety with its festivities, pilgrimages, novenas, etc., creation of new church movements (serving youth, women, industrial workers, farmers) and creation and strengthening of independent popular movements (associations, trade unions, parties). All this constitutes the church of the poor or people's church, of which the CBCs are the living tissue.

BIBLE READING IN THE CBCs

The cornerstone of the CBCs is the word of God. Members come together in order to hear it, thus constituting an ecclesia – the assembly of those called together by the word. What primarily constitutes the CBCs is thus not friendship or the struggle for survival or social change but the word, which gives rise to faith. In the CBCs the word of God is received directly in the Bible, its prime witness, not in secondary witnesses such as catechism, documents of the magisterium or particular theologies – not even the theology of liberation.

In the CBCs the Bible is always read face to face with the actual life of the people: the struggle for survival and for social change. This “Bible/life method” obviates any spiritualizing fundamentalism. Bible and life are linked in a hermeneutical circle: the Bible leads to vital commitment, and vital commitment leads to better understanding of the Bible. While the danger exists of making a political tool of the Bible, this is more the case with middle-class activists than with the people, who have a deep sense of God and sincere respect for religious things.

Bible reading in the CBCs is done in a communal, i.e. participatory way. Furthermore, it is an extremely flexible and creative reading, rather like the sensus spiritualis (spiritual sense) of the fathers – though here it is very “material”. The CBCs may be said to express and transmit the great hunger and thirst for the word of God felt by the religious and disinherited masses of the third world. Their re-appropriation of the Bible is leading to renewal of the church and transformation of society in accord with the purposes of the Spirit who inspired the sacred books.

CBCs AND SOCIAL COMMITMENT

The commitment to striving for justice and social transformation is constitutive of CBCs. While this dimension of liberation is most apparent when a CBC owes its existence to a particular social conflict, it is always present from the start at least in the form of openness and interest. The growth of the community, through the dynamic relation between gospel and life, leads to the real creation and deepening of social commitment, generally in various stages: (1) mutual help within the CBC and its neighbourhood, (2) participation in struggles in the locality or perhaps in associations, (3) entry into the world of work, through trade union and other campaigns, (4) various degrees of party-political involvement.

CBCs in Latin America have thus been the seedbed of many popular organizations and continue to provide them with active participants and support. Yet they recognize that organizing the social struggle is only a secondary function. They seek to bring into existence and strengthen independent popular associations, trade unions and parties, but their own specific and permanent function is evangelization – always in the perspective of liberation and thus adapted to the demands of each historical moment.

This element of social commitment may create problems, including the radical secularization of militants originating in the CBCs but deviating from them, or the temptation of “neo-Christendom”, the impression that CBCs can transform society on their own, or the notion that the social question will be solved the day when everyone is like them.

CBCs AND ECUMENISM

CBCs are of particular ecumenical significance by the mere fact of re-creating the church according to the pattern of the early church rather than as a reproduction of the prevailing type of church. Their essential or elementary character emphasizes not the denominational (in Latin America, typically Catholic) but rather the common Christian elements: baptism, the centrality of faith in Jesus Christ, the sacred scriptures, the Lord's supper, charity, witness, etc. This is not, as has sometimes been suggested, a case of Protestantizing the Catholic church – which would be to fall back into the domain of denominationalism. Rather, the CBCs are striving to get nearer to the one and undivided church, like the apostolic church.

In consequence, while preserving their origin and denominational identity (demonstrated by communion with their own church through their own pastors), the CBCs have achieved an original kind of ecumenical activity. This is marked by two distinctive features. First, it is built around charity (practice) and not around faith (doctrine). In other words, the Christian poor meet in the same struggles, where they get to know and esteem one another and only subsequently come to pray together and to discuss their respective religious convictions. Second, the ecumenical practice of the CBCs is at the church-base level among simple believers and therefore not in the upper reaches of hierarchy and theology. Simple believers, especially if they are poor, are more genuine and free in regard to ecumenical dialogue.

While many Catholics and Protestants – the “historic” Christians in Latin America – feel at home in the style of “basic Christianity”, there is also resistance, opposition and competition from many sectarian groups on the basis of their biblical fundamentalism and political conservatism. In Catholic circles in the CBCs some traditional anti-Protestant prejudice remains.

The process has scarcely begun of forming a new church model (not a new church), i.e. a participatory and liberating church model, of which the CBCs are the living cells and embodiment. The journey is long and conflictual, precisely because it is new and historic, but everything indicates that the way has been found. It is a matter now of going ahead, at the impulse of the Spirit.

CHURCH BUILDINGS, SHARED USE OF

CHRISTIAN congregations in every locality normally seek to meet on a regular basis, if possible in a building of their own, designed to enable and enhance their particular style of worship. Such church buildings are usually reserved for the worship and related activities of that particular denomination. Legal trusts may limit their use in this way. However, in some places church buildings are used by two or more distinct congregations from different Christian traditions. This represents good Christian stewardship and should be encouraged, especially where a church building is under-used and there are other Christian groups with inadequate premises. This may require special legislation.

For example, in the 1960s the churches in England and Wales secured an act of parliament enabling a church building of one denomination to be used on a regular basis as if it were a building of another. There are now many such formal "sharing agreements" in the United Kingdom. Usually a joint council comprising equal numbers of each denomination involved is formed to settle acceptable patterns of use and appropriate financial contributions. Capital money can be contributed by the "guest" church on the understanding that if the building is sold, an agreed percentage of the sale price will be reimbursed.

Even if no "sharing agreement" exists, sharing congregations are encouraged to meet to increase understanding. Tensions can arise between a locally drawn and a more widely gathered congregation. Cultural and language differences may reinforce denominational ones. It is noticeable that the opportunity to share a building often promotes integration of worship, ministry and congregational life. In England sharing agreements under the sharing of church buildings act are regarded as a form of local ecumenical partnership (see local ecumenical partnerships).

CHURCH CALENDAR

THE PURPOSE of a liturgical calendar differs from that of the civil (solar) calendar. The latter counts the days in relation to the tropical solar cycle with its four seasons – spring, summer, autumn and winter – which are defined by the four phases through which the earth passes as it goes round the sun. The dates which correspond to the spring equinox (when day and night are equal), the summer solstice (the longest day), the autumn equinox (when day and night are equal) and finally the winter solstice (the shortest day and longest night), which may be described as cosmic events, are provided by a good solar calendar.

By contrast, the liturgical calendar is not concerned with the tally of days, but uses the civil calendar which science has already fixed and gives it a liturgical content. The criterion for this content is the light, which at one point of time is eclipsed by the darkness and at another makes the darkness disappear. Thus the sun becomes, as it were, an icon of God, and the darkness becomes a symbol of death. In this scheme, cosmic events (the two equinoxes and the two solstices) have a liturgical meaning which represents the struggle of light with darkness. For example the winter solstice (when the day begins to become longer) corresponds to the nativity of Christ (in the northern hemisphere); the spring equinox (when the day begins to be dominant) corresponds to the annunciation and also to Easter.*

A solar calendar was introduced in the Roman empire at the time of Julius Caesar (46 B.C.), and is thus called the Julian (or Old Style) calendar. It has 365 days in the year, and every fourth year an additional day (29 February) is added to ensure that the calendar dates correspond to the sun. As a result of the inaccuracy of this correction, the Julian calendar falls behind the sun by one day every 128 years. Thus around the time of the first council of Nicea (325), which defined the principle for dating Easter, the spring equinox, which was on 25 March in 46 B.C., fell on 21 March.

By 1582 the calendar date corresponding to the spring equinox had fallen ten days further behind, to 11 March. The church of Rome under Pope Gregory XIII decided to correct the calendar by eliminating ten calendar dates (5-14 October 1582 inclusive), restoring the date of the spring equinox to 21 March, as it had been in the 4th century. To prevent the calendar's falling behind in the future, it was decided to eliminate the 29th day of February three times every period of 400 years. The calendar thus corrected is known as the Gregorian (or New Style) calendar.

At present the Julian calendar is at odds with solar time by 13 days, and the spring equinox falls on 8 March, whereas the Gregorian calendar will continue to correspond to the sun for a very long time. It lags behind the sun by around one day for every 3323 years rather than the 128 years in the Julian calendar.

Regarding liturgical events with fixed calendar dates, two practices are followed in the Orthodox church. The majority follow the New Style, the others the Old. Thus Christmas* is fixed for 25 December; and if the Russian church appears to celebrate it on 7 January, it is because this day is in fact 25 December according to the Old (Julian) Style.

The movable (paschal) cycle is fixed not according to specific dates of the solar calendar but depends on the date of Easter – “the feast of feasts” – which changes from year to year in accordance with the principle worked out in 325 at Nicea. It was decided to celebrate Easter on a Sunday chosen in relation to the sun and the moon, the “two great lights” (Gen. 1:16). First comes the spring equinox, corresponding to the point in the year when the day (the sunlight) begins to triumph over night. Next comes the full moon, when the “lesser light” is on the dark side of the earth (that away from the sun) to “rule [or illuminate] the night” (Gen. 1:16); thus the earth is simultaneously lit on both sides. The first Sunday after this phenomenon becomes Easter Day.

According to a 4th-century document from Asia Minor, the Nicene formula for the date of Easter – the feast of Christ's resurrection – makes a direct link between the “week of creation” and the “week of redemption” as its fulfilment. The spring equinox recalls the first day of creation (Gen. 1:5). The full moon is the fourth day, when “God made the two great lights – the greater light [the sun] to rule the day, and the lesser light [the moon] to rule the night” (Gen. 1:16). Finally, the first Sunday, corresponding in this context to the eighth day, follows both Friday, the sixth day (the creation of human beings and their fall), and Saturday, the seventh day (on which God rested and which the Christian church regards as Christ's descent “to the dead” or “into hell” prior to his resurrection).

To make it easier to apply the paschal formula, the Christian church began quite early to compile tables giving the date of Easter for relatively long periods. Paschal tables appeared in about the 7th century covering a period of 532 years in conformity with the Julian calendar. These tables were regarded as perpetual; i.e. at the end of the 532 years, everything should begin again in the same order. The Orthodox church has continued to use these tables up to the present. According to them, 21 March Old Style should always be the day of the spring equinox. According to the New Style that day is already 3 April, i.e. 13 days later than the actual spring equinox.

For Western Christians, the necessary correction was introduced into these tables after the Gregorian reform in 1582, so that the festival of Easter depends on the actual spring equinox. This is the reason for the difference between Western and Eastern Christians as to the date of Easter; the idea that the Orthodox supposedly reckon the date from the Jewish Passover, which Western Christians do not, is a misunderstanding.

The full moon of the Nicene formula happens in fact to coincide always with the OT Passover.

Full moons occurring between 21 March and 3 April (New Style) are thus paschal moons for Western Christians but not for the Orthodox. In this case the Orthodox Easter will come after the second full moon – making a difference of four or five weeks in the dates.

It may be hoped that in their quest for unity, Christians will come to agree on a calendar as close as possible to the solar system and that this will enable them to celebrate all the great festivals of the liturgical year together, especially Easter, the “Feast of Feasts”, by applying together the principle adopted at Nicea I.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE

THE TERM “church discipline” (French, discipline ecclésiastique; German, Kirchenzucht) is used primarily in Reformed churches and some communities of the radical Reformation for that procedure by which God’s word is applied by particular exhortation to individual members. More specifically, the reference is to cases falling under the provisions of Matt. 18:15-18, according to which faults in the congregation are to be treated first by way of fraternal conversation, then by a small group (usually pastors and elders), finally, if necessary, before the whole church. To the true preaching of the gospel and the obedient administration of the sacraments, Calvin and many Reformed confessions added “right order” or “the exercise of discipline” as a third mark by which the church on earth can be recognized (Calvin, Institutes 4.1.1,22; 4.10.27-32; 4.11.1-5; 4.12.1-21; Belgic confession, 29; Scots confession, 18). According to the Westminster confession, “church censures are necessary for the reclaiming and gaining of offending brethren; for deterring of others from the like offences; for purging out of that leaven which might infect the whole lump; for vindicating the honour of Christ, and the holy profession of the gospel; and for preventing the wrath of God, which might justly fall upon the church, if they should suffer his covenant, and the seals thereof, to be profaned by notorious and obstinate offenders” (30:3).

Combining the concerns that figured in the so-called church orders of the early centuries (from the Didache onward), church discipline in a broader sense covers the regulation, standards and pattern of the spiritual and moral life of Christians and their communities in their entirety. It always takes some juridical form (see canon law), but it also involves pastoral care and looks for faithful observance on the part of all believers. All would-be Christian communities in fact practise an ecclesial discipline of one kind or another. But they differ over the proper discipline, over which elements in it should be attributed to “divine law” and which to merely “human law” within the church* (often as the question of the variability or invariability of particular disciplinary dispositions), over whether and when the juridical order should be understood as advisory guideline or as binding law (Lukas Vischer), and over the importance they attach to discipline in relation to other features of church life; they differ in the relative rigour or laxity with which they put their discipline into practice; and amid the vicissitudes of political history, they have differed over the appropriate relation between church discipline and civil law.

The most fundamental matter in church discipline concerns the requirements for entry into, and continuance in, the ecclesial community. Baptism is almost always a necessary, but seldom the sufficient, condition of church membership. Thus the British Methodist church regards both baptism and the Lord’s supper to be of “divine appointment and perpetual obligation”, and abstinence for long from the communal means of grace could lead to the removal of a member’s name from the rolls on grounds of having “ceased to meet”. The (Anglican) Church of England requires that “every parishioner shall communicate at least three times in the year, of which Easter to be one". To be a Roman Catholic, one must belong to a local church whose bishop is in communion with the see of Rome. In practically all would-be Christian bodies, a member may for various failings suffer varying degrees of suspension or even exclusion from communion (see excommunication).

The ecclesial community makes certain requirements of faith and morals. It is expected that one will continue in the faith to which one has been summoned and invited by the preaching of the gospel, the faith in which one was baptized and which finds eucharistic expression in the celebration of the Lord's supper. The search epitomized by Faith and Order's project "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today" is thus a vital part of the restoration and achievement of church unity, for unity is impossible without agreement in what is commonly "necessary and sufficient" to the Christian faith. Yet although all churches similarly cherish certain moral expectations of their members, ecumenical dialogues, both multilateral and bilateral, have been noticeably reticent concerning the treatment of ethical teaching. The international Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue was a modest pioneer in daring to mention issues of home and family life (Denver 1971, paras 69-78; cf. Dublin 1976, para. 39), while the tripartite Lutheran-Reformed-Roman Catholic statement on "The Theology of Marriage and the Problem of Mixed Marriages" (1977) went somewhat further. The second Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission went furthest in claiming that "despite existing disagreement in certain areas of practical and pastoral judgment, Anglicans and Roman Catholics derive from the scriptures and Tradition the same controlling vision of the nature and destiny of humanity and share the same fundamental moral values" (Life in Christ: Morals, Communion, and the Church, 1993).

Almost all churches assign to "pastors and teachers" (Eph. 4:11), however named, a special role in maintaining church discipline. They are to instruct all members in the faith; "in them", as Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* puts it, "the church seeks an example of holiness and loving concern"

(M12); and they are usually the ones principally entrusted with the ministry of encouragement, admonition and (where necessary) rebuke and even excommunication. Their duties call for their own fidelity to Christian doctrine in faith and morals as their church receives and perceives it, and for their own acceptance of ecclesial discipline. None of this responsibility should be seen in terms of a personal superiority in faith or practice on the part of an ordained ministry; it is rather a functional necessity for the edification of the church and all its members. In Calvin's words: "Thus the body of Christ is built up; thus 'we grow up in every way into him who is the Head' and grow together among ourselves" (Institutes 4.3.2). Discipline subserves the church in its primordial responsibilities of worship (leitourgia), witness (martyria) and service (diakonia).

Different versions of ecclesial discipline reflect basic options and guiding perspectives in Christology, pneumatology and the understanding of the gospel and the church. The legal structure of the Roman Catholic Church emphasizes Christ the legislator, and both Orthodox and Protestant critics have considered this an over-emphasis. The more sacramentally and pneumatologically inspired concept of the Orthodox churches can nevertheless leave their canonical order "fixed" at an early stage of the Tradition and make it difficult to accommodate to changes in the social and cultural context. In the sharp distinction, even opposition, Lutherans make between law and gospel, other Christians have feared a resulting antinomianism. Calvinists and Methodists allow a "third use of the law" as serving the sanctification* of believers; the danger here is of hypocrisy for the sake of outward observance. "Enthusiastic" communities have exalted spontaneity in ways that threaten to divorce the Spirit from the word of God* and the great Tradition.*

Although there will probably always be variety in the detailed translation of the faith into practice, particularly as historical circumstances differ, the attainment and recognition of consensus* in major doctrines should have the result of bringing the disciplines of the churches within recognizably common bounds of principle. In turn, work on current disciplinary differences could

CHURCH GROWTH

FROM THE beginning, reports on the progress of the church have frequently included reference to its numerical increase (e.g. Acts 2:41). A goal of missionary outreach was the winning of new adherents to the faith (see mission). Debates surrounding the work of outstanding figures such as Francis Xavier, Robert de Nobili, Matteo Ricci, John Eliot and David Livingstone focus on the most effective missionary means or strategy of adding converts rather than on whether or not growth of the church was a legitimate goal.

The 19th-century Protestant missionary movement was based on the premise that the object of mission was the founding of an “indigenous church”, one of whose characteristics would be continuous propagation or growth. The Roman Catholic term was the planting of the church (plantatio ecclesiae) in every nation, but Pope Benedict XV began to stress the “de-Europeanization” of mission work by insisting that the planting of the church should result in a strong local clergy and hierarchy who become fully responsible for the church. Only would an indigenous local church truly grow (Maximum Illud 1919).

“Church growth” became a technical term in the 1960s for a particular missiological approach introduced by Donald A. McGavran, who served in India with the US Disciples of Christ missionary society. His The Bridges of God (1955) and How Churches

Grow (1959) critically evaluated and attacked the traditional “mission station” mentality and approach, and forcefully advocated a radical overhaul by promoting numerical growth as the primary goal of mission strategy. McGavran developed the “homogeneous unit principle”. Missions ought first to respect the social unit – ethnic clan, class, caste – in which the individual is most at home. Since the degree of responsiveness varies from one group to another, the mission priority seeks to win to Christ those more responsive people or groups, identified by thorough-going scientific research. McGavran’s Understanding Church Growth remains the authoritative statement of church-growth theory and methodology.

Protestant reaction to church-growth thinking has been mixed. Conciliar Protestants, in particular in WCC circles, largely ignored or rejected it. In 1950 the Dutch Reformed missiologist J.C. Hoekendijk, in a highly influential article, “The Call to Evangelism” (International Review of Mission), roundly criticized the church-centred orientation of the modern mission movement (see missio Dei), and argued that church planting is not a legitimate goal of mission.

This widely accepted critique has had two consequences: in mainstream Protestant missiology it contributed to a devaluation of the church, but among conservative evangelical Protestants it fostered a change of emphases – from the church as goal of mission to the church as instrument, and from the church to the reign of God as the basis for missionary witness (see kingdom of God).

This church-growth thinking has reinvigorated conservative evangelical mission studies and stimulated the founding of new schools of mission round the world. Nevertheless, acceptance has been accompanied by critical response and modifications, focused on the overweening emphasis on pragmatism and dependence on the social sciences, on inadequate biblical foundations, on the ideological pitfalls inherent in such a methodology, and especially on the “homogeneous unit principle”, of which incisive criticism has come from South Africa and Latin America, where the strategy is judged as only reinforcing racism and classism.

The flowering of the church-growth movement coincided with the introduction of “contextualization” as a replacement for “indigenization”. Contextualization theory emphasizes the importance of local cultural materials and leadership in developing churches with integrity. This emphasis relativizes the role of the missionary outsider in relation to the local church and its leadership. Both streams of influence draw attention to the importance of culture in the development of indigenous churches.

The original impulse to church-growth thinking was the concern to re-invigorate and extend cross-cultural mission beyond the borders of North America and Western Europe. But by the early 1970s, the methodology was being adapted to the new North American and European contexts where the major historic churches face declining membership and a growing religion-cultural pluralism within the societies. Here church-growth associations have training programmes for pastors and lay leaders which equip them to use church-growth methods in their home countries.

CHURCH MUSIC

ANY MUSIC used in or associated with Christian worship can be considered church music; and the musical forms, styles and performance practices in Christian churches have always exhibited great variety. Differences in musical practice may indicate underlying differences in theological emphasis, since the music used in Christian worship reflects a church's interpretation of its liturgy;* likewise, similarities may indicate ecumenical agreement or convergence on theological is-

ues. Much of the significant diversity stems from two factors: (1) an emphasis on different liturgical functions of music, especially its relationship to the words of the service; (2) differing interpretations of the liturgy, which lead to different requirements for its performance.

LITURGICAL FUNCTIONS

The church has generally regarded music as an essential part of the liturgy because it supports the liturgy's purpose: praise of God. Most churches agree that this means that the music must in some way be subordinated to the larger aims of the liturgy; however, they have differed widely in their attempts to provide acceptable music. For example, in most Eastern Orthodox churches the liturgy is primarily chanted and generally unaccompanied by instruments: vocal music is considered normative, since the words of the liturgy keep the function of the music clear. In contrast, the role of music has gradually changed in Western liturgies. While it has often consisted entirely of vocal music, Western churches gradually accepted instruments starting in the 8th century and de-emphasized chant (cultivating polyphony) from the 12th century on.

In all churches, musical practices and the liturgy have interacted in two important ways. First, music has influenced the interpretation of liturgical texts and actions. Even in a largely chanted service, music indicates how a text is to be performed and understood, by punctuating the text through melodic formulas and cadences; by emphasizing words through melisma, or repetition; and by organizing the length and balance of each section of the liturgy. Changes in musical style alter the delivery of the texts and have often been considered disruptive of the liturgy, consequently causing conflict. For example, as early as the 4th century a melodic style of chanting imported from the East caused considerable controversy as it spread through Western churches. According to Augustine, the problem was that the music could detract from the words by calling attention to itself. Such tensions between words and music have been heightened in the West by the development of functional harmony, which aims at relatively autonomous musical forms, making words dispensable or interchangeable. However, these forms have not been found necessarily incompatible with the supporting of words, as the widespread popularity of the accompanied hymn suggests. In practice, even purely instrumental music has generally been tied to words or liturgical actions: substituting for words, as in the alternatim practice of the late middle ages; referring to words, as in the Lutheran chorale prelude; or highlighting an important action, as in the baroque elevation toccatas.

Second, changes in liturgical style and content can lead to a sense of musical deficiency. For instance, the translation of liturgies into various vernaculars has provoked changes as diverse as the growth of divergent families of Byzantine chant and the development of the Lutheran chorale. More recently, the Second Vatican Council's emphasis on the vernacular and the transplanting of various Eastern churches to the West have led to the creation of many new or adapted vernacular settings.

PERFORMANCE PRACTICE

Most churches agree that the liturgy requires the active participation of all those assembled; however, there is little agreement about how such participation should be reflected in church music. In Eastern churches the liturgy is predominantly sung, but the singing parts are mostly taken by ministers, cantors or choirs; congregational participation largely consists of (active) listening. In contrast, the churches of the Reformation have historically emphasized congregational singing.

Differences in the performance of the liturgy stem from the fact that churches emphasize various traditional models of worship. The New Testament offers two influential examples: the model of heavenly worship (Rev. 4-5) and the model of the community gathered to remember the Lord Jesus (1 Cor. 3,11-14). It would be fair to say that the Eastern churches have tended to emphasize the former, while the Western churches have swung between the two, currently tending to emphasize the latter.

Most churches would tend to agree that it is the relationship between the two models that needs to be expressed in the liturgy. The predominantly congregational music of the West and the predominantly ministerial music of the East may both need to re-discover a balance which the history of church music could suggest. For instance, in the 4th century the liturgy included specialized musical ministries exercised by the priest and cantors, as well as congregational participation. These two performance practices were commonly interpreted by the church fathers as reflecting the two music metaphors implicit in the word symphonia: musical harmony (the balance between various musical elements and performers), and musical agreement (most fully realized in unison congregational singing). Both metaphors stress a unity which reconciles all diversities, but if both are to be realized fully, some sort of variety in musical roles may still be necessary.

The ecumenical investigation of the history of liturgy has led to a number of insights relevant to this issue, which are reflected in the revised liturgies of both Roman Catholics and Protestants. From its origins at the abbeys of Solesmes and Maria Laach, the modern liturgical movement* has gone hand in hand with a renewed appreciation of chant. One indication that musical practice is responding to these recoveries is the increasing use of responsorial psalm forms in both Protestant and Roman Catholic churches. In North America, the question of congregational singing is also being raised more frequently in Orthodox publications.

Although the musical practices of the churches continue to indicate unresolved theological and social tensions, they may also indicate important resources for mutual enrichment. The Western churches would profit greatly from examining the wider range of interaction between text and music which can be observed in the largely chanted services of the Eastern churches; this might enable the West to recover what is useful of its own chant tradition. The East might also offer some insights into the question of the proper ministerial role of the choir. The Eastern churches could attend to the successful balancing between congregational singing and professional musical ministry in the Protestant and Roman Catholic traditions.

Both in the East and in the West, church music from the Southern hemisphere is receiving increased attention and respect.

Many areas, particularly in Latin America, Africa and South Asia, have discovered their own musical voice for worship. Furthermore, the music indigenous to local cultures is increasingly being recognized as useful for worship. Both regional and local music is being adopted and adapted by a larger number of communities, many of which are only remotely connected to the groups which produced the music. For this reason, all churches will find a need to attend to the theological significance of musical and liturgical inculturation, particularly by noting how the wide diversity of music available now for liturgical use is adapted to differing liturgical, musical and social circumstances.

CHURCH ORDER

THERE IS MUCH diversity in structure or polity, but three basic patterns of church order have dominated since the 16th century: congregational, presbyterial and episcopal. Episcopal polity, characteristic of Roman Catholic, Orthodox and Anglican traditions, is the most widely used. Presbyterial or congregational structures are more prominent among churches that emerged out of the Protestant Reformation* or later divisions.

All three polities may claim New Testament antecedents. A congregational structure would have suited the so-called house churches formed by early missionaries like Paul, who refers several times in his letters to churches in the homes of persons he knew (Rom. 16:5; 1 Cor. 16:19; Col. 4:15; Philemon 2). The church at Corinth probably employed a congregational structure. A presbyterial pattern, in which leadership is exercised by presbyters (also called overseers, episcopoi) and deacons, seems to have gained wide currency during the last half of the 1st century. Paul saluted "bishops and deacons" at Philippi (Phil. 1:1). Acts and the pastoral epistles, both perhaps dating from the late 1st century, envisioned apostolic appointment of presbyters "church by church" or "city by city" (Acts 14:23; Titus 1:5). In 1 Tim. 4:14 Paul referred to a "council of elders", or presbyterion (see presbyterate).

Monarchical episcopacy,* or rule by a single bishop, did not develop until the 2nd century, but a kind of prototype for it may be found in the primitive community of Jerusalem. Parallels between the structure of this community and that of the Jewish community at Qumran are striking. James, brother of Jesus, stood at the head, like the Qumran mebaqqer, or "superintendent" (episcopos). The Twelve, including the "three pillars" (see Gal. 2:9), formed a kind of council like the Council of Twelve – including or in addition to three priests – at Qumran. Beyond these were the presbyters and the "many" in both communities (Acts 15:2,4,6,22,23).

Progress towards the threefold order (bishop, presbyters, deacons) moved at different paces in different places. According to J.B. Lightfoot, the twofold order of presbyter-bishops and deacons prevailed in most churches by the end of the 1st century. Within the church of a city (polis), whatever the number of congregations, one of the presbyter-bishops probably served as chair of the presbyterion. A number of factors – the demands of an expanding constituency, threats of schism and heresy, a natural inclination to clarify authority – probably encouraged a permanent presidency. When this happened, the term "episcopos" was reserved for the presiding presbyter-bishop and the term "presbyter" for others.

Judging from the urgency of the plea of Ignatius of Antioch to "do nothing without the bishop!" (Letter to the Philadelphians 3.2), the church of Asia Minor had not yet fully secured the tripartite order at the time he passed their way en route to Rome c.110-15. Indeed, Ignatius left his own flock in some kind of turmoil (ibid., 10.1; cf. to the Smyrnaeans 11.1; to Polycarp 7.1). Rome, always conservative, moved still more slowly to accept the monarchical episcopate.

Concern for the indigent, the need for additional assistance and the desire to include as many persons as possible in the ministry of the church led to the development of "minor orders" not part of the threefold ministry: sub-deacons, widows, deaconesses, exorcists, porters, readers, acolytes and others. These varied widely from church to church.

In line with the Pauline mission strategy, the polis-church served as the primary unit in the development of Christian polity. They extended their reach to surrounding villages and the countryside; and the bishop naturally considered himself the bishop of areas evangelized by his church. Accordingly, Ignatius called himself bishop of both Antioch and Syria (see his Letter to the Romans 2.2). Claims often overlapped, necessitating the establishment of certain lines of jurisdiction. At Nicea in 325 bishops accepted the Roman dioceses and provinces as the units recognized by the church. Parish units did not develop until around 400 or after, perhaps first in Gaul. Heads of churches in provincial capitals gained special recognition as metropolitans (in the East) or archbishops (in the West).

From an early date certain churches held more eminent places and came to be designated patriarchates. Jerusalem did so for a time by virtue of its importance in Christian origins, then faded out of the picture after the Bar Kochba revolt (132-35) but recovered some of its pre-eminence after Constantine's conversion opened the way for Christians to return. The council of Nicea in 325 officially restored to the Jerusalem church some of its status. Antioch gained prominence as a result of its special role in the early Christian mission led by Paul and Barnabas. Rome had a natural advantage as the capital of the empire, and the martyrdoms of Peter and Paul there further enhanced its standing. When Constantine shifted the capital from Rome to Byzantium in 330, he brought the latter immediately into the limelight; yet it never succeeded in taking the place of Rome. At Constantinople in 381 the bishops listed it second after Rome as "the New Rome". Several other large cities such as Alexandria, Ephesus, Carthage and Caesarea gained prominence at one time or another, but of these only Alexandria, perhaps as the centre of Christian learning in the 3rd century and after, attained the title of patriarchate in the early church.

Rome held a certain prestige almost from the beginning, but the extent to which it exercised authority over churches outside Italy is debated. The theory that the bishop of Rome was Peter's successor appeared first in Tertullian (Prescription 32). Damasus (366-84) established clerical right of appeal to Rome. Pope Leo I (440-61), however, shaped the theory of Roman primacy* based on succession from Peter, which claimed for Rome full power over the whole church. The power vacuum created by the barbarian invasions allowed Rome to implement the theory in the West in ways it could not in the East.

Church order changed little during the middle ages either in East or West. The Protestant Reformation, however, led to radical changes. Although Luther emphasized that clergy differ from laity* only in function, he did not make far-reaching changes. Calvin and more radical reformers wanted to return to the order set by primitive Christianity but disagreed among themselves as to what the pattern was. Anglicans steered a middle course under guidance of the church fathers and not too far from the Orthodox and Roman Catholic models (except for rejection of Roman hegemony over the Church of England).

Episcopal polity, whether Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican or Lutheran, is usually conceived in terms of a diocese over which a bishop presides with the assistance of other clergy. The bishop is the chief pastor, worship leader and teacher. Priests (presbyters) serve as the bishop directs in pastoral, liturgical or other duties, normally in a parish, a sub-unit of the diocese. After a long eclipse, the diaconate* has recently been revived as a permanent order in some churches. Today many episcopal churches still recognize a number of "offices" for which persons are not ordained. Ordination* to the priesthood is believed to confer special grace for the performance of certain sacramental functions and thus to distinguish clergy and laity.

In the Roman Catholic Church bishops exercise authority only in union with the Roman pontiff, who “has full, supreme and universal power over the whole church, a power which he can always exercise unhindered... Together with their head, the Supreme Pontiff, and never apart from him, the bishops have supreme and full authority over the universal church; but this power cannot be exercised without the agreement of the Roman Pontiff” (Lumen Gentium 22) (see collegiality).

Presbyterial polity, preferred especially by churches of the Reformed/Presbyterian tradition, is less tied to a territorial understanding of the church and stresses instead the relative independence of the ministerial “college”. In this model the ordained clergy belong to congregations grouped under them. The clergy – originally pastors, elders, teachers and deacons, according to Calvin’s scheme – lead in word (preaching), sacrament (baptism and Lord’s supper) and exercise of discipline. Local synods and national assemblies attended by both clerical and lay delegates wrestle with issues of common interest and exercise varying degrees of authority over the smaller units.

Congregational polity operates on the assumption that power lies with people gathered voluntarily for worship, education, discipline and fellowship. Cooperation between congregations is also voluntary and varies widely – from complete independence to an order similar to the presbyterial. Many congregational traditions such as Baptists have abandoned almost all traditional offices and developed structures like those employed by modern business corporations. Although they may retain names such as pastor or deacon, authority may rest with an executive board and various committees entrusted with a variety of responsibilities: personnel, nominations, education, worship, ministry, outreach, etc. The prevailing social model obviously affects all three major types, but it has greater impact on the congregational one than on the others because of its limited commitment to a defined structure.

The Lima text on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* (1982) recognizes that certain features of the episcopal, presbyterial and congregational systems all have an appropriate place in the order of a reunited church, where ministry should have “personal, collegial and communal” dimensions (M26-27, with comm.).

CHURCHES, SISTER

THE CURRENT use of “sister churches” in ecumenical discourse, in particular between Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholics, restores an ancient church expression. “Your elect sister” (2 John 13) is the only biblical reference. Already Clement of Rome (d. ca. 101) and Ignatius of Antioch (d. ca. 107) had witnessed to the family relations between local churches. Later the theological foundations became explicit: common apostolic origins, communion in faith and hope, believers calling one another “brother” or “sister”, mutual hospitality (Irenaeus of Lyons, d. ca. 200; Tertullian from Roman Africa, d. ca. 225). During the era of the first ecumenical councils* in the 4th and 5th centuries, large geographical spheres of church administration emerged; responsible for them were bishops, especially those who became patriarchs of the more important centres. The council bishops who represented their churches were brothers of one another, colleagues, syllleitourgoi, and they assured the sisterly relations between their churches.

Later development saw a double movement: in the West, the accent on the primacy of the local church of Rome; in the East, the predominance and privileged place which the patriarchs gave to Constantinople. This divergent evolution, to a large extent, resulted in the gradual dissolution and final rupture of communion between the Byzantines and the Latins. Letters from the Byzantine patriarchs Nicetas of Nicomedia (1136) and John X Camateros (1198-1206) protest Rome's seeking to annul their authority by presenting itself as "mother and teacher" (mater et magistra), arguing that the church of Rome is only the first among "sisters", equal in both dignity and origin.

In the 20th century ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras was the first (1963) to describe the relation between the church of Constantinople and the church of Rome as "sister churches"; and the next year Vatican II's Decree on Ecumenism* recognized the legitimacy of the Eastern churches' theological, spiritual and canonical traditions, and described the nature of the family relations "which ought to exist between local churches, as between sisters" (n.14). In a letter to Athenagoras in 1967, Paul VI declared: "For centuries we lived this life of 'sister churches', and together held the ecumenical councils", "children of the same Father who share in a common life, through the Son in the Holy Spirit", made explicit in baptism, then "united more closely by the priesthood and the eucharist, in virtue of the apostolic succession". This papal declaration recognized the full ecclesial character of the Orthodox church, and envisaged that the relations between the church of Rome and the Orthodox church could follow a model other than that of the authority which Rome now exercises in the Catholic church.

In Rome in October 1967, Athenagoras and Paul VI issued a common declaration that their meeting had helped "their churches to make a further discovery of themselves as sister churches". The 1984 common declaration of Pope John Paul II and Syrian Orthodox Patriarch Mar Ignatius Zakka I Iwas designated "the church of Rome and the Syrian church of Antioch" as "sister churches". An emphasis on the local dimension is found in the common Christological declaration of John Paul II and Patriarch Mar Dinkha IV of the Assyrian Church of the East* (Rome 1994): "Living by this faith and these sacraments, it follows as a consequence that the particular Catholic churches and the particular Assyrian churches can recognize each other as sister churches." Although the term has since become customary, not all the theological and practical conclusions have yet been drawn from it.

In 1970 Pope Paul VI, on the occasion of the canonization of the 40 English martyrs, used the expression as a future hope for Catholic-Anglican relations: "There will be no seeking to lessen the legitimate prestige and the worthy patrimony of piety and usage proper to the Anglican church when the Roman Catholic Church... is able to embrace her ever beloved sister in the one authentic communion of the family of Christ: a communion of origin and of faith, a communion of priesthood and of rule, a communion of the saints in a freedom of love of the spirit of Jesus."

CIMADE

THE INTER-MOVEMENT committee for aid to evacuees (CIMADE – Comité inter-mouvement auprès des évacués) was set up by French Protestant youth movements in October 1939 to send teams to live among the French evacuees from Alsace. After the Nazi invasion in 1940, CIMADE worked to alleviate the situation of foreigners assembled in internment camps under inhuman material and psychological conditions.

Through the efforts of general secretary Madeleine Barot and president Marc Boegner, CIMADE teams were able to go into the camps. With the beginning of mass deportations, particularly of Jews, in 1942, and it became necessary to go underground in the resistance. With the help of the WCC, then in the process of formation, and many parishes, CIMADE did whatever was possible to help those most at risk to flee to Spain or Switzerland.

After the liberation, CIMADE, still headed by Barot and Boegner, helped to resettle persons displaced by the war, working with Swiss churches, which donated temporary huts, and “fraternal workers” – volunteers delegated by churches abroad to help in post-war reconstruction, as an act of witness to the gospel. Later the teams also contributed to the efforts for reconciliation with the Germans by setting up temporary reception centres in Germany. CIMADE also took more ecumenical initiatives, such as organizing training conferences involving Roman Catholics, Orthodox and Protestants.

CIMADE gradually affirmed its identity as an organization independent of the churches but related to them. Its defined purpose was to show active solidarity with refugees, migrant workers and oppressed peoples: “CIMADE is one form of the service which the churches seek to render to humanity in the name of the gospel of liberation. It works in relation with the World Council of Churches, the French Protestant Federation and the Orthodox church and cooperates with various lay and Roman Catholic bodies.”

As numerous uprooted people arrived in France from Eastern Europe, Africa and the Mediterranean countries, then from Latin America and the Caribbean and Southeast Asia and, more recently, from Africa and the Middle East, the work done by the teams has changed to meet the needs of each successive group. The reception and support given to the refugees is marked by the desire to respect their adherence to their own beliefs until they can return home.

This effort to work in partnership also involves undertaking legal defence of foreigners and migrant workers and combating all forms of discrimination, including racism.* As more and more people who came to France expecting to stay for only a short time remain in the country, their integration has become an important element in CIMADE’s work. Because one of the main causes of migration continues to be underdevelopment and unequal living conditions, CIMADE has been developing a third branch of its work and extending its activities to partners in the countries of the South, anxious to take their own destiny in hand. CIMADE now has working links with some 30 countries.

CIMADE’s activities outside France are complemented by work to make French people themselves more aware of the structures of inequality. Whether in relation to human rights* in France, or the structures of injustice and exploitation elsewhere, CIMADE focuses on the root causes of the situations which challenge Christian responsibility. This calls for constant reflection and review in the light of changing situations. Such reflection makes it possible to go beyond giving personal help, necessary as this always is, to the level of dealing with the structures which cause marginalization and exploitation.

As CIMADE continues its efforts, its direct involvement in the reality of tragic situations and injustice makes its voice unmistakably authentic when it calls on political authorities, society at large and church members to work unceasingly for justice* and the defence of outcasts.

CIVIL RELIGION

THE IDEA of civil religion goes back to the Enlightenment and to Rousseau’s The Social Contract. Its four simple dogmas – about the existence of God,* the life to come, the reward of virtue and punishment of vice, and the exclusion of religious intolerance – had both a polemical and emancipatory character in contrast to the spirit of established churches and theology. Civil religion became a form of widely accepted religious beliefs that were private, personal, civil and inward.

Within the ecumenical movement attention to this complex religious phenomenon was initially stimulated by the analysis of US sociologist Robert N. Bellah: "There actually exists alongside of and rather clearly differentiated from the churches an elaborated and well-institutionalized civil religion in America. This religion – perhaps better, this religious dimension – has its own seriousness and integrity and requires the same care in understanding that any other religion does."

From 1981 to 1987 the Lutheran World Federation (LWF) Department of Studies coordinated an interdisciplinary ecumenical study on civil religion in 52 countries, using a working definition of civil religion as "a pattern of symbols, ideas and practices that legitimate the authority of civil institutions in a society. It provides a fundamental value orientation that binds a people together in common action within the public realm. It is religious in so far as it evokes commitment and, within an overall world-view, expresses a people's ultimate sense of worth, identity and destiny. It is civil in so far as it deals with the basic public institutions exercising power in a society, nation or other political unit. A civil religion can be known through its observance of rituals, its holidays, sacred places, documents, stories, heroes and other behaviour in or analogous to recognized historical religions. Civil religion may also contain a theory that may emerge as an ideology. Individual members of a society may have varying degrees of awareness of their civil religion. It may have an extensive or limited acceptance by the population as long as it serves its central function of legitimating the civil institutions."

Churches, universities, seminaries, experts and institutions prepared local and national studies, and the LWF organized several area and continental conferences and a final meeting for general evaluation. According to the findings of the study, civil religion is not a "religion" like Christianity, Buddhism or Islam but rather a socio-political orientation – sometimes overt and sometimes hidden – that borrows and interprets for its own purposes a given religious framework. Every socio-political system can produce a civil religion to legitimate its way of life, understanding of history, beliefs, values and regulations in relation to other socio-political systems.

The study distinguished four inter-related aspects of civil religion: (1) religiosity as folk-church or folk religious tradition (e.g. communities and individuals struggling for identity and hungering for transcendence); (2) the relationship between church, religion and state, as defined by the constitution, legislation, the national anthem and the idea of a "neutral" state; (3) the relationship between church, religion and nation, which includes national or tribal elements of religiosity and the role of religion* in the process of nation-building; (4) the relationship between church, religion and the deep structure of basic values, as reflected in the values of the constitution and the educational structures.

Governments and people in authority have always used religion to legitimate or safeguard their own position. The privileged church or religion used its music or liturgy to support social and civil institutions, which in turn guaranteed its favoured treatment. Every society harbours certain forms of civil religion, which differ according to the society's background and the elements that have shaped its development. If civil religion is to integrate and unite a society through myths, ceremonies and ideologies, it must provide a sense of a common past, present and future in transmitting and interpreting the society's values and goals and make them appear to be right, necessary and, indeed, the only possible ones.

A further element can be the mobilization of people for common tasks and responsibilities. For example, in Indonesia the five pillars of Pancasila represented an attempt to provide a framework of unity for religion and peoples through belief in one supreme God, just and civilized humanity, the unity of Indonesia, a democracy led by the wisdom of deliberations among representatives, and social justice for the whole of Indonesia.

Any theological evaluation of civil religion must remember that the church is always involved in the process of civil religion. At its best, civil religion can create social order and national or group cohesion, and at its worst it can become a kind of idolatry. The church can sometimes use civil religion as a point of contact (Anknüpfungspunkt); at other times the church should stand in prophetic judgment over it.

CIVIL SOCIETY

THE ORIGINAL use of the term “civil society” in modern philosophy was intended to contrast civil society with natural society – the former being a “well-ordered” political society or state, the latter being a society without an effective political order. It is used in this sense, for example, by John Locke (1632-1704).

The fact that in current usage the state is not only not identified with “civil society”, but contrasted with it, suggests that (1) the term has been expanded and has undergone a shift of meaning in the history of thought; (2) having various connotations, it is liable to be used loosely or manipulatively; (3) care should be taken when using it to set it in its discursive context.

It is the first point which interests us here. The opposition of “civil” and “natural” in the early development of bourgeois society was easily associated with the distinction between “civilized” and “primitive” or “barbaric”, reflecting a philosophy of history which saw capitalist organization of the economy as the supreme expression of the development of the human spirit and everything non-capitalist as inferior and everything anti-capitalist as chaos. The next step was to locate the superiority of the capitalist order, not in its economic relations but in the sphere of government. This is found in Rousseau (1712-78) and above all Hegel (1770-1831). Rousseau distinguishes between natural society, civil society (still not adequately political) and political society or the state. Hegel saw the state in categorical terms as superseding the civil society, from which by implication it drew its power. In all these versions, “civil society” is to be understood as the well-ordered bourgeois society. The difference lies in the emphases placed on the factors in the relation between economy and politics.

Following Marx’s prologue to his Contribution to the Critique of Political Economy (not necessarily correctly understood), civil society came to be identified with the economy or the sphere of particular interests – something quite different from what it originally meant. The situation became more complicated, even within the Marxist tradition, when Gramsci (1891-1937) categorized the notion in relation to the state function of hegemony.

The most widely used sense of “civil society” today distinguishes it from government and the state, defining it as the sphere of particular interests, organized to some degree, and not necessarily in conflict with political institutions. (In some literature on the subject in English, “civil society” is simply synonymous with “society”; some Latin American writers close to this tradition make the same transposition.)

With the increase of globalization under the neo-liberalism of the 1980s, the term “civil society” once again returned to socio-political discourse and analysis. The anti-state rhetoric of neo-liberalism developed a Manichean dualism of state and market, presenting the latter as the basis of social relations. Within this framework, civil society can be held up as the sphere in which enterprises, including informal workers, can be strengthened and express themselves. It is the arena of liberty, free of political or party-political corruption (intervention). From another angle, the opening up of the markets under the neo-liberal project increased the impoverishment and exclusion of the labour force and gave a new form to social tensions and conflicts. Against this background came the collapse of the societies living under historical socialism and renewed talk of the “end of ideologies”. As a reaction to this, the attention to civil society reflects a quest for new social forces and actors who might bring about the changes that are needed, at least by Latin American societies. In its extreme form, civil society is seen as the sphere of the alternative, of New Historical Subject; more moderately, it is a space where the many new actors on the social scene (feminists, ecologists, etc.) can organize and assert their identity alongside the traditional ones (trade unionists, farmers, etc.). Many saw the uprising in Chiapas, Mexico (1994), as a sign of the vitality of this new civil society.

Analytically, “civil society” is to be understood as a humanly well-ordered society. It refers to the differing needs of the diverse social groups and the forms of reasoning, spirituality, structures and institutions that link and empower them as a community. Civil society, then, is the space where both the diverse needs and the will for a constructive linkage of differences are expressed. By definition, civil society is plural in nature.

To the extent that civil society included the tendency to respond to all the needs without exclusion, it is also an ecumenical space. This implies a tendency towards the absence of domination and hegemony. “Civil society” can thus be associated with a category like the people of God* – a people in which everyone appreciates and values other cultures and other religions as manifestations of the richness of the one God of life.

Slowly the churches are becoming aware that (as Israel Batista has put it) “whatever we call civil society, be it an old idea, a new paradigm or an easy slogan, society is becoming a testing place for alternatives, the reorganization of social movements and the space for the healing witness of local churches and ecumenical groups in the face of the predominance of the market economy and the weakness of the state”. In June 1995, in cooperation with the Evangelical Academy at Loccum (Germany), the WCC called a consultation on theology and civil society and published the preparatory papers and a booklet of testimonies on “Witnesses of Faith Communities in Changing Societies”.

COLD WAR

THE TERM “cold war” designates the ideological, political, economic and military struggle between the two super-powers, the Soviet Union and the United States, each the centre of a bloc of allies, during the period from the end of the second world war through 1989. These two blocs had fought together against facism in Europe and Japanese imperialism in Asia during the second world war, but from 1945 both sought to expand their spheres of ideological, political, economic and military influence worldwide. The ideological hostility resulted in the “iron curtain” between East and West, symbolized most graphically in the building of the Berlin Wall in 1961, halting communication between peoples at all levels.

In 1955, a conference of Afro-Asian countries in Bandung, Indonesia, used the term “third world” to distinguish these countries from the ideological power blocs of the “first” and “second” worlds, and in 1961 a group of 25 developing nations formed the Non-Aligned Movement to declare their intention not to emulate the policies of either of the super-power blocs.

While armed military conflict between the two super-powers was avoided, they confronted one another in destructive regional proxy wars in Korea, Vietnam, Afghanistan, Southern Africa, Central America and elsewhere.

Global tensions between capitalist and socialist systems inevitably posed serious problems also for the WCC. At its founding assembly in Amsterdam in 1948, a classic debate between John Foster Dulles, the USA statesman, and Joseph Hromádka, the respected Czech theologian, on Christian attitudes towards the cold war set the tone for decades of ecumenical confrontation. From the beginning, the WCC included churches from East, West and non-aligned blocs. In this tense situation the WCC sought (1) to ensure that neither the ecumenical movement as a whole nor the individual churches would so “identify themselves with any political or social ideology that religion would become exploited for purely secular political ends”; and (2) to defend the “fundamental liberty of the church to exercise its evangelistic and prophetic functions without hindrance” (Visser ’t Hooft).

The Amsterdam assembly urged churches to do all in their power to attack the causes of war by promoting peaceful change, the pursuit of justice and resistance to the deployment of weapons of mass destruction.

The first test of these ecumenical principles came in June 1950 when war broke out between North and South Korea. The United Nations, after receiving a report from its commission in Korea, concluded that “all evidence points to a calculated attack prepared and launched with secrecy” by North Korean troops, and approved “a police measure” by member nations to oppose this “aggression”. Meeting in Toronto in July 1950, the WCC central committee adopted a statement on the Korean situation and world order supporting the UN action, while urging governments to press individually and through the UN for a just settlement by negotiation and conciliation. After a bitter and costly conflict, an armistice was declared in 1953, though the Soviet Union and the USA continued to support their respective allies on the divided peninsula. (From 1984, the WCC took the lead in promoting Korean re-unification, and in 1986 brought Christian leaders together for the first time in more than four decades.)

There were more cold-war crises throughout the 1950s. In October 1956 a revolt against the communist regime in Hungary was quickly suppressed by Russian troops and tanks, to the dismay of churches and the WCC. In the same month an Anglo-French military incursion in the Middle East sought to deny Egypt control of the Suez Canal, and this was equally condemned by the ecumenical movement.

In December 1961 the Russian Orthodox Church was received into membership in the WCC along with nine other Orthodox and Protestant churches from the USSR and Eastern Europe. Though some in the West feared that this would weaken the stance of the WCC on many cold-war issues, most churches welcomed the views of additional churches from the communist-bloc nations.

The Vietnam war (1962-72) generated worldwide criticism of the Western bloc, especially the USA. Opinion within the USA itself was bitterly divided. Large student protests in the USA, Europe and elsewhere gave rise to mass popular movements – in which many WCC member churches joined – which openly defied their governments’ policies in Indochina. Simultaneously, the “doctrine of national security” applied by the USA to support military dictatorships in Asia, Africa and Latin America was widely condemned by the worldwide ecumenical movement. There was similar ecumenical reaction to the Soviet military suppression of the “democratic” Marxist government in Czechoslovakia (August 1968), which reminded the world that the USSR was also unable to accept any dissenting views in its bloc.

The Western doctrine of “containment” of communism through the 1960s and 1970s led to reliance on nuclear deterrence by both sides to preserve the “peace” of the cold war. During the 1970s and 1980s the nuclear arms race grew dramatically. From the time of the US decision in 1979 to modernize its nuclear weapons stationed in Western Europe, massive popular protests began around the world against the nuclear arms race. A WCC public hearing on nuclear weapons and disarmament in Amsterdam in 1982 called special attention to the threat of global nuclear destruction. The sixth assembly of the WCC in Vancouver the following year echoed the concerns of the first assembly in 1948 and issued a ringing appeal to Christians and churches to refuse to participate in research, production or use of nuclear arms.

Internal problems in the communist bloc in the late 1970s, especially the disastrous results of communist economic policies, and internal reactions to the Soviet military invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, began to erode public confidence in the communist parties. Eventually new economic thinking and proposals for social restructuring (glasnost and perestroika) began to emerge in the USSR and throughout Eastern Europe. In the last months of 1989, the once fearsome cold war ended with dramatic political and economic changes throughout the communist world, leading to the eventual collapse of the Communist Party system. New, closer links were established with Western nations. However, the political and economic risks in bringing this about were underestimated. Not only did the former socialist bloc led by the USSR break apart, but the Soviet Union itself collapsed, resulting in a new configuration of nations in the area, in some cases accompanied by painful and prolonged ethnic conflicts.

A major contribution of the WCC and the ecumenical movement during the entire period of the cold war was to build bridges between churches living and witnessing in East and West. At times these represented the only human contact across the iron curtain. In some, though not all, of the post-cold war conflicts these ecumenical ties contributed significantly to reducing the level of violence in the transition from socialism to another system. The role of the churches in the German Democratic Republic in the period leading up to the fall of the Berlin Wall was a particularly dramatic example of this.

COLLEGIALITY

THE SECOND Vatican Council's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church officially describes collegiality thus: "Together with its head, the Roman pontiff, and never without this head, the episcopal order is the subject of supreme and full power over the universal church." This college of bishops, "in so far as it is composed of many members, expresses the variety and universality of the people of God, but in so far as it is assembled under one head, it expresses the unity of the flock of Christ" (Lumen Gentium 22). All bishops, by virtue of their episcopal consecration and their communion among themselves and with the head of the college, the bishop of Rome, have a corporate or collegial responsibility for the unity of faith* and communion* of the universal church* and for its mission* "to teach all nations and to preach the gospel to every creature".

The authority of the pope and the bishops is always to be exercised through the faithful preaching of the gospel, the administration of the sacraments and loving governance. They thus collaborate in the Holy Spirit's work of unity "in the confession of the one faith, in the common celebration of divine worship and in the fraternal harmony of the family of God" (Decree on Ecumenism 2).

Since all power in the church is that of Christ in the Spirit, and thus truly vicarious, Vatican II wrestled with how to explain the bishops' power as coming from Christ while still maintaining good order and structure in the church. And since the agents of supreme power are multiple (i.e., the pope and the rest of the bishops in full communion with him), the issue of their relationship in the exercise of authority is crucial. Otherwise that power which is intended for the unity of the church could seem to lead to disunity. Thus, the need for a further development of collegiality in theological theory and ecclesial practice is for the sake of both the local and the universal church, with direct ecumenical consequences.

Since Vatican II there are at least three major schools of thought on the relation between the pope and the other bishops in terms of supreme authority. The first focuses solely on the pope. No act of supreme authority can take place without his direct involvement, even if he joins himself to other bishops in a general council. A second view sees two different modalities of exercising legitimately the unifying power of Christ as the supreme authority: the pope in his own right, not involving the college of bishops, or the pope acting together with the bishops in a collegial act. Thus there are two subjects of supreme authority, though they are inadequately distinguished. A third view considers the role of the college of bishops, or the pope of the first college of the apostles, as more central in the plan of salvation. The college alone is the subject of supreme power. When the pope freely acts by himself, he is still exercising the supreme power that Christ gave the apostolic college, a college that Christ designated Peter to head but not to replace or duplicate.

In this debate, collegiality must be set within the Vatican II understanding of the worldwide communion of the people of God* and of the local (diocesan) churches in which they live, for the church is at once local and universal. Bishops are rooted in these particular churches in which they minister. In the universal church as "a communion of churches", the relationship of these churches to one another "is the foundation of the office (munus) that one bishop has in regard to others, whether as pope, patriarch, metropolitan, etc." (James Provost).

The 1985 synod of bishops stated that "the ecclesiology of communion provides the sacramental foundation of collegiality. Therefore the theology of collegiality is much more extensive than its juridical aspect. The collegial spirit is broader than effective collegiality understood in an exclusively juridical way."

This "collegial spirit" (or "affective collegiality") embraces the attitudes and motives of mutual interaction and collaboration in decision-making within the college of bishops and their structural expressions (e.g. national and regional episcopal conferences, the international synod of bishops, the college of cardinals and the Roman curia). The "spirit of collegiality" is also popularly used in a more extended sense to describe attitudes and structures in the local church or diocese through presbyterial and pastoral councils, and relations between bishop, clergy, religious and laity.

Could a broad interpretation of collegiality, biblically understood and historically developed, at least constitute a base of agreement between the churches? How might the pope exercise a ministry of primacy* which is acceptable to other churches? How does collegiality relate to conciliarity* and lead to a future "council truly ecumenical"?

Such topics have appeared in the official RCC bilateral dialogues with the Orthodox and Anglicans (and the RCC-Lutheran dialogue in the USA), with an impetus from the 1982 Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* section on the continuity of the apostolic Tradition and the episcopal succession as a servant, symbol and guardian of the continuity of the apostolic faith and communion. Indeed, collegiality contributes to the emerging inevitable question: What and for what is the Christ-given authority* in and of his one church? Where is that authority, and how should it be exercised?

COLONIALISM

AN EXAMINATION of official church statements from the end of the 19th century shows that the Christian churches were slow to recognize the implications of colonialism. Not until long after the end of the second world war did the term "colonialism" begin to appear in church documents. Although the peoples of Asia and Africa had been busy for years organizing nationalist and freedom movements, not to mention armed movements for national liberation, practically nothing of this activity appears in official ecclesiastical texts. Only after the war are a few explicit references found, often in a very watered-down form.

Colonialism is not mentioned in any of the great social encyclicals.* Yet the anti-colonialist movements were born long before the end of the 19th century and were even organizing international conferences like the one held in Brussels in 1925.

In the case of the WCC the first relatively concrete treatments of the problem came with the Evanston and New Delhi assemblies in 1954 and 1961. The first explicit allusion on the side of the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) dates from the Second Vatican Council. But these ecclesiastical statements are generally short on social analysis and reflect a very optimistic view of colonialism. The 1967 papal encyclical Populorum Progressio, for example, makes the following statement: "It must certainly be recognized that colonizing powers have often furthered their own interests, power or glory, and that their departure has sometimes left a precarious economy, bound up for instance with the production of one kind of crop whose market prices are subject to sudden and considerable variation. Yet while recognizing the damage done by a certain type of colonialism and its consequences, one must at the same time acknowledge the qualities and achievement of colonizers who brought their science and technical knowledge and left beneficial results of their presence in so many underprivileged regions. The structures established by them persist, however incomplete they may be; they diminished ignorance and sickness, brought the benefits of communications and improved living conditions."

How are we to explain this lack of awareness or historical objectivity in judging the situation?

THE HISTORY OF MISSIONS AND ITS PARALLELS WITH COLONIALISM

There were two main stages in colonialism: mercantilism and industrial capitalism.

Mercantile colonialism (15th to 18th centuries) was undertaken by the monarchies of Portugal and Spain and later by those of the Netherlands, England and France. In the nations of southern Europe like Portugal and Spain, mercantile colonialism was seized on to establish a balance between the feudal aristocratic class and the merchant class.

Since the feudal ideology, which was religious, continued to dominate, the mercantile enterprise was given a legitimation of the same sort. At the same time, the RCC saw in this mercantile activity a possibility of evangelism* (at least as understood in this period). Thus the ventures of the kings of Portugal and Spain were regularly legitimized by papal bulls issued throughout the entire mercantile period. It is true that not a few missionaries, particularly from religious orders (e.g. the Dominicans in Santo Domingo, the Jesuits in Paraguay, and even some bishops), fought against the brutality of the conquest and tried to develop a different understanding and practice of evangelization. But their testimony, sometimes heroic, was not able to modify seriously the course of events or change the policies of a church subject to the patronage power of the state and generally allied to the interests of the colonizers.

In return for this legitimation, the effort of evangelism received material and political assistance from the royal power. Evangelism was seen, on the one hand, as one of the best means of establishing tacit agreements with the local populations or of domesticating slaves and, on the other hand, as a task incumbent also on lay Christians in the exercise of power.

The second stage of colonialism concentrated mainly on the discovery and exploitation of raw materials for industrial development and the marketing of manufactured goods. The large Indies companies of the Netherlands, France, Sweden and Britain paved the way for this stage. Gradually, the new type of colonialism found itself competing with the more traditional powers, which continued to engage in mercantile colonialism – hence the wars between Britain and Holland, on the one hand, and Spain and Portugal, on the other, and the eventual conquest of the respective colonies in Latin America, Asia and Africa. The colonialism of this stage no longer claimed the same religious legitimization as that which prevailed in the mercantile period. Adopting a much more pragmatic approach and making use of the colonial governments, capitalism provided the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, with support to encourage the arrival of missionaries in the colonized territories, entrusting them with educational and medical missions extremely useful to the colonial enterprise of the day. Support for the work of missions was thus never interrupted, even when the European governments adopted a hostile attitude towards certain churches in their own countries.

In Latin America, the emergence of nationalist, anti-colonialist and anti-imperialist movements directed against the Western countries dates back to the beginning of the 19th century. The Vatican refused to recognize the new nations and long remained loyal to Spain, thus endangering the organization of local churches during a long period. Members of the lower-ranking clergy joined the nationalist movements, which at that time represented the emancipation of a local middle class rather than of the ordinary people. These movements, however, played an important historical role.

In Asia, strong nationalist movements based on traditional cultures and religions began to develop from the beginning of the 20th century: Hindu movements in India; Buddhist movements in Sri Lanka, Burma, Vietnam and Laos; Islamic movements in most of the Arab countries, Iran, Malaysia, Indonesia and that part of British India corresponding to present-day Pakistan and Bangladesh.

Most Christian churches were alarmed by these movements and resisted national emancipation, preferring to maintain their links with the colonizing powers. Only a few churches adopted a truly national position; elsewhere, it was only a few isolated voices, usually in lay intellectual circles. There were exceptions, notably in Indonesia and in Korea (which had been colonized by the Japanese).

Generally speaking, the Reformation churches had less difficulty in severing connections with the colonial power, since these connections were usually less direct. An exception was the Anglican church in British India; given its character as an established state church, it tended to take its cue from government colonial policy, though the same also applied when that policy was one of decolonization.* All this helps to explain why a number of political leaders in Asia after independence were Christians with a nationalist bias but at the same time exponents of the capitalist ideology characteristic of the West.

In Africa, the movement for independence after the second world war was rather sudden, and the local clergy adopted positions more explicitly emancipatory in character. This was the case with a number of local Roman Catholic episcopates, some of them predominantly white. This stance is attested, for example, by the pastoral letters of bishops in Tanganyika and in Madagascar in 1953, in Cameroon, French West Africa and Togo in 1955, and in Madagascar in 1956. A number of anti-white emancipation movements were led by Africans who had founded independent churches or religious movements such as Kimbanguism in the Belgian Congo.

The case of Portuguese colonialism was particularly distressing. The RCC did not dissociate itself from the colonial war waged by Portugal right up to 1974. The concordat between the holy see and the Portuguese government was still in force, and the holy see never renounced it. Only a tiny number of priests and lay Catholics joined various leaders of the Protestant churches in identifying themselves with the nationalist movement.

It is clear, then, that the Christian churches had a largely blinkered ecclesiastical and proselytizing vision of what was happening and lacked the critical distance for an objective analysis. They were almost completely unrepresented in the critique of colonialism which had developed in the West, largely inspired by socialist movements and later by a Marxist analysis, and played hardly any part in the movements within the colonized nations which for the most part preached a cultural emancipation inspired by the traditional religions. A number of the IMC conferences – particularly Tambaram 1933, Whitby 1947, Willingen 1952 and, even earlier, the Latin American missionary congress of 1926 in Panama – sharply criticized the colonial enterprise. But only later, particularly in the struggles in Southern Africa, were some churches, following the leadership of the WCC, able to overcome the colonialist mentality and establish a positive relation with liberation movements, often led by people from the local churches – and these relations were violently criticized in the West.

The positions adopted by the Christian churches at the end of the colonial era emphasized their tasks in the new situation of national sovereignty and the importance of the autonomy of the local churches, rather than critically appraising the colonial past. This was the standpoint expressed, for example, at the Uppsala assembly of the WCC in 1968.

A EUROCENTRIC VISION

Another feature of church documents is their deep conviction of the superiority of the civilized values which “Christian” Europe brings to the “non-civilized” peoples. From the 15th to the 16th centuries, this was the justification for the struggle against Islam. The absolute conviction that Christianity was necessary for the salvation* of all human beings and that it was essential to spread it by all legitimate – or what were deemed legitimate – means found expression in its alliance with the mercantile colonial enterprise. The notion of European cultural superiority and the blessings of European civilization together constituted a particularly important ideological basis during the period of colonialism by the industrial nations, and the Christian churches were the main vehicle for this ideology.

Even after the attainment of independence by the former colonized countries, church documents still remained close to the old way of thinking (seen, for example, in the address of Pope Pius XII of 24 December 1955). A critical distance in this area is found only in certain positions adopted by the WCC, notably in 1961 at the third assembly in New Delhi.

THE POST-COLONIAL ERA

The churches were very quick to draw a veil over the colonial era and at the same time in many cases to adopt a more concrete and courageous attitude to the problems of the post-colonial era. In Pacem in Terris, Pope John XXIII spoke of the relationships between the young peoples and the old peoples. The self-determination of the new nations was a theme at the Uppsala assembly. The encyclical Populorum Progressio tackled the theme of development and did not hesitate to condemn economic imperialism.* Various documents of the WCC and especially of its Programme to Combat Racism* have spoken of the phenomenon of neo-colonialism. The capacity for analysis was gradually developed within the churches. It must be acknowledged, however, that the official documents show little in the way of self-criticism as to the role played in colonialism by the churches themselves, whatever the personal devotion and heroism shown by individual missionaries. Nor are there any critiques of colonialism as such, of its economic and political roots and the domination resulting from it.

COMMON CONFESSION

FROM ITS VERY beginning, the organized ecumenical movement has aimed at attaining a common confession of the same apostolic faith.* As early as 1927, the first world conference on Faith and Order* at Lausanne received this resolution unanimously: "Notwithstanding the differences in doctrine among us, we are united in a common Christian faith, which is proclaimed in the holy scriptures and is witnessed to and safeguarded in the ecumenical creed, commonly called the Nicene, and in the Apostles' Creed, which faith is continuously confirmed in the spiritual experience of the church of Christ" (4.28).

Perhaps such a declaration was at that stage too optimistic for the ecumenical movement as a whole. The "basis" prepared for the constitution of the WCC, adopted at Amsterdam (1948) and revised in a more Trinitarian direction at New Delhi (1961), was indeed a provisional and minimal criterion of faith for admission to membership. But it was not yet the common confession required and sufficient for the unity* of the church and the "unity in one faith" which is the explicit goal pursued by the WCC and its F&O commission.

From Lausanne onwards, F&O has studied ways for making a common confession and the problems which hinder the reception* of a common confession of faith. Its world conference at Montreal in 1963 studied the relation of scripture, Tradition and traditions* and, within that context, the relation of scripture and creeds.* Thereafter, studies were undertaken on the councils of the early church and their hermeneutical significance, and on the possibility of a genuinely universal council which would be able to receive such a common confession. In 1967, at the F&O commission meeting in Bristol, the proposal for a study on a common confession of faith was deemed to be unripe for the time being. The emphasis after the Uppsala assembly (1968) and the Louvain meeting of the commission (1971) was on the contextual pluralism* of credal witness and of "accounts of hope". On the basis of material collected from all parts of the world, F&O issued, at its meeting in Bangalore (1978), a "Common Account of Hope" (see hope). It was followed directly by a proposal for a study on the "Common Confession of the Apostolic Faith Today", in order to implement more fully the exhortation of the Nairobi assembly (1975): "We ask the churches to undertake a common effort to receive, re-appropriate and confess together, as contemporary occasion requires, the Christian truth and faith, delivered through the apostles and handed down through the centuries. Such common action, arising from free and inclusive discussion under the commonly acknowledged authority of God's word, must aim both to clarify and to embody the unity and the diversity which are proper to the church's life and mission."

A joint consultation of F&O and the Joint Working Group* between the Roman Catholic Church and the WCC produced in 1980 an important study document, "Towards a Confession of the Common Faith", which takes up the issue of the plural, and sometimes contradictory, character of confessional traditions among the churches: "Since their divisions the churches have each given themselves either conciliar decrees or confessions to which they attach a real authority. But this authority always remains subject not only to the authority of scripture but also to that of those universally received documents which concern the centre of the faith and which the church holds from the period that may be deemed its building period."

In spite of those differences, however, the churches within the ecumenical movement have to meet the aspirations and hopes, doubts and fears of people in various contexts. Confidence could be restored between older and younger churches, and between older and younger church members only if "the faith of the church through the ages" was expressed in such ways that it met the longings and desires of people in modern societies without destroying the trust and faith as it is held by older people or by the older churches.

Time-bound expressions of faith must always be measured by the regula fidei (rule of faith) transmitted through the centuries. To face the hermeneutical task, the Lima meeting of F&O in 1982 proposed a study project in three stages, under the title "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today". It aimed at three interdependent goals: (1) recognition of the Nicene Creed* (in the version of 381, i.e. without the filioque* clause) as the ecumenical creed of the church, (2) explanation of that creed for the sake of contemporary understanding and establishing confidence concerning its meaning in the service of unity, and (3) finding ways to express that same common faith today.

Recognition of the Nicene Creed – without the addition of the filioque clause – seems a real possibility now, provided that an ecumenical explanation becomes a sufficient basis for mutual trust. Such explanation has been developed within the F&O commission, and a first draft was published in 1987, entitled "Confessing One Faith". After further work, it was shared with the churches at the F&O world conference in Santiago de Compostela in 1993. This explanation sets out the biblical sources of the articulations of faith used in the creed of 381, describes their 4th-century context and then treats them in relation to questions being asked about them today. A popularized version of "Confessing the One Faith" was adopted at the F&O plenary commission meeting at Moshi, Tanzania, in 1996.

Recognition and explanation of the Nicene Creed, however, must not replace the search for new confessions of faith* as they are provoked today by situations of persecution, of church union negotiations, or of urgent socio-economic, political or ideological threats. Several such examples of "credal witness in context" were collected and published by the WCC in the series "Confessing Our Faith around the World". Among this material, some modern confessions of faith that have been made on an authoritative level could enrich the variety of credal expression and ought to be communicated within the ecumenical community as concrete evidence of "listening to what the Spirit has to say to the churches". Reception and fraternal correction of such confessional formulas would become a real sign of koinonia* and conciliar fellowship. An ecumenical "Book of Confessions" would then become an enriching possibility for dialogue and exchange of spiritual experiences.

Important problems still to be solved in the explanation of the ancient creeds and the reception of contemporary expressions of faith relate to the understanding of creation* and redemption,* the images and names of God,* the challenge of atheism,* dialogue with other faiths (see dialogue, interfaith), the doctrine of the incarnation* and the resurrection* of the Son of God, the activity of the Holy Spirit* in church* and world, and the right understanding of the gospel of "the kingdom of God".*

More important, however, is the question of how the churches could discover together "how to live the faith in such a way that it will meet the aspirations on which people and persons set their hopes together, and how to proclaim this faith unanimously by overcoming its divisions" (Towards a Confession of the Common Faith).

COMMON WITNESS

THE TERM “common witness”, in use since the early 1970s, refers to the witness* that the churches, even while separated, bear together, especially through joint efforts, by manifesting whatever divine gifts of truth and life they already share and experience in common. A more limited understanding of common witness had been conveyed in the Protestant origins of the ecumenical movement by terms such as “cooperative missions”, “united ministries” and “joint mission”.

EARLY COOPERATION

Cooperation marked a few Protestant missions from their beginnings in the early 18th century: already in 1710 the Anglican-based Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge began supplying personnel and funds to the Lutheran Danish-Halle mission in India.

In the 19th century, Christians across denominational lines formed associations, notably Bible and tract societies, and some mission groups worked for common policies and effective home-base collaboration. Cooperation in health and education ministries led to union institutions, e.g. in India and in China. At least they bore common witness to basic Christian convictions about helping people in need and sharing the same gospel.

By so-called comity arrangements, various church-related or independent mission groups divided new territories into spheres of operation. Although comity led to “denominationalism by geography”, it did reduce wasteful duplication of resources and kept at a distance obvious variant forms of worship and polity which could scandalize non-Christians and hinder witness to the basic gospel message which Christians share.

The Edinburgh world mission conference in 1910 (see ecumenical conferences) stimulated cooperation along other lines, especially in the gradual spread of interdenominational “home base” and “foreign” federations; after the first world war, many of these developed into national Christian councils.

Some Protestant bodies – e.g. Missouri Synod Lutherans, Seventh-day Adventists and most Baptist groups – rejected the very principle of such cooperation. Up until the 1960s, the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) and most Orthodox churches also refused to cooperate. The Catholic and Orthodox refusals were based on ecclesiological self-understanding, on the pastoral judgment of “not confusing the faithful” by apparent compromise of revealed truth, and on the anxiety about legitimating if not promoting what they judged to be Protestant proselytism* among their vulnerable flocks.

On the other hand, Protestants and Orthodox questioned RC understandings and policies on religious freedom.* The RCC seemed to demand free exercise of religion where Catholics were in a minority in any nation, and to refuse and deny it where they were the majority. If RC initiatives towards cooperation with other Christians were to be trusted, the RCC should state “clearly and authoritatively that it will respect the liberty of other believers, even if it has the power or the occasion to do otherwise, and that it condemns intolerance, persecution and discrimination on grounds of religious liberty” (A.F. Carillo de Albornoz, WCC secretary for religious liberty, 1964).

THE PRE-CONDITION OF COMMON WITNESS

In hindsight, it is apparent that consensus over religious freedom and proselytism (or false witness) was a pre-condition for the acceptance of authentic common witness among all the churches. The WCC’s third assembly (New Delhi 1961) approved a report on Christian witness, proselytism and religious liberty. Its clarifications eased the entry of the Orthodox churches into the working life of the WCC – itself a “privileged” instrument and sign of common witness.

The RCC’s active entry into the ecumenical movement was officially signalled in several documents of Vatican II* (1962-65), especially those on the church, on ecumenism and on religious freedom. Based on the ecclesiological conviction that “real but imperfect communion” already exists between the churches, the Decree on Ecumenism* pleaded: “Before the whole world, let all Christians profess their faith in God, our Redeemer and Lord. United in their efforts, and with mutual respect, let them bear witness to our common hope." The decree called for "cooperation among Christians", for it "vividly expresses that bond which already unites them, and sets in clearer relief the features of Christ the Servant" (12). In its declaration on religious freedom, Vatican II insisted that no individual or community may be forced to act against conscience* or be prevented from expressing belief through teaching, worship or social action.

The expression "common witness" appears extensively for the first time in the 1970 document of the WCC-RCC Joint Working Group,* "Common Witness and Proselytism". It elaborated and updated the theme in its "Common Witness" study documents in 1982 and 1996.

IMPLICATIONS OF COMMON WITNESS

Christian witness is, in the first place, the continuous act by which a Christian individual or community proclaims, in deed and word, God's saving deeds in history. Christ calls each disciple wholly to be his witness but does not demand each to be a witness to the whole of him. Only the church,* the community of all disciples, in its many-splendoured variety, is a witness to the whole incarnate counsel of God. This continual witness includes the whole life of the church: personal and communal worship, responsible service and proclamation of the good news. The church is prodded to persevere in such witness by the "cloud of witnesses" (Heb. 12:1), especially of those who suffered for the faith, even unto death (see martyrdom).

Second, common witness, as it is now used, applies to the historical situation of the real but imperfect communion* between the churches in their search for the full visible communion of the one church of Christ. Common witness will always remain imperfect until there is full communion in faith, sacramental life and teaching authority,* and in the exercise and recognition of all the Spirit's charisms* given "for the common good" (1 Cor. 12:7), "for building up the body of Christ" (Eph. 4:12).

Third, even while still lacking that full communion, the churches nevertheless acknowledge that proclaiming the saving deeds of God is their central task, and this should be the burden of their common witness. They all find in the one gospel the motivation, purpose and content for their common witness. The churches give common witness whenever and however they express the gifts of faith, hope and love according to God's word, e.g. in Christian marriage and family life, in Sunday worship, in acts of compassion and forgiveness, in selfless service to those who are in material and spiritual need, in the promotion of social and economic justice, in the explicit invitation to hear Christ's call through God and his church, and even in the silence of a prison cell or of a restricted but still serving, waiting, praying church.

This indicates that common witness is broader than cooperation or joint efforts. In fact, Christians give common witness when they acknowledge and respect the shared gifts of grace, truth and love in all the churches, rejoice in their exercise and praise and thank God, always wonderful in divine works.

Fourth, common witness is heightened whenever the churches and their members jointly carry out shared Christian responsibilities: prayer (common celebrations to mark the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity* or highlight the great Christian festivals or locally significant occasions); reading, studying and praying through the Bible; translating, producing and distributing the Bible editions; preparing Christian catechism texts, especially for the young; reflecting theologically on classically dividing issues (bilateral and multilateral dialogues*); approaching local, national or international authorities to offer Christian witness on political matters where human rights and dignity or spiritual and moral values are at stake; and direct evangelism.*

The range and diversity of interchurch organizations for joint action and other forms of cooperation run from councils of churches at various levels, to joint working groups, service councils and committees, and study and action groups of every kind. One should expect further forms to appear as renewed faithfulness to mission impels Christians towards unity, as they already try to proclaim a message of hope and peace in a broken world.

Finally, common witness has limits because of different, even contradictory, understandings of the revealed content of the faith regarding worship (e.g. eucharistic sharing), faith (e.g. authority in and of the church) and personal and social ethics (e.g. abortion, sexual orientation, women's role in the church). In fact, on some ethical issues transdenominational coalitions may form on opposite sides, each claiming to be faithful to the gospel and to be engaged in common witness.

Such situations and experiences should further press Christians "to find the right ways to proclaim together to all peoples the good news of the kingdom of God" (Pope John Paul II) and to pray and work for that true common witness in the full visible communion of the one church of Christ, who is "the faithful and true witness" (Rev. 3:14).

COMMUNICATION

THE WORD "communication" by its very definition is central to the ecumenical movement. Its literal root meaning is "bound together in one". It refers to the bond that is forged when information is imparted, when ideas and thoughts are exchanged, when cultures are shared and when people or places normally treated as separate entities are brought into close relationship with one another. Communication lies at the heart of the churches' commission to make known the message of the gospel and supremely describes that act of sharing together in the gifts of grace when Christians "communicate" in the holy sacrament (see eucharist).

"I would call communication the fundamental human fact," wrote the Dutch theologian Johannes de Graaf, "because communication is the essential divine fact. The nature of the Triune God is the communication of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit in that holy perichoresis of love, out of which results the creation and in which the creation rests."

The church has consequently from the earliest days been concerned about the means of communication and has frequently been the pioneer in the development of new media, though often expressing ambivalent views about the potentiality or perils inherent in them. Thus, though the invention of printing in the 15th century was first used to disseminate the holy scriptures, it was regarded with suspicion by those who feared that this would put into common possession writings once safeguarded by religious teachers and scholars and might lead to misinterpretation and debase-ment of their worth. Similarly, as drama developed in the churches of medieval times as a way of communicating the gospel among illiterate people, the players were eventually driven out of the sanctuaries and had to perform in the streets instead.

The same ambivalence has been apparent in the churches' attitudes towards the mass media of communication that developed in the 20th century, although in many cases their pioneers were people of good conscience and Christian intent. It is said that Samuel Morse, the inventor of telegraphy, for example, declared as his hope that it might be used to make known "not so much the price of pork, as what God hath wrought". The first public radio broadcast was made to ships at sea by the Canadian inventor Richard Fessenden, who began the transmission with a reading from St Luke's gospel. Broadcasting House, the headquarters of the British Broadcasting Corporation, was dedicated at the outset to the glory of God. Yet the churches were slow to see the new opportunity for Christian communication presented by these mass media. Nor were they immediately aware of the impact that electronic methods of transmission would eventually have upon the whole of society, affecting the way people send and receive messages and shaping new patterns of perception.

THE VALUE OF THE MEDIA TO THE CHURCHES

Pope Pius XII (1939-58) was one of the first church leaders in the 20th century to speak positively about the potential value of the mass media. While sharing the anxieties of his predecessors about the debasing of values in the secular press, he pursued the thesis that the media in themselves were not inherently good or evil but that the abuse of them reflected the sickness in human society. He emphasized that they should be used to propagate Christian teaching.

Similarly, the earliest statements of the WCC on the theme of mass communication concentrated on their value as tools to be used by the churches in their own task of evangelism* and particularly emphasized the importance of safeguarding the right to the freedom of religious expression. At the first WCC assembly in Amsterdam (1948), the principle was enunciated that "the right to determine faith and creed becomes meaningful when man has the opportunity of access to information... This right requires freedom from arbitrary limitation of religious expression in all means of communication, including speech, press, radio, motion pictures and art." The assembly urged that further research into the effect of these media should be undertaken.

Warning notes about the perils inherent in using mass media as a means of evangelism were sounded at the Evanston assembly (1954), where it was stated: "When the gospel is secularized, vulgarized or diluted into an easy alternative to facing the demand of God for a personal response, it does much harm." But the assembly emphasized the important role of communication in publicizing the ecumenical movement itself and gave a mandate to the communication department of the WCC to "make known the activities of the WCC through the church and secular press and other media. It should also serve the churches by providing them with news about the life of their sister churches."

INTER MIRIFICA

The Second Vatican Council* Decree on the Instruments of Social Communication, Inter Mirifica, was one of the earliest documents approved and was given little discussion. While it came later to be regarded as too slight a commentary on what was becoming a major issue, Pope Paul VI remarked that it was "not of small value" in emphasizing the need for everyone to develop "an upright conscience on the use of these instruments", particularly with regard to the purveying of information and the portrayal of human morality. "Within human society", the decree declared, "exists a right to information about affairs which affect men individually or collectively." But such information should be "honourable and appropriate". As with the early WCC assemblies, the main emphasis was on the value of the media in the fulfilment of the church's own task: "The church claims as a birthright the use and possession of all instruments which are necessary and useful for the formation of Christians and for every activity undertaken on behalf of man's salvation."

The practical outcome of the Vatican decree came from its recommendation of establishing national offices everywhere for "affairs of press, motion pictures, radio and television", with "the special obligation of helping the faithful to form a true conscience about the use of these media and of fostering and coordinating Catholic activities directed to this end". Following the re-organization of the Roman curia in 1989, the Pontifical Council for Social Communications is concerned with all media: written, cinema, radio and television.

Several commentators criticized the clerical and paternalistic tone of the decree and its failure to take account of the expertise of professional journalists among the church's laity. Its insistence that "on religious shepherds devolves the task of so training and directing the faithful that by the help of these instruments [of communication] they may pursue their own salvation and fulfilment" seemed to claim the right of the church to possess the communication media for its own purposes while exercising control over all other uses.

Archbishop Andrea Pangrazio, quoted in the Italian Catholic weekly Ave Maria in January 1965, took a more prophetic view: "A mass society has come into being which has given itself a mass culture. The intellectual is contemptuous of it and rejects it, but the fact remains that this mass culture contains real human values: a thirst for knowledge and truth, a need to communicate these with every means and with all speed so that people may be in communication with each other, and finally a cultural heritage accessible to all and offered as a gift. These values must find their own theological interpretation so that a new humanism can be realized."

THE UPPSALA STATEMENT

Out of a similar concern that the churches did not seem to be taking the media seriously enough and were failing to recognize the quantum leap taking place in the whole field of communication, a group of professional journalists and broadcasters met with an ecumenical group of theologians for a consultation convened by the WCC at Bossey (1965). This was the first international conference under church auspices to consider the relationship of theology to mass communication. It stressed that, with the advent of radio and television, the patterns of human perception were being changed, in that the printed word is no longer the main way in which people receive and transmit messages. While recognizing that the churches had a pastoral responsibility towards all who used the media, it emphasized especially the role of professional journalists and the wide impact of their work on society as a whole.

The outcome of this consultation was a major statement prepared for the Upp-sala assembly of 1968 on the church and the media of mass communication. Its optimistic tone reflects the theological mood of the 1960s, affirming the presence of God in the secular world of the media, claiming the world of communication as a theatre of the Holy Spirit's operation and seeing the mass media as tools to forge a new universal human society. "The media can enrich human life considerably," it stated. "As never before, they make it possible for people to share experience with the hope that they may grow in awareness, understanding and compassion. The media provide some of the bone structure for a responsible world society. The sufferings of others are swiftly known and may be quickly alleviated. The crucial issues of our time are discussed before all people. Minority views can be given a public airing. New proposals and plans can be openly debated. Cultural treasures can be circulated en masse in what can be described as 'museums without walls'. Moribund traditions can become living knowledge. It is possible that senses which have lain dormant as a result of the development of a primarily verbal or literate culture may be quickened. The media can do these things but there is no guarantee that they will."

Within the Uppsala assembly itself much use was made of visual and aural means of communicating the concerns of the various sections. Films, songs, drama, exhibitions of graphic art were prominent foci of attention, all presented with the kind of professional expertise the statement had emphasized. "The preaching of the good news of Christ", it had said, "should not be confused with poor techniques, cheap advertising methods and presentations designed as propaganda for our own groups. The presentation of the gospel requires respect for the freedom of the audience and the integrity of the media."

Acknowledging that the churches had been tardy in taking the communication media seriously, the recommendations arising out of the Uppsala statement urged that the WCC should initiate studies in this area, a mandate given subsequently to the department of communication. This led to considerable discussion later about whether the department was primarily to focus on the Evanston mandate to provide efficient communications to serve the churches and the ecumenical movement, or to develop programmes addressing the more wide-ranging issues identified by Uppsala.

COMMUNIO ET PROGRESSIO

A similarly optimistic note was sounded by Paul VI in his 1971 pastoral instruction Communio et Progressio, which stressed the need for a more positive and affirmative attitude to the media. The pope saw modern developments as making it possible to multiply the contacts within human society and to deepen social consciousness, which would contribute to the growth of human unity. In a vivid simile, he compared the availability of the mass media to the provision of a round table which could give the whole human family an opportunity to participate in dialogue and fellowship with one another.

During the 1970s the Catholic regional offices concerned with communication were beginning to make their impact. In Latin America the issue of communication was given prominent attention at the third general conference of Latin American bishops (Puebla 1979), which made both positive and negative judgments on the basis of monitoring the media in their region. "We recognize that the media of social communication are factors for communion. They contribute to the integration of Latin America and to the expansion and democratization of culture. They also contribute to the entertainment of people. They increase people's capacity for perception and sensory acuteness through auditory and visual stimuli." But the report went on to denounce the control and ideological manipulation of the media by political and economic power groups. "They seek to maintain the status quo or even to create a new order of dependence and domination, or else they seek to subvert the existing order and to create one that is the very antithesis of it. Exploitation of passions, feelings, violence and sex for consumeristic purposes constitutes a flagrant violation of individual rights."

THE ECUMENICAL DIMENSION OF THE MEDIA

Meanwhile, ecumenical commentators were stressing the potential of the mass media as a democratizing influence, putting information, education and entertainment within the reach of all. WCC communication director Albert van den Heuvel commended the role of the media in extending a sense of universalism over against nationalism and in unmasking the inefficiency of the churches' denominational structures. He suggested that the development of mass methods of communication was providing the one stable factor in a mobile society. While such theologians as Karl Barth, Roger Mehl and Jacques Ellul had written about communication as being of the very essence of the divine-human relationship, they had used the word only within the context of interpersonal relationships and had not seriously addressed the question of the media of social communication. This theological dimension was sounded in a 1972 report to the WCC central committee: "Often the churches have been content to talk about communication as technique without realizing that communicative techniques are always developed within a theoretical framework and betray deep theological or ideological presuppositions. It is high time that the churches accept the need to give to the theological reflection on communication the place of importance which is necessitated by the crises of communication they experience within and among themselves... The well-being of the media for mass communication, their proper structures, the code of professional ethics, their purpose and the ministry in a technological society are not given the attention which their importance requires."

During the 1970s issues of communication began to appear on the agenda of many ecumenical consultations. The WCC Sub-unit on Education discussed the growing use of mass media as tools of instruction; the WCC-RCC committee on Society, Development and Peace (SODEPAX) emphasized the role of the media in disseminating news of the developing world; the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development saw social communication as a powerful alternative to violent confrontation in seeking to change society's structures; the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs criticized the selective presentation of world affairs in the Western-dominated news media; the image of women portrayed in the media was introduced in a vivid audiovisual presentation at the 1974 conference on sexism in Berlin.

But budgetary constraints were restricting the department of communication to serving the WCC's own communication needs; and the larger questions about the theology and ethics of communication did not surface at the Nairobi assembly in 1975. The only mention of the electronic media – linked to the work of the church – was somewhat dismissive. "Never before has the church universal had at its disposal such a comprehensive set of means of communication... While we need to improve our use of such media, nothing can replace the living witness in words and deeds of Christian persons, groups and congregations who participate in the sufferings and joys, in the struggles and celebrations, in the frustrations and hopes of the people with whom they want to share the gospel. Whatever 'methodologies' of communication may seem to be appropriate in different situations, they should be directed by a humble spirit of sensitivity and participation." No doubt, such statements were influenced by scepticism about the glittering showmanship of the increasingly popular US "tele-evangelists", who were using television to reach mass audiences and draw them to what has been described as an electronic church.

COMMUNICATION PROBLEMS

Meanwhile the WCC itself had become embroiled in much media controversy in the West about its own programme and purpose, especially through the debates aroused by the Programme to Combat Racism* (PCR). A great deal of the time of the department of communication was taken up in interpreting the Council's actions both to the churches and to the secular media. The PCR by the very nature of its action-oriented programme had vigorously communicated the nature of the struggle in which it was engaged.

A communication problem internal to the WCC is language. Inherited Babel does not make easier the task of those who seek to enter into a post-Pentecost community. As the Council has grown, the number of member churches whose first language is not one of the working languages used by the Council – English, French, German, Russian, Spanish – has also grown, and the need for greater recognition and inclusion of the main languages of the southern and eastern regions of the world as well as of the northern and western has become clamant. But resource limitations have reduced possibilities even for providing language services (translation and interpretation) in the working languages.

Nairobi's emphasis on the value of person-to-person communication found concrete expression in preparations for the sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983), when team visits prior to the assembly enabled delegates to travel and to communicate with their counterparts in churches in other countries and cultures. In the Roman Catholic community too the value of travel and of personal encounter, enhanced by the cooperation of the mass media, has become a highlight of the papal tours to all parts of the world.

THE SEARCH FOR CREDIBLE COMMUNICATION

Three church-related bodies were by then working in the field of mass communications: the WCC, the Lutheran World Federation* (LWF) and the World Association for Christian Communication* (WACC). These organizations cooperated in "such programmes, projects and considerations as are agreeable to their respective constituencies" which included "joint funding and execution of projects and programmes" (Lee p.30).

The "media malaise", as it has been described, grew during the 1980s. The need for deeper reflection on how the media themselves were shaping as well as reflecting modern society and extending their influence in a global network has become an even more urgent task. At a consultation in Versailles in 1981, representatives of the WCC, the WACC, the LWF and three Roman Catholic agencies met to discuss their common concerns. It was determined that the focus of attention should still be primarily on church-related communication in the widest sense. A discussion paper was circulated among some 400 churches, media institutes and individuals involved in the media. Under the title "The Search for Credible Christian Communication", the paper was described as "an invitation to the churches to join a journey towards a new understanding of their communication opportunities in the 1980s". It noted that "the churches exist to communicate" and observed: "How well we succeed is the measure of our mission and our Christian credibility."

The paper went on to sketch out a wider context for the discussion, pleading for Christians to develop a greater awareness of the influence of the media on the whole of life. It recognized the injustice of the present international order, whereby the tools of mass communication are owned and for the most part wielded by the powerful nations or commercial interests of the Western world. The paper raised many fundamental questions, the responses to which were intended to form the basis of debate at Vancouver in 1983, where the issue of communication figured in the programme in its own right as one of eight sections set before the delegates.

The report emerging from that section at Vancouver was, in contrast to the Uppsala statement of 15 years before, more critical in its assessment of the mass media and their impact on modern society. While recognizing that "credible communication serves the cause of justice and peace", it did not support the demand for a New World Information and Communication Order, whereby people would "affirm their own values, assert their own cultures and determine their own priorities. Their demands for such a new order have been largely ignored." The Vancouver report suggested criteria by which people should judge the credibility of what they see and hear, questioning the content, the style, the opportunity for dialogue and the appropriateness of the media themselves. To these it added criteria which might be raised from a Christian viewpoint. The gospel of Christ, it asserted, reverses the values so often pervading the modern media of communication.

In 1986 the WACC adopted the following principles for Christian communication: communication from a Christian perspective is the basic calling of all Christians; it creates community; it is participatory; it liberates; it supports and develops cultures; and it is prophetic.

The WCC's Canberra assembly in 1991 emphasized the need to develop "communication for liberation", but echoed a pessimistic view of the influence of the increasingly pervasive mass media. In the report from the section "Spirit of Truth – Set Us Free!", it described the media as "powerful means of control, where the truth is not told and we are unable to exercise an informed and free judgment. Control may be exercised by governments, the market or the dominant culture." The assembly expressed particular concern about the influence upon children of the media's promotion of violence, pornography and obscenity. Churches were urged to seek ways to educate people in discernment, both as passive and as active participants in communication. They were encouraged to promote good interpersonal communication and the telling of the stories of the people. The question of the values and life-style which the media purvey universally, the effect upon regional and indigenous cultures, the ethical issues raised by the content of modern communication and the means of expressing it, the debate about censorship and the principle of freedom of information, and above all theological reflection on what mass communication means for a faith which at its very heart is communication between God and the human soul are all matters of vital importance to the agenda of the ecumenical movement as a whole.

In his address to the WCC's Harare assembly in 1998, entitled "Visions for the Future", Philip Potter pointed out that, "During these past fifty years the oikoumene, the whole inhabited earth, has been brought into one global city, through the various high-technology means of communication, but under the control of only a small minority of the world's population." Developments in the realm of information technology in the last two decades of the century were evident even in the organization of the assembly itself, where the administration was computerized and where provision was made for delegates to communicate with their home churches by electronic mail.

The Internet, originally designed as a means of linking up establishments of military research, has rapidly developed into the World Wide Web, influencing every sphere of life. Electronic mail has given to both interpersonal and inter-institutional correspondence an immediacy which overleaps both time and distance. By the end of the 20th century, e-mail and the Internet had become a major means of inter-church communication for the dissemination of ecumenical news and information.

Yet such developments have also increased dramatically the gulf between those who have access to modern technology and those still deprived even of the basic essentials of life. Communication technology is not only reshaping our world, it is also increasing the disparity within it. Whether it proves to be ultimately a bane or a blessing to humanity depends on who controls it, how it is used, and what values it enshrines.

At the beginning of the 21st century, Christian communicators face the enormous challenge of encouraging and reporting on inter-religious dialogue, an especially sensitive undertaking at a time when religious communities are perceived to be in conflict with one another. "Communication within a cultural and religiously plural world... requires the creation of a 'culture of dialogue'... Such communication would create a spirituality of dialogue and cooperation in a world that, despite all the modern tools, is so easily drawn into confrontation and conflict" (Lee p.9).

COMMUNION

AMONG THE many traditional conceptions of the church,* one of the most ancient and enduring is that of a communion of human persons with the Triune God (see Trinity) and, consequently, with one another in God. This communion, though fundamentally spiritual, is effected, nourished and certified by adherence to common expressions of the faith,* by participation in the same sacraments* and, some would add, by submission to a single collegially unified pastoral leadership.

According to the New Testament Christians are in communion with God and with one another through faith, the sacraments, the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, joint apostolic labours, and practical care for the poor.

In patristic times the Greek koinonia and its Latin equivalent, communio, referred to a whole set of ecclesial bonds. Each particular church was seen as a group of faithful in communion with their own bishop (see episcopacy) and, through the bishop, in communion with the faithful of other local churches.* The universal fellowship was both a communion of persons (the "communion of saints"* ) and a communion in sacred things, especially in sacraments.

In the early centuries communion was effected and expressed in a great variety of ways. For example, the bishop of Rome had the custom of sending particles of the bread consecrated at his own altar (the fermentum) to the titular churches of the city. Unconsecrated hosts were sent over great distances to be used for the eucharist. Bishops of major sees would send lists of approved and orthodox bishops in their own region to bishops of distant lands. Christian travellers would be furnished with tesseræ (letters of communion), entitling them to hospitality in the churches they visited. The most fundamental sign of communion was admission to the eucharist* – as celebrant or concelebrant, in the case of clergy, or as communicant, in the case of laity.

When one bishop established communion with another, he entered into communion, at least nominally, with all the bishops recognized by the second bishop. When a bishop was out of communion with the principal churches, and especially with Rome, he and his faithful were to that extent “excommunicated”.

Excommunication* was not yet viewed as a canonical penalty imposed by a superior authority but seen rather as a suspension of communion between fellow bishops. Communion would be denied in various degrees for various offences ranging from heresy* at worst, through schism,* down to lesser infractions of good order. A person who was in some respects excommunicated – e.g. from the eucharist – might be in communion in other respects, such as participation in non-eucharistic prayers.

In the middle ages, the church gradually became more centralized, especially in the West, where it took on the appearance of a monarchy under the sovereignty of the bishop of Rome. With the increased codification of canon law,* the church was seen in predominantly juridical terms as the spiritual counterpart of the holy Roman empire. Excommunication came to be viewed as a penalty imposed from above, involving a denial of churchly status to those who were, so to speak, cut off from the body. From the Roman point of view, any individual or community outside its communion was to that extent outside of the church.

This juridical type of ecclesiology continued to dominate in Roman Catholic theology until the mid-20th century. But the rise of the ecumenical movement brought an increasing readiness, also in the Roman Catholic Church, to attribute some true churchly status to bodies of Christians with whom one’s own church was not in communion. Thus the conditions were ripe for a revival of the patristic theology of communion.

In Roman Catholicism, Vatican II* (1962-65) was a major contributor to this revival. Following the lead of Catholic theologians well versed in patristic literature, the Council adopted in many key texts a communio ecclesiology. The Catholic church described itself as a communion of particular (or diocesan) churches, each of which, being a communion, was a distinct realization of the mystery of the church (e.g. Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 41). The member churches, while maintaining their individual character, were linked to one another in a fellowship of charity and truth. As bonds of union the Council referred to communion in the same faith, the same sacraments and the same structured fellowship. The bishops were charged with presiding over the communion of their own churches and keeping those churches in communion both synchronically with the other churches and diachronically with the church of previous ages. The bishops were seen as mutually joined to one another in a collegial fellowship, or hierarchical communion, over which the bishop of Rome presided in charity and truth.

In its Decree on Ecumenism,* Vatican II took the position that all baptized Christians were in some degree in communion with one another and with the Catholic church, but that the lack of full participation in the same professions of faith, the same sacraments and the same societal structures were obstacles to that full communion which should flow from baptism. Thus the present ecumenical situation, as described by the Council, was one of communions in imperfect communion with one another and with the Catholic church. The goal of the ecumenical movement was seen as the establishment or restoration of full communion among separated Christian groups.

The ecumenical vision of Vatican II has been consistently maintained by the highest Roman Catholic authorities since the Council. Pope Paul VI and Cardinal Jan Willebrands, second president of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity,* repeatedly spoke of the desirability of restoring full communion with “sister churches”* such as the Orthodox churches of the East. Paul VI, followed by John Paul II, described the Orthodox churches as being in “almost complete” communion with Rome (Paul VI, letter to Patriarch Athenagoras, 8 February 1971; John Paul II, address for Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, 17 January 1979). The extraordinary synod of bishops of 1985, reviewing the work of Vatican II, re-affirmed an ecumenism of communion: "We bishops ardently desire that the incomplete communion already existing with the non-Catholic churches and communities might, with the grace of God, come to the point of full communion" (final report, 2.C.7).

The Roman Catholic conception of the church as a communion having its centre in the Petrine see was authoritatively set forth by the Congregation of the Doctrine of the Faith in its letter Communio in Notio (28 May 1992). The statement in this letter that any church not in communion with Rome is "wounded" in its ecclesial existence provoked critical comments from highly placed theologians in a number of other churches. In his encyclical on ecumenism, Ut Unum Sint* (1995), Pope John Paul II depicted ecumenism as a movement that begins with the partial and sometimes unrecognized communion that already exists among baptized Christians and moves towards full and visible communion in one church, as willed by Jesus Christ.

A similar theology of communion is accepted by many other Christian bodies. In dialogue statements representatives of the Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches have been able to agree that "the church is a communion of believers living in Jesus Christ and the Spirit with the Father. It has its origin and prototype in the Trinity, in which there is both distinction of persons and unity based on love, not subordination" (USA consultation, 4 December 1974). The International Joint Commission for Theological Dialogue between the Catholic Church and the Orthodox Church declared in its Munich statement on "The Church, the Eucharist and the Trinity" (July 1982): "The one and unique church finds her identity in the koinonia of the churches." In its Bari statement on "Faith, Sacraments and the Unity of the Church" (June 1987), the same commission stated: "The human person is integrated into the Body of Christ by his or her koinonia (communion) with the visible church, which nourishes this faith by means of the sacramental life and the word of God, and in which the Holy Spirit works in the human person" (see Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue).

Anglicanism has traditionally defined itself as a fellowship of local and regional churches in communion with the see of Canterbury. The Lambeth conference of 1930 depicted the Anglican communion as "eagerly awaiting the time when the churches of the present Anglican communion will enter into communion with other parts of the catholic church not definable as Anglican... as a step towards the ultimate reunion of all Christendom in one visibly united fellowship". The national ecumenical consultation of the Episcopal Church, USA, in its Detroit report of 5-6 November 1978, declared: "The visible unity we seek is one eucharistic fellowship, a communion of communions, based upon mutual recognition of catholicity." The final report of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission in 1982 stated in its introduction that the concept of koinonia was fundamental to all its statements.

Lutheranism has historically looked upon itself as a confession, but this confessional consciousness does not exclude the idea of communion. Lutheran commentators have discussed the question of pulpit and altar fellowship in the context of a well-articulated ecclesiology of communion; and the new constitution of the Lutheran World Federation,* adopted in 1990, defines the LWF as "a communion of churches which confess the Triune God, agree in the proclamation of the word of God and are united in pulpit and altar fellowship".

In its statement "Facing Unity", the Roman Catholic-Lutheran Joint Commission (1984) proposed a gradual process of achieving a structured fellowship. The statement takes its departure from the assertion that the church is by its very nature a communio subsisting in a network of local churches (5). The statement also calls attention to the union of Florence (1442) as one possible model for church union without merger or absorption. Communion is seen in "Facing Unity" as involving three dimensions: fellowship in confessing the same apostolic faith, fellowship in sacramental life and fellowship in ministry and service.

The WCC at its New Delhi assembly (1961) used the concept of koinonia to explain the meaning of the “one fully committed fellowship”, which the member churches accepted as the goal for which they should work and pray. The assembly warned, however, that this fellowship did not imply “a rigid uniformity of structure, organization, or government”. The Nairobi assembly (1975) approved a new constitution in which the purpose of the WCC was described, in the first instance, as “to call the churches to the goal of visible unity in one faith and one eucharistic fellowship expressed in worship and in common life in Christ, and to advance towards that unity in order that the world may believe”. The “conciliar fellowship” envisaged at Nairobi may be seen as a version of what has been here described as communion. Recognizing the central importance of communion for the ecumenical movement, the fifth world conference on Faith and Order, held at Santiago de Compostela in 1993, took as its theme “Towards Koinonia in Faith, Life and Witness”.

Because communion admits of many degrees and modalities, it is not possible to state in simple terms which churches are in communion with one another. Churches that are still divided to some extent in doctrine and polity have sometimes chosen to express their mutual proximity by establishing “interim eucharistic fellowship”, such as that which was encouraged in the Consultation on Church Union* in the USA. Other churches that are very close to each other in doctrine, styles of worship and ecclesial polity have seen fit to refrain from eucharistic sharing until all barriers between them have been overcome. Thus eucharistic fellowship, although it is of great importance in the concept of communion, should not be used as the exclusive criterion.

The term “full communion” is used with various nuances. For Roman Catholics it normally signifies not only doctrinal and sacramental agreement but submission to the same system of pastoral rule. Some ecumenical statements, however, use the term to designate a relationship of “pulpit and altar fellowship”, together with commitment to mutual respect and consultation in teaching and decision making, among communions that “become interdependent while remaining autonomous” (Anglican-Lutheran Joint Working Group, Cold Ash, Berkshire, England, 1983). In the US important new agreements establishing full communion among churches were achieved around the turn of the century, for example between the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and the Episcopal Church, and between the Evangelical Lutheran Church and the Presbyterian and Reformed churches.

According to the perspective adopted in this article, ecclesial communion is a complex notion that includes not only eucharistic fellowship but also agreement regarding the necessary doctrines of faith, sharing in the full sacramental life of worship and affiliation with the same socially structured community. Christians who believe that a unified pastoral office is essential to the church will regard acceptance of the same body of leaders as necessary for full communion. Whenever any one of these elements is present, even minimally, communion exists to some extent, but “full communion” requires the total verification of all the elements.

COMMUNION OF SAINTS

IN SOME ancient eucharistic liturgies, the celebrant turns to the people at the time of communion with the words “holy things for holy people”, words which are sometimes now translated “the gifts of God for the people of God”. This sharing in holy gifts by holy people is created by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, by the love of God the Father and by the communion of the Holy Spirit (see Trin- ity). This communion* is not broken by death, for by his death Christ has destroyed death. It is a communion which fulfills the loving purposes of the Father from all eternity, bringing all together into a unity which preserves all the richness and diversity which God has placed in his creation.

In time the all-inclusive phrase communio sanctorum – a sharing of holy people in holy things – came to refer especially to the sharing of life and love across the barrier of death which exists between all who are in Christ and the Spirit. We are at one with the saints in heaven, and they are at one with us. Questions have been raised about this doctrine, however, and differences surfaced, particularly at the time of the Reformation. What is the situation of those who have died? Are they already either in heaven or in hell and so beyond the reach of our prayers? Or are we still bound together with them in mutual prayer and intercession? Should we pray for them and ask for their prayers? How far should the churches officially recognize and proclaim certain of their departed members as saints, a practice common to Roman Catholics and Orthodox, and not unknown among Anglicans? Does such a recognition undermine the faith that all God's people are called to be saints?

Most if not all Reformation theologians maintain that we should not address the saints directly, and that if we pray for them our prayer should take the form of a simple commendation of them into the hands of God. To pray to the saints, in this perspective, is to make a confusion in the nature of prayer. Prayer is that which is addressed to God alone. Christ alone is Mediator and Intercessor. This does not mean that the doctrine of the communion of saints is repudiated. In hymnody in particular there is sometimes a strong affirmation that the saints are worshipping with us. But in much of the Protestant world, little is said on this subject.

The Eastern Orthodox tradition is very different in this respect. The church's faith in the unity of heaven and earth across the barriers of death finds exuberant expression in prayers and hymns, in the veneration of relics and icons, in the commemoration of the departed in church and home. We are at one with them. They pray for us, we pray for them. At the heart of the communion of saints stands the dearest of them all, Mary the mother of God, always praying for the human race.

The practice and theology of the Roman Catholic Church is in many ways very similar, not least in the central place given to Mary.* In some areas, at least in the past, lines have been more sharply drawn. It was commonly taught, e.g., that whereas we have a duty to pray for the souls in purgatory, they are not able to pray for us. But in Catholicism as in Orthodoxy, the veneration of the saints and prayers for the departed have an essential place in the official liturgy of the church, no less than in the faith and devotion of the people.

Is this not a point where mutual correction and enlightenment is possible? The Reformation insistence on the centrality of Christ in Christian faith and worship is universally accepted. The saints should lead us to him and not divert us from him. But the Catholic and Orthodox affirmation of our solidarity with the departed gives vivid expression to our faith in the resurrection* of Christ, which breaks the power of death, and to our faith in the transforming power of God, which works wonders in the lives of his servants, men and women of flesh and blood like ourselves.

COMMUNITY OF WOMEN AND MEN IN THE CHURCH

AT ITS 1974 meeting in Accra, the WCC's commission on Faith and Order (F&O) agreed to "undertake a study of the theological and practical aspects of the community of women and men in the church". This action was taken in response to recommendations from a consultation in Berlin on "Sexism in the 1970s", sponsored by the WCC's Sub-unit on Women in Church and Society several months earlier. The F&O study was designed to address theological issues such as the Christian concepts of God, the authority of scripture in the light of present-day situations, the fullness of diakonia as it affects the relationship and ministry of women and men, the ordination of women and the "language, symbols and imagery of scripture and churches today as they influence men-women relationships".

The decision to sponsor this study followed considerable debate, in which some argued that the issues raised in Berlin were "non-theological matters" and that the "woman problem" had nothing to do with the unity of the church. Not until the WCC's assembly in Nairobi the next year, with its theme "Jesus Christ Frees and Unites", did F&O affirm that the unity of the church "requires that women be free to live out the gifts which God has given them and respond to their calling to share fully in the life and witness of the church". Also at Nairobi, the Sub-unit on Women in Church and Society agreed to collaborate with F&O to "ensure active continuation" of the study assembly delegates had received for their consideration under the title "The Community of Women and Men in the Church", leading to an international consultation.

Debate over where the community study should be based continued until the WCC central committee voted in 1976 to lodge it in the secretariat on F&O, thus clarifying that it would be a study of church unity with particular regard to the experience of women. According to Constance F. Parvey, the Lutheran pastor from the USA who directed the study, this clarification was "part of the breakthrough": "... the issues being raised by women... are issues concerning the church and its wholeness". The study officially ran from January 1978, when Parvey joined the F&O secretariat in Geneva, to the 1982 meeting of the F&O commission in Lima, where its findings and recommendations were reported.

During 1978 local study groups were launched, the first regional consultation was convened, the first of several specialized consultations on issues integral to F&O discussions met, and plans were set for an international consultation in 1981. A study book using an experience-based method of theological reflection was developed and distributed to WCC member churches, church-related organizations and interested individuals. From an initial printing of 3000 copies in English, French and German, the distribution grew to an estimated 65,000, largely at the initiative of women's church and ecumenical organizations, official church and ecumenical agencies, and some seminaries. It was also translated by local initiative into at least 13 additional languages.

This experience-based method had its precedent in a study undertaken before the founding assembly of the WCC in 1948. Replies to a questionnaire on "The Life and Work of Women in the Church", formulated by Twila McCrea Cavert, a US laywoman, were sent to Geneva from nearly 60 countries, thus eliciting the largest response of any of the enquiries made by the WCC before the Amsterdam assembly. These responses subsequently formed the basis of a book edited by Kathleen Bliss on The Service and Status of Women in the Church, published in 1952.

Responses to the community study book 30 years later addressed issues of identity, sexuality, marriage, family life, scripture and Tradition in relation to the community of women and men in the church, theological education, worship and ministry. Questions that asked participants to describe their particular contexts were also posed. Throughout the study book, personal and corporate experience was taken as the starting point for reflection.

Approximately 150 groups sent reports to Geneva. Some came from South and Southeast Asia, Africa, the Middle East, the Caribbean, Latin America, Australasia and the Pacific, though the vast majority were sent by churches in countries in the North Atlantic. Regional consultations provided crucial additional input for both appreciating the range and depth of differences and finding the commonalities among women's experiences in the churches.

This portrait of women's experience in the churches was further enriched by the specialized consultations on the ordination of women,* on theological anthropology (including the imago Dei and the Virgin Mary) and on the authority of scripture in light of new experiences of women.

Protestant, Orthodox and Roman Catholics participated in each arena of the community study – from local groups and the regional and specialized consultations to the international consultation in Sheffield, England, in July 1981. All groups and gatherings, from grassroots to Sheffield, were encouraged to be 60% women and 40% men in order to redress the imbalance of decision making, which saw women’s participation in many churches at 10% or less. Equitable representation regarding race and other minority status was always considered, but not always realized.

The community study is significant in several respects. While its experientially based method was unusual but not unprecedented for a F&O study, the use of this method played a crucial role in the revival of the “Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community” study in Lima in 1982. Moreover, the several hundred local group reports that informed the findings and recommendations reported to the Lima meeting anticipated the many responses to “Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry”, a study sent to the churches from Lima.

Moreover, the method of the community study was significant because it was interdisciplinary and co-sponsored. In this way the study made clear that the search for the unity of the church cannot be undertaken without attention to the realities of the world in which the church lives and to which it witnesses. Accordingly, the method invited new constituencies into the ecumenical conversation, affirming the growing recognition that “doing theology” is a task for the whole people of God.

The significance of the community study was most immediately visible at the sixth assembly of the WCC (Vancouver 1983), which recommended that its findings and recommendations be appropriated and translated into a variety of WCC programmes. This translation became apparent in such initiatives as the Ecumenical Decade – Churches in Solidarity with Women* (1988-98) and Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation, as well as in increased participation of women in decision making in the life and work of the WCC. In Vancouver, as never before, the integral relationship of the unity of the church and the healing and reconciliation of the world’s divisions was recognized and highlighted: “Christ – the life of the world – unites heaven and earth, God and world, spiritual and sacred.”

The significance of the community study for the ongoing work of F&O has been slower but steady. Besides the study on the “Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community”, its influence has been apparent in studies on gospel and culture, on ecclesiology and ethics and on ecumenical hermeneutics. Moreover, the focus of the ecclesiology study on koinonia indicates an ongoing commitment to emphasizing the integral connection of the search for church unity and the healing of human community, as well as the church as local eucharistic community of faith, life and witness.

CONCILIARITY

ALTHOUGH the whole history of the church is punctuated by councils or synods, conciliarism and the theory of conciliarity did not appear until the late middle ages, at the time of the great schism in the Western church, when two popes each laid claim to legitimate authority. The controversy could be settled only by a council. In the decree Haec Sancta, the council of Constance in 1415 declared that “being lawfully assembled in the Holy Spirit, constituting a general council and representing the Catholic church militant, this synod has its power directly from Christ. All persons of whatever rank or dignity, even a pope, are bound to obey it in matters relating to faith and the end of the schism.” This conciliar doctrine was based on earlier theological and canonical tradition. However, from the time of the council of Florence (1438-39), it was strongly contested and later came to symbolize what was known as Gallicanism (1682), which was opposed by the First Vatican Council (1870) (see Vatican Councils I and II).

At the council of Constance large numbers of laity, non-episcopal clergy and religious were present, and many of them were entitled to speak and vote through the nations, princes and universities they represented. In most Reformation churches, the laity played an active part in the synods alongside the pastors from the outset. This is also the case today in the Anglican communion. Most Orthodox churches also have, in addition to the synod of bishops, wider councils at which the laity are entitled to speak and vote. Nevertheless, only the bishops have the authority to decide in matters of the faith. Their doctrinal decisions, however, must be “received” by the whole people of God (see reception).

When the encyclical of the Orthodox patriarchs (1848) affirmed that “the preservation of the faith resides in the whole body of the church”, the Russian thinker Aleksey Khomyakov saw in this text the foundation of his doctrine of conciliarity known as sobornost* (from the Slavonic word sobor, meaning “council”, and the adjective sobornaja, which translates the word “catholic” in the Nicene Creed). Sobornost, according to Khomyakov, is the specific mark of the Orthodox church which, through the action of the Holy Spirit, unites all the faithful in freedom, harmony and love and so ensures the infallibility of the church (see indefectibility/infallibility). Others, however, have criticized this concept of sobornost as compromising the explicit authority of the bishops in the councils.

Since 1960 ecumenical reflection on conciliarity has been prompted by the Second Vatican Council (1962-65) and by the need to clarify the significance of the WCC and the goal of unity* which it is intended to serve. The Uppsala assembly (1968) suggested that the member churches should “work for the time when a genuinely universal council may once more speak for all Christians and lead the way into the future”. Faith and Order took up this suggestion at Louvain (1971) and started a study on conciliarity understood as “the coming together of Christians – locally, regionally or globally – for common prayer, counsel and decision, in the belief that the Holy Spirit can use such meetings for his own purpose by reconciling, renewing and reforming the church by guiding it towards the fullness of truth and love” (Louvain 1971, 226). The Salamanca consultation (1973) declared: “The one church is to be envisioned as a conciliar fellowship of local churches which are themselves truly united. In this conciliar fellowship, each local church possesses, in communion with the others, the fullness of catholicity, witnesses to the same apostolic faith and, therefore, recognizes the others as belonging to the same church of Christ and guided by the same Spirit.” This description, adopted and refined by the WCC at Nairobi (1975, sec. 2), is now being developed by F&O in its continuing work on the nature and goal of unity. More recently, the question of presidency in conciliar gatherings at various geographical levels has opened an avenue for exploring the possibility of ecumenical ministries of primacy* (see The Nature and Purpose of the Church 107-110).

CONFERENCE OF EUROPEAN CHURCHES

THE CONFERENCE of European Churches (CEC) is the regional ecumenical organization for Europe. It comprises some 126 member churches in all European states, and 41 associated organizations. CEC is both in association with the WCC and a non-governmental organization recognized by the United Nations Economic and Social Council (Ecosoc) and the Council of Europe.

The project of bringing the churches of Europe into conversation with each other developed in the deep divisions and acute tensions in Europe after the second world war. This was the period of the so-called cold war,* which grew dangerously in Europe in the mid-1950s. In the midst of profound international separations and perilous tensions, a small group of church leaders from Eastern and Western Europe, most of them friends from the pre-war period, began to consult together about the possibility of contributing to the establishment of a true peace by bringing into conversation churches in European countries separated by highly differing political, economic and social systems. Building on the basis of already-existing bilateral structures for reconciliation between the churches, exploratory conversations began in the early 1950s, but it was only in 1957, at Liselund, Denmark, that a first preparatory meeting could be convoked.

The first full assembly, simply described as “a conference of European churches”, was held in January 1959 in Nyborg Strand, Denmark, also the site of assemblies in 1960 and 1962. At first these assemblies represented nothing more than a very loose association of the churches concerned, but at the assembly in 1964, with the adoption of a constitution, a decisive step was taken towards forming a regional conference of churches, as was happening in other parts of the world. Important for the 1964 assembly was its setting, for it took place at sea, aboard the MV Bornholm, as the only possible answer to last-minute visa problems. The fifth assembly (1967) in Pörschach, Austria, prepared the way for the replacement of the existing part-time executive secretariat by a full-time general secretariat as from April 1968. Subsequent assemblies were held in Nyborg Strand (1971), Engelberg, Switzerland (1974), Crete (1979), Stirling, Scotland (1986), Prague, Czechoslovakia (1992), where a totally revised constitution was adopted, and Graz, Austria (1997). A 40-member central committee meets annually to oversee the continuity of the work.

The preamble to CEC’s constitution states that it “seeks to help the European churches to renew their spiritual life, to strengthen their common witness and service and to promote the unity of the church and peace in the world”. In this activity churches of the Anglican, Protestant, Old Catholic, Pentecostal and Orthodox traditions from all over Europe play a part. Although the Roman Catholic Church is not a member, a steady pattern of cooperation has developed since 1964. Ecumenical encounters organized by CEC and the Council of Roman Catholic Bishops Conferences in Europe (CCEE) began in 1978 and have been held at about four-year intervals. Two European Ecumenical Assemblies have been convened with the two organizations as sponsoring partners (Basel 1989, Graz 1997).

At the 1989 Basel meeting on “Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation”, there was an increased presence of Eastern European churches, particularly Orthodox, making it the most representative church meeting in Europe ever. It was also an impressive instance of the church exercising a prophetic role, taking place a few months before the walls between Eastern and Western Europe began to crumble. The theme of the 1997 assembly, “Reconciliation: Gift of God and Source of New Life”, was discussed against the background of new European tensions and the civil war in the former Yugoslavia, making evident the dire need for reconciliation between both churches and peoples on the European continent.

After relying in its early years on frequent assemblies, developments in CEC’s structure followed the diversification of activities and the increase in membership. While assemblies have become less frequent, there has been a growth in theme-related consultations. This resulted in the creation of special secretariats alongside the general secretariat.

The first to be established was a study secretariat, now the Churches in Dialogue Commission. This was followed by a secretariat with the joint tasks of administration, finance and interchurch service. Interchurch service later separated and expanded to include the Ecumenical Churches’ Working Group on Asylum and Refugees (ECWGAR). The latter work then became a shared responsibility with the Churches’ Commission on Migrants in Europe (CCME), based in Brussels. Then came a churches' human rights programme for the implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, established as a joint activity with the national councils of churches in the USA and Canada. This work was administered from the CEC peace, justice and human rights programme. A communication service was also integrated into the general secretariat. A desk was later established to initiate work on women's concerns.

After the end of the cold war certain restraints on the work of CEC within the European Community were no longer valid. This led to a process of integration with the European Ecumenical Commission on Church and Society (EECCS), with offices in Brussels and Strasbourg. The work of these offices together with related work in the Geneva office now functions as the Church and Society Commission of the CEC.

In accomplishing its tasks CEC cooperates closely with other ecumenical organizations at the world and regional levels, especially the WCC. CEC is, nevertheless, completely autonomous and self-supporting, and CEC membership includes some 25 churches which are not members of the WCC.

Among the conditions peculiar to the European situation which CEC has to face and which determine its priorities are the long history of separation and enmity between the churches, much of it originating in Europe; the relationships between church and culture* and church and state;* the cooperation of very large and very small churches, and of ancient and comparatively new churches; European responsibility in the divisions and tensions of the contemporary international situation; and European responsibility towards the developing nations.

CONFESSING CHURCH

THE CONFESSING Church (Bekennende Kirche) was formed in the context of the German church struggle (Kirchenkampf) during the Third Reich, 1933-45. Inspired by National Socialism, the so-called German Christians aimed to produce a synthesis between nationalist ideology and Christianity. Some favoured a German Christian national church, incorporating the "new deeds of God of 1933" and Adolf Hitler as saviour of the German people into its standards and proclamation.

The contamination of the German church by such thinking, the luring of young church people into the Hitler youth movement, the notorious church elections of July 1933 (won by the German Christians), and the new regime's interference in church affairs (Hitler's nomination of Ludwig Müller as the imperial bishop of the newly combined German Evangelical Church, antisemitic laws, offences against church constitution and life) sparked the Kirchenkampf.

Opposition groups, such as the emergency alliance of pastors led by Martin Niemöller and theologians inspired by Karl Barth and Theologische Existenz Heute (May 1933), joined to form a "confessional community". Despite Nazi and German Christian threats, its leaders came together at Barmen in May 1934 as the first Confessing Church synod. The synod declared itself to represent the only legitimate German Evangelical Church, and proclaimed a theological declaration whose starkly worded six "evangelical truths" rejected the false doctrine that the church should or could claim for itself the tasks of the state as an organ of the state (see church and state). The declaration identified a deep-seated disease in the life of church and society: placing one's trust in life's realities rather than in God's grace, deriving God's word from history, reason and desires rather than the only valid source of revelation, Jesus Christ, the one Word of God who is to be heard, trusted and obeyed. Thus, the Confessing Church struggle was about the true church and a false church.

As the church struggle evolved, the state tried to settle the problem on its own authority, dismissing Barth from his professorship at the university of Bonn, arresting Niemöller and prohibiting theological education. There were also divisions and power plays within the Confessing Church. While preparing the Final Solution, Hitler strategically observed peace with the churches during the 1939-45 war. Protestant groups of the pietist and revivalist traditions generally supported Hitler. The Roman Catholic Church arrived at a treaty with him (concordat of 1933), but expressed concern over state idolatry, racism and the initial holocaust (encyclical Ardenti Cura 1937). Confessing Church members were at work in German-occupied countries, in the Netherlands, Norway (led by Bishop Eivind Berggrav of Oslo) and France (led by Pastor Marc Boegner). Thus a European Confessing Church was arising.

The ecumenical significance of the Confessing Church appears at various levels. The WCC "in formation", by electing members of the Confessing Church such as Dietrich Bonhoeffer to its provisional committees, indicated where it saw the true church at work; it also initiated studies on church, nation and state. The provisional WCC could not publicly speak up for the Confessing Church; and the Nazi state forbade ecumenical contact abroad. Nevertheless, W.A. Visser 't Hooft and Bishop George Bell of Chichester acted on behalf of the "other Germany" – the Confessing Church and the resistance movements. Bonhoeffer's statement that "whoever parts knowingly from the Confessing Church separates himself from salvation" placed the ecumenical movement before the question of its own ecclesial quality.

The "confession of guilt" (Schuldbekenntnis) in the 1945 Stuttgart declaration* enabled the German church in post-war reconstruction to participate in the ecumenical movement and be accepted by the churches elsewhere. This was possible because of the Confessing Church's ecumenical relations during the war and the assistance church and interchurch groups had given to German war victims. Prominent Confessing Church figures also served as WCC leaders: Niemöller, for example, was a member of the central committee from 1948 to 1961, and president from 1961 to 1968. The Confessing Church has subsequently been evoked as a model in situations of strong confrontation between church and state and painful political oppression (e.g. South Korea, South Africa, Latin America). Bonhoeffer is often cited as an outstanding example of Christian witness and martyrdom.* The Barmen declaration as a model statement of Christian freedom and obedience has inspired texts such as "A Message to the People of South Africa" (1968) and the Kairos document* about the South African situation (1985). It remains an example for churches in search of witness in social and political matters, although its theological perspective seems highly problematic for contextual theologies in Africa, Asia and Latin America. The questions it raises are controversial: To what extent can religious, political and socio-economic conditions determine theological statements and the Christian confession? And how do a theology of the word of God* and a theology of history* relate to each other?

CONFIRMATION

IN ITS ORIGINS, confirmation is the second post-baptismal anointing of the Roman liturgy, in which the bishop anoints the newly baptized on the forehead with chrism and imposes his hand on them, giving thanks for the gifts of the Holy Spirit (see baptism). It is a liturgical expression of the reality that "in God's work of salvation, the paschal mystery of Christ's death and resurrection is inseparably linked with the pentecostal gifts of the Holy Spirit" (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry,* B14). In time confirmation became separated from the rest of the Roman baptismal liturgy because it was reserved to bishops, who were no longer able to be present at every baptism. By the 5th century the rite had come to be called confirmation and began to be given a theology of its own, independent of its baptismal roots. This theology emphasized the images of "strengthening" and "confirming to fight" and drew heavily on medieval images of chivalry.

During the middle ages the rite was administered as soon as possible after baptism (by one, two or three years of age), and it was only in the 16th century that it generally came to be reserved for candidates who had attained the age of reason (seven years). In the contemporary Roman Catholic rite it is administered at the time of baptism to all those aged 14 or older (by either the bishop or the priest presiding) and is closer in form to chrismation* of the Eastern and Oriental churches than to its medieval predecessor. Those baptized as infants are not confirmed until a later time, often early adolescence.

In the churches of the Reformation, confirmation was given an entirely new meaning. Rejecting the medieval understanding of confirmation as a completion of baptism, it instead became a completion of catechesis.* Beginning with the 15th-century Bohemian Brethren, a rite developed in which young adolescents, after a period of intensive catechesis, made a public profession of their faith.* Through Erasmus, this new practice came to be known and adopted by reformers of the 16th century, for whom a rite of catechesis appealed to their Renaissance concern for education. In this second, catechetical form it found a place in a number of Reformation churches (Anglican, Lutheran) but was totally rejected by others. In some Reformed churches confirmation was introduced in the 19th and 20th centuries only as a rite of admission to communion after a period of intensive catechesis.

Because the same word is used for two or more quite distinct liturgical practices and because the theologies given to confirmation often relate to the churches' contemporary theological understanding of baptism, the place of confirmation in the life of the churches is being questioned increasingly. It seems to be an area in which ecumenical agreement cannot be achieved easily.

CONFLICT

CONFLICTS have been a recurring feature in the life of the church and in the history of nations, as even a cursory reading of the New Testament shows. Sometimes they have been resolved by the recognition of different doctrinal, liturgical or moral views coexisting with greater or lesser tension in the same community or in different communities; sometimes they have led to division. The roots of conflict have been seen as either doctrinal or moral (see apostasy, heresy, schism).

In modern times there has been much greater awareness of the psychological and social dimensions of conflicts in the religious field. In a well-known letter written in 1949, C.H. Dodd called the attention of the WCC to "non-theological factors" in church conflicts. This led to studies on institutionalism (see church as institution) and to the attempt to relate the issue of conflict and unity in the church with that of conflict and community among humankind (see unity of humankind).

In recent decades, however, social, international and ideological conflicts have increasingly forced the churches and the ecumenical movement to take positions in matters that involved theological, ethical and social issues. In extreme cases, like Nazism in Germany (see Confessing Church) or apartheid,* churches have found conflicts irreconcilable. In other cases, they have had to admit that differing points of view can claim legitimacy and have to be kept in tension (e.g. in questions of violence and non-violence,* pacifism,* just war*).

Sometimes churches have raised conflictive issues through documents that try to provide a theological framework but leave the question open for discussion (e.g. the United Methodist "In Defence of Creation", 1986, or the US Roman Catholic bishops' "Letter on the Economy", 1986). In a similar way but with more precise limits, a Vatican "Instruction" on liberation theology tries, first, to set limits to the admissible interpretation and, then, to define lines for a positive understanding of the issue of freedom and liberation.

In describing typical forms of conflict, social scientists have distinguished between conflicts that occur within a shared set of values and those that represent ultimately incompatible options, and they have considered different ways of containing and resolving conflict and the positive significance of conflict for social life. Some of these studies have been fruitfully used to understand the dynamics of conflict in the early church. But neither churches nor the ecumenical movement has, on the whole, taken advantage of insights from such studies to deal with their internal conflicts or with those that emerge in their relation with society.

CONGAR, YVES

B. 13 April 1904, Sedan, France; d.22 June 1995, Paris. One of the most influential of the pioneering Roman Catholic ecumenists, Congar was a Dominican priest (ordained in 1930) whose Chrétiens désunis (1937) marked the first carefully argued shift in the theology of ecumenism which would be developed and recognized in the Decree on Ecumenism* of the Second Vatican Council.* Congar had attended the 1937 conferences of Life and Work (Oxford) and of Faith and Order (Edinburgh), where he began to meet future WCC leaders.

As a medical orderly in the war, Congar spent five years in a German prisoner-of-war camp, a crucible of shared suffering in which he experienced a unity of faith and charity far deeper than the “Protestant” and “Catholic” labels of cellmates. After the war he became a leader and mentor of the French church’s flowering renewal in theology, missionary and pastoral practice, e.g. the worker-priest movement and the missionary parish. His True and False Reform in the Church (1950), a lengthy historical survey which included the true but frustrated insights of Martin Luther, was withdrawn from circulation on Vatican orders. Three years later he produced the also lengthy Lay People in the Church.

Under growing threats from Rome to dissolve the French Dominicans, Congar and some prominent confrères obediently went into exile in February 1954, forbidden to teach and, for Congar, to have contacts with Protestants. After a quiet period of writing in Jerusalem and Cambridge, Congar was assigned to Strasbourg, still under suspicion but more or less left alone. This dark decade he described as a time of “active patience”. He was a member of the Catholic Conference for Ecumenical Questions* and was enlisted by WCC general secretary W.A. Visser ’t Hooft in the drafting of the WCC’s 1950 Toronto statement* and in reflecting on Faith and Order studies.

Pope John XXIII (1958-63) rehabilitated Congar by personally placing him on the preparatory theological commission for Vatican II. During the Council he helped to draft such important documents as those on the church, the church in the modern world, revelation, religious freedom, missionary activity and ecumenism. The documents vindicate his Tradition and Traditions (1966), a history of the doctrine of tradition and a theology of tradition viewed as the organic life of the church as it continually reflects on revelation.

Although inflicted already in the mid-1930s by a chronic and painful neurological disease, Congar seemed indefatigable. When not lecturing to groups ranging from parish workers to international scholars, he spent 12-13 hours a day at his desk. His bibliography lists over 1300 books and articles up to 1985, when his illness made such scholarly research almost impossible. His last major studies were I Believe in the Holy Spirit (3 vols, 1979-80) and Diversity and Communion (1982). Other themes treated in his works are Christ, Mary and the church, laypeople and their ministries in the world, the local church, the Eastern churches, the 16th-century reformers, the early councils of the undivided church, collegiality and the papacy, evangelization, and the ecumenical future of the church. His careful studies restored an historical understanding of the RCC as “a living, collective, organic personality faithful to revelation recorded uniquely in scripture and summoned to constant renewal... History ran through the narratives of the Hebrew and Christian scriptures, and history insisted that the church be both the same and different for various ages and cultures” (T. O’Meara). His culminating work presents the Holy Spirit* as the source and image of church unity, making it possible for tradition to be living and to prompt renewal and growth. Congar concludes that the ecumenical movement is a movement of the Spirit, and no generation should make an idol of any stage.

Congar bluntly claimed that the logical refutation and canonical separation characteristic of post-Reformation RC apologetics did not do justice to the intent and insights of the reformers, most of which should be incorporated into the entire church to be more church. He insisted that the Eastern Orthodox tradition on the church’s mystery, sacraments, government, monasticism and pieties offer “a complementarity” with the Western tradition; although differing in their tangible and historic expression, “the two constructions of the mystery are experienced by the same faith” (1982).

Congar’s personal journey never gave way to defeatism. He wrote at the age of 80 that “whatever we have to... say, as sublime as it is, it is really not worth much unless it is accomplished by a praxis, by real action, by concrete service and love”. When John Paul II made him a cardinal in 1994, the 90-year-old priest remarked to friends that Paul VI had conferred a far greater honour when he asked Congar and other leading theologians at Vatican II to concelebrate with the pope the eucharist at the high altar of St Peter’s basilica as the Council was concluding in December 1965.

CONGREGATIONALISM

CONGREGATIONALISM understands the church to be God’s gathering of saints, called by the Spirit through the word. As such it is both local and visible, catholic and eternal, and subject in all things to Christ as head. The local church meeting, comprising professed believers, calls its officers – normally minister(s) and deacons – and orders its worship and witness under the word. Usually, though not universally, it is associated with sister churches in regional and international fellowship. While this polity is shared by Baptists, some Pentecostals and others, this entry focuses on the Congregationalists themselves.

The 16th-century harbingers of Congregationalism were separatist Puritans in England who despaired of adequate church reformation under any establishment, whether episcopalian or presbyterian. Under persecution many fled to Holland. In 1620 some sailed as pilgrims to the New World; others returned to England in 1640. Their ranks were swollen when, in the wake of the Cromwellian era, the monarchy was restored in 1660. Between that date and 1662, some 172 Congregational ministers were ejected from their livings. Not until the toleration act of 1689 were dissenters given limited and conditional religious freedom.

The spread of Congregationalism to many parts of the world was the result of the evangelical awakening of the second half of the 18th century and its child, the modern missionary movement. Colonial expansion played its part, and 19th-century revivals in Czechoslovakia, Sweden and Finland further increased the Congregational family. The International Congregational Council (ICC) first met in London in 1891, secured its constitution in 1948, and united with the World Presbyterian Alliance (WPA) to form the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* in 1970.

Doctrinally, Congregationalists have traditionally been orthodox Trinitarians (see Trinity) and (pace the Dutch Remonstrants) Calvinists. From the 18th century onwards they have been subject to the moderating influences of evangelical Arminianism and, to a much lesser extent (except locally, e.g. in New England) to Unitarianism. They observe the dominical sacraments.*

Though for the most part shunning subscription to creeds* and confessions, Congregationalists have confessed their faith* in a variety of ways: in formal declarations (classically, the Cambridge [New England] Platform, 1646-48; the Savoy Declaration of Faith and Order [doctrinally a revision of the Westminster confession, with additions on Congregational church order], 1658); in local church covenants; in personal testimonies on reception as church members; at the ordination and induction of ministers; and in their hymns – supremely those of Isaac Watts (1674-1748) and Philip Doddridge (1702-51).

Although Congregationalism's raison d'être is ecclesiological, internal variety is not precluded; some, for example, are more open to advisory synods than others. In England, the home missions and county unions were roughly contemporary with concerted foreign missionary activity; the Congregational Union of England and Wales was proposed in 1831 and formed in 1832; but only in the 20th century was the idea that mutual cooperation and episcopate are not only useful but right espoused widely enough to enable formation of the nationally covenanted Congregational Church in England and Wales (1966) – an unbiblical anomaly, tolerable given the divided church.

Because of their inherent catholicity* (to be a member of the local church is to be a member of the church catholic), many Congregationalists have been ecumenically inclined. The charter of the (largely Congregational) London Missionary Society (1795) was both noble and practical in disavowing any intention of propagating a particular church polity. The ICC-WPA union of 1970 remains the only merger of its kind to date. Congregationalism has given such leaders to the ecumenical movement as Leslie E. Cooke, A.E. Garvie, Norman Goodall, Douglas Horton and Henry Smith Leiper. Congregationalists went into transconfessional church unions in Canada (1925), South India (1947), the Philippines (1948), Zambia (1964), North India (1970) and Australia (1977); and into Reformed unions in the USA (1957), Jamaica and Grand Cayman (1965), and England and Wales (1972, with the further union with the Reformed Association of Churches of Christ in 1981, and with the majority of Scottish Congregationalists in 2000).

Like all polities, Congregationalism, so vulnerable in human hands, is prone to degeneration. Freedom under Christ can degenerate into “freedom to do and believe as we like”. When the polity is misconstrued as democratic rather than Christocentric, the objective becomes “one person, one vote and government by the majority”, rather than the mind of Christ and unanimity in him. The advocacy of local autonomy can be a pretext for (sometimes financially motivated!) isolationism.

The ecclesiology of earthed sainthood is undermined theologically when the biblical-Calvinistic distinction upon which it rests – i.e. that there is an eternally significant gulf between those who are Christ's and those who are not – is eroded by more genial, relativistic doctrinal stances. The idea of the covenant people of God has been threatened by post-Enlightenment individualism (not least in its evangelical-awakening form, whereby the church can come to be regarded as the aggregate of saved, atomistic souls), whence flows religious consumerism. The reduced emphasis upon regeneration and personal testimony, coupled with the increased emphasis upon infant baptism as the point of entry into the church, raises the question of the process of Christian initiation; while the increasing participation of children in the Lord's supper poses an important question to those who have traditionally required both profession of faith and the acceptance of church-governmental responsibility (e.g. attendance at church meetings) prior to participation in the supper qua sacrament of the (professed and enrolled) church.

Further challenges are posed by societal change, or lack of it. The classical Congregational order could not be imposed upon hierarchical societies. In socially mobile environments it can be difficult to keep track of the saints, especially when they wish to be elusive; and in some areas the Congregational church, being the only neighbourhood church, functions as a quasi-parish church. In contexts which are tolerant to the point of being unprincipled, "godly discipline under the gospel" is all but a relic of the past.

Perils, pitfalls and lapses in practice notwithstanding, those of the Congregational way make affirmations of profound ecumenical significance: Christ alone is Lord of the church, and church order* must reflect this fact. Christian profession entails locally rooted church membership; one cannot be a Christian "in general". The church which hears the word and receives the bread and wine must go on (church meeting) to seek the mind of Christ for its witness* and mission.* Since the church catholic comprises all whom God calls, the sectarian spirit, whether inspired by establishment, sacerdotal, theological or "issue-oriented" considerations, is strenuously to be resisted.

CONSCIENCE

THE TERM "conscience" (Greek syneidêsis, Latin synderesis and conscientia) refers to the knowledge of oneself as a responsible, acting and judging person, the place or organ of this knowledge and the relations of one's responsibilities. Thus conscience involves a person's experience of responsibility, a relation between a person's actions (or inaction) and his or her identity, a relation to the empirical knowledge of the problems involved, a relation to other people and their expectations, and a relation to God. The judgments of conscience bear on a person's planning of future behaviour and actions as well as his or her critique of past decisions to act or not to act.

While no Hebrew word in the Old Testament quite corresponds to the meaning of syneidêsis, it is the "heart" (a symbol of wholeness) where a person is affected by the word of God in order to respond to him (see Deut. 30:14; Ezek. 36:26). In the New Testament the term is frequently used by Paul, Hebrews and the epistles of Peter. In most cases "conscience" is seen as a critical organ, a sort of court of appeal that judges actions, rather than as a legislator. Frequently the word is used with an adjective (good, bad, clear, blemished). Conscience can be misguided by sin, and therefore it is not an infallible judge, but it can be cleansed by faith through the redeeming work of Christ (1 Tim. 1:5,19; Heb. 10:22).

Augustine and the Greek fathers understood "conscience" as the place and the organ of sin and guilt as well as of faith and truth. Medieval authors distinguish synteresis, the basic capacity (habitus) of moral judgments (Urgewissen), from conscientia, the actual decision based on reasons in a single case. In Augustine conscientia means the "inner person", the "heart" of a person in confrontation with the eternal God. Thomas Aquinas taught that a person is obliged to obey his or her conscience (quaconscientia) even in case of (personally unknown) error. In ancient and medieval theology and philosophy there is a tension between the (personally) voluntaristic and the (potentially) universalistic rational aspects of conscientia (i.e. knowledge common to others and other authorities). Martin Luther did not follow this tradition; he understood “conscience” – in accord with the biblical traditions – as the centre and heart of a person in relation to God, either bound by the power of sin and death, or as the liberated conscience bound by the word of God. This “good consciousness”, founded in the will of God, produces good works of love, and in deciding what to do in particular cases it tries to give rational reasons for everybody.

This two-tier interpretation of conscience as synderesis and conscientia is also evident in Immanuel Kant. On the one hand, he calls it the “application of our actions to the law in us”; on the other hand, he speaks of the practical reason that judges itself. Because the same person cannot be both the accused and the judge, conscience for Kant must be thought of “as a subjective principle of responsibility for one’s actions before God”, but the leading principle is the self-centred responsibility (“autonomy”). This twofold structure – the personal confession and conviction on one side, the elaborated orientation to the “common good” as a principle of universalization on the other – is very important for the discussion of conscience. Hegel contrasted the liberty of individual conscience as a significant achievement of modern times after the Reformation and the French revolution with the danger of arbitrary conscientious decisions which can end in terrorism.

Following the religious wars of the 16th–18th centuries, religious freedom and the liberty of conscience became predominant principles in the constitutions of states which established the rule of law. Protection of the individual conscience was not self-evident; it always had to be claimed against the vested interests of churches, states and other powers in society. The acceptability of freedom of conscience was a consequence of societal differentiation (Niklas Luhmann) and required the institutionalization of public tolerance. While modern constitutions since 1776 and 1789 have acknowledged the principle of freedom of religion and conscience, its implementation has remained difficult, especially in the area of pacifism (see conscientious objection) and religious dissent.

As a specific modern insight conscience is regarded as the result of education and processes of socialization. Freud stressed the importance of personal and societal “internalized” authorities (“Über-Ich”), which condition personal attitudes and judgments; Piaget discovered the development of moral judgment in childhood. It is evident that a person’s capacity to behave and to act in relations of responsibility and to gain a “good conscience” is determined by many factors, individual and societal.

In Christian ethics protection of the individual conscience of women and men is a predominant value. Therefore many churches have been and are engaged in favour of the individual right of religious liberty and of conscientious objection against military service. Most churches agree that true autonomy of conscience integrates the rational knowledge of facts and the individual moral judgment (in relation to “ultimate concerns”), and that the individual conscience is the result of very complicated processes in education and personal experiences. It is not necessary to assume a contradiction of “autonomy” and “theonomy” insofar as there is no violent action against the individual conscience. Protestant churches tend to assume that the individual conscience is the result of a specific biography and should not be modified without the free consent of any person, while the Roman Catholic Church postulates that every Christian should obey the magisterium* (see Veritatis Splendor, 6 Aug. 1993). But it is a matter of fact that the acceptance of the principles, insights and advice of the moral teachings of all churches in modern times is a question of individual consent and conscience.

WOLFGANG LIENEMANN

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTION

AT LEAST as early as Deuteronomy (20:5-8), legislation prescribing who must participate in war has provided exemption for certain categories of persons. Medieval canon law* called for priests, religious and penitents to be excluded. Sometimes rulers have accorded exemption to minorities (Jews, Mennonites*) on the grounds of other services they rendered to the regime. Others have excluded some of their subjects of whose loyalty they were unsure. Since modern states have adjusted to religious pluralism,* providing legal protection for the rights of conscience,* it has become possible to call states to respect the rights of individuals or communities whose faith convictions lead them to refuse military service on moral grounds.

This development has recently come to be designated as conscientious objection. That governments ought to recognize conscientious refusal to serve in war was stated by the WCC central committee in 1951 and confirmed in 1953. The same call was stated by Vatican II (Gaudium et Spes 79). Germany is the only nation where such exemption is constitutionally protected.

Recognition of the rights of a conscientious objector is usually conditioned upon the individual's being willing to render some alternative service to the nation. The state's claim to judge what counts as authentic religious or philosophical "conscience" necessarily runs risks of arbitrariness.

No nation has yet found a way to respect those who conscientiously reject a particular war or weapon on grounds of discrimination guided by the just-war* tradition (see just war).

CONSENSUS

THE QUESTION of the meaning of consensus for the true unity* of the church* has been the subject of intensive ecumenical theological and ecclesiological reflection in recent years. Yet essentially it is as old as the ecumenical movement itself. To ask about the unity of the church is inevitably to raise the question of the kind of consensus necessary for unity. To give an idea of the issues involved, four sets of general observations may be made.

IMPLICATIONS OF THE WORD "CONSENSUS"

The word "consensus" may refer either to the agreement that characterizes a particular community – the fundamental convictions, attitudes and behaviour common to its members, whose validity is generally unchallenged – or to agreement in the form of a specific accord or joint statement.

This distinction is important. The consensus which makes community possible and sustains it is far more fundamental and comprehensive than anything that can be expressed in specific agreements and declarations. It rests on common experiences, on certain commonly acknowledged authorities, on customs evolved over a period of time. It is expressed in stories, songs, rites and other communal actions. Consensus in the narrower sense is the attempt to understand the agreement that is rooted in the life of the community, to interpret it and express it in appropriate ways, e.g. through a constitution or a confession of faith.

The two senses of consensus are intimately related and mutually interactive. Without the preliminary agreement of the community (consentire), explicit agreements and statements are inconceivable. Conversely, interpretations and formulated statements can help to strengthen and deepen the basic consensus of the community and perhaps even guide it in new directions.

The starting point for exploring the consensus that characterizes the church is that it understands itself as a community which has its origin and its raison d'être in Jesus Christ. It did not constitute itself but was called into being on God's initiative. It is the church so long as it reflects this fundamental understanding in its life, its prayers, its words and its action. The content of the consensus that characterizes the church is therefore God's gracious gift in Jesus Christ. It is first and foremost accord with Jesus Christ, the head of the body, and only afterwards, and on that basis, agreement among ourselves.

This raises the difficult question of the relationship between truth and community. How can consensus reflect the truth of the gospel and at the same time represent the common convictions of the church as a human community? The accord with Jesus Christ may be watered down by certain compromises made for the sake of "unity". But the fellowship among us can equally be placed at risk if too great a value is put on certain theological statements. The church has always been exposed to these twin dangers in its efforts to achieve genuine consensus.

In society* and church alike, consensus is never something static but is a constantly evolving process. New historical experiences create new conditions. Questions arise that call for answers. Things which once stood unchallenged are suddenly called in question, and the consensus has to be established all over again. This is not an easy challenge for any community. The danger is that it may shy away from the task and simply keep invoking the existing consensus. But that consensus may eventually be so undermined by such refusal to face up to the challenge that it collapses and the community crumbles with it.

The consensus has to be renewed in each new generation, and also when the composition of the community changes for other reasons. To be genuinely valid, a consensus has to be supported by the whole community. This problem is particularly acute in the church today. The missionary movement has made the church a worldwide community. Does the consensus that holds this worldwide community together really accommodate the experiences of the young churches, or does it actually represent only part of the oikoumene?*

For the church as a worldwide community today to confront seriously the difficult task of broadening the base of its inherited consensus, appropriate structures are required. The community must be able to keep revising its understanding of what binds it together. It is no mere chance that throughout the ages the church has gathered in representative assemblies. Only as a conciliar fellowship can the church be and remain the church. It has to live in a constant process of exchange. It has to face up to the questions asked of it and, when necessary, to take decisions to settle the issues. Councils are instruments which have often helped the church to "tune in" to what for it is the fundamental truth.

THE POSSIBILITY OF CONSENSUS

Christianity today is divided into numerous traditions and communities. How can they arrive at a consensus which will allow them to see themselves as one fellowship? The ecumenical movement works on the assumption that, despite all their divisions and differences, the churches are bound together by a fundamental consensus. They confess their faith in Jesus Christ, and this confession obliges them to assume at least the possibility of fellowship with one another. The goal pursued by the ecumenical movement is to bring to light the fundamental consensus that binds the churches together and to make them consciously aware of it. By so doing, it confronts them with their common confession* of faith* and obliges them to examine how far their respective interpretations can withstand comparison with it. Where have they become one-sided, rigid and exclusive with the passage of time? Where has the truth been betrayed? Where has legitimate diversity been suppressed? Where has the fundamental consensus been blotted out by disobedience and self-righteousness? The task of the ecumenical movement is not to create consensus but rather, in a conciliar process, to rediscover and make effective the consensus that is given in us in Christ.

CONSENSUS IN CHURCH HISTORY

Every confessional tradition is likewise held together by a particular consensus. Each has its specific teaching, its particular spirituality, forms of worship and internal organization. This consensus forms a whole which cannot be resolved into individual elements. Moreover, every confessional tradition has its idea of the kind of consensus necessary for true church unity. The differing conceptions of consensus that the churches bring into conversations make understanding more difficult to achieve.

Some may insist that the consensus which holds the church together remains essentially unchanged throughout the ages. The Orthodox church maintains that the original Tradition* has developed in its midst through the power of the Holy Spirit. It has represented across the centuries the consensus which marked the church of Jesus Christ from the very beginning. Unity can only come about as others likewise let themselves be permeated by this consensus. The Roman Catholic Church lays no less a claim to have preserved the original truth in unbroken continuity and free of inner contradictions: what the church's magisterium today describes as consensus may perhaps seem like a new interpretation, but in substance it is claimed to be what "has been believed by all at all times and in all places".

The Reformation* led to radically new perspectives. In view of the church's decadence the prevailing consensus had to be called in question. Genuine consensus can be achieved only when the church heeds the word of God* as it is attested in holy scripture* and allows itself to be guided by it. Consensus is formed not by tradition but by the church's following its Lord and "heeding no other voice". Therefore, true consensus may on occasion be represented by only a small flock.

At the same time, the consistent following of God's word opened the way for a new conception of unity, namely the view that agreement on the essentials of the faith was sufficient for true unity. So long as churches agree that Jesus Christ is the sole source of salvation,* they can admit differences in many spheres in regard to both doctrine and order. This path has been trodden again and again since the consensus of Sandomir (1570), which linked different Protestant groups together in a federative union, up to the Leuenberg agreement (1973), which declared church fellowship among the Lutheran, Reformed and United churches in Europe.

This conception, however, inevitably raised the question of what constituted the nucleus on which agreement must prevail. The Protestant churches have given various answers to this question over the centuries. Whereas for the reformers the essential thing was the message of forgiveness, later generations tried to define what was central in a series of dogmatic theses or rational statements about God and the human being. In the age of pietism and revival, attention focused on the experience of salvation.

There have also been attempts to bridge the contradictory concepts of consensus by appealing to a fundamental common basis. In the 17th and 18th centuries, for example, the idea of the consensus quinquesaecularis was discussed – i.e. the suggestion that, on the strength of the tradition of the supposedly undivided ancient church, the churches should come together. The Lambeth Quadrilateral* of the Anglican communion took this idea up in a new way.

CONSENSUS WITHIN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

In the ecumenical movement various concepts of consensus have been used over the years. The 19th-century movements such as the Evangelical Alliance continued the Protestant idea of agreement on essentials: they called on Christians of all (or at least all Protestant) traditions to come together for exchange and common witness on the basis of a confession of faith which synthesized the indispensable core of the gospel. In the first half of the 20th century different concepts of consensus were pursued by three movements. The International Missionary Council* held the conviction that the decisive consensus comprised the common affirmation of the church's missionary task. If the churches faced up to the urgency of this mission,* they would also be brought together. Arguments about questions of doctrine, initially at least, were therefore deliberately set aside and postponed. The Faith and Order* movement, in contrast, set itself the task of gradually working out, in patient conversations, the agreement in doctrine and order that is necessary for church unity. The same concept underlay the discussions on union which have led to the formation of a number of united churches, particularly in North America, Asia and Africa. The Life and Work* movement held the view that the churches can come together only at the level of action. While the churches were divided at the level of doctrine and would in all probability remain so in the foreseeable future, at the level of action they were confronted with challenges to which they could respond only by referring back to the original tradition. As they faced up to these challenges, they might be brought to confess the gospel together in a new way. The consensus that was formed simply on the level of action might develop into a common confession of faith. In this respect the experience of the Confessing Church* in Germany at the time of the Third Reich broke new ground. The response to the challenge of that time revealed a consensus which was not incorporated in that form in any of the established confessional traditions.

The founding of the WCC in 1948 led beyond these three approaches. A simple idea underlay this step: conversations, exchange of ideas and occasional meetings are not enough. If a sustainable consensus is to be formed among the churches, they must begin to share their life together. The WCC gives the churches the chance to come together in a fellowship of exchange and common witness,* based on their common confession of “Jesus Christ as God and Saviour”, but without relinquishing their distinctive identity. The three concepts of consensus previously followed in the three separate movements are now linked together. Within the fellowship into which they have entered, the churches are trying to extend the consensus on doctrine and order, to fulfill their missionary task and to respond in action to the challenges of the times. The WCC lives in the hope that their common experience and common efforts will form the basis on which a consensus will gradually grow and allow the churches one day to declare full fellowship with one another.

The consensus within the WCC has gradually been deepened over the decades. The basis was expanded by a reference to the Trinity* (1961), and while for the moment no definition was given of “the unity we seek”, the assemblies in New Delhi (1961) and Nairobi (1975) adopted extensive texts on the goal of unity. Following the Nairobi assembly, which described unity as a conciliar fellowship, the F&O commission was able to reach agreement on what kind of consensus was necessary for unity: consensus in the apostolic faith; in baptism, eucharist and ministry; and on structures making possible common deliberation and decision (Bangalore 1978). The work on both the church’s confession of faith and on its understanding of baptism, eucharist and ministry were initial steps in this direction.

More important still, perhaps, is the consensus it has been possible to achieve in the WCC regarding the response to certain contemporary challenges, such as the common responsibility for the poor countries, the struggle to combat racism,* defence of human rights,* the community of women and men in the church.* At the same time the debates on these issues also caused profound tensions. The consensus reached at the level of the WCC met with resistance and rejection in some churches. In coming to terms with new issues, the WCC must work through exactly the same difficulties as individual churches (e.g. the debate on the ordination of women* in the Anglican communion).

The Roman Catholic Church attaches particular importance to bilateral talks (see dialogue, bilateral) between the different confessional traditions. Since it decided in favour of active participation in the ecumenical movement during the Second Vatican Council, a network of bilateral conversations with almost all the confessional traditions has developed. The aim of these conversations is to determine the degree of consensus in teaching, worship* and church order.* To what extent does consensus exist? To what extent do different statements ultimately mean the same thing? How far is mutual recognition possible? The bilateral dialogues of recent decades have undoubtedly contributed to bringing the churches closer together.

The partial consensus noted in the talks has come to symbolize the lively relations between the churches. But at the same time the limits of the bilateral conversations must be recognized. With the exception of the Lutheran-Reformed conversations in Europe (Leuenberg 1973) none of these dialogues has so far led to full communion* being declared between two traditions. The results up to now are no more than instruments which can help in formulating an acceptable consensus.

How can a comprehensive consensus be achieved? It is obvious that the consensus necessary for unity has to be built up by various means at once. Above all, it is becoming increasingly clear that a valid consensus has to be implanted in the minds of ordinary church members (sensus fidelium) (see consensus fidelium). Consensus cannot be worked out at the level of official representatives alone. This aspect has not been sufficiently considered in the ecumenical movement up till now. Attention needs to be given to the experience which members of different churches have had and continue to have in the ecumenical movement, for a tradition is growing up here which can lead to a common interpretation.

CONSENSUS FIDELIUM

IT IS LARGELY through the influence of Cardinal Newman in the 19th century that the concepts sensus fidelium and consensus fidelium were revived. What they express is an essential feature of ecclesial life, namely the implementation of the sensus fidei.

Sensus fidei (the instinct of faith). The sensus fidei is the consequence of the presence in the church of the Spirit, who inspired the prophets, Christ and the apostles. It may be described as a kind of instinctive discernment or "spiritual sense" by which Christians whose lives are faithful to the gospel are enabled to perceive intuitively – like a musician with "perfect pitch" – what accords with the word of God* and what does not. Although Christians may often be unable to provide a rational explanation, they know that their discernment "rings true".

This sensus is in every Christian inasmuch as he or she participates in the life of the ecclesial body as a full member. Possession of it comes through membership in the community of all the baptized, upon which it is formally bestowed; and its presence in each individual is an instance of the supernatural sense of the faith inherent in the whole body (Lumen Gentium 12).

Sensus fidelium (the mind of the faithful). The sensus fidelium is a consequence of the sensus fidei. It is the expression of the latter by the community of the faithful and always reflects the contemporary social and historical background. It is not the sum total of the spiritual idiosyncrasies of the baptized but rather their manner of affirming the conscience of the body of Christ in response to the constantly changing situation. The truth that has been revealed and remains unchanged must nevertheless be interpreted afresh to meet new needs; and the sensus fidelium perceives what is appropriate or necessary, in the light of important developments in the realm of human affairs, so that the gospel may remain a living reality through all the fluctuations of successive generations. The sensus fidelium also perceives any strands of untruth which may permeate attitudes, movements or facile concessions to changing values in the world. Clearly, it is not to be obtained by a majority vote, for there is no element of democracy involved. It is usually perceived through dialogues with those exercising doctrinal ministry. However, if an impressive number of Christian faithful speak out on their own for or against a certain opinion or decision, the profound significance of their views should be recognized and their ideas given serious consideration by all those who hold authority or exercise an official teaching role (see teaching authority).

Throughout the course of history the corporate perception of the sensus fidelium has been sought and expressed within an institutional setting by means of synods at all levels convoked for this purpose. The Orthodox church, for example, has remained firmly committed to this procedure, and the churches issuing from the Reformation also give it an important place. The canonical legislation of the Roman Catholic Church attests to its continuing importance, and it has been infused with new life and strength by diocesan synods since Vatican II.

Consensus fidelium (the agreement of the faithful). The expression consensus fidelium has several meanings. When used as a synonym of the sensus fidelium, following Newman, it expresses the communal perception of the baptized. On some occasions it has the more precise connotation of an agreed statement by the faithful in response to questions previously brought to their attention by ecclesiastical authorities or by public opinion (Pius XII's consultation of Catholics concerning the assumption of Mary illustrates the former, and the Christian condemnation of racial prejudice and violations of liberty the latter).

A careful study of Tradition reveals a third and more important use of the term: the reception* by the ecclesial community of the decisions and, above all, the definitions of faith issued by councils or other hierarchical bodies. In so doing, the church as the community of the faithful recognizes its own good in the judgments and accordingly accepts them as its own.

By circulating the Lima document (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry*) among the churches, the Faith and Order commission set in motion a procedure along these lines. The ecumenical movement will bear real fruit only to the extent that, having elucidated the desire for Christian unity and put forward proposals for agreement, it can lead Christians to a consensus* on the essential truths of the faith and on the structures necessary to bring about ecclesial communion.

CONSTANTINOPLE, FIRST COUNCIL OF

THE FIRST council of Constantinople was convened by the Roman emperor Theodosius I to bring an end to the Arian dispute, which had continued after the condemnation of Arianism at Nicea (325), and to deal with various new heretics who emerged during the 4th century as a result of this dispute. It lasted from May to July 381 and was attended by 150 bishops, all of them Easterners, including such leading figures as Gregory the Theologian, Amphilochius of Iconium, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Jerusalem and Nectarius of Constantinople, as well as a good number of moderate Arianizers under the leadership of Meletius of Antioch, who presided at the council but died during its proceedings. It was accepted by the fourth ecumenical council (Chalcedon* 451) as the second ecumenical council, especially because of its positive work in reconciling the moderate Arians around Meletius to the Nicene position and in expanding the original doctrines of the Nicene Creed* in the light of new needs. The theological work of the council is summed up in the so-called Nicene-Constantinopolitan (or simply Nicene) Creed, though modern scholars have propounded a variety of opinions as to the precise connections of this creed with the deliberations of Constantinople and with the original creed of Nicea.

The creed as it stands re-affirms the doctrine of the consubstantiality (the homoousios) of the Son with the Father and adds certain new clauses, especially to the third article concerning the Holy Spirit.* The council also issued seven canons which succinctly represent the contents of its proceedings. Canon 1 stresses the necessity of retaining the faith of the council of Nicea and its creed and condemns the following heretics: Eunomians and Eudoxians (who denied the consubstantial Trinity* and supported a sort of tritheism), semi-Arians and Pneumatomachians (who denied the true godhead of the Holy Spirit), and Sabellians, Marcellians and Photinians (who were unitarians and had an inadequate doctrine of the Trinity). Canon 2 restricts the movements of bishops to their own dioceses. Canons 3 and 4 deal with the church of Constantinople; the former grants the status of seniority of honour to the bishop of Constantinople next to that of the bishop of Rome, because Constantinople is New Rome, and the latter nullifies the irregular ordination of Maximus the Cynic to the throne of Constantinople and of those who had been ordained by him. Canon 5 accepts as Orthodox certain Trinitarian statements of the churches of Rome and Antioch. Canon 6 deals with procedures for adjudicating accusations against bishops. Canon 7 specifies the manner of receiving into the catholic church heretics who repent. This council also dealt with the canonical ordination of bishops to the thrones of Constantinople, Antioch and Jerusalem, and with the processes for electing and ordaining their bishops.

CONSULTATION ON CHURCH UNION

THE CONSULTATION on Church Union (COCU) came into being in 1962, the result of a sermon preached by Eugene Carson Blake (later general secretary of the WCC) in December 1960. Within ten years it had grown to include nine US communions, including three predominantly African American churches. The stated purpose of COCU was to explore the establishment of a church that is truly catholic, truly evangelical and truly reformed.

During the period 1962-68 growing theological agreement in areas such as ministry* and the sacraments* was reached in COCU. From 1968 to 1970 a plan of union was written, envisioning a new ecclesial body, including institutional merger. An ambitious study programme was undertaken throughout the United States.

But by 1973 it was clear that this type of union was not acceptable to the member churches. Thus, through the 1970s experience and insight were sought and gained in various types of unity in local settings, such as sharing of the eucharist* among several congregations and joint mission* for definite periods among contiguous bodies. The theological insights of African American Christians, women, and persons with disabilities were sought, and a theology commission worked from the mid-1970s to 1984 to develop an acceptable theological agreement. This COCU Consensus was agreed upon in 1984, and by late 1989 all nine member churches had officially found it an "expression in the matters with which it deals, of the apostolic faith, order, worship and witness of the church". Another important development of the late 1970s was the official recognition by each church of the baptism*/membership of the others.

From 1979 a second form of unity was developed, inasmuch as the traditional union proposed in 1970 had not been accepted. It was called covenanting* and, on its own interpretation, incorporated the primary foundation stones of "conciliar fellowship" as affirmed at the WCC Nairobi assembly (1975). The intention of covenanting was "to enable organic unity without organizational merger and while providing for much diversity in retaining the ethos of each communion".

In 1988, COCU's seventeenth plenary approved the document "The Churches in Covenant Communion" as a plan for the formation of this covenantal relationship among the churches, and commended it to them for official action. Seven of the denominations approved the text and declared their willingness to enter into a new relationship of "covenant communion". The Presbyterian Church (USA) approved the proposal in its general assembly; but that church's presbyteries subsequently rejected necessary constitutional changes concerning a proposed ministry of oversight. Meanwhile, the Episcopal Church indicated it was not ready to enter covenant communion and expressed a number of reservations about the proposal.

Against this backdrop, representatives of the churches met in 1999 for COCU's first plenary in ten years. It recommended that the participating churches "enter into a new relationship to be called Churches Uniting in Christ (CUIC), and that they together inaugurate this new relationship through public declaration and liturgical celebration during the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity in the year 2002".

Marks of Churches Uniting in Christ include: mutual recognition of each other as authentic expressions of the one church of Jesus Christ; mutual recognition of members in one baptism; mutual recognition that each affirms the apostolic faith of scripture and Tradition which is expressed in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds and that each seeks to give witness to the apostolic faith in its life and mission; provision for the celebration of the eucharist together with "intentional regularity"; engagement together in Christ's mission on a regular and intentional basis, especially a shared mission to combat racism; international commitment to promote "unity with wholeness” and to oppose “all marginalization and exclusion in church and society based on such things as race, gender, forms of disability, sexual orientation, and class”; an ongoing process of theological dialogue, especially regarding the churches’ understanding of racism and the question of ministerial reconciliation; and “appropriate structures of accountability” and appropriate means for consultation and decision making. As this list indicates, the entire question of ministry is left to the dialogue following inauguration of Churches Uniting in Christ. The 1999 plenary called on the churches to complete this dialogue, aimed at full reconciliation of ordained ministry, by 2007.

In January 2002, CUIC came into being, with the following nine constituent bodies: African Methodist Episcopal Church; African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; Christian Church (Disciples of Christ); Christian Methodist Episcopal Church; Episcopal Church in the USA; International Council of Community Churches; Presbyterian Church (USA); United Church of Christ; United Methodist Church.

CONVERSION

WHILE THE general religious use of this term refers to adopting a religion, belief or opinion, a specific concept of conversion developed in the course of the pietistic, Methodist and revival movements beginning in the 17th century. Counteracting the orthodox Protestant emphasis on doctrine and formal church membership, this concept of conversion stressed the need for a personal dedication to Christ, implying a clear decision for him. Some held that the particular moment of such a decision, rather than baptism,* is the starting point of one’s Christian biography.

The Protestant missionary movement gave the concept of conversion new reference and prominence. William Carey in 1792 defined the aim of mission* as “conversion of the heathens”. In consequence a double meaning came into use: conversion as the heart of mission, standing for a personal acceptance of faith by each individual, and the conversion of a group, tribe or people as the general goal of the missionary enterprise.

The importance of conversion for Protestant mission placed it on the ecumenical agenda in the context of the integration of the International Missionary Council* into the WCC. While the Orthodox churches emphasized the questions of mission and unity* and mission and church,* attention was drawn to all that conversion stands for in order to integrate more strongly the evangelistic tradition of the missionary movement. A WCC study of conversion, published in the workbook for the Uppsala assembly (1968), and the resulting discussion process contributed to a recovery of the biblical meaning of conversion as wider than the pietist Protestant missionary usage of the term.

Recovering a biblical understanding meant going back to the Old Testament, where the Hebrew shub refers to the prophetic call to the people of Israel to return to the covenant* relationship with God. Here conversion has a collective meaning, challenging Israel to re-orient itself within a given relationship. In the New Testament two words appear: epistrephein and metanoein. The first, meaning to turn around from a wrong way, is addressed to disciples after following Jesus for years (to Peter in Luke 22:32) and is also used of the conversion of Saul to Paul at Damascus (Acts 9), of Israel (2 Cor. 3:16) and of Gentiles (Acts 15:3). The latter, with the connotation of radically thinking anew, though sparsely used, is central to the message of Jesus, summarized as “the kingdom of God is at hand; repent” (Mark 1:15 and par.). The Johannine writings speak of re-birth.

In summary, there is no closely defined concept of conversion in the NT which would lend itself to a doctrinal or ideological use. However, conversion is always linked with the kingdom of God* rather than with entry into the church or a mere individual decision. Conversion always means a re-orientation to God and to fellow persons at the same time. In the words of Lesslie Newbigin, conversion is “a turning round in order to participate by faith in a new reality which is the true future of the whole creation. It is not, in the first place, either saving one’s soul or joining a society. It is these things only secondarily.”

The aim of furthering an interchange between the evangelical and other traditions in the ecumenical movement was only partly achieved. For instance, The Ecumenical Review in 1967 published a theological discussion on conversion to which such diverse figures as Nikos Nissiotis, Billy Graham, E.R. Wickham, Letty Russell, Christoph Barth and Emilio Castro contributed. But the debate on renewal in mission at the Uppsala assembly (1968) failed to reconcile theological differences, and the growing estrangement between the WCC and conservative Evangelicals led in 1974 to a separate international congress on world evangelization at Lausanne, which emphasized evangelism* in line with the traditional understanding of conversion and established the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization.*

The 1982 WCC ecumenical affirmation “Mission and Evangelism” – which grew out of consultations that involved Evangelical as well as Roman Catholic missiologists – re-defined the understanding of mission. Conversion remains a prominent point, described as a personal decision to accept the saving power of Christ and to enter into his discipleship, but the statement warns of a narrow delineation and includes a transpersonal, collective significance. Also the call to conversion is seen as part of the missionary task together with engagement for justice* and dialogue with persons of other faiths (see dialogue, interfaith).

Although a specific right to change one’s religion is established in the UN Declaration on Human Rights, some governments have passed laws which restrict or prohibit conversions. In many societies, conversion may result in total ostracism of the convert. In its response to the 1982 Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* document, the Church of South India points to the problem that “making public declaration of one’s commitment to Christ as Lord and Saviour” may be understood as becoming “separated from the community and lost to the culture”.

The ecumenical discussion indirectly exposed the Western individualistic anthropology which deeply influences the traditional concept of conversion. Accordingly, third-world theologies and progressive Western trends made little use of it or gave it a very different emphasis as conversion to the world or conversion of structures. On the other hand, the topic stimulated an inter-religious discussion of parallel phenomena of conversion in different religions and even a common approach between Christians and Marxists (see M. Machovec, The Ecumenical Review, 1968). The Groupe des Dombes* marked the 50th anniversary of its founding by a study on the theological foundations of the experience of conversion, whose findings were published in For the Conversion of the Churches.

Within the Roman Catholic Church before the Second Vatican Council,* conversion referred to the transition from one church to another or, more specifically, from any other church or religion to the RCC. Now a clear distinction is made between already-baptized Christians who “enter into full communion with the RCC” and the unbaptized, whether religious or not, who “convert”. More recently, Pope John Paul II has used conversion in several ways, e.g., from the “culture of death” to the “gospel of life”; and in the ecumenical context, the Christian personal and communal “need for repentance and change of heart through self-denial and unstinting love”, through “an examination of conscience, a kind of dialogue of consciences”.

COTTESLOE

THE COTTESLOE consultation met from 7 to 14 December 1960 in the Johannesburg

suburb of that name. It was convened in response to the crisis generated by the Sharpeville massacre on 21 March of that year, when 20,000 people had converged on the Sharpeville police station in support of a campaign to defy pass laws. Sixty people were killed, and 180 injured. Two weeks later, on 8 April, the African National Congress and the Pan Africanist Congress were banned under the hastily enacted unlawful organizations act. Repercussions echoed around the world, and Robert S. Bilheimer, then associate general secretary of the WCC, visited South Africa in the latter part of April to assess the situation on behalf of the Council. As a result of the visit it was agreed that a consultation should take place between representatives of the WCC and South African member churches as a basis for formulating an appropriate Christian response to the crisis at hand.

The consultation statement issued by the delegates had far-reaching implications for the church and society in South Africa, although it cannot be regarded as in any way radical. Much of it was based on a preparatory document drafted by Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk (NGK) theologians.

The document regarded the prohibition of racially mixed marriages as without scriptural warrant but admitted they were inadvisable in practice. It further suggested that there could be “no objection in principle to direct representation of coloured people in parliament”. Regarding apartheid* and the church, Cottesloe resolved that “no one who believes in Jesus Christ may be excluded from any church on the grounds of his colour or race” and that the “spiritual unity among all men who are in Christ must find visible expression in acts of common worship and witness, and in fellowship and consultation on matters of common concern”. Most churches around the world took such observations as self-evident. The Nederduitsch Hervormde Kerk (NHK) had, however, a clause which excluded blacks from membership, and the NGK a policy of segregated churches.

The NHK rejected the consultation statement and subsequently withdrew its membership from the WCC. Although the majority of the NGK representatives at the Cottesloe meeting accepted the statement, the NGK itself, under pressure from prime minister Hendrik Verwoerd, rejected the statement and re-affirmed its own theological justification for government policy. Later that year the two NGK synods which had been members of the WCC (the Cape Province and the Transvaal) withdrew from the Council. The process of moving into increasing ecumenical isolation by the white Afrikaner Reformed churches had started. It would come to a head with the declaration of the theological justification of apartheid as heresy and with the suspension of the membership of both the NGK and the NHK by the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* at the meeting of its general council in Ottawa in 1982.

COUNCILS OF CHURCHES: LOCAL, NATIONAL, REGIONAL

A COUNCIL is a voluntary association of churches within a defined geographic area which, without compromising the distinctive identity and authority* of its members, enables their sharing in common reflection and action on matters of Christian unity,* faith* and ethics,* and in programmes of common Christian witness* and service (see diakonia).

Councils are among the most pervasive and significant expressions of the ecumenical movement. They vary greatly in size, number of members and staff, and scope of programme, and the terminology used of them is inconsistent. Historically, many local and national councils have included cooperative missionary organizations, interchurch or non-denominational Christian organizations such as the YWCA* or Bible Society, or Christian “action groups” working on specific issues such as world hunger. Such broadly based bodies are properly (though not always in practice) termed “Christian councils” or “Christian federations” rather than councils of churches (see federalism).

Because councils are, properly speaking, the churches joining together in reflection and action, the tendency today is to emphasize the unique authority and role of the councils’ member churches, with other bodies having associate membership or observer status. Most regional councils refer to themselves as “conferences” of churches; their membership may include also national councils and other Christian bodies. Finally, the term “local” may refer to any level from suburb or town to federal state, while “regional” indicates a large, culturally coherent geo-political area such as Africa, Latin America or the Pacific.

In principle, councils exist as servants of their member churches and have no authority apart from that granted to them by these churches. For national and regional councils these are autonomous, usually national, churches; for local councils, congregations or city or local denominational structures. The various levels of councils are structurally independent; they do not form a hierarchy in which local councils are “branches” of their national councils, which in turn make up the regional ecumenical bodies.

Modern councils must be distinguished from the “ecumenical councils”* of the ancient church. These were authoritative deliberative and decision-making bodies, among churches which understood themselves to be one, on matters of doctrine and practice; modern councils are organs for common reflection, consultation and joint programming among still-separated churches. (In French and German the first meaning of the English word “council” is indicated by the terms concile and Konzil respectively, the second by conseil and Rat.)

THE ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF MODERN COUNCILS

Several essential elements of modern councils were heralded by Philip Schaff in his address on “The Reunion of Christendom” to the 1893 World’s Parliament of Religions in Chicago; he called for a “federal or confederate union” between churches, each retaining its independence “in the management of its internal affairs” but recognizing the others as having “equal rights”, and all “cooperating in general enterprises” in areas of evangelism, apologetics, social services, and social and moral reform.

The earliest national council-like structure appears to have been the Protestant Federation of France, formed in 1905; this added the dimension (crucial to councils in difficult cultural and political situations) of providing a channel for the churches’ common action to preserve freedom of religious expression, and “to uphold with public authorities, where necessary, the rights of the churches in the federation”. The formation of a council in Puerto Rico in 1905 is also reported.

The modern council with the most extensive programme and largest staff was also founded in this era: the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, set up in 1908. Its constitution was typical of those of many later councils: it sets careful limits to the council’s activities; it seeks actively to promote the “spiritual life and religious activities of the churches”; and it “recommends a course of action in matters of common interest”. By 1910 its membership of 31 denominations encompassed the majority of Protestants in the USA. Its successor in 1950, the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA, subsumed the Federal Council and seven other national religious bodies (such as the National Protestant Council of Higher Education and the United Council of Church Women).

The origins of many national councils are rooted in the efforts in the early 20th century to strengthen the identity and independence of missionary-founded churches in Asia, Africa and Latin America (see missionary societies, common witness). Cooperation between mission agencies and the new national councils enjoyed the enabling support of the International Missionary Council* (IMC) at its founding meeting in 1921. (Indeed, John R. Mott considered his greatest contribution to the IMC to have been enabling the formation of these national Christian councils.) The IMC also provided the newly formed national councils with access to other international ecumenical structures.

For example, in India in 1922 the National Missionary Council became the National Christian Council of India, Burma and Ceylon, which required that 50% of the churches' representatives be nationals of their countries. In Japan a federation of churches, continuing impulses from the Conference of Federated Missions (1902), led in 1922 to the National Christian Council, which soon became an IMC member. The need for a common Christian voice in dealing with governments often provided a powerful impetus towards the formation of councils. Thus in Indonesia a "missions consulate" (1906) represented virtually all Protestant mission bodies in the Netherlands Indies in their relations with the state, and this proved to be the forerunner of the National Council of Churches in Indonesia, founded in 1950.

The number of national councils has grown steadily from only 2 in 1910 to 23 in 1928 and at least 30 by 1948, including 9 in Asia, 3 in Africa and the Near East, and 5 in Latin America. By 2001 there were at least 103 national councils, including some 25 in Africa, 15 in Asia, 10 in the Caribbean and Central America, 20 in Europe, 2 in North America, 4 in Latin America and 8 in the Pacific.

Local councils of churches exist in most towns or rural areas with a sizeable mix of Christians. They have often developed to provide a more structured cooperation among local church leaders, or to sustain the initiative of laypersons who, impatient with denominational divisions, sought broader forms for fellowship and cooperation with other Christians. Such councils have played a vital role in enabling – and sometimes legitimizing – contacts across denominational lines: indeed, for many Christians, "ecumenism" means the annual Week of Prayer* observance or the "interchurch food pantry", both typically sponsored by the local council of churches. Far more than national or regional councils, local councils offer opportunities for lay ecumenical leadership. One can only loosely estimate the number of such councils by "tens of thousands".

Regional councils exist in all major geopolitical areas except for North America, where there are separate councils for the US and Canada. Their principal aims include helping their members to shape a common Christian response to issues of regional concern and serving as a bridge between churches and national councils in the region and global issues and worldwide organizations.

Many regional councils also have roots in the contacts fostered by the missionary and Christian youth movements in the early decades of the 1900s. On the basis of regional encounters through the World Student Christian Federation* in 1907 and 1921, Asian Christians called at a 1922 WSCF meeting (Peking) for a regular "international conference in the Far East... to promote cooperation" and mutual understanding. In response to this need, the IMC proposed an East Asia regional committee; but the Asian Christians themselves preferred a more independent "East Asia conference", whereby representatives of the church can share their experience and concern, join in meditation and prayer and make common plans for participating more fully in the life of the ecumenical church". Such a conference met first in Bangkok in 1949; from its second meeting in 1957 in Prapat, Indonesia, its three secretaries worked each from their home countries of Burma, New Zealand and Ceylon, and in 1959 the East Asia Christian Conference (EACC) held its inaugural assembly in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia. In recognition of its true scope its name was changed in 1973 to the Christian Conference of Asia* (CCA): now headquartered in Hong Kong, it encompasses nearly 100 churches and 14 national councils of churches in 18 countries from Korea in the north to New Zealand in the east to Pakistan in the west. Its traditional concerns include justice and the healing of divisions in the human community; since 1990 it has increasingly been concerned with (the related!) issues of church unity.

The All Africa Conference of Churches* (AACC), inaugurated in 1963 and based in Nairobi, has focused on issues of worship and evangelism, the search for a Christian family life in the African context and indigenization of the gospel (e.g. in 1966, a first consultation of African theologians on biblical revelation and African belief). In recent years it has worked extensively on issues of violence (especially in relation to regional wars) and justice (particularly in relation to debt relief and slavery).

The Pacific Conference of Churches* (PCC), founded in 1966 and headquartered in Suva, Fiji, has emphasized themes of education, citizenship, and the relation of gospel to culture, with an increasing engagement with issues of justice (especially immigration and nuclear testing) and the protection of the environment. The Caribbean Conference of Churches* (CCC), founded in 1973 and based in Trinidad, includes 34 "Christian denominations" and works in 32 countries in the pan-Caribbean region. It has focused upon "the decisive action of God in Christ in terms of [Caribbean] culture, experience and needs", and the search for both unity and renewal among the churches. The Latin American Council of Churches* (CLAI), founded in 1982 and based in Quito, Ecuador, culminates a long history of cooperation among Protestant missions and then indigenous churches. Including more than 150 churches and "Christian organizations" (working in areas such as youth and theological education) from 21 countries in Latin America and the Caribbean, it has supported its members especially in evangelism and in their search as Christians for "a system based on justice and brotherhood". The Middle East Council of Churches* (MECC), founded in 1974 and based in Beirut, with regional offices in Cyprus, links some 27 churches in a "[confessional] family" structure. It has emphasized promoting understanding and cooperation among its member churches, inter-religious relations with the predominant Muslims, and links with the global ecumenical family, as well as making a common Christian witness on issues of regional concern such as violence and justice, and working on the need for a common date of Easter. The special calling of the Conference of European Churches* (CEC), founded in 1959 and headquartered in Geneva, has been enabling the churches' common participation in the spiritual and material rebuilding of a Europe shattered by the second world war. It includes some 123 churches and 25 associate organizations in all the countries on the European continent. Since 1999 the European Ecumenical Commission on Church and Society, with offices in Brussels and Strasbourg, has been integrated into CEC.

In some regions, councils with a sub-regional focus have become an important part of the ecumenical scene (e.g. the Nordic Ecumenical Council, based in Uppsala, Sweden). These help groups of churches linked by historic and cultural factors to express their distinctive identity and witness within the larger regional framework.

Regional councils have also been an important factor in indigenizing the church and developing a Christian identity rooted in local culture. Thus in 1959 retiring EACC general secretary D.T. Niles spoke of the EACC as an expression of the "growth of the church in Asia into selfhood..., the instrument of our resolve to be churches together here in Asia". And voicing their sense of "coming of age" over against the Western missionary agencies which had "planted" them, Niles called this regional council "the means by which we [Asian churches and Christians] enter into a meaningful participation in the missionary task of the church".

MEMBERSHIP, ORGANIZATION AND PROGRAMME OF COUNCILS

Most councils began as pan-Protestant organizations (though there are early examples of Orthodox membership, such as the four Eastern Orthodox churches which entered the Federal Council in the US in 1940). Councils today typically encompass the classic "ecumenical" Protestant churches (from Brethren through Methodists, Disciples and Presbyterians to Lutherans and Anglicans) and often Orthodox churches. Others, such as Seventh-day Adventists and the Salvation Army, are also sometimes involved. There is often a significant presence of churches whose members are predominantly from minority groups (for example, the black-led churches, with their Caribbean roots, within the former British Council of Churches). Many councils today are making serious efforts to include a broader range of members, particularly from the Pentecostal and Evangelical churches.

The formal basis for membership in most councils reflects the Christocentric orientation of the Protestantism of the first half of the 20th century, broadened by a Trinitarian allusion and by references to the scriptures and to the churches' divine calling to common witness and work. The following statement (used by national councils in such diverse countries as Zambia, Tonga and Austria) is typical: "The council is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit" (see WCC, basis of). Other themes may be mentioned, such as the imperative to work for unity (as in the basis of the Council of Churches of Malaysia).

Two negative principles have helped many councils to encompass churches with very diverse theological, ecclesiological and cultural profiles. The first is that council membership does not imply that a church accepts the doctrinal positions – or even full ecclesiological status – of other member churches: councils exist precisely to help the still-divided churches understand one another and work together. Second, membership does not commit a church to specific statements and actions taken by the council: the churches retain their autonomy of judgment and action in each case. In practice, the process for shaping common statements on public issues and determining their status remains among the most complex and difficult issues faced by councils.

Though there were occasional instances of cooperation, Roman Catholic membership in local, national and regional councils was out of the question before the recognition, heralded by Vatican II's Decree on Ecumenism,* that other churches are in some sense "ecclesial communities" and that it is imperative to seek cooperation with them. Roman Catholic participation is defined by the 1975 text Ecumenical Collaboration at the Regional, National and Local Levels: initiating "formal doctrinal conversations" is the prerogative of the churches themselves in their "immediate and bilateral contacts"; procedures for making public statements must leave room for member churches to define their own distinctive positions; representatives of churches "should be clearly aware of the limits beyond which they cannot commit the[ir] church without prior reference to higher authority". Within these limits, there is clear approval for the fullest possible RC involvement in councils. The decision whether to join rests with the "highest ecclesiastical authority in the area served by the council" (for national councils, the national bishops' conference); in reaching this decision there "must necessarily be communication" with the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.* The 1993 Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism emphasizes that RC membership is not possible in councils "in which groups are present who are not really considered to be ecclesial communities".

In 1971 there was RC membership in 11 national councils; this had increased by 1975 to 19, by 1986 to 33, and by 2001 to no fewer than 58, including membership in NCCs in 16 countries in Europe, 12 in Africa, 12 in the Pacific and 11 in the Caribbean, with the remainder divided across Asia, Latin America and North America. The RCC has observer or consultant status in four countries. In addition Roman Catholics are members of three regional conferences of churches (the Caribbean, the Pacific and, as of January 1990, the Middle East). There is increasing Roman Catholic involvement in local councils of churches; for example, in 2001 an informal survey of 21 of the 41 state councils of churches in the US revealed that the Roman Catholic Church had membership in 13 and observer status in 6.

Nevertheless, councils which actively relate to the ecumenical movement incorporate only a portion of the churches within their area (for example, in the 1980s the AACC – with its 117 member churches and 19 associate Christian councils in some 38 countries – encompassed about 35% of African Christians.) Most Pentecostal, Evangelical and fundamentalist churches have not sought membership, fearing inevitable association with council statements or actions with which they disagree, or generally distrusting the ecumenical movement as being "too progressive" theologically in matters of social witness, or believing that councils tend towards the creation of a "super-church", so that membership would inevitably compromise their own freedom of judgment and witness (see criticism of the ecumenical movement). Often such churches form their own organs for agreed forms of Christian witness and action, and these may cooperate selectively with councils and with other churches in specific areas, for example in making a common Christian representation on matters of religious freedom (e.g. the Christian Federation of Malaysia, which includes the Council of Churches of Malaysia, the Roman Catholic Church, and an alliance of Evangelical churches).

Councils have adopted many forms of governance. Typically there is a general assembly, meeting every one to three years to set broad programmatic guidelines; a governing board of church representatives meeting every year or two for detailed programmatic and personnel oversight; an executive committee; and steering committees in such areas as faith and order, evangelism, world service and family life. Council staffs range from a few volunteers to 100 or more full-time ecumenical professionals. Councils are usually financed by contributions from their member churches, though some receive significant funds from government or other secular sources in support of "community service" programmes. Most councils receive insufficient support to provide the programmes and services which their member churches ask them to provide.

Council programmes and activities vary greatly. Almost every council promotes common worship and spiritual life among their members. A few councils in the most affluent countries conduct extensive national and even international operations; they have a larger programme and staff than some of their member churches. Others with more limited financial and personnel resources restrict themselves to specific areas. Many councils emphasize programmes of aid or relief in the face of natural disasters, or the continuing social disasters of chronic poverty and unemployment, drug abuse or juvenile delinquency. Councils have been very active in common witness where a divided Christian voice would be less effective (e.g. prison and hospital chaplaincies). Many councils encourage evangelism (though its practice is understood to be the prerogative of the churches themselves, hopefully working in consort); and many have publishing programmes, particularly of worship materials and Christian analyses of local issues. Some councils promote inter-faith dialogue, helping their churches relate responsibly to other faith communities; others are called upon to represent their member churches in dealings with the government. Sometimes councils feel duty-bound to speak out in support of human rights, or to criticize unjust social structures; such prophetic witness often has its price (a dramatic example being the 1987 expulsion of the CCA from Singapore).

Some councils have traditionally dealt more zealously with the divisions of society than with the theological and cultural divisions within and among their own member churches. But recently, many councils are giving more attention to the "difficult" questions of faith and order, and to helping members to discuss their differences of doctrine, church order and moral teaching. This has been an important point of contact with the broader ecumenical movement, as for example many councils have used the WCC's Faith and Order text Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry as a basis for shared reflection.

Councils have developed extensive contacts with one another for sharing of information and for mutual support. Regional councils have sought close working relationships with the WCC; and many national councils have sought "associate council" status with the WCC. Three international consultations for national councils of churches have been held, in Geneva in 1971 and 1986, sponsored by the WCC, and in Hong Kong in 1993, held under the auspices of the national councils themselves, with strong WCC and RC participation. In 1982 the WCC, together with the Roman Catholic Church, held an important consultation on the ecclesiological significance of councils.

ENDURING ISSUES AND FUTURE CHALLENGES

Councils at all levels face certain enduring issues. First is the nature of their relationship to their member churches: do the councils exist only to serve the churches, enabling their more effective witness in certain carefully defined areas; or must they sometimes lead the churches by calling them prophetically back to the search for unity,* common witness and service? The churches have an essential and legitimate concern for their unique ecclesial status, and the councils must remain their servants. But if the churches cling to their present structures and divided identities or fail to bring a common Christian witness to bear on crucial issues of the day, then is it not the councils' duty – precisely as their faithful servant – to challenge them to a deeper and more costly ecumenical commitment?

This issue often comes to sharp focus on issues of participation in councils (e.g. the controversy in the early 1990s around the application of the Universal Fellowship of Metropolitan Community Churches for observer status in the US National Council of Churches) or over council statements on controversial public and ethical issues such as abortion.

A second, related issue is that of the ecclesiological significance of councils of churches (see church). Recent ecumenical discussion has placed this squarely within the context of the churches' search for unity. The first international consultation of national councils in 1971 emphasized that theological work for unity is not an "extra" beside the practical work of councils, but is "the real basis for their common witness and action"; and that although councils lack an independent ecclesiological status, they are nevertheless "instruments" which enable crucial ecclesiological developments to occur among member churches. The 1982 consultation emphasized the role of councils as instruments of the churches' "irreversible" commitment to unity among themselves; councils are but "interim expressions of unity" shared by churches already committed to each other and to their common search for unity. The subsequent consultations of councils of churches have reinforced these ideas, emphasizing the need for common reflection and action appropriate to the local context.

Councils, then, offer an environment in which churches and ecclesial communities "provide each other with the means to grow together towards full ecclesial status, each helping the other to acquire what it lacks"; in their "communion of mission, witness and prayer the full koinonia [of the churches in a truly conciliar state] is seen in profile and forecast". This means that membership in a council "expresses a commitment to practise some real measure of mutual recognition and reconciliation at every level of church life". This ascribes to councils a real, though carefully limited, ecclesiological significance, one unthinkable a few decades ago. But such a purely "instrumental" understanding does not satisfy those Christians who have experienced their foretaste of unity through the life and work of councils rather than – if not in spite of – the structures of their still-divided churches.

A third issue confronting councils is the continuing search for a truly adequate form for their life and work. In the past 25 years several national councils have entered adventurous schemes of re-organization. For example, in Aotearoa New Zealand, Australia, Britain and Canada, one major aim was to enable the fuller participation of the Roman Catholic Church. In some cases, most strikingly the USA, the need to re-align programmatic and financial aspects of the council's life has been an insistent factor.

Such re-organizations may yield creative new insights for councils of churches. In Britain, for example, Churches Together in Britain and Ireland is the coordinating body for regional ecumenical instruments in England, Scotland, Wales and Ireland. This grew out of a broadly inclusive process, "Churches Together in Pilgrimage", launched in 1985 as a response to the failure of several church union schemes and the positive experience of many Christians worshipping and working together across denominational lines in local ecumenical projects (now partnerships). It is rooted in churches' resolve to move, in Cardinal Basil Hume's words, "quite deliberately from a situation of cooperation to one of commitment to each other". Given this, the new ecumenical instrument need not be a force "outside" the churches, but an expression of their own will towards unity. It was suggested that the new instrument would not develop its own "programmes", but rather ensure that the churches' existing programmes were pursued together rather than separately. Thus there could be a shift from "ecumenism as an extra which absorbs energy" to "ecumenism as a dimension of all that [the churches] do which releases energy, through the sharing of resources" (Robert Runcie).

The new Conference of Churches in Aotearoa New Zealand (1987) raises a fourth issue: *the proper participation* of the* *whole people of God** in their life and work. This was a major theme at the second international consultation of national councils (1986), which went so far as to refer to an “imperative towards participation” and to identify as an “urgent challenge” the need “to create a context within which their member churches may challenge each other [towards] fuller participation... in their koinonia of confession, worship and action”. This challenge was taken up boldly in Aotearoa New Zealand; its new ecumenical body sought a much greater participation of persons normally under-represented in church decision-making structures, particularly laypersons, women and youth, and has committed itself to inclusive and participatory styles of work, to consensus styles of decision making, and to a decentralized structure.

The results and implications of these new ventures are not yet clear. The British scheme has been very successful in expressing the churches’ desire for unity and their understanding of councils as servants of their members (to the point that the new council should not issue public statements in its own right at all, but only “enable” the churches themselves, when they agree, to speak a common word). This raises the question of how independent a council must be in order to maintain its own identity, and to challenge its members should their enthusiasm for unity and prophetic witness falter. The new body in Aotearoa New Zealand has been very successful in expressing the desire of the people of God for fuller participation (to the point that its first three presidents were all laypersons, and its first three co-general secretaries women), but through the 1990s this bold alignment has come under severe strain. This raises the question of how independent a council can be and still maintain sufficient contact with its members’ traditional structures to be taken seriously by them.

In a complex and changing ecumenical situation, three developments are of special interest for the future. First, many councils are emphasizing anew the fact that they “belong to”, and exist “for”, their member churches; councils understand more clearly that their role is not to exist apart from the churches but to encourage and enable them to express their common faith, life, witness and action within the local, national or regional context. While councils continue, and indeed intensify, their engagement with issues of justice and witness, this has been complemented by an increased concern for related issues such as church unity and common worship. Second, in a few cases, particularly in Europe and North America, a council’s diaconal programmes of social relief and development work have separated themselves from the council, forming a new structure. These function increasingly as independent aid agencies, with the council no longer serving to channel and coordinate the churches’ efforts in this area. It is unclear whether this trend will spread, and what its long-term implications will be. Third, many councils are finding interfaith issues to be an increasingly important part of their agenda. Depending on the context this may involve engagement in interfaith dialogue, working with other living faiths to promote reconciliation, or seeking common cause on issues of mutual concern (for example, freedom of religious expression, human rights, or the protection of the environment). In some contexts, particularly in Europe and North America, this has re-opened the debate about the nature – and membership – of councils of churches.

The future of councils of churches is at once uncertain and hopeful. They often face unclear or even conflicting expectations about their identity and role. They may become frustrated at what seems the snail’s pace of the churches towards unity. And finally they are dependent upon the ecumenical enthusiasm, commitment and (sometimes severely) shrinking financial means of their members. Particularly since about 1990 many councils have faced increasing, sometimes severe pressure as their member churches could not maintain earlier levels of support. This has led some councils to “re-structure” or “rationalize” their finance and operations, often according to then-current secular management principles, usually with the result that the same programmatic load has to be carried by fewer staff.

Yet councils are an essential expression of the ecumenical movement. Ecclesialogically speaking, they embody (in however imperfect a form) the divided churches’ calling to be together the church in each place. Practically speaking, they enable the divided churches to reflect together on issues which divide them, and to work together day-by-day. They will remain necessary as long as the churches remain divided, for they provide a precious “space” in which the churches’ common life, reflection, witness and work is “normal”, and it is their continuing state of division which is the “problem”. They confirm the words of the great ecumenical pioneer J.H. Oldham, who wrote in 1922 of the nascent national Christian councils around the world: “If our unity is real, and we have a common purpose, these must express themselves through some visible organ.”

COUTURIER, PAUL-IRÉNÉE

B. 29 July 1881, Lyons, France; d. 24 March 1953, Lyons. A Catholic priest and ecumenical pioneer of “spiritual ecumenism”, Couturier learned of Orthodox piety and spirituality in his encounter with more than 10,000

Russian refugees in the Lyons area during the 1920s. In 1932, a stay at the Benedictine priory of Amay-sur-Meuse (Chevetogne*) introduced him to the thinking of Lambert Beauduin and to the attempts of Cardinal Mercier to foster RCC-Anglican church union through the Malines conversations (see Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue). He devised a format for a yearly eight-day period of prayer for church unity at Lyons. Protestants and Orthodox welcomed his formula: “the unity as Christ wishes and by the means which he desires”, broader than the “return to Rome” formula of the already practised octave inspired by the former Anglican Paul Wattson. “Unity is not a return but a re-grouping.” From 1935, Couturier’s Universal Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, 18-25 January, reached beyond Lyons and France (see Week of Prayer for Christian Unity). In 1937 he helped to initiate the annual interdenominational retreat conferences of the Groupe des Dombes* and influenced Roger Schutz at the new Taizé* community. He was in close touch with early WCC leaders. His efforts are continued by the interconfessional association Unité chrétienne (Lyons).

COVENANT

THIS CENTRAL biblical word first appeared in ecumenical vocabulary in the message of the first assembly of the WCC in 1948: "Here at Amsterdam we have committed ourselves afresh to [God], and have covenanted with one another in constituting this World Council of Churches. We intend to stay together. We call upon Christian congregations everywhere to endorse and fulfill this covenant in their relations with one another. In thankfulness to God we commit the future to him."

The idea of churches covenanting together had not been a familiar part of the ecumenical call to renewal* and unity.* Indeed, the word does not appear in the first volume of the History of the Ecumenical Movement (1517-1948) except for the above quotation, and it does not re-appear in the second volume.

EARLIER USAGE

At the very beginning of the Christian era, a deterrent to using the word "covenant" may have been that for the Roman authorities a covenant meant an illegal secret society, which the Christian community was already considered to be. It may also be conjectured that the great Eastern and Western churches, after recognition by Constantine, would not want to emphasize the covenant character of the church in view of their close links with the state. Of course, it was long accepted, from the formation of the canon* of the scriptures, that the two parts of the Bible were originally the old and new covenants ("testament" being a Latin translation of the word berith in Hebrew and diatheke in Greek).

With the Reformation and the availability of the Old and New Testaments (covenants) in the hands of the people, "covenant" became a rallying point for reform and radical obedience to the word of God. Peasants in Germany banded themselves into associations called by the general title of Bund (covenant), and their leather-laced shoe (Bundschuh) became their symbol of protest. The peasants were encouraged by Thomas Münzer with his preaching on the covenant of the elect, but their rebellion was brutally suppressed in 1524-25. In 1531 the Protestant princes and free cities combined to form the Smalcald league, or covenant (Bund), to preserve their freedom of belief and practice, by force if necessary. With John Calvin, covenant (Latin foedus, French alliance) became, in close association with the doctrine of predestination, a major theological category in the history and understanding of salvation.

In 17th-century Britain an important segment of the Church of Scotland adopted the word "covenant" as a protest against the determination of Charles I of England to impose episcopacy and a new liturgy on the Reformed Kirk. In 1638, a group of their leaders made a national covenant for the defence and preservation of "the true religion, liberties and laws of the kingdom". Each pledged to behave "as becometh Christians who have renewed their covenant with God". The rebellion of 1640 in England led, among other things, to convening the Westminster assembly, which produced a Solemn League and Covenant whose purpose was to preserve reformed religion in England, Scotland and Ireland "according to the word of God and the example of the best reformed churches".

In 1648 the Dutch theologian John Cocceius, in Doctrine of the Covenant and Testaments of God, sought to change the emphasis of Calvinism on the unilateral decrees of God by drawing attention to the divine covenant of grace,* prefigured in the OT and fully revealed in the NT, by which every repentant sinner may share in the covenant grace. During the latter part of the 17th century a new piety developed among the puritans, who regarded themselves as people who were bound to God individually and corporately, and who, especially on new year's day, would renew their covenant with God and pledge to be more devoted in worship and the reading of the word of God, to employ their time wisely and to seek opportunities for doing good to others.

John and Charles Wesley were heirs to this puritan tradition. John Wesley notes in his journal on Christmas day 1747 that he rejoiced in God his Saviour with a gathered company of believers, and during the following days, "I strongly urged the wholly giving up of ourselves to God, and renewing in every point our covenant that the Lord should be our God". Around that time Wesley began the practice of the covenant service on the first Sunday of the year. It has developed into a liturgy celebrated by Methodists, which has also been used at ecumenical meetings as an affirmation of God's covenant of grace and our participation in it in all dimensions of our existence.

One active member church of the WCC is called the Mission Covenant Church of Sweden. Starting in 1855 as a congregation, it became a denomination in 1878 as "a free association of committed believers in local fellowship".

Another use of the word "covenant" has not enhanced its popularity. "Covenant" was a legal term since the middle ages for an agreement or promise made under seal to do or refrain from doing things, or to lease or renew lease of land. The term carried a certain solemn commitment about it. After the first world war, the 26 articles agreed in the Treaty of Versailles formed the covenant of the League of Nations. It constituted a firm undertaking by the signatory states to maintain international peace and security, to promote international cooperation and to act collectively when the territorial integrity and political independence of member states were threatened or violated. In the event, the USA, the leading state at the time and the best guarantor of the covenant, withdrew its membership. The invasion by Japan of Manchuria in 1931 was unchallenged. Germany left the league in 1933. Italy invaded Ethiopia in 1935, but while condemning Italy, the member states did little to deter Italy. The Spanish civil war began in 1936. The way was set for the second world war and the demise of the League of Nations. "Covenant" became such a word of ill repute that, when the United Nations was formed, the former "covenant" was now named "charter". But in 1966 the UN assembly re-introduced the word "covenant" by adopting, under the rubric of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, two international covenants – one on economic, social and cultural rights, and the other on civil and political rights. The further fact that many nations took a long time to ratify these covenants (or did not ratify them at all) has encouraged the perception of a certain cynicism or at best disinclination about being committed to meeting obligations internationally. Some of these unhappy associations of the word "covenant" may help to explain why few church traditions employ it in expressing their commitment to God in Christ and their relations to one another.

The biblical and theological renewal of the 1930s and 1940s highlighted the central and comprehensive character of God's liberating work and covenant with Israel, fulfilled in the covenant made in Christ through his ministry and death for the redemption of the world. Walther Eichrodt's preface to the 1957 edition of the first volume of his Theology of the Old Testament, published in 1933, re-affirms his conviction: "As an epitome of the dealings of God in history the 'covenant' is not a doctrinal concept, with the help of which a complete corpus of dogma can be worked out, but the characteristic description of a living process, which was begun at a particular time and at a particular place, in order to reveal a divine reality unique in the whole history of religion." Eichrodt's colleague at Basel, Karl Barth, published in 1945 the first part of volume 3 of his Church Dogmatics on "The Doctrine of Creation", whose central section is entitled "Creation and Covenant". Barth's thesis was that "the purpose and therefore the meaning of creation is to make possible the history of God's covenant with man, which has its beginning, its centre and its culmination in Jesus Christ. The history of this covenant is as much the goal of creation as creation itself is the beginning of this history." He goes on to say that "in the Christian concept of the creation of all things the question is concretely one of man and his whole universe as the theatre of the covenant of grace; of the totality of earthly and heavenly things as they are to be comprehended in Christ (Eph. 1:10)". This scriptural text provided the theme of the inaugural assembly of the WCC, "Man's Disorder and God's Design", which Barth rightly pointed out in his address to the assembly should have been "God's Design and Man's Disorder".

ECUMENICAL USE OF "COVENANT"

The message of the WCC's second assembly (Evanston 1954) invoked the Amsterdam "covenant" in a paragraph addressed directly to each congregation: "To stay together is not enough. We must go forward. As we learn more of our unity in Christ, it becomes the more intolerable that we should be divided. We therefore ask you: Is your church seriously considering its relation to other churches in the light of our Lord's prayer that we may be sanctified in the truth and that we may all be one? Is your congregation, in fellowship with sister congregations around you, doing all it can to ensure that your neighbours shall hear the voice of the one shepherd calling all into the one flock?"

The call to go beyond staying together to going forward and growing together was seen as an expression of the covenant relationship of the churches which God has established in Christ through the power of the Holy Spirit. The accent is clearly on the churches being obedient to their call in all its manifold dimensions.

The New Delhi assembly (1961) did not use the word "covenant", although it attempted to give a vision of the unity which Christ wills for his church on earth to be "one fully committed fellowship". In his report to the assembly, the general secretary, W.A. Visser 't Hooft, posed the question of how the local congregations in each place can become "unitable". He asked: "For what is the use of deep convictions and imaginative plans about unity which arise at the level of world meetings, if our church members are indifferent, lukewarm or even hostile with regard to unity? There is as yet an immense task to be performed by all of us together to prepare our churches spiritually for action towards unity."

In November 1964 the first British conference on Faith and Order in Nottingham called on "the member churches of the British Council of Churches, in appropriate groupings such as nations, to covenant together to work and pray for the inauguration of union by a date agreed amongst them... Since unity, mission and renewal are inseparable, we invite the member churches to plan jointly so that all in each place may act together forthwith in mission and service to the world" (Unity Begins at Home, 77-78).

This quite spontaneous suggestion of covenanting came up against the history of the word in the great conflicts of the 17th century regarding Scottish covenanters and the puritans, and the word "covenant" was later replaced by the phrase "an act of commitment". However, six churches in Wales continued to have a joint covenant committee and to discuss "the implications of covenanting". The discussions in the British Isles have not produced any major breakthrough, apart from union of Reformed churches in England. But a significant number of joint congregations have demonstrated the will to live and witness together on the local level.

At the WCC's fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968), the section on "The Holy Spirit and the Catholicity of the Church", again not using the word "covenant", expressed its substance. It articulated "a fresh understanding of the unity of all Christians in all places. This calls the churches in all places to realize that they belong together and are called to act together. In a time when human interdependence is so evident, it is the more imperative to make visible the bonds which unite Christians in universal fellowship" (Uppsala Report, 17). More explicitly, the WCC's fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975) formulated the first of three guidelines for future WCC programmes as follows: "All programmes of the WCC should be conceived and implemented in a way which enables the member churches to grow towards a truly ecumenical, conciliar fellowship. In this respect, the programmes of the WCC should become living expressions of the covenant relationship among the churches within the WCC and foster growth towards fuller unity. These programmes should challenge the churches beyond the brokenness of our human situation as well as beyond the partial, incomplete character of our ecumenical efforts towards deeper sustained and sustaining relationships" (Breaking Barriers: Nairobi 1975, 297).

The clearest instance of discussions on church unity or "conciliar fellowship of local churches" where "covenant" emerged strongly was the Consultation on Church Union* (COCU) in the US. The scheme proposed in 1988 by and to nine churches was entitled: "Churches in Covenant Communion: The Church of Christ Uniting". The whole document was written as a covenant act and process. An explanatory pamphlet said: "It begins at a moment in time when church representatives stand together before God and the world and make promises to each other. It continues as a process of growing daily into deeper understanding and spiritual unity. God has made covenant with us in Jesus Christ, and has drawn us to God by cords of saving love. In grateful response to God's covenant with us, we make covenant with one another to live henceforth, not as strangers or competitors, but as one community in Christ – just as our Saviour prayed that we should. Covenanting is not an interim step towards eventual church union, because covenanting is itself a valid form of church union, though differing from the more traditional forms."

In the ecumenical movement and among the churches the covenant has been mentioned in terms of God's new covenant in Christ, which demands that, according to the WCC basis,* the churches "seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit". And that common calling is to renewal, unity, mission and service. At the WCC's sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983), one of the priority areas articulated for WCC programmes was: "To engage member churches in a conciliar process of mutual commitment (covenant) to justice, peace and the integrity of all creation... The foundation of this emphasis should be confessing Christ as the life of the world and Christian resistance to the demonic powers of death in racism, sexism, caste oppression, economic exploitation, militarism, violations of human rights, and the misuse of science and technology." Curiously, the word "covenant" was put in parenthesis.

The fact is that there was much debate about the use of the concept of covenant both during the assembly and in the years following. Nevertheless, the world convocation on "Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation" in Seoul in 1990 made several major affirmations "in responding anew to God's covenant". The convocation proposed as an "act of covenanting" examples of faithful action required for promoting justice, peace and the integrity of creation. It said: "They translate the response to God's covenant into acts of mutual commitment within the covenant community. The building of links of solidarity around specific issues and concerns, of networks of communication and support, is the most urgent priority for action today. This underlines the fact that the human response to God's covenant is a corporate act."

BIBLICAL FOUNDATION

It is clear that ecumenical thinking is still at an initial stage concerning the relation between covenants given by God, the human acceptance of them and, within that context, covenants made among human beings themselves. What, then, is the biblical foundation for an act of covenanting in response to God's covenant? The word "covenant" in the OT, berith, is related to various languages in the ancient Near East and has the general meaning of a strong reliable bond or treaty. But while there is abundant evidence of covenants as a normal feature of international relations, as demonstrated by Hittite records of the second millennium before Christ, only in the Bible is "covenant" used to describe the relations between God and humanity, and especially between God and Israel, old and new. God is always the true subject of covenants and lays down the conditions of the covenant, which are based on God's character as holy, righteous and merciful.

In the OT record, three covenants which God makes can be mentioned in the order in which they appear in scripture. The first is God's covenant with Noah before and after the flood which destroyed nearly all creation as a result of human corruption and violence on the earth. This primeval story speaks of God's everlasting covenant with the whole creation, the rainbow being the visible sign of God's grace (Gen. 6-9).

The second covenant is God seeking to create a people bound in faith and obedience, starting with the call to Abraham to go out to a land which he will be shown. God says he will make of Abraham "a great nation, and I will bless you... and in you all the families of the earth shall be blessed" (Gen. 12:2-3); and later: "I am God Almighty; walk before me, and be blameless... this is my covenant with you; You shall be the ancestor of a multitude of nations" (Gen. 17:1,4). This is the promise of the new humanity which exists by the blessing, shared empowerment and life in community.

The third covenant is the centrepiece of God's revelation to the people of Israel. When God rescued the people from Egypt and accompanied them through the wilderness, Moses went to the mountain, where he received the word of the Lord for the people: "You have seen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles' wings and brought you to myself. Now, therefore, if you obey my voice and keep my covenant, you shall be my treasured possession out of all the peoples. Indeed, the whole earth is mine, but you shall be for me a priestly kingdom and a holy nation" (Ex. 19:4-6). This covenant includes God's claim not only on the people of Israel but also on all the earth. The content to the covenant is given in the book of the covenant (Ex. 20-23), and particularly in the ten commandments (Ex. 20:1-17).

Four basic features of these commandments should be noted. (1) They are the proclamation of a fact. The people's existence derives solely from Yahweh, the One who has been present with them, hearing their cry and liberating them from slavery in Egypt, and leading them in the desert so that through the struggle and learning God's way they may become a people ready for God's service. That is the foundation and living reality of the covenant. (2) God demands as a consequence of this fact that they have no other gods, that they not give their allegiance to other powers or ideologies or styles of life. There must be no graven images or representations of God other than the constant awareness that they, like all human beings, bear the image and likeness of God. Nor must they try to manipulate God, for this is taking God's name in vain. (3) The covenant calls for the celebration of sabbath, which enables people to pause and recollect their place before God in creation and to follow a rhythm of respecting the identity of all creatures and the interdependence with them under God. This is further developed in the sabbath and Jubilee years, when the land is rested, prisoners and slaves are freed, the poor, the widows and strangers have a chance to share the fruit of the land, and all things have the state of shalom, of the imbalances being put right (Ex. 23:10-11; Lev. 25). (4) At the centre of the covenant is a solemn call to respect and maintain the integrity of all persons in the community as well as living creatures.

Faith in the one God remains faith only as it is practised in the way which is unfolded, and that means all realms of life. Faith is ethics, and ethics is faith. Faith means faithfulness to all that God demands in the covenant, which involves our relations with God, humanity and the rest of creation. It is this undivided character of faith and ethics which is sealed by the act of the covenant – the bond, obligation, disposition, commitment. The people offer their allegiance to keep the covenant, and blood is offered up to God and sprinkled on the people as a symbol of life, binding them together as a people to be witnesses in word and deed to the peoples of the world.

The subsequent history of this covenant people is the long drama of how they kept the covenant and renewed it from time to time (Deut. 31:9-13), and especially how they broke it, with disastrous consequences for themselves and for creation (e.g. Isa. 24:4-6). The prophets testified to the failure of Israel to live up to the covenant teaching. It was Jeremiah who saw that God would have to make a new covenant in which everyone, of whatever age or status, being forgiven, would know God and walk with God in a relationship of responsible faithfulness in their whole life and in creation (Jer. 31:31-34).

This new covenant is fulfilled in Jesus Christ,* who comes and calls people to a radical change of mind and attitude and to belief in the gospel of the kingdom of God* in righteousness, reminding the people that they cannot serve God and mammon (Mark 1:15; Matt. 6:24,33). It is he who embodies the covenant. In the dread hour of betrayal, he shares the paschal meal with his disciples: "This is my body that is for you... This cup is the new covenant in my blood" (1 Cor. 11:24-25; see eucharist); and in the presence of the destroying powers of the world at the cross, his blood is poured out for the life of the world. In communion* with him in his body and blood, Christians offer their body and blood for the life of the world, thus being an inseparable part of God's covenant to continue Christ's eucharistic ministry in creation* for justice and peace. This is done in the light of Christ's "new commandment" to love one another (John 13:34-35). The competence for doing this comes from God, “who has made us competent to be servants of a new covenant”, not in the written code (of the old covenant) but in the life-giving Spirit, in whose presence there is freedom (2 Cor. 3:4-6,17). This freedom in the Spirit means being part of a new creation in Christ entrusted with the ministry of reconciliation* (2 Cor. 5:17-20).

Thus although the covenant is a matter of God’s unmerited grace, it requires constant, loyal commitment in the daily realities of existence. And for the members of the worldwide Body of Christ, the church,* the commitment must be a mutual one carried out in a continuous process of taking counsel together on ways to be obedient to the covenant God.

COVENANTING

COVENANTING is a concept of visible church unity* that seeks to respond to the diversity of traditions within the unity Christ gives to and wills for the church. As a modified expression of organic union (see union, organic), it calls the churches to unite in “sacred things” (communio in sacris) – faith,* baptism,* eucharist,* ministry* and mission* – without organizational unity. In covenanting, each church maintains, for the present and as long as each church shall decide, its ecclesiastical structures, traditions, forms of worship and systems of ministerial placement. Nevertheless, in a solemn act the churches ask God through the Holy Spirit to create out of their separated lives a new ecclesial community committed to common mission in the world.

The first serious initiative towards covenanting as a model of reconciling divided churches came in Wales. Responding to a resolution from the British conference on Faith and Order in Nottingham in 1964, six Welsh churches formed the Joint Covenant Committee, which produced three documents: “The Call to Covenant” (1966), “Covenanting in Wales” (1968) and “Covenanting for Union in Wales” (1971), which included specific proposals. On 18 January 1975, the Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist and United Reformed churches in Wales made solemn covenant in worship “to work and pray in common obedience to our Lord Jesus Christ, in order that by the Holy Spirit we may be brought into one visible church to serve together in mission to the glory of God the Father”. The Welsh pattern is one of mutual recognition and common mission based on seven “recognitions”, namely of the same faith, of the same calling of God to serve all humanity, of already being in the one church of Jesus Christ, of common baptism and membership, of ordained ministries, of patterns of worship and sacramental life that are “manifestly gifts of Christ”, and of the same concern for church government. Since the covenanting act in 1975, the formation of a united church in Wales came closer with the publication of two consensus reports: “The Principles of Visible Unity in Wales” (1980) and “Ministry in a United Church: From Recognition to Reconciliation” (1986). In 1997 the Commission of the Covenanted Churches in Wales put forward a proposal for an “ecumenical bishop”.

In England the covenanting process began in 1973, when the United Reformed Church invited all Christian churches in England to develop a new approach to visible unity. Their Churches’ Unity Commission eventually articulated a proposal for covenanting in “Visible Unity: Ten Propositions” (1976). Five churches – Anglican, Disciples of Christ, Methodist, Moravian and United Reformed – then constituted the Churches’ Council for Covenanting, whose major document “Towards Visible Unity: Proposals for a Covenant” (1980) put forth their interim hope for unity. The English covenant shared similarities with the Welsh, including full recognition of each other as churches, the placement of their unity in the wider context of all churches, mutual recognition of each other’s baptism and members, receiving members of the covenanting churches at the eucharist, acceptance of one another's ministries as "true ministries of word and sacrament in the holy catholic church", and commitment to common ordinations in the future using a common ordinal. Additional dimensions were to include, following the lead of the WCC Faith and Order commission, the development of processes of joint decision making, a respect for the rights of conscience* and freedom of thought and action. However, when the churches voted in 1982, the Methodists, Disciples of Christ and United Reformed voted affirmatively, but the Church of England failed to win final approval when the proposals missed by only a few votes to secure the required two-thirds majority in the house of clergy of the general synod.

The covenanting concept was endorsed during this same period in several commonwealth countries, usually after an impasse had been reached on plans of structural union. Activity, mostly short-lived, took place in Ghana, Sri Lanka, Zimbabwe and Aotearoa New Zealand. None produced lasting fruits, especially as Anglicans turned away from intimate ecclesial relations with Protestants and became preoccupied with possible reconciliation with the Roman Catholic Church.

Learning from their Welsh and English brothers and sisters, the US churches in the US Consultation on Church Union* (COCU) developed another variation of covenanting. The nine churches of COCU – Episcopal, Disciples, Presbyterian, United Methodist, African-American Methodists (AME, AME Zion, and CME), United Church of Christ, Community Churches – based their proposals for a united future on two documents: "The COCU Consensus" (1984) and "The Churches in Covenant Communion: The Church of Christ Uniting" (1989), both deeply indebted to the WCC's convergence text Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.* COCU proposed eight elements of covenanting: claiming unity in faith, mutual recognition of one another's members in one baptism, mutual recognition of each other as churches, commitment to become an inclusive church (by race and gender), mutual recognition and reconciliation of ordained ministry, establishing regular eucharistic fellowship, engaging together in mission and evangelism, and forming appropriate structures of mutual accountability and decision making. While definitely not duplicating the various continuing denominational structures, the "councils of oversight", varying in composition and operation from place to place, were to exercise leadership in the covenanting process "as member churches move forward year by year into deeper unity in Christ". The essential dimensions of "covenanting" became encompassed under the language of "koinonia ecclesiology" used in recent F&O conversations, and bilateral dialogues. The aim has been to express the visible unity of the church without merging structures, and to hold together the authentic diversity of churches in koinonia.

In 1999 COCU's 18th plenary in St Louis was faced with the resistance of two churches to move forward towards covenant communion. The Presbyterian Church (USA) failed to give approval when "Churches in Covenant Communion", the primary vision document, was not sustained in the required majority of presbyteries. The historic Reformed hesitancy about the office of bishop flared up in a new generation. The Episcopal Church also expressed hesitancy to enter into full communion, when other COCU churches seemed uncertain about a reconciled ministry of deacons, presbyters and bishops in apostolic succession – a consensus point since the beginnings of COCU. It was also clear that many Episcopalians seemed predisposed towards their concordat with the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, while others exclusively preferred their dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church.

In a strategic move the St Louis plenary decided to remove, for the time being, the proposal for the mutual recognition and reconciliation of ordained ministries and to claim the other seven elements as the basis for entering into a new relationship under the new name of Churches Uniting in Christ (CUIC). At the same time, the participating communions were to pledge in their common life to combat energetically the pervasive racism that marginalizes and divides people and churches in the US and throughout the world. All nine churches were by the summer of 2001 to vote on entering into this expression of church unity. The CUIC would, it was hoped, be inaugurated 18-22 January – during the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity – in 2002. In the meantime, a special commission started working towards a common theological understanding of the ministry of oversight – personal, collegial and corporate – in a way that invites universal recognition by other churches. CUIC did in fact come into being in January 2002.

As its brief history reveals, covenanting is not a magic formula. In some instances and places it was unachievable; in a few places it goes forward with promise and hope. As with all other models of unity, the decisions necessary to sustain covenant communion are often affected more by historical burdens and non-theological factors than by the adequacy of the concept. Its value lies in the commitment to bind divided churches in an undeniable, visible unity as a sign of God's unity given in Jesus Christ for the whole world.

CREATION

IMPLICIT in the confession of the Judao-Christian tradition that the world is God's creation are a number of fundamental themes, most of which recur explicitly or as assumptions in the literature of the ecumenical movement. Among these, the following may be named:

Purposeful: To designate the world as creation is to deny that it is either random or value-neutral. While the tradition does not find its redemptive principle within creation as such, it does assume the purposefulness of the created order.

Contingent, yet distinct: The creation is wholly dependent upon its Creator, yet it is not an emanation; and in relation to God it is both "other" and internally comprehensive.

In essence, "good": Despite its forthrightness with respect to evil, the tradition insists on the essential goodness of creation as the work of God. In the words of the WCC's Evanston assembly (1954), "this world, disfigured and distorted as it is, is still God's world. It is his creation, in which he is at work, and which he sustains in being until the day when the glory of his new creation will fully appear."

Made out of nothing: The dogma creatio ex nihilo, officially formulated at the fourth Lateran council of 1215 (though appearing as early as 2 Macc.), denies the assumption of pre-existent matter and therefore, at least in theory, curbs the persistent "religious" temptation to attribute evil to materiality.

Reflecting divine commitment: That the world is God's own work suggests the continuing commitment of the Creator to creation. While this implication of creation theology has frequently been neglected or underdeveloped, it is a rudimentary assumption of biblical faith, is foundational for the doctrines of providence and creatio continua and is confirmed by the central affirmation of Christian faith – the incarnation of the Word. In its deliberations and documents, the WCC has frequently drawn upon this assumption, e.g., “God has not abandoned this world... He rules and over-rules its tangled history... The world in which we... live is the world that God has loved from all eternity in Jesus Christ” (Evanston).

Confessional: Belief in creation is not based upon scientific observation or philosophical speculation. As in the historic creeds, the epistemological presupposition of all creation theology is faith* in God.

PROBLEMS ASSOCIATED WITH THE DOCTRINE

Like every area of Christian teaching, the doctrine of creation is attended by inherent or acquired ideas and practices which must be regarded as problematic. A responsible theology must be aware of the real and potential distortions which result from such problems as the following three.

Especially in the 19th and 20th centuries, in reaction to modern methods of scriptural analysis as well as the impact of the natural sciences, biblical literalism has marred the discussion of creation. Taking the Genesis creation sagas as literal accounts of the world's beginnings, many Christians (esp. in North America) have entered into conflict with the advocates of other theories, notably the theory of evolution (see creationism).

This approach is linked with a second recurring problem, namely the tendency to consider creation an event rather than a process. Moreover, the event in question is pictured as a past event – something which occurred long ago, at the beginning of time, and was almost immediately distorted by “the fall”. While such conceptualization sustains a theoretical confession of creation, it is almost wholly lacking in existential import. Furthermore, when combined (as it often is) with a strong emphasis on “personal salvation”, it easily leads to a third problematic area: the tendency to regard salvation* as salvation from the world.

Although Christological and Trinitarian theology links creation and redemption, there has always been a temptation in and around Christendom to “spiritualize” the doctrine of redemption and thus to supersede creation. This is historically associated with Gnostic and other forms of world denigration, yet its roots are deeper than these influences, involving perhaps the most subtle form of sin* – the abhorrence and rejection of our creaturehood.

A “NEW” PROBLEM: ANTHROPOCENTRISM

The theological emphases of the WCC have demonstrated a consistent sensitivity to the problems just enumerated. Ecumenical Christianity has generally fostered responsible scholarship with respect to biblical interpretation; it has been open to process theology and other modern schools of thought, including modern physics, which have helped to replace static with dynamic views of the universe; e.g. the Uppsala assembly report (1968) states that “the Living God [is] the creative force within everything that is constantly renewing all things”. Above all it has accentuated the world as the locus of God's redemptive activity, thus combating the otherworldliness of much conventional religion.

Within recent decades, another problematic dimension of the Christian concept of creation has surfaced in a conspicuous way, and a cursory examination of WCC literature demonstrates that ecumenical thought has not been as sensitive in this area. In the light of contemporary threats to the natural world, Christianity in general seems to have concentrated so wholeheartedly upon the well-being of the human creature that it has fostered a civilization whose “manifold crisis” (C.F. von Weizsäcker) is in part its apparently inevitable propensity to befoul and destroy its natural environment.*

Many contemporary environmentalists have accepted the accusation of historian Lynn White Jr that the Judeo-Christian tradition, accentuating, as it seems to do, the “dominion” of the human being over all of nature, contains “the historical roots of our ecological crisis”. While as historical analysis such an explanation must be deemed simplistic, it cannot be taken lightly by contemporary Christians. One must at least ask whether some 20th-century voices in the ecumenical discussion were not too eager to celebrate modern secularity and Western technology.

Secularism reduces the natural order to a one-dimensionality devoid both of mystery and meaning. Eager to accentuate human dignity and responsibility and to avoid the hint of pantheism, Christian theologians have sometimes failed to discern the dangerous overtones of their affirmation of secularity. Read against the backdrop of present-day concern for the environment, a statement like the following (from the preparatory essays for the 1966 Geneva conference on "Church and Society") re-inforces the need for theology to be vigilant with respect to the negative aspects of its own positive pronouncements: "The biblical story... secularizes nature. It places creation – the physical world – in the context of the covenant relation and does not try to understand it apart from that relation. The history of God with his people has a setting and this setting is created nature. But the movement of history, not the structure of the setting, is central to reality. Physical creation even participates in this history; its timeless or cyclical character, so far as it exists, is unimportant. The physical world, in other words, does not have its meaning in itself. There are no spirits at work in it which can help or harm mankind. It is the creation of God alone and is the object of his manipulation" (The Church amid Revolution).

Since the secular mentality offers no opposition to the technological society, it is not surprising that the same mood which permitted the WCC and other Christian agencies to celebrate "the secular city" simultaneously regarded Western technology (see science and technology) uncritically, sometimes indeed in almost salvific terms – and did so on the basis of a type of creation theology. E.g.: "The traditional Christian doctrine of creation is an obvious basis for the view that God acts in and upon nature. It teaches that nature is both to be dominated by man and to be offered to man's contemplation and awe... Nature is under both the providence of God and the mastery of men... We cannot and we must not speak of nature apart from human perception in the historical development of knowledge, since man gives meaning to nature, as the only being called by God to name, to keep and to use nature; as such, he is the crown of creation. In this sense the comprehension of nature is theologically anthropocentric... Jewish and Christian theology... has thus freed men for their critical examination of natural phenomena. They can proceed with scientific and technical research and development without fear of being impious or guilty of desecration. It is this deification or de-sacralization of nature which is one basic starting point of true science and of its results in technology" (Christians in the Technical and Social Revolutions of Our Time, 1967).

The same document does go on to speak of human "stewardship" of nature;* yet in making the language of stewardship almost synonymous with that of mastery, it evokes a posture which seems calculated to confirm the worst suspicions of scientists and environmentalists who link technocracy and Christian anthropocentrism: "'Subdue the earth and have dominion,' God says to man (Gen. 1:28). What does this mean? Does God give man the vocation of controlling or dominating the world which he puts at man's disposal? Yes. Moreover, God puts no limit upon man's dominion or control over nature except that it has to be fulfilled under God's lordship: it is man's mastery and God's lordship. Man is responsible to use his stewardship of nature to make possible a fuller human life for all mankind; in this way he regains his original God-given destiny for which Christ dies and has risen... Man is both the master and the steward of nature."

In a similar vein, the deliberations at the third assembly (New Delhi 1961) seemed prepared to embrace the technological mindset – or at least to see no negating potentiality within technology itself: "For Christians, who recognize that Christ is Lord of the mind, so that all that has been rightly discovered belongs to us, there cannot conceivably be any kind of choice between science and religious faith. For science is essentially a method of discovering facts about nature and ordering them and interpreting them within a conceptual pattern. Pure science is concerned with the body of knowledge thus acquired; technology with the useful application of this scientific knowledge and technique. The nature that scientists investigate is part of God's creation; the truth they discover is part of God's truth; the abilities they use are God-given. The Christian should welcome scientific discoveries as new steps in man's dominion over nature."

While the anthropological and technological optimism of such pronouncements has usually been qualified in WCC circles by reference to such unavoidable aspects of the Tradition as the doctrine of human sin,* for a long time the Council, like most other Christian bodies, did not exercise a critical regard for its possible over-emphasis on the human creature or (more to the point) explore the Judaeo-Christian tradition for its positive and independent valuation of extra-human creation.

"THE INTEGRITY OF CREATION"

The recognition of this neglect inspired – and in turn was stimulated by – the decision of the Vancouver assembly (1983) "to engage member churches in a conciliar process of mutual commitment (covenant) to justice, peace and the integrity of creation" (JPIC). Exploration of the integrity of creation was expedited by the growing urgency of the multifaceted crisis of the environment and the recognition by many Christian scholars of the important contributions the tradition has to make to the search for new and better human attitudes towards the earth and its myriad creatures.

Meeting in Amsterdam in 1987, a small group of scientists and theologians reflected on this facet of the JPIC theme and achieved remarkable unanimity both in their assessment of the problem ("the disintegration of creation") and the pertinence of neglected dimensions of the Christian tradition for "reintegrating God's creation". Their report drew on the biblical metaphor of stewardship, but in contradistinction to the earlier reference cited above assumed the solidarity of the human "steward" with all the creatures for whom the steward is responsible and deplored the language of mastery, which "not only ignores the most rudimentary theology of the biblical Tradition, which attributes sovereignty to God alone (Calvin), but bypasses as well the Tradition's most salient anthropology, which confesses on the one hand the permanent accountability of the human creature... and on the other is consistent in attributing human pretension to sovereignty to rank sin and disobedience."

A subsequent consultation in Granvollen, Norway, in 1988 produced similar conclusions: "The drive to have 'mastery' over creation has resulted in the senseless exploitation of natural resources, the alienation of the land from people and the destruction of indigenous cultures. It ignores the experience of oppressed peoples like the blacks and women who suffer under its weight. It also undermines other highly developed systems of scientific, religious and philosophical thought. For example, Western medicine as it developed and spread over the world began to supplant indigenous systems of medicine which have a more holistic approach to health care and healing."

For the first time in any consistent manner, such documents demonstrated the church's readiness to consider the creation for its own sake and not only as the setting for the human drama. There is even a sense in which the human creature is a late and perhaps a reluctant participant in a creational glory which precedes and vastly transcends its own consciousness: "Creation came into being by the will and love of the Triune God, and as such it possesses an inner cohesion and goodness. Though human eyes may not always discern it, every creature and the whole creation in chorus bear witness to the glorious unity and harmony with which the creation is endowed. And when our human eyes are opened and our tongues unloosed, we too learn how to praise and participate in the life, love, power and freedom that is God's continuing gift and grace" (Granvollen, 16).

FUTURE PERSPECTIVES

Clearly, the question ecumenical Christianity will have to address in this area of theology is whether the biblical and traditional bases of the faith are able to sustain a "theology of nature" which can function both critically – as a prophetic critique of the rampant technocratic manipulation and rape of the natural order – and as a source of vision and courage for the development of alternative conceptions of the relation between God, humanity and extra-human creation. To achieve this, it will be necessary for Christians to overcome the abiding ambiguity about the world which has tempted them to distinguish too sharply between nature and grace,* secular and sacred, creation and "new creation", and to entertain doctrines of salvation which in effect bypass this world. Creation can no longer be treated as a mere preliminary to the gospel story. In a context comprising enormous threats to the future of the planet, the hope of the gospel must be articulated as the redemption of creation itself.

CREATIONISM

THOUGH all Christians are creationists in the sense of believing that God created the universe, the term "creationism" now generally refers to the belief that, contrary to theories of naturalistic or theistic evolution, the world was created in the relatively recent past in six 24-hour days and suffered a universal flood as described in the biblical account in Genesis.

After the publication of Darwin's Origin of Species in 1859, many Christians – including conservative Protestants – gradually came to accept some form of theistic evolution. Following the first world war, however, fundamentalists in the United States, led by William Jennings Bryan, pressed to ban the teaching of biological evolution in the schools. This movement climaxed in the famous Scopes "Monkey Trial" of 1925. Negative publicity in the national press dealt a serious blow to the anti-evolution movement and led to its gradual demise.

In its narrow contemporary form, creationism, or "creation science", was developed primarily by Henry Morris. Morris and like-minded fundamentalists, following the lead of George McCready Price (1870-1963), seek scientific evidence for a young earth and a worldwide flood. Hence, contrary to many earlier fundamentalists, such as Bryan, who allowed for an old earth and perhaps even some evolution of lower life-forms, creation scientists deny all biological evolution. Dissatisfied with the increasing acceptance of theistic evolution in the American Scientific Affiliation, an organization of fundamentalist and evangelical scientists founded in 1941, Morris founded the Creation Research Society in 1963, which helped to spawn a number of related organizations. Beginning in the 1970s, creation scientists promoted legislation, sometimes with temporary success, to require US public schools to give equal time to "scientific creationism" as a balance to the teaching of biological evolution. Many other Christians, including mainline Protestants, many evangelicals, and Roman Catholics, opposed such legislation and attempts to limit the term "creationism" to a literalistic reading of Genesis. Though generated principally in the US, creationism has been spread around the globe by its adherents.

CREEDS

FOR THE RESTORATION of the full communion* of Christians, a common confession of the faith* will be an essential prerequisite. From the very beginning of the modern ecumenical movement, with the Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral (1888),* it has been recognized that the classic creeds, notably the Apostles’* and the Nicene* creeds, are the most common ecumenical formulation and the most appropriate. While the WCC is not authorized by its member churches to compose or propose a creed to the churches, studies “Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today” assist the churches in their pilgrimage towards full reconciliation.* This article treats the definition and use of creeds, their role in the ecumenical movement and issues being addressed today in connection with them.

Before the text of the New Testament itself was received, and as these texts were being brought together in the early church, short formulations were in use as elements in initiation and instruction and occasionally as authentication of orthodoxy (see 1 Cor. 12:3; Phil. 2:11; Rom. 10:9; 1 John 4:2-3,15). Such formulations were sometimes spontaneous acclamations or homologia; in other cases they took the form of summaries of elements affirmed to be essential for Christian initiation or evangelical witness. They represent a personal testimony of continuity with the faith of the apostles and communion with the church* into which one was being baptized. Often they bear the character of prayers or hymns.

As creeds emerged in the liturgical practice of the church, their structure was Trinitarian. While the formulas may have differed from local church to local church, their character and content were rather consistent. The word “symbol” is often used for these early creeds.

In the patristic period, after the reception of the biblical canon* and the liberation from persecution, creeds of initiation became useful vehicles for a common confession of faith. This function was particularly important in the early councils (325, 381, 431, 451). Later councils likewise put forward affirmations as formulations of, then as criteria for, the authentic confession of the apostolic faith. Confessions, or confessional statements of the faith, gained particular importance during the Reformation,* when they served the functions both of clarification and differentiation on the one hand and of uniting the confessing parties on the other.

In some branches of the Reformation, covenants* became the primary mode of formulating the faith in a similar fashion to creeds and confessions. These covenants are rooted in the experience of confession found in the Hebrew scriptures and play a credal function in congregations and churches. Elements of the Free church and Pentecostal traditions claim to have “no creed but scripture”; however, careful listening to the worship, preaching and hymnody of these communities discloses both fundamental affirmations and often tests of orthodoxy which are no less specific and not necessarily any more biblical than those of churches affirming the Nicene Creed.

The early use of creeds was in the rites of Christian initiation. From these baptismal formulas the church drew the formulations put forth in the early councils. The purpose of the creeds in the life of the early conciliar fellowship was to provide common affirmations that also excluded anything judged unacceptable as a formulation of the apostolic faith. They were thus contextual expressions of the biblical faith, in a particular time and place. Their use to bind the ecumenical family together in affirmations about the Trinity* and incarnation* precedes their use as tests of orthodoxy or impositions by secular authorities.

From the earliest times, credal differences have featured in the church divisions that give urgency to the ecumenical movement. The formulations of Chalcedon*(451) were rejected by the Armenians, Syrians and Copts, giving rise to a schism between churches now spoken of as Oriental Orthodox* and the rest of the Christian world. The Western insertion of the phrase “and from the Son” (*filioque**) into the Nicene Creed – adopted, only after long resistance by the Roman church probably in the year 1014 – has been an element in the continuing schism* between East and West. Certain Free churches and Quakers have considered the “imposition” of creeds a church-dividing issue; others express doubts about whether the content of the creeds is really affirmed by those who confess them liturgically.

Once formulated, the classic creeds came to function as theological summaries and as such supplied the outline of theological treatises. Thus the Nicene Creed – and in the West the Apostles' Creed – formed the structure around which much of systematic theology was built. The familiarity of the creeds from their doxological affirmation in worship* enabled them to serve admirably as a focus for synthetic theological reflection. Similarly, in areas of fresh evangelization, they became the framework for catechetical instruction. Beyond this normal use for evangelical witness, prayer and teaching, they were also used as instruments of social control and ecclesiastical scrutiny where the state* was engaged as the instrument for ensuring orthodoxy.

The ecumenical role of the classic creeds has been affirmed by both sides at the time of the Reformation and thereafter. Luther and Calvin insisted on the credal basis of their confessional reforms, and the Anglican Articles of Religion and Book of Common Prayer are clear about their credal orthodoxy. However, the interpretation of these creeds and the church's role in this – as with the interpretation of scripture – continue to be an element of ecumenical discussion, only gradually moving towards resolution.

In the 19th century, both the World's Evangelical Alliance* and the Anglican bishops at Lambeth made the role of the credal affirmations central to the call for reconciliation and common evangelical collaboration. In the Faith and Order movement, credal discussions had taken a central place from the beginning. At the New Delhi assembly (1961), building on the Toronto statement*(1950), the WCC incorporated central elements of the Nicene affirmation into its own basis* of membership (notably the Trinitarian formula "Father, Son and Holy Spirit", and the phrase "according to the scriptures").

The classic credal affirmations and their use in worship have been an important element in progress towards reconciliation in both bilateral discussions and church union negotiations. Discussions with non-credal churches have likewise begun to show a common ground in the Trinitarian faith which is affirmed by these communities, though not often in the liturgical and confessional forms used by the classic Orthodox, Protestant, Anglican and Roman Catholic churches. These affirmations are being taken most seriously, and the non-credal churches are reassessing the usefulness of the classical formulations in a new context. Often the history of the rejection of credal formulations does not lie in their content so much as in their use by states for coercion or by ecclesiastical institutions not judged to be serious about their content.

Throughout history, but especially since the Reformation, churches and individuals have seen fit from time to time to set forth their faith in confessional statements adapted to the times in which they live. This often happens out of a sense of crisis, as in the confessions of the Reformation. Such statements can become ways of clarifying the faith of a community and producing unity. Among Protestants, those in the Reformed tradition have been more prone to produce new confessions than other Christians.

In recent centuries the ethical context has been of particular importance in eliciting confessions or creeds, as with Hitler's Germany or apartheid* in South Africa. If one notes the history of the 4th and 5th centuries closely, the ethical and social vigour is no less present in those earlier affirmations; likewise, the doxological and orthodox character of many contemporary formulations elicited by the ethical urgency of the gospel stands up well when compared with the classic formulations.

As the churches join the pilgrimage towards that unity* to which they are called in the gospel of Jesus Christ, unity of confession will be essential if a true conciliar fellowship is to be realized. The different approaches to creeds, their relationship to church fellowship and to authority, the means for recognizing the apostolic faith in a creed and for recognizing one another as churches authentically confessing this apostolic faith, the sufficiency or adequacy of any formulations of the faith, and the limits of diversity in the interpretation of these formulations are all elements to be considered in fidelity to God's will for Christian unity.

The WCC has provided a commentary on the Nicene Creed, Confessing the One Faith, that may contribute to the day when the churches can confess together their common apostolic faith. Many national councils have produced studies contributing to this credal basis for unity.

CRITICISM OF THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT AND OF THE WCC

DURING the second half of the 20th century, the ecumenical movement has become increasingly polycentric as a network of relations between Christians and the churches. The movement as such is now so much wider and deeper than any of its structured expressions that to articulate constructive or negative criticisms has become more and more complicated. Christians from diverse backgrounds – confessional, geographical, cultural and political – have met in a bewildering variety of ecumenical forums. The agendas sooner or later touch on almost every divisive issue within and between the churches. Agreements, convergences and differences ultimately come into sharper relief. A position which favours or claims one point of view may provoke objections within church constituencies or even from people who are not affiliated with any church but feel confident to prescribe what the church should say or do, especially in public arenas. Some of these criticisms are based on deliberate or unintended caricatures and judgments shaped from a distance.

The WCC, which remains the most visible international expression of the ecumenical movement, has since its foundation in 1948 been subject to diverse and sometimes contradictory criticisms, from both within and outside its constituencies. And it is often the focal point for judgments on the ecumenical vision, motivations, intermediate goals, activities and institutional forms. Many critics, strongly committed to ecumenism and to the WCC, voiced their remarks at the WCC's invitation during the process of study and consultation "Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the WCC" between 1989 and 1997, and during the discussions of the report at the eighth assembly (Harare 1998).

For the purposes of this entry, criticisms of the ecumenical movement and the WCC are divided into four general categories: theological, ecclesiological, political and institutional.

THEOLOGICAL CRITICISM

The main flaw in the present ecumenical movement, some contend, is the juxtaposition of so many varied visions, often flawed and limited, of what church unity is. As a result there is a potpourri of criteria by which ecumenical advances and breakthroughs, standstills and setbacks are identified. An ecumenical "success" for one is considered a "failure" by another. Consider, for example, the opposing reactions within and between churches to women priests and bishops, to the introduction of "inclusive language" into the Bible and liturgy, or to the permissibility of abortion.

Although no church equates church unity* with a uniformity that goes beyond revealed essentials, some nevertheless fear an underlying ecumenical yearning for a future church so monolithic and well-organized that the free, unsolicited promptings of the Holy Spirit* and the exercise of the Spirit's diverse gifts throughout the grassroots will be stifled by the weight of a church modelled as a multinational religious corporation – a globalized Coca-Cola, with the same product, the same packaging, the same slogan and the same management techniques in every culture.

Other critics suggest that the underlying ecumenical motivation is political expediency in the face of dwindling congregations – and funds. Or more radically, that the impetus towards the reunion of denominations is not the product of evangelistic zeal, fervently held doctrinal convictions and biblical spirituality, but weariness of and scepticism about the real value of denominational systems; it is considered “a response to this sense of being about to become extinct, rather than to any zeal for union as such” (Malcolm Muggeridge, 1970).

The search for unity, some contend, is covering a multitude of sins by soft-peddalling theological barriers in favour of organizational unity based on cooperative social action. A persistent emphasis in study documents on what already unites the churches papers over what theologically really separates or should separate them. Church unity is exalted at the expense of truth. A Scottish critic called the ecumenical movement “the greatest disaster to affect the Christian church this century. It has reduced the professing churches of this country to a collection of bloodless, spineless and boneless organizations, which can hardly raise a whimper on the side of Christ and his truth.”

In 1948, a month before the WCC’s first assembly, delegates of 58 conservative Evangelical, mostly fundamentalist, churches in 29 countries formed the International Council of Christian Churches, in order “to stand against the WCC”. Though small in numbers, the ICCC continues to reflect widespread extreme conservative Protestant charges against the WCC: its theological error in failing to uphold biblical infallibility, and its betrayal of Protestantism in accepting Orthodox membership and cooperation with the Roman Catholic Church. Many Protestant fundamentalists justify the distance they keep from all ecumenical groups by appealing to the biblical prohibition of alliance with unbelievers (see Fundamentalists).

Other critics of councils of churches in general, and the WCC in particular, focus on what is judged to be a failure to hold together in balanced tension major theological items on the Christian agenda. In the case of the WCC, while some charge that doctrinal (“faith and order”) issues are subordinated to “social” (“life and work”) concerns, others hold the reverse: the WCC is too “church”.

The 1961 integration of the International Missionary Council* into the WCC was intended to place the concern of mission, especially direct evangelism,* into the very centre of the WCC’s life. Indeed, several statements balance mission-in-unity and unity-in-mission, such as the central committee’s 1982 “Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation”. But critics claim that the WCC, including its Commission on World Mission and Evangelism, minimize or even ignore the explicit verbal proclamation of the gospel to the millions who have never been challenged to accept Jesus Christ as Lord and personal Saviour.

This questioning of the WCC’s commitment to direct evangelism took on a new divisive dimension with growing WCC involvement in interfaith dialogues.* Does not the very fact of such dialogues dull the edge of Christian witness and lead even to “religious syncretism”? This line of thinking has led many evangelical Christians, in member or non-member churches or in para-church groups, to remain aloof from the WCC and to support other world mission forums, such as the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization* and the World Evangelical Fellowship*.

Some critics link this de-emphasis of direct evangelism with the “liberal theology” which they claim dominates the WCC. Such theology, they believe, has too optimistic a view of human nature; a view of sin* that focuses too much on the subtle evils embedded in the institutions and structures of society, and not enough on downright sinful persons; and too uncritical a faith in the ever-progressing human potential for bringing in the kingdom of God.*

Even in Faith and Order studies, what is regarded by some as strength in convergence is seen by others as weakness. Some churches in the Reformation tradition see in the 1982 WCC document Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* a “catholicizing” tendency which they say subordinates the word to the sacraments or so emphasizes the special ministry of the ordained that the ministry of ordinary believers is belittled. On the other hand, many Orthodox complain that too many ecumenical theological concerns and approaches are essentially Western (Protestant or Roman Catholic) and thus foreign to the Eastern traditions, e.g., grace and sacrament, faith and works, creation and redemption. Or that while F&O theologians are clearing away old doctrinal disputes, new potential fissures arise around pressing personal and social moral issues, especially in the areas of sexuality (e.g. homosexuality), the right to life of the unborn and euthanasia.

ECCLIOLOGICAL CRITICISM

Never-ending discussions of the nature of the WCC as a vehicle or instrument of church unity have always been complex and generally inconclusive. Some charges endure despite repeated WCC disavowals from its earliest years: that the WCC aspires to be a “super-church”; that its statements and public declarations carry any more authority than “their intrinsic wisdom”; that WCC membership implies accepting a specific doctrine concerning the nature of church unity. Some attack the WCC basis* as such. It is not credal, it does not specify enough of the non-negotiable elements of the Christian faith, e.g., baptism. Others object to the fact that even though every member church “expresses agreement with the basis” as a condition of membership, the WCC does not verify this assent. This is a root of the “separatist” argument that affiliation with the WCC is biblically compromising.

Others criticize the fundamental structure of WCC membership. This objection comes typically from traditions which stress that the body of Christ becomes one and visible “from below” as local congregations gather around the word and sacrament, whereas most international confessional and ecumenical structures, including the WCC, presume national churches as the basic building blocks of church unity. This national structure, claim some in the “historic peace churches”,* is why the WCC has never taken a theologically consistent stand against war in any modern form.

Traditional ecumenical organizations include only a limited sampling of Christian diversity, and despite good intentions have so far found that their tents are too small for the rapidly growing Pentecostal, conservative evangelical Protestant, independent and indigenous new churches. One such critic has called for “the next ecumenical movement with Christian unity as its clear focus and wide inclusivity its method” (M. Heim).

Some argue that the WCC’s structure as a council of churches prevents it from duly acknowledging the prophetic contributions to social justice, peace and works of mercy by Christian communities and movements, whether confessional or transdenominational. Yet others claim that the WCC and other ecumenical bodies employ too many “prophets” – elite lobbyists for single causes who are inexperienced in congregational life and in direct church governance – and not enough “pastoral, priestly, churchly” types. Consequently, the image is created of a movement too far ahead of the average laity, clergy and hierarchy who make up its constituency – and of writing them off too easily.

POLITICAL CRITICISM

In 1948 the Russian Orthodox Church and the Eastern European Orthodox churches which followed its lead decided not to join the WCC (many did so later, in 1961). Its real aim, they declared, was the formation of an “ecumenical church” with political power rather than “the reunion of the churches by spiritual ways and means”. Continuing objections to WCC political stands often accompany charges that, to the contrary, the WCC has increasingly subordinated concerns of church unity to immediate social, political and economic issues.

This is “secular ecumenism”. Such negative, even contradictory reactions to WCC political involvement go back to the very first assembly in 1948. The assembly’s less than enthusiastic assessment of capitalism* prompted the Wall Street Journal to call the critique “Marxist-inspired”, though the assembly’s equally severe criticism of communism inspired Marxist interpretations of ecumenism as “an ideological struggle to integrate modern theology and bourgeois ideology within the ecumenical framework, testifying to the deepening crisis in contemporary social thought and bourgeois society’s inner life” (Yuri Kryanev, 1983).

The allegation that the political stance of the WCC is “leftist” is common, especially in Western circles. Such criticisms became strident in the late 1970s and 1980s with widely publicized charges that many ecumenical bodies were giving money from unwitting church members to radical revolutionary and often violent Marxist causes and even to armed groups. Especially controversial were 1978 grants by the WCC Programme to Combat Racism* to armed movements which were trying to topple white minority rule in Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe). Critics called this “blood money”.

From the other end of the political spectrum, in 1961 Beijing’s People’s Daily called the integration of the IMC and the WCC a “new strategy of American imperialistic missionary enterprise”; this interpretation reflected an estrangement which dates back to the 1950 WCC central committee’s commendation of the United Nations’ “police action” in Korea. National political leaders accused the WCC of encouraging the 1956 popular uprising in Hungary, and in the late 1980s of supporting the workers’ revolt in Poland. In the 1980s Brazilian landowners who were exploiting Indian lands described WCC support for the land rights of the Indian population as a conspiracy with Western interests to deny Brazil’s sovereignty over its own country. And in the tangle of Middle Eastern politics, all sides have criticized the WCC, and often blame it for activities of Christian groups, in and outside the region, with which the Council has no connection whatever.

A more general objection is that ecumenical bodies such as the WCC exhibit “selective indignation” in political stands, including human rights violations, e.g. explicitly condemning the suppression of Christians’ rights to religious freedom in Islamic North Africa, but remaining largely silent about the corruption of some political and church leaders elsewhere in Africa.

For more than 40 years, the cold war* sharpened the polemical edge of criticisms of political positions taken by the WCC and other ecumenical bodies. In the West, annoyance and suspicions were raised by the vigorous critiques of the capitalist way of life and politics voiced by a growing number of church leaders in the South in WCC forums; and little credence was given to their claims, in the bipolar geo-political context, to represent a “non-aligned” voice. The entry and visibility of churches from Eastern Europe (especially the Russian Orthodox Church, which has the largest membership of any WCC church) fed suspicions of infiltration by agents of Soviet and other intelligence services. At the same time, there were repeated criticisms that the WCC, zealous to denounce human rights violations by right-wing military dictatorships around the world, was unaccountably and culpably silent about the oppression of totalitarian communist rulers and remained unmoved and inactive in the face of the persecution of Christian dissidents at their hands.

The end of the cold war and the opening of massive files from these intelligence agencies, especially the Soviet KGB and Stasi in the former German Democratic Republic, re-launched the debate about the relations of ecumenical bodies, especially the WCC, with the officially authorized church representatives from these countries during the 1960s, 1970s and 1980s. Within the countries of the former Soviet bloc, in turn, some church leaders come under pressure for having been too influenced by the communist governments of this period, and this has contributed to a more general anti-ecumenical climate in these countries.

Some critics are proposing that ecumenical bodies should refrain from making public statements on international issues, arguing that they try too quickly to analyze conflicts and propose unworkable solutions and that their “instant expertise” smacks of Christian arrogance. In any case, some would say, it is impossible to maintain a balanced stance that is comprehensively forthright about the flaws and wrongdoings, the strengths and right actions of all governments, political parties and movements.

INSTITUTIONAL CRITICISM

As the ecumenical movement has evolved, some observers say that institutionalization has blurred its original vision and somewhat frozen the movement. Ecumenical bodies are said unwittingly to preserve and even strengthen the status quo; they satisfy the majority of the members, including the leaders, who prefer the closed autonomy of denominations to church unity, yet who want to be “ecumenical” cafeteria-style – opting for some activities with some members. The main structural flaw, some argue, is not in fact in the ecumenical bodies but in their member churches, which are not structured to receive the full service of national councils or the WCC. Furthermore, membership in such councils is no guarantee that authentic ecumenical thinking, attitudes and practices deeply affect the majority of Christians. In fact, they did not do so, even in those churches that pioneered the movement decades ago. Ecumenical bodies are pastorally to help a minority movement grow, not to comfort the majority in cosy indifference or adamant standstills.

On the other hand, committed Christians do criticize large ecumenical structures, such as the WCC, in order to help those instruments achieve their stated goals. Airing differences is a ministry of healing in a forum for churches from so many different confessional, cultural, political, social, economic and linguistic contexts. And such forums are a test of Christian patience with institutions. Some churches – especially perhaps the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox churches – are faulted for having too much patience, others for being too impatient. This can lead either to eccentric steps beyond any ecumenical institutions (“wild” or, more politely, “prophetic” ecumenism) or to a resignation and withdrawal from ecumenical structures into self-centred ghettos.

Some complain that the large ecumenical structures are still too much under the control of the church professionals. High-level visits and fact-finding tours, summit conferences and confidential conversations (called dialogues) eventually produce conclusions that all other Christians are expected to accept or else be labelled “unecumenical” – a procedure that is all too familiar in the world of secular politics. Others point out that in the face of so many human needs, the WCC too reflexively adds new programmes to its already heavy agenda. This overload complicates an organization which already has too little coordination, and the programmes have little chance of being digested by wider constituencies, which already have more than enough to cope with on their pastoral plates.

Finally, critics charge that the numerous international conferences absorb too much staff time and energy and cost too much money for what such gatherings in fact accomplish. Their most permanent legacy takes the form of documents which are almost invariably too long, and either too rhetorical or too technical, thus appealing to a very limited audience even among those who would like to take advantage of them.

CRUSADES

THE CRUSADES were a series of military expeditions of the Western church, supported by royal, knightly aristocratic and popular pieties, and organized to liberate Jerusalem from the Muslims, and to help defend the Eastern church and the shrunken Byzantine empire against further Islamic encroachments. They took place between Pope Urban II’s call at the synod of Clermont (France) in November 1095 and the fall of Acre (today’s Akko, on the coast of northern Israel) in May 1291.

The original expeditions were called pilgrimages or “the Jerusalem journey”. The pilgrims were God’s soldiers in a holy war, meriting special papal indulgences (“the journey will be reckoned in place of all penance”, Urban II). Much later do the terms crusade and crusader appear, from the cross (crux) sewn on the outer garment of the soldier-pilgrim. Whatever their European country of origin, for the Easterners all crusaders were “Franks” (Franji).

Historians debate over the interplay of religious motivations and justifications, pragmatic political and economic interests, and crusaders' relations with local Christians, Muslims and Jews which developed. But today selective memories and negative images still rule, even as we outline the ecumenical and inter-religious consequences, principally in the Middle East.

Eastern churches. Despite the 1054 mutual excommunications of the pope of Rome and the patriarch of Constantinople, the Eastern Christians initially welcomed the Western pilgrims, expecting them to be a well-disciplined conventional army. But that welcome quickly faded in face of the crusaders' plundering conduct. Their disdain for fellow Christians of the East was expressed, above all, in taking over (1099) the Holy Sepulchre church in Jerusalem, and expelling from the city all the Orthodox clergy of different rites – Greek, Georgian, Armenian, Syrian and Coptic. The Eastern Christians welcomed Salāh al-Din when he brought Jerusalem once more under Muslim control (1187).

The hostile anger culminated in 1204. Pope Innocent III's well-intentioned fourth crusade to restore Jerusalem to Christian sovereignty turned into sheer lust for conquest and blind treacheries. The Venetian-led army detoured to Constantinople, looted the city, slaughtered its Christian inhabitants, and desecrated Hagia Sophia, the pride church of the East. As already had been done in Edessa/Armenia, Antioch and Jerusalem, a feudal kingdom was established, "the Latin kingdom of Constantinople". As a final blow, the pope replaced the Eastern with a Latin patriarch, something which had already been done in Antioch and Jerusalem. This was in direct violation of the canons of the council of Chalcedon* (451).

The humiliation and rancour are expressed in the popular Christian slogan, "Better to come under the turban [the sultan's head-dress] than under the tiara [the pope's crown]." Prior to Pope John Paul II's trip to Greece in 2001, many Orthodox bishops, monks and laity in Greece would condition at least their tolerance of his visit on his pre-arrival explicit apology for "1204".

The almost two centuries of crusader presence symbolized Western Christian tri-umphalism. The Easterners' fear and distrust of Western unconditional subjugation of their empire to the Latins and their church to the pope helped support resistance to sincere papal, patriarchal and imperial attempts of reunion, a non-reception of the reunion decrees of the general councils of Lyons in 1272 and of Florence in 1439. The perception of a more subtle crusading spirit prompted anxious opposition among the Orthodox churches when later the Uniate (see Eastern Catholic churches) and Latin Catholic missionary expeditions were to proselytize in the midst of vulnerable flocks.

Muslims. The Muslim historian Abu'l-Fida, a young soldier in the final defeat of the crusaders at Acre in 1291, concludes his chronicle: "All the lands were fully restored to the Muslims... God grant that the Franj will never set foot there again!" The list of vivid unforgettables is long: above all, the blasphemy against Muhammad and Islam, and the ridicule of Muslims as a "vile" and "abominable" race "absolutely alien to God". Of special example is the difference between the peaceful captures of Jerusalem and the respect towards Christians and Jews by Caliph Omar in 688 and Salāh al-Din in 1187, and the crusaders' conduct in 1099 when they murdered all 40,000 of the city's Muslim men, women and children. The memory of the massacre blocked any future permanent modus vivendi.

The crusades only strengthened the Muslims' resolve, through their own holy war (ji-had), to conquer Europe itself. Intermittent attempts to stop the Turks failed disastrously at Nicopoli (Bulgaria) in 1396. In 1453 the Muslims took Constantinople. By 1529 their army was on the hills overlooking the walls of Vienna.

Islamic historians trace the interwoven factors which led the Muslim Middle East to turn in on itself, to be wary of "the road to modernization", and still to see the West as a natural enemy, whether hostile acts are political, military, oil-based, cultural or religious. Amin Maalouf states in no uncertain terms: "There can be no doubt that the schism between these two worlds dated from the crusades, deeply felt, even today, as an act of rape."

The analogies are in the vocabulary. Some Muslims label Israel as a new crusader state. Arab political and religious leaders refer to the 1187 re-capture of Jerusalem as a sign of hope in the present pessimism about Jerusalem's political future. Radical Muslim Palestinians, in the jihad against Israel, find comfort in the patient wait for the Israelis, like the crusaders, also eventually to be "driven into the sea". Saddam Hussein's Iraqi rhetoric during the Persian Gulf war period (early 1990s) repeatedly referred to the American/English/French joint forces as crusaders. Mehmet Ali Agca, who tried to assassinate John Paul II (1981), considered the pope "the supreme commander of the crusades".

Jews. Jewish chroniclers call Clermont, where in 1095 Urban II had first called for military expeditions, "the mountain of gloom" (Har Afel). In hindsight the period is singled out as the start of, and explanation for, the severe persecution of Jews by Christians, even though the excesses were only symptomatic of a prior process of church antisemitism.*

If the pilgrimage of holy war were to defeat the Muslims who had stolen Christ's tomb in Jerusalem, why not begin by punishing the Jews who had killed him? A blessed vengeance. So even before the first expedition met its official enemies, undisciplined crusading mobs in the spring of 1096 stormed through the German cities of Speyer, Worms, Mainz, Cologne, Trier and Regensburg, and through other cities en route, e.g. Prague. The pilgrims harassed or killed the Jews (if they would not convert and be baptized), destroyed their synagogues and Torah scrolls, and desecrated their cemeteries. Such pogroms continued in part in later expeditions, often despite the harsh protests of local bishops. When the crusaders entered Jerusalem (15 July 1099), the Jews sought refuge in synagogues which their attackers then set on fire. The few surviving Jews were sold into slavery.

Pope Innocent convened the fourth Lateran council in 1215, in his words, "to correct faults and reform morals,... to get rid of oppression and foster liberty". The canon (68) most remembered by Jews today prescribed distinctive dress or marking for them (and for Muslims), primarily to prevent concubinage or intermarriage with Christians.

The marks varied, but the "yellow badge of shame" stands out, the predecessor of Hitler's yellow star for the Jews not yet exterminated.

These series of crusading events, in Europe and in Jerusalem, have fused into a single symbol for the Jews – "the first holocaust" (Shapiro).

Ethics. The crusades went beyond the just-war tradition initiated by Augustine (see just war). For the official church, not only was the war not offensive but it was positively pleasing to God. It was "Christ's business" (negotium Christi, fourth Lateran), a virtuous act which merited the commutation of penance for all one's sins. The new tradition of canonized violence justified the church crusades against the Moors and Jews in Spain, against the heretical Cathars and Albigenses in France, and the Hussites in Bohemia.

Nevertheless, during the crusade period itself, public criticisms on ethical grounds were not muted and enter the history of moral theology: not returning evil by evil; "those who take up the sword shall perish by the sword"; the boundaries that limit blameless acts of self-defence; the conditions for an offensive just war; conscientious objection by non-officers; the conversion of the non-Christian by peaceful persuasion, not by force or bribery.

CULLMANN, OSCAR

B. 25 Feb. 1902, Strasbourg, France; d. 16 Jan. 1999, Chamonix, France. Cullmann's ecumenical interests are evident in his study on the place of Peter in the early church (Peter, Disciple – Apostle – Martyr, London, SCM Press, 1953). Observer at the Second Vatican Council and active in developing relations between Protestants and Roman Catholics in Europe, he believed that every Christian confession embodies a permanent spiritual gift which it should preserve, nurture, purify and deepen, and which should not be given up for the sake of homogenization. He was especially concerned in developing a theory of Heilsgeschichte (history of salvation), which he expounded in Christ and Time (Philadelphia, Westminster, 1950). According to Cullmann, what is most distinctive in the New Testament is its view of time and history.* Running through the whole course of world history there has been a relatively narrow stream of sacred history (see salvation history). This special history, the midpoint of which is Jesus Christ, provides the clue to the understanding of general history, which is linear in form and runs from creation to consummation.

Cullmann studied at Strasbourg and Paris, and in 1930 became professor at Strasbourg. From 1938 he was a professor at Basel, and after 1948 concurrently professor in the Protestant faculty of theology in Paris. He also lectured at the Ecole de hautes études of the Sorbonne in Paris and the Waldensian Seminary in Rome.

CULTURE

THE ISSUE of the relation between Christianity and culture is not new. The fledgling Christian community in Antioch had to face it around the Mosaic practice of circumcision for gentile Christians. Between some Jewish Christians who asserted that circumcision was essential for salvation* and Paul and Barnabas who opposed it, “no small dissension and debate” broke out (Acts 15:2). The case was brought to Jerusalem, where the first Christian council was held to settle the matter. The outcome was an apostolic letter sent to the gentile Christians in Antioch conveying the decision “to impose on you no further burden than these essential things: that you abstain from what has been sacrificed to idols and from blood and from what is strangled and from fornication” (15:28). The issue of circumcision was resolved, but that of “food sacrificed to idols” was not, as Paul’s letter to Christians at Corinth was to show later (1 Cor. 8:1).

As Christianity spread from Jerusalem, Judea, Samaria and to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8), the question of circumcision receded into the background and finally disappeared. But the question of “food sacrificed to idols” came to the foreground and has not ceased to engage the mind of the Christian church down the centuries. For generations of Christians the phrase “food sacrificed to idols” came to stand for idolatry, and idolatry stood for religions other than Christianity. From time to time the Christian church also found itself under hostile socio-political systems in which the power of “Caesar” is divinized and takes the pseudo-religious form of idolatry. In the minds of Christians, then, idolatry, whether in its religious or pseudo-religious form, is identified with religious beliefs and cultural practices alien to the Christian faith.

Christ and Culture, the influential work published in 1951 by US theologian H. Richard Niebuhr, should be understood against this background. In the history of Christianity, Niebuhr discerned five ways or types by which the Christian church had addressed itself to the complex problem of the relations between the Christian faith and cultures: Christ against culture, the Christ of culture, Christ above culture, Christ and culture in paradox, and Christ the transformer of culture. While such a typology makes possible a better understanding of the issues involved in the problem, there is a danger that this descriptive account may prevent thoughtful Christians, especially perhaps those in the third world, from taking a fresh look at the problem and coming up with insights into a new Christian theology of cultures.

The negative view of Protestant neo-orthodox theologians towards culture and religion is well known. Karl Barth's pronouncement on religion* as unbelief (Church Dogmatics I/2), taken out of context, serves to deepen the suspicion of the Christian church towards the world of cultures and religions outside the sphere of its own influence. The Dutch missiologist Hendrik Kraemer did much to translate this neo-orthodox theological view into a missiological formulation of the relations between Christianity and other religions. This is evident in the prominent theological role he played at the world missionary conferences in Jerusalem in 1928 and in Tambaram (Madras) in 1938.

Then came the second world war, during which the world witnessed an unprecedented destruction of human lives and civilization. It also marked the beginning of the end of Western colonial culture in Africa and Asia (see colonialism). Emerging from the war were newly independent nations preoccupied with the terrifying task of nation-building (see nation). Inevitably, there was resurgence of the indigenous cultures and religions – which often went hand in hand with a strong sense of nationalism. One thing became abundantly clear: a world under the sole influence of Christian religion and culture could never have existed, and Christianity had to face other cultures and religions asserting themselves with new vigour. A quest for new relations between Christianity and cultures had to begin, particularly in Africa and Asia.

In the West, the theology of culture developed by Paul Tillich re-defined the issue of relations between Christianity and culture on the broader basis of religion and culture. After discerning three forms of culture (autonomous culture, heteronomous culture and theonomous culture), he identified theonomous culture as an expression of an ultimate concern and coined the now-famous dictum, "religion is the substance of culture, and culture the form of religion". This theological approach to religion and culture, while correcting the excesses of the neo-orthodox position and opening up the possibility of correlating religion and culture theologically, may result in subsuming all cultural activities under the religious rubric, leading to a new conflict between Christianity and cultures endowed with other religious values than those of the Christian church.

It is at this point that Christian theology must turn to behavioural sciences, especially anthropology, for a broader understanding of culture. It must be acknowledged that scholars differ in their understanding of what culture is, but the working description offered by the English anthropologist Edward Tylor (1832-1917) remains useful: "Culture or civilization, taken in its wide ethnological sense, is that complex whole which includes knowledge, beliefs, art, morals, law, custom, and any other capabilities and habits acquired by man as a member of society" (Primitive Culture, 1871). Culture, it is evident, is closely related to religion. But it has to do with religion not in the narrow sense of doctrine, teaching or institution, but with the complex whole of life in which religion plays a critical and dynamic, but not the only, role. It is within this expanded framework of culture that relations between Christianity and cultures must be reconstructed theologically.

This central concern underlies most of the theological efforts undertaken outside traditional Western theology in recent years, especially in Asia and Africa. These efforts are expressed in different but related ways. Indigenization first came to be widely advocated. The Christian gospel must take roots in the soil to which it has been transported.

To use a metaphor popularized by Sri Lankan theologian D.T. Niles, the Christian gospel must cease to be a “potted flower” without roots in the alien soil. The movement towards indigenization gained momentum in the 1950s and the 1960s and enabled churches in the third world to shed their foreignness. But the change was largely structural and political. It was assumed that the Christian gospel would remain unchanged in the process of indigenization. Theologically, it was on the whole a matter of finding parallel indigenous religious and philosophical language and ideas and expressing the Christian truth in those terms.

Closely related to the indigenization model is the emphasis on contextualization, or the careful study of the “fit” between the Christian Bible, the gospel, and the various cultural and religious settings to which Christian faith addresses itself. This was carried out with much zeal and insight, mainly in the area of theological education. It was indebted to the Theological Education Fund, later the WCC’s Programme for Theological Education, for initiative and inspiration in the late 1960s and the early 1970s. Shoki Coe, an energetic theological educator from Taiwan, did much to focus attention on the relation between the text and context in theological schools and seminaries. Although there was no surprising breakthrough, the contextualization model encouraged innovative theological education in the third world and firmly put cultures in the forefront of continuing theological efforts.

It became obvious in the efforts of indigenization and contextualization that Christian theology could not go about reconstruction of the relations between Christianity and cultures single-handedly, but must be open to the findings and insights of colleagues in other fields of study and research, particularly behavioural sciences and history of religions. It is not surprising that from the mid-1970s terms such as “acculturation” and “inculturation” came to be a part of theological language in both Protestant and Roman Catholic circles. Acculturation, to put it simply, is to adapt Christian practices to local culture: the clergy in the pulpit wearing traditional clothing, using indigenous music and traditional instruments in worship service, incorporating local architectural ideas and styles into church buildings, developing Christian arts in relation to indigenous art forms. This is obviously a great step forward, although it still remains tentative for most established churches in Africa and Asia, heavily conditioned as they are by their Western mentors. But the acculturation process is bound to develop more and more in the years to come.

The question is whether these traditional cultural forms and expressions adapted into the practice of Christian faith are only the means to make Christianity appear less foreign, or whether they also lead to interactions between Christianity and cultures on a much deeper theological level. The latter seems to be the case. Inculturation deals more with this deeper matter of the theological understanding of different cultures. It is no longer just the question of forms and styles but one of theological relations between Christian faith and cultures. As the Ghanaian theologian Mercy Amba Oduyoye puts it: “How can one be African and Christian at the same time? In this area we meet, for example, questions about the rites of passage, naming and other initiation ceremonies, as they confront Christian baptism and confirmation” (Hearing and Knowing). This is a soul-searching question for Christians not only in Africa but in Asia also. It is the most urgent and most difficult question for Christians and churches in the third world.

At the heart of these and other theological efforts to wrestle with the question of relations between Christianity and cultures is the concept of incarnation. If the divine has taken human form not only in Judeo-Christian cultures but in cultures that are African, Asian, Latin American or secular Western, do we not have to admit that there are already theological meanings embedded in these cultures? Do we not have to train our Christian theological minds to perceive God’s judgment and salvation working through men, women and children in their own cultures? Cultures will then open new theological horizons that give us glimpses of the depth and breadth of the mystery of God,* the Creator and Saviour of all nations and peoples.

DANIÉLOU, JEAN

B. 14 May 1905, Neuilly-sur-Seine, France; d. 20 May 1974, Paris. Daniélou was an influential Roman Catholic theologian whose interests included ecumenism, missiology and the Christian attitude towards communism. He was a member of the editorial board of Etudes and, together with Henri de Lubac, edited the series Sources chrétiennes. He had a particular interest in biblical theology and the sacramental theology of the church fathers, and he tried to approach Marxism from a Christian vision of history based on biblical inspiration and marked by an eschatological orientation. In 1929 he entered the Jesuit order and in 1944 was appointed professor of Christian origins of history at the Catholic Institute in Paris; later he was made a cardinal. Daniélou influenced several decrees issued by the Second Vatican Council. He was co-editor of The Catholic-Protestant Dialogue (Baltimore, Helicon, 1960).

DAY, DOROTHY

B. 8 Nov. 1897, New York; d. 29 Nov. 1980, New York. A journalist and pacifist, Dorothy Day was co-founder in 1933 of the Catholic Worker movement, a community of laypeople from all walks of life who embrace evangelical poverty and serve in urban places of welcome (“friendship houses”) for the homeless, runaways and persons recently released from prison.

Day, who herself spent time in jail for protesting at government sites, communicated in both words and deeds her radical convictions on Catholic pacifism, conscientious objection and creative non-violence as the response to war. Her best-seller The Long Loneliness described her early non-religious adult life as a confirmed Marxist with an erratic life-style before her conversion and baptism in the Catholic church (1927) – a decision that resulted in the break-up of her common-law marriage with an anarchist who considered the RCC to be one of the world’s most oppressive structures.

Influencing her life and thought was her Catholic Worker Movement co-founder, the self-educated philosopher Peter Maurin, an immigrant of French peasant origins who lived in careless simplicity. Maurin and Day shared belief in Christian personalism, a philosophical orientation that stresses the value and dignity of each human person. US Catholic prelates, including New York’s influential Cardinal Spellman, who opposed her pacifist views which rejected the Catholic just-war position, strongly defended her right to speak out and supported her ministry to the urban poor.

To the end, Day’s stubborn piety was very traditional Catholic – daily mass, rosary, breviary. But her own person and example drew equal attention and affection from Protestants, some of whom have supported the appeal for her canonization. She herself said, “Don’t call me a saint – I don’t want to be dismissed so easily”, and considered her monuments to be the more than 80 houses of hospitality set up from Los Angeles to Oxford and Amsterdam as a result of her work. “If I have achieved anything in my life,” she said, “it is because I have not been embarrassed to talk about God.” Just before he died in 1999, Cardinal John O’Connor of New York introduced her cause for official sainthood and commented, “She was not a gingerbread or holy card saint.”

DEBT CRISIS

THE HEAVY burden borne by many countries in Africa, Latin America, the Caribbean, Asia and the Pacific because of their foreign debt began to be apparent towards the end of the 1970s. A series of underlying causes for this may be identified. First, the world market price of raw materials, on which many of these countries depend for export earnings, stagnated and in many cases declined. Second, international financial instability began to make itself felt at the end of the 1960s. In 1971, in response to the first concerted pricing measures taken by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, President Nixon suspended US currency controls. At that point currency exchange rates began to fluctuate. Third, as a result of the action of the US administration and the consequent increase in the number of dollars in circulation, banks in the more developed market-economy countries adopted an aggressive policy of offering loans on very favourable terms to third-world countries, assuming that development* would be a natural consequence of good management of the debt. Consequently, from 1973 to 1979 many countries in Africa, the Caribbean and Latin America, as well as some Asian countries, doubled and even tripled the amount of their foreign debt.

From the end of the 1970s a fourth factor became operative: as a result of the instability of the international financial system, interest rates on dollar loans soared to astounding levels, in some cases even tripling. This produced an imbalance between the rate of economic growth in the indebted countries and the amount they had to pay out to service the debts incurred. Bank interest – often calculated as compound interest – raised the amounts owed by many countries to levels which simply could not be paid. Rescheduling of the payment of this interest led in turn to further increases in the debts.

A considerable share of responsibility for the debt crisis lies with the authorities of the indebted countries themselves. In many cases they contracted debts for projects which did not deserve priority, thereby adding to the sums owed. Moreover, even when the money received in loans was spent on investments to encourage development, it was often drained away from the debtor countries back to the lending banks through the process of capital flight.

It is clear that for many countries the foreign debt has become unpayable, with the interest due representing an intolerable burden. The adjustment programmes demanded by the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank have not provided a satisfactory solution. These programmes are in general extremely rigid both in their economic approach (with the financial aspect being given priority over the necessary structural changes) and in the time period allowed for adjustment. The social cost of the adjustment programmes is extremely high, above all for the poorest sections of society.

It must be noted that the main burden of the debt is the amount due by the weight of interest rates. As noted by the 1992 WCC study document Christian Faith and the World Economy Today, “The debt has by now already been more than paid, though the idea of simply cancelling it leaves all sorts of intricate questions hanging. It has become the prime example of an economic ‘system’ that grinds tragically on for sheer lack of the political, indeed spiritual imagination and will to devise a way through and out.”

Already in 1984, the WCC’s Advisory Group on Economic Matters (AGEM) spoke of the need to reform the international financial system. On the one hand, this calls for a restatement of goals and values, stressing the priority of equality, justice and sustainability. To this end, the AGEM also proposed that the churches should endeavour to formulate clearly “an international moral and ethical order. Two basic principles are at the core of the search for this order: (1) international responsibility for all the world’s people; (2) universality in the approach to finding and funding solutions to the world’s financial problems.” Clearly, this approach to the problem has to be based on an economic order which gives priority to justice (see economics) at both national and international levels. At the same time, the AGEM affirmed the need for systematic reforms which would include changes in the relations and modus vivendi of the IMF, the World Bank and national governments. These and further complementary measures would make it possible to overcome the existing stalemate.

In July 1985, on the basis of these studies, the WCC central committee called for creditors to cancel the debt. Nevertheless, as stated in the WCC study document cited earlier, “Substantial foreign debt reductions or even sheer cancellation will not prevent the problems from recurring again if this is not accompanied by comprehensive changes in political-economic systems and policies at national levels both in South and North, at the level of the world economy, and within international institutions” (41).

The WCC assembly in Harare (1998) produced a statement on “The Debt Issue: A Jubilee Call to End the Stranglehold of Debt on Impoverished Peoples”. The statement affirmed that “cancelling the debt of impover-erished peoples... [is] a matter of urgency” and that “the basic human needs and rights of individuals and communities and the protection of the environment should take precedence over debt repayment”, and called for “new structures and mechanisms, involving participation and dialogue between creditors and debtors”. The statement also appealed especially to the G8 nations “to engage, in consultation with civil society, in a process of global economic reform towards a just distribution of wealth and preventing new cycles of debt”.

Towards the end of the second millennium movements such as the Jubilee 2000 Coalition enabled churches, church-related organizations and other concerned bodies and movements to renew their commitment to solving the debt crisis, not least by challenging their governments to review their lending and borrowing policies.

DECOLONIZATION

IN THE 20th CENTURY, decolonization in Africa and Asia involved different strategies of resistance, each rooted in certain cultural patterns.

Primary forms of resistance. In the chronological sense primary resistance refers to that which took place at the time of European penetration and conquest. Many African and Asian societies fought colonialism* as it arrived. Resistance ranged from the Ashanti wars in Ghana to the Matabele wars in Zimbabwe, from the struggle against the British in Afghanistan to the early struggles against the Dutch in Java. In the cultural sense primary resistance means resistance on the basis of indigenous fighting symbols, regardless of chronology. An example is the resistance of the Mau Mau in the 1950s on the basis of Kikuyu values and related religious beliefs; although they were militarily defeated by the British, they were triumphant in the sense that they broke white settler political power. The Maji Maji war in Tanganyika (mainland Tanzania) was primary resistance in an intermediate sense: chronologically it occurred quite early, but it was also inspired culturally by indigenous beliefs. Although militarily crushed, the movement influenced the Germans to formulate less repressive imperial policies.

Islamic forms of resistance. In Africa, primary resistance in the chronological sense was, at least in its symbolism, sometimes Islamic rather than purely indigenous, usually sounding the clarion call of the jihad (struggle in the name of God), a theme that has persisted in Afghanistan and parts of the Arab world. Islamic resistance manifested itself in the Nile valley with the Mahadiyya opposition to British penetration. It may be argued that the influence of the fear of jihad on British colonial policies in Muslim areas was responsible for the decision to let northern Nigeria enjoy substantial autonomy during the colonial period and for the overall policy of indirect rule in Africa. Missionary education was also discouraged in Muslim areas for similar reasons. The French also showed some caution in the policies towards Muslim colonial subjects. Opposition to European imperial rule in North Africa was often re-inforced by pan-Islamic sentiment. In Egypt nationalism became increasingly secular in the 20th century. Islamic sentiment in favour of creating a separate Muslim country (Pakistan) from British India aroused fears about Islamic militancy in other parts of the empire and among African Christian nationalists like Nhamdi Azikiwe and Kwame Nkrumah, but West Africa never experienced separatist Islam to the same degree as Pakistan.

Indian-inspired forms of resistance. While some colonial nationalists in the 1930s and 1940s worried about the kind of religious tension that was affecting India, the achievements of the Indian nationalist struggle for independence were often admired by distant colonial subjects. Particularly influential was Mahatma (Mohandas) Gandhi. Nkrumah used Gandhian ideas as basis for his strategy of “positive action” in the early 1950s. Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia was also a disciple of Gandhi; for a time he opposed violence in all its forms and advocated a strategy of non-violent resistance of “soul force” (or satyagraha) more compatible with his Christian faith. African opposition to armed struggle was evident at the All-African People’s Conference held in Accra, Ghana, in 1958, where the Algerians – then at war with France – found it difficult to secure pan-African endorsement for their struggle. The obstinacy of white colonial rule in Southern Africa and the stubborn Portuguese insistence that the colonies were part of metropolitan Portugal helped to radicalize and militarize anti-colonial struggles.

Christian and Western-inspired forms of resistance. A disproportionate number of the leading figures in African independence struggles were Western-educated or educated in Christian missionary schools and colleges: notable examples were Nkrumah, Senghor, Nyerere, Kenyatta, Mugabe, Awololo, Banda, Kaunda and Houphouët-Boigny. European and North American inspiration for African and Asian resistance to colonialism also came through Christianity as a social and political force, Western political ideologies (nationalism, liberalism, socialism*), alliances with metropolitan political parties or organizations, and the use or adaptation of Western military technology by liberation movements. Furthermore, the top political leaders in Asian and African liberation movements came disproportionately from among the more culturally Westernized sectors of the colonized population: Sukarno (Indonesia), Jawaharlal Nehru (India), Nelson Mandela (South Africa), Kwame Nkrumah (Ghana), Ahmed Ben Bellah (Algeria) and Robert Mugabe (Zimbabwe).

Decolonization and the second world war. All these forms of resistance were profoundly affected by the second world war. Politically, imperial control was being weakened by the decline of the imperial powers themselves, breaking the mystique of their invincibility. Japan, on the other hand, played havoc with Burma, Indonesia, Vietnam and the Philippines. African nationalists watched these developments with rising hopes and aspirations for African liberation.

India was restive. Ordinary Asians and Africans tried hard to understand conflict in such remote places as Dunkirk and Rangoon, Pearl Harbor and El Alamein. Not a few “natives” were servicemen, experiencing combat but also learning new skills and acquiring new aspirations. The war also increased Europe’s need for the products of the colonies, sowing the seeds for the deeper incorporation of the colonies into Western capitalism. In other words, while politically the war prepared the way for the disintegration of the empires of France and Great Britain by weakening imperial control, economically it helped to integrate the colonies more firmly into the global capitalist system as the economies of the periphery were made to serve more systematically the war needs of the centre. Culturally, it broadened Africa’s exposure to alien influences and later resulted in the imperialist building of higher educational institutions for the colonies. Militarily it initiated more firmly the idea of recruiting colonial soldiers and setting up colonial armies equipped with modern weapons, with the well-known consequences of both military dependency and the tensions of civil-military relations in the former colonies.

DECREE ON ECUMENISM

THE SECOND Vatican Council* Decree on Ecumenism, Unitatis Redintegratio, is the most authoritative charter of active Roman Catholic participation in the one ecumenical movement. Promulgated on 21 November 1964, it has three chapters.

Chapter 1 unfolds the Catholic understanding of the fundamental invisible and visible unity* of the Lord’s “one church and one church only” as the expression of the undivided Trinity.* This church “subsists in” the RCC but is not co-extensive with it, because “outside its visible borders”, i.e. in other Christians and their communions, exist “elements and endowments which together build up and give life to the church itself”. Division among Christians “openly contradicts the will of Christ, scandalizes the world and damages... the proclamation of the gospel”. Nevertheless, there already is *real communion** between Christians because of what God has done and does to and through them, but this communion is imperfect because of what they have done and continue to do to each other – “a real but imperfect fellowship” between all Christian communions.

These ecclesiological positions shape a fundamental shift in the RC understanding of relations among Christians and underlie the guidelines, methods and helps for Catholic participation in “the restoration of unity”. The shift is from an ecclesiology of self-sufficiency and a model of unification by “return” (to the RCC), to an ecclesiology of incompleteness and the need for one another in the one but still-divided household. In this sense, ecumenism deals not with foreign, but with domestic relations. It is not a return to the past but a common search for future reconciliation.*

In the practice of ecumenism (ch. 2), the whole church is involved, laity and clergy alike. Ecumenism demands both the “continual reformation” of the pilgrim church and the continual conversion of each Catholic. In fact, “the very soul of the ecumenical movement is the change of heart and holiness of life”, along with private and public prayer for unity and occasional joint worship. Loving understanding of each other’s communions through dialogue (see dialogue, intrafaith), ecumenically oriented formation in theological studies and a common search into the word of God* foster mutual understanding and esteem. And to express the bond which already unites Christians to the Servant Lord and to one another, common witness* through cooperative action, especially in social matters, is strongly encouraged.

Chapter 3 describes the two principal historical divisions in the Christian family – between East and West and within the West. Special features of the origin and growth of the Eastern churches resulted in a mentality and historical development different from that in the West. The Eastern liturgical and monastic traditions, spiritualities and church disciplines, and “complementary rather than conflicting” theological formulations should be respected, for they contribute to the comeliness of the one church and to its witness.* Prayer, dialogue and cooperation in pastoral work are the means for restoring full communion.

For the Christian communions in the West, the decree proposes a programme for dialogue. The commitment to Christ as Lord and Saviour, the loving reverence for holy scripture, the baptismal liturgy and celebration of the Last Supper, the apostolic witness to the gospel in social action – all provide points of agreement as well as disagreement among Catholics and their Anglican and Protestant brothers and sisters in Christ.

The decree ends by acknowledging that it is not an evaluation of a static position but a charter for an open movement, “without prejudging the future inspirations of the Holy Spirit”.

Since Vatican II the Secretariat (now Pontifical Council*) for Promoting Christian Unity has issued periodic guidelines and ecumenical directories.*

DENOMINATIONALISM

DENOMINATIONALISM denotes a pattern of religious structuring and of ecclesial diversity that appeared in the modern, Western world under conditions of religious pluralism,* disestablishment, toleration and religious liberty.* As a state of dividedness and as the object of corrective endeavours on the part of 20th-century ecumenism, denominationalism has been portrayed negatively, as the “moral failure” of the church (H. Richard Niebuhr). A more sympathetic recognition might see in denominations and denominationalism a form of religious order and organization peculiarly expressive of the social and cultural life of democratic capitalism.* That recognition comes easier as the vitality and salience of denominationalism recede. In its heyday, denominationalism and related forms of voluntarism seemed to be actually constitutive of democratic society. Diversity took different forms at earlier points in the church's life and will doubtless assume a different aspect in the future. Such a perspective on denominationalism perhaps invites some reconsideration of ecumenism, construing it less in moral terms as an onslaught against schism* and more as an expression of the church's unity* appropriate to the same set of social conditions as those in which denominations express the church's diversity.

Denominationalism patterns vary geographically, reflecting the social-cultural landscape, the political configurations, and the route taken in each country. In the Anglo-Saxon world, denominationalism bears the marks of its origins in the 17th-century religious maelstrom out of which modern Britain emerged. The theological languages of the Reformation(s) gave urgency, even ultimacy, to causes and social groupings. British society fractured into religious parties. The fracturing itself set the terms for later British denominationalism and that of Britain's colonies.

The habits of mind and heart that characterize denominationalism and give it its peculiar colouration also derived from the 17th century, particularly from Puritanism. Reformed theology put a high premium on conceptualizing God's order for the world and actualizing order in church and state.* Puritan parties re-inforced that mandate for structure with eschatological urgency. In the face of an imminent end, they felt driven to build God's new order. Detailed blueprints for the structural order of the church they discovered in the Bible. So Presbyterians, Independents, Separatists, Baptists, Quakers and a myriad of radical groups sought to build God's order. These groups carried the mandate for order throughout the Anglo-Saxon world, thereby providing an essential ingredient in denominationalism, i.e. purpose. Each group cherished its order as God's own, planted it wherever it went and viewed other ecclesiological expressions as a betrayal of God's will.

Such presumption bred intolerance, fanaticism, war and regicide. It also bred the reactions which came to be known as the Glorious Revolution and the Enlightenment and which are credited with the invention of toleration. Such tolerance, or acceptance of other religious bodies, was another essential for denominationalism. And to a certain extent, the Enlightenment and political liberalism did provide the social conditions for religious groups to recognize one another's legitimacy. However, that vital achievement derived its positive content from one strand of Puritanism, namely the Independents. Committed to the ecclesial sufficiency of the local gathered community (see local church), the Independents worked out for themselves and ultimately for a larger Protestant community a conception of the church's unity that transcended the manifest plurality of churches (see congregationalism). The key notion was that schism did not apply to the mere fact of division but rather to attitudes and relationships, specifically to the want of love between Christian groups that put brothers at enmity with one another. On that premise, groups could recognize one another as legitimate, as part of the church, even though differing on non-essentials. That posture guided the attitudes towards one another of the groups bred or nurtured by pietism and thus suffused the whole evangelical wing of Protestantism.

Other constructions of unity-amid-diversity would eventually reinforce that puritan/pietist one and embed themselves in the folkways and laws of Western states. The US, in particular, made denominationalism seem almost constitutional. The federal amendments proscribing establishment of religion, providing for separation of church and state, and guaranteeing religious freedom and corresponding legislation on the state levels did seem to envelop the existing religious pluralism in political sanctity. But other factors as well made denominationalism into what Tocqueville recognized as the first of US political institutions. The public theology* derived from New England puritanism and the missionary imperialism of revivalistic Protestantism drove denominations into the quest for a Christian America, a quest that re-oriented denominational attention away from internal preoccupations and towards the amelioration of the moral and spiritual conditions of the American people. The denominationalism that resulted constituted what scholars have recognized as a voluntary establishment of religion, an extremely ironic but nevertheless highly visible establishment despite disestablishment. Well into the 20th century, so-called mainstream Protestant denominations and denominationalism functioned as the structure or skeleton for the American civil religion.*

That skeletal function depended upon the diversity which denominationalism permitted, even blessed. The unitive purposes of denominations and denominationalism went hand in hand with intense competitiveness and social divisiveness. Denominations facilitated division of church and society along ethnic, sectional, radical, economic and linguistic lines. It was this "compromise" of the church that Niebuhr pronounced as the sin of denominationalism.

By the final third of the 20th century, that form of denominationalism seemed to be crumbling, a casualty of the many developments that rendered mainstream Protestant hegemony implausible – the social and political maturity of Judaism and Catholicism, the waning plausibility of a missionary conception of the world, the self-critique typified by Niebuhr and known as neo-orthodoxy, the increased secularization* of American society, the more "civil" tone of civil theology, the political strength of the Protestant right and, of course, ecumenism. Many mainstream Protestants (and increasingly Catholics as well) found in ecumenism the purpose, vision and unity that denominationalism and a Christian America had once provided. Abandoned by the mainstream, both denominationalism and the quest for a Christian America have prospered among conservative and Evangelical Protestants. The future of denominationalism and of its relation to democratic society thus remains an interesting question.

DEPENDENCE

THE DEBATE on development* inevitably involved the issue of strategies for overcoming underdevelopment; and analysis of the material conditions of the underdeveloped countries in turn showed that the problem of economic growth cannot be separated from that of domination. The situation of the great majority of the underdeveloped countries is the result of an historical process which was in general decisively influenced by colonialism.*

For most former colonies, achieving political independence has not set them on the path of development. In many instances the situation even became worse. The new nations (see third world), despite their new political sovereignty, generally continued to be dominated by external factors, i.e. to be in a state of dependence. This is understood to mean "the situation of underdevelopment, which socially implies a kind of domination... In extreme cases this situation presupposes that the decisions affecting production or consumption in a given economy are made in terms of the dynamics and the interests of the developed economies. The economies based on colonial enclaves represent a typical example of this extreme situation" (F.H. Cardoso and E. Faletto).

The theory of dependence stresses that this linkage of domination and dependence takes place within the process of capitalist development, with its associated social structuring (see capitalism). It follows that dependence brings an expansion and intensification of tensions between capital and labour (1) by alienating the immediate producers from their products, especially in the case of those who work in rural areas; (2) by concentrating excess production in private capital; (3) by concentrating and centralizing the ownership of the means of production in private capital; (4) by increasing the number of unemployed people; and (5) by giving new impetus to the development of productive resources.

The fundamental problem is that capitalist growth is a process which involves the whole of society in the same way. Capitalist development in a region and in an economic sector has a destructive effect on the forces already existing, on the production relations in that region and sector, and also in the regions and sectors which depend on it. It is therefore a destructive process which in turn creates new tensions. Thus for instance an imbalance occurs between industrialized countries and others which provide them with raw materials, promoting the power of the former while weakening the latter. This inequality in turn has repercussions within the society of the countries subjected to domination, causing serious social confrontations and general instability.

The theory of dependence was formulated chiefly as a criticism of the developmentalism of the 1950s and early 1960s. In the 1960s it was claimed that economic growth would result from a process of investment to which domestic savings and international aid would contribute. Those who formulated the theory of dependence emphasized that the impact of this investment would not yield the results claimed unless the problem of structures was tackled. The view of the developmental theorists was that the social well-being of the countries on the periphery would come about through the processes of reform and modernization: the model for growth had already been given through the success obtained by the more industrialized countries. Those who framed the theory of dependence, however, stressed that this assumption ignored the historical conditions which had led to the growth of the strong and the economic weakening of the impoverished. The development of some, therefore, meant the underdevelopment of the others and vice versa.

This view of economic and social reality contributed decisively to the initial analyses that led to the proposals enunciated by liberation theology,* especially in Latin America and the Caribbean. Gustavo Gutiérrez pointed out that "the poor countries are becoming ever more clearly aware that their underdevelopment is only the by-product of the development of other countries... Moreover, they are realizing that their own development will come about only with a struggle to break the domination of the rich countries." This perception sees the conflict implicit in the process. Development must attack the root causes of the problems, of which the deepest is the economic, social, political and cultural dependence of some countries on others – an expression of the domination of some social classes over others. Attempts to bring about changes within the existing order have proved futile. Only a radical break from the status quo – i.e. a profound transformation of the private property system, access to power by the exploited class and a social revolution that would break this dependence – would allow for the change to a new society.

The novelty of dependence theory does not lie in recognizing domination. Rather, the theory makes it possible to understand the effects of economic domination today on the various social classes and the state. The contrast between centre and periphery thereby gains in intensity in dependent societies. It has found expression in the continuous series of acute social conflicts in the countries of Africa, Asia, Latin America, the Caribbean and the Pacific. Dependence was also experienced strongly by the end of the 20th century by countries which were formerly governed by communist regimes.

The dependency of peripheral countries in the world system is threefold: at the domestic level it has a social dimension; at the international economic level it is both technological and financial; at the level of relations among nations it has a political character. The experience of these situations is a main ingredient in the tense cultural confrontations of today.

B. 9 July 1901, Madras; d. 10 Sept. 1962, Dehra Dun, India. An ordained minister of the Church of South India, Devanandan was a speaker at the WCC's New Delhi assembly in 1961. He was literature secretary of the Indian YMCA for a period, and was associated with the work of the East Asia Christian Conference and the Committee for Literature on Social Concerns. For the last five years of his professional life he was director of the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society in Bangalore. After studies at Madras University and the Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, he obtained his PhD in religion from Yale University. He held several major teaching posts in the areas of theology, philosophy and religion: William Paton lecturer at Selby Oak, Birmingham; Henry Luce visiting professor at Union Theological Seminary, New York; and Teape lecturer at Cambridge University. Many leaders of churches and Christian institutions in India looked to him for personal guidance and counsel. A pioneer in the area of interfaith dialogue,* his many friends and acquaintances included not a few adherents of other faiths. With M.M. Thomas he was editor of the journal Religion and Society.

DEVELOPMENT

THE IDEA of development became prominent after the second world war. The term, originally synonymous with "growth", has often been criticized as inadequate to express fully the reality of promoting human well-being through societal transformation.

Various factors contributed to the increasing use of the notion of development after 1945. A prominent one was the emergence between 1946 and 1970 of approximately 50 nations to sovereign independence, most of them in Africa or Asia, starting with India in 1947 and Indonesia in 1949. Another precipitating factor was a "revolution of rising expectations" closely associated with political freedom, new technology and increasing appreciation for the marvels of science (see science and technology). Contributing to this revolution was a radically changing understanding of human and civil rights and a new commitment to social justice not only for nations but also for individuals and groups within a nation. Perhaps of lesser significance, but not to be underestimated, was the remarkable success of the US Marshall Plan for the recovery of war-torn nations, as well as the cold war,* which led to a competition between super-power blocs to enlarge their spheres of ideological, political and economic influence.

Perhaps no title reveals the early understanding of development better than Walter Rostow's Stages of Economic Growth. Simplified, Rostow's argument was that nations could reach a stage of "take-off" towards economic and social prosperity if sufficient technical skills, financial support and economic organization were made available. While this view relied heavily on long-run market forces, Rostow's thesis was compatible with both socialist and capitalist views of development. Both relied heavily on capital formation, development of human technical skills, industrialization and infrastructure enhancement. Some 300 years of Western history and 40 years of Soviet history seemed to confirm the scientific validity of Rostow's view. When the newly politically independent nations found themselves shackled to economic dependence and having few of the key ingredients in Rostow's prescription, the theory of stages of growth became even more convincing. But there has been progressive disaffection, especially among some Christian ethicists, with the assumptions implicit in this notion of development.

EARLY INVOLVEMENT IN DEVELOPMENT

It was natural for the churches, with a long tradition of mission* and service programmes among the poor, to become involved in the development agenda. Thousands of church-sponsored schools, colleges, hospitals, rural-development schemes and other projects to improve human life had already obliged the churches to face many important questions about the purposes and efficacy of their work. What should be the relationship between mission and service? What is the relationship between charity or relief and the promotion of longer-term human welfare? Is there any end to charity unless development is also achieved?

In the mid-1950s the churches in the ecumenical movement embarked on influential studies of what happens to individuals, communities and churches under conditions of "rapid social change". A symbol of the growing attention to the reality and problems of the poorer countries was the venue of the WCC's 1961 assembly in one of these countries, India.

A watershed in the ecumenical debate about development occurred at the 1966 Geneva conference on the churches' relationship to the "social and technological revolutions of our time". Influenced more strongly than ever before by leading speakers from the third world (this admittedly problematic term is used here in the original sense of the French tiers monde – designating the group of nations which belonged neither to the market economies [first world] nor to the Marxist economies [second world] and which had particular characteristics and problems, including, for most of them, grinding poverty*), the ecumenical case for systemic political and cultural transformation was dramatically argued, a transformation in which the churches would be called upon to play more than a palliative role. The nature of the church's role was vigorously debated. Some contended that mission, in the sense of proclaiming the gospel, was the primary task of the churches, with service a strictly ancillary function. Some stressed charity and relief rather than systemic development, either because the churches were perceived to be ill-equipped to engage in systemic transformation, or because systemic development required a kind of political or economic ideological commitment in which the churches should not engage.

Although this debate was not completely resolved, by 1968 at the WCC's Uppsala assembly it was clear that for most people the issue was not whether the churches should be involved in socio-economic development but how. In fact, so strong was the Uppsala commitment to development that the WCC immediately began a process to institutionalize it by establishing in 1970 the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development (CCPD). The Uppsala assembly also approved plans for a Joint Committee on Society, Development and Peace (SODE-PAX*), which was set up in 1968. In the early 1970s SODEPAX was seen as an instrument for wide-ranging collaboration between the WCC and the Roman Catholic Church. This dream never materialized fully, in part because of differing emphases in the analysis of development and what the churches should do to promote it. After the first period, the SODEPAX mandate was re-defined, with a reduced staff and programme, and at the end of 1980 it was terminated.

Under the aegis of CCPD, the debate about the purposes, nature and processes of development became a focal point of the ecumenical agenda. Initially, there was a fairly broad implicit acceptance of the Rostow understanding of development. In fact, some argued that the basic function of the churches was to generate financial resources to give to secular agencies and technical specialists, fully confident that the latter could achieve development through their own emphases. The debates of the early 1970s centred more on the moral question of how to generate the will and material resources for sacrificial giving than on defining goals and methods of fostering development. The Rostow conception of development was also implicit in the composition of the first 25-person commission, largely composed of technical experts in social analysis, management or technical development matters, including persons who served on specialized UN agencies. Programmatically, too, the emphasis was on technical economic considerations and the mobilization of greater capital and human resources.

REJECTION OF EARLIER VIEWS OF DEVELOPMENT

It soon became apparent that the churches would not settle for the widespread secular paradigm for development, nor would they relinquish their own distinctive, often experimental, programmes. Formative for ecumenical thinking during the early years was Indian economist Samuel Parmar, whose emphasis on economic growth, self-reliance and social justice planted the seeds for fundamental questioning of the Rostow model. A first task for the churches was to test whether their existing mission work promoted these three goals. Clearly there were shortcomings, and alternative operational models were sought.

A common ecumenical development fund was established to generate more money, and churches and other organizations were asked to contribute 2% of their annual budget to it. A serious commitment to sharing power and decision making was implemented by transferring much more power to “recipient” groups to establish their own priorities and monitor their own progress. Comprehensive development efforts – rather than those focusing exclusively on individual sectors such as population planning, health schemes, farming cooperatives – were emphasized. Financial support, formerly often on a year-to-year basis, was committed for longer periods of time to enhance planning and fundamental development.

While all of these institutional changes implied new understandings of the churches’ role in promoting development, only in the mid-1970s did a conscious assessment of the idea of development itself come to the fore. The widely adjudged failure of the first UN Development Decade (1960-70) and the active involvement of third-world persons in the debate led to a radical questioning of the notion of development. Much of the initial challenge came from Latin America, but questions also came from Africa and Asia. Significant in this intensified questioning was the emergence of the “limits-to-growth” debate, coupled with the oil supply crunch in Western nations in 1973, which dramatically challenged the assumption that more is always better, even if more for all people were possible.

In church circles this questioning of the very idea of development had theological as well as sociological, political and economic roots. Seven major shortcomings of the concept of development were identified.

1. The traditional understanding of development has focused too narrowly on economic development, giving too little attention to non-economic factors in social transformation, such as cultural and religious divisions.

2. Real social transformation is to be measured by what happens to people in the process of social change, but traditional notions of development tended to emphasize more abstract economic or political objectives. In fact, “people-centred development” was soon identified as the distinctive feature of the ecumenical understanding of development.

3. Many discussions on development, such as the Pearson commission’s influential report Partners in Development, assumed a too-facile harmony of interests between the rich and the poor, while the real situation, at least in the short term, was often a conflict between the haves and the have-nots. One should not assume that the rich will consider promoting the well-being of the poor to be in their own interest. To some extent, the structures which promote the prosperity of the affluent at the same time perpetuate the subservience of the poor. Some saw a direct one-to-one relationship here; others were content to argue that the correlation is close enough to forbid glib talk about “partnership in development”.

4. The typical measurements for development are inadequate. “Gross national product” and “per capita income” are defective because improvements in aggregate prosperity almost always obscure the real situation: the poor sectors of the population typically receive a disproportionately modest part of the bigger pie (or none at all). Disparities between the rich and the poor,* between and within countries, often became larger rather than smaller. Without justice it is impossible to speak of development.

5. In the name of development, many national and international economic structures were perpetuating or even re-inforcing structures of injustice. Development has traditionally presupposed the primacy of order, predictability and rationality, but such emphases simply re-enforced the status quo. Rather than a benign collaboration between rich and poor, with a slow evolutionary process, authentic development often is conflictual and revolutionary (see revolution). Thus many prominent ecumenical ethicists gradually rejected “development” in favour of “liberation”* which seemed to reflect better a holistic understanding and made it easier to connect issues of material well-being with deeper psychological and religious values and concerns. Furthermore, it was argued, “liberation” is a more biblical concept; and many rooted their understanding of it in the Hebrew exodus from slavery in Egypt. While accepting liberation as more fully expressive of many faith affirmations, some warned that jettisoning the idea of development entirely risked marginalizing Christians from the broader development debate, thereby tacitly encouraging the churches to escape into theological analysis without taking hard economic and political questions seriously.

6. The enormous strain on the environment implied by growth models of development – in the face of increasingly visible signs of the earth's limited resources and absorptive capacities – calls into question the suitability of the goals of development, not on the basis of whether they are attainable but whether they are desirable. At the WCC's MIT conference (1979), the theologians and scientists who reflected together on issues of "faith, science and the future" seriously questioned scientific and technological values.

7. A cardinal feature of traditional development theory was that prosperity should be generated at the top in centres of strength, from where it would flow ever more fully towards the periphery of society. This "trickle-down" idea worked better in theory than in practice: not a few studies showed that "trickle-up" was the more likely scenario, transferring resources from the poor to those who were already relatively better off. To rely heavily on trickle-down is at best inefficient, at worst a hoax against the poor.

PARTICIPATION OF THE PEOPLE

Two key emphases were central to ecumenical thinking about development and liberation in the mid-1970s. One was the crucial role of "participation".* In line with the logic of the liberation argument and the example of the Exodus, it was argued with increasing cogency and insistence that people* should be the subjects of history* rather than the pawns moved about by others, that justice should be not merely distributive but participatory. Thus a society cannot be considered developed or even moving towards development when those governed have no share in determining where their society is headed. The popular notion of development encouraged concentration rather than distribution of power; the ecumenical community countered with the understanding of development as struggle towards a "just, participatory and sustainable society".* The inclusion in this formula of "participation" as a visible element in the vision of an emergent society corrected a long-standing association of justice solely with distributive justice.

Parallel and even more central was the dominance of the idea of "the people". The priority was not simply participation in general, but participation by the marginalized and oppressed people who had too often been written off. C.I. Itty, director of CCPD, captured this shift in his 1977 report to the commission: "Development is essentially a people's struggle in which the poor and oppressed should be the main protagonists, the active agents and immediate beneficiaries. Therefore, the development process must be seen from the point of view of the poor and oppressed masses, who are the subjects and not the objects of development. The role of the churches and Christian communities everywhere should be essentially supportive." This notion of development, he noted, has direct consequences for the way the churches should pursue development: "In situations where the poor accept their lot of poverty and misery in passive resignation, the churches should assist the masses to recognize the roots of their plight, to acquire a new awareness of themselves and the possibilities for changing their situation. In situations where the poor and oppressed are organizing themselves for the struggle, the churches should manifest their solidarity with them and provide supportive means for the struggle."

This commitment to solidarity with the poor has been controversial. Who are the poor? Which poor? Do the poor really have wisdom about the direction society should take and what methods are best to get there? Are Christians to endorse every strategy adopted by poor people? What is the relationship between poverty and righteousness? Is the church to abandon the rich and middle class? What are the practical implications for the churches as they try to promote development? One programmatic consequence for the churches was much greater attention to developing networks of people or people's movements rather than to building institutions or encouraging projects from outside the local situation.

The logic of experience and analysis, intentionally testing and contributing to one another, led quite naturally to this emphasis on people's participation. This "praxis", or dialectical interaction between theory and practice, has been a dominant motif in recent ecumenical understanding of development. Along with it has come a concern that analysis and action not be so preoccupied with the local or micro-situation as to ignore the impact of the macro-level economic, political and cultural forces, such as transnational corporations,* many of which have more financial clout than the nations in which they are working, aid and trade decisions by rich nations, and the policies and practices of international bodies and agencies.

SEEING THE WHOLE PICTURE

Thus, while primary attention has gone to people's participation in movements for justice and human dignity, ecumenical reflection on development has also given considerable attention to macro-level factors, e.g. through studies on the role of transnational corporations, the tendency of technology to concentrate power, the control exercised by the information and communication industries, the dependencies created by Western-style medicine on health professionals and the pharmaceutical industry, the debt crisis.*

The 1980s brought growing awareness of the integral connections between all of the major justice questions facing the world family. Racism* is deeply connected with economic injustice; sexism* constitutes an incredibly resistant barrier to social development; ecological disaster compounds pressures on the poor and makes justice more difficult to achieve; militarism* and the enormous costs of "security" exact a disastrous toll on human and financial resources; consumerist values insidiously exert their corrosive effect on humanistic and justice values; population pressures exacerbate environmental degradation, etc.

The issues are so large and complex that there is a danger of either succumbing to the temptation of ignoring them altogether or being overwhelmed by trying to resolve them all at once. As an ecumenical response to the interlocking character of all these issues and their negative impact on prospects of justice and dignity for the poor, the WCC's Vancouver assembly (1983) offered a comprehensive vision of what society ought to be under the rubric of "justice, peace and the integrity of creation".* While not understood as a blueprint for society, this theme nevertheless sought to provide a normative conceptual framework for keeping fragmented issues dynamically related.

Recent ecumenical discussion of socio-economic development has explored the meaning of and possibilities for a "civil society". A civil society* is characterized by a variety of institutions, organizations and movements mid-range between the state at one pole, and the individual or family at the other. Such institutions help to give individuals and families a "social identity" and purpose which is relatively independent of the direct authority and power of the state. They also provide a pluralism and flexibility which accommodate movement and change, especially in societies which are ethnically, racially, religiously or linguistically heterogeneous.

Despite the significant strides in understanding more fully the nature and problems of development, the mood in many poorer countries at the dawn of a new century is one of exasperated desperation – sometimes quiet, sometimes not so quiet. Caught in desperate living conditions, many people argue that it is euphemistic to talk about development at all. They argue that things are not improving; in fact, in vast areas of the world they are deteriorating further. In the face of the debt crisis, environmental degradation, lack of food, dearth of elementary health care, repression by those in control, paucity of even basic education, the dominant concern is simply to survive. The revolution of rising expectations has, in many parts of the world, been replaced by a resignation to lowered expectations. Perhaps the greatest achievement of the development concept was in arousing common people to the belief, the hope, that they did not have to live in dire poverty and tacit oppression, that they were called to a different possibility. Many believed that this could happen peacefully, with the goodwill and collaboration of those who controlled society. Now that dream, belief, expectation is struggling to survive among the poor, even while it remains a popular idea among people of liberal persuasion who are still determined to foster development.

The issue of development has become a major preoccupation of the churches, but the churches have not been uncritical participants in the broader debate about the goals and methods for promoting development. They have challenged fundamental assumptions and conceptions, and they have called into question many existing patterns for trying to achieve development at both the macro- and micro-levels. Not least, they have continuously explored the possible implications of these new insights for their own theories and actions. The pressures for justice, dignity and ecological sanity guarantee that, despite their complexity, the issues of development will remain a compelling challenge, conceptually as well as practically.

DIACONATE

THE PRIMARY model for the diaconate is the serving aspect of the ministry of Christ summarized in his statement, "I am among you as one who serves" (Luke 22:27). A serving ministry alternative to that of the apostles was established in the earliest church according to Acts 6, in order to reach more types of people. The first gentile Christian church in Antioch, in thankfulness for receiving the gospel, reciprocated with diakonia* (service) when the Jerusalem church was in need (Acts 11:27ff.). Later Paul bound together the Greek churches with the mother church through the practice of diakonia (cf. 2 Cor. 8). By the time of Philipians and 1 Tim. some ministers were definitely known as deacons. An increasing number of biblical scholars have concluded that Phoebe served as a deacon (see Rom. 16:1). Some of the enrolled widows of 1 Tim. 5:9ff. would have been obvious candidates for the women deacons of 1 Tim. 3:11.

By the 2nd century, deacons linked together bishop and people in the liturgy, social care and teaching centred on baptismal preparation. Deacons in late 2nd-century Rome were especially involved in burials and in administration of the cemeteries and catacombs, tasks later assigned to others. Rome limited the number of its deacons to seven, responsible for seven (later 14) areas of the city, which eventually – until the 19th century – gave their titles to the cardinal deacons.

Especially in the sexually segregated churches and households of the East, women deacons ministered to women and children. Their liturgical duties were connected with the baptism of women and taking communion to housebound women; they also chaperoned interviews between laywomen and male clergy. Canon 15 of Chalcedon specified 40 as the minimum age for ordination. Scholars differ as to whether canon 19 of Nicea means that all deaconesses (the term is used there for the first time) were lay, or whether those the Paulianists called "deaconesses" had never been ordained. The golden age for women in the diaconate was the 4th through 7th centuries in the East; best documented is Chrysostom's mentor, Deacon Olympias of Constantinople.

In both East and West women deacons ministered in women's monasteries. In Syria there were special canons for abbesses who were deacons. By the 14th century, evidence of the diaconate of abbesses disappeared, but traces remain in the Orthodox Euchologion and in the ordination of abbesses in the West. Probably as a result of Byzantine influence, women deacons were found in the West at least from the late 4th through 6th centuries, as attested by the fact that synods tended to prohibit them.

For a number of centuries the minimum age for the presbyterate ensured that most clergymen served as deacons for several years. Some head or arch-deacons proceeded directly to the episcopacy (Thomas à Becket) and even to the papacy (Gregory the Great). As the diaconate came increasingly to be regarded as a transitional stage to the more highly prized priesthood, it became less qualified, retaining its liturgical roles but losing its administrative and social-service roles.

In the 19th century there was a revival of a social-serving diaconate in German Protestantism. At Kaiserswerth, deaconesses (who remained single) lived communally in a motherhouse and were sent out as nurses or teachers, for which they received pocket money. The deacons, who were allowed to marry, were trained by their brotherhood, and often worked as house fathers in institutions. After training and probation, both were blessed by the pastor of their brotherhood or sisterhood. At Zehlendorf and Herrenberg, the institution trained diakonia sisters who then worked for salaries, especially as district nurses; in return for a percentage of income, the institution provided in-service training, pastoral guidance and retirement opportunities. German cultural contacts and missionary work spread these forms throughout the world. The German example was followed in several Anglo-Saxon churches with parish deaconesses – some lay and some ordained. Churches of the Reformed tradition tended to elect lay deacons to do financial or pastoral work in parishes.

After the second world war, changes in the large German hospital-based institutions affected the deaconesses. Some nurses formed diaconal sisterhoods parallel to or incorporated into the deaconess sisterhoods. By the 1960s married German deacons both men and women were following a style of life similar to that of the diakonia sisters; they had been commissioned by their church, held both social-serving and theological qualifications, and often served as parish workers or as youth leaders in parishes. By the 1970s many Anglo-Saxon deaconesses were taking on liturgical duties.

Especially in Sweden there has been a shift from a mother-house sisterhood to deacons in the church; deacons are now ordained as part of the threefold ministry. In Europe more and more communities now contain a variety of members (women and men; deaconesses, deacons and pastors) involved in a greater variety of ministries in society, including hospice work, AIDS counselling, long-term care, retreat work, industrial safety, school administration and dance workshops, as well as more traditional tasks in central church administration.

Although in the 1970s some Protestant churches considered laicizing or even abolishing the diaconate, more and more now agree that having deacons as authorized leaders brings into focus and stimulates the diakonia of all believers. Many Protestant churches are restructuring their diaconal ministries. Worldwide, at least 50,000 men and women are authorized for lifelong diaconal ministry. The Roman Catholic Congregation of the Clergy devoted its 1995 session to examining the progress of the restoration of the permanent diaconate according to local needs authorized at the time of Vatican II. Several Anglican provinces, like the Roman Catholic Church, now have both transitional and permanent deacons, some for particular ministries. Many Anglican women priests highly value their continuing diaconal ministry. More recently Oriental and Orthodox churches have been thinking about their diaconates and about the diakonia appropriate for women, as are some Roman Catholics.

Literature on the diaconate continues to grow. Following the statement in the 1982 Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* text that “deacons represent to the church its calling as servant in the world. By struggling in Christ’s name with the myriad needs of societies and persons, deacons exemplify the interdependence of worship and service in the church’s life” (M31), the 1993 Faith and Order world conference (Santiago de Compostela) recommended further F&O work on the diaconate and noted that the experience of Protestant diaconal brotherhoods and sisterhoods, especially those with an ecumenical common life, could contribute to a fuller understanding of the structures for koinonia. “Hands and Feet: Towards a Serving Church”, a 1995 report for the Anglican Church of the Province of Southern Africa, called the diaconate “a crucially important element in the total ministry of the serving church” and the provincial synod urged the establishment of a renewed dynamic diaconate in every parish, archdeaconry and diocese and agreed that the deacons would form a fourth house in the synod at all levels.

The Hanover report (1995) by the Anglican-Lutheran International Commission is the first international bilateral statement on the diaconate. It maintains that “when diaconal ministry involves personal identity and is not just a task, long-term or open-ended commitment is particularly appropriate” (para. 41). Pastors and priests are urged not to see the diaconate as a threat, but to welcome deacons as partners who can free them for a more focused presbyteral ministry (para. 68). The report concludes by suggesting that “because diaconal ministry is not burdened with the problems of validity and canonical recognition... we are called all the more to take up the possibilities before us for common diaconal ministry” (para. 79).

The World Federation of Diaconal Associations and Diaconal Communities (see diakonia II), the International Centre for the Diaconate (Roman Catholic), and the European Conference of Deacons are organizations in which men and women in various diaconates meet at regional and international levels for mutual encouragement and ecumenical enrichment.

Deacons have been challenged by the recent work of John Collins to eliminate hints of servility from their roles and to emphasize that their high-skilled and community-focused ministry involves training and leading the laity in their own diakonia. Collins has opened a debate on the fundamental nature of diakonia and of the diaconate. Some deacons whose churches practise sequential ordinations are advocating that those whose vocation is priestly be ordained directly to the presbyterate.

DIAKONIA

THE TERM “diakonia” (from the Greek verb diakonein, to serve; cf. diakonos, male or female servant) refers to service as a permanent activity of the church throughout its history (part I of this entry). It is also the name of an international organization networking among those involved in the service ministries of the churches (part II). A separate entry is devoted to the diaconate* as an order of ministry in the churches.

I. THE DIAKONIA OF THE CHURCH

Diakonia, or the “responsible service of the gospel by deeds and by words performed by Christians in response to the needs of people”, is rooted in and modelled on Christ’s service and teachings. The intimate link between the service of God and the service of humankind is said by Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* to be exemplified for the whole church by the ministry of deacons (M31).

The Old Testament law provided a variety of ways to alleviate the sufferings of the poor,* and the prophets often spoke as advocates of the widows and orphans. The early Jerusalem church practised a form of communism: those with possessions sold them to benefit those who were in need. Its own subsequent needs were met in part by diakonia from gentile churches (Acts 11:27ff.; 2 Cor. 8).

ELEMENTS OF THE TRADITION

In the ancient churches, the funds used for diakonia were collected from the whole congregation at the eucharist.* In the Roman church male deacons, and in the Eastern church both men and women in the diaconate, were the key administrators of practical care in the name of the church.

By the 3rd century the church at Rome had over 1500 registered widows and recipients of alms. The city was divided into seven administrative districts, or diaconiae, under the care of seven deacons. Instead of the Roman state distributing bread, the deacons looked after it. The apostate Emperor Julian was extremely impressed by the care Christians provided for one another.

In Syria the monk-bishop Rabbula built a hostel and arranged for a female deacon and nuns to provide care for the women in need and a male deacon and monks to care for men. Diakonia as an institution to care for the sick and poor spread from Syria throughout the Byzantine empire. At the height of their ministry, the deacons of the Eastern churches were involved in social care, liturgical-pastoral care, teaching, administrative-judicial duties and burial diakonia. Emperor Justinian (483-565) stressed philanthropy and promulgated philanthropic legislation which covered not only the capital but also the provinces. He established separate residential institutions to care for the various types of people in need. During his reign institutions were set up to care for poor pilgrims in Jerusalem; through the pilgrims the idea of hospices reached the Western church.

While the diaconal activities of official institutions in both East and West are documented, little is known of the diakonia of the ordinary laity.* Both Basil and Benedict expected monks to practise diakonia; each guest was to be received like Christ. The monasteries tended mainly to provide food for the poor at their gates; this feeding of the poor became part of the Maundy Thursday ritual. The name of the Hospitaliers, who specialized in their own forms of diakonia, is still attached to ambulance care in Britain. The Beguines cared for orphans and sick women, and when suppressed their houses often became municipal orphanages.

When the diaconate came chiefly to be a transitional office to the priesthood, the duties of deacons became more limited to the formal liturgical ones; and during the middle ages responsibility for the care of the poor shifted from the bishop to the parish clergy, who coped with needs mainly on an ad hoc, local basis. Systematization developed the scheme of the seven corporal and the seven spiritual works of mercy based on Matt. 25:34-46; their illustration in art indicates the widespread diakonia practised by the laity.

The crisis of the black death greatly increased the need for care (and cost the lives of about half the care-givers). Changes in life-style and the economy added to the difficulties. By the 16th century, the diaconal system was no longer able to cope with the needs. In England the breakdown of the medieval provisions resulted in the Poor Law, by which minimal relief was provided to residents through a poor tax levied on all householders.

The reformers recalled the role of deacons in the NT church: Luther recommended that deacons "keep a register of poor people and care for them"; Calvin stressed that the proper function of a deacon was not liturgy but collecting alms from the faithful and distributing them to the poor. This was put into practice in some Reformed churches: male deacons administered the affairs of the poor, the women cared for the poor themselves. The 1662 Ordinal of the Church of England directed the deacon to search out the sick and poor of the parish and inform the curate, so that "by his exhortation they may be relieved with the alms of the parishioners, or others". The most extensive diaconal concern was shown by the radical reformers and institutionalized by the Mennonites and others.

Meanwhile in the Roman Catholic Church new religious orders, especially those inspired by St Vincent de Paul, specialized in various aspects of diakonia.

Under Turkish rule the Greek church found itself severely restricted from public diakonia, as more recently did several other Orthodox churches under various communist governments. A parish-church based diakonia and the restoration of some (formerly deaconess) diaconal houses is now occurring in some Eastern European countries.

SOCIAL REFORMERS OF THE 19TH CENTURY

With the Industrial Revolution and the rise of laissez-faire capitalism, many people suffered extreme hardship, and a feared “means test” was sometimes used to assess whether one was among the “deserving poor”. Both Christian and secular interests tackled these problems in the 19th century. In Hamburg the threat of revolution and social hardship led Wichern to form the Innere (or “Home”) Mission and to train deacons. At Kaiserswerth the social conditions of women and children led Fliedner to found a training institution for deaconesses who would serve as nurses and teachers in parishes. The 19th-century deacon and deaconess movement understood evangelization and diakonia as a unity and developed large institutions to care for the sick, epileptic, elderly and people with disabilities, etc.

Secular and Christian social reformers made many people conscious of the plight of their neighbours. Public charities increased, and secular movements produced a philanthropy not tied to any religion or denomination (e.g. the Red Cross). Meanwhile, the idea of the professional social worker began to emerge.

ECUMENICAL DIAKONIA

While the activities of the ecumenical movement of the 20th century tended at the outset mainly to take the form of conferences, meetings and reflection, a pioneering venture in ecumenical diakonia emerged in 1922 with the founding of the European Central Bureau for Inter-Church Aid under the auspices of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches, later joined by other European churches. Over the next 23 years this agency distributed millions of dollars’ worth of relief to churches, Christian institutions and pastors in need both in Europe and elsewhere, before merging in 1945 with the WCC, then in process of formation.

The WCC’s direct involvement in diakonia had begun during the years of the second world war in the form of ministry to refugees and prisoners of war, working closely with a variety of other churches and church-related organizations, as well as the Red Cross. Plans for post-war involvement in reconstruction were laid already in 1942. The scope of the refugee service – which focused on the more than 12 million people driven from their homes in Europe – soon extended to work with Palestinians displaced after the founding of the state of Israel in 1948; and from there the WCC broadened its diaconal service to other forms of emergency relief and service worldwide. The first meeting of the WCC central committee after Amsterdam, in Chichester, UK, in 1949, underscored that interchurch aid* is a permanent obligation of the WCC, not a temporary engagement that would come to an end with the completion of reconstruction after the war, and that this is a spiritual and not just a material task. There was also a widespread agreement that the most effective diakonia is that which is rendered ecumenically, rather than bilaterally between churches of the same tradition.

Over the years, the WCC has engaged in considerable reflection on the meaning of diakonia. In 1966 a world consultation on interchurch aid, refugee and world service convened by the WCC in Swanwick, UK, added the idea of social advancement or social action to the prevailing concept of social relief work and service. The WCC was seen as playing a major role in the coordination of the help coming from the growing regional and national Christian agencies, especially in Europe. In 1967 the WCC, the International Federation of Innere Mission and Diakonie, and DIAKONIA established a diakonia desk for research and action attached to the WCC’s interchurch aid unit, though a subsequent major restructuring of the WCC in 1971 made it more difficult for the members of the diaconates to contribute to international ecumenical discussions about diakonia.

As the Western Christian aid and development agencies grew, often with major government support, criticism of the “new missionaries of the interchurch aid empire” was increasingly heard in some quarters. They were charged with making the same mistakes and putting almost the same pressures on developing nations that international aid does. This viewpoint would prefer a local sharing of resources (P. Gregorios, 3-5). The WCC’s sixth assembly re-affirmed that “diakonia as the church’s ministry of sharing, healing and reconciliation is of the very nature of the church. It demands of individuals and churches a giving which comes not out of what they have, but what they are.” The WCC sought to broaden traditional understandings of diakonia and the ecumenical sharing of resources* to go beyond a focus on material transfers from rich to poor and to enable practical partnerships which involved people as well as funds. A global consultation on diakonia in Larnaca, Cyprus, in 1986 discussed such issues as worldwide regression to parochialism, hunger, debt, armaments expenditure, and uprooted people. It noted that diakonia can exist on various levels — emergency, prevention, rehabilitation, development and change — and that the form it takes should be shaped by local needs. For the future, Larnaca suggested (1) renewal of philanthropic diakonia, (2) diakonia and development for justice and human rights and dignity, (3) diakonia for peace between people, (4) diakonia and church unity in the service of society, and (5) diakonia and inter-religious understanding for common involvement in justice and peace.

DIAKONIA AND THE CHURCHES TODAY

From the 1960s to the 1980s, as governments in Western Europe tended to take on more responsibility for social security, some churches left diakonia in the hands of the social services and welfare and saw their diaconal role as one of only “plugging the gaps”. A number of churches established “boards of social responsibility” or similar bodies to influence government policy and thus practise prophetic diakonia. Especially in Eastern Europe, Christians were asking what it means to be a Christian in a socialist and communist state. Others reflected on what it means to be a Christian and to be a church in a capitalist state. Does it mean evangelizing the government as well as those in private companies? In the global village, is diakonia to be exercised only towards the Christian neighbour, or is it for all?

Individual churches in different cultures vary immensely in their degree of articulation of diakonia and in their practice. There is also great variation concerning who has primary responsibility for diakonia: central church offices (bishops or specialized national agencies), local presbyters, deacons, professional social workers or laity.

In Germany, church tax helps to support large evangelical and Catholic diaconal institutions. In January 1998 the many forms of individual and institutional work of Diakonisches Werk of the Evangelical Church in Germany involved more than 419,000 staff in some 30,130 institutions. In the Netherlands, elected lay deacons collect offerings and use them for projects at home and abroad. In some Scandinavian countries each parish is obliged to have a deacon or deaconess authorized by the church to visit those in need.

The theoretical basis for diakonia in the RCC is mainly found in the various papal encyclicals (see encyclicals, Roman Catholic social). The restructuring of the religious congregations has greatly affected their diakonia. Fewer religious and more lay professionals are now involved in the diminished institutional work, and religious are taking on new forms of work (e.g. AIDS* ministry). Caritas* is the largest Catholic aid agency.

The restored permanent diaconate of the RCC and the distinctive diaconate in some of the Anglican churches are becoming more active in advocacy for people in need, working for change which will produce justice for them, as well as continuing to lead in pastoral and emergency care. In many Anglican churches there is stress on studying root causes and trying to influence those in power. In England the Faith in the City report (1985) led to an exciting growth in church-based community work projects, but the question remains whether the church's diakonia can keep pace with the changes in the complex societies in which they live and work and whose problems and tensions they themselves share, as the 1988 Lambeth conference pointed out.

By the late 1980s, for reasons of both economic ideology and pragmatism, governmental authorities were increasingly asking voluntary agencies to take on the new tasks, precisely at a time when many churches were facing acute funding difficulties and had fewer staff and less financial resources for diakonia. But government support for church-related diaconal endeavours typically comes with restrictions, conditions and complicated reporting requirements, requiring further professionalization of diakonia.

Meanwhile, old problems increase in scope and new ones arise. What can churches do to ease the plight of the millions of refugees, internally displaced persons and other people living as migrants outside their countries of origin? Ad hoc responses to emergencies vie for money and staff with long-term evaluation and remedying of causes. On the global scale not only catastrophes but also recognized long-term needs seem to be growing more rapidly than the capacity to respond either at the national or international level. Countless questions arise: for example, about the relation of aid to dependency, about reconciling local grassroots people's participation with professionalization, about the allocation of church resources to emergency aid, prevention, rehabilitation, development and advocacy, about diakonia in the face of the special plight of women and children, and so on.

During the 1990s the challenge of diakonia faced churches in the formerly socialist countries of Central and Eastern Europe in dramatic new ways. The collapse of the economic system brought to the surface a wide range of unmet needs in society, but the churches, having been prevented from undertaking diaconal activities for more than 40 years (and in Russia for more than 70 years), had few structures and little experience for this. In the case of the Orthodox churches, significant reflection on diakonia had come from a 1978 consultation in Crete, which had articulated a theological approach linking diakonia with leitourgia: "Christian diakonia is not an optional action... but an indispensable expression of that community, which has its source in the eucharistic and liturgical life of the church. It is a 'liturgy after the Liturgy'."

With international ecumenical assistance, churches in Eastern Europe were soon undertaking a variety of major initiatives in diakonia in their own countries. A consultation organized by the Conference of European Churches in Bratislava in 1994 made it evident that the reality of the situation was not one of rebuilding church-based social care in this part of the world but of beginning from scratch. In the conflict around the break-up of the former Yugoslavia during the 1990s, Hungarian interchurch aid played a significant role in delivering diaconal services. As the conflict went on, Orthodox emergency aid conducted at an international level came to be extremely important in partnership with church-related agencies and the WCC.

Those involved in diakonia, whether as professionals or volunteers, would view service to the neighbour as half of the church's life, the other half being the worship of God. But in international, national, regional and local church structures diakonia is too often marginalized, and decisions are made by those who give priority to the pastoral care of the gathered church.

II. THE ORGANIZATION DIAKONIA

DIAKONIA became part of the ecumenical movement shortly before the founding of the WCC. After the second world war, the European deaconess associations felt a need to form a close-knit federation. Thanks to Dutch initiative, an international conference in 1946 appointed an interim committee to work out a plan for an international organization. After much study, prayer and consultation, this committee met in Riehen, Switzerland, in April 1947 and produced a proposal which formed the basis of the constitution for DIAKONIA as an international ecumenical federation of diaconal associations and sisterhoods. It was adopted by the delegates of the various countries at a conference in Copenhagen in October 1947. In the beginning a conference was held every two years for the consideration of mutual concerns; from 1951 to 1975 DIAKONIA met every three years; at present the federation holds such conferences every four years.

The constitution of DIAKONIA was rewritten at Manila in 1979 as the constitution of the World Federation of Diaconal Associations and Sisterhoods, further revised in accordance with the law of the Netherlands and approved at the Wolfville assembly in Nova Scotia, Canada, in 1992. The official name is now Foundation DIAKONIA: World Federation of Diaconal Associations and Diaconal Communities.

DIAKONIA has the status of an international ecumenical organization in working relationship with the WCC and sends a representative as an observer to central committee meetings. Its aims are to further ecumenical relationships between diaconal associations in various countries, to reflect on the nature and task of diakonia and the diaconate in the New Testament sense and to further the understanding of it, to strengthen a sense of community among the associations and sisterhoods, to render mutual aid and to undertake common tasks.

DIAKONIA presently comprises 65 individual associations or federations of many associations in some 36 countries. It has three working groups: Kaire, which encourages an ecumenical spiritual experience that embraces both contemplation and service; Koinonia/Diakonia, which reflects on the meaning and understanding of diakonia/diaconate and its practical consequences in churches and parishes (1971-94); and Diakaid, a programme for mutual aid and exchange of personnel. Its three regional sections – DOTAC (the Americas and Caribbean), DAP (Asia and the Pacific) and DRAE (Africa and Europe) – are becoming increasingly important for its work between assemblies. At DIAKONIA's world assembly at Friedrichroda, Thuringia, in eastern Germany in 1996, some of the work which its executive committee has been doing on the theology of diakonia and of the diaconate was presented to the delegates.

DIALOGUE, BILATERAL

IN THE 16th century and later, bilateral dialogues, i.e. religious conversations between two parties only, were a usual method of overcoming or of avoiding church division. At the time of the Reformation, there were such bilateral religious conversations (between Catholics and Lutherans, Lutherans and Anglicans, and Reformed and Lutherans); in the early 20th century such dialogues also took place, e.g. between Anglicans and Roman Catholics (1921-26), Anglicans and Orthodox (1930-), Anglicans and Old Catholics (1931), and Lutherans and Reformed (1947-). Then for a time bilateral dialogues receded into the background. Multilateral ecumenical encounters and dialogues strongly prevailed, particularly in the realm of the WCC.

The 1960s brought a new emphasis on and a sudden surge of bilateral dialogues. Today, there is a widespread network of bilateral dialogues on both international and national levels, in which almost all churches and church traditions are involved. Thus, bilateral dialogues have again become a main focus within the modern ecumenical movement.

Two factors especially contributed to this development. First, the multilateral encounters of the early ecumenical movement and later within the WCC, particularly its Faith and Order* commission, prepared the ground both theologically and spiritually for a more direct encounter between the individual churches. Second, the official entry of the Roman Catholic Church into the ecumenical movement with the Second Vatican Council* brought in a church which, by its strong sense of identity and universality, had a natural preference for bilateral dialogues. Other churches, particularly those with their own fairly strong sense of identity and worldwide coherence in doctrine, worship and practice, took up the dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church and subsequently also among themselves.

Apart from their bilateral method, most such dialogues have two features. First, they are official church dialogues in that they are authorized by the respective church authorities who appoint the delegates and to whom the results must be directly submitted. Second, they are mainly concerned with doctrinal matters (esp. authority* in the church, eucharist,* ministry,* ecclesiology), the aim being to overcome the church-divisive divergences inherited from the past and reach agreements on these issues sufficient for the establishment of closer fellowship.

This bilateral form of dialogue has gained renewed emphasis for three reasons. First, the bilateral approach allows for thorough and detailed study of the specific issues which separate two traditions and, at the same time, makes it possible to bring out more effectively the elements which, despite separation, the traditions have in common. Second, the official nature of the dialogue helps in reaching results which carry at least a certain amount of authority and thereby contributes to the process of receiving the dialogue results in the churches (see reception). Third, the emphasis on doctrinal matters results from the conviction that the theological divergences rooted in the historical heritage of the churches are still operative today and must be overcome if an authentic and lasting church fellowship is to be established.

A disadvantage of bilateral dialogues may be the danger of isolating the individual dialogues from each other and of losing sight of the indivisibility of the ecumenical movement. In order to counteract this danger, there have been periodic forums on bilateral dialogues since 1978; the eighth in 2001. These have demonstrated that bilateral dialogues and multilateral dialogues are not to be seen as alternatives, but that both types of ecumenical dialogue have their specific tasks and are therefore in need of close interrelation.

DIALOGUE, INTERFAITH

THE STRUGGLE to comprehend the relationship between Christianity and other religious traditions has been an important issue from the beginnings of the church.* Christian faith* was born in a Jewish milieu. Inevitably it soon came into contact with the Graeco-Roman world. When persons who were not of Jewish origin became Christians, controversy erupted over the basis of their common life in a religious community made up of Jews and Gentiles (Acts 15; Gal. 2). In his letter to the Romans, Paul seeks to clarify theologically the relationship between the Jewish religious tradition and the Christian faith, which by then were beginning to be seen as two distinct religious groupings. Writing to the Corinthians, Paul gave pastoral advice to people who had become followers of Christ but had partners in marriage who continued to remain in another religious tradition (1 Cor. 7:12-16).

The writings of the early church also show that there were divergent schools of thought on how to understand and relate to religious life that was not based on Christian convictions. The history of Christianity is also the history of Christian relationships, for the most part conflictual, with other faith traditions. This survey confines itself to the period of the modern ecumenical movement and to the development of the concept and practice of interfaith dialogue inspired by and structured within it.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The world missionary conference at Edinburgh in 1910 is commonly accepted as marking the beginning of the modern ecumenical movement. This conference appealed to the 1200 delegates sent by missionary societies and so-called younger churches (a total of only 17) to bring about the evangelization of the world in that generation.

The question of Christian understanding of and relationship to other religious traditions was a central issue in Edinburgh, and the section that dealt with the missionary message in relation to non-Christian religions was by common consent the finest of all the reports produced at Edinburgh. It spoke of the Christian encounter with the religious traditions of Asia, for example, as being of the same order as the meeting of the New Testament church with Graeco-Roman culture, demanding fundamental shifts in Christian self-understanding and theology. While the evangelistic thrust predominated in the overall Edinburgh message, the discussions there stimulated scholarly interest both in comparative religion and in exploring the Christian relation to other faith traditions. An influential book of the period was J.N. Farquhar's The Crown of Hinduism, which argued that Christ fulfilled the longings and aspirations of Hinduism.

By the time of the next international missionary conference (Jerusalem 1928), considerable controversy had arisen within the missionary movement over the approach to other religious traditions. Some European theologians detected in liberal Protestantism, especially in the USA, troubling arguments, however tentative, in support of a universal religion.* There was also deep concern that what was considered "syncretistic thinking" with regard to Asian religions was undermining the importance and urgency of Christian mission.* But the issue that dominated the Jerusalem meeting was rising secularism in both East and West (see secularization). While asserting that the Christian gospel provided the answers to a troubled world, the conference affirmed the "values" in other religions and called on Christians to join hands with all believers to confront the growing impact of secular culture.

But some participants could not agree with Jerusalem's positive affirmation of other faiths and maintained that the Christian gospel is unique among religious traditions. Thus, even though the message was unanimously accepted (largely due to the drafting skills of William Temple), the Christian attitude to other faiths became a highly controversial issue shortly after the Jerusalem meeting. At the heart of the post-Jerusalem dispute was the Report of the Commission of Appraisal of the Laymen's Foreign Mission Enquiry, edited by W.E. Hocking, which criticized the exclusive attitude of Christians towards other faiths and claimed that the challenge to the Christian faith came not from other faiths but from anti-religious and secular movements. In response, the leadership of the missionary movement commissioned Hendrik Kraemer, the well-known Dutch missiologist then working as a missionary in Java, to write a book on the biblical and theological basis of the Christian attitude to other faiths. Kraemer's The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World became the preparatory study book for the next international missionary conference in Tambaram, India, in 1938.

Kraemer, following Karl Barth, insisted that the biblical faith, based on God's encounter with humankind, is radically different from all other forms of religious faith. Admitting that God's will shines through, albeit in a broken way, in the all-too-human attempts to know God in all religious life, Kraemer maintained that the only true way to know the revealed will of God is by responding to the divine intervention in history in Christ. Both Barth and Kraemer considered Christianity as a religion to be as human as any other. But neither could avoid giving, at least by implication, a unique place to Christianity in so far as it had become the vehicle through which the unique revelation* of God is lived and proclaimed.

Despite Kraemer's impact on Tambaram and subsequent missionary thinking, there were many dissenting voices. A.G. Hogg, H.H. Farmer, T.C. Chao and others challenged Kraemer's view that the gospel was in discontinuity with other religious traditions. They witnessed to what they were convinced was a "two-way traffic" between God and the human soul in the religious life and experience of others. It was inconceivable to them that God had no witnesses among the nations of the earth. All participants agreed on the special revelatory character of the Christ event, but many had difficulty with Kraemer's view of religions as "totalitarian systems" of human thought and practice. Thus, although the Tambaram report leaned heavily towards Kraemer's views, it acknowledged that "Christians are not agreed" on the revelatory character of other religious traditions and identified this as "a matter urgently demanding thought and united study" within the ecumenical movement.

POST-TAMBARAM DEVELOPMENTS

Not long after Tambaram, Europe became embroiled in the second world war, and other concerns demanded the attention of the missionary movement. When the International Missionary Council* (IMC) turned its attention again to Christian relations to other faith traditions once the war was over, it was a different world. Nationalism was sweeping through the newly independent states in Asia and Africa, and with it came a revival of religious traditions. The churches, awakened to the need to express their unity in a world shattered by war, had come together in Amsterdam in 1948 to form the WCC. Both the IMC and the WCC's department on evangelism were eager to follow up on the unfinished Tambaram debate on other faiths.

One of the strategies adopted was to set up a number of study centres around the world that would address the question in concrete historical situations. Another was a long-term joint study on "The Word of God and the Living Faiths of Men", which sought to take the discussion beyond Tambaram and the continuity-discontinuity polarity.

A great deal of attention was focused on Asia, where outstanding work on the issue was carried out by Paul Devanandan, D.T. Niles, Sabapathy Kulendran and others. Devanandan's address to the New Delhi assembly of the WCC (1961) – at which the IMC was integrated into the WCC – challenged the churches to take seriously the experience of the younger churches in the newly independent countries, where they had to work and struggle together with peoples of different religious traditions in nation-building.

In this context the concept of dialogue appears in the New Delhi statement as a way of speaking about Christian relations with people of other faith traditions. This was further considered at the first world mission gathering under WCC auspices in Mexico City in 1963. A more significant discussion took place at the East Asia Christian Conference assembly in Bangkok in 1964. Its statement on "Christian Encounter with Men of Other Beliefs", incorporating much of the re-thinking in Asia in relation to other faiths, took the debate at many points beyond the Tambaram controversy.

A WCC conference in Kandy, Sri Lanka, in 1967, proved to be a landmark both as the beginning of serious interest in interfaith dialogue as such in the WCC, and as the first involvement in the ecumenical discussion of the Vatican Secretariat for Non-Christians. In Kandy Kenneth Cragg challenged in a fundamental way the Barth-Kraemer attitude to religions that had so dominated Protestant thinking during the previous decades.

DEVELOPMENTS WITHIN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

There were in fact significant differences between Protestants and Roman Catholics in their general theological orientation towards other religions. The Protestant missions tended to place enormous emphasis on Christology and on the need to respond to the message of the gospel as a way to salvation.* While the attitude to other faiths had not always been negative, it had tended to be neutral at best on the question of salvation outside a response to Christ. This gave rise to a sense of urgency to bring the message of the gospel to the nations of the world.

Roman Catholic theology placed greater emphasis on ecclesiology. Salvation is a free gift of God* offered in Christ to one who has faith in Christ. This faith is expressed by being baptized and becoming part of the church, which was instituted by Christ to carry on his saving work. Within the overall concept of the church as the sign and sacrament of the saving work of Christ available to all humankind, Roman Catholic theology could provide for the possibility of salvation to those who had not explicitly become members of the church. With reference to those who had lived before the ministry of Jesus and those who had had no opportunity to hear the message, Roman Catholic theology developed the idea of "implicit faith" or “faith by intention”, so that no one was “lost” simply because he or she was born at a particular time or place which made it impossible to become part of the historical expression of the church. Salvation offered in Christ is mysteriously available to all who seek to fulfill the will of God; it is possible to be incorporated into the sacrament of the paschal mystery, the church, by intention.

These thoughts were developed in the 1960s by French cardinal Jean Daniélou and German theologian Karl Rahner. In so doing these two prominent Catholic thinkers spelled out the theological implications of some of the positive developments at the Second Vatican Council regarding the question of other faiths.

The Roman Catholic Church (like the WCC and many of its member churches) has had a long history of relating to the Jewish people. During Vatican II* it was decided that a similar relation should be developed with the followers of other religions as well. Pope Paul VI thus established a special secretariat (later a pontifical council) for relationships with non-Christians; and the papal encyclical Ecclesiam Suam emphasized the importance of positive encounter between Christians and people of other faith traditions. The Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra Aetate), promulgated on 28 October 1965, spelled out the pastoral dimensions of this relationship. Other key Vatican II documents, such as the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (Lumen Gentium) and the Decree on the Church’s Missionary Activity (Ad Gentes), included important pointers to a dialogical attitude towards people of other religious traditions.

Although Vatican II did not develop clear theological positions on other religions, it did, by opening up the issue in the direction of interfaith dialogue, mark a new phase in the relationships of the Roman Catholic Church, in all parts of the world, with people of other faiths. The preparatory materials for the Kandy meeting included Nostra Aetate and parts of Lumen Gentium.

THE DIALOGUE CONTROVERSY

The Kandy meeting affirmed dialogue as the most appropriate approach in interfaith relations, and after the Uppsala assembly

(1968) the WCC commission on World Mission and Evangelism engaged Stanley J. Samartha of India to pursue with greater intensity a study begun some years earlier on “The Word of God and the Living Faiths of Men”. A turning point in this study was the first multifaith dialogue convened under WCC auspices: Hindu, Buddhist, Muslim and Christian participants came to Ajaltoun, Lebanon, in 1970, not only to consult about inter-religious dialogue, but also actually to engage in it. Two months later, a WCC consultation in Zurich evaluated theologically the experience of dialogue in Ajaltoun and produced a report that became the fundamental document on the basis of which the WCC central committee, meeting in Addis Ababa in 1971, created a new Sub-unit on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies, with Samartha as its director.

The establishment of the Vatican Secretariat for Non-Christians and the WCC Sub-unit on Dialogue heightened the visibility of interfaith dialogue in the life of the churches. The secretariat published materials promoting interfaith dialogue and encouraged closer collaboration between Christians and others in local situations. The WCC Dialogue Sub-unit organized bilateral dialogue meetings with Jews, Muslims, Hindus and Buddhists and sought to clarify the meaning and significance of interfaith dialogue.

Basically, interfaith dialogue was understood as an encounter between people who live by different faith traditions, in an atmosphere of mutual trust and acceptance. Dialogue did not require giving up, hiding or seeking to validate one’s own religious conviction; in fact, the need for being rooted in one’s own tradition to be engaged in a meaningful dialogue was emphasized, as were common humanity and the need to search in a divided world for life in community. Dialogue was seen as a way not only to become informed about the faiths of others but also to rediscover essential dimensions of one’s own faith tradition. The benefits of removing historical prejudices and enmities as well as the new possibilities for working together for common good were recognized and affirmed.

Within this general framework individual theological explorations have yielded a variety of points of view. Some see dialogue primarily as a new and creative relationship within which one can learn about and respect others but also can give authentic witness* to one's own faith. Others see it as an important historical moment in the development of religious traditions, in which each of the faith traditions in dialogue is challenged and transformed by the encounter with others. Still others view dialogue as a common pilgrimage towards the truth, within which each tradition shares with the others the way it has come to perceive and respond to that truth.

Within the Christian tradition, the practice of dialogue has raised questions regarding the theological assumptions about other faiths at the heart of Christian mission. Suspicion of interfaith dialogue among some Christians surfaced in the open controversy at the WCC's fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975). For the first time, five persons of other faiths were invited to a WCC assembly as special guests and took part in the discussions of the section on "Seeking Community", where the dialogue issue was debated. Plenary discussion of the report of this section highlighted the deep disagreement within the church on the issue of dialogue. Fears were expressed that dialogue would lead to the kind of syncretism* against which the 1928 Jerusalem meeting warned, or that it would compromise faith in the uniqueness and finality of the revelation in Christ, or that it would threaten mission seen as fundamental to the being of the church itself. As in Tambaram, Asian voices in particular defended dialogue as the most appropriate way for the church to live in a pluralistic world. The assembly referred the report back to the drafting group, which added a preamble to meet the hesitations expressed at the plenary.

But Nairobi made clear the urgent need to clarify further the nature, purpose and limits of interfaith dialogue and to give more detailed attention to issues of syncretism, indigenization, culture,* mission, etc. Evaluating the debate, the WCC central committee authorized a major theological consultation to pursue further the questions raised at the assembly. That meeting, on the theme "Dialogue in Community", held in Chiang Mai, Thailand, in 1977, aimed to clarify the Christian basis for seeking community with others and to draw up guidelines for Christian communities in pluralistic situations, in order that they might become communities of service and witness, without compromising their commitment to Christ.

The Chiang Mai consultation affirmed that dialogue is neither a betrayal of mission nor a "secret weapon" of proselytism but a way "in which Jesus Christ can be confessed in the world today". The Chiang Mai meeting led to the formulation of "Guidelines on Dialogue", adopted by the WCC central committee in 1979 and commended to the churches for study and action.

Within the Roman Catholic Church, there were similar problems. All agreed on the need to develop positive and friendly relations with people of other faiths and on the value of interfaith dialogue for mutual understanding and collaboration. But the plenary commission of the secretariat also had to draw up guidelines that dealt with the purpose and goals of dialogue so that it was seen within the overall convictions of the church; the relationship of dialogue to mission remained a persistent problem also in Roman Catholic discussions. In general, dialogue and mission have been affirmed as legitimate activities of the church. The initial guidelines sought to avoid placing dialogue at the service of mission, a view advocated by some within both the Roman Catholic Church and the member churches of the WCC.

After many revisions, arising from disagreements among Catholics on the theological basis of dialogue, a version was officially accepted and issued by Pope John Paul II in 1984 under the title "The Attitude of the Church towards the Followers of Other Religions: Reflections and Orientations on Dialogue and Mission". Like the preamble to the WCC's Nairobi report, it stressed the missionary vocation of the church, even as it sought to exhort Christians to be in a relationship of dialogue with others. But the pressure to clarify further the dialogue-mission relation was so great that, not long after the proclamation of this statement, the secretariat had to begin work on a document that specifically dealt with "Dialogue and Proclamation".

DIALOGUE IN THE CHURCHES

While the theological issues continue to be discussed, dialogue activities have been more and more accepted at the local level. A number of churches have expanded their desks on ecumenical affairs to include an interfaith component. Some churches and councils have created staff positions to promote interfaith dialogue. There has been an increase in the number of local and international interfaith councils. Interest in interfaith prayer was further kindled by the call issued by Pope John Paul II to leaders of all religious communities to come together in Assisi in 1986 to pray for peace, an event that attracted media attention.

Interfaith dialogue today takes place at many levels. There is the continuing dialogue of life in all pluralistic situations. There is intentional dialogue, or discourse, where persons come together to share and converse on specific issues. There are academic dialogues among scholars, as well as spiritual dialogues, emphasizing prayer and meditation. Zen and Benedictine monasteries, for example, exchange monks each year to learn from each other's meditative practices. In India there are weekend live-in sessions where people of diverse traditions come together for exposure to each other's prayer life and to participate in common devotions. There is a proliferation of books and articles on interfaith dialogue and the challenge of pluralism.*

DIALOGUE AS A CONTINUING ECUMENICAL CONCERN

Evidence of the overall impact of the programme on dialogue was clear at the WCC's sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983). The number of guests of other faiths rose to 15, and four made presentations to plenary sessions. Interfaith dialogue was an integral part of the assembly's extensive visitors' programme. In the section on "Witness in a Divided World", there was no serious disagreement on the need for interfaith dialogue. There was, however, much controversy over the theology of religions, with a number of participants challenging a statement in the report that spoke of God's hand active in the religious life of our neighbours. Whether other religious traditions are vehicles of God's redeeming activity became a hotly debated issue.

Evaluating the experience of Vancouver, the Dialogue sub-unit identified theology of religions as an important issue for sustained study. A four-year study project – "My Neighbour's Faith – and Mine: Theological Discoveries through Interfaith Dialogue" – was launched with the distribution of a study booklet that was eventually translated into 18 languages, in order to raise the awareness of plurality in the churches and to explore how Christians today may look theologically at other traditions of faith. For the first time in the history of its mission conferences, the WCC invited consultants from other faith traditions to its tenth such conference, in San Antonio, Texas (1989), where the relationship of Christianity to other faiths and the challenge of dialogue to Christian understandings of mission and evangelism were among the major issues discussed. The preparation for the WCC's seventh assembly (Canberra 1991) was preceded by a major consultation on the theology of religions (Baar 1990). Representatives of other religious and indigenous traditions, including the Australian Aboriginal and Islander peoples, played a significant role in the Canberra programme, creating controversy and new interest both in gospel and culture and in the theological understanding of other religious traditions. A four-year study on gospel and culture* in the churches led to a report to the next world mission conference in Bahia, Brazil (1996). Issues in the theology of religions were followed up in Baar II (1993).

The WCC's eighth assembly (Harare 1998) provided additional opportunities for wider participation of persons of other faiths in an assembly. The padare (meeting place) programme enabled a succession of interfaith encounters between Christians and peoples of other faiths to be organized within the context of the assembly itself. Within the WCC, the post-Harare period has been marked by increased cooperation between the Office on Inter-religious Relations (successor to the Sub-unit on Dialogue in the WCC's new structure) and those programmes of the Council that deal with issues such as education, health, indigenous peoples, international relations and youth. Collaboration between the office and the Pontifical Council for Inter-religious Dialogue has also further developed. Joint studies have led to joint publications on interfaith prayer, interfaith marriages and the spiritual significance of Jerusalem.* A study project on the contribution of Africa to world religiosity is under way, involving various aspects of African-inspired religion.

Within the ecumenical family interfaith dialogue will continue to remain a profoundly important, if controversial, issue. The challenge it brings to the ecumenical movement is far-reaching. It summons the church to seek a new self-understanding in its relation to other religions. It requires it to look for deeper resources to deal with the reality of plurality, and it calls the church to new approaches to mission and witness.

DIALOGUE, INTRAFaITH

"DIALOGUE" has become a fashionable term, and correspondingly it lacks semantic clarity. It sounds civilized and reassuring, for it indicates an effort to fight with the weapons of the mind or even to let contrasting positions stand. In the broadest political context dialogue is the opposite of an attitude in which conflict is waged with weapons of devastating power. It is for this reason that the threat to break off dialogue – e.g. in the statement "we have nothing more to say to each other" – has such a menacing sound. Frequently the end of dialogue is the beginning of armed conflict. If we enter into dialogue, however, hostilities come to an end.

In church usage the term "dialogue" is applied in various sets of relationships. It is applied, for instance, to the relation between Christianity and world-views which are not religious, as was the case especially with Marxism. The Vatican has published documents on "dialogue with non-believers". Dialogue also characterizes the Christian relation to non-Christian religions. Furthermore, discussions between Christian churches have been described as the way "from polemics to dialogue". The Orthodox churches have described their opening up to the churches of the West as a "dialogue of love" which is intended to lead to a "dialogue of truth".

Lack of clarity in the understanding of dialogue increases when the meaning of this term is considered in the context of the philosophy of dialogue and personalism. Is dialogue a form of behaviour intended to solve problems, or a metaphor for mutual dependence in the age of pluralism? Is dialogue an expression of human openness from which the truth question is excluded, or is it in fact the opposite: a method which occurs only in discourse and which is to be used for deciding about the truth of propositions?

In view of the varied and often not very exact use of the word, Lukas Vischer expressed doubts in 1969 about whether the term was still appropriate as a way of describing the relation of the Christian churches to each other. According to him, "the word 'dialogue' is quickly losing the magic it had till quite recently, and there is even some uneasiness about its use. For what is it that the churches are doing when they converse together? Have these conversations become a means of preserving the churches in their present condition and actually protecting them against full fellowship? They are in dialogue. What more is needed?" (ER, 1970).

The view of interchurch dialogue presented here bases the understanding of dialogue on communio as the structure of the church, thus making dialogue fruitful for tackling ecumenical problems (see communio, koinonia).

A BASIS IN COMMUNIO AS THE STRUCTURE OF THE CHURCH

Often the importance of dialogue receives greater stress the further the other party seems to be removed from one's own religious conviction. In particular, official pronouncements from Rome promote dialogue with non-believers, with world religions and with other Christian confessions, but not (it seems to some Catholics) within the Catholic church itself. Against this it must be insisted that dialogue is a mark of the church,* which exists as a fellowship of churches. There is no longer any dispute among the confessions that the church occurs first of all as the local church,* and that the criteria which make a church the church are met in the local situation. These criteria are the proclamation of Christ's message (see word of God), the celebration of the sacraments,* Christian love (agape, caritas) and (for churches with an episcopate) the true (episcopal) ministry (see ministry in the church). These local churches cannot stand in mutual isolation if they wish to remain faithful to their Christian mission and message – i.e. they are members of a fellowship.

This communio of the churches is achieved differently in different Christian traditions. For the churches that have bishops, the highest representative of the universal church is the ecumenical council,* in which the bishops bear witness to the faith* of their churches, while regional synods express and embody the communio at their own geographical level. In non-episcopal churches the idea of "conciliar fellowship" (see conciliarity) links together the local churches in a network of exchanges, proclamation and criticism, and common efforts to find the right Christian path to follow. In this fellowship of local churches or among their representatives, the universal church is built up as communio. The Roman Catholic Church also took up this idea in Vatican II,* seeing the church no longer as a rigid, monolithic world church but as a fellowship of churches each contributing a part to the whole. In this communio structure and in the mutual interdependence of the local churches and their representatives, dialogue finds its basis as an element of the church's nature.

Individual local churches are also communio and also achieve fulfilment in dialogue. In all the confessions there are structures and forms of organization which are intended to ensure exchanges between the different functions, ministries and charisms.* These structures and forms make dialogue possible between ministers, church authorities, theologians and "laity". In this fellowship of different gifts and tasks, the Christian congregation achieves its proper form and can proclaim its message in faithfulness to its origins and with relevance to the situation.

This dialogue, as a realization of the communio structure of the church, also determines the relation of the Christian confessions to each other. In this dialogue the degree of fellowship already existing between the churches is realized, and a situation is sought in which the still-divided churches of today become churches which are parts within the one universal church or mutually recognize each other as part-churches and thus build up the universal church.

DIALOGUE AND UNDERSTANDING

The churches realize their communio structure in dialogue, and in this way their various functions, tasks and charisms and the different forms they have taken in time and space have a mutually fertilizing and stimulating effect. Such benefit occurs through their attempt to understand each other; dialogue contributes to (mutual) understanding. This process of understanding takes place at a given time between individuals in the churches, between different Christian traditions and between confessions in conflict or tension with each other; but it also takes place across time, in relation to the past.

The common factor in all these different efforts at understanding is that they are directed towards human beings or groups whose worlds are initially unfamiliar to me but which I presume have something to say to me and a meaning for my own self-understanding. But if the other party is in the first instance unfamiliar to me, how can I understand at all? My immediate horizon is the sphere within which I do my understanding. A text written long ago or uttered by someone who shapes his or her life within a circle of meaning unfamiliar to me has its own, and different, horizon. My position is not that of my opposite number but is in my own particular world. I have my particular horizon, not that of the other person.

In the process of understanding, we are attempting first of all to incorporate the unfamiliar world in our own horizon. We therefore think initially that we shall find a confirmation of everything we already knew and wanted – congenial things that fit in with our own pre-understanding. But the unfamiliar world will simply not be disclosed in this way. Rather, understanding takes place because a strange world initially strikes us precisely as strange. Pre-eminently it was Hans-Georg Gadamer who drew attention to this fact. Initially I think I understand, but at that stage I have still not got beyond the circle of my own pre-understanding and prejudice. Unfamiliar things and people who live differently do not seem at first to be a problem, and everything makes some kind of sense on my own terms. Here I am still continuing to understand only myself. But the more I concern myself with a text or with people or with a church, the clearer it becomes that I no longer understand. Only on the collapse of my own pre-understanding do I begin to understand and another world becomes comprehensible to me in (so to speak) its own terms. So long as everything seems to be free of problems, I am working only on the basis of my own preconceptions. The first stage in any understanding is when something becomes unfamiliar and is not understood. This stage in dialogue cannot be eliminated.

In understanding, I must recognize the unfamiliar horizon but must also hold on to my own horizon. Each is equally necessary for dialogue; after all, it is I who am seeking to understand, and this means that I am not simply absorbed into the unfamiliar world. I have to live within my own horizon of understanding. In dialogue, which is meant to lead to understanding, my self-understanding is made new. The aim of the dialogue is a fusion of the horizons – of my own and the unfamiliar horizon. In understanding I remain myself, and yet as an unfamiliar world opens up to me I become another. A new world thus discloses itself to me, and my own self-understanding assumes a new form. The person who is engaged in understanding changes, and one's horizon expands. Thus dialogue opens up the future and freedom to act. New worlds and possibilities for action open up for me in the act of understanding. Understanding demands that I should take my own and the unfamiliar horizon equally seriously; and when the two horizons fuse, the aim is achieved.

INTERCHURCH DIALOGUE

All churches have conducted dialogue, constantly striving better to understand their ministers, theologians, fellow Christians, doctrinal traditions, and above all the biblical proclamation, and thus better to preach the Christian message and to put it into practice more fully and thoroughly. Since the age of the church fathers, dialogue has been a means of improving the formulation or implementation and exposition of Christian doctrine. Behind the medieval disputations, which flourished for the last time at the Reformation, lay the awareness that if the truth is to be discovered everyone is needed and must make his or her contribution. The rules of disputation at the medieval universities were meant to systematize dialogue and guarantee at the same time that the parties to the dialogue listened to and learned from each other – and did not simply try to confute each other.

But from the time of the Reformation, the churches carried on dialogue only with those they regarded as standing on the same ground as themselves ecclesially. It was, so to speak, only half a dialogue, which did not seek to understand the unfamiliar horizon but deliberately excluded it. Even in the ancient church, dialogue was not a stylistic medium for disputations with pagan philosophy. Medieval scholasticism did not argue with heretics. In that direction no common basis was seen that could have facilitated and justified a dialogue, and the religious discussions of the Reformation were used not to contribute to understanding the other but to demonstrate their error. From then on, a fusion of horizons transcending confessional boundaries was excluded as the point of the process of understanding, for there was in fact no desire to learn or to change. This meant that a basic presupposition for any dialogue whatever was missing.

This curtailment of dialogue to half-measures defined by confessional boundaries meant that the churches inevitably became partisan and gradually defined themselves in opposition to rival churches. Every Christian tradition emphasized one particular element in a special way and regarded this as the differentia of one's own church as opposed to the other confession. The term "Protestantism"* came to be used in a primarily critical way, and the protest against, or criticism of, everything Roman Catholic became the distinctive feature which characterized the Reformation churches. After the council of Trent,* the basis of self-understanding among Roman Catholics came to be the rejection of the Reformation, and catechisms* incorporated the idea of "not being Protestant" as Roman Catholic teaching. The after-effects of these antagonisms have continued to the present day: the "church of the word" was opposed to "the church of the sacraments", the "church of the clergy" to that of the "priesthood of all believers", the "church of authority" to that of the "freedom of a Christian man". The resulting differences were often elevated into the specific confessional identity – the "Protestant principle" or the "fundamental Catholic option". Each side identified itself by its protest against the other or against the picture it had constructed of the other. The wall of separation between them served as a means of defining their own standpoints. The separation became a system of coordinates within which their own position was fixed.

To overcome such one-sidedness and regain the fullness of witness, the churches of each individual tradition do not need to disavow it but need to understand it and change themselves in a fusion of horizons. Only the tradition which is still unfamiliar, and dialogue with it, can provide what is lacking in the various confessionally blinkered views of doctrine and structure in church and devotional life, or can balance one's own bias by other elements in tension with it. The churches need dialogue and the fusion of their horizons that occurs in the process of understanding so that they will not truncate the gospel and so that men and women today may be able to discover a meaning to their existence and a way of structuring their lives and world through encounter with the full Christian revelation.

CONSEQUENCES FOR THE OIKOUMENE

Dialogue presupposes both common elements and divergences. Where there is no common basis, no dialogue takes place. At best there are two-way monologues which serve to create barriers, not understanding. Dialogue requires the other to be genuinely other and calls for a readiness to listen to the other and learn from the other.

Dialogue assists self-discovery. Thus the churches need dialogue to become genuinely Christian and credible. Because of the division of the Christian world, each of the churches has become partisan and has lost credibility and the power to persuade. Ecumenical dialogue is a means of enabling them to disclose to each other what each of them has repressed and cannot acquire again in its own strength. Through ecumenical dialogue the churches will become more credible witnesses for Jesus' cause than they are at present.

Understanding means changing ourselves – in a fusion of horizons. I emerge from a dialogue changed from what I was when I entered into it. "Reception"* is not a later recognition of what has been agreed but an inherent dimension of understanding itself. If I am not ready for input in this way, then I have not been in dialogue. In dialogue I cannot predict how and in what direction this change will take place. Dialogue is therefore always hazardous. If churches exclude a change of this kind, they are not conducting a dialogue, even if they are talking to each other.

My own position is just as indispensable for dialogue as my partner's. Only if I as myself come with my ideas and convictions and contribute what is my own to the conversation can I carry on a dialogue. Dialogue does not mean a surrender but an encounter of different horizons. It would serve no one's purpose if we were willing in advance to discard our own convictions for the sake of a false irenic approach. "Fusion of horizons" presupposes the existence of the two horizons. Abandonment of our own position is no way to conduct dialogue.

It is part of the process of mutual understanding that initially we become detached from ourselves and can no longer easily understand and accept some things. This is where dialogue inevitably becomes difficult. We are all too easily tempted to accept the other only within the limits of our own horizon. And then if someone belonging to another confession acts in a way that does not correspond to the knowledge I already have, that person is often regarded as being dishonest and insincere. Mutual accusations of dishonesty, which have by no means been overcome in interconfessional relations, seem the most dangerous way of misunderstanding others and claiming to have the truth ourselves. In dialogue, too, I must grant that the other can be different and can react differently from what I expect. Without this acceptance of unfamiliarity and clarification of misconceptions, oikoumene would remain superficial and bogged down in an initial, facile stage of understanding.

Controversy and argument are also part of dialogue and can contribute to an enlargement of the horizon for both parties. This controversy is not the same thing as polemics, which does not seek to understand others or learn anything from them. As long as the readiness exists to let the other tell us something, to listen to his or her arguments and to acquire something of value for our own form of Christian life and doctrine from the way the others structure their Christianity, a controversy can be wholly fruitful for dialogue and can promote the credibility of the Christian churches.

After 35 years of practical experience since Vatican II, officers from the WCC and the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity considered the time had come for a fresh study of "the nature and purpose of ecumenical dialogue", with recognition of its existential character, its many ecclesial levels, its commitment to truth, its transformative aims, and the complexity of the hermeneutical contexts in which it is conducted and its result are received (see The Ecumenical Review, July 2000, for the twofold proposal to the Joint Working Group* from WCC general secretary Konrad Raiser and Bishop Walter Kasper of the PCPCU).

DIALOGUE, MULTILATERAL

FROM THE beginning of the modern ecumenical movement, bilateral and multilateral dialogues have been conducted side by side. Bilateral dialogues* enjoy the advantage of allowing the two parties to concentrate on the particular issues that have divided them or the common ground that still or already joins them. If the problems can be settled or mutual recognition achieved, official action towards the restoration or establishment of closer unity* may follow quite expeditiously, e.g. the Leuenberg concordat of 1973 (see Lutheran-Reformed dialogue) between European Lutherans and Reformed, or the Bonn accord of 1931 between the Anglicans and Old Catholics, or even the various church unions between Methodist and Reformed denominations beginning with the United Church of Canada in 1925. This piecemeal approach, however, takes place within the broader ecumenical movement, whose complexity is ensured by the fissiparous history of Christendom that it seeks to mend. This wider context calls forth multilateral dialogue(s).

While a few multilateral church unions have taken place at a national or regional level (notably the Church of South India, 1947, and the Church of North India, 1970), at the universal level the WCC has been the principal locus and instrument of the churches for multilateral dialogue. In particular, Faith and Order* has supplied the forum for the most sustained and cumulative treatment of doctrinal matters. The furthest development up to now has been embodied in "the BEM process" (see Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry). This experience has suggested a number of characteristics of multilateral dialogue in the ecumenical movement.

A certain common ground is needed for dialogue. This has been minimally provided by the membership basis of the WCC (see WCC, basis of). While member churches may retain their own ecclesiology (see Toronto statement), to join the fellowship of the WCC implies the provisional judgment that one's fellow members are at least plausible partners in a common effort to serve the Triune God (see Trinity). It is worth noting that the Roman Catholic Church (since 1968) and some other churches not in membership with the WCC have official representatives on the F&O commission.

The interchurch dynamics of multilateral dialogue vary with the issues under discussion. It is not always easy to say who stands to the "right" or to the "left", who holds the "higher" or "lower" churchmanship. Having confronted the intricate diplomacy of seating arrangements at Amsterdam 1948, the Russian-American Orthodox theologian Alexander Schmemmann was fond of saying that on some matters he belonged with the Quakers rather than with his ostensibly nearer neighbours among the Old Catholics or the Anglicans. While "reunion all-round" was the mocking title of a pamphlet by the then Anglican satirist Ronald Knox in 1914, at the Lambeth conference of 1988 Archbishop Robert Runcie called for "an all-round ecumenism". Most churches have in fact discovered in and through multilateral dialogue that there are worthwhile relationships to be cultivated in all directions.

Progress may be slow, and great patience required, as the attempt is made to clarify the manifold positions of the churches, to develop a convergence from many different starting points and to keep the greatest possible number of the participants in a state of positive engagement for the furthest possible advance. The reward will be the maturity which is widely recognized in the Lima text, which resulted from 55 years of attention to questions of baptism, eucharist and ministry in F&O.

The multilateral dialogues have profited from, and perhaps contributed to, the more diffuse and sometimes less official movements which have drawn scholars and church people from a very wide spectrum together in the 20th century. At the academic level, some agreement has been attained in exegetical methods (see exegesis, method of) and hermeneutical principles (see hermeneutics). At the pastoral level, most churches have been affected by the liturgical movement.* BEM would have been unthinkable without the "biblical theology" of the middle third of the 20th century and the recovery of patristic perspectives on worship and the sacraments.

Multilateral dialogue helps to "keep the churches honest" in what they affirm with various particular partners in their respective bilateral dialogues. It would, for instance, be wrong to play up the question of episcopal succession in discussion with one body while playing it down with another. Less suspiciously put, multilateral dialogue encourages the churches to develop positions which are both internally consistent and simultaneously mindful of their effect on all interlocutors. Positive signs are the "borrowings" of material which take place between multilateral dialogues and the various bilaterals. Under the auspices of F&O and the officers' conference of Christian World Communions,* eight forums (1978, 1979, 1980, 1985, 1990, 1994, 1997 and 2001) have enabled the tendencies and results of the various bilateral dialogues to be compared multilaterally.

Multilateral dialogue tends to focus on central themes of the Christian faith,* since these are shared by the greatest range of partners, and it is on these that it is most important to find agreement in confession and interpretation. It is significant that the continuing F&O study "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today" took the Nicene Creed* as its "theological basis and methodological tool". At the same time, multilateral dialogue allows even a single church to put on the agenda for universal attention a matter whose importance may not be widely perceived, or which others might have chosen to avoid; so that the reduction of agreement to a few uncontroversial commonplaces is less of a risk.

Multilateral dialogue corresponds to the fact that, in many ways, the churches in the 20th century have faced common tasks in a common world. The churches have needed and enjoyed mutual support among as many as they can each recognize, at least prima facie, to be responding to the same call to worship the Triune God (leitourgia), to proclaim the gospel of Christ (martyria), and to serve the needy among humankind (diakonia).

At the turn into the 21st century, the F&O study on "The Nature and Purpose of the Church" (interim statement 1998) is summoning the divided "churches" to discern through their dialogue where "the church" is to be found.

DIASPORA

THE TERM "diaspora" is a Greek word meaning dispersion, dissemination (the Hebrew equivalent is galuth), applied by biblical writers to the situation of the Jews scattered in various places around the world, living as separate communities in foreign, sometimes hostile environments. The New Testament does not apply it to the situation of the Christian church; its three occurrences (John 7:35; James 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:1) clearly refer to the Jewish diaspora (including Jewish Christians). The related verb diaspeiresthai is used twice in the NT for the result of the first persecution against the disciples of Jesus of Nazareth (Acts 8:1-4, 11:19; RSV "scattered"). Another verb, diaskorpizein, conveys the idea of dispersion, conceived as a (temporary) curse, not as the manifest destiny of the Christian church (Matt. 26:31 and the oft-quoted John 11:52). Whereas the Old Testament as a rule sees the dispersion as a curse which will come to an end in the days of the Messiah, when the whole people of God will be gathered in one place, the NT generally insists that the gathering of the children of God which is the work of Jesus Christ breaks barriers that separate those living "far off" and those "near" (Eph. 2:13). In patristic literature all mention of the dispersion of the church worldwide supports the idea of the geographical catholicity* of the church (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.10.1 and 3.11.8). The ecumenical discussion about the biblical origin of the (modern) theology of the diaspora has definitely been marked by the contribution of the Dutch biblical scholar Willem Cornelis van Unnik in 1959, acknowledged by Hans-Ruedi Weber in that same year but still widely ignored.

The Jewish diaspora was originally thought of as the counterpart of the homeland, but after the disasters of A.D. 70 and 135, the Jewish people became practically homeless. Following the terrible experience of annihilation (Shoah) before and during the second world war, the situation of the Jews completely changed with the foundation of the new state of Israel in 1948, an event acclaimed by many Christians as fulfilment of prophecies and reinforcement of the old covenant. It includes theological and non-theological realities. The special bond with the land of Israel is maintained, although the majority of Jews live in the diaspora. The Jewish-Christian dialogue* has to wrestle with differing appreciations of the meaning of the diaspora and of the promised land.

In modern times, nearly all Christian churches have large or small affiliated groups scattered in various places, sometimes without any active connection with the "home base" of the mother church, which in its turn may have disappeared from its original place. Schisms, reformation movements, political upheavals and demographic explosions, as well as human mobility and voluntary emigration, have led to this multiplication of denominational or confessional "diasporas": Protestant diasporas in Roman Catholic countries after the Peace of Augsburg (1555), the dispersion of the French Huguenots after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685), the exile of Armenians after 1915, the emigration of Orthodox Russians after 1917, the continuing flow of immigrants to the Americas and Western Europe.

Missionary efforts undertaken by Christian denominations have created a kind of diaspora, although it is assumed that after a while the new churches (see mission, proselytism) will be sufficiently rooted in the local culture to gain selfhood and lose any self-awareness of being foreign. However, in some cases the foreign character of the new church is cultivated in connection with other social, political, historical or theological factors. No country today can claim a total religious homogeneity. The ecumenical dilemma here is, on the one hand, the concern for religious liberty* and cultural identity and, on the other hand, the pursuit of Christian unity* at the local, national and regional levels (New Delhi 1961, document of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity 1975, Common Witness 1981, "Towards Common Witness: A Call to Adopt Responsible Relationships in Mission and to Renounce Proselytism", 1997).

Among the various movements of dissemination of the past two centuries, the significance of the Russian emigration to the West should not be underestimated. It has meant an active ecumenical interaction between the Orthodox tradition and the Latin churches, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant and Anglican. The St Sergius Institute in Paris (founded in 1924) has been a source of spiritual and theological renewal for Orthodox and other churches. National or ethnic minorities originally related to other autocephalous Orthodox churches or patriarchates have also emigrated by force or voluntarily to other countries, especially in the West.

The simultaneous presence of various jurisdictions among the Orthodox diasporas in the West creates internal problems which must be faced by the Orthodox themselves. The pre-conciliar pan-Orthodox conference at Chambésy (1986) decided to put the problem of the Orthodox diaspora on the agenda of the future great synod of the Orthodox churches. The points are, as recalled by Olivier Clément in an influential report (1977), "that there shall not be two bishops in the same town" (first ecumenical council) and "that there shall not be two metropolitans in the one province" (fourth ecumenical council).

While the concept of diaspora can be used for persons and groups of various religions, ideologies or ethnic identities, current ecumenical usage prefers the term "minority".

The term "diaspora" became popular in ecumenical reflection on the church* after the tremendous displacements of people in Europe in the wake of the second world war and the establishment of socialist regimes in Eastern Europe. German theologians like Harald Kruska, Gottfried Niemeier, Werner Krusche and Ernst Lange among Protestants, as well as Karl Rahner and Hans Küng among Catholics, applied the term "diaspora" to the church in order to highlight its new situation.

At one level, the proposition that the church today is fundamentally a diaspora has to do with the collapse of the Volkskirche both as a historical reality and as a national purpose (see church and state). The alternative to Volkskirche (national church) is Diaspora-Kirche. Here church no longer expresses the soul of a nation but has become a social minority of active Christians among a majority of non-believers. This ecclesiological self-awareness is largely a result of sociological studies on the empirical state of the churches in the modern world (see church and world). Theologically the concept of diaspora as applied to the church can draw from the OT theology of the remnant, or from the idea of the "little flock" in the NT (Luke 12:32). Another theological undertone is the idea of the church under the cross, facing harassment and oppression from the powers-that-be.

A second level of meaning pertains to the functioning of the church in society.* The church can function in two complementary ways: first as a fellowship assembled before the Lord in worship, and second as a dispersion of believers taking action in society each in a particular place or activity. This may have been the meaning of the oft-quoted definition of the church by the reformer Melancthon as "the community of the dispersed". This idea applies specifically to the laity.* Actually the Department on the Laity of the WCC developed a strong ecclesiology in this sense. "The whole church shares Christ's ministry in the world and the effective exercise of this ministry must largely be by church members, when they are dispersed in the life of the world" (WCC central committee, Galyatető 1956; italics added). A possible theological undertone of this statement is the concept of presence (French présence au monde, J. Ellul, 1948).

Modern theology of the diaspora is evidently not a simple concept. It has both a pessimistic, almost sectarian form, and a more optimistic, missionary form.

B. 15 May 1880, Berlin, Germany; d. 31 Jan. 1967, Berlin. Dibelius participated in the Edinburgh 1910, Stockholm 1925 and Lausanne 1927 conferences and was the first German to be a president of the WCC

(1954-61). He was a leader in the Confessing Church,* and signed the Stuttgart declaration* in 1945. A staunch anti-communist, Dibelius was bishop of Berlin-Brandenburg, 1945-66, and strongly advocated unity in the Evangelical Church in Germany, in spite of the tensions between the Federal Republic of Germany and the German Democratic Republic.

DIÉTRICH, SUZANNE DE

B. 29 Jan. 1891, Niederbronn, France; d. 24 Jan. 1981, Strasbourg, France. Diétrich was a lay leader in ecumenical youth and student movements, founding staff member and associate director (with Hendrik Kraemer) of the Ecumenical Institute in Bossey* (1946-54), and key figure in the mid-20th century "biblical renewal".

Born into an old Alsatian family of metal founders, Suzanne de Diétrich took a diploma in electrical engineering from the University of Lausanne in 1913. While there, she came into contact with the French Student Christian Movement, and in 1914 she decided to devote herself to student work rather than returning to the family foundry. An initial two-year commitment stretched into almost four decades, both in France and in Geneva, where she worked with the World Student Christian Federation* and the World YWCA.*

Despite a lifelong hereditary disability, she travelled on five continents and took part in numerous ecumenical meetings and conferences, including the world youth conference in Amsterdam in August 1939, for which she prepared the Bible studies. She was also instrumental in fostering ecumenical worship. During her years in Bossey she organized biblical study seminars and played an active role with her fellow layperson Kraemer in preparing the institute's programmes. Returning to Paris in 1956, she worked closely with the French Protestant Federation and its aid agency, CIMADE,* which she had helped to create in 1939 and had supported from Geneva during the war.

At the centre of de Diétrich's work stood the Bible as a whole, which she read and taught others how to read, and about which she spoke and wrote. Her books, which were translated into several languages, helped to make the biblically based Protestant, Orthodox and Roman Catholic theologies of her time – including those of Karl Barth and Oscar Cullmann – accessible to laypeople, especially to youth. “No one who heard her expound the Bible”, said an associate after her death, “will ever forget her incisive mind, her simplicity of expression and her sense of humour, nor doubt that the Bible is the living word of God for everyone, as it was for her.”

Between the two world wars de Diétrich helped to run many biblical and ecumenical seminars in Mouterhouse, her family's mansion in northern Alsace. In 1950 she received an honorary doctorate from the theological faculty of the University of Montpellier (France).

DISABILITY

WHILE DEFINITIONS vary, the term “disability” is generally used in church and ecumenical networks to refer to any emotional, mental or physical impairment that can prevent a person from participating fully in life and society. The usage “persons with disabilities” is preferred to the terms “disabled person” (or the earlier “handicapped person”), as a way of affirming the wholeness and recognizing the potential of the person.

Statistics from the United Nations suggest that from 7 to 10% of the world's population have some form of physical or mental disability. Famine and malnutrition, poverty, AIDS and other communicable diseases, poor quality of health care, violent conflict, accidents (home, traffic and sports) and torture and other violations of fundamental human dignity are key factors in the increasing number of physically, psycho-traumatically and mentally disabled persons.

Despite medical advances and increased awareness and advocacy in churches and in society, many persons with disabilities are denied the right to lead meaningful lives within their families, church and society. Many do not have opportunities for education, work and caring social lives and all too often are shut away in institutions, cast out from society. They may be forced to live with little or no help, financially, spiritually or emotionally, from either the government, the community or the church. The plight of persons with disabilities in the poor countries is even worse: nearly 90% of all resources spent on people with disabilities are expended in industrialized countries, and yet 85% of persons with disabilities live in developing countries – and only 2% of them receive any services at all.

Christian theological reflection and spirituality should bring all people together as one – all in some way whole and broken, rich and poor, weak and strong. While many churches have done positive work in this area, the tendency is still present to look upon persons with disabilities as objects of pity and charity. A special role for churches is in providing a spiritual dimension of wholeness alongside other more secular perspectives of service, recognizing that persons with disabilities experience suffering (as do many others in the world), but that often their point of great weakness can ultimately become their greatest strength. Such is the journey and the mystery of the cross.

In 1971 the WCC began to discuss seriously the disability issue at its Faith and Order* commission meeting in Louvain. The fifth assembly in Nairobi (1975) issued a statement on "The Handicapped and the Wholeness of the Family of God". Subsequently, a consultant was appointed for a year and a half to work with the churches in connection with the United Nations International Year of Disabled Persons. The issue was discussed in several of the issue groups of the sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983), and persons with disabilities had quite a high visibility in the life and work of the assembly. A full-time staff consultant was appointed from 1984 to the end of 1991 to begin to coordinate further work in the Council and its member churches, much of which was reflected in the seventh assembly (Canberra 1991), where a large group of people with disabilities were present as delegates, advisers or visitors. Another consultant continued this work from 1994 to 1996, building networks with member churches and organizing regional consultations. The work continued within the programme on Lay Participation towards Inclusive Community, that prepared a visible presence of ten advisers with disabilities at the eighth assembly (Harare 1998). Their presence at the assembly influenced a number of documents, e.g. the Programme Guidelines.

The advisers at the assembly formed the Ecumenical Disability Advisers Network (EDAN), that later linked up with the WCC; the network's coordinator, based at the national council of churches in Nairobi, is also a staff member of the WCC's Justice, Peace and Creation team where the concerns for people with disabilities has been based since the Harare assembly. EDAN, whose major concern is to stimulate and engage in theological reflection on issues concerning people with disabilities, has organized several consultations and cooperates with a number of partners within the WCC, the wider ecumenical movement and disability organizations around the world. The network has also sent advisers to WCC central committee meetings. The formation of the network and its cooperation with the WCC has led to a new working style for the concerns of people with disabilities in the WCC; it remains to be seen what effect that will have for the Council, the member churches and the larger ecumenical movement.

Within the WCC issues of disability have been considered both from the perspective of inclusive community and as an issue of justice. It has become apparent that those member churches which are working on this issue have different starting points and approaches, based largely on culture. Theological understandings of what causes a person to have or encounter a disabling condition vary tremendously from society to society, which in turn affects how that society views and therefore treats someone with a disability and how people with disabilities participate in the life and work of local congregations. Ecumenically, the Consultation on Church Union* in the USA has been notable for the intensive work done on disabilities.

Amidst this diversity, the WCC has sought to serve as a focal point to coordinate materials and work, conscientize and mobilize churches and thus emphasize a new and deeper spirituality, transforming and renewing people. Regrettably, lack of funds and limited human resources in member churches and in the WCC itself have often made ecumenical progress on regional and international levels slow; at the local level, more informal ecumenical work and sharing does in fact occur, usually out of necessity. The challenge is for many national councils of churches to incorporate the concern for people with disabilities into their agendas. The problem is often financial and, because the issue is so diverse, it tends to get lost in the list of programme priorities.

DISARMAMENT

UNTIL THE END of the cold war, disarmament was largely a future agenda for humanity. Historically, disarmament efforts between the two world wars, particularly the work of the League of Nations (see United Nations), collapsed in the face of the Nazi threat. However, some of the work done before the second world war provided a valuable basis. Mention must be made of the 1925 Geneva protocol, which banned the use of chemical and biological weapons, as well as gas warfare. The period since 1945 – often mistakenly referred to as the “post-war” period – has been characterized by wars outside Europe and, since 1989, in Europe once again. World Military and Social Expenditures calculates 149 wars with 20 million casualties for 1945-92; UNICEF puts the casualties at 23 million – overwhelmingly civilian women and children – leading them to proclaim an “anti-war agenda”. According to the UN secretary-general, over 5 million people were killed in the 1990s in wars, mainly within – rather than between – countries. The recent Yearbooks of the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute (SIPRI) have detailed about 30 ongoing major armed conflicts each with a total of over 1000 battle deaths.

In 1959 the UN proclaimed the goal of “general and complete disarmament”. However, the goal of disarmament was replaced in government thinking by arms control, which did not prevent the quantitative and qualitative arms race. By the end of the 1980s, annual global expenditure on arms was over $1,000,000,000,000 (US$1 trillion) – more than the income of the poorest half of humanity. At the end of the cold war, arms spending was over 6% of the world’s gross national product, with the industrialized world accounting for three-quarters of the total. This has now fallen to 2.6% ($780 billion) according to SIPRI.

Since the late 1980s, beginning before the cold war ended, world military expenditure, expenditure on the arms trade, military research and development (R&D) budgets and stocks of nuclear weapons have all declined significantly. The US Arms Control and Disarmament Agency estimates a 35% decline in world military spending from 1987 to 1994 from the peak of $1.3 trillion (1987) to $840 billion (1994 – both figures in 1994 dollars). Various expert international agencies calculate the values differently, but the downward trend is confirmed by inter alia SIPRI. Global R&D expenditure fell 50% in the period 1987-95 to about $60 billion. From 1987 to 1990, conventional arms transfers declined sharply. At the turn of the millennium, major conventional arms transfers were half the level of the cold war peak.

In the field of nuclear weapons, the Cuban missile crisis of the early 1960s served as a stimulus to the USA and USSR to try to reach agreement. Direct communication in crisis situations, the Partial Test Ban Treaty (1963) and the Non-Proliferation Treaty (1968) were some of the results. It cannot be said that the super-powers or the other nuclear weapon states have fulfilled their commitment “to achieve at the earliest possible date the cessation of the nuclear arms race and to undertake effective measures in the direction of nuclear disarmament” (art. VI NPT).

In the 1970s the USA and USSR concentrated particularly on bilateral approaches. In 1971 they agreed upon cooperation in the exploration and use of outer space and later (with Britain and France) prohibited placing weapons of mass destruction on the seabed and ocean floor. The period of detente was marked by the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty and SALT I on the limitation of strategic offensive arms (1972). The ABM Treaty, a major achievement of arms control, would be threatened should the USA deploy a national missile defence system. Towards the end of the 1970s, the collapse of detente led to the failure by the US senate to ratify the SALT II agreement. After the signing of the Helsinki agreement (1975), the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe developed into a forum where European nations, including neutral and non-aligned countries, could exert some influence over the USA and USSR. In 1990, the Treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE) was signed. It entered into force in 1992, establishing ceilings for five main categories of conventional arms. The 1999 Agreement on Adaptation of the CFE brought these efforts to fruition.

The 1987 Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces (INF) agreement marked the beginning of genuine progress towards nuclear disarmament. Consistent with their belief that “nuclear war cannot be won and must never be fought”, the USA and USSR agreed in 1988 to notify each other at least 24 hours before launching any intercontinental ballistic missiles and submarine-launched ballistic missiles. Substantial progress has been made on nuclear disarmament between the USA and Russia. Following ratification of START II by the Russian Duma (April 2000), by the end of 2007 each side must reduce its total deployed strategic nuclear warheads to 3000-3500. There are still as many as 35,000 nuclear warheads worldwide. These are significant reductions from cold war level, but remain an awesome destructive capacity.

In spite of concerns by third world, neutral and non-aligned states that the acknowledged nuclear weapon states (the five permanent members of the UN Security Council: the USA, Russia, China, France and the United Kingdom) have not fulfilled their obligations to move swiftly enough towards nuclear disarmament, it proved possible to extend the Treaty indefinitely in 1995. The existing dangers for nuclear proliferation among "threshold" or "over-the-threshold" nations relate to issues of regional tension (Middle East, India-Pakistan). It is still a challenge to achieve a fully effective Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty following the 158-3 vote in the UN general assembly in September 1996. India's opposition remains the main obstacle. The US Senate rejected ratification in October 1999, but the USA holds to a moratorium on testing. It remains to be seen whether the Treaty will ever enter into force.

The Chemical Weapons Convention was finally agreed and opened for signature in 1993. Political will is the key to effective implementation. The same is true for the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention (agreed 1972, entered into force 1975) and achievement of a meaningful protocol on verification. The Pugwash Movement – recipients of the 1995 Nobel Peace Prize – and the Abolition 2000 movement have stressed the desirability and achievability of a nuclear-weapon-free world and a nuclear weapons convention as a necessary step.

Inherent within the UN charter is the paradox which has made disarmament so difficult. The UN was established "to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war". The Security Council is required "to promote the establishment and maintenance of international peace and security with the least diversion for armaments of the world's human and economic resources" (art. 26). At the same time, however, the charter allows for the right of member states to self-defence (art. 51). Arms spending can thus be justified by states as necessary. In spite of the first and second disarmament decades (the 1970s and 1980s) and three UN special sessions on disarmament (1978, 1982, 1988), the most that could be claimed by 1988 for the results of multilateral and bilateral disarmament efforts is that they are "limited yet significant". The disarmament trend of recent years has been mainly due to the end of the cold war and economic pressures for arms cuts.

In the world of multilateral negotiations, the UN Conference on Disarmament, the "single multilateral disarmament negotiating forum", established a permanent ten-area agenda in 1979: (1) nuclear weapons in all aspects, (2) chemical weapons, (3) other weapons of mass destruction, (4) conventional weapons, (5) reduction of military budgets, (6) reduction of armed forces, (7) disarmament and development, (8) disarmament and international security, (9) collateral measures including confidence-building measures and verification, and (10) a comprehensive programme of disarmament leading to general and complete disarmament under effective international control.

The UN machinery is only as powerful as the member states enable it to be. Regional agreements should also be mentioned, such as the Antarctic Treaty (1959), which makes the region a demilitarized zone, the 1967 Treaty of Tlatelolco and the 1986 Treaty of Rarotonga, which declare Latin America and the South Pacific nuclear-free zones.

From the perspective of the churches, there are clear motivations for concern for disarmament. The ecumenical movement has been consistent in its support for the disarmament efforts of the UN, as the then WCC general secretary Philip Potter underlined in his address to the UN Second Special Session in 1982. The churches' concern for peace, justice and environmental protection requires disarmament. In particular, in the 1970s and 1980s, there was growing moral criticism of nuclear weapons, leading to the WCC Vancouver assembly (1983) statement that "the production and deployment of nuclear weapons as well as their use constitute a crime against humanity". This statement is hard to harmonize with positions which maintain that nuclear deterrence is still required. The clearest example is that of Pope John Paul II at the UN Second Special Session, who said: "In current conditions 'deterrence' based on balance, certainly not as an end in itself but as a step towards progressive disarmament, may still be judged morally acceptable." The common denominator is agreement that deterrence based upon weapons of mass destruction must be overcome in the future. In October 1993 the permanent representative of the holy see at the UN argued that there is no case for retaining or further developing the "cataclysmic firepower". He continued: "Security lies in the abolition of nuclear weapons and the strengthening of international law." The 1996 judgment of the world court stopped short of declaring nuclear weapons illegal. The churches have yet to address the challenge of the Canberra assembly calling for the phased elimination of nuclear weapons.

As the perceived threat of nuclear war receded, attention in the churches turned increasingly to restricting the conventional arms trade, opposition to landmines and restricting trade in small arms. The WCC has played an active role in efforts to ban landmines and is addressing small arms. As the UN secretary-general points out in his millennium report We the Peoples many of the 5 million people killed in the wars of the 1990s were killed by small arms, such as assault rifles – of which up to 500 million are in circulation. These are bought for "the price of a chicken or a bag of maize". Some 50-60% of the small arms trade is legal.

In 1994, the WCC established its Programme to Overcome Violence. At its Harare assembly (1998) it declared the years 2001-10 a Decade to Overcome Violence. There is still disagreement within the churches between the pacifist and just-war traditions, although there would be theological consensus that the churches must be committed to peace with justice, as well as reconciliation – the theme of the 1997 second European Ecumenical Assembly.

As the new millennium begins, it is clear that the 20th century was one of industrialized weapons production, unprecedented warfare and genocide. Even if this trend has been reversed, it cannot be stated with confidence that the reversal is permanent. The many conflicts – actual and potential – and the availability of cheap weapons, particularly small arms like machine guns, mean that the world is still a dangerous place, especially for poor, marginalized and undefended people.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST

THE DISCIPLES of Christ are a worldwide Christian communion whose origins were in the US frontier of the early 19th century. In 1801 Barton W. Stone, a Presbyterian minister, led a revival at Cane Ridge, Kentucky, for a gathering of over 20,000 people. The experience convinced Stone that unity among Christians was essential for the church's mission, evangelism and spiritual renewal. In a landmark document, The Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery (1804), he set forth a vision in which the present church structures would “be dissolved, and sink into the body of Christ at large”. Stone and his followers took the name “Christian” for their congregations and members as a sign of inclusiveness and renounced all non-biblical names as they sought to reclaim the faith proclaimed in the New Testament scriptures.

Thomas Campbell and his son Alexander were the primary founders of a second movement, the Disciples of Christ, which joined with Stone’s Christians in 1832 to become the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). Thomas Campbell, a Presbyterian minister from Ireland who came to western Pennsylvania in 1807, was soon cast out of his denomination for trying to remove all “fencing of the table” by credal conscriptions and to reconcile the various Presbyterian bodies rooted in events in 17th- and 18th-century Scotland and Ireland which had no relevance in the context of the US frontier in the early 1800s. In his Declaration and Address (1809), Campbell proclaimed that “division among Christians is a horrid evil”, and that “the church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one”.

The early leaders of the two movements, Christians and Disciples, believed that the realization of Christian unity could be achieved through the restoration of the faith and order of the New Testament church. Their call was to return to the apostolic tradition of the earliest church, which they identified as the “ancient order of things”. They thus rejected all doctrinal formulations when used as “tests of fellowship” and opposed as unscriptural the historic creeds* and authoritarian ecclesiastical government (see church order). In response to the concept of restoring the unity of the church, based on the NT witness, many of the characteristic beliefs and practices of the Disciples of Christ took shape and continue today: weekly celebration of the Lord’s supper (see eucharist), baptism* by immersion of individuals upon their own profession of the “good confession of faith” (see Matt. 16:16; Luke 9:20), commitment to the priesthood of all believers, in which lay and ordained share in the ministry of word and sacrament, and an evangelistic zeal in the proclamation of the gospel to the world.

Baptism and the Lord’s supper are accepted by Disciples of Christ as sacraments of the church; indeed, they are the primary elements in shaping the Disciples’ ethos and identity. Baptism marks entrance into membership in the church universal and is administered “in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit” (see Trinity). The Lord’s supper, or holy communion, is the central act of each Sunday’s worship service; the invitation is always to an “open table” where all Christians are welcomed to share in the eucharistic meal of memorial, sacrifice and anticipation of the kingdom. For Disciples, Christ is present at each Lord’s supper both in the elements as they are received and within the life of the community itself.

Disciples of Christ believe that the church is a sacramental community, a covenantal fellowship brought into being by God’s initiative of grace* and sustained in its life by the Holy Spirit.* The church is both local (as the congregation of believers are gathered in Christ’s name and witness to the power of God’s love in each place) and universal (as all Christians and Christian communions are bound together to be the community/koinonia* of God’s people in all places and at all times).

The movement of the Disciples, with its message of freedom, diversity, simplicity of worship and a reasonable faith, grew rapidly on the US frontier; and by 1900 its membership was over 1.1 million, the largest denomination to be born on North American soil. Its message also spread to Canada, Britain and Australia, where the similar themes of Christian unity, restorationism and the congregation’s right to self-governance were already present among different church bodies (often calling themselves by the name “Churches of Christ”). These churches readily acknowledged one another as part of the same worldwide movement.

With the missionary expansion of the churches in the late 1800s and early 1900s, Disciples of Christ communities were established in most regions of the world. Many have subsequently joined with other denominations to form united churches,* e.g. the Church of North India, the United Reformed Church in the United Kingdom, the Kyodan (Japan), the Church of Christ in Zaire.

Disciples of Christ have been prominent in most major ecumenical ventures of this century, including the founding of the WCC and its predecessor bodies, in many national councils of churches and in giving leadership to continuing efforts in church-union negotiations. In the US, Disciples participated in the nine-union Consultation on Church Union* and are part of the new Churches Uniting in Christ.

The international body that gives expression to the Disciples of Christ in official church-to-church relationships is the Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council (DECC). (A second organization, the World Convention of Churches of Christ, is an inspirational, global fellowship for individual members of the Disciples of Christ, who gather every four years at international assemblies.) The DECC has three main purposes: (1) to coordinate the appointment of official Disciples representation to international ecumenical events and meetings, (2) to share information on Disciples' ecumenical activities around the world, and (3) to encourage and provide for engaging in international theological dialogue. The three current dialogues of the DECC are with the Roman Catholic Church (1977), the Russian Orthodox Church (1987) and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (1987). The DECC includes membership of Disciples of Christ churches (and united churches which have former Disciples ties) in Argentina, Australia, Canada, Democratic Republic of Congo, Jamaica, Mexico, New Zealand, Paraguay, Puerto Rico, Southern Africa, the United Kingdom, the US and Vanuatu.

DISCIPLES-REFORMED DIALOGUE

WHEN THE Disciples of Christ emerged as a distinct movement in the US and Britain in the early 19th century, many early leaders came from a Presbyterian background. Although the adoption of believers' baptism* by immersion marked them off from other Reformed churches, Disciples' theological roots lay in the Reformed tradition. Both Disciples and Reformed have been active in the ecumenical movement nationally and internationally and belong to united churches in the Democratic Republic of Congo, Japan, North India, Southern Africa, Thailand and the United Kingdom. They are involved in union discussions in Jamaica and were formerly involved in New Zealand; in the USA Disciples are involved in an ecumenical partnership with the United Church of Christ and in united congregations with Presbyterians and UCCs.

Following an initial planning meeting in Geneva in 1984, a consultation between representatives of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* (WARC) and the Disciples Ecumenical Consultative Council (DECC) took place in Birmingham, England, in March 1987. Four main themes were discussed: the common doctrinal roots of Disciples and Reformed, the sacraments of baptism and communion, ministry, and models of Christian unity. Case studies of Disciples-Reformed relations were presented from Australia, the United Kingdom, India, the US and Japan.

The report of the consultation suggested that "a reconciliation of memories" was needed to overcome past divisions. Common understandings of the church* and the Lord's supper (see eucharist) were affirmed. It was noted that both traditions find it easier to relate their understanding of the church to the local congregation and to the church universal than to ecclesial structures of a national or international kind. On baptism it was agreed that neither tradition could be content with a baptismal theology which excluded children from the Christian community, and that the legitimacy of the theological traditions of both infant baptism and believers' baptism should be acknowledged. Re-baptism should not be practised because it undermined the once-for-all nature of baptism. Within a general agreement on the nature of ministry, the consultation urged further reflection on the meaning of ordination,* the nature of presbyterial, diaconal and oversight ministry, and the significance of the ordination of women.*

The consultation concluded that there were no theological or ecclesiological issues which needed to divide the two church families and asked the DECC and the WARC to call upon their member churches to say whether or not they could accept this declaration: "The Disciples of Christ and the Reformed Churches recognize and accept each other as visible expressions of the one church of Christ."

On this basis, continued contacts through the 1990s led to a further consultation in January 2002, which recommended that "the goal of relations between the WARC and the DECC should now be the development of comprehensive partnership in pursuit of the vision of the two eventually becoming one". It also offered specific suggestions to help bring the two confessional bodies closer together: collaboration, however and wherever possible; sharing information about the history and current situation of Disciples and Reformed; sharing in governing body meetings; and coordinating approaches to bilateral dialogues. Care should be taken to include the perspective of those uniting and united churches which belong to both the DECC and the WARC.

DISCIPLES-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

IN THE USA the Roman Catholic Church and the Disciples of Christ have been engaged in a dialogue since 1962. Although this conversation began at the national level, it was later transferred to the regional level where, in 1987 after 12 years of discussion, the group based in Louisville, Kentucky, published a document entitled Ministry – the Whole Church for the Whole World.

An international commission was set up in September 1977 with meetings alternating between the USA and Europe. The result of the first series of annual meetings (1977-82) has been the publication of the first report, Apostolicity and Catholicity, which discusses "Our Life Together", "Spiritual Ecumenism", "Baptism", "Faith and Tradition", "The Unity We Seek" and "Looking to the Future". In their foreword the two co-chairmen declare that this final report "contains not an agreed statement on points of doctrine but an agreed account, written by those commissioned for the dialogue, to record promising developments. The paper describes some convergence in understanding as well as some of the problems which have yet to be faced."

Following changes in the composition of the commission in 1983, it began a second series of annual discussions whose results, completed in 1992, were published as "The Church as Communion in Christ". Bearing in mind the differences and similarities in history and ethos of the two churches, the discussions focused on how the church as communion is linked to the "new creation", the visibility of the church's koinonia as revealed in the eucharist, in continuity with the apostolic tradition, and the role of ministry – including the whole church – in maintaining the faith of the apostles.

A third series of annual meetings began in 1993; themes treated up to 2000 included: faith – the individual and the church, the gospel and the church, the content and authority of the early ecumenical councils, the canon and authority of scripture, the teaching office of the church, conscience and community, and evangelization.

This dialogue follows its own distinctive methodology, which gives precedence to a search for lines of convergence and not for the establishing of agreed formulas. For this reason the results of these discussions have aroused the interest of other groups.

DISCIPLES-RUSSIAN ORTHODOX DIALOGUE

THE FIRST contacts between the Disciples of Christ and the Russian Orthodox Church came early in the 20th century. Peter Ainslie of the Disciples, one of the primary architects of Faith and Order,* attended the preparatory meeting in Geneva in 1920 for the first world conference on F&O. Attending the meeting was the Russian exarch for Western Europe, Archbishop Evlogy of Volynia, who expressed Christian love for all the churches in the young F&O movement. In his address, Ainslie lifted up the Disciples’ vision of a united church that included “the whole House of Christ – Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Anglican and Protestant”. This exchange led to a friendship between these two early ecumenical pioneers.

Specific contacts and relations between the Disciples and the Russian Orthodox grew after the second world war when the member churches of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA braved the cold war* to join hands with churches in the Soviet Union. One of those delegations was headed by the Disciples lay leader and industrialist J. Irwin Miller, then president of the NCCC. In 1973 pastoral relations found deeper expression when George G. Beazley, Jr, president of the Disciples’ Council on Christian Unity, died in Moscow while on an official visit to the Russian Orthodox Church. Other Disciples leaders made subsequent ecumenical visits to the USSR; and during the mid-1980s more than 200 Disciples regional and local leaders went there under the NCC’s church-to-church programme.

In 1987 official Disciples of Christ-Russian Orthodox dialogue began. Ten Disciples theologians met with leaders in Moscow and with theological faculties at Zagorsk, Leningrad and Odessa. The themes were “Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry” and “The Church’s Role in Peace-making” (see the Journal of the Moscow Patriarchate, 12, 1987, and Mid-Stream, 27, 3, 1988). A second dialogue in 1990 addressed “The Renewal of Parish Life” and “The Church’s Diaconal Ministry in Society”.

The end of the cold war, the collapse of the Soviet Union and the new and fragile social situation in Russia created a situation in which the Russian Orthodox Church was preoccupied with many critical issues, some of which created suspicion of any ecumenical dialogues. As a result this dialogue, like many other contacts between Russian Christians and the churches of the West, was for some time in a holding pattern. However, persistent contacts have enabled resumption, notably through the visit of an official Disciples delegation to St Peterburg and Moscow in 1998. The dialogue emphasized continued growth in mutual respect through a deeper understanding of the historic identity, faith convictions, and current challenges faced by each church.

DIVORCE

DIVORCE is the legal act dissolving a marriage. In all cultures, legislators – both civil and religious – have been concerned to ensure the stability of marriage* and guarantee protection for the persons within it: it cannot be terminated without good reason and due legal process. Some systems allow for repudiation (usually by the husband only, rarely the wife); others insist on official certification of misconduct or mutual consent by the appropriate authority. The subject of divorce is dealt with in the Hebrew Bible and Jesus pronounces on it, but his words are interpreted differently by the churches. This article therefore looks first at the scriptural record before going on to examine the different disciplines established for handling the failure of a marriage and, in some cases, allowing for a second marriage (which the Roman Catholics do not).

THE WORD OF GOD IN SCRIPTURE

The law of Moses allows for a woman to be repudiated by her husband, who must put in her hand a bill of divorce (gueth), giving the ex-wife social status and the possibility of remarriage (Deut. 24:1-4). Even though legal, vigorous disapproval of divorce is expressed by the prophet Malachi (2:14-16). Questioned on the subject by the Pharisees (Matt. 19:3-9; Mark 10:2-12), Jesus continues in the prophetic line but goes beyond the letter of the law written by Moses because of human "hardness of heart". He reminds them of what is said of marriage in Genesis (Gen. 2:24) and concludes, "Therefore what God has joined together let no one separate." He also goes on to draw the conclusion, "Whoever divorces his wife and marries another commits adultery against her."

However, the account of these words of Jesus is not unanimous: in Matt. 19:7-9 (cf. Matt. 5:31-32) porneia seems to warrant an exception to the prohibition of divorce, but this is not mentioned in Mark 10:11-12 and Luke 16:18. Strict scientific exegesis considers the text of Mark to be the most ancient and the insertion in Matthew a later addition. There are differing views on how to understand porneia – as "adultery", or "unchastity", or as irregular unions contravening Lev. 18:6-18. But whatever scientific exegesis may say, this insertion and the interpretation of it are at the root of the present divergences among the churches in regard to divorce.

Paul broaches this question in 1 Cor. 7:10-16, reminding Christian couples of the Lord's commandment that the wife should not separate from her husband (but if she does separate she should remain unmarried or else be reconciled to her husband) and that the husband should not divorce his wife. Then, speaking of couples in which only one partner is a Christian believer, he reminds them of the permanent nature of their union, but authorizes the Christian to contract a new marriage if the non-believer wishes to separate, for in such a case the (Christian) brother or sister is not bound.

INTERPRETATIONS OF SCRIPTURE BY THE CHURCHES

For the ancient church, immersed in cultures which allowed divorce by repudiation and also by mutual consent, Jesus' words sounded like a prophetic pronouncement. While many authors of the first six centuries interpret these words as excluding divorce between Christians, some church fathers and councils seem to allow or at least tolerate remarriage after divorce in some cases.

In the 6th century, the legislation of the Eastern empire (accepted by the church), based on the Matthean exception, decreed that in case of adultery the marriage was broken and the injured spouse could remarry. In the West, the principle of the intrinsic indissolubility of any marriage and the absolute indissolubility of a marriage between Christians, once consummated, came to be affirmed by the theologians and canonists in the course of the middle ages, up to the start of the Reformation.

The reformers considered that scripture did not prohibit divorce in certain cases. Luther accepted it in cases of adultery and the desertion of one spouse by the other. Other reformers accepted divorce in cases of maltreatment or heresy. The council of Trent* (1563) condemned some of these Reformed theses on the indissolubility of marriage during its 24th session. It thus decreed that marriage could not be annulled for heresy on the part of one spouse, nor for incompatibility of temperament, nor for culpable abandonment. But eager not to declare as heretics the Eastern Christians, whose discipline included divorce on grounds of adultery, while defining Roman Catholic doctrine in the context of the Reformation controversy, it condemned only those who said the church was wrong in teaching that marriage cannot be dissolved for adultery – thus indirectly recognizing the legitimacy of the Eastern practice.

THE CHURCHES' CURRENT PRACTICE

Today the Roman Catholic Church teaches that the sacrament of marriage between two baptized Christians, once consummated, cannot be dissolved by any human power, nor by any cause except death. Having thus defined absolute indissolubility, it reserves the right to pronounce the dissolution of other unions in cases where this may promote the life of faith of the individuals concerned.

Hence, it permits a person who has become a Christian after marriage to re-marry during the life-time of his or her former spouse when their union has been broken by the latter. This procedure is called the Pauline privilege because it is based on what Paul said in 1 Cor. 1:12-15.

Furthermore, since the middle ages, the pope has reserved the right to dissolve the sacramental union between two baptized Christians if it has not been consummated, as well as non-sacramental unions (marriages not concluded between two baptized persons). These cases are grouped under the name of the Petrine privilege, as the church refers to the authority vested in it in the person of Peter. The coherence of this discipline is that the consummated sacrament of matrimony symbolizes the unailing union of Christ with the church, which is the model for it and the source of grace. All other unions are also intended to be permanent but, not being sacramental, they can be dissolved by the authority of the church in view of its mission to nurture life in the faith.

The procedure known as "annulment" is not the dissolution of a marriage but the confirmation by the church authorities that the marriage in question was in appearance only because one of the essential conditions for its validity was not fulfilled from the start (e.g. incapacity, lack of consent or requisite form).

The Orthodox consider marriage as a sacrament and indissoluble but, because they interpret the Matthean insertion (except in the case of porneia) as referring not only to invalid irregular unions but to adultery, they authorize divorce in this case. By economy (adaptation of the law to a concrete situation), they extend this solution to analogous situations which make it impossible for the couple's union to continue (permanent separation or, in the Russian church, apostasy, serious illness or culpable abandonment). With the permission of the bishop, who is responsible for assessing the cause, the divorced spouse (normally the "injured party" but also the guilty party after a time of penitence) can therefore be authorized to re-marry. Second and third marriages are celebrated with a lesser degree of solemnity as having a lesser degree of sacramentality (they represent the love of Christ more imperfectly than a first marriage). Fourth marriages are never permitted.

As for the Reformation churches, on theological grounds they do not consider marriage as a sacrament like baptism or the Lord's supper, but as a human and social reality within which Christians must live ac-ording to the gospel. Reformation Christians therefore receive from scripture the call for the permanence of marriage but, concerned to express God's loving kindness towards human beings and their weakness, they allow their members to re-marry after a civil divorce. However, the discipline of several Reformation churches requires that the request for a blessing on a second marriage be examined by a commission which assesses whether or not this is pastorally appropriate. In many cases the re-marriage of divorced clergy is governed by special procedures.

PASTORAL CARE OF DIVORCED PERSONS WHO HAVE RE-MARRIED

Pastoral care of divorced persons who have re-married is difficult in the RCC, especially in the West where divorce has become a common occurrence. The RCC considers that the conjugal bond persists beyond separation and the factual termination of the couple's shared life. Official texts clearly distinguish the spouse forced into divorce or separation, who does not re-marry; he or she continues to participate fully in the life of the church. But if the abandoned spouse or the spouse who caused the divorce re-marries, his or her moral responsibility is seriously engaged, albeit in different ways. These Christians are not excommunicated, however. Divorced persons who have re-married should receive "solicitous care to make sure that they do not consider themselves as separated from the church because, as baptized persons they can, and indeed must, share in her life" (John Paul II, Familiaris Consortio, 1981, 84). However, they cannot be admitted to the sacraments of the eucharist and of penance because "their state and condition of life objectively contradict that union of love between Christ and the church which is signified and effected by the eucharist" (ibid.).

Despite the pastoral support and welcome extended to them in their church, the situation of spouses who have been abandoned or compelled to divorce and who have "made a new life" for themselves by forming a new, stable and committed couple has become a growing concern for many bishops and diocesan synods. Some of them would like to draw on Orthodox practice. Faced with the increasing numbers of such cases the RCC feels obliged to witness faithfully to the Lord's words on the indissolubility of marriage and endeavours to help couples to live up to their vows of faithfulness. At the same time, and without detriment to the latter, it is seeking better theological and pastoral ways to proclaim grace to the men and women, often with children, who have had the misfortune or committed the error of divorcing.

DODD, CHARLES HAROLD

B. 7 April 1884, Wrexham, Wales; d. 1973. Facing social and cultural factors in church divisions, Dodd spoke of the "unavowed motives in ecumenical discussions", which had an impact on the preparations of Faith and Order* for Lund 1952. He put forward the much-debated conception of "realized eschatology", i.e. that the Old Testament promises of God's kingdom and Christ's own words about the coming of the kingdom were realized through the incarnation, with definitive consequences for humankind. The most influential figure in British New Testament scholarship during the middle decades of the 20th century, Dodd was a Congregational minister educated at Oxford. In 1930 he became Rylands professor of biblical criticism and exegesis at Manchester, and from 1935 to 1949 was Norris-Hulse professor of divinity at Cambridge – the first non-Anglican to hold a chair there since 1660. His publications include over 20 books and some 70 major articles, essays and lectures. He served as the general director of the New English Bible translation.

DOGMA

DOGMA refers to communally authoritative truths of revealed faith* essential to the identity or welfare of Christian community. The concept is objective rather than subjective: it points to the faith which is to be believed (fides quae), not to the faith by which one believes (fides qua). A belief may be a dogma even when it is not recognized or affirmed as such. Thus the term in its theological sense lacks the subjectivism of popular usage, according to which beliefs are dogmas because of the way they are held and asserted, e.g. arrogantly and groundlessly, rather than because of their community-defining character.

Dogma and theology should also be distinguished. Theology refers to reflection on the Christian faith in both its non-dogmatic and dogmatic aspects. Dogmatic theologians focus on the dogmas of Christian community, but even when they agree on what these are, they may differ greatly in their understanding of them. Dogmatic unity is compatible with theological disagreements between individuals and schools of thought.

None of the rare New Testament occurrences of "dogma" fully corresponds to the present-day meaning. The closest is in Acts 16:4, where the decisions of the Jerusalem church in regard to gentile converts are termed dogmata. In other passages, the word refers to governmental decrees (Luke 2:1; Acts 17:7) or Mosaic ordinances (Eph. 2:15; Col. 2:14). Later Christian writers often do not use the term at all (e.g. Aquinas) and instead speak of articles, symbols or rules of faith or, most commonly, creeds* and confessions; but these, while containing what are now called dogmas, often include much material of other kinds. The present technical understanding of "dogma" is largely the product of Protestant as well as Catholic developments in the post-Reformation centuries, but it has acquired official status only in Roman Catholicism and chiefly through the First Vatican Council* (1870).

DOGMA AND VATICAN I

For the First Vatican Council, the revealed truths contained in the deposit of faith and transmitted through scripture and Tradition are taught in the dogmatic definitions of the church's supreme teaching authority (councils and popes) and in the undefined dogmas of the ordinary magisterium. In addition to the threefold reference to revelation,* community (church*) and teaching authority* mentioned above, Vatican I thus introduced a fourth note – the distinction between defined and undefined dogmas.

Undefined dogmas can be understood as including the lex orandi,* the rule of prayer of which patristic authors spoke. In so far as prayer or worship is the centre of Christian life, the dogmas implicit within it guide the practice of the faith in all its aspects and may also be called the lex agendi, the rule of action. Even when they are not explicitly recognized, these undefined dogmas contribute to the shaping of scriptural interpretation, worship, proclamation, pastoral care and the communal and individual behaviour of believers. Their explicit recognition develops through theological reflection in the face of heresies (such as the Christological and Trinitarian ones of the first centuries) or is stimulated by new forms of action (such as Paul's gentile mission) or of piety (such as Marian devotion, to cite a controverted case). These theological developments may become part of the lex credendi, the rule of believing represented by the church's ordinary preaching and instruction, but this is not yet dogmatic definition.

Definitions usually occur only when they are thought necessary for communal unity or faithfulness. They are serious matters, for they mark the boundaries of full ecclesial communion* and can be rightly decided on, as the Jerusalem church acknowledged, only with the help of the Holy Spirit (Acts 15:28). This conviction that God is at work as well as human beings when churches properly decide dogmatic questions is a fifth common element in the understanding of dogma. It has been historically present in various forms in all the major Christian traditions.

CHANGE IN DOGMA?

Disagreements about dogma involve different understandings of revelation and of the three criteria for dogmatic definitions: scripture, Tradition and the teaching authority of the church. In regard to revelation, one view is that the formulations in which dogmatic decisions are expressed are so related to revelation that they cannot be translated into other conceptualities. If dogmas cannot be reformulated, the statement of Vatican I, for example, that dogmatic definitions are "irreformable" means that they can be articulated only in their original terms and in no others.

Another view is that irreformability applies more to the decisions than to their formulations, and that formulations may change, even though dogmatic decisions are irreversible. Since Vatican II (1962-65) this has become the general opinion among those who hold to irreformability: the substance of the faith remains unchanged but not its articulations. A third possible position is that not only formulations but dogmatic decisions themselves may in some instances be applicable only in restricted contexts. While irreversible in their original settings, changes in situation may make them unnecessary or no longer binding. Dogmas are thought of in this perspective as confessional responses to God's revelatory word uttering different directives to his church in different circumstances. Such views are strongest among Protestants but have gained ground everywhere (as has also the second position) with the weakening of the rationalistically propositional understandings of revelation and of truth which characterized early modern orthodoxies, and with the growth of emphases on historicity and contextuality. Whether these changes will make possible an ecumenically acceptable understanding of the irreformability of dogma remains to be seen.

CRITERIA FOR DOGMA

In reference to the three criteria for dogmas, the disagreements on teaching authority are the most clear-cut and perhaps the most intractable. In Eastern Orthodoxy, decisions of ecumenical councils received by the church as a whole have full dogmatic authority. There have been seven such councils, the last of which was Nicea II (787). These decisions are "infallible": believers may confidently affirm that they have been arrived at with the assistance of the Holy Spirit. In Roman Catholicism, not only the councils of the undivided church but also the later Roman Catholic ones are competent to define dogma infallibly when acting together with the pope; and the pope can also exercise this infallibility "with which God has endowed his church" (Vatican I) by himself, under the restricted conditions of ex cathedra pronouncements. Reformation churches do not speak of infallibility: one could perhaps say that they “hope and pray” rather than “believe and affirm” that their community-defining decisions are divinely assisted, are truly dogma. Furthermore, they are not committed to any one form of institutionalization of teaching authority, and communal reception* is proportionately more decisive for them than it has been in Roman Catholicism, though perhaps not in Eastern Orthodoxy. Once again, there has been much theological convergence on these issues of teaching authority in recent times, but it remains unclear how or whether the oppositions can be finally overcome.

In reference to the criterion of Tradition, the historic disputes are perhaps now close to being solved in theological principle, even if not in ecclesial practice. Roman Catholics have generally abandoned the “two-source” theory, according to which tradition is an independent source, supplementary to scripture, of publicly authoritative knowledge of revelation. Reformation Christians, without surrendering the sola scriptura in the sense of the supreme authority of scripture, have become much more aware of the inescapable and pervasive influence of Tradition on the communal understanding and use of scripture. They recognize that also for the reformers the traditions of Christ-centred and Trinitarian scriptural interpretation crystallized in the early creeds are essential to reading the Bible as the revelatory word of God – the “cradle of Christ”, as Luther put it. Thus theologians of both Roman Catholic and Protestant allegiance now speak, in effect, of a single source of knowledge of revelation in which the scriptural canon, itself the product of Tradition, is the centre of the ongoing traditioning process. Distinctive of the Eastern Orthodox is their insistence on the unchanging character of Tradition. Tradition has not changed as much for them as in the West. They have not needed to the same degree as Western Christians to decide dogmatically between new and conflicting traditions such as developed during and after the middle ages and became divisive at the time of the Reformation. Even in Eastern Orthodoxy, however, the continuity of Tradition is being threatened by modernity, and the need for dogmatic decisions going beyond the first seven councils is coming to be recognized.

Such decisions, in the East as in the West, depend chiefly on the Bible, for it, by general agreement, is the primary witness to revelation. The issues here are for the most part hermeneutical (see hermeneutics) and cut across the confessional boundaries. Both modern fundamentalist and modern liberal interpretative methods are in disarray, and the retrieval of pre-modern classic methods in combination with historical criticism has not yet progressed to any great extent. But it is perhaps only by such a retrieval that Orthodox, Roman Catholic and Reformation Christians could overcome their respective temptations to exaggerated traditionalism, clerical authoritarianism and biblicism, and thus learn to read scripture together as the primary guide to the dogmatic decisions (such as the recent condemnations of racism*) which will need to be made in the future as in the past.

One major development in the understanding of dogma is especially promising: the recognition of what Vatican II calls the “hierarchy of truths”* or, in language more familiar to Reformation Christians, the acknowledgment that some doctrines are closer to the centre of the gospel than others. At the uniquely authoritative summit and centre, by common consent, are the classic Christological and Trinitarian credal affirmations which define the person of Jesus Christ,* i.e., true God and true man, second person of the Triune deity (see Trinity). Those who thus agree on who Jesus is and who God is can join together in what from the beginning of Christianity was the central community-forming acclamation – Jesus is Lord. They can hope to remove the incompatibilities of their dogmatic formulations at lower levels while retaining an enriching diversity. Thus the hierarchy of truths in its Trinitarian and Christological ordering provides a way of understanding and experiencing dogma as primarily unitive, even in the present divided state of the church.

DU PLESSIS, DAVID J.

B. 7 Feb. 1905, South Africa; d. 2 Feb. 1987, Pasadena, CA, USA. Widely known as "Mr Pentecost", Du Plessis was for a generation the leading figure in relations between Pentecostal churches and the ecumenical movement. Born of French Huguenot stock and ordained to the ministry in the Apostolic Faith Mission of South Africa (1928), he emigrated to the US in 1949. He attended several conferences of the International Missionary Council* and numerous WCC consultations and assemblies from Evanston 1954 (as a staff member) to Vancouver 1983 (as a delegate of the International Evangelical Church). Du Plessis attended the first Pentecostal World Conference (Zurich 1947) and was organizing secretary for several subsequent ones. He preached in more than 50 countries and was a frequent lecturer on Pentecostal issues at theological schools. A catalyst for the denominational charismatic renewal movement which began in the US in the 1960s, Du Plessis was looked on with suspicion and rejection in many Pentecostal circles because of his relationships with the WCC and the Vatican. His contacts with Rome culminated in the Pentecostal-Roman Catholic dialogue,* which began in 1972.

DUPREY, PIERRE

B. 26 Nov. 1922, Croix, France. Widely familiar with historical theology and ecumenical currents and personally acquainted with numerous church leaders, Duprey (bishop, 1990) was a staff member of the Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity (SPCU) from 1963 to 1999, becoming its secretary in 1983. He also served as vice-president of the Vatican commission of religious relations with the Jews; from 1965 as a member of the RCC-WCC Joint Working Group;* as liaison between the SPCU and Faith and Order* (1971-83); and as a member of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCCIC) and of the dialogue commissions with the Lutheran World Federation,* the World Alliance of Reformed Churches,* and the Pentecostal churches.* In 1980 he became secretary of the international commission for the Orthodox-RCC theological dialogue.* In 1963 he founded the Catholic Committee of Cultural Collaboration with the Orthodox and Oriental churches, and served on the board of the Tantur Ecumenical Institute* in Jerusalem.

Duprey left Nazi-occupied France in 1940 for Tunisia, to study theology and Arabic, as a member of the Missionaries of Africa (White Fathers). Ordained in 1950 (Carthage), with a doctorate from Rome's Oriental Institute (1953) and further studies in Orthodox theology (Athens) and Arabic literature (Beirut), in 1956 he began to teach dogmatic theology at the Melchite (Greek Catholic) seminary of St Ann in Jerusalem, and to edit Proche Orient chrétien. In 1962 he served as SPCU theologian/interpreter to the delegated Orthodox observers at the Second Vatican Council.*

EAST-WEST CONFRONTATION

ORTHODOX participants in the 1927 world conference on Faith and Order* in Lausanne vigorously expressed the view that the apostolic Tradition* is the source of all Christian churches and confessions, which thus share a common history. The “undivided church” is not an abstraction, but the church of the apostles, the fathers and the ecumenical councils.* The schism* and subsequent tensions between East and West were caused by ecclesiastical and political factors that divided the church into two regions: Rome and Byzantium, East and West, “Old Rome” and “New Rome”.

After centuries of estrangement, hostility and mutual ignorance, described by Henry Chadwick as a “succession of failures in mutual comprehension”, divided Christians are seeking through the ecumenical movement to speak together about the visible restoration of the one undivided church.* Without the presence of the Eastern churches, the WCC would represent only the Western fraction of Christianity. Roman Catholicism and the Reformation are often seen by Eastern Christians as two variants of the same theological system, which was initiated by Augustine of Hippo, accepted by the Latin church tradition and continued by the reformers.

Most of the controversial doctrinal, liturgical and canonical issues on the ecumenical agenda are rooted in or related to the broad historic East-West confrontation. They appear most clearly in the bilateral dialogues which the Orthodox churches have established with the Roman Catholic and Reformation churches.

An example is the West's ambiguous reception* (as the East sees it) of the decrees and decisions of the early ecumenical councils, as exemplified in the discussion concerning the council of Constantinople (381)* and the attitude of Pope Leo in dealing with the council of Chalcedon (451).* Rome and the Orthodox take opposing views concerning the status of councils held in 869-70 and in 879-80. Thus the reception of ecumenical councils remains a matter for dialogue.

In Orthodox eyes, the acceptance by both Roman Catholics and the Reformation of the theological system of Augustine shows that the West was largely indifferent to the soteriological presuppositions of the Christological heresies rejected by the ecumenical councils. The Augustinian doctrines that fallen humanity is saved by a created grace, that only justification* but not glorification (theosis) takes place in this life, and of the similarity between the created and the uncreated (analogia entis), appear to constitute the basis of Western theology and spirituality. The council of Constantinople in 1341 condemned, in the person of Balaam the Calabrian, the teaching of created grace, and accepted the distinction made by St Gregory Palamas between the ineffable essence of God and the communicated uncreated energies as source of the human being's theosis. This correction of Augustinian theology was never received in the West.

The confrontation within Western Christianity itself between the Franco-Latin powers and the Roman popes, which was turned against the New Rome for political reasons, led to the schism between East and West in 1054.

The sola scriptura of the Protestant Reformers can be seen as a non-reception of the binding common Tradition* of the ecumenical councils held in the East. The long conciliar experience of ecumenical interpretations and doctrinal development of the gospel message seems to be devaluated on the basis that the church* is a sinful and fallible human body. Here modern ecumenical dialogue has played a very positive role. The world conference on Faith and Order in Montreal (1963) declared that "by the Tradition is meant the gospel itself, transmitted from generation to generation in and by the church". Sola scriptura is thus placed in the context of the Tradition of the church.

Later the universal primacy* and jurisdiction of the bishop of Rome and the infallibility* of the pope were declared matters of divine revelation* and not of canon law.* The First Vatican Council* (1870) demonstrated to the East that the West had lost the conciliar system. The Orthodox continued to maintain the tradition of the pentarchy, according to which the "Old Rome" is equal and in the line with Eastern patriarchates.

For the East the critical issue here is the uncanonical substitution of authorities – the papacy for the ecumenical councils – which had the strange consequence that the Orthodox are seen as heretics and the Uniates* as orthodox. On this view, the only way for the New Rome to be accepted was Uniatism. Consequently, the dialogue between Orthodoxy and Catholicism is an essential part of the ecumenical movement (see Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue). This bilateral dialogue was initiated by the late Pope John XXIII and the late Patriarch Athenagoras I and led to the lifting of the anathemas* (though communion was not restored) of 1054. The Balamand agreement of 1993 opened a way for the mutual ecclesiological recognition of the sacraments* and the removal of Uniatism as a legitimate model for restoring unity among "sister" churches. The dialogue initiated by the WCC led to the elaboration of the document on *Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry** (1982) with the full participation of the Roman Catholic Church. Patriarch Dimitrios I of Constantinople said on his visit to Geneva in 1987 that "we hope that the complete inclusion [of the Roman Catholic Church] in the Council will be speedy, and that negotiations in this direction will have a happy end". For the Orthodox the East-West confrontation cannot be comprehended fully and rapprochement achieved unless the Roman Catholic Church joins the ecumenical quest for a "conciliar fellowship" of all local churches. In historical terms, the catholicity* of the church demands a fuller and more organic integration of the Eastern and Western traditions, especially because the serious dangers of deviation in each tradition can be avoided only if there is integration and synthesis.

EASTER

EASTER is the annual feast of Christ's resurrection* from the dead – an event that is celebrated on a weekly basis every Sunday, "the first day of the week", when the women discovered the empty tomb (Matt. 28:1; Mark 16:2; Luke 24:1; John 20:1) and the risen Lord appeared to them and to others (also Luke 24:13,36; John 20:19). The annual celebration was at first a unitary celebration of Christ's death and resurrection, a Christian passover, or pasch, corresponding to the fact that Christ's "exodus" (the Greek word in Luke 9:31) for the salvation* of the world had taken place at the time when the Jewish people commemorated their liberation from Egypt. The 4th century saw the development of "Good Friday" as a commemoration of Christ's passion and crucifixion, leaving Easter Sunday and the ensuing 50 days (see Pentecost) as the feast of Christ's victory over death. Liturgical and sacramental theology in the 20th century rediscovered the unitary character of the "paschal mystery" of Christ's death and resurrection, celebrated pre-eminently in the paschal vigil during the night from Saturday to Easter Sunday.

The dating of Easter has been the object of several controversies during Christian history. The serious remaining difference separates the Eastern and the Western churches. While both sides agree to the principle laid down in 325 by the council of Nicea* (Easter falls on the annually variable date of the first Sunday following the full moon after the northern spring equinox), the dates in practice differ because the East dates the equinox by the Julian calendar and the West by the Gregorian calendar (see church calendar). (Exceptions occur in Finland, where the Orthodox keep the Western date, and in parts of the Middle East, where some churches of Western origin have lately agreed to observe the Eastern date.)

The modern ecumenical movement has seen some modest efforts to consider and achieve the practice of a common date for Easter. An early stimulus came from the League of Nations, which in the 1920s proposed the fixed date of the Sunday after the second Saturday in April. This met with some support in the Life and Work* movement, but the Roman Catholic Church was wary of any semblance of secular control over a religious matter. At Vatican II,* however, encouragement was given to the search for an agreed date for Easter, whether annually variable because dependent on the moon (as at present) or fixed (by the civil, solar calendar); but no change was to be made until the churches reached a common mind. The WCC pursued the matter through a questionnaire to its member churches (1965-67), a Faith and Order* consultation (1970), and a report to the Nairobi assembly (1975). The subject was brought back to the agenda of Faith and Order in 1995-96.

While some churches, particularly Western, would be happy with a fixed date (the most favoured being the one originally proposed by the League of Nations), the Orthodox churches stand by the Nicene principle that makes a variable date dependent on the moon. Ecclesiastically, the best hope for a common date appears to reside in continuing to keep an annually variable date while respecting astronomical exactitude for the equinox, from which the first full moon and the ensuing Sunday are counted. This – with the precision that the basis for reckoning be "the meridian of Jerusalem, the place of Christ's death and resurrection" – was the recommendation made by a consultation of the WCC and the Middle East Council of Churches held at Aleppo, Syria, in 1997 under the title "Towards a Common Date for Easter". There have been hints (documented by Heller) that, failing this solution, the church of Rome might move to a fixed Saturday in April.

EASTERN CATHOLIC CHURCHES

THESE CHURCHES, with an estimated total membership of more than 9 million, originated in very diverse circumstances and live in various situations. What they have in common is full communion* of faith* and sacraments* with the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) around the bishop of Rome, while retaining various Eastern liturgical and canonical traditions inherited from the mother churches from which they were separated by their union with the church of Rome. They were disparagingly called Uniates* by the Orthodox or Oriental churches because of negative memories of their origins and of their type of relationship with Rome or with the Orthodox churches of the same traditions.

On the RC side, these union attempts were generally founded on the principle of the union-council of Florence (1438-45): complete respect of the diversity of traditions within the unity of faith. But no Eastern Catholic church in fact traces its origin back to this council. In the context of the Counter-Reformation, the awareness of the ecclesial character of the Orthodox churches became blurred in the RCC, and the attempts to restore unity between the two churches slowly gave way to the "return" of individuals or small groups to the RCC.

In Eastern Europe, the reunion with Rome of certain communities – at times with their bishops – was strongly influenced by the socio-political situation, especially the changes of frontiers between countries with Catholic or Orthodox predominance. The union of the Ukrainians (Brest-Litovsk 1595-96) concluded at a time when these regions were under Polish authority. The union of the Ruthenians (Uzhorod 1646) and that of a group of Romanians (Transylvania 1700) took place within the Austro-Hungarian empire. Of lesser importance were the Yugoslavian, Bulgarian, Slovak, Hungarian, Belorussian, Albanian, Russian and Greek Catholic churches. All belonged to the Byzantine-Slavonic tradition. The Ukrainian (about 3.7 million members), Ruthenian, Belorussian and Romanian Catholic churches were officially suppressed by force under communist regimes in the late 1940s; they survived only in their homelands underground or outside them, especially in Western Europe and North America.

In the Middle East the circumstances were very different. The Maronite church is a special case. Originating in the territory of Antioch (monastery of Beit-Marun) in the 4th century, it claims no historical consciousness of a formal break with Rome; and it renewed contact at the time of the crusades.* The Maronite church thus has no "Orthodox" counterpart, but belongs totally to the Catholic communion. All the churches of the Middle East lived in very difficult situations within the Ottoman empire. Under its law, as small minorities amid the Muslims they formed ethnic communities with their own separate legal status. Thus these churches readily welcomed the offer of help from Latin missionaries from the West, particularly since most of their members had no vivid awareness of an existing schism* with the RCC. The pastoral, intellectual and social activities of these missionaries slowly created, in different places, groups of laity and pastors who favoured union with Rome; eventually the union was proclaimed officially.

Rather than bringing about the union between the RCC and the respective other partners, the fait accompli was generally refused by the majority of the Orthodox, and new divisions resulted. With some important differences, this was the case with all the churches of the Middle East when some of their members became united with Rome: the Eastern Syrian or Nestorian tradition (Chaldeans, 1553), the Western Syrian tradition (Syrian Catholics, 1662), the Armenian tradition (Armenian Catholics, 1740), the Byzantine tradition (Greek Catholics or Melkites, 1724). Later on, the passage of individuals to the RCC led to the creation of Coptic Catholic (1895) and Ethiopian Catholic (1930) hierarchies.

On the Indian coast of Malabar in the 16th century, divisions resulted when the Portuguese tried to impose Latin authority and discipline on the St Thomas Christians. Two groups entered into communion with Rome: the Malabar (1599) and the Malankara (1930) churches.

The canonical ties of all these churches with Rome led in varying degrees to a process of Latinization of their liturgy and thinking, and to a number of encroachments on their discipline and autonomy as local churches. The Orthodox thus sometimes interpret this as a proof that the Roman Catholic Church has no place for a true local church and an original tradition. However, in its Decree on the Eastern Catholic Churches, the Second Vatican Council* insisted on respect for their particular traditions and on the necessity for these churches to rediscover their authentic heritage. Moreover, in emphasizing the ecumenical vocation of the Eastern Catholic churches, Vatican II stated that all juridical dispositions concerning them are of a provisional nature until the time of full communion with the Orthodox churches.

The Orthodox regard the very existence of the Eastern Catholic churches as de facto negation of the ecclesial character of the Orthodox themselves. In their eyes, these churches are instruments of disguised proselytism* which aim to convert to Catholicism those ignorant faithful who are unable to recognize the differences. The Eastern Catholic churches are an open wound in the side of the Orthodox churches which consistently ask for their suppression. Hence the Eastern Catholic churches cannot act as bridge between Catholics and Orthodox, as they were sometimes expected to do. Orthodox churches now want to dialogue directly with the RCC without the mediation of these churches.

From the side of the Eastern Catholic churches, created by Rome with a view to restoring unity, it is painful to be judged an obstacle to unity, a "thorn in the flesh" of the dialogue. What could be their future vocation? By faithfully reviving their most authentic Eastern traditions, they could bear witness to the Orthodox church that it is possible to be an authentic local Eastern church within the Catholic communion around the bishop of Rome. Within the universal Catholic church, their task is a constant reminder that catholicity* cannot limit itself to the Latin tradition alone but must be open to all genuine expressions of the fullness of ecclesial life in Christ.

The official Orthodox-Roman Catholic international commission for theological dialogue (see Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue), established in 1979 by Pope John Paul II and Ecumenical Patriarch Dimitrios I, began in the mid-1980s to discuss what some on both sides regard as proselytism among vulnerable flocks.

The 1988 session established a special sub-commission to study the question of the Eastern Catholic churches. The topic monopolized the 1990 session, because the rebirth of religious freedom with the sudden political changes in Eastern and Central Europe allowed the resumption of open pastoral activity by the Eastern Catholic churches, including their claim to repossess their former places of worship. The new tensions prompted the holy see in Rome and local Eastern Catholic and Orthodox authorities to begin conversations. Pope John Paul II addressed a letter to the Catholic bishops of Europe (31 May 1991), and the Vatican published general principles and practical norms for "coordinating the evangelizing activity and ecumenical commitment" (1 June 1992). The 1993 international dialogue session (Balamand, Lebanon) adopted a text "Uniatism, Method of Union of the Past, and the Present Search for Full Communion", offering ecclesiological principles and practical rules for a solution. However, this question still weighs heavily on Orthodox-Roman Catholic relations.

The Roman curia* has a congregation or department for the Eastern churches, created in 1862 within the Propaganda Fide and made autonomous in 1917. John Paul II, as pastor of the universal Catholic church, promulgated in 1990 a Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches.

EASTERN ORTHODOXY

IN RECENT times, this term has come to be used, particularly in the ecumenical context, to refer to the “Chalcedonian” Orthodox as distinct from the “non-” or “pre-Chalcedonian” churches, known as “Oriental Orthodox churches”.*

Eastern Orthodox churches are identified with the East through a series of historical accidents, involving the gradual estrangement between Rome (and Western Christendom) and the other ancient patriarchates. In reality, Orthodoxy* does not consider itself either Eastern or Western. Until the schism* between East and West became a final reality, Eastern and Western Christianity, with tensions from time to time, were one conciliar communion* (with the exception of the pre-Chalcedonians from the 5th century onwards).

The date of 1054, usually given as that of the separation, is that of an exchange of excommunications* between Rome and Constantinople (the “New Rome” since the first council of Constantinople,* 381). The process leading to the schism was in fact long and complicated, and in spite of attempts at reunion (councils of Lyons, 1274, and Ferrara-Florence, 1438-39), it still remains unhealed. However, relations have changed considerably in recent decades, particularly in 1965, when Pope Paul VI and Patriarch Athenagoras I mutually lifted the excommunications of 1054. An official international dialogue commission has been at work for some years now (see Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue).

The Eastern Orthodox claim a direct, unbroken descent from the church of the apostles. This is expressed in their fidelity to the apostolic faith as developed in the seven ecumenical councils* and the patristic tradition (see apostolic Tradition, apostolicity). Thus, the Eastern Orthodox churches are united in the faith,* and each one has internal autonomy under the primacy* of the patriarchate of Constantinople, the “first among equals”.

Orthodoxy also implies a strong attachment to the sacraments,* the most important being the sacraments of initiation: baptism* (by immersion), chrismation* and the eucharist* (communion in both kinds), to which the newly baptized member is immediately admitted, whatever his or her age.

Since the separation from the Christian West, Eastern Orthodox churches have mainly been using the Syro-Byzantine liturgical tradition (see liturgy), whose development owes much to the fathers and the great monastic centres (today, Mt Athos is the most important of these). In this liturgical tradition iconography plays an important part (see icon/image).

Structurally, Eastern Orthodox churches currently fall under the following classifications. They represent four out of the five ancient patriarchates which, together with Rome, formed the famous pentarchy, i.e. Constantinople (Patriarch Bartholomew I; some 2 million faithful, with only a few thousand in Turkey); Alexandria (Patriarch Peter VII; about 100,000 faithful); Antioch (primatial see, Damascus: Patriarch Ignatius IV; some 450,000 faithful); and Jerusalem (Patriarch Irineos I; about 50,000).

Orthodoxy includes a number of other autocephalous churches (i.e. churches that elect their own primate without reference to another autocephalous church). The largest of all is the church of Russia (Patriarch Alexis II; about 100 million faithful in 1917, approximately the same number baptized today). Others are the Romanian church (Patriarch Theoctist; some 14 million); the Serbian church in ex-Yugoslavia (patriarchate in Belgrade: Patriarch Pavle; some 8 million); the Church of Greece, distinct from the patriarchate of Constantinople since 1833, with its own primate, the archbishop of Athens (Christodoulos; about 7.5 million faithful); the Bulgarian church (Patriarch Maximos; some 6 million); the church of Georgia, much more ancient than the Russian church, having been founded in the 5th century as a result of missionary work by a woman, St Nino, counted as “equal to the apostles” in the Orthodox sanctoral (Patriarch Catholicos Elias II; 2.5 million faithful in 1917); the church of Cyprus, autocephalous since the council of Ephesus in 431 (Archbishop Chrysostomos; some 450,000 faithful).

A third type are autocephalous churches which represent a minority among other Christians in their territory, namely, the Orthodox Church of the Czech Lands and Slovakia (some 350,000 faithful in 1950); the Orthodox church in Poland (about 350,000); the Orthodox Autocephalous Church of Albania (about 210,000 faithful in 1944, now developing once again under the leadership of Archbishop Anastasios).

Orthodoxy also includes autonomous or semi-autonomous churches (i.e. churches that enjoy internal autonomy but whose primate is elected under the aegis of one of the autocephalous churches. Among them are the church of Finland (some 70,000 faithful, under the jurisdiction of Constantinople); the church of Crete (also under Constantinople); the Orthodox Church of Japan (about 36,000 faithful, under the jurisdiction of Moscow); the Russian Orthodox mission in China (probably some 20,000 faithful).

Another classification is missions which are not yet autonomous. These include the Russian mission in Korea (under the jurisdiction of the Greek Archdiocese of North America) and African Orthodoxy (founded in Uganda by dissidents from Anglicanism, now present also in Kenya, Democratic Republic of Congo, Ghana and Zimbabwe, under the jurisdiction of the patriarchate of Alexandria).

Finally, there is the Orthodox diaspora.* In the 19th and 20th centuries, many Orthodox emigrated to Western countries for economic and political reasons. As a result, Orthodox are now to be found in most parts of the world.

Although the principle of identifying Orthodoxy with an ethnic group was condemned as a heresy* in 1872 under the name of “phyletism” by a synod held in Constantinople (but received by all Orthodox churches), the present situation resembles a complicated jigsaw puzzle of numerous jurisdictions in most countries of the Western world, where the Orthodox of various origins tend to be claimed by their mother churches according to their ethnicity.*

According to traditional Orthodox ecclesiology, all the Orthodox in a given place, whatever their ethnic origin, should be gathered in one conciliar communion. Such, for example, was the situation in the US until 1917: all the Orthodox were in one diocese, which had grown from the Russian mission among the Aleutian and Alaskan Indians in the 18th century. At the council of Moscow in 1917, Tikhon, formerly bishop of the American diocese (recently canonized), was elected patriarch. When he was able to send a new bishop to New York a few years later, the latter found that in the meantime all the mother churches of the Orthodox world had claimed their nationals and created their own jurisdictions. In 1970, the Russian church granted autocephaly to the churches of its old diocese in America, thus creating the Orthodox Church in America (primate: Metropolitan Theodosius). However, finding the solution to the problem of the Orthodox diaspora remains one of the main difficulties of present-day Orthodoxy, one that is high on the agenda of the pan-Orthodox council. Recently the churches have moved towards a consensus in this area.

Eastern Orthodox churches have played a part in the ecumenical movement from early in the 20th century. Witness the encyclical* letter of the Ecumenical Patriarch of Constantinople in 1920 to “all the churches of Christ” for “closer intercourse and mutual cooperation”. The Orthodox diaspora has also greatly contributed to an encounter with Western Christendom, to better mutual understanding, and to a common renaissance in patristic theological reflection. Most Eastern Orthodox churches have become members of the WCC and have established bilateral dialogues* with most Christian churches. Orthodoxy, however, does include a certain anti-ecumenical strain which is largely due to a suspicion on the part of some that ecumenical dialogue necessarily implies a betrayal of the purity of the Orthodox faith. Under the influence of this trend, the Orthodox churches of Georgia and Bulgaria left the WCC in 1998.

Eastern Orthodox churches do not believe in “intercommunion”;* in their view, only full communion* has a meaning. This is the main reason why the Orthodox generally have refused to practise so-called eucharistic hospitality. In their conception of the nature of the church,* communion is only possible when the apostolic faith can be fully confessed together. (Some pastors do practise eucharistic hospitality in specific circumstances, but only as a matter of conscience in their personal pastoral responsibility.) For the time being, Eastern Orthodox churches are not prepared to sanction a generalized eucharistic hospitality, not even as a measure of economy.* Indeed, such a step would amount to establishing a rule, and the principle of economy is precisely a pedagogical exception to a rule which in no way abolishes the existing rule. In the Orthodox perspective, full communion will quite naturally be restored when it is truly possible to confess the fullness of the apostolic faith together.

ECCLESIOLOGY AND ETHICS

FROM THE VERY foundation of the church it has been believed that some styles of behaviour are compatible with discipleship and membership of the church, while notorious immorality, if persisted in, involves exclusion from fellowship. The ecumenical movement has all along wrestled with the relationship between ethics* and the being and unity of the church. Sometimes the distinction between Faith and Order and Life and Work made it possible to treat the issues of ecclesiology and ethics separately, but crises such as the German church struggle of the 1930s and subsequently the question of apartheid made the issue unavoidable: it was clear to most people that the integrity, unity and faith of the church were fundamentally compromised if it took a false stance in relation to the claims and actions of Nazism or the racist system of apartheid. The Barmen theological declaration of 1934, which was a foundation document of the Confessing Church,* challenged both the theology and the ethics of the “German Christians” who supported Hitler. And declarations by the Lutheran World Federation, the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* and the WCC that apartheid was a confessional issue led to the breaking of fellowship with several white churches in South Africa because of their support of the apartheid regime.

W.A. Visser 't Hooft spoke at the WCC's Uppsala assembly in 1968 of “moral heresies” – a reminder that some ethical issues are church-dividing matters, for ethics* and faith are inseparably intertwined. But struggles for justice and peace can also lead to a new and vital sense of being church. Archbishop Desmond Tutu often said that apartheid was too strong for divided churches; but in the struggle against apartheid and in other moral struggles there has often been a new experience of unity, a costly, gracious unity. Some have found that involvement in the conciliar process for Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation (JPIC) was for them a rich experience of what it is to be “church”, suggesting that the church grows and finds its unity in and through moral struggle, although paradoxically moral issues can also be church-dividing. Unity is a precious gift which requires a costly response; the world in which the church is called to manifest this unity is full of division, hostility, suspicion and injustice. The road to the true unity in love and truth which is God's purpose is thus sometimes the painful way of division.

The “conciliar process” for JPIC to which the WCC called the churches in 1983 reached its rather confusing culmination in the world convocation on JPIC in Seoul in 1990. The Seoul gathering rested on a strong conviction that ecclesiology and ethics belong together, that the being of the church is implicated in ethical action, but there was continuing uncertainty how this might best be articulated. As a result, the WCC set up a study on ecclesiology and ethics which sought to clarify the issues involved and reflect on the lessons to be learned from the churches' involvement in struggles for justice, liberation and ecological responsibility. The first meeting at Rønede, Denmark, in 1993 explored ways in which discipleship means costly involvement in the pain, brokenness and struggles of the world and also involvement in a koinonia which overcomes divisions and hostilities many of which are ancient and deep-seated. These two commitments are often in acute tension. But the Rønede consultation in its report Costly Unity sought to point the way to a fresh approach which "offers new inspiration for the churches' search for unity, and for their costly, reconciling and healing witness in the world". "Costly unity", the report declared, "is discovering the churches' unity as a gift of pursuing justice and peace."

The Rønede consultation had a considerable impact on the fifth world conference on F&O (Santiago de Compostela 1993). The report of section IV affirmed that "in many places and at different levels, koinonia-generating involvement in the struggles of humanity is taking place. We recognize in these common involvements an urgent, real, but imperfect koinonia, and urge the Faith and Order commission to give priority to lifting up and clarifying their ecclesiological implications." The report also declared that "the being and mission of the church... are at stake in witness through proclamation and concrete actions for justice, peace and integrity of creation. This is a defining mark of koinonia and central to our understanding of ecclesiology. The urgency of these issues makes it manifest that our theological reflection on the proper unity of Christ's church is inevitably related to ethics."

Two further consultations on ecclesiology and ethics took place, in Jerusalem in 1994, and in Johannesburg in 1996. Their reports and working papers helped to clarify the issues, which are certain to remain high on the ecumenical agenda for some time to come.

ECONOMICS

ECONOMICS deals with the production, distribution and consumption of material goods and services. The second assembly of the WCC (Evanston 1954) summarized the ecumenical concern about economic and social issues as follows: "The church is concerned with economic life because of God's concern for human beings who work to produce goods and services, who use them, and for whom business exists."

A survey of the history of the ecumenical debate about economic issues can be divided into five different periods, though of course many characteristic elements of one period were present in the previous or continued during the following one. During the first period, from 1910 to 1933, awareness of the importance of socio-economic issues emerged. The concept of the responsible society played a major role as a criterion for the assessment of economic problems during the second period from 1934 to 1960. In the third period, between 1960 and 1975, the concept of human development* became dominant. The fourth period, from around 1975 to the end of the 1980s, was characterized by the use of two different criteria: sustainability, which expresses a concern for nature and human resources, and solidarity with the poor,* as a key in the struggle against poverty. Reflection in the fifth period, beginning around 1990, has been dominated by the awareness of globalization and its consequences.

1. ECONOMICS AND THE CHURCH (1910-33)

In the 1890s the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) had begun to develop its social teaching, for which Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum can be considered as the point of departure (see encyclicals, Roman Catholic social). In this encyclical the concept of the common good plays a key role. This notion was further dealt with by Pius XI in Quadragesimo Anno (1931), in the context of the rise of fascism. Conservative Protestants, however, approached economic life from a perspective dominated by a sharp distinction between the spiritual and the secular, the eternal and the temporal, based in a traditional understanding of Luther's theology of the two kingdoms. The social gospel movement* was influential in North America, as was religious socialism in Western and Central Europe, mostly in Reformed circles.

The concern for peace and internationalism became a priority for the churches as they realized how much the problems related to social ethics are interlinked. This awareness informed many of the early discussions and reflections of the Life and Work* (L&W) movement, which emerged in this period. Its first conference (Stockholm 1925) was an impressive endeavour to create a common basis for discussions on social ethics among Christians of different churches. Although not an exclusively Protestant event, it sought to overcome the over-emphasis on individualism prevalent in Protestant social ethics at that time, stressing that industrial activity should not be undertaken only for the sake of personal profit, but should provide benefits for the whole community. Because the human person is a steward in the service of God, whose will embraces the whole of humanity, private interest and property should be subordinated to social goals.

2. THE RESPONSIBLE SOCIETY (1934-60)

This second period was particularly creative. The churches had to face enormous challenges, among them the rise of National Socialism in Germany, the consolidation of Stalinism in the USSR, the consequences of the great depression, the gathering power of authoritarian and totalitarian states, the second world war and its aftermath, the cold war, the birth and development of the world economic order based on the internationalization of capital and labour,* decolonization* and the emergence of independent nations, the emergence of the group of non-aligned countries, the beginning of the period of peaceful co-existence, and the Chinese and Cuban revolutions.

These changes, during a period of about 25 years, profoundly influenced the life of the churches. Ecumenically, the second L&W conference met in Oxford (1937) around the theme "Church, Community and State"; the WCC held its first assembly – postponed for seven years by the war – in Amsterdam (1948) and its second in Evanston (1954). Pope John XXIII called the Second Vatican Council,* which marked the beginning of the official participation of the Vatican in the ecumenical movement.

Three names from these years deserve special mention. J.H. Oldham, the first general secretary of the International Missionary Council and chief organizer of the Oxford conference, was the architect of the concept of the responsible society,* which was not an alternative social model or system but a criterion for decisions at the level of social ethics. W.A. Visser 't Hooft, the first general secretary of the WCC, had a passion for the una sancta and a deep interest in the socio-economic and political problems of the world. Paul Abrecht, director of Church and Society in the WCC for nearly 30 years, introduced concerns of developing countries such as economic growth and development onto the ecumenical agenda and promoted a multidisciplinary, contextual approach to church and society issues.

After the second assembly, an international ecumenical study was launched on "The Common Christian Responsibility towards Areas of Rapid Social Change". Through it the ecumenical movement developed an approach to socio-economic and political matters that was universal as well as culturally and politically pluralistic. Two main lessons were learned. First, it was realized that ecumenical social ethics, in spite of its supranational character, had so far approached economic and political problems from a predominantly Western perspective. The time had come to broaden this perspective to include the concerns of churches and Christians in other parts of the world. This realization marked the beginning of a more inclusive dialogue involving other cultures and people of other faiths. Second, study of rapid social change demonstrated clearly the inadequacy of the simplistic view of the world as divided between two opposite camps: the liberal-capitalist West and the Marxist-socialist East. This view, which prevailed up to the Evanston assembly, needed to be broadened by including problems related to North-South relationships.

More than before, the ecumenical movement came to pay attention to such important economic issues as migration* (both domestic and international), economic growth, patterns of consumption, development cooperation, world poverty* and trade relations. The overarching key of the analysis was the criterion of social justice and its practical implications. It became evident that there cannot be economic growth and development without structural transformation to bring about justice* and democracy.

Whereas the first period was characterized by a certain idealism, the second period called for greater realism on the part of churches and Christians. In the words of the conference which concluded the "Rapid Social Change" study (Salonika 1959): "It is impossible to foresee an ideal pattern of economic development without difficult problems. Some cost in human hardship and misery is inevitable. It will often be necessary to work out proximate goals and least harmful measures. Christians must accept the hard facts of economic life and be ready to take necessary choices and to run the unavoidable risks."

3. HUMAN DEVELOPMENT (1960-75)

As the process of political decolonization continued in the 1960s and early 1970s, more and more independent states emerged in Africa, Asia and the Pacific. Peaceful co-existence was followed by detente, and this new path survived until the end of the 1970s, despite some difficult situations (e.g. the Cuban missile crisis in 1962; the Vietnam war from 1965 to 1975; Arab-Israeli wars in 1967 and 1973). The gap between the rich industrialized countries in the North and the poor producers of raw materials or semi-manufactured goods of the South continued to widen. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development was created as a forum to discuss many problems of the so-called third world. A main problem was to see what kinds of national development models and international economic order were required to ensure the real development of the South.

Churches became important partners in this debate. The Second Vatican Council's pastoral constitution on the church's presence in the world (Gaudium et Spes) was followed by Pope Paul VI's encyclical Populorum Progressio (1967), which stated that "development is the new name of peace". In 1966 the WCC called a world conference on church and society around the theme "Christians in the Technical and Social Revolutions of Our Time". The WCC and the Vatican together organized a conference on world cooperation for development (Beirut 1968). At the fourth assembly of the WCC (Uppsala 1968), "human development" was identified as a major priority for the ecumenical movement. The WCC and the Pontifical Commission on Justice and Peace jointly established the exploratory committee on Society, Development and Peace (SODEPAX*), thus highlighting the ecumenical importance of issues such as development, peace and human rights.

In the emerging debate about the quality of life and economic growth, the criterion of the meaning of the human prevailed. A consultation on ecumenical assistance to development projects (Montreux 1970) affirmed that three main elements must characterize human development: social justice, self-reliance and economic growth, the third being a means of promoting the first two. This understanding of development reflected prevailing thoughts of third-world economists and social scientists, promoted ecumenically by Samuel Parmar of India.

The Montreux consultation also proposed creation of an Ecumenical Development Fund (EDF), to which churches were asked to contribute 2% of their annual budgets. The fund would be used to provide seed money for the launching of development programmes and to support development education aimed at increasing awareness of the need for solidarity and human development. The WCC's Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development (CCPD) was created; in addition, other departments of the WCC took part in the development debate, notably Church and Society, Inter-Church Aid, the Christian Medical Commission, SODEPAX, and the Sub-unit on Women.

The Church and Society programme on "The Future of Man and Society in a World of Science-Based Technology” focused in the early 1970s on the relationship between economic growth and the quality of life. During this period the Club of Rome published its report on The Limits to Growth, which argued for a self-imposed limitation to growth in light of the planet’s limited physical resources. Whereas the ecumenical reflections about development emphasized social justice as the highest priority, the debate stimulated by Church and Society underlined the importance of sustainability. That social ethics must deal with both elements became particularly clear at the Church and Society conference in Bucharest (1974) on “Science and Technology for Human Development – the Ambiguous Future and the Christian Hope”, as well as in the CCPD report Threats to Survival, approved by the WCC central committee in 1974.

The experience gained by some churches through their involvement in development made them aware that any action in this field requires an exercise of people’s participation if it is to be effective. That neither development nor the future of humankind can be left in the hands of the powerful and specialists alone was underscored in the report of WCC general secretary Philip Potter to the fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975).

By the mid-1970s, both the international community and the ecumenical movement had come to realize that eradicating poverty and transforming world economic and social structures would be far more difficult to achieve than was foreseen earlier. It was hard to implement “human development” and “human economy”. Although a consensus within the churches on economic matters thus seemed almost impossible to achieve, Nairobi called for further reflection on a “Just, Participatory and Sustainable Society”.*

4. SUSTAINABILITY AND SOLIDARITY (1976-89)

When non-aligned nations introduced the debate around a New International Economic Order at the special session of the general assembly of the UN in 1974, powerful groups manifested great resistance to proposals for structural transformation. The optimism of the late 1950s and the 1960s about transforming the world economic situation and developing better patterns of growth at the planetary level was no longer evident. The development of African, Asian, Latin American and Pacific countries had not occurred. There was economic growth in many cases, but this was achieved at the cost of increased dependency and a high social toll on the poor sections of the population. The gathering pessimism was reflected in the report of an independent commission on development, chaired by Willy Brandt. The process of internationalization of capital and labour, most clearly evident in the concentration of decision making in transnational corporations* (TNCs), called for a more careful analysis of the world’s economic situation. As new technologies created new dynamics – especially in the information industry – special attention to technological developments was necessary. Genetic engineering was raising new concerns over food and energy production (see bio-ethics). Global financial instability was becoming increasingly evident – most dramatically in the October 1987 stock market crisis – and led to complex consequences like the increasing foreign debt of developed and developing countries.

The WCC world conference on “Faith, Science and the Future” (MIT 1979) was decisive in highlighting the need for convergence between science and theology, technology and spirituality. Underscoring the unbreakable link between sustainability, social justice and participation, the conference warned against dismembering the concept set forth in Nairobi into “justice for the third world, participation for the second world and sustainability for the first world. We of the human race are all members of one another. We must together struggle to extend participation, develop sustainability and let ‘justice roll down like waters and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream’.”

In 1977 the WCC had initiated a study programme on churches and TNCs. Attention was given to the need for an integral approach to the issue of the transnationality of business as a unique phenomenon, to the power of TNCs and accountability, to the use of technology and its effects on employment and labour, to the need for building up countervailing power and to the responsibility of churches. A process of consultations was organized, and a report presented to the WCC central committee in 1982.

Within the framework of CCPD, an Advisory Group on Economic Matters (AGEM) was established in 1979. A CCPD-Church and Society consultation on "Political Economy, Ethics and Theology: Some Contemporary Challenges" (Zurich 1978) emphasized the need to formulate a "new paradigm in political economy", outlined in three propositions: (1) the need to re-instate the historical and spatial dimension in economic thought and praxis; (2) the need to have an integrated view on economics through interdisciplinary research; (3) the need for economics again to become political economy, in which value judgments play an important role. It was argued that the discussion on limits to inequality in terms of maximum and minimum levels should be central.

Meanwhile, the WCC central committee had received the report of the CCPD study programme on "The Church and the Poor", which emphasized that churches should be in solidarity with the underprivileged sectors of society. Building on this perspective, the AGEM organized a series of reflections on various political economic issues.

Much the same concern for social justice and the eradication of poverty was manifested in Roman Catholic social teaching, notably three encyclical letters of Pope John Paul II – on human labour (Laborem Exercens 1981), on socio-economic issues that challenge the Christian conscience (Sollicitudo Rei Socialis 1987), and in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of Rerum Novarum (Centesimus Annus 1991). Similar thinking is reflected in the document of the Pontifical Commission Justice and Peace on foreign debt (see debt crisis) in the North and the South (At the Service of the Human Community: An Ethical Consideration about the International Debt, 1987). The pastoral letter of the US Roman Catholic bishops on "The Catholic Social Teaching and the US Economy" (1986) made yet another important contribution to the debate.

During this period a new wave of research and publications on economic praxis and theory stimulated fresh thinking in Christian theology and social ethics. Ecumenically influential were Franz Hinkelam-mert, Las armas ideológicas de la muerte (1977), Crítica de la razón utópica (1983), Democracia y totalitarismo (1987); Arendt T. van Leeuwen, De Nacht van het Kapitaal (1985); and Ulrich Duchrow, Weltwirtschaft Heute: Ein Feld für bekenkende Kirche? (1986), all anticipated by Helmut Gollwitzer, Die kapitalistische Revolution (1974). These publications attempt to show how Christian faith is challenged in economic life by false gods and idols, the Molochs and Mammons of our time. Reflected in the ecumenical debate is the call to resist the totalitarianism of the market through confessing the lordship of Christ.

5. GLOBALIZATION (1990-PRESENT)

This period is influenced by the new configuration of the world economic situation characterized by the globalization of financial markets and world trade. In 1992, the WCC central committee commended to WCC member churches a study document produced by the AGEM, "Abundant Life for All: Christian Faith and the World Economy Today". It suggests some criteria for economic policy-making which clearly express the conviction that theology cannot be dissociated from economic realities. They are: (1) the essential goodness of the created order, and the responsibility for it entrusted to humanity; (2) the innate value and freedom of each human being and of all humanity; (3) God's concern with all humankind, breaking through whatever barriers we build between us; (4) God's justice as the overarching standard for human relationships and behaviour, to be discovered through a preferential option for the poor.

CONCLUSION

The ecumenical approach to economics has been multidisciplinary, aiming above all at developing social ethics to provide churches, Christian communities and individual believers with criteria and guidelines for judgment and action in social and economic matters. In this process, churches have discovered that all ecclesiastical institutions and all religions and ideologies share many common problems; thus, no clear distinctions can be made between the agenda of the churches and the agenda of the world in this area: economic matters are ecumenical matters; the economic dimension of life touches the whole inhabited world.

The specificity of the ecumenical dialogue lies precisely in the approach, values and criteria applied to the understanding of economics. The ecumenical movement is not called to find one homogeneous and uniform position. What is called for is an intercontextual approach which recognizes that the universality of a given problem needs to be tackled through the diversity of its manifestations in difficult situations. Such an approach demands a multidisciplinary exercise. The ecumenical discussion can be seen as an approach to economic problems through permanent dialogue. This was clear in the discussion on development and economic growth during the 1960s and 1970s, and the current discussion of the debt crisis.

The ecumenical dialogue on economic matters has always underscored the value of social justice, understood as a translation of the commandment of God in Jesus Christ to love one another. Practically, the permanent task of the ecumenical movement to work for social justice has been translated into efforts to eradicate poverty through interchurch channels of cooperation and solidarity.

Another value that has been emphasized is freedom which, since the beginning of the 1970s, has been understood by some Christian communities as liberation. For the ecumenical movement, freedom has never been an absolute value. The second WCC assembly qualified it as "relative", important for the life of the economic enterprise and the regulating role of the price system. Because freedom is not absolute, it calls for the exercise of stewardship in the administration of property and world resources.

In response to the question of how to act in order to give substance to the values of social justice and freedom, four main criteria have prevailed in the ecumenical debate about economics. The first was the concept of the responsible society, which played a key role until the beginning of the 1960s. It was based on the understanding of middle axioms,* proposed by J.H. Oldham as a basis for the orientation of Christian witness. One of these middle axioms is the responsible society.

Second, from the beginning of the 1960s, the "human" became a prevailing criterion, especially evident in the world conference on Church and Society in 1966 and the fourth and fifth assemblies of the WCC. The concept of responsible society left room for the practice of a wide humanism. Ecumenical social ethics during the 1960s and 1970s did not look for ready-made norms of conduct but was concerned with the biblical imperative to become full human persons. That goal entails the humanization of science and technology and demands the satisfaction of basic human needs. Justice is a prerequisite because people cannot become fully human when they are victims of injustice. Therefore, the goal of the ecumenical movement was not only "economic growth" but above all "human development". The problem is not only of a quantitative nature; the goal is a better quality of life.

Third, this synthesized reflection process culminated in the proposal that the ecumenical movement should strive for a "sustainable society" which can ensure respect for the human as well as respect for nature and the responsibility towards future generations.

Fourth, the prevailing situation from the mid-1970s did not allow for much hope for the immediate future. The plight of the poor worsened, and the gap between the rich and the poor continued to widen. The foreign debt of many countries in the South, combined with general financial instability everywhere, created conditions favouring the rise of conservative patterns of behaviour. This posed a serious threat to human development, especially because welfare policies were becoming increasingly unpopular. Churches around the world adopted "an evangelical option for the poor", and this choice influenced ecumenical discussions. "Solidarity with the poor" was proposed as a new criterion for economic reflection and action within the ecumenical movement.

ECONOMY (OIKONOMIA)

THE GREEK word oikonomia is used in the New Testament to mean the management of a household (e.g. in Luke 16:2-4) and also to refer to divine providence (1 Cor. 9:17; Eph. 1:10, 3:2; Col. 1:25; 1 Tim. 1:4). Its use to indicate flexibility in the enforcement of church disciplinary rules goes back to the 3rd century. The bishop is to interpret and implement canon law,* and in so doing he can either follow the rules strictly or display flexibility (first council of Constantinople,* 381). Departure from strictness is praiseworthy if the attitude has a positive effect on the common good of the church (Cyril of Alexandria). By the middle ages, economy clearly characterized a departure, made by competent authorities, from strict conformity with a canonical norm.

Strictness (akribeia) does not always mean conformity with only written laws, since Eastern canon law has never been a system which provides answers to every kind of problem. Rather, strictness embraces the observance of the church's standards, whether written in canons or not. And internal criteria limit applications of economy.

Thus, economy does not apply to what directly involves doctrines of faith,* such as the basic principles which underlie sacramental theology, church order* and Christian ethics. But one cannot infer that because economy is impossible in these areas, it is unrestricted in all other cases.

Economy can designate either a decision which departs from a strict norm or, more often, the principle by which one has made such a decision (kat' oikonomian). For example, the council in Trullo (691) dealt with irregular marriages of clergy. While the church of Rome keeps that rule strictly, the church of Constantinople introduces "humanity and compassion" as a principle of economy. The explicit mention of "according to economy" indicates that an exceptional non-enforcement of a rule does not imply that the rule itself is considered invalid or obsolete.

In Eastern Orthodox church law several canons have sunk into oblivion, either from changes in the life setting or merely from the disappearance of the specific reasons which had provoked their promulgation. The fact that such laws are not enforced has nothing to do with economy, because the use of economy precisely supposes that normally the law is in effect.

But precedents should not simply be ignored; there is "case law" which leads to generalizations based on past decisions. Otherwise, normative canon law would constitute merely a set of theoretical statements which have no real impact on the life of the church. Resorting to economy implies that a rule in effect is purposely not applied.

However, in several occurrences doubts may arise, since limits between legitimate flexibility and transgression of a rule are not always self-evident. Many decisions "according to economy" have been strongly criticized by the upholders of rigorism. For example, it would be impossible to understand Byzantine church history between the end of the 8th century and the beginning of the 10th century without taking into account the continuous existence of two parties: one favoured leniency, the other consistently advocated strict adherence to ecclesiastical law.

The recurrent controversies of that time involved two sensitive issues: remarriages, which the rigorists held as impermissible (this concerns laypeople, since marriage after ordination is not permissible), and acceptance of irregularly ordained clerics into the Orthodox church. To understand how such controversies were possible, one must bear in mind the very nature of canon law in the Eastern church, and the different views of canon law held by the two halves of Christendom from the early middle ages onward.

In the church of the West, rules which do not belong to the province of "natural law"* or do not affect "divine positive law" fall within the competency of the supreme authority of the church. Therefore, the pope is entitled either to abolish laws or temporarily to suspend their enforcement. On these grounds, dispensations may be granted. In the church of the East, the situation is completely different: the concept of fullness of power does not exist. Besides, in the East the idea that church authorities might modify ancient laws and customs is not unconditionally admitted. Consequently, in serious matters the church in the West often questions the use of economy by churches in the Eastern tradition. The most thorny questions on the use of economy bear on issues of sacramental theology, because those questions affect ecclesiology.

There are two intertwined reasons for using economy: the good of the church and pastoral concerns. In patristic literature, therefore, one finds the phrase "excellent measure of economy". With regard to penance, leniency is related to the good dispositions of the repentant sinner. This linkage is in canon 102 of the council in Trullo.

That economy has no creative power is a fundamental principle. Economy is inoperative if there is an essential deficiency in the sacramental rite or a serious disagreement over doctrine. For example, the ancient church did not recognize the baptism of the Eunomians, members of an Arian sect, because they did not believe in the Holy Trinity and had purposely altered the baptismal rite (apostolic canon 49). The first ecumenical council (Nicea 325*) did not recognize the validity of the baptism conferred by the Paulianists, for although those heretics were using a correct rite, their Paulianist doctrine on the Holy Trinity was completely at variance with the beliefs of the catholic church. On the other hand, the church did not rebaptize other heretics because their doctrine on the Holy Trinity* – though not completely correct – was not basically at variance with the faith of the church (as expressed in the council of Constantinople 381). Those examples demonstrate that, especially with respect to sacramental theology, one must base the implementation of economy on objective criteria.

It seems that economy which is equated with expediency has wide possibility of application in those matters which are loosely related to doctrines of faith. For example, economy can apply to minor impediments of ordination. It may also apply to impediments of marriage. However, in several cases regarding dispensations for marriage, it would be more appropriate to speak of laxity, not of economy.

Decisions on economy fall exclusively within the competency of the hierarchy. According to the nature of the problem, either the ruling bishop or the synod of bishops makes the decisions (see episcopacy). Decisions can be made by a church court whose president is not necessarily the ruling bishop himself, but the bishop needs to confirm them. With respect to procedure, there are two kinds of economy: (1) antecedent economy, where an exemption is canonically requested and granted prior to an act; and (2) retroactive economy, which is granted in order to regularize an already existing uncanonical situation. In all cases, internal criteria and moral justification limit the use of economy.

ECUMENICAL ASSOCIATION OF AFRICAN THEOLOGIAN

FOUNDED IN 1977 with offices in Yaoundé, Cameroon, the EAAT held assemblies and consultations on the word of God and human languages (1980; published in the African Theology Series), black theology and liberation in South Africa (1983; published in Bulletin of African Theology), dialogue between African and European theologians on the mission of the church today (1984; published in Bulletin of African Theology), the liberation of Africa (1985; published in the African Theology Series), Africa and the Bible (1987), and inculturation and ecumenical dialogue (1988). After the brutal murder of Pierre Mwang of Cameroon, who had been the driving force behind EAAT, the association merged with EATWOT.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

ECUMENICAL ASSOCIATION OF THIRD WORLD THEOLOGIANs

EATWOT was founded in 1976 in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, at a meeting of 21 theologians from Africa, Asia and Latin America and one African American theologian. Behind its formation lay a recognition that the political independence from colonial rule of many countries in Africa and Asia since the late 1950s had created a new stage in world and ecclesial history, requiring an exploration of how churches minted in colonial history could become more relevant and indigenous, despite the strength of the colonial heritage. Making connections between the various regions of the world from the perspective of the experience of having been colonized was seen as a viable route to vibrant and relevant theology – and was itself an ecumenical agenda. At the same time, the openness signalled by the Second Vatican Council (1962-65) created an atmosphere conducive to setting up an ecumenical forum in which Protestants and Roman Catholics could engage together in theological pursuits for mutual enrichment, but as third-world persons.

The specification of “third world”* was essential. Once-colonized third-world people could not be at home in structures and paradigms of theology inherited from those who had colonized them. Moreover, the churches in many third-world nations lived as definite minorities in a predominantly Muslim, Hindu or traditional religious population – a sharp contrast to the context of Christendom in which the inherited theology was moulded. Third-world theology was to be done in a context of pluralism, which helped to underscore the ecumenical perspective.

At the time of EATWOT’s formation, the third world had a certain glamour in ecumenical circles, and many Northern ecumenical agencies were prepared to assist nationalist struggles against oppression and economic exploitation and foster the development of fullness of life and humanity of all. Theology was seen as an ally in this struggle, which meant EATWOT’s endeavours had liberation as an emphasis and vision, whose development can be traced in the themes of the inaugural meeting and succeeding assemblies: “Ecumenical Dialogue of Third World Theologians” (inaugural meeting, 1976); “The Irruption of the Third World: Challenge to Theology” (first assembly, New Delhi 1981); “Commonalities, Differences and Cross Fertilizations among Third-World Theologians” (second assembly, Oaxtepec, Mexico 1986); “A Cry for Help: The Spirituality of the Third World” (third assembly, Nairobi 1992); “Search for a New Just World Order: Challenge to Theology” (fourth assembly, Tagaytay City, Philippines 1996); “Giving an Account of the Hope That Is in You: Weaving the Threads of Our Contributing Struggles into a Tapestry of Hope in the 21st Century” (2001).

The theme of the inaugural meeting signalled how people who had been strangers one to another, despite their common colonial experience, were beginning to look at each other, share insights and engage one another. The first assembly theme reflected the fact that a minority phenomenon in a sea of powerful church and theology in Christendom society had burst on to the world scene, demanding recognition as partners in dialogue.

The term “cross-fertilization” in the second assembly theme pointed to a growing maturity, involving recognition of the differentiations within the third world, which must be acknowledged but not allowed to be debilitating to the theological and ecumenical imperative and vocation.

The focus of the third assembly on life marked an important step forward. By 1992 African and other third-world countries had lost their glamour. The web of corruption, bureaucratic irrationality, dictatorships and poverty had evoked anguished cries of pain in the third world. This contextual reality could not but recall for Christians that Jesus came that the world may have life in abundance. Besides capturing this mood, the third assembly caught another insight. Theology inherited from the North and West had been judged by rational and intellectual criteria; its mantras were “fact”, “theory”, “objectivity”. But African scholars, for example, were aware that the theology undergirding apartheid had no sensitivity to the human suffering and pain it engendered. That made third-world scholars very conscious that theological excellence cannot be determined only on intellectual, rational criteria but must also be judged by whether it fosters a spirituality that is both deep, helping people to reach to God the Creator in the depth of being, and broad, helping people in interpersonal life to reach out to all. Spirituality as it was envisaged was holistic.

The fourth assembly emphasized that political-economic issues are matters of faith, so that an ecumenical perspective is not only a matter of church unity but also involves the claiming of all life and all creation for God.

The theme for the fifth assembly linked the concerns of the third and fourth assemblies, and the event marked the 25th anniversary of the association.

Apart from the general assemblies, there have been regional EATWOT meetings. In 1977 an African meeting (published as African Theology en Route, 1979) focused on the indigenization of the gospel and the liberation of Africa from the cultural and economic domination of the USA. An Asian conference in Sri Lanka in 1979 (published as Asia's Struggle for Full Humanity, 1980) concentrated on doing theology as a Christian minority amid multi-faceted religiosity in a situation of poverty. The focus of a Latin American meeting in Brazil in 1980 (published as The Challenge of Basic Christian Communities, 1981) was the role of economic analysis and socio-political transformation in doing theology.

In recent years EATWOT has taken steps to correct its traditional male domination. The Tagaytay assembly decided to recognize and promote women's experience and hermeneutics in order to transform and re-structure EATWOT's concerns and discourse. It also decided to aim at increasing the participation of women to 50%, as well as recruiting younger theologians. These commitments have increasingly been reflected in the number of women in the leadership of EATWOT.

Two characteristics of this whole movement may be highlighted in conclusion. First, it is committed to the ecumenical imperative, which it understands not only in terms of the unity of the church but also in terms of the summing up of all things to God in Christ. Thus, wholesome theology is determined not only by academic criteria but also in terms of obedience to the will of God or spirituality. This is the significance of EATWOT's characteristic style of dialogue between socio-political and religious-cultural structures on the one side and the word of God on the other. In that ecumenical commitment dialogue between all regions and all churches is a necessary method. While some have read this as politics donning the cloak of theology, it is more accurate to see it in terms of the radicalization of faith and theology and the attempt to capture the movement character of the church, the ecumenical movement and theology. Second, theology does not start from absolutes but from social relationships. In this regard EATWOT is committed to the hermeneutical privilege of the poor.

In September 1997 EATWOT was accepted as an international ecumenical organization in association with the WCC.

ECUMENICAL CHURCH LOAN FUND

ECLOF was formed in Switzerland in 1946 as a non-profit foundation enabling Christians to demonstrate solidarity with the churches of Europe and their congregations in the harsh times immediately after the second world war, by creating a revolving fund to be disbursed in the form of loans and repaid with interest. The capital repayment and surplus income which stay in the fund is lent out again and again. With its international office in the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva, ECLOF works in close collaboration with other ecumenical bodies.

The first countries in the ECLOF network were France, Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Hungary. After the situation in Germany and the Netherlands had improved in the 1960s, many of the national ECLOF committees paid back their capital, and these funds in turn helped ECLOF to extend its activities into the southern hemisphere, where it began to finance small-scale community development projects for the poor and marginalized as well as church building. This wider and more development-oriented involvement led ECLOF to realize that its role was not solely financial. Through its work methods and lending strategy, ECLOF promotes new attitudes in churches and grassroots groups to build community and group cohesiveness, to decrease dependency on donations, to achieve socio-economic self-reliance and to create awareness in people or the grassroots of their right to participate in decision-making processes which affect them.

Following a period of re-organization beginning in 1990, the number of national ECLOF committees was reduced from 59 in 1989 to 38 by 1999. National committees include representatives of churches and non-governmental organizations with professional training in finance and development or in other fields necessary for analyzing projects. At least half the members of the Geneva board and of national committees are women. Many national committees have the authority to disburse funds for projects up to an agreed amount, and about 65% of ECLOF loans are approved in this way. More than 90% of the total activities are in the South.

Out of solidarity with the ECLOF global family, between 1995 and 2001 the following committees returned their capital: Australia, Austria, France, Ireland (partial), Japan (partial) and Singapore. In 2000 lending operations totalled US$9.8 million, and 5393 loans were granted.

ECLOF has spearheaded small-scale revolving loan-fund lending activities to the marginalized in a unique way: its loans are kept small and given only to needy churches and groups; re-payment is in local currency; local autonomy, not centralization, is encouraged; and the lending policy promotes the development of communities and equips people at the grassroots with the financial means, know-how and a socio-economic awareness to look out for their own needs.

ECUMENICAL CONFERENCES

IN THE HISTORY of the ecumenical movement, major international conferences of various subjects and by various organizations have been held to draw together leading representatives of the churches, to deepen a common understanding of missionary, social or doctrinal issues or to focus on a major contemporary concern of common witness and service. Many of these conferences had a pioneering role concerning key ecumenical themes in their historical context, opening up a new line of thought influencing further conversation for years. Some of them remained single events, others have served as focal points in a continuing series of similar meetings within one of the streams of the ecumenical movement marking its progress and development (as in the case of Faith and Order or world mission conferences).

They have varied considerably in working methodology and participation, but all of them were shaped by their interest in being as inclusive as possible while reflecting the principles of representationalism and official recognition given in the particular historical moment and field of the ecumenical movement. Together, the ecumenical conferences constitute something like the "ecumenical memory" of the ecumenical movement on a global scale.

Most of the ecumenical conferences are referred to by shorthand titles of identification indicating the cities in which the meetings were held and the years.

The following overview reviews 46 major conferences held between 1910 and 1998, listing the stated main themes and briefly summarizing the highlights. Restricting the list to conferences on a global scale imposes a severe limitation, leaving out important ecumenical conferences in various regions of the world which in themselves might have been much more relevant than some of the conferences mentioned here. A separate article deals with WCC assemblies.

Edinburgh 1910 (Scotland), world missionary conference. Eight commissions dealt with (1) carrying the gospel to all the non-Christian world, (2) the church in the mission field, (3) education in relation to the Christianization of national life, (4) the missionary message in relation to non-Christian religions, (5) the preparation of missionaries, (6) the home base of missions, (7) missions and governments and (8) cooperation and the promotion of unity.

This conference marked the climax of earlier gatherings through which Protestants had been drawing together in their purpose to bring the gospel to the world. It was in a succession which began with gatherings held in New York and London in 1854, continued in Liverpool in 1860, in London in 1878 and 1888, and especially in New York in 1900.

The conference did more than build on past achievements in evangelism* and unity:* it prepared for the turbulent years which lay ahead, blazed new trails in Christian fellowship and cooperation, and inspired and enlisted men and women who later were outstanding leaders in the ecumenical movement. The first report emphasized the worldwide mission* of the church. The second stressed the development of what later were called the younger churches and made clear that a leading purpose of the missionary enterprise was to bring into being self-governing, self-supporting and self-propagating churches in every region. The eighth report was ecumenical in both title and intention.

The conference was, however, overwhelmingly Anglo-American. Representatives from Europe were a small minority, and overall there were very few younger church leaders. In consequence, Edinburgh 1910 did not immediately do as much to spread the ecumenical spirit among the churches of the continent as it did in the British Isles and the US and among British and American missionaries. Representatives of the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) and the Orthodox churches were not present at Edinburgh, and indeed had not been invited.

Stockholm 1925 (Sweden), universal Christian conference on Life and Work.* Main subjects were (1) the purpose of God for humanity and the duty of the church, (2) the church and economic and industrial problems, (3) the church and moral and social problems, (4) the church and international relations, (5) the church and Christian education, and (6) methods of cooperation and federative efforts by the Christian communions.

Convened by Archbishop Nathan Söderblom of Sweden, this conference was the fruit of a vision earlier seen by church leaders who agonized over a war-torn humanity and the weakness of a divided Christianity. Although it affirmed in unmistakable terms the responsibility of the churches for the whole life of Christians, it did not produce any ecumenical social creed or solve any controversial problems. Making a rapid survey of the needs of contemporary society, appealing to the conscience of the Christian world and indicating possible lines of advance, Stockholm 1925, in its social idealism, generated a species of optimism that reflected the spirit of the times. Emphasizing the role of the Spirit, it presented a social analysis which could assess the nature of the crisis of post-war Europe. The main achievement of the conference was a fresh discovery of the Christian fellowship which transcends denominational oppositions and national antagonisms. The conference took care not to offend the susceptibilities of the churches by raising divisive confessional issues. Stockholm, which became known for the slogan "doctrine divides, service unites", later through its continuation committee led to the formation of the ecumenical council for Life and Work in 1930 and an international institute for social research.

The final message, the only official conference statement, expressed penitence for the failure of the churches to do their duty and affirmed the obligation of the churches to apply the gospel "in all realms of human life – industrial, social, political and international". But the message limited "the mission of the church"; it "is above all to state principles, and to assert the ideal, while leaving to individual consciences and to communities the duty of applying them with charity, wisdom and courage".

The presence of a strong delegation from the Orthodox churches, led by the patriarchs of Alexandria and Jerusalem, was of great significance. The RCC was represented only through a few unofficial observers. Only six younger churches – from India, China and Japan – sent representatives.

Lausanne 1927 (Switzerland), world conference on Faith and Order.* The sections considered (1) the call to unity, (2) the church's message to the world: the gospel, (3) the nature of the church, (4) the church's common confession of faith, (5) the church's ministry, (6) the sacraments, and (7) the unity of Christendom and the relation thereto of existing churches.

Over 400 delegates from 108 churches participated in this first F&O meeting. The majority were officially appointed representatives of their churches. Africa, America and Europe were well represented, but Asia sent only two nationals and some missionaries. Those to whom a conference of this kind was a novel experience felt a certain bewilderment, in spite of repeated clarifications of the purpose of the meeting by the president Charles H. Brent. It was meant as a forum at which "both agreements and disagreements were to be carefully noted... It is not a conference that aims at complete agreement, still less at a united church." The misconceptions of the aim were at least partly responsible for a marked feature of the latter part of the conference – a series of separate declarations on their position by the members of different communions.

The conference accepted the reports of sections 3-6 without negative votes. The report of section 2, accepted also by the Orthodox members, was destined to play an important role in the whole ecumenical movement. Part of it was incorporated into its own message by the Jerusalem meeting of the International Missionary Council* in 1928, and it was used by the Church of Christ in China in its constitution as its statement of faith. In section 7 some delegates strongly objected to the proposal of collaborating with Life and Work and the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches.* This approach would commit the conference to a conception of ecumenical relations in which interchurch collaboration would be emphasized at the expense of unity in faith and order. The section report was referred to the continuation committee; the final revision appeared as an appendix to the Lausanne report.

Jerusalem 1928, *International Missionary Council** (IMC). Sections dealt with (1) the Christian message in relation to non-Christian systems of thought and life, (2) religious education, (3) the relation between the younger and the older churches, (4) the Christian mission in the light of the race conflict, (5) the Christian mission in relation to industrial problems; (6) the Christian mission in relation to rural problems, and (7) international missionary cooperation.

This meeting marked noteworthy advances beyond Edinburgh 1910. The preparation was carefully developed through seven volumes of comprehensive studies. The growing worldwide threat of secularism to Christianity was given major attention (see secularization). Missions were thus seeking to touch life from more angles than in earlier years. The increased place of the younger churches at Jerusalem was partly due to their rapid growth in numbers and leadership. To follow up the concerns of the problems of industrialization, the meeting authorized what came to be known as the Department of Social and Economic Research and Counsel. Its first head, J. Merle Davis, conducted numerous studies in Africa and Latin America and referred to the problem of obtaining an adequate economic basis for the support of the younger churches. From Jerusalem also came the impetus for the creation of the International Committee on the Christian Approach to the Jews, established as a sponsored agency of the IMC in 1930.

Oxford 1937 (England), Life and Work.* Sections were (1) church and community, (2) church and state, (3) church, community and state in relation to the economic order, (4) church, community and state in relation to education, and (5) the universal church and the world of nations.

This conference on church, community and state was undertaken with great care and thoroughness. In the face of gathering social crisis, the Stockholm combination of Christian social idealism, spiritual enthusiasm and pacifism had come into question, to be replaced by new tougher trends in Christian thought represented by theologians like Reinhold Niebuhr, Emil Brunner and Karl Barth.

No ecumenically organized reflection on theology and social ethics since Oxford has surpassed it in quality and thoroughness. Among the theological and ethical insights that emerged were the following. First, the liberal notion of a continuity between history* and the kingdom of God* is to be rejected. History is not redemptive. Evil will persist until the end. Second, a Christian social order is impossible, as is the solution of social problems by a direct application of Christian "moral principles". The Bible offers no direct solutions for contemporary political and social problems. The task of the ecumenical movement and of the churches is to outline tentative or approximate ethical positions (Oxford called them "middle axioms"*) for the encounter of faith* with social issues. Third, one must acknowledge the place of power* in the struggle for justice.* The state* is necessary, but its dependence on power relativizes its authority. The need for human freedom and the right of the church to resist the state must be emphasized "if obedience would be clearly contrary to the command of God". Fourth, Christians must both critique liberal democracy, without repudiating the democratic principle, and reject atheistic and totalitarian communism, while not joining the Western self-righteous anti-communist crusade. No economic system (capitalism, socialism, communism, etc.) will eliminate injustice; the only recourse for Christians is a pragmatic, discriminating action which maximizes social justice and human welfare within different systems. Fifth, since the church is not of the world but for the world, its action for social justice (as distinct from the response of individual Christians) differs from that of political and social power blocs that defend particular interests (see also church and state).

Edinburgh 1937 (Scotland), Faith and Order.* Four sections considered (1) the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, (2) the church of Christ and the word of God, (3) the church of Christ: ministry and sacraments, and (4) the church's unity in life and worship.

This second world conference of Faith and Order marked a definite advance upon that held ten years earlier at Lausanne, which was due chiefly to two factors. Among the 443 delegates appointed by the churches, 95 had already been at Lausanne. Many delegates of different countries and churches were now meeting as old friends who through their contact had grown in the understanding of confessions other than their own. The other change was due to the theological preparation, a new development in the F&O movement. The delegates of the Orthodox churches reiterated the view they had already expressed at Lausanne: "The general reunion of Christian churches may possibly be hastened if union is first achieved between those churches which present features of great similarity with one another."

Friction arose over the proposal offered by a Life and Work meeting that a world council of churches be formed. After debate, however, the meeting concurred with the proposal, and ultimately a committee of 35 was appointed; it met in London in July 1937. The Edinburgh conference appointed a committee of 60 persons to examine and report to it on the proposals of the committee of 35. After a long and at times heated debate, the recommendation to work towards a world council of churches was carried.

Utrecht 1938 (Netherlands), special advisory conference of the World Council of Churches* in formation. After adoption of resolutions at Oxford and Edinburgh, this advisory conference was convened to define the basis for membership (see WCC, basis of) and the constitution of what would become the World Council of Churches. Participation in Utrecht mirrored as nearly as possible the proposed WCC central council (later, committee). Because of the advent of the second world war in September 1939, the WCC remained "in process of formation" until its first assembly in Amsterdam 1948.

Tamparam 1938 (India), International Missionary Council.* Sections comprised (1) the authority of the faith, (2) the growing church, (3) evangelism, (4) the life of the church, (5) the economic basis of the church, and (6) the church and the state.

Larger in numbers and more representative than Jerusalem (1928), the gathering dramatized the fact that the Christian church had become a truly worldwide company. The representatives of the younger churches constituted slightly more than half of the official delegates. A major emphasis at Tamparam was on the church.* The younger churches, while mostly minorities in their countries, were now strong enough to assume more of the burden not only of their own support and direction but also of the evangelization of their nations. The first section was reinforced by a preliminary book The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, written at the request of the IMC by Hendrik Kraemer. Significant, too, was a large volume, The Economic and Social Environment of the Younger Churches, edited by J. Merle Davis. Tambaram provided a sense of Christian unity on the eve of the war soon to break out. It recommended a full participation of the younger churches in the forthcoming ecumenical council – a demand fulfilled only in the integration between the WCC and the IMC in 1961.

Amsterdam 1939 (Netherlands), world conference of Christian youth. The main theme was “Christus Victor”, with seven interest groups: (1) Christian youth in a world of nations, (2) Christian youth in the nation and the state, (3) Christian youth in the economic order, (4) Christian youth and race, (5) Christian youth and education, (6) Christian marriage and family life, and (7) the church: its nature and mission.

This first youth* conference was sponsored by the World Christian Student Federation,* the World Alliance of YMCAs,* the World YWCA,* the Ecumenical Youth Commission of Life and Work, and the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches. The age of the 1500 delegates ranged from 18 to 35, with one-third over 25. The conference faced the growing menace of war. W.A. Visser 't Hooft was conference chairman, R.H. Edwin Espy secretary, H.L. Henriod and Francis House chairman and secretary for worship services, Suzanne de Diétrich chairwoman for Bible study, and Tracy Strong chairman for discussion groups.

The quality of work and reporting varied from section to section. Those who had concentrated on theological preparation and those who had devoted their energies to the study of practical steps found little common ground for sharing. The two great centres of discovery lay in the Bible studies and worship services, although great difficulty was experienced when the problem of different services of holy communion had to be faced. The conference was an adventure in close cooperation among the various Christian youth movements and reflected the geographical extension of the world Christian community and its cultural varieties more clearly than had any previous ecumenical meeting. Many delegates at this conference were to become leaders of the ecumenical movement in the next decades.

Oslo 1947 (Norway), conference of Christian youth. With the main theme “Jesus Christ Is Lord”, discussion groups considered (1) freedom and order, (2) Christian responsibility in a secular environment, (3) world order, (4) man and his inventions, (5) the family in community, (6) the Christian congregation's life in the local community, (7) education in the modern world, (8) the Christian faces the situation of the Jew, and (9) the church faces the world.

This second world gathering of young Christians had not quite the same quality of adventure and pioneering which had characterized Amsterdam 1939. It was marked by a new sobriety over the realities of the world situation and the grateful recognition of the lordship of Christ over the whole church and over the world. This conference did not adopt an official message; the delegates themselves were the message as well as the messengers. The very day the meeting began, fighting had broken out between the Netherlands and Indonesia. A joint statement from Dutch and Indonesian youth affirmed “the right of the Indonesian people to liberty and independence”. Also the French delegates issued a declaration on the colonial question. Representatives from Great Britain and India rejoiced that India was on the threshold of independence.

Whitby 1947 (Canada), International Missionary Council.* The general theme was “Christian Witness in a Revolutionary World”. Subjects treated were (1) partners in obedience, (2) the “supranationality” of missions, and (3) the functions of the IMC.

Even during the terrible period of the second world war, the IMC had been able to maintain to a remarkable degree the fabric of cooperation, especially through the vast programme of support for “orphaned missions”. The title of the report of the meeting, Renewal and Advance, well indicated the dominant mood of the conference.

It had not yet become clear, however, how drastic the changes were which the world had undergone as a result of the convulsions of the war years. The complete extinction of the colonial pattern, most dramatically in China but also throughout the rest of Asia and Africa, lay still in the future. The extent of the spiritual damage which Christianity had suffered could not yet be assessed. Nevertheless, “expectant evangelism” and “partnership in obedience” were the two slogans of the meeting. Representatives of older and younger churches met separately to discuss the devolution of responsibility from mission agencies to churches with their own evangelistic tasks.

Willingen 1952 (Federal Republic of Germany), International Missionary Council.* Major themes were (1) the missionary obligation of the church, (2) the indigenous church – the universal church in its local setting, (3) the role of the missionary society, and (4) re-shaping the pattern of missionary activity.

The meeting was significant as a first attempt to reformulate Christian mission subsequent to the end of colonialism and the consequences of revolution in China, and to develop a truly missionary understanding of the whole church in the context of a rapidly changing world. Two issues dominated the section which was preparing a statement on the missionary obligation of the church. On the one hand, a sharp attack was launched, primarily by J.C. Hoekendijk of the Netherlands, against the church-centred view of missions which had dominated the thinking of the IMC since Tambaram (1938). On the other hand, and closely related to the first issue, there was a strong effort made, especially by the North American study group which had prepared for the conference, to relate the missionary task to the signs of Christ's present sovereignty in the secular world. While the Willingen meeting could not achieve a reconciliation of all theological tensions, its statement "The Calling of the Church to Mission and Unity" was the first ecumenical document in which the definition of mission as witness and service rooted in a Trinitarian concept of missio Dei* was reflected. The missio Dei concept paved the way theologically for the integration of church and mission and the later study on the missionary structure of the congregation (1961-67).

Lund 1952 (Sweden), Faith and Order.* Section titles were (1) Christ and his church, (2) continuity and unity, (3) ways of worship, and (4) intercommunion.

Already in 1938 and 1939 F&O had appointed three international theological commissions to study the church,* worship* and intercommunion.* Three published volumes provided materials for discussion at this third world conference. The theme of "outward" unity, introduced at Edinburgh in 1937, was further developed. "We agreed", the conference report stated, "that there are not two churches, one visible and the other invisible, but one church which must find visible expression on earth." While the participants differed on whether certain doctrinal, sacramental and ministerial forms are of the essence of the church, they looked forward to a time when all Christians could have unrestricted communion* in sacrament and fellowship. The message to the churches asked "whether they should not act together in all matters except those in which deep differences of conviction compel them to act separately", an approach later called the Lund principle.* For the first time, F&O discussed the social, cultural, political and racial elements and so-called non-theological factors in church divisions and church unity.

Kottayam 1952 (India), Christian youth. The main theme was "Jesus Christ the Answer – God Was in Christ Reconciling the World unto Himself". Discussion groups studied (1) interpreting the gospel of Jesus Christ, (2) Jesus Christ and the search for personal freedom, (3) the church's witness to Jesus Christ, (4) the claims of Christ in personal and family relationships, and (5) Christ in a world of tensions.

Two-thirds of the 350 delegates from 55 countries and 28 confessions came from Asia, the Middle East and the Pacific. For the first time, youth from other parts of the world worked at ecumenical questions in an Asian and not a Western setting. Participants struggled with the issues raised by the movements for political independence, the renaissance of other faiths, the challenge of communism and the need to re-think their understanding of the church.* The meeting emphasized that "the church must become a place where human worth and common responsibility are actualized. Creative love must express itself not simply in acts of mercy, genuine and important though they may be, but also in attempts to achieve a more just economic and social order." The theme would recur often and would profoundly influence the work of the WCC.

Accra 1958 (Ghana), International Missionary Council. Group discussions pondered (1) Christian witness in society and nation, (2) the Christian church facing its calling to mission, (3) the Christian church and non-Christian religions, (4) the place and function of the missionary, and (5) what "partnership in obedience" means.

An important item on the conference agenda was the draft plan of integration of the IMC and the WCC which the joint committee of the two bodies had prepared. There were serious reservations about this plan, and a great deal of further discussion was needed. The conference accepted a statement on "The Christian Mission at This Hour" which took as its starting point "the Christian world mission is Christ's, not ours". The statement affirmed that the distinction between older and younger churches was no longer valid or helpful because it obscured the fact that every church, because it is a church, has the same missionary calling. Preparations were made to set up the Theological Education Fund, which over the years was to bring about a considerable change in the quality and strength of theological education at various seminaries and schools in the third world.

Montreal 1963 (Canada), Faith and Order.* Three sections studied (1) Christ and the church, (2) worship, and (3) Tradition and traditions.

This fourth world conference received the final report of the theological commissions. Section 1 was in two parts, based on a North American and a European contribution. While this report did not contain much that was an advance over previous work, it opened up, through the very disagreements which surfaced in the discussions, new avenues of F&O study. The traditional differences ranged from the insistence on apostolic succession to the view that there is no sufficient New Testament authority to warrant ordination. Increasing consensus on the theological basis of ministry did not lead to greater agreement on matters of order. Section 2 stated that, despite many disagreements regarding holy communion, the churches could agree that the eucharist* is "a sacrament of the presence of the crucified and glorified Christ, until he come, and a means whereby the sacrifice of the cross, which we proclaim, is operative within the church". Lund had not specifically studied the area of Tradition and traditions.* The approaches of the North American and European contributions to section 3 at Montreal were different: the first took a more historical perspective, while the second centred on the dogmatic issue of scripture and Tradition. There was nevertheless a large measure of agreement in the final report: "By the Tradition is meant the gospel itself, transmitted from generation to generation in and by the church, Christ himself present in the life of the church. By tradition is meant the traditory process. The term traditions is used in two senses, to indicate both the diversity of forms of expression and also what we call confessional traditions, for instance the Lutheran tradition or the Reformed tradition."

Mexico City 1963, WCC Division on World Mission and Evangelism.* The sections dealt with (1) the witness of Christians to men [sic] of other faiths, (2) the witness of Christians to men in the secular world, (3) the witness of the congregation in its neighbourhood, and (4) the witness of the Christian church across national and confessional boundaries.

This meeting was the first one of the division since the integration of the IMC into the WCC in 1961. With its main theme "Witness in Six Continents", it broke new ground by paying expert attention to the specific problems of mission in Europe and North America. Section 1 did not yield a clear consensus on dialogue with people of living faiths (see dialogue, interfaith). Section 4 advocated advance in the direction of more international and ecumenical action in the field of mission. Throughout the meeting there was a vigorous discussion about mission in the context of six continents. The Department on Studies in Evangelism, following the New Delhi assembly (1961), had launched a worldwide study on "The Missionary Structure of the Congregation";* it raised radical questions concerning the nature of the church* and evangelism.* The Department on Missionary Studies had also engaged in several research projects on the missionary situation of the churches in specific areas. Both departments were integrated into the Department on Studies in Mission and Evangelism in 1967.

Swanwick 1966 (England), *interchurch aid* (ICA), refugee and world service*. The sections were (1) development aid, (2) up-rooted people, (3) the role of ICA in the use and training of the churches' manpower, and (4) criteria for interchurch aid projects (the so-called Herrenalb categories of 1956).

With 239 participants from 78 countries, Swanwick was the first large international ecumenical gathering in which representatives of the RCC took part. This world consultation urged the churches to align themselves more closely to governmental and intergovernmental programmes of development aid. The fact that the WCC had more than 200 churches in its fellowship meant a wholly new relationship between the churches themselves. Within the Council, those churches had equal status; requests for aid and offers of aid had taken on a different connotation. There was no more room for paternalistic charity, only for partnership and sharing. Ecumenical diakonia* had thus gained significance.

Geneva 1966 (Switzerland), world conference on Church and Society.* Sections considered (1) economic development in a world perspective, (2) the nature and function of the state in a revolutionary age, (3) structures of international cooperation – living together in peace in a pluralistic world society, and (4) man and community in changing societies.

This conference marked the first truly worldwide Christian examination of social issues and responsibility. Under the circumstances, it was bound to have a revolutionary impact on ecumenical social thought, opening up controversy, especially in the Western churches. For the first time, an equal number of participants came from the countries of Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Middle East as from Western Europe and North America. It was the first gathering to which churches of the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries made substantial contributions. Also present were a large number of Roman Catholic theologians and laypersons, most of whom had been active in the preparation of the Second Vatican Council's* Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (1965). Controversies focused on three ecclesiological points: (1) the appropriate way in Christian social ethics to relate biblical and theological traditions to the fast-changing conditions in modern societies, (2) the ambiguities of the word "revolution"* and the need for a clearer statement of the theological ideas which underlie a positive and critical response to the various demands for revolutionary change, and (3) the different ecclesiologies which surface when the church (or some group in the church) becomes involved in political and social action. The demand that the ecumenical movement support the revolutionary struggle for justice* in the third world intensified and dramatized this old ecclesiological problem.

Bristol 1967 (England), Faith and Order.* The five sections dealt with (1) creation, new creation and the unity of the church, (2) the eucharist, a sacrament of unity, (3) ministry, church union negotiations, (4) Tradition and traditions, and (5) general faith and order problems.

When the F&O commission met at Aarhus (Denmark) in 1964, it had planned a programme for a new period in the light of the numerous recommendations and suggestions from Montreal 1963. Bristol 1967 faced the tasks which had grown out of the constant expansion of the ecumenical movement, of relationships with world confessional families, of the progress and problems of national church unions, and of the cooperation of F&O with other WCC departments. In all these efforts the decisive questions were the understanding of church unity,* of full communion,* and of the theological methods of reflection which can best serve the unity of the church. Bristol completed the first stage in the "God in Nature and History" study and authorized the second stage of the "Man in Nature and History" study.

Notting Hill 1969 (England), international conference on racism. The WCC assembly in Uppsala 1968 had recommended this conference of international experts on racism which took place in a suburb of London torn by racial problems. The conference highlighted perspectives on the root causes, nature and social consequences of white racism* and developed recommendations for strengthening resistance against it, even allowing active support for resistance movements against racist oppressive regimes as a last resort when all other means have no results. The conference report changed the WCC's approach from mere declarations about racism as sin towards ecumenical action in the common struggle against the political forces behind racism. The Notting Hill report informed the major plan and decision of the WCC central committee meeting in Canterbury on 21 August 1969 to form an Ecumenical Programme to Combat Racism* (PCR).

Montreux 1970 (Switzerland), *ecumenical assistance to development* projects. The working groups discussed (1) the debate about development, (2) policy and procedures for church support to development projects, (3) structure and organization of ecumenical assistance to development projects, (4) technical assistance for church-sponsored development, and (5) the mobilization of funds.

This world consultation emphasized that all Christian development programmes should promote social justice* and the self-reliance of the community. They should help to provide new creative patterns of life for groups and communities whose lives have been disrupted by the effects of economic growth, and help to build bridges between separated groups in the interest of a more integrated society. The consultation recommended cooperation with intergovernmental agencies, especially the UN development system. Such cooperation is not a matter of simply supplying church funds but of involving the participation of local churches in planning and cooperation. The conference appealed to the churches to contribute to the promotion of education for development by changing people's attitudes and by mobilizing public opinion towards fundamental changes in the social, economic and political structures on national and international levels.

Louvain 1971 (Belgium), Faith and Order.* The various committees were (1a) authority of the Bible, (1b) "giving account of the hope that is in us", (2a) catholicity and apostolicity, (2b) worship today, (2c) participation in and methods of Faith and Order, (3a) "baptism, confirmation and eucharist", (3b) "beyond intercommunion", (3c) the ordained ministry, (4a) study on the council of Chalcedon, (4b) common witness and proselytism, (4c) conciliarity and the future of the ecumenical movement, and (5) church union negotiations and bilateral conversations.

Besides studying these themes and concerns, this meeting also concentrated on the comprehensive theme "The Unity of the Church – the Unity of Mankind". Problems related to this theme had already become acute, and the commission decided to provide essential clarifications. It was quite clear that confessional differences alone no longer called into question the unity of the church. Churches were urged to bring to fruition the fellowship given to them in Christ, amid the debates of the present. Only thus can they become signs of the presence of Christ today.

Lima 1971 (Peru), World Council of Christian Education.* This was the last gathering of an ecumenical federation of national and international bodies involved in Christian education (founded in 1924). After almost ten years of conversations, the union of the WCC and the WCCE was finally consummated. The Lima meeting was in fact dispersed; 17 encuentros were held in capital cities of Latin America. The Lima meeting faced up to the important issue that to educate is not so much to teach as it is to become committed to a reality in and with people, that it is to liberate humankind, under God and God's power, from the bonds that prevent the development of God's image.

Bangkok 1973 (Thailand), world conference on mission and evangelism.* Under the main theme "Salvation Today", sections considered (1) culture and identity, (2) salvation and social justice in a divided humanity, and (3) churches renewed in mission.

This conference faced the theological theme of liberation,* affirmed the right of every Christian and every church to cultural identity, and urged them to formulate their own response to God's calling in a theology, a liturgy, a praxis, and a form of community that were rooted in their own culture.* The Africans, especially, attacked the West's "imperialism over theology". The meeting drew attention to the indissoluble connection between the individual and social aspects of salvation:* to respond to Christ and his missionary call means to be involved in the struggle for social justice, peace and a fully human life. The conference debated at length the question of the structure of missionary relationships which would reflect genuine equality between partners. Proposals ranged from a temporary moratorium to new forms of cooperation between churches. Bangkok 1973 was undoubtedly one of the most contextual and interdisciplinary ecumenical missionary conferences.

Berlin 1974 (Germany), WCC conference on sexism and discrimination against women. Influenced by the growing vitality of the women's movement in the 1970s, the WCC organized the first international consultation on sexism which brought together 150 women from 54 countries. Dealing with issues like discrimination against women, equality, education for women, role models for women and men, partnership, social injustice, the role of women in the church and women's ordination, the consultation for the first time highlighted women's issues as global issues for all churches. Recommendations of the consultation were taken up in the Nairobi assembly 1975 and later led to the study on the community of women and men in the church* (since 1976). See sexual ethics.

Bucharest 1974 (Romania), Church and Society.* The main theme, "Science and Technology for Human Development", was developed in several sections: (1) the significance for the future of pressures from technology and population on the environment, and of natural limits to growth, (2) self-reliance and the technical options of developing countries, (3) quality of life and the human implications of further technological change, (4) human settlement as a challenge to the churches, (5) world social justice in a technological age, and (6) the theological understanding of humanity and nature in a technological era.

Organized principally by the WCC Sub-unit on Church and Society, this world conference was the last in a series of ecumenical study conferences which the WCC convened for its five-year study of "The Future in a World of Science-based Technology". The study was launched to evaluate from ecumenical perspective the social and human implications of the modern scientific and technological revolution (see science and technology). Bucharest was the first major WCC meeting in a communist and predominantly Orthodox setting. The conference sought to state clearly some practical ways in which Christians must re-think their societies in this new historical situation. It also laid the basis for a future ecumenical inquiry on the "just, participatory and sustainable society". This inquiry helped clarify issues for later debate, but it was unable to resolve fundamental differences, for example, between those who emphasize the centrality of justice and those who stress the critical importance of sustainability in any responsible society.

Accra 1974 (Ghana), Faith and Order.* The two main themes were giving account of the hope that is within us, and the unity of the church.

The F&O commission had launched a study on the theme of hope* on the theory that the churches can overcome their divisions only by starting from the centre of their faith. As long as they continue to deal with inherited differences, they will not be ready to enter the one committed fellowship to which they are called. Only as churches recognize each other as living in and proclaiming the same faith* will they have the freedom to move forward together to become the one Body of Christ within the world's tensions and conflicts.

But, the conference asked, what does church unity* require in each region of the world? Theological and ecclesiological debates tend to speak about unity in too general terms, but ultimately, since unity is the committed fellowship of particular people in a particular place, progress can be made only if the specificity of each situation is taken seriously. The conference, finally, discussed the draft statement on baptism, eucharist and ministry (see Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry).

Chiang Mai 1977 (Thailand), dialogue with people of living faiths and ideologies. The conference theme was "Dialogue in Community".

This world consultation, sponsored by the WCC Sub-unit on Dialogue, continued the difficult discussion of section 3 at the Nairobi assembly (1975): "Seeking Community: The Common Search of People of Various Faiths, Cultures and Ideologies", which expressed fears about the betrayal of mission* and the danger of syncretism.* The consultation sought to clarify the Christian basis for seeking community by focusing theological reflections on specific issues and particular contexts, to indicate the nature of the Christian community in a pluralistic world and to suggest guidelines which may help Christian communities in pluralist situations to become authentic communities of service and witness without diluting their faith or compromising their commitment to Christ. In 1979, the WCC central committee meeting in Kingston, Jamaica, approved the Guidelines on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies and recommended it to member churches "for their consideration and discussion, testing and evaluation, and for their elaboration in each specific situation".

Bangalore 1978 (India), Faith and Order.* Main themes were (1) a common account of hope and (2) growing together into unity. Subjects of discussion groups were (1) the meaning of "conciliar fellowship", (2) towards communion in one faith, (3) growing into one eucharistic fellowship, (4) the discipline of communion in a divided world, and (5) new ecumenical experiences and existing ecumenical structures.

The most significant achievement of the Bangalore meeting was the F&O document "A Common Account of Hope". The debates were not easy. One difference in particular had seemed insurmountable. Some wanted to emphasize the hope* which is above all hopes – Jesus Christ, the risen Lord, who has already overcome the world. But others wanted to state, clearly and strongly, that Christian hope finds expression in concrete human hopes. The final document was seen as doing justice to both positions.

The second theme was intimately connected to the first: the more successful the churches are in giving a common account of their hope in spite of their divisions, the more they will grow in unity.* Bangalore 1978 also faced the fact that unity is not merely a distant goal; however necessary it may be to stress that the churches still have a long way to go, the fact remains that a good stretch of the road is already behind them.

MIT 1979 (Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Massachusetts, USA), Church and Society. Sections were (1) the nature of science and the nature of faith, (2) humanity, nature and God, (3) science and education, (4) ethical issues in the biological manipulation of life, (5) technology, resources, environment and population, (6) energy for the future, (7) restructuring the industrial and urban environment, (8) economics of a just, participatory and sustainable society, (9) science/technology, political power and a more just world order, and (10) towards a new Christian social ethic and new social policies for the churches.

This world conference on "Faith, Science and the Future" faced a situation that was entirely different from the one faced by the 1966 Church and Society meeting. The issues of science and technology* had become far more complex and controversial, and both church and society were questioning the future of technologically organized and controlled social systems. Science and technology raised those important questions about the relation of faith to science which many churches, in both technologically developed and technologically developing countries, were only beginning to consider. All present political and economic systems have made assumptions about technological and economic planning which now required re-thinking. The scientific-technological world-view had come under challenge and, with it, many previously accepted social goals. Although the 1979 conference highlighted the problems, it could not resolve them. It could, however, help the churches to understand both the promise and the threat posed by modern science and technology and the challenge these present to traditional Christian thinking.

Melbourne 1980 (Australia), world mission and evangelism.* The theme "Your Kingdom Come" was considered in four sections: (1) good news to the poor, (2) the kingdom of God and human struggles, (3) the church witnesses to the kingdom, and (4) Christ – crucified and risen – challenges human power.

The Orthodox churches were involved both in the preparation and holding of this mission conference, and many Roman Catholic theologians, as in the Bangkok conference (1973), participated in the meeting. The main findings were, first, that the kingdom* which Christians pray for is the reign of the One who died outside the gates. Jesus Christ affirmed his centrality by giving it up. He moved towards the periphery in order to seek the marginalized and downtrodden. Second, the poor* challenge missionary criteria. Jesus established a visible link between the coming of the kingdom and the proclamation of the good news to the poor (see poverty). Third, evangelism* takes place in the midst of human struggles. There is no evangelism without involvement, and no Christian involvement without evangelism. Fourth, at the centre of church life is the eucharist,* pilgrim bread and missionary food, for a people on the march. The eucharist is a powerful example of self-emptying. Finally, unless the pilgrimage route leads the churches to visible unity* in the one God, the one Christ and the one Holy Spirit, the mission entrusted to them will remain incomplete.

Amsterdam 1981 (Netherlands), hearing on nuclear disarmament. Facing the increasing danger of nuclear war, the WCC Sub-unit on Church and Society and the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs sponsored a hearing on the challenges of nuclear disarmament attended by 17 church leaders and 40 expert witnesses. The report, Before It's Too Late, contains extended treatments of theological and ethical concerns in relation to nuclear weapons, development and introduction of new nuclear weapon systems, strategies of limited nuclear war and deterrence, negotiations for arms control, and multilateral and unilateral disarmament. One of the key affirmations was that nuclear war can never be just or justifiable so that any "limited" nuclear war is unlikely to remain limited, and therefore it should be discouraged from the outset. The report of the conference was very positively received by the central committee meeting in 1982 and also made a major impact on the Vancouver assembly.

Sheffield 1981 (Great Britain), WCC consultation on the community of women and men in the church.* Sections were on (1) identity and relationships in new community, (2) marriage, family, and life-style in new community, (3) scripture in new community, (4) ministry and worship in new community, (4) authority and church structures in new community, (5) Tradition and traditions, (6) justice and freedom in new community.

The consultation was the culminating point of the four-year study process on the community of women and men in the church between 1978 and 1982 which focused on three major aspects, namely theology, participation and relationships in the complex area related to the community of women and men in the church. The Sheffield report served as a foundational resource on much of what later was taken up in the Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women (1988-98). The community study, jointly pursued by Faith and Order and the WCC Sub-unit on Women in Church and Society and involving hundreds of local study/sharing groups, was one of the most participatory and broad based study processes the WCC ever undertook. Many of its discussions and recommendations raised questions concerning liberation and equality of women, patterns of relationships in partnerships, marriage and family life, images used to describe God and the ordination of women.

Lima 1982 (Peru), Faith and Order.* Sections were (1) the work of F&O, (2) F&O and the WCC, (3) the Latin American context, (4) baptism, eucharist and ministry, (5) towards the common expression of the apostolic faith today, (6) steps towards visible unity, (7) the unity of the church and the renewal of human community, and (8) the community of women and men in the church.

For the first time, the F&O commission met on Latin American soil, where many strands of liberation theology* and new forms of church community had their origin. Building on the theological convergences formulated in the F&O studies on "Giving Account of the Hope" and the "Common Statement of Our Faith", the Lima conference integrated these understandings in a long-term model for a common affirmation of the faith of the apostolic church, under the title "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today". The final text of Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* was unanimously approved as having reached "such a stage of maturity that it is now ready for transmission to the churches"; it quickly acquired the shorthand title BEM. In deciding to pursue anew the earlier study on "Unity of the Church – Unity of Humankind", the conference agreed to place the classic F&O concern for church unity "on a broadened horizon and to develop its implications for Christian service and mission in the contemporary world".

Stavanger 1985 (Norway), Faith and Order.* The three programme areas were (1) baptism, eucharist and ministry, (2) apostolic faith, and (3) unity and renewal.

The conference reviewed the reception* process of BEM, i.e., how the stated convergences were being received by the churches. The two major projects, "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today" and "The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community", were re-examined. Other continuing concerns were F&O and ecumenical spirituality (Week of Prayer for Christian Unity* and Ecumenical Prayer Cycle*), proposals for a fifth consultation of united/uniting churches and church union negotiations, bilateral and multilateral dialogues, and the call to a fifth world conference on Faith and Order. The commission recalled that it was 75 years since Charles Brent had conceived the idea of a world conference on issues of faith and order (see Faith and Order, history).

Larnaca 1986 (Cyprus), interchurch aid, refugee and world service.* The theme was "Called to Be Neighbours".

Since the first world consultation on interchurch aid (Swanwick 1966), far-reaching changes had taken place in the world situation. By 1986 the optimism of the mid-1960s about the possibilities of development* had given way to a mood of frustration and an awareness that the people and the churches were losing in the global struggle for justice.* It was against this backdrop that this second world consultation on ICA, refugee and world service took place. There was relatively little discussion of development or projects; rather, discussions centred on the struggle for life and the need to be in solidarity with people. The emphasis was on a comprehensive, preventive and liberating diakonia* in the discipleship of Jesus Christ (see refugees).

El Escorial 1987 (Spain), sharing of ecumenical resources. The theme was "Koinonia: Sharing Life in a World Community".

This world meeting climaxed a ten-year ecumenical discussion of "resource sharing" that had been initiated by the Nairobi assembly (1975). A central emphasis was that the resources to be shared ecumenically are not only the material wealth and power which a few control but also the churches' rich theological understandings, spiritualities, cultures, expressions through music, prayer, song and dance and, perhaps most important of all, the testimonies of those who are suffering. It raised serious questions about ecumenical relief and development programmes, including those of the WCC.

San Antonio 1989 (Texas, USA), world mission and evangelism.* Under the theme "Your Will Be Done: Mission in Christ's Way", sections studied the topics (1) turning to the living God, (2) participating in suffering and struggle, (3) the earth is the Lord's, and (4) towards renewed communities in mission.

With its great diversity of participants (including, for the first time, consultants of other faiths) and a wide-ranging agenda, San Antonio was planned not to feature authoritative ecumenists instructing the delegates but to create a context in which persons active in mission could address each other. Its two significant trends, said the conference message, were "the spirit of universality (catholicity) of the gathering, and its concern for the fullness of the gospel", holding "in creative tension spiritual and material needs, prayer and action, evangelism and social responsibility, dialogue and witness, power and vulnerability, local and universal". Especially extensive were discussions of the tension between dialogue* and witness* which, a section report said, "we appreciate... and do not attempt to resolve".

Budapest 1989 (Hungary), Faith and Order.* A major item on the agenda was the responses to BEM, the 1982 F&O text on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.* In a statement to the churches on BEM, the commission said the text has "created a new ecumenical situation. It expressed broad convergence on basic Christian affirmations, and revealed sometimes surprising agreements." But, it added, "we still have far to go" in terms of "further growth into unity".

It noted serious disagreements which persist on “the relation of word and sacrament, the understanding of sacrament and sacramentality, the threefold ministry, succession in ministry, the ministry of men and women, the relation of men and women, the relation of scripture and Tradition, and ecclesiology”.

The meeting also reviewed plans for the fifth world conference on F&O, projected for 1993, and received a report which suggested, as part of future F&O work, a consultation on “unresolved ecumenical issues concerning ministry, especially the ordination of women”, and more attention to “the gifts of the Holy Spirit within the church”. Another report urged a major study on ecumenical perspectives on ecclesiology, concentrating on “basic perspectives of unity and diversity” (see church).

Seoul 1990 (Korea), world convocation on justice, peace and the integrity of creation.* Coming after regional consultations, the convocation completed the first stage of a process initiated by a decision at the WCC assembly in Vancouver (1983) “to engage member churches in a conciliar process of mutual commitment (covenant) to justice, peace and the integrity of all creation” (JPIC). A report of the convocation’s responses to a preparatory document examining contemporary threats to JPIC and offering a “faith perspective” by which Christians may “reflect upon the world” was not fully covered because of unexpectedly long discussion of its first section. Ten affirmations – on power as accountable to God, God’s option for the poor, the equal value of all races and peoples, the creation of male and female in God’s image, truth as the foundation of community, the peace of Jesus Christ, creation as beloved of God, the earth as the Lord’s, the dignity and commitment of the younger generation, and human rights as given by God – provided a “basic direction” for Christian commitment to JPIC. An “Act of Covenanting” (see covenant) provided specific examples of “faithful action” in relation to a just economic order, demilitarization of international relations, preservation of the atmosphere from the threat of global warming, and the eradication of racism* and discrimination.

Santiago de Compostela 1993 (Spain), Faith and Order.* The four major sections of this F&O world conference were (1) the understanding of koinonia and its implications, (2) confessing the one faith to the glory of God, (3) sharing a common life in Christ, and (4) called to common witness for a renewed world.

With its 400 delegates amongst whom could be found many young theologians, more than 30% women and an official delegation of the Roman Catholic Church, the conference reflected the widening and changing participation in the work of Faith and Order. One key task was to receive and review the three major F&O studies since Montreal 1963, namely “Confessing the Apostolic Faith Today”, “Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry” and “Church and World”. Following the WCC assembly in Canberra the earlier concept of “unity”, which too easily could be misunderstood as a term enforcing uniformity and a static monocultural approach, was replaced by the biblical concept of “koinonia” in which the church was understood as God’s privileged instrument for the restoration of community with all of creation and which was said to emphasize the relational and the multidimensional character of church unity. A question present in most of the sections concerned common structures of leadership, decision making and mutual accountability between the churches; these were understood as consequences of the concept of koinonia if taken seriously. Among the recommendations was the invitation to work for a mutual recognition of baptism and a common baptismal formula, a study on a universal, reconciled ministry for the church as well as wider attention to the implications of ecclesiology and ethics.

Mendes 1993 (Brazil), Ecumenical Global Gathering of Youth and Students (EGGYS). Some 524 young people from 81 countries representing ten international Christian youth organizations came together to discuss how to strengthen youth participation in the ecumenical movement and to reflect on common mission of Christian youth and student organizations worldwide. Reports were presented on themes such as economy, society and alternative models; violation of women’s rights; education for life; environment and development; unity in a fragmented world. The global youth gathering called for a new vision concerning the involvement of youth in the life and renewal of churches.

Salvador 1996 (Brazil), world mission and evangelism.* Under the theme “Called To One Hope – the Gospel in Diverse Cultures”, sections studied the following sub-themes: (1) authentic witness within each culture, (2) gospel and identity in community, (3) local congregations in pluralist societies, (4) one gospel – diverse expressions.

At the close of nearly a century of debate, study and cooperation in mission which began in 1910 at Edinburgh, this conference clearly demonstrated the fact that the gospel has been proclaimed around the world and that the centre of gravity in Christianity had shifted towards the South. The 574 participants represented the largest ecumenical conference to date on the key issues of inculturation, gospel and culture, and culture-sensitive evangelism. Major challenges were addressed, including the negative effects of economic globalization,* mission in a Western culture, accountability in mission and equipping local congregations for mission (ecumenical renewal of local congregational life).

Moshi 1996 (Tanzania), Faith and Order.* Major themes of this first plenary commission meeting after Santiago (1993) were the ongoing studies on ecclesiology (the church as koinonia), ecumenical hermeneutics, ecclesiology and ethics (costly obedience – towards a global communion of moral witnessing), worship and confessing the apostolic faith today. A main theme was highlighted in a keynote address on the “hermeneutics of unity”, demanding an inter-relation between a coherent ecumenical hermeneutics inspired by the four essential marks of the church (unity, holiness, apostolicity, catholicity) and visible structures of mutual accountability.

Harare 1998 (Zimbabwe), festival of the Decade of Churches in Solidarity with Women. Held prior to the WCC assembly in Harare, the festival was the culminating point for the Ecumenical Decade of Churches in Solidarity with Women* (1988-98). More than 1000 women and 70 men from all churches and regions in the world underlined the importance of the key issues of the Decade and its ongoing significance for the life and renewal of the churches. For the first time, violence against women and violence within the church was made the main topic. Participants composed a letter to churches and other concerned communities in which violence against women was portrayed as sin against humanity and the earth as well as a violation of the Body of Christ. Ethical and ecclesial issues like the ordination of women, abortion, divorce and different sexual orientations were intensely debated but remained controversial. The festival was notable for the strong and rich contributions of African women.

ECUMENICAL COUNCILS

ENGLISH has only one word to render two different realities which Latin, French and German, for example, designate by two words: consilium (conseil, Rat), as in World Council of Churches; and concilium (concile, Konzil), as in the ecumenical councils of the church.

The idea of an ecumenical council and its fundamental role in the church is deeply rooted in almost every Christian tradition. In the ecumenical movement, the ideal of a truly ecumenical council as the most significant way to manifest and to seal the unity of the churches constantly re-emerges but there are considerable differences concerning the conditions required to convene such a council.

ORIGIN

The fundamental reference for every council is the Jerusalem assembly of Acts 15, with its essential elements of representation of the whole ecclesial community, special assistance of the Holy Spirit,* and unanimity in the decisions to be applied in the life of the church. Early church writers refer to Matt. 18:20 – “Where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I in the midst of them” – suggesting an inseparable link between the councils and the liturgy in the life of the one undivided church.

The institution of the ecumenical council as such developed in the framework of the Roman-Byzantine empire. In the presence of grave questions of faith* or church order* that threatened to divide the church* and the Christian world, the emperor took the initiative to convene the bishops of the oikoumene, the inhabited world identified with the empire. This is the precise origin of “ecumenical”, meaning “universal”. Personally or through his delegates, the emperor also supervised the debates without direct interference in the discussions – at least in principle. He left to the bishops alone the theological decisions, which he then confirmed and gave the force of law throughout the empire.

CONDITIONS

The early councils themselves did not determine the conditions for a council to be received (see reception) as ecumenical. These developed gradually in history, sometimes through long confrontations and when it was necessary to refute those assemblies which claimed to be ecumenical but could not be received as such because their decisions did not conform with the scriptures and the ancient Tradition. Docility to the Holy Spirit and strict fidelity to the scriptures are obviously primary requirements.

Only at the seventh ecumenical council (Nicaea II 787), in order to invalidate the iconoclastic council of Hieria (754), were the criteria clarified. The presidents of the main churches must be in agreement; in particular, the five patriarchs (the “pentarchy” of Chalcedon 451) of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem and above all the bishop of Rome must collaborate and participate, at least through representatives. The decisions should be coherent with previous councils and reach out beyond the regional to the ends of the earth: the whole church must be able to identify with the council and its decisions. Representatives of all situations and vocations in the church can be invited, but according to Roman Catholic and Orthodox traditions, only the bishops have the right to vote.

The Roman Catholic Church (RCC) has strongly emphasized the essential role of the bishop of Rome (see primacy): for a council to be ecumenical, the pope must convene it, preside over it (personally or through his delegates) and approve its decisions (1983 canon laws, 338-41). This later Western development cannot be applied strictly to those first seven councils celebrated in common by the East and the West. The majority view in the Orthodox church is that a council is in fact ecumenical only if the whole church accepts its decision, although some hold that this does not correspond entirely to the self-awareness of the ancient councils. This is the primary reason why the future pan-Orthodox “holy and great council”, in preparation since the 1960s, does not want to appropriate the adjective “ecumenical”, but leave that to the later judgment of the whole church.

The aim of a council is the safeguarding and growth of communion* in the faith and the sacraments.* Therefore the normal way of proceeding is not to settle for a mere majority vote but to seek as much unanimity as possible. An ecumenical council has reached its final objective only when it results in a strengthening of full communion.

AUTHORITY

The authority of the council is no more than the authority of truth, and truth is guaranteed when it is proclaimed in conformity with scripture* and in accordance with the faith of the whole church, throughout the world and history.

For the RCC, the Second Vatican Council* (1962-65) stipulates that in the ecumenical council the college of bishops exercises in a solemn way the supreme power it enjoys over the universal church, in union with the bishop of Rome, its head (Dogmatic Constitution on the Church 22); this emphasis on the essential and organic role of the pope is characteristic of the RCC. In the Orthodox church the ecumenical council also represents the supreme authority of teaching and decision making: once a council has been received as ecumenical, its authority is final and its decisions are binding for everyone everywhere (see teaching authority). For Luther, the authority belongs only to scripture, and the councils have no other authority than results from their conformity with scripture. For Calvin, the authority of a council depends on its docility to the Spirit, its faithfulness to scripture and its expression of the unity* of the church.

The Roman Catholic and Orthodox traditions speak of the infallibility* of the ecumenical council as the official expression of the infallibility of the church itself. But it would not be historically correct to project this notion back to the first councils, whose consciousness of being an infallible authority was not explicit; rather, they had the assurance of being in the truth whenever they were united in spirit and heart with the universal church in direct line with the apostolic Tradition.* Luther rejects the infallibility of the ecumenical councils by virtue of the sola scriptura; in his view, councils can and did err (Leipzig disputation 1519).

LIST

The first four general councils occupy a privileged place in most Christian traditions because of their importance in the formulation of Christological and Trinitarian dogmas. Several ancient writers compared them to the four gospels. The first (Nicea I* 325) condemned Arianism and defined Christ as being of one essence (homoousios) with the Father; the second (Constantinople I* 381) proclaimed the divinity of the Holy Spirit; the third (Ephesus 431) condemned Nestorianism and defined the unity of the person of Christ; the fourth (Chalcedon* 451) condemned monophysitism and defined two natures (divine and human) in the one person of Christ.

The Assyrian Church of the East* has built its own tradition on the first two councils, and ignores the following ones. The Oriental Orthodox churches* recognize the first three councils but reject the fourth (Chalcedon), mainly for reasons of terminology and political circumstances. Luther recognized the special status of the first four councils because of their Christological importance, but allowed them no other authority than that of their faithfulness to scriptures. Calvin wrote: "We readily receive the ancient councils like those of Nicea, Constantinople, Ephesus, Chalcedon, and those similar we honour and reverence" (Institutes 4.9.8), but he is almost silent about the councils that followed. The Anglican formularies accept the first four councils.

The churches of the East and West held three other councils together – Constantinople II (553), Constantinople III (680-81) and Nicea II (787) – which the RC and Eastern Orthodox churches unanimously recognize as ecumenical. These seven councils, often called the councils of the undivided church, are so high in Orthodox consciousness that the Eastern Orthodox church calls itself "the church of the seven ecumenical councils". In the Eastern church no council after the separation from the West (1054) receives the title "ecumenical".

The Latin church continued to convene other general councils in the middle ages and later. Afterwards, in the RCC some of them came to be entitled "ecumenical", but without any official decision to that effect: Constantinople IV (869-70), Lateran I (1123), Lateran II (1139), Lateran III (1179), Lateran IV (1215), Lyons I (1245), Lyons II (1274), Vienne (1311-12), Constance (1414-18), Basel-Ferrara-Florence (1431-45), Lateran V (1512-17), Trent* (1545-63), Vatican I (1869-70), Vatican II* (1962-65). A possible response to the question of whether this constitutes an obstacle on the road to unity may be the formula of Pope Paul VI on the 700th anniversary of Lyons II in 1974: he never used the term "ecumenical" but instead, "the sixth of the general synods held in the West".

THE CONCILIAR MOVEMENT OF THE LATE MIDDLE AGES

At a time of great tensions and profound divisions in the Western church (e.g., the so-called great Western schism, 1378-1417), the conciliar movement gained considerable strength (see conciliarity), since a general council was considered the only authority capable of restoring unity to the church and introducing the radical reforms needed. Already in the 12th century some canonists who did not question the principle of the primacy of Rome nevertheless held that the general council constituted the supreme authority in the church, to which the pope himself was subject. The council of Constance (1414-18) proclaimed that the pope owed obedience to the general council in everything concerning the faith, the extirpation of schism and the reform of the church; it also fixed a periodic meeting of the future councils which would govern the church. In response to this provoked crisis of papal authority, the council of Basel (1431) was convoked. Anti-papal sentiment and extreme conciliarism prevailed, but that was short-lived and the papacy emerged reinforced. The ineffective fifth Lateran council (1512-17) practically marked the end of the conciliar movement. Internal quarrels prevented the application of its urgent reforms, while the fear of a resurgence of the conciliar movement made the papacy reluctant to convene a new council. All this had far-reaching consequences for the events surrounding the Reformation of the 16th century.

TOWARDS A "GENUINELY UNIVERSAL COUNCIL"

In the course of a gradual clarification of the aim of the ecumenical movement ("the nature of the unity we seek"), the WCC New Delhi assembly (1961) expressed the conviction that the time had come seriously to study the role, methods and influence of the ancient seven ecumenical councils. Faith and Order* (1964-67) studied the nature and structure of those councils and the significance of the conciliar process in general for the ecumenical movement. The Uppsala assembly (1968) asked the churches "to work for the time when a genuinely universal council may once more speak for all Christians". The Nairobi assembly's description of the unity we seek as a "conciliar fellowship" (1975) must be seen in the same perspective: the 1961 New Delhi approach (the unity of all Christians "in each place") was thereby enlarged to a confession of faith and a life of communion on the universal level; and conciliarity was regarded as an integral part of the essence of the church.

After the Vancouver assembly (1983) "conciliar process" designated the common commitment to "justice, peace and integrity of creation". Within the WCC the Orthodox especially objected to the term "conciliar", since for them as for the RCC a genuine council already presupposes unity in faith and must meet some precise criteria. The WCC then abandoned the term, though Christians in some places continued to use it and to consider the different convocations on the local, regional or global level as provisional stages on the long road to unity. One day they would like to celebrate this unity together in a gathering that would represent all Christians and would be a visible sign of communion among all churches scattered around the world. New voices in that sense were heard as the third millennium drew near, including the first draft (1996) of the WCC's policy statement "Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the World Council of Churches" – though this reference was not included in the final version (1997).

ECUMENICAL DECADE: CHURCHES IN SOLIDARITY WITH WOMEN (1988-98)

FROM THE OUTSET the World Council of Churches was visibly committed to women and to providing a space for their voices and concerns. The first assembly (Amsterdam 1948) commended a report on "The Life and Work of Women in the Church" to the churches for serious reflection and action; and each subsequent assembly also made specific reference to the participation of women and called for special focus on their concerns and struggles in church and society.

The conference on "Sexism in the 1970s" (Berlin 1974) shifted the focus of work from "cooperation between women and men" to issues of social and economic justice for women. The fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975), taking place during the UN International Women's Year, called for a theological and biblical enquiry into the insights and experiences of women, leading to the worldwide study process on the "Community of Women and Men in the Church".* This study drew on and encouraged the emerging women's movements in churches of all regions of the world, which were raising questions regarding women's participation and representation. Yet a report to the WCC central committee in 1985, at the end of the UN Decade for Women, established the need for more focused attention by the churches. The UN Decade had not addressed the churches in a direct way, and a questionnaire sent to the churches to assess the impact of the UN process on the status and place of women in the church met with little response.

At its next meeting in January 1987, the central committee decided to observe an Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women (1988-98) so that the energy generated by the UN Decade could be sustained. The Decade was officially launched at Easter 1988 with the following objectives: (1) empowering women to challenge oppressive structures in the global community, their churches and communities; (2) affirming – through shared leadership and decision making, theology and spirituality – the decisive contributions of women in churches and communities; (3) giving visibility to women's perspectives and actions in the work and struggle for justice, peace and the integrity of creation; (4) enabling the churches to free themselves of racism, sexism and classism, and from teachings and practices that discriminate against women; and (5) encouraging the churches to take actions in solidarity with women.

The Decade was described by a woman in India as “a gift from God to the churches”, an opportunity for the churches and the ecumenical movement to transform into action the many commitments they had made to women since the WCC came into being. There is no doubt that there was a burst of enthusiasm when the Decade was launched and many plans were made to act in solidarity with women. But what is more significant is that particularly the women of the churches grasped the moment to articulate some of their deepest aspirations and longings in an attempt to ensure responsive action by the churches.

At the mid-point of the Decade in 1992, a group of women from all regions decided that rather than evaluation of the churches, critical reflection with them was needed, in order to affirm the progress made towards becoming a truly inclusive community of women and men. Such a process could also provide an opportunity for churches to analyze the obstacles in the way of change and to plan strategies for action in the remaining years of the Decade.

An ambitious plan of ecumenical visits to all the member churches of WCC was proposed as a means of engaging the churches in this dialogue, using the image of the apostle Paul of “living letters”. Over 70 teams, each composed of two women and two men from member churches of WCC, visited more than 330 churches, 68 national councils of churches and 650 women's groups in all regions of the world. While sensitive to the context of each member church and listening carefully to the concerns they raised, the “living letters” also challenged the churches to greater and more concerted action. Each team prepared a report, shared with the churches visited and subsequently reviewed by an ecumenical group of readers, who drew out common issues facing women and the churches as well as recording the specificities in particular churches and contexts.

Their composite report highlighted the deep love women have for the church and their willingness to commit themselves to work in the church. But in many churches, women who are active, strong and ready to carry forward the church's mission are not recognized nor given leadership for their ministries, nor are they admitted into key areas of participation. The report also exposed the many obstacles remaining: “As ‘living letters’ we encountered three issues of deep concern to women in all regions: violence against women, even within the ‘safe womb’ of family and church; the impact of increasing racism and xenophobia; and the effect of the global economic crisis on women's lives.”

Summing up the vision after ten years, the report noted that the Decade and the visits “have raised tremendous expectations among women for real change... We have expressed our vision of the Decade... as an unfolding process, a movement for transformation that will continue to build momentum beyond 1998 and into the new millennium.”

The Decade officially concluded in December 1998 with a festival held in Harare, Zimbabwe, just before the WCC's eighth assembly. More than a thousand women, joined by about 30 men, assessed what the Decade had and had not achieved, outlined the tasks remaining, and urged that the churches move in the new millennium “from solidarity to accountability”. The Festival challenged the ecumenical movement to continue to raise the many issues women wrestle with: questions related to the participation of women in the life of the church and their various ministries, including the ordination of women; violence against women and children; economic discrimination; and racial violence and exclusion. There was also the strong call to deal more consistently with the ecclesiological and theological challenges that are at the heart of a true community of women and men. To achieve the unity the churches seek calls on them to roll away the stones of violence and injustice, and the obstacles to participation that women had identified through the Decade process. The Decade merely opened the way for the churches to move into deeper commitments and more resolute actions.

ECUMENICAL DIRECTORIES

DURING the Second Vatican Council* discussions of the Decree on Ecumenism,* many bishops asked for detailed directives and guidelines for pastoral practices. In response, the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity (SPCU) – since 1989, a Pontifical Council (Pcpcu)* – has released a series of such documents.

The 1967 Directory, Part One treated the setting up of diocesan and national ecumenical commissions, the validity of baptisms conferred in other Christian communions, and “spiritual ecumenism” and the “sharing of spiritual activities”, including liturgical worship and occasional eucharistic hospitality. Part Two (1969) outlined ecumenical principles and practices for seminaries, colleges and universities. In 1970 the SPCU published reflections and suggestions concerning ecumenical dialogue; and in 1975, a study on forms of ecumenical collaboration at regional, national and local levels. SPCU officers also were consulted for the Vatican's new norms in mixed (and interchurch) marriages (1970), the reception of adult baptized Christians into the RCC (1972), and the celebration of the eucharist for deceased non-Catholics (1976).

While the RCC was developing an ecumenical tradition of reflective experience, John Paul II promulgated new codes of canon law for the Western Catholic church (1983) and in 1990 the code of canons of the Eastern (Catholic) churches* (1990) and the universal catechism of the RCC (1993). Many of the canons legislate ecumenical concerns, for “it pertains especially to the entire college of bishops and to the apostolic see to foster among Catholics the ecumenical movement” (CCL, 755.1).

So after 20 years of RC ecumenical thought and practices, and after consultation with all the bishops' conferences, the Pcpcu in 1993 promulgated a comprehensive, coherent Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms of Ecumenism (ED), “approved and confirmed by the authority of Pope John Paul II”. “While fully respecting the competence of local and territorial church authorities, and recognizing that many judgments... can best be made at the local level”, the Directory “gives general norms of universal application to guide Catholic participation in ecumenical activity”, so as to guarantee that it “is in accordance with the unity of faith and discipline that binds Catholics together” (n.7).

The Directory presents the RC theological foundations for ecumenical life and action (teaching, attitudes, motivations and spirituality); the ecumenical formation of all clergy and laity (studying the scriptures, preaching, catechesis, liturgy) in various settings (family, parish, schools, seminaries, theology faculties, Catholic universities, pastoral ministers' continuing education, hospitals, lay associations and institutes); “spiritual activities” (prayer in common, baptismal celebrations, sharing in sacramental life, especially the eucharist, marriages and mixed marriages, funerals); ecumenical cooperation and common witness (social and cultural life; peace, justice and stewardship of creation; missionary activities; common Bible translation and distribution; catechetics; medical work, relief and development work, communications media); and church structures (college of bishops, bishops' conferences, patriarchal synods, dioceses and their ecumenical commissions; religious communities and lay organizations; the PCPCU).

While reactions to the Directory from other churches have lamented certain rules seen as too restrictive (e.g. on mixed marriages, liturgical celebrations and the role of women in the church), many praised the seriousness of the RC pastoral commitment to the ecumenical movement; as one of them wrote, "Would that many of the Protestant churches took their ecumenical life seriously enough to produce such comprehensive guidelines... in the light of their own ecclesial self-understanding!"

ECUMENICAL LEARNING

ECUMENICAL learning has always been considered an important task through which Christians and churches have come together to work towards visible Christian unity* and the renewal* of the human community. It is only possible to discern, acknowledge and if necessary overcome existing theological, denominational, historical and cultural differences among Christians and churches when comprehensive learning takes place. Ecumenical learning has long been seen as an outcome of anything done in an ecumenical spirit or context (meetings, visits, joint services, interchurch aid, etc.) – a "learning by experience, by a direct encounter and confrontation with situations in a world horizon" (Werner Simpfendörfer). Since the mid-1950s it has been identified as a fundamental task and a distinctive programme within the ecumenical movement and the churches.

The WCC central committee in 1957 described ecumenical learning as "fostering understanding of, commitment to and informed participation in the whole ecumenical process. The vision of the one, missionary church in process of renewal, when it is apprehended by Christians, leads them to an ecumenical commitment, i.e. to participation in the process of letting the churches be more truly the church." Ecumenical learning (or "ecumenical education" or "education for ecumenism" or "ecumenical formation") thus cannot be limited to the communication of facts (history, background, structures and functions of the ecumenical movement) as part of an educational curriculum. Even imparting information about differences between Christians and their churches or about convergences being achieved is only part of a much more comprehensive task of equipping Christians to live as a liberating and reconciling community in a divided world. To be sure, ecumenical learning must incorporate this kind of information if ecumenism is to be more than a sort of sentimental "being together". Roman Catholic participants in ecumenical discussions about ecumenical learning (e.g. in the Joint Working Group*) have emphasized sharing knowledge about others as integral for the formation of priests and laypeople.

Equally important for ecumenical learning is an involvement in the deeper levels of ecumenical experience in the life of the Christian community – for example, at worship, in service and witness, by sharing life with others and becoming vulnerable to their suffering, by becoming neighbours to strangers. Ecumenical learning should thus be described as a dimension rather than a segment of the whole educational task of the church, although it also appears in particular learning projects or programmes, such as development education or education for mission. Its pedagogical approach moves from teaching about to learning together with.

A more precise description of the task of ecumenical learning requires identifying three elements in the understanding of "ecumenical”: the ecclesiological element, which gives rise to the question of how Christians of different churches, confessions and denominations can move towards more visible unity (see church); the missionary element, which requires a global awareness and a new understanding of the inter-relatedness of the proclamation of the gospel and social commitment, of evangelism and humanization (see evangelism, mission); and the social-ethical element, which, by linking the unity of Christians and the renewal of humankind, stresses commitment to the cause of justice, peace and the integrity of creation in a world seen as a dwelling place for all. One or another of these factors may predominate in a particular learning project but none can be completely lacking. This distinguishes ecumenical learning from the global learning, or international learning or multi-cultural learning programmes initiated by UNESCO and other organizations, which have much in common with it.

In the early 1960s the call for a theory of ecumenical learning and for new content, methods and experiments became more distinct. The need for substantial curricular materials for theological, Christian and religious education enabling children, young people, adults, clergy and laity to understand and take part in the ecumenical process became increasingly evident. Ernst Lange argued for a theory and methodology which enabled people, while remaining rooted in a specific denominational, cultural, historical and socio-political context, to become ecumenically committed and share the experiences of others.

Further discussions led the WCC's sixth assembly Vancouver 1983) to describe learning as “a constitutive dimension for the church as church” and to enumerate several characteristics of ecumenical learning: (1) it transcends barriers – of origin and biography, individual as well as community limitations, because it responds to the exhortation of the word of God* and the far-reaching horizons of God's promise; (2) it is action-oriented, not satisfied with information but seeking to enable Christians to act in order to learn, to be right with God and with one another in word and deed; (3) it is done in community, in which people are asked to establish relationships with one another and also with those who are far away and with what is unfamiliar; (4) it means learning together, detecting the global in the local, the unfamiliar in the context of one's own environment, in order to become aware of one's own conditions and implications; (5) it is inter-cultural, promoting the encounter of different cultures, traditions and forms of life because only a widening of perspectives will bring about an experience of the riches of creation* in nature,* history* and culture;* (6) it is a total process: social and religious learning are not separated from one another but constitute a unity.

ECUMENICAL NEWS INTERNATIONAL

THE ROOTS of ENI and its predecessor, Ecumenical Press Service (EPS), lie in “ecumenical journalism” which began in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. In the wake of the Stockholm conference of 1925, and under the umbrella of the Life and Work movement launched by that gathering, the International Christian Press Commission began its work. Among other things, it circulated “ecumenical letters” among church leaders and journalists.

Towards the end of 1933, this ecumenical communication activity was named the International Christian Press Information Service (ICPIS). In the 1930s the situation of the church in Germany in the face of Nazism was a major focus of attention. The first in the ICPIIS “information series” appeared in March 1934. Eventually the name was changed to EPS.

Although EPS was officially a service of the WCC and several other ecumenical bodies, the WCC alone funded EPS and its French-language counterpart, Service oecuménique de presse et d’information (SOEPI). EPS and SOEPI gained high credibility in ecumenical circles, but throughout the 1980s there was talk of a more ambitious news service, with a wider sponsorship, a wider news range and aimed at a much wider audience.

In 1994 this project came to fruition with the establishment of ENI, which replaced EPS and SOEPI and was sponsored by the WCC, LWF, WARC and CEC. ENI was set up, initially within the WCC structures, as an editorially independent news service to disseminate ecumenical and Christian news to the secular and religious media. From the start, ENI published news rather than information, and subscribers were required to pay.

During the late 1990s ENI built a strong image, thanks largely to its network of “stringers” around the world and to rigorous editing by the Geneva staff. As its establishment coincided with the growth of the Internet, ENI was able to use new technology to produce a daily news service in English and French. In 2001 ENI was established as an independent association under Swiss law.

ECUMENICAL PRAYER CYCLE

THE ECUMENICAL Prayer Cycle (EPC), a book of prayers for each area of the world, was produced initially in response to a request made by the WCC fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975) that ways be found of deepening spiritual bonds among the churches of the world. First published in 1978 under the title For All God’s People, a subsequent edition, authorized by the central committee in 1984, became available under the slightly revised title With All God’s People, in 1989.

Arising out of the long-standing practice in the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva of praying regularly for member churches around the world, the EPC represents a systematic attempt to make available for wider use a cycle of prayer which ensures that peoples and churches all over the world are prayed for on a regular basis during the course of the 52 weeks of the year. It has been described by one user as “the only satisfying way of praying in this kind of interdependent world”.

Consisting of maps, information and appropriate prayers, translated into a number of different languages and in some instances considerably subsidized, the first EPC was welcomed as a significant contribution to ecumenical prayer. It has been used in a variety of different situations: in Sunday worship, in theological colleges, by religious orders, in lay training academies, by Christian councils and by many individuals. It seemed a natural choice for Christians to use in worship in a well-known Indian teaching hospital already devoted to healing and wholeness and in the setting of a church committed to unity. The use of the cycle imparted a sense of support and solidarity to hard-pressed pastors in a particularly isolated part of Africa, and it also provided a focus of intercession in the course of a weekly celebration of the eucharist in a Lutheran parish in New York. It has been available, in a number of different languages, in the chapel of a well-known international airport, giving travellers a global picture of the church, present in every part of the world.

The change of title for the second edition was reflected in its contents, with an increase of prayer material from the regions themselves, thus giving users a better opportunity worldwide to pray with their sisters and brothers using, wherever possible, the words they themselves might use on matters about which they would be most concerned to pray. Many concerns – unity, peace, justice, cities, refugees, young people, unemployment – are held in common by Christians nearly everywhere, while others, very specific to an area and situation, call for special understanding and sensitivity. Differences in circumstances and of temperament result in a wide variety of collects, litanies, creeds, lamentations and thanksgivings.

In keeping with the underlying theme of interdependence, the current EPC moves from one yearly cycle to the next with the closing prayer of the Vancouver assembly: "As the earth keeps turning, hurtling through space; and night falls and day breaks from land to land; let us remember people – waking, sleeping, being born, and dying – of one world and of one humanity. Let us go from here in peace." The cycle in the 1989 edition has expired and a new edition is in preparation. Meanwhile, amendments and updates have been made by individuals and regional ecumenical councils for their own use.

ECUMENICAL SHARING OF RESOURCES

FOR MANY churches, involvement in sending and receiving personnel and funds for mission,* interchurch aid* and development* has had a considerable effect on their international relationships and ecumenical participation. The WCC in turn has played an active role in fostering reflection on relationships in mission and promoting sharing of personnel ecumenically. Against this background, the Ecumenical Sharing of Resources (ESR) emerged as a conceptual framework for new relationships that would free the churches from traditional roles of being either a sending (giving) or a receiving body and enable them to overcome structures of inequality and dependency between rich and poor. In some countries the issues of ESR are often taken up under the term "partnership".

The vision of ESR implies a broad understanding of what is meant by "resources", including spirituality, culture and human resources as well as finance and material goods. It calls for just relationships based on equality, which allow for mutual accountability, sharing of power and true interdependence. It requires holding together mission, development and service, which are often treated separately, both in theology and in church organizational structures.

The study process. Ecumenical reflection on resource sharing has been a consultative process involving a gradually widening range of participants: first, the church-related agencies for world service and development in the North and churches and national councils of churches in the South; later, agencies for world mission, regional ecumenical organizations and network groups related to the WCC.

ESR began in 1976 as a WCC study after the Nairobi assembly, where interchurch aid, mission and development had been discussed in the wake of the debate on the moratorium proposal by some church leaders in Africa and Asia. This had raised fundamental questions about the selfhood of the receiving churches and the self-understanding of churches accustomed to seeing themselves solely as senders or givers. A report was made to the central committee in 1980; it issued a message to the churches and a study guide, Empty Hands, reflecting the basic concept of ESR described above.

Attention then shifted to elaborating a new "resource-sharing system" for the WCC, implementing the ESR principles. The sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983) emphasized ESR as a priority for WCC programmes and insisted on a "comprehensive understanding... as part of a continuing dialogue on the mission and service of the church... to facilitate models..., not a heavy, centralized structure". In response, a third phase in the process began, aiming to formulate an ecumenical discipline for the sharing of resources to which all participants, including the WCC, would be called to commit themselves, in the recognition that translating the concept of ESR into structural changes of the existing project system and relationships of giving and receiving would require such a commitment.

The world consultation on ESR in October 1987 in El Escorial, Spain, adopted the commitment text "Guidelines for Sharing", including recommendations regarding women and youth, and formulated a "Common Discipline of Ecumenical Sharing" which spelled out its biblical-theological basis and steps for implementing ecumenical sharing locally, regionally and globally. In August 1988 the central committee received the guidelines and recommendations, affirmed the WCC's own commitment and called on the churches to implement the discipline in their own situation.

The ESR discussion related to the broader process of continuing reflection on ecumenical diakonia* within the WCC's interchurch aid* section (CICARWS until 1992, then the Unit on Sharing and Service) and its partners, especially the large church-related development agencies in the West. The world consultation on interchurch aid (Larnaca 1986) placed the vision of ESR at the centre of the WCC's diaconal agenda, as reflected in the call of the Larnaca declaration for a "comprehensive diakonia", i.e. a prophetic, pastoral and reconciling service, not simply charity, which involves the whole people of God in the context of local churches in every place and continent.

Theological perspectives. The close link between ESR and the quest for unity* was reflected in the theme of the El Escorial meeting: "Koinonia – Sharing Life in a World Community". It belongs to the essence of the local church* to be a sharing community, rooted in the eucharist,* from where it is sent out to be Christ's body, broken and shared in the world. Similarly, the global fellowship of churches engaged in the ecumenical movement should reflect the image of the body. The search for the real meaning of the eucharist as the body broken for the world and for eucharistic unity is therefore closely related to the task of building the ecumenical community of sharing.

During the latter part of the 1990s, the approach of the year 2000 and the 50th anniversary of the WCC (1998) stimulated ecumenical reflection on sharing in terms of the biblical jubilee tradition, and the WCC Unit on Sharing and Service adopted a systematic framework for its work entitled "Strategy for Jubilee". The spirituality of the jubilee tradition brought to the ESR process a challenge which was both theological and practical. From a Christological perspective, the jubilee was seen as calling churches and Christians to live with the rhythms of liberation and to proclaim good news to the poor at the particular points of pain, oppression and alienation in the world, and thus to confess Jesus as the Christ who is the herald of the jubilee, messenger and enactor of liberation.

This challenge from the jubilee tradition to the ESR process was significant in the broader ecumenical debate about how to realize the vision of the WCC as a fellowship of churches. The jubilee images require setting koinonia side by side with diakonia, fellowship with costly discipleship, church order with gospel risk.

ESR is thus seen as a concept with significant implications for the fellowship of the churches but also reaching beyond to sharing life with all people. In response to the biblical imperative of compassion and justice, it confronts the injustices of the prevailing world order with its unequal distribution of resources and power, calling for the empowerment of the powerless and for solidarity with the poor.

EDUCATION, ADULT

LEARNING was all-pervasive in communities until it was institutionalized in formal education and ultimately identified with it in the West. That model was exported to other countries during colonial times. In that context, "adult education" was first used for organized learning outside the school system, either for adults who had not finished school or for those who needed specific skills for jobs. Education was functional and was clearly linked to development (understood as economic needs).

In the late 1960s a strong movement emerged criticizing the school system. Ivan Illich would later speak of “deschooling society”. In the early 1970s, Paulo Freire, a Brazilian known for his work in literacy and author of Pedagogy of the Oppressed, a reflection on his experience, was invited to set up the adult education desk at the WCC. From the start, the thrust of the desk was what he called “liberating education” as against “banking” or “domesticating” education. The aim of education was “conscientization”, imperfectly rendered by “awareness raising”. People should be able to read critically their world, understand their situation in order to transform it through a process of action and reflection. At its core was what would later be called “the option for the poor”, the oppressed, the marginalized to become subjects of their own history* and not objects of the various powers in society. Dom Helder Camara popularized the word “conscientization”, and Freire’s ideas caught on first in and then outside churches. In Persepolis in 1975, UNESCO recognized the shift in education and came up with the concept of “lifelong learning”, which integrated formal, informal and non-formal education and linked literacy with people’s participation in decision making. Freire’s intuitions inspired a number of community-based programmes and accounted at one time, mostly in third-world countries, for much of the practical involvement of churches in education and the struggles for justice, preparing the way for a theology of liberation.

Some of those intuitions expressed in Pedagogy of the Oppressed can be summarized as follows: (1) education is never neutral; (2) learners should be involved in selecting the subject matter of the learning; (3) pedagogy should be problem posing and not merely transfer of knowledge from those who know to those who do not; (4) education is not an academic exercise but should contribute to the radical transformation of society so that people should take their destiny in their own hands; (5) learning happens in a dialogue situation.

A wealth of experiences of “adult education” can be found most of all in social movements. Movements of peasants, urban poor, women, and indigenous peoples have affirmed and developed the orientations sensed by Freire. In January 1990, the International Council of Adult Education, presided over by Nita Barrow, a member of the executive committee of the WCC, chose as the theme of its world assembly “Literacy, Popular Education, Democracy: Building the Movement”. In March of the same year the World Conference on Education for All, organized by UN agencies, recognized the overall failure of the formal educational systems and the contribution of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) in the creative rethinking of basic education. For most of these, education must give access to the bases of social power. Several approaches have developed, and adult education is being covered in participatory research, participatory evaluation, participatory training, development education, peace education, environmental education, workers’ education, women’s education and global education. Many of the pioneering NGOs are either church-based or church-related.

We can say that adult education for lifelong learning today is a process of collective production and diffusion of knowledge involving world-view, vision, values, understanding, attitudes, practices, strategies, skills and tools, as people struggle to survive, to resist oppression and dehumanization, and to build a more human world through communities of solidarity.

EDUCATION

EDUCATION and renewal* have been emphasized in the church from its beginnings. Acts

2:42 attests that the earliest Christians found their unity* among other things by devoting themselves to the apostles' teaching. Indeed, Luke's task was to pass on the content of the apostles' teaching (Luke 1:1-3; Acts 1:1-2); and the church through the ages has continued to be concerned to teach and learn the Tradition* for the renewal of the faithful. Timothy is exhorted to "continue in what you have learned and have firmly believed, knowing from whom you learned it, and how from childhood you have known the sacred writings that are able to instruct you for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. 3:14-15). Here Tradition is stressed – what has been learned from forebears and teachers, including in particular the scriptures, which are inspired and are therefore useful in enabling human beings to come to wisdom (vv.16-17).

By the 2nd century the catechetical school of Alexandria in Egypt was a centre of the intellectual life of the Christian church as well as instructing candidates for church membership in the principles of the Christian faith.* Emperor Justinian I sought to promote an exclusively Christian form of education, regulating the belief of Christians and removing all traces of pagan philosophy and practices. In 529 he published a decree excluding pagans from positions of public education financed by city councils. The result was a narrower focus of the Christian faith, and the emphasis on correct teaching and doctrine served the imperial idea of total mastery. But Cassiodorus in the West saw the study of the seven liberal arts as the best preparation for higher studies in Christian theology as well as the best defence against non-Christian attacks on the church. The education of the clergy was very much on the agenda of Emperor Charlemagne, who wanted Christian service, including prayers and rituals, to be correctly understood and properly performed (Admonitio Generalis, 789; De Litteris Colendis, c.781-91).

From the 12th century onwards, scholasticism dominated theology and theological education. In its preoccupation with the relationship between faith and reason and with the nature and attributes of God, scholasticism became so erudite that it neglected the needs of the churches, and the aridity of theology set the stage for the work of the reformers and thus contributed to the divisions of the church.

THE REFORMERS

Martin Luther's emphasis on education was linked to his re-discovery of the priesthood of all believers. Convinced that the entire body of Christian believers is called to be intelligent in the faith, Luther published his small catechism* for children and a large catechism for adults. Family education received considerable emphasis in his ministry. John Calvin also emphasized education, and his successor Theodore Beza established what eventually became the university of Geneva. The founding of educational institutions was rooted in the conviction that the church needed learned ministers who could set forth the true faith, as well as an educated laity.

The Reformation stimulated fresh approaches to education by broadening the base and scope of learning and devising new methods to quicken and train the human mind and spirit. Philipp Melanchthon and John Higenkegin developed Volksschule and reconstructed university education. John Amos Comenius (1592-1670) of Unitas Fratrum pioneered an educational theory which influenced the education of the child as a child. The Catholic Reformation also produced new approaches to education. The Jesuits developed the ratio studiorum, and congregations of women (e.g. the Ursulines) arose to pursue education of the masses (see religious communities).

Thus education, Christian and theological, was seen as an important element in the renewal of the church. In general, it was oriented to serving the needs of the church; it was not education for its own sake. The view of education was democratic, in the sense that it was for all the faithful, not just the clergy. This foreshadowed the later ecumenical emphases on ministry by all God's people (see people of God) and theology by the people.*

18TH- AND 19TH-CENTURY DEVELOPMENT

In 19th-century Europe, education became a function of the state, aimed at preparing young people for service of the state rather than rearing them specifically in the Christian faith. Not only did this reflect the distancing of the state from the church but it also led to a distancing of theology faculties from the church (see church and state).

Already the Reformers had protested that they were not themselves educated enough in theological matters to be entrusted with the Christian education of the faithful. This concern – and the desire to promote Christian education among the young, particularly the unschooled poor – led to the formation of Sunday schools, the first founded by Hannah Ball in High Wycombe, England, in the 1760s. In 1780 the Sunday School Movement was pioneered by Robert Raikes of Gloucester. It grew around the world, and in 1889 was re-named the World Sunday School Convention (later Association), headquartered in London. Its main work was producing materials for Sunday schools. In 1924, the World Sunday School Association became a federation, with an interdenominational and international board, committed to Christian education and to drawing churches together. In 1947 it was re-named World Council of Christian Education* (WCCE); its activities included providing resources for effective educational leadership and programmes, and ecumenical curriculum development for church and day schools in all continents. In 1971 it was integrated into the WCC.

Education was also emphasized by the Christian social action movement arising in the 19th century. Workers in trade unions were educated for political consciousness. The World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches* was founded in 1914 to promote education for peace. The first Life and Work* conference (Stockholm 1925) included a section on “the church and education”; and the Life and Work movement continued this emphasis, holding annual ecumenical seminars in Geneva from 1933 to explore ecumenical education. Its 1937 Oxford conference explored the subject of “Church, Community and State in Relation to Education”.

The YMCA* (1855), the YWCA* (1894) and the World Student Christian Federation* (1895) addressed matters of faith and the world’s agenda through prayer, Bible study and practical missionary and socio-political involvement. The lay, youth and student movements dealt with general and Christian education as well as the renewal of educational institutions and theories.

EDUCATION IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

A strong ecumenical perspective on education had thus developed from a number of 19th-century sources. Against this background, the Ecumenical Institute in Bossey,* near Geneva, was founded in 1946. Its expressed objective was the formation of an apostolic type of leadership “which not only aims at changing the life of individuals, but also seeks to achieve a peaceful penetration into the various sections of the community and the various areas of life”.

Before the integration of the WCCE in 1971, the WCC in 1969 had set up an Office of Education. Earlier, the mandate of the Division of Ecumenical Action established by the Evanston assembly (1954), had included helping churches to “relate ecumenical thinking to Christian education in all its aspects”, a task shared by the Ecumenical Institute and the Laity and Youth departments. A joint study commission on education was formed with the WCCE in 1961. The Office of Education established in 1969 had sub-sections on basic adult education (see education, adult), theological education and church education, and administered a fund which financed curriculum projects and initiatives in religious education among children and adults. Several assumptions have governed WCC work in education. One is that all of life is a learning experience – from the cradle to the grave. This has tended to produce a proliferation in the work of the WCC sector dealing with education. Another is the need to pay attention to the roles of both teachers and pupils. What may adults learn from children? What may literates learn from non-literates? What may be learned from peoples with disabilities about true values and the good life? How can a two-way process of teaching and learning in a learning community be fostered? A third assumption is that education in the church context should be not only learning about the faith but also discovering its implications of the faith for personal and social ethical attitudes and decisions.

Theological education. Although theological issues, particularly those related directly to the church, have in the ecumenical movement typically been the province of Faith and Order,* it was the International Missionary Council* (IMC) which took the first steps to structure the concern for theological education programmatically. When the missionary movement gathered momentum early in the 20th century, the churches of the North provided the leadership and set the agenda for church life, style and theology in the South. But some missionaries, notably Charles Ranson, a missionary to India, were convinced that improving the training of indigenous persons was essential for the future of the church. Ranson was tireless in communicating this vision to the IMC, and on the basis of its study of theological education in the South, its 1958 assembly created the Theological Education Fund (TEF), both to promote theological excellence (then still measured by exclusively Western standards) and to develop creative indigenous theological education. The three marks of TEF's work were quality, combining intellectual rigour, spiritual maturity and commitment; authenticity, involving critical encounter with each cultural context in the design, content and purpose of theological education; and creativity, leading to new approaches and deepening the churches' understanding and obedience in mission. As a fund, it enabled the churches of the South to share in decision making about the training of their pastors. After the IMC was integrated into the WCC in 1961, TEF was part of the WCC's Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME); and when theological education later became a separate programme, CWME retained a desk for education and mission.

In 1977 TEF became the Programme on Theological Education (PTE), whose central mandate was "to assist the churches in the reform and renewal of theological education". The understanding of assistance to the churches, who are seen as the principal actors, includes the role of catalyst, challenging them to reform and renew their theological education and ministerial formation. PTE's partners also include other funding agencies, mission boards and regional associations of theological schools.

The PTE mandate called for it to give attention to: "(1) the influence of the context and culture in theology and ministerial training and practices; (2) the need to liberate theological education and ministerial formation and practices from bondages which hamper faithfulness in their life and witness; and (3) cross-cultural discussion of key aspects of theological education". These guidelines led to two special programmatic emphases after the Vancouver assembly (1983): theology by the people and the place of spiritual formation in ministerial formation. The former, rooted in an understanding of the church as the people of God, asks how the people of God are to be equipped for mission and ministry in today's world. What lessons may be learned, for example, from the basic Christian communities, which actually live out the idea of church as the people of God?

The viability of ecumenical theological education today was the theme of a three-year WCC study in the 1990s. This culminated in a consultation in Oslo in 1996 which emphasized the need for greater integration and wholeness within theological education and ministerial formation, and pointed out that such education is a catalyst for renewal.

The Ecumenical Theological Education (ETE) programme, successor to PTE, supports a range of activities, including innovative and alternative programmes in theological education, original and contextual reflection in curriculum development, the programmes of regional bodies of theological education, training of theological educators, and intra- and inter-regional exchange of students and faculty.

Other initiatives in Christian education. Important ecumenical educational work was carried out in the 1970s and 1980s by the WCC Portfolio for Biblical Studies, established in 1971 to explore ways in which Christians "can more faithfully live, witness and worship in accordance with the scriptures" (see Bible, its role in the ecumenical movement). In addressing the questions of how Bible study can become operative for Christian obedience in everyday life and how Christians can be helped to mediate the biblical message in light of their own personal, political and cultural situation, the programme developed extensive training and networking of Bible-study enablers around the world, drawing on and teaching a great variety of Bible-study methods.

For a number of years beginning in 1978 the WCC's Church-Related Educational Institutions Programme (CREIP) evaluated the role played by church-sponsored schools, colleges, universities and institutions, including in human development and nation-building. Among the issues it grappled with were elitism, the influence of governments on Christian education, the relationship between institutional church and private Christian institutions, and the access to education of racial and religious minorities. Another concern was the churches' development of leaders for church and society. This concern became a growing emphasis in the work of the WCC scholarships programme, as it sought increasingly to ensure that the provision of ecumenical financial support for the advanced education and training of individuals took account of the need to meet the future human resources requirements of the churches from which the recipients came.

The concern for ecumenical learning* and the exploration with churches of how their curricula and educational programmes might be revised to promote education for ecumenism, particularly at the local level, involved cooperative initiatives with other sectors of the WCC and with external networks. One such initiative, for example, was a multi-year study of education in a multi-faith environment.

The work of lay academies. The growth of various types of lay centres (see academies, lay) reflects the conviction that the church is called to a dynamic concern for social welfare, and is a sign of a larger renewal of the church's life and structures. This movement resulted in the establishment in 1972 of a worldwide ecumenical network of persons and centres, the World Collaboration Committee for Christian Lay Centres, Academies and Movements for Social Concern (re-named Oikosnet in 1997). Structurally, the concern for laity* – and relations with lay centres and academies – has been variously located in the WCC, reflecting both the breadth of approaches to the issues and the strong lay involvement in many of the activities and organizations that went into the creation of the WCC. Between the Canberra (1991) and Harare (1998) assemblies, it was located in the Unit on Unity and Renewal, and theological reflection on the laity as the whole people of God was given particular attention. With the 1999 restructuring, it returned to its earlier location in the Education team – within an overall understanding of working collaboratively as part of the new structure. The WCCCLC was built on autonomous regional associations, developments and priorities, but its 1993 convention, on the theme "Weaving Communities of Hope", put new emphasis on the worldwide coordination of a movement – strengthening networks, developing concepts of the laity and laity formation and planning common action.

The centre of the lay movement thus seems to have shifted from Europe, allowing the church to see more clearly its proper location with the poor and disestablished. The ecumenical focus on laity has had consequences for reforms of theological education and the continuing education of clergy, reflecting the need to overcome the persistent dichotomy between clergy and laity.

Education and liberation. In the early 1970s the WCC invited the Brazilian philosopher of education Paolo Freire to set up an adult education desk, drawing on the experiences and insights summarized in his book The Pedagogy of the Oppressed and related closely to liberation theology.* Under Freire and his successors over the next 25 years, this WCC programme carried out pioneering work in education that was firmly rooted in the churches' "option for the poor". The central goal of education was seen as enabling those who are poor, oppressed or otherwise marginalized to become the subjects of their own history. Literacy was thus linked with people's participation in decision-making, and formal, informal and non-formal education were integrated. Pedagogy was understood as posing problems in dialogue, rather than a merely monological transfer of knowledge from those who know to those who do not know.

As Freire's ideas and work – especially in Portuguese- and Spanish-speaking countries of Africa – became more widely known, many of his ideas were taken up by governments, universities, community groups and international and non-governmental bodies involved in education, development and social change.

Women and education. James Kwegyir Aggrey of Africa is quoted as saying, "Educate a man and you educate an individual; educate a woman and you educate a tribe and a nation." But despite the crucial role of women in the family, the wider community and the church which his statement highlights, women have often been discriminated against and marginalized in education activities. In response, WCC programmes in laity education have collaborated with the Council's women's desk to raise awareness of women and the churches regarding the impoverishment of the total community life by the marginalization of women in the community, the causes of their oppression and possible positive actions to eliminate this. Locally and nationally women have been enabled to come together to share stories of struggle and analyze problems, thus promoting the cross-fertilization of ideas, shared leadership and strengthened linkages among groups of women. Among creative educational methods used have been biblical and theological reflection through drama, artwork or sharing stories. Two publications record this experience: By Our Lives (1985), an attempt to relate the experiences of women today and those in the Bible and thus call people to read the Bible with new eyes; and New Eyes for Reading (1986), a collection of biblical and theological reflections by women from the third world.

The continuous recognition within the ecumenical movement of the critical importance of education for the renewal of the church has thus been reflected in the WCC, especially since the 1960s. While taking a variety of different forms, it has always emphasized community and the participation of all. Education which not only trains individuals and makes them whole but also prepares them to serve the community and the renewal of the church will continue to be a key dimension of ecumenical work. Prince Thompson, an Anglican bishop in Sierra Leone, has said that "theological education is our nerve centre, and our willingness to shoulder it is an indication of our growing maturity in Christ". What he said of theological education in Africa is true of all education in churches from all regions of the world.

ELECTRONIC CHURCH

THE ORIGINS of what would later come to be known as the electronic church were in the 1920s, when individual preachers in the US such as Aimee Semple McPherson and Charles E. Fuller discovered the power of radio. In the 1950s Billy Graham brought TV cameras to his mass meetings, and radio healer Oral Roberts brought his tent meetings to the screen. Today's electronic church programmes are syndicated throughout the USA, Europe, Latin America, Asia and Africa. Most depend on a single highly visible charismatic leader, exhibit high-budget "slick" production qualities and consistently solicit money over the air and through telephone calls and computerized "personal" letters to viewers.

Although "televangelism" represents only a small part of all religious broadcasting, it attracted considerable interest during the 1970s and 1980s. However, in mass media terms, its audience is not large. According to A.C. Nielsen studies, the US viewing public probably peaked around 1978, held steady for a few years and subsequently decreased. An Annenberg-Gallup study in 1985 revealed that the total number of US viewers who watch one hour or more of religious programmes per week was under 5 million, about 2% of the population.

The basic message of the electronic church is found not so much in its rhetoric as in its overall images. The programmes are authoritative, built on a strong authority figure (almost always male). They stress the need to change individuals as the key to changing society. They present every issue in simple terms, often as a duality – good versus evil, God versus the devil – and they propose correspondingly simple solutions. They affirm the values of reward for effort, equal opportunity of all to achieve success and the free-enterprise system. They pose a concrete eschatology which simultaneously proclaims the imminent end of the world and endorses symbols of success in this world – wealth, power, prestige and beauty, the essence of American secularism.

Electronic church programmes have made some positive contributions to religious outreach. They have identified the alienation of a segment of the population who feel their local churches do not meet their needs. They have met the specialized needs of some people, particularly the ill and elderly who are confined to their homes and those who cannot relate to their community in other ways. And they have made contact with people whom the mainline churches have not been successful in reaching.

There are also serious shortcomings. While televangelists identify with remarkable accuracy the sense of alienation in people, they are all too ready to take advantage of this alienation and to use it to their own advantage. Many televangelists systematically exacerbate and implant viewer self-doubt.

Fund-raising is the central activity. In 1986 Jim Bakker's programme took in US$129 million, Jimmy Swaggart US$140 million. Pat Robertson claimed in 1985 that the overall operations of his Christian Broadcasting Network (CBN) took in US$230 million. In 1983, during a single hour the average televangelist asked the viewer to donate an average of US$328. Several televangelists have been accused of diverting money collected for mission projects to pay ongoing expenses. In 1983 CBN gave less than 8% of its total income to mission ministries, and Swaggart spent more than 80% of his income just keeping his programme on the air.

During the 1980s the televangelists' international influence was considerable. Jerry Falwell generated US political support for the role of Israel during the Palestinian crisis. Robertson's CBN was deeply involved in raising funds in support of the contras during the Nicaraguan war. Swaggart held huge rallies in Latin America and was accused of preaching virulent anti-Catholicism and of starting churches with a promise of funds and staff – which never materialized. Many such evangelists considered their chief mission to be the exportation of US-style fundamentalism overseas.

By 1987 the electronic church encountered serious difficulties. As more televangelists sought a share of the relatively small audience, appeals became more desperate. Several leading figures ran afoul of their own puritan ethic. By 1988 scandals and controversies had caused all the major televangelists to suffer a decline, in some cases by as much as one-third to one-half, of their funding and audience. However, though the phenomenon of the electronic church has currently faltered, it seems certain that in the future new forms of electronically expressed evangelistic fervour will emerge in broadcasting.

ENCYCLICALS

AN ENCYCLICAL was originally a circular letter (Greek enkyklos) on matters of faith* or church discipline,* usually from a bishop to some Christian local churches* (e.g. 1 Pet.) or to all. In the 2nd century, Ignatius of Antioch, who found it “impossible to write to all the churches”, urged Polycarp of Smyrna to bring the far-flung early Christian communities in touch with one another through the exchange of encyclicals. The letter from the Christians of Smyrna on Polycarp’s martyrdom was addressed “to all the congregations of the holy and catholic church in every place”. Between the 3rd and 5th centuries, the bishops of Alexandria customarily addressed all the other bishops. It became usual for the Eastern patriarchs to send encyclicals to fellow bishops of “sister churches”.*

In modern times, both Constantinople and Rome have issued encyclicals on the restoration of Christian unity* (see encyclicals, Orthodox; encyclicals, Roman Catholic). The bishops of Rome have also issued ecumenically significant letters on social questions (see encyclicals, Roman Catholic social).

TOM STRANSKY

ENCYCLICALS, ORTHODOX

THE IMPORTANCE of the encyclicals and other comparable statements of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople dealing with Christian unity* stems from the recognition of the “primacy of honour” which the patriarch of Constantinople has among the hierarchs of the Orthodox church. This entry treats the 20th-century statements of the church of Constantinople on ecumenical topics, which have been a particular source of guidance for those Orthodox engaged in interchurch dialogue.

On 12 June 1902 Patriarch Joachim addressed the first encyclical to the other autocephalous Orthodox churches which raised the question of theological dialogue with the West. Following responses to this letter, another encyclical was issued on 12 May 1904. While lamenting proselytism,* the letter expressed the real possibility of discussion with the Old Catholics and the Anglicans, who had already made overtures. The letter concluded by calling for meetings of Orthodox theologians of the various churches and by noting opposition at that time to a change in the calendar (see church calendar).

The historic encyclical of January 1920 – addressed “unto all the churches of Christ, wheresoever they be”, frequently regarded as one of the founding documents of the contemporary ecumenical movement – called for the establishment of a “fellowship of churches” which would work for charitable cooperation and theological dialogue. Calling for an end to mistrust and proselytism, the letter claimed that rapprochement could begin despite doctrinal differences, and it listed areas of potential cooperation and dialogue.

On the eve of the establishment of the WCC in 1948, the patriarchate addressed an encyclical to the other autocephalous Orthodox churches on 4 February 1947 soliciting opinions regarding the nature of Orthodox participation. Another encyclical followed on 31 January 1952 in advance of the third world conference on Faith and Order. In this letter the patriarchate advocated representation from all Orthodox churches in the WCC, cautious participation in the meetings of F&O, and very prudent participation in ecumenical services of prayer. The letter also urged the Orthodox churches to cooperate in common studies of themes to be discussed by the WCC and to encourage their theologians to examine issues related to ecumenism. Eight Orthodox jurisdictions were among the founding members of the WCC, and Orthodox theologians had been involved in F&O from its beginning.

The patriarchal tome of 7 December 1965 lifted and removed from memory the anathemas* pronounced in 1054 against those who had excommunicated Patriarch Michael. The "Lifting of the Anathemas of 1054" proclaimed in this document by Patriarch Athenagoras and the synod and also in the brief Ambulate in Dilectione issued by Pope Paul VI is frequently regarded as the beginning of a new phase in the relationship between Orthodoxy and Roman Catholicism marked by episcopal visits, the return of relics and theological discussions.

In the midst of such dramatic developments, the patriarchate issued the encyclical of 14 March 1967 addressed to bishops of the church of Constantinople. The text affirmed that intercommunion* between Orthodox and other churches did not exist as yet. While commending the progress of the ecumenical movement, the encyclical reaffirmed the view that full sacramental communion* can follow only from doctrinal agreement.

Noting the 25th anniversary of the WCC, a "Declaration of the Ecumenical Patriarchate" was published on 16 August 1973. The text acknowledged the many advances in interchurch relations and commended the activity of the WCC. Note was also taken of the valuable contributions of the Orthodox to the work of the WCC. Mindful of the difficulties of the time, the text also challenged the WCC to avoid the dangers of "secular ecumenism", to be in service to the churches in their quest for unity and to remain faithful to its constitution, which emphasized the goal of Christian reconciliation.* The text also called for the full inclusion of the Roman Catholic Church into the WCC.

Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople addressed a significant letter to the WCC on 30 November 1998 in anticipation of the eighth assembly in Harare. He noted that "a series of liberal theological and moral positions" had entered the life of the Council and stated that one of the major tasks of the assembly was to "re-define the nature of the WCC and re-orient its work, continuing the debate on the churches' common vision and understanding of the WCC". He favoured the option of the churches "shaping the WCC as a fellowship in which, through being, working, reflecting theologically and witnessing together, and above all by sharing a common vision of what the church is, they will come to a point confessing not only the one Lord but also the one church". The patriarch recognized the difficulties of this "eclesiological challenge" and, at the same time, affirmed "the imperative of an Orthodox participation in the WCC 'on an equal footing'".

ENCYCLICALS, ROMAN CATHOLIC

IN THE Roman Catholic Church, a papal encyclical is a formal letter, signed by the pope, on doctrinal, ethical, social or disciplinary matters, written for the entire RCC as a means of maintaining unity* of “faith and morals”. The letters are identified by the opening words, usually in Latin. From the first modern one, Benedict XIV’s Ubi Primum on bishops’ duties (1740), until those of John XXIII (1958-63), the letters were directed to “patriarchs, primates, archbishops, bishops and other local ordinaries in peace and communion with the apostolic see” (of Rome). Beginning with John XXIII’s Pacem in Terris (1963), recent popes have addressed social encyclicals on justice and peace not only to the RCC but also to “all people of good will”.

The popes’ use of encyclicals varies. Pius VIII wrote only one, in 1829. John Paul I, pope for only one month in 1978, wrote none; his successor John Paul II had written 13 by the end of 2000. The topics also vary, from Clement XIII’s Christianae Reipublicae (1766), which condemned all publications not in line with Catholic dogma; to Pius XI’s bitter condemnation of Nazism in Mit Brennender Sorge (1937); to Pius XII’s Munificentissimus Deus (1950) which declared the bodily assumption of Mary as a dogma of faith; to Paul VI’s insistence on celibacy for all Latin-rite priests in Sacerdotalis Coelibatus (1967); to John Paul II’s on faith and reason, Fides et Ratio (1998).

Although the Second Vatican Council* acknowledged that “in writing such letters, the popes do not exercise the supreme power of their teaching authority” (Lumen Gentium 25), it is impossible to generalize about the exact degree of authority* encyclicals bear and about the quality of consent to their contents they require of Catholics. Each encyclical and its sections must be evaluated in terms of what is proposed and how, in the context of the teachings of Vatican II, the writings of theologians and other papal pronouncements. No matter how different his approach and content may be, each pope likes to present his teaching as being in direct continuity with his predecessors; to challenge that earlier teaching would call in question his own authority.

In the 19th century popes used encyclicals as appeals “to the Orientals” to re-unite with Rome, and they were answered by Orthodox patriarchal encyclicals. Such an appeal in Pius IX’s In Suprema Petri Apostoli Sede (1848) received the united response of the Orthodox patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem, whose encyclical defined “papism” as a heresy* and expressed the hope that Pius IX would himself be “converted” to “the true catholic, apostolic and Orthodox church”. In 1894 Leo XIII addressed a new appeal to “return” in Praeclara Gratulationis. Anthimos, ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople, responded negatively; he envisaged reunion, but only on the basis of the undivided faith of the first centuries.

From its side, the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople in 1920 issued an encyclical to “all the churches of Christ everywhere”. Despite their doctrinal differences, the churches should come closer to one another by “the removal and abolition of all mutual mistrust and bitterness” and in frank exchange of Christian thought and love, “for the preparation and advancement of that blessed union which would be completed in the future in accordance with the will of God”. On the side of Rome, Pius XI’s Mortalium Animos (1928) forbade RCs to participate in ecumenical gatherings and pleaded for “the return to the one true church of Christ of those who are separated from it” (see RCC and pre-Vatican II ecumenism).

In many ways, the first positive papal response to the 1920 letter of the Patriarchate of Constantinople was John XXIII’s first encyclical, Ad Petri Cathedram (June 1959). He outlined the ecumenical intentions of the forthcoming Vatican II with no appeals to one-way return to the see of Rome but with a call for the renewal of the RCC as an “example of truth, unity and love”. Paul VI’s first encyclical, Ecclesiam Suam (Aug. 1964), greeted all Christians “with love and reverence, in the hope that we may promote together, even more effectively, the cause of Christ and the unity which he desired for his church, in the dialogue of sincerity and love”.

In many encyclicals Paul VI and John Paul II at least mentioned the ecumenical dimension of a specific topic, and Paul VI highlighted the scandal of Christian divisions and the urgency of common witness* in his magisterial Evangelii Nuntiandi on evangelization (Dec. 1975). But the first encyclical devoted entirely to the RCC as an active participant in the ecumenical movement is John Paul II's Ut Unum Sint,* on commitment to ecumenism (1995).

ENCYCLICALS, ROMAN CATHOLIC SOCIAL

ENCYCLICALS,* or solemn letters which popes write for the universal Roman Catholic Church, are the major means by which the modern papacy directly proposes teachings on the political, social, economic and international order. The RCC has never elaborated a complete doctrinal system in social matters, but has responded to new issues and to the religious and secular controversies surrounding them. But one can discern in hindsight a developing and coherent Catholic social teaching in the more than 100 papal social documents from Leo XIII (1878-1903) to John Paul II (1978-). This categorization should not be applied too rigidly, for papal texts which would not be classified as social encyclicals may include elements relevant to Catholic social teaching, e.g. the papal teachings regarding conjugal love and responsibility (no artificial contraception) in Humanae Vitae (Paul VI, 1968) and Evangelium Vitae (John Paul II, 1995) directly challenge certain governments' population policies.

Until Vatican II* (1962-65), the popes and RC ethicists structured social teachings principally in philosophical categories, drawing on the long tradition of natural law,* e.g. the theory of justice, rooted in Aristotle and reshaped by Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). The language explicated the broad biblical vision, and the terms could appeal to the wider civil society. For example, the United Nations sponsored two forums on John XXIII's Pacem in Terris (1963), in which the pope quoted scripture only nine times. Only after Vatican II do biblical categories and language complement social philosophy, especially in the writings of John Paul II.

Vatican Council II's "The Church in the Modern World" (Gaudium et Spes) could not have been promulgated without the previous encyclicals and their generative influence on the interdisciplinary reflection and experiences of Catholics. Nor could Paul VI and John Paul II have written their social encyclicals without Vatican II's Gaudium et Spes and Dignitatis Humanae (on religious freedom), and without the "Justice in the World" statement of the 1971 bishops' synod. These two popes have used departments of the Roman curia,* in particular the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, for more detailed documents on specific issues, such as nuclear disarmament and the arms race, international banking and the disparity between the wealthy and the poor nations. Among the social encyclicals from Leo XIII to John Paul II, this entry highlights those which introduce key themes.

Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum (1891) outlined the fundamental principles regarding the nature of the modern secular state: it has positive moral responsibilities and is the ultimate guarantor of the rights of the person in society. Aware of the loss of the working classes to the church in the context of the wage economy emerging in the industrial society of Europe and North America, Leo XIII began the papal teaching tradition on the rights and duties of management, workers and the state, the protection of workers against exploitation, their right to just wages and their right to organize themselves for protection and representation. He also introduced into social ethics the principle of subsidiarity* in the society-state relationship: to preserve as much freedom as possible, the responsibility for social needs should begin with the local or smallest institutional authority, and be referred to the state only when other institutions cannot meet those needs.

Forty years later (1931) Quadragesimo Anno of Pius XI introduced the concepts of social justice* and social charity as essential to the reconstruction of society, with stress on the role of the Christian laity* in such an apostolate.

On the eve of the second world war, Summi Pontificatus (1939) of Pius XII called the denial of the unity and solidarity* of the human race one of the major modern heresies. Various addresses of the pope towards the end of the war recognized that a juridically established international organization would be a necessary condition for world peace. Thus began a noticeable shift of focus in papal teachings from the nation to the international community.

John XXIII issued Mater et Magistra (1961) and Pacem in Terris (1963). The former developed social teaching on the balance between state-regulated activities and the freedom of individual and group enterprises. True prosperity is not only a matter of total national or international wealth but also of its just distribution. The imbalance between wealthy industrial nations and less-developed ones calls for richer nations to aid the others, but not to impose their way of life or seek political advantages from this, which would be "another form of colonialism". Pacem in Terris advocated human freedom* and dignity as the basis for world order* and peace, and proposed that a proper philosophy of law* be based on conformity between human legislation and the laws of God. The pope pleaded for the cessation of the arms race, the banning of nuclear weapons and the negotiating of a general disarmament.

As a direct consequence of Vatican II's declaration on religious freedom, Paul VI took almost for granted an explicit shift in the RCC's public posture – "from a claim to favouritism to a claim for freedom" (J. Bryan Hehir). The ecclesiological shift guaranteed the transcendence of the church in the face of any and all political regimes, and at the same time depoliticized the social role of the church by withdrawing it from dependence on or alliance with any specific civil power.

Populorum Progressio (1967) expressed the RC social conscience in regard to poverty and wealth. It dealt with "development of those peoples who are striving to escape from hunger, misery, endemic disease and ignorance; of those who are looking for a wider share in the benefits of civilization and a more active improvement of their human qualities; of those who are aiming purposefully at their complete fulfilment". Denouncing "the scandal of glaring inequalities not merely in the enjoyment of possession, but even more in the exercise of power", Paul VI declared that "the superfluous wealth of rich countries should be placed at the service of poor nations. The new name for peace is development."

The development* theme, dominant in the 1960s, began to be eclipsed in the mid-1970s by the emergence of human rights* issues, so that John Paul II could say in 1979: "After all, peace comes down to respect for man's inviolable rights" (Redemptor Hominis). John Paul II's Laborem Exercens (1981) reflects the pope's extended, critical dialogue with Marxism. Labour* is the key for understanding people's historical vocation* and societal projects; through labour people create their social world, and in so doing they in some sense create themselves. The pope offers a critical analysis of Western capitalism* and Eastern collectivism by spelling out the principle of "the priority of labour over capital". If capital does not serve the whole of working society, the economic system will generate injustices, exclude some from the very wealth they produce and create hardships among the majority. The violation of the principle of labour over capital is the reason for the crises of unemployment, inflation, insecurity and growing poverty in most societies.

The uniqueness of John Paul II's social writings is his entering into the Marxist perspective of understanding society and history largely in terms of human labour. But by insisting that for the unity of nations one must move "from class war to solidarity", he plays down class conflict by recommending the widest diffusion of power throughout society and repeats Paul VI's warning that "the most revolutionary ideologies lead only to a change of masters" (Octagesimo Adveniens, 1971). After Rome's nervous criticisms of Latin American liberation theology, Sollicitudo Rei Socialis (1987) adopted some of its language in speaking of "structural sin" and "a preferential but not exclusive option for the poor".

In papal teaching, persons are necessarily the "foundation, cause and end of all social institutions" (John XXIII), because the human person is a divinely created social being and raised to an order of existence that transcends nature. Authority,* required by God's moral law, must strive for the respectful recognition and caring promotion of the individual's basic rights in the context of the common good – the total of those conditions of social life by which persons are enabled more fully to achieve their own authentic fulfillment. Justice demands respect for human rights, but rights are always relative; they can be neither specified nor understood apart from the web of social interdependence, which involves mutual duties and responsibilities in human relationships, whether economic, social, cultural or political.

This understanding of justice joins a Christian morality of love in “solidarity” – the willing acceptance, support and promotion of the selfhood and freedom of others. Love does not substitute for justice, but without love justice becomes a lifeless theory and can neither be adequately conceptualized nor effectively realized in action. “Justice alone can even lead to the negation and destruction of itself, if that deeper power of love is not allowed to shape human life in its various dimensions” (Dives in Misericordia, 1980).

Centisimus Annus (1991), written to mark the 100th anniversary of Rerum Novarum, is John Paul II's synthesis of RC social teaching as “an essential part of the Christian message” and thus directly relevant to the church's evangelizing mission. This encyclical clearly shifts away from an “ideology of answers” to social, political and economic crises, to a pragmatic recognition that all issues are laden with diverse, imperfect historical and circumstantial contingencies. Former papal claims to identify concrete demands for social justice with precision have now ceded to an “epistemological humility”. The church has “something to say about specific human situations”, “its message gives direction”, but “its analysis is not meant to pass definitive judgments, since this does not fall as such (per se) within the magisterium's specific domain”. Finally, the church's “social message will gain credibility more immediately from the witness of actions than as a result of its internal logic and consistency”.

ENVIRONMENT/ECOLOGY

“THE EARTH is the Lord's and all that is in it” (Ps. 24:1a). Familiar as this passage is, only in the relatively recent past have Christian theology and the ecumenical movement come to recognize threats to the well-being of the earth as posing fundamental issues of faith. As the urgency of environmental problems is increasingly recognized, Christians and persons of other faiths around the world are responding in various ways.

The origins of the current ecological crisis can be traced to the scientific and industrial revolutions. Perceptions of the relationship between human beings and the rest of creation changed as science and technology* found new ways to manipulate the natural world. No longer were humans viewed as exclusively at the mercy of the forces of nature. Now, humankind was seen as gaining power to control aspects of nature and to reconstitute them for human purposes. In many ways, Western Christian theology, scientific endeavour and industrial development reinforced each other in elevating the image of the human as the pinnacle of God's creation.* The natural world lost its mystery and sacredness and came to be perceived only as a resource for human exploitation.

As the 20th century progressed, Western industrial development produced not only material benefits for human communities but also by-products with unanticipated destructive consequences for the environment, including toxic wastes, acid rain and greenhouse gases leading to climate change. Energy production has been a source of particular environmental problems related to nuclear power, fossil-fuel use and large-scale hydro-electric dams. Colonialism* and subsequent forms of economic exploitation led to serious environmental problems in developing countries as natural and human resources were exploited to meet the material demands of Europe and North America and the servicing of international debt.

While there have always been some religiously-motivated acts of resistance to the industrial exploitation of nature, it is only over the past 30 years that serious concern has emerged within the ecumenical movement about the environmental impacts of technology and economic development. Discussion began surfacing in some denominations and theological institutions in the 1960s. At a consultation in Bucharest in 1974, organized as part of a WCC study on science and technology, scientists, economists and theologians discussed implications of the recently-published study of the Club of Rome, Limits to Growth. Out of this meeting came the concept of "sustainability"* – the idea that the future of the world requires a vision of development that can be sustained for the long-term, both economically and environmentally – which would later become prominent in international discussions. The next year the WCC assembly in Nairobi initiated a programme on the just, participatory and sustainable society* (JPSS). Within the JPSS focus, the "Energy for My Neighbour" programme sought to sensitize churches about energy problems faced by developing countries and to activate practical steps to ameliorate the energy situation of those in need. Environmental issues were further highlighted at the 1979 world conference on "Faith, Science and the Future" at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

In 1983, the WCC assembly in Vancouver called for a conciliar process on Justice, Peace and Integrity of Creation* (JPIC), through which churches were encouraged to work together on these three themes in recognition of their inter-relatedness. A growing number of churches became increasingly attentive to environmental concerns, adopting policy statements and initiating education and advocacy on specific issues. The JPIC process culminated in a world convocation (Seoul 1990), which adopted ten theological affirmations and four specific covenants for action, providing an overview of the inter-relatedness of economic inequity, militarism, ecological destruction and racial injustice, as well as a theological, ethical and spiritual basis for affirming and sustaining life in its fullness.

From the early 1970s on, a growing number of theologians and ethicists began reflecting about creation and the place of humans within it, propelled in part by criticism from environmentalists that the Judaeo-Christian heritage, with its traditional teachings of human dominion over creation, bore a significant degree of responsibility for the ecological crisis. While this theological work may have begun by re-analyzing these teachings, it moved on to articulate a new understanding of the place of humans within the natural world, emphasizing an appreciation of human dependence on nature and of the need to respect and protect it. Insights from Orthodoxy, drawing on patristic sources often unknown or forgotten in Western Christian theology, were re-discovered as part of the Christian theological heritage with particular contemporary relevance. Orthodox churches began to mark the first day of September each year as a day on the church calendar set aside for special prayers asking for the preservation of God's creation and "the adoption of the attitude to nature involved in the eucharist and the ascetic tradition of the church". Important contributions to the ecumenical debate were also made by process theologians such as John Cobb Jr and Charles Birch, stewardship theologians such as Douglas John Hall, and creation theologians, including Thomas Berry and Matthew Fox. Feminist theologians (e.g. Rosemary Radford Ruether, Elizabeth Dobson Gray, Sallie McFague, Chung Hyun Kyung) moved the reflection deeper by analyzing the connections between oppression of nature and oppression of women and by developing ecologically sensitive models for organizing human relationships and societies. Indigenous theologians such as George Tinker and Stan McKay also had an important influence on the development of Christian ecological theology through their writings on Native spirituality. The direction of the most adventurous thinking in ecological theology is towards an understanding of humans as an inter-related species within the totality of God's creation, an appreciation of the inherent worth of other species not just in terms of their value to humans and an awareness of the presence of the Spirit of God throughout creation.

Christian theologians also met with leaders of other religions to explore elements from within their faith traditions and sacred writings which could contribute to moving human societies towards greater respect for the natural world. One such occasion was an interfaith consultation hosted by the WCC in 1991 to develop proposals for inclusion in an "Earth Charter" in connection with the 1992 UN conference on environment and development in Rio de Janeiro.

The Rio Earth Summit was an opportunity for witnessing to the spiritual dimensions of the ecological crisis, and many faiths were represented there, holding joint vigils, ceremonies and workshops. The WCC sponsored a major ecumenical gathering, which brought 150 representatives of churches from more than 100 countries for two weeks of prayer, worship, study and involvement in events around the UN conference. Important connections were made with many other non-governmental organizations representing environmental groups, development bodies and women's networks. As a follow-up, the WCC published in 1994 Ecotheology: Voices from South and North, an anthology of creative theological and ethical thinking from around the world on the themes of environment and development. In 2002 on the 10th anniversary of the Rio Earth Summit, the WCC participated actively in the World Summit for Sustainable Development in Johannesburg in collaboration with the South African Council of Churches.

As part of the longer history of ecumenical socio-economic thought, the analysis of environment and development themes has led to a serious critique of current theories and policies which promote unlimited economic growth. Many believe that such economic systems simultaneously exacerbate economic inequities in the world and precipitate serious environmental destruction – a view succinctly summarized in the theme of a 1993 consultation sponsored by the WCC-related Visser 't Hooft Fund: "Sustainable Growth: A Contradiction in Terms?"

An environmental problem which illustrates well this interconnection of economics and ecology is climate change. The emissions from industrial processes, energy production through fossil fuels, transportation and various agricultural practices are gradually warming the atmosphere, leading to climatic changes such as increased storm activity, droughts in some areas and floods in others, and rising sea levels. The pressures for increased material consumption and globalized trade steadily increase the rate of emissions. Not only does climate change represent a threat to the well-being of God's earth but it is also a profoundly ethical issue, since it is largely precipitated by the rich industrialized countries while its consequences will be suffered disproportionately by the poorer developing countries and by future generations.

Climate change thus became a major focus for international ecumenical activity on ecological issues. The ecumenical community through the WCC has participated in the UN negotiations on climate change treaties. In 1996-97, the WCC sponsored an international petition campaign to build greater public pressure on the governments of industrialized countries to take action to reduce their emissions. Churches in many countries have organized education and advocacy and have sponsored ethical reflections on climate change within the context of models for sustainable societies.

EPICLESIS

IN THEOLOGICAL language, epiclesis (from the Greek epikalein, "to call upon", "to invoke") is a special invocation asking for the Holy Spirit* to be sent. It finds a place within a variety of liturgical celebrations, especially in the eucharistic formulas (see eucharist).

The eucharistic liturgy is addressed to the Father and asks for the Holy Spirit to be sent down either upon the elements (the bread and wine) so that they can be transformed into the body and blood of Christ, or on those partaking of the eucharist so that they can be sanctified and united by communion, or on both, with the same results.

In the Eastern tradition this invocation comes at the end of the anamnesis – the relatively detailed account of the institution of the Last Supper by Christ, which also recalls the main stages in the work of salvation* (cross, resurrection, ascension, etc.). The epiclesis thus represents a conclusion or climax to the anamnesis. A sequence of this kind is found in the early documents, especially those from Antioch (end of the 4th century).

In the West most current eucharistic formulas have two epicleses, in line with a custom attested in a document from Alexandria from the mid-4th century. The first, which comes before the words of institution of the supper, asks for the Holy Spirit to be sent down upon the species to transform them; the second, at the end of the anamnesis (as in the Eastern documents), asks for the Spirit to be sent down on the members of the congregation to sanctify and unite them.

Controversies have taken place between East and West, mainly from the 14th to the 17th centuries, regarding the part played by the epiclesis and its function in relation to the words of institution of the supper. More recently, this has yielded to an overall view that it is the eucharistic anaphora as a whole which, among other things, has the effect of transforming the gifts and sanctifying those taking part. This idea is more in accord with a view which pre-dated any controversy, since the epiclesis is bound up with the element that precedes it within the eucharistic prayer; it displays the reality according to which every liturgical action is carried out in and by the Holy Spirit. The place of the epiclesis in the eucharistic prayer as a whole has not changed through the ages, but both the meaning given to that prayer and the theology of the Holy Spirit underlying it have been the subject of clarifying statements.

The controversy about the epiclesis related to whether that prayer was or was not one of consecration, and this prompted the parties in the dispute to look for a particular moment in the anaphora at which the consecration of the gifts might be said to take place. The polemical atmosphere led them to a hardening of positions, each side defining its position in opposition or reaction to the other's. Thus in the West the words of institution alone, pronounced by the celebrant, were affirmed to have consecrating force. Those in the East then thought it necessary to look for another element in the eucharistic anaphora which would fulfill the same function; they believed they could find it in the epiclesis. The doctrinal disadvantage of such a confrontation lies in its reductionist character: on the one hand, the consecration of the gifts is not the sole aim or effect of the eucharistic celebration, which contains an infinite number of other riches (sanctification of those taking part, re-presentation of the work of salvation, participation in anticipation in the benefits of the coming kingdom, to mention only a few), only in part accounted for in the theological statements (see 1 Cor. 11:26); on the other hand, to look for a specific moment in the anaphora at which the transformation is effected is inevitably to fragment the liturgical elements which go to make up this celebration and thus to lose the indissoluble link that binds them together.

Thus anamnesis, the recapitulation of the work of the Son, is of no avail without epiclesis, the invocation of the Holy Spirit as the Power which re-presents. The Son has fulfilled the Father's will on earth and has ascended again into heaven (see John 14:31b, 16:5a); since then the Spirit has been at work and will be to the end of the age (Rom. 8:22,26), re-presenting (John 16:13) the work of the Son, which has been accomplished once for all (Heb. 10:12). The process of re-presentation by the Holy Spirit is effected particularly during each eucharistic celebration, and it is the epiclesis which expresses and displays this reality.

The contribution of the ecumenical movement in this field consists first of all in abandoning the controversy about consecration: it appears that most now accept the transformation of the eucharistic species into the body and blood of the Lord as one of the effects of celebrating the eucharist as a whole – but not as the sole effect. The text on the eucharist in the Faith and Order Lima document on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* stresses the “intrinsic link” between the words of institution and the epiclesis, as expressing in each celebration the complementary role of the Son and the Spirit. The old idea that it is the whole eucharistic prayer which brings about the reality promised by Christ is recalled as a model to be followed (E14 comm.). The argument about a particular moment for the consecration is thus transcended in this document.

Ecumenical encounters have made it possible to improve the enunciation of the doctrine on the Holy Spirit, a doctrine closely related to the presence of the epiclesis within the eucharistic anaphora. The role of the Holy Spirit makes the work of the Son present in every liturgical celebration; it is the invoked Holy Spirit who guarantees the sanctification,* empowering and unification sought for the congregation meeting together (E17). According to another text, the eucharistic epiclesis exhibits the presence of the Holy Spirit, who through the perceptible gestures and words alone accomplishes an eschatological reality which remains invisible (Pour la communion des Eglises, 152-53). This text thus stresses the personal, active character of the Holy Spirit in eucharistic celebration, a character clearly expressed in the petitions of the epiclesis.

EPISCOPACY

SINCE THE beginning of ecumenical conversations, the episcopacy has proved a difficult topic to tackle, both in theory and in practice. The Lambeth Quadrilateral* of 1888 included “the historic episcopate, locally adapted in the method of its administration to the varying needs of the nations and peoples called of God into the unity of his church”. On the other hand, Lutheran churches showed reserve towards restoration of the episcopacy as a condition of unity,* either among themselves or with other churches, because of their commitment to the principle of the one ministry of word and sacrament. Congregationalists, for their part, did not wish to see the episcopacy undermine the autonomy of local congregations. When the Orthodox churches and later the Roman Catholic Church eventually entered ecumenical conversations, they did so with the presuppositions that the episcopacy is of divine origin and cannot be called into question. This was a stronger position than that of the Anglicans, who wished to retain it in any church unification, without necessarily having to resolve the matter of its doctrinal foundations.

Concrete union schemes involving churches of different origins and polity had to decide on what was to be done about the episcopate. Most significant ecumenically was that of the Church of South India, which united in 1947 after many years of preparation. This plan brought together the local Anglican church and some non-episcopal churches into one episcopal church, but without calling into question the authenticity of the previously exercised ministry of the non-episcopal churches and without demanding re-ordination. A somewhat different plan was followed in North India in 1971. There the mutual recognition of ministries and their assumption into one episcopally structured church involved a mutual laying on of hands. Also to be noted in this connection are discussions within Lutheran churches about the possible restoration of the episcopacy in synods which did not retain it after the Reformation, both for unification of Lutheran churches themselves and for their communion with other bodies.

The section on ministry in the Lima text on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* (BEM) presents the theoretical foundations of these discussions and reflects a policy that is widely talked of even if it is not to the satisfaction of all. It gives precedence to the one ministry over the issue of its structure and gives priority to the apostolic succession of churches over the position of the episcopacy in the church as its sign ("serving, symbolizing and guarding the continuity of the apostolic faith and communion"). In asking for the possible restoration of the episcopacy in churches that have not maintained it, as key to the tripartite form of ministry, BEM presents it as an historical phenomenon of quite early origins and of some significance to the life of the church, rather than as something that dates from the apostles or that is absolutely essential to the church. It also admits a possible diversity in the forms which episcopate could take.

A number of bilateral statements within recent years have emphasized that the historical episcopal ministry serves the continuity of churches within the apostolic Tradition.* They have chosen to relate this ministry to the koinonia* which is a participation of the whole church,* beginning with the local church,* in the communion* of the Trinity.* They also relate the apostolic succession of the episcopacy to the apostolic Tradition of the whole church, so that its relation to the communion of churches stands out clearly. In like manner, whatever institutional and historic importance is given to the historic episcopacy, they make it clear that it does not stand by itself but is there to serve the ministry of word and sacrament.

In agreements intended to serve the full communion of Anglican and Lutheran churches in Europe (Porvoo communion*) and the USA (see Anglican-Lutheran dialogue), the understanding of the historic episcopacy has been clarified. Communion must include the recognition of the role of the historic episcopacy, and its value as a sign. In acknowledgment of the relation of the historic episcopacy to the intention of Christ and to the work of the Spirit, its inclusion in the structures of all the uniting churches is stated as a condition of full communion. The point that the continuity in succession of the historic episcopacy could be visibly restored while acknowledging the reality of God's gift of ministry to the churches in their separation had already been made in 1984 by the Anglican-Reformed International Commission; hence, these more recent moves towards full communion give recogniton to the ministries, past and present, of those churches in which at some point and under special circumstances the historic succession was broken, thereby asserting the nature of the episcopacy in its service to the primacy of word and sacrament in justification.* As far as the essential constitution of the church is concerned, the episcopacy must not seem to have the same place in the church as the gospel and the dominical sacraments, even while its visible reality as a sign of unity is affirmed.

In the conversations between the Anglican communion and the Roman Catholic Church (see Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue), ARCIC II responded to problems raised about the place of the episcopacy in the documents of ARCIC I by affirming that ordained ministry is an essential element of the church and that only the episcopally ordained priest presides at the eucharist.* ARCIC II affirmed the role of episcopal succession in the church in maintaining the communion of churches in the open apostolic Tradition. However, it further expressed the importance of the sacramental continuity of the episcopacy which expresses the communion of churches across time and space.

Some other churches have not given the reclaiming of the historic episcopacy the same importance in their efforts to move towards full communion. The consultation on united and uniting churches in Jamaica in 1995 saw the need to embody their unity in a recognition of structures within congregational churches, but did not give the primacy to episcopal structures found in other dialogues. The 1992 report on the dialogue between the Disciples of Christ and the Roman Catholic Church noted their differences on ministry: the Disciples of Christ continue to affirm the work of ministry shared in local congregations by ordained ministers and ordained elders, while the Roman Catholic Church adheres to the relation of all ministry to the essential episcopacy. The report, however, affirms the shared view of the importance of apostolic community and salvation* within this community.

As their respective responses to BEM show, the Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches are satisfied with nothing less than sacramental continuity of the episcopacy, however much it needs to be related to the apostolic Tradition of communities and to the service of word and sacrament. In the joint statement on the sacrament of order issued at Valamo, Finland, in 1988, the Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue* commission bluntly stated that the bishops are the successors of the apostles and that the episcopacy is the fullness of the priesthood, by which the ministry of Christ himself is exercised in the church. While this sacramental continuity is affirmed, the statement likewise concurs that episcopal succession is not independent of the apostolic succession of the church as such, and that it includes a succession in teaching and apostolic witness, as well as in sacramental ministry. While these churches recognize some development of church ministry in the early period of the church, they teach that the eventual form of the episcopacy is divinely intended and belongs to the essential constitution of the church.

All ecumenical discussion on the episcopacy keeps certain historical realities in mind. The plurality of church structures in NT times is widely acknowledged, as is the uncertainty about the meaning of the word "episcopos" where it occurs. Also recognized is the diversity in the form of the episcopacy in earliest apostolic times, as evidenced for example in the difference between the episcopate as portrayed in the letters of Ignatius of Antioch and the more collegiate form practised in Alexandria. It is also quite clear that there is considerable difference between the role of the bishop in early centuries as minister of the eucharist, teacher and judge in local communities, and that of the medieval episcopacy, with its characteristic of juridical authority over a broader domain. It was on this account that scholastic theologians often described the episcopacy as an office rather than an order and sacrament.

Historical enquiries have also probed the reasons why parts of the Lutheran Reformation rejected or abandoned the historic episcopate. It is clear that the fundamental Lutheran commitment was to the work of ministry and dominical sacrament in the work of justification, and that questions of ministerial structure would not allow of any obstacle to this ministry. It was in this context that the council of Trent,* in its decree on order, pronounced on the divine origin of the episcopacy and its superiority to the presbyterate.* On the other hand, although Trent rejected the legitimacy of ordinations performed outside the historic episcopal succession, it did not assert their invalidity. The Anglican communion on its side kept the episcopacy, but without any confessional commitment to its sacramental nature, to priesthood or to notions of linear succession.

Several characteristics of current ecumenical conversation pave the way to further agreement and communion. Beginning with the teaching on the sacramental nature of the episcopacy and its role within the communion of other ministries and charisms at the Second Vatican Council,* the Roman Catholic Church places the episcopacy within a communion of eucharist and word that is shared by all the faithful. The Valamo Orthodox-Roman Catholic statement expresses a clear ecclesial perception of apostolic succession that puts the notion of historic succession in fuller context. Some theologians have even questioned the possibility of more collegiate forms of episcopate than those presently known.

In bilateral agreements the image of koinonia that serves to express a communion in faith, baptism and eucharist, which is itself a communion in the life of the Trinity, qualifies the discussion of the episcopacy. In this context, there seems to be more ready acceptance of the episcopacy as what BEM calls "a sign, though not a guarantee, of the continuity and unity of the church" (M38). With this view of the nature of church communion, episcopally ordered churches have also left more room to recognize what has been, or is, done by a different form of episcopate or oversight. While there is thus still a lack of consensus on how the episcopacy belongs to the constitution of the church and on the extent of communion between episcopally and non-episcopally ordered churches, the question of the episcopacy allows of some further development. It is not an obstacle to the recognition that churches can give each other within a koinonia of faith, worship and Christian witness, however structurally limited this may be.

ESCHATOLOGY

ESCHATOLOGY as logos (discourse) about the eschaton (the end) explicates the doctrine of "the last things". It presents the Christian understanding of future events, such as death (see life and death) and resurrection,* the last judgment and the end of the world, eternal damnation (hell) and eternal life (heaven). In scholastic textbooks of theology eschatology was the last chapter of dogmatics, and it stood in a certain discontinuity with its main corpus. Today, a consensus has developed among the various schools of theology that the eschatological perspective is basic to the understanding of the Christian faith, and Christian theology from beginning to end is considered eschatological.

The principal reasons for the contemporary emphasis on eschatology are the rediscovery by biblical scholars of the eschatological nature of the Christian gospel and the philosophical appreciation of the role of hope* in human existence. The recovery of biblical eschatology began in Protestant circles at the turn into the 20th century with the seminal studies of Johannes Weiss and Albert Schweitzer investigating the nature of God's kingdom* in the New Testament. They argued that Jesus' message about the imminent coming of God's kingdom should be understood in continuity with the Jewish apocalyptic world-view, and that Jesus expected the establishment of God's kingdom to take place in the immediate future not as a result of human endeavours but as the final and decisive intervention of God in history.* C.H. Dodd further advanced the discussion on the nature of God's kingdom by examining the time factor in the coming of the kingdom in the teaching of Jesus. He argued that for Jesus the kingdom of God was realized in his own ministry and therefore his eschatology was already "realized". The fact that the kingdom of God was already present in the ministry of Jesus was then recognized by biblical scholarship, but it was also noticed that in some sayings of Jesus – especially in the parables – the coming kingdom of God is both a present and a future event. Joachim Jeremias modified the concept of realized eschatology into "inaugurated eschatology", or eschatology in the process of being realized. This view implied that the salvation* and the judgment already begun in the ministry of Jesus will come to a future climax.

Eschatology as the starting point of all theology inevitably affected the understanding of the Christian gospel and consequently the understanding of the church's nature and mission.* In the context of the ecumenical movement, this influence helped the churches to understand themselves as dynamic communities of God's presence in the world, which find their true nature and fulfilment in the coming reality of God's kingdom.

As early as the first conference of the Faith and Order* movement (Lausanne 1927), participating theologians urged the divided Christians to discover their unity* in the future, in proclaiming the coming kingdom of God. Such exhortations were immediately criticized for not giving adequate attention to what the church* had already become through the power of the Holy Spirit and its identification with Jesus Christ. The second world conference on F&O (Edinburgh 1937) tried to synthesize these two views but could not draw any systematic conclusions as to their meaning for divided Christianity. It was agreed that the church, although it intrinsically relates to God's kingdom, cannot be fully identified with it, since the fullness of the kingdom is a future reality. This theme was further developed in the ongoing theological reflections of the WCC; and the biblical image of “the people of God”* was used to describe the eschatological dimension of the church, while the concept “Body of Christ” signified what the people of God had already become through baptism* and participation in the eucharist.*

The third world conference on F&O (Lund 1952) suggested that eschatology could help the churches to change and move from disunity into unity. This belief put eschatology at the centre of WCC theological reflection. The Evanston assembly of the WCC (1954), for which the theme was “Christ – the Hope of the World”, invited a detailed study of Christian eschatology in its relation to the unity and the witness* of God’s church. In the preparatory documents as well as in the actual proceedings of the assembly, a variety of opinions were expressed on the nature of Christian hope. It was suggested that history should be understood from its relation to its Lord, the crucified and risen Christ. Christian hope was understood as the confident affirmation that God is faithful and will complete what God has begun for the salvation of creation.* There was no speculation or agreement concerning the manner and the time of God’s final victory, but it was affirmed that the completion of God’s divine will for creation is not an abrogation of history but a redemption.* In Christ people are given a new mode of life which already constitutes the new age in process of fulfilment. It was also suggested that the correct balance of what has been given and what is still expected can be apprehended and experienced only in the Lord’s supper. The eschatological and ecclesiological significance of the eucharist received the attention of the F&O commission at Louvain (1971) and reached its climax in Lima (1982). The Lima text, Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry,* treats the eucharist as “meal of the kingdom” (E22).

Evanston had further stated that the main task of the church, as the community of those who have identified themselves with Jesus Christ, is to be both the instrument of God’s purpose in history and the first realization of the life of his kingdom on earth. It testifies to the nature of the end towards which its hope is set as the promised climax of what God has done and still continues to do for the created world. From this perspective the oneness of the church is a result of Christ’s eschatological and saving presence in the lives of various Christian communities, and it will become visibly manifested when the Lord will return in his glory to judge the living and the dead.

The fact that Christian hope is founded on God’s presence and action in history does not mean that Christians should abandon the world and its problems (see church and world). On the contrary, Evanston affirmed that the world, despite its fallen nature, continues to be a world created and sustained by God and that the vocation* of the church is to work for the realization in the world of the basic principles of justice,* peace* and freedom, realities that reflect the grace* of God in history. Concerning the theological significance of these endeavours, the preparatory documents emphasized that all human achievements are fragmentary, all responsibilities are subject to frustration and all hopes based on human power and wisdom alone are self-defeating. It was emphasized that whatever Christians accomplish in their involvement against the maladies of this world must not be considered as the manifestation of God’s perfect world. It is not known exactly how God will use the efforts of his people, or what degree of visible success he will grant to them in any particular project. Through their belief in God’s lordship over history, they are secure against despair, for they know that what they commit into God’s hands is safe. Thus Christians were challenged never to rest with any existent state of affairs, but rather to press unremittingly on towards a better and worthier future as it is destined to be by the merciful God.

At Evanston it was also stated that futurist eschatology could help the churches recognize the ambiguity and imperfection of all historical existence and knowledge. Since God cannot be fully identified with any historical institution or event, Christians must live by faith and hope without giving their historical understandings of truth an absoluteness which will be granted to them in the future by God. Orthodox theologians agreed that futurist eschatology could help the churches to move beyond their present divisions, but they insisted that it had to be balanced with what God has already done in history for the salvation of humankind. This insight made the churches aware that no escape into the future could heal the church's divisions if it ignored the serious ecumenical problem of lack of a common mind and language by which Christians could discover and express their God-given unity.

These concerns were taken seriously and discussed at the fourth world conference on F&O (Montreal 1963). There it was recognized that the Tradition (see Tradition and traditions) of the church is Jesus Christ himself, who is known to Christians through their traditions, which are expressions and manifestations in diverse historical forms of the one truth, which is Christ. Yet the churches could not agree whether all traditions which claim to be Christian contain undistorted the totality of Tradition. However, they continued to agree that the church, despite its possession of history and tradition, of settled institutions and abiding forms, is still characterized by an anticipation of the Saviour and the final reign of God. While the churches recognized the transcendental and the temporal aspects of God's kingdom, they continue to be vague or rather uncertain about its exact relation to the church.

After Evanston, eschatology was never ignored in the theological deliberations of the WCC and particularly the discussions of the F&O commission. Either the assembly themes of the WCC and of the F&O commission were eschatological, or their particular subjects were discussed from an eschatological perspective. The Second Vatican Council,* with the publication of its Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, affirmed the intrinsically eschatological nature of the church. It is important to note, however, that the WCC carefully avoided developing a systematic view of the nature of the church; thus, there are only occasional fragmentary – and sometimes confessional and repetitive – presentations of how eschatology affects the life and the witness of the church and advances the cause of the church's unity. For example, at Montreal the F&O commission, and more generally the WCC at New Delhi and Uppsala, suggested that the structures of the church, conceived eschatologically, are changeable, but this view was not accepted by the Orthodox and other churches which considered the structures of the church sacramentally as divinely given and therefore unchangeable.

A more careful study of such divergence, however, would reveal an emerging ecumenical convergence that some elements of the church's life can be considered permanent because of the eschatological significance which they gain as a result of God's grace, through which the church already participates in the eschaton. Although there is no complete agreement among the churches on what elements of the church's life can be considered as permanent because of their eschatological significance, the F&O commission, in agreement with the Vancouver assembly of 1983, considers as prerequisites of the church's unity the confession of the apostolic faith, the mutual recognition of baptism, eucharist and ministry, and the development of structures that make possible authoritative teaching (see teaching authority) by the united church. In the studies that F&O has produced towards this goal, the impact of eschatology can be discerned as the common ground of a new theology that makes the church a charismatic institution deriving its existence from the coming reality of God's kingdom. Finally, by making the idea of God's coming kingdom the most appropriate starting point for a theological understanding of the church, the factual inseparability of the church from the life of the world has been affirmed, since the reality of God's kingdom reveals the ultimate destiny of the world intended by God. This combining is reflected in the F&O studies, especially after Uppsala (1968), which deal with the unity of the church and renewal of the world – particularly the Bangalore statement "A Common Account of Hope" and the subsequent study of "The Church as Mystery and Prophetic Sign". An eschatological perspective is theologically indispensable to the WCC's concern for justice, peace and the integrity of creation.*

ETHICS

IT IS NOT surprising that the ecumenical movement has been deeply involved in the consideration of ethical issues. Changes in the relations of production and political organization, new cultural trends and the ideological struggles of the modern world raised a number of questions for which the traditional theological and ethical repertoire of the confessional churches had no ready-made answers and frequently not even the instruments or disposition for understanding. In fact, one could argue that the ecumenical movement developed in large measure as a response to the challenges presented to Christians and churches by the complexity of the modern world.

Such a hypothesis is strengthened by the recognition that some of the early forms of ecumenical encounter that appeared towards the end of the 19th century and beginning of the 20th century represent an attempt by individual Christians to tackle problems or respond to opportunities presented by changes in the modern world. Thus the three important youth organizations – YMCA,* YWCA* and the Student Christian Movement (see World Student Christian Federation) – born in an evangelical milieu and with an evangelistic concern, were soon engaging in social action and concerns. The International Missionary Council,* which gathered missionary boards and societies in an effort to cooperate and to avoid the scandal of missionary competition, was soon trying to find answers to the ethical, social and later political questions raised in transcultural and international relations. More specifically, the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches* and its successors reflected the need to respond to the inevitable and conflictive globalization of human life. While apart from some individuals the Roman Catholic Church did not participate in the ecumenical dialogue until the mid-20th century, Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum (see encyclicals, RC social) (1891) developed a social doctrine inspired by the traditional Catholic theological understanding of humans and society – but it did so in the face of the same questions that were then engaging the attention of the emerging ecumenical movement.

As these trends began to flow together (if not organizationally, at least in dialogue and overlapping of constituencies), and as the churches began to participate institutionally in dialogue and cooperation through the creation of organizations like national councils or the Faith and Order* and the Life and Work* movements, some of the traditional theological and ethical distinctions used by the churches, while retaining a certain analytical value, began to blur. The distinction between individual and social ethics lost all precision in ever more complex societies, where many face-to-face relations became institutionalized and bureaucratized and personal decisions frequently can be reached and implemented only by means of collective action. Social sciences, on the other hand, made clear the social nature of individual life. How should one respond to this new situation? Casuistry would have to include so many variables as to become an impossible game; pure principle ethics has to be worked through infinite mediations, which present their own ethical ambiguities; purely agapaic or situational/contextual proposals seem too subjective. A new discussion of these different directions can make sense only if it begins by recognizing the impossibility of separating an individual and a social ethics.

The 18th- and 19th-century distinction of dogmatics and ethics is also challenged by the realization that there is no ethical decision which does not imply a theological understanding and no dogmatic formulation which is independent of the historical conditions and the actual practice of those who create it. Moreover, some burning issues, for instance race and nationhood, are indissolubly tied to understandings of creation and redemption.* In fact, certain political or social decisions are discovered to be in themselves an act of heresy or a confession of faith (the cases of apartheid* and of the Confessing Church* have become typical).

Finally, and in the same direction, the distinction between social issues that belong within the sphere of religious ethics and those that belong to autonomous realms is clearly artificial. Secularization* claims all realms of human life as a field for human debate and decision; faith* claims for the sovereignty of Jesus Christ* all of reality. A distinction between areas where the church has something to say (e.g. public morality, marriage, family, education) and others which must be left as wholly autonomous (mainly politics and economics) is totally untenable. The question becomes one of finding an adequate understanding of how the sovereignty of Christ is exercised in these relatively autonomous realms and how the Christian retains a freedom in obedience.

The sociology of religion, developed mainly since Max Weber and Ernst Troeltsch, also poses critical questions to the churches by showing how they are themselves subject to social conditionings and can act on society only through the mediation of social relations. As Troeltsch put it, "the question of the inward influence of Christianity upon... ethical mutual relationships" can be investigated only in "the concrete effects of its influence in different social groups", and such investigation makes it clear that "great tracts of social life, like that of the economic order, throw a great deal of light upon the general fundamental tendency of Christian sociology". The churches and the ecumenical movement are only slowly and reluctantly incorporating such insights into their self-understanding and action, but some efforts to understand institutionality (see church as institution) or the nature of conflict* or to examine the actual praxis of the churches are already part of the ecumenical movement.

This dialogue and cooperation of Christians and churches on ethical questions have revealed coincidences both in relation to concrete questions and on general theological affirmations. At the same time, some of the differences in theological traditions have become visible in their approach to ethical questions. Edward Duff, for instance, finds in the ecumenical discussion a tension between a Catholic ethics of ends, with a more optimistic anthropology and an affirmation of a natural law that reason can know, and a Protestant ethics of inspiration, with a more pessimistic anthropology and a sense of the discontinuity between reason and revelation. C.-H. Grenholm, on the other hand, discerns in the WCC a "pure humanistic ethics", for which the Christian faith does not add any criterion which is not already available in human thought; a "pure theological ethics", for which the Christian ideal of love is specific, only to be known through revelation and totally different from all non-Christian conceptions of love; and a mediating "mixed theological ethics", for which there are certain normative criteria common to all human beings and Christian faith operates as motivation but also as offering some specific insights. Although such distinctions have the approximate character of all typologies, the differences to which they point will be seen in the discussion of specific ethical questions. Different positions on hermeneutical questions concerning the nature of biblical authority for ethical questions and the hermeneutical principles in the interpretation of scripture in this respect are not unrelated to these differences in theological tradition. They can also be discerned in their understanding of eschatology* and the role that it plays in relation to ethics. Finally, churches differ in the way they understand the authority of the church on ethical questions and the modes of exercise of such authority, particularly in relation to social and political issues. It is striking that the international bilateral dialogues* should have so far devoted so little attention to ethical questions.

These deep differences, however, should not be seen simply as a liability or a hindrance for ecumenical dialogue and cooperation. They do create tensions and make the road to united witness and action a difficult one. But they also have helped to see the richness of the common Christian heritage, to correct the one-sidedness or misunderstandings of each tradition as it has developed in particular historical circumstances and to find complementary relations. The frequently quoted slogan "doctrine divides, service unites” proves to be only partially true: service also reveals deep differences, but the urgency for common action leads to a deeper doctrinal unity. Faith and Order and Life and Work are not competitors for ecumenical priority but the necessary presupposition and consequence of each other.

ETHICS IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

The history of the ecumenical movement in the 20th century, particularly the tradition that developed in the WCC, manifests the points of insertion of the issues mentioned in previous paragraphs. Both continuity and new developments are apparent in that history. It can be developed internally, in the sense of a process that follows the theological and ecclesiastical changes in the churches. But it can also be seen externally as changes in society, geographical expansion of the ecumenical movement, new cultural trends and the deep issues raised by suppressed or muted ecclesial or social subjects – women, racial and ethnic groups, people with disabilities – condition the problematics that the churches must assume. The following considers some of these developments, which are dealt with more specifically in the corresponding entries.

The first Life and Work conference (Stockholm 1925), deeply concerned with the question of reconstruction in the aftermath of the first world war, and reflecting the beginning of the crisis of liberal theology and the rise of dialectical theology, centred theologically on the relation between the kingdom of God* and society. Can the relation between them be seen in terms of continuity (can we therefore discern in history* the signs of the presence of the kingdom?), or is the kingdom an eschatological reality which is exclusively God’s work, whose presence in history remains hidden until the end? While the social gospel movement* and Christianisme social (see socialism) moved in the first direction, neo-orthodoxy and the Lutheran tradition were more inclined to emphasize discontinuity. While all would agree that questions of peace* and international order* were fundamental and should engage Christians, the approach to them was seen by the former as a means of preparing the way for the kingdom, a cooperation with God’s action, by the latter as an act of obedience to the lordship of Christ (more in the Reformed tradition) or of the exercise of love in the secular realm (more in the Lutheran tradition). The WCC study on “The Authority of the Bible for Today”, begun before Amsterdam and culminating in an Oxford meeting in 1949 with some principles of biblical interpretation for social and political issues, hinges on this question. It tried to find a common ground that recognizes the autonomy of the worldly realm (a concern of the “two-kingdoms doctrine”) as well as the lordship of Christ over both church and world (and therefore the relevance of the testimony of scripture for society).

Between Stockholm and the next Life and Work conference 12 years later (Oxford 1937), some things had changed. On the one hand, it had become clearer that Christian concern could not be left to individual Christians alone but had to engage the churches as such. The title of the conference already indicates this: “Church, Community and State”. But that title indicates also the new challenge that had emerged with the rise of nationalism in the forms of fascism* and totalitarianism.* The more tragic dimensions of human life became visible. Theologically, the centrality of the lordship of Christ became a main theme that dominated the ecumenical approach to social and political ethics for several decades. It was on this basis that the Confessing Church* would carry on its struggle with National Socialism in Germany.

But while such an approach was fruitful for a critical position, it was also necessary to find guidelines for Christian action. What kind of society could Christians envisage in order to define their understanding of the state, economy or political action? The concept of middle axioms* was here introduced as a bridge between a principle ethics which could not find its way into concrete reality and a casuistry that could transform the gospel into a law. For a more liberal tradition, middle axioms could be seen as an encounter between the Christian revelation* and human wisdom and experience; from a more eschatologically oriented theology, they could be understood as “concrete utopia”, signs or analogies of the kingdom of Christ. In both, however, the preference for a form of democratic political organization, human rights and freedoms and a mixed economic system was clearly visible.

To provide a vision of society that could give some concrete guidance to Christians in the political and social realm has been a permanent concern of the WCC since its beginning. Its first expression was the responsible society,* seen in Amsterdam 1948 as an instrument for assessing both critically and positively the claims and achievements of both the liberal democratic and the communist ideologies and societies. The dominant Christological approach of Amsterdam was enlarged at Evanston 1954 with an eschatological dimension which had already been explored, from an ethical perspective, in the studies of "Eschatology and Ethics" (Bossey 1951). A global perspective began to appear, and it increased after the third assembly (New Delhi 1961) with the growing presence of third-world churches, Eastern Orthodoxy and the merger of the International Missionary Council. But the quest for some picture of society, a diacritical instrument, would recur again in the attempt to define the traits of a just, participatory and sustainable society* (after Nairobi 1975) and of justice, peace and the integrity of creation* (since Vancouver 1983).

Between Amsterdam and Vancouver, however, certain fundamental issues had engaged ecumenical interest and enlarged the ethical concerns. Churches from Asia and Africa had raised the political issue of decolonization,* their struggles for liberation* and the problems of nation-building. Theological understandings warned against a confusion of God's kingdom and human struggles, but could not respond to the questions raised by the new peoples and nations, races and classes who, struggling against centuries-old oppressions, began to build their own world. The idea of a responsible society had to be corrected and expanded to include the concern for necessarily revolutionary change (see revolution), the concern for rapid social change and development,* the struggle against racism* and the legitimacy of certain forms of nationalism (see nation). At the Geneva 1966 conference on Church and Society, a development of the neo-orthodox theology, coming mainly from Latin America, was concerned with the legitimacy of revolution, looking for ways to identify the signs of God's presence in our history, vindicating the positive role of ideologies as the way in which people* define their goals and project their action in the quest for freedom and justice. Some themes had to be explored: on the one hand, the significance of ideology* for social ethics; on the other hand, the meaning of the humanum as a criterion for Christian reflection (see Humanum Studies).

Struggles against colonialism as well as development and nation building could not be discussed without taking account of omnipresent economic determinations. Oppressed nations, races and peoples are poor, economically and therefore also socially. The ethical agenda had to include an understanding of the economic mechanisms of poverty (see economics) and a theological as well as a social and political understanding of the poor.* Such demands led to programmes on transnational corporations,* questions of investment,* capitalism* and socialism, concrete issues like land reform (see land), trade unions (see labour) and the New International Economic Order. Oppression, however, is also related to political and military situations. Hence issues such as human rights* and militarism/militarization*, the doctrine of national security* and specific repressive policies such as torture* or the ill treatment of refugees* presented challenges which could not be ignored. It has to be admitted, however, that often an immediate response to critical situations has not been followed by a theological reflection that could have enriched the theologico-ethical understanding and critical evaluation of these immediate responses.

Geneva 1966 was concerned not only with the political but also the scientific revolutions of our time. While one may dispute the use of the term "revolution" in this context, there can be little doubt that scientific and technological changes had raised new challenges for the churches. Questions of environment/ecology,* bio-ethics* and genetic engineering, the sources and use of energy, the relation of science and technology,* and pollution (most of them already mentioned though not developed at Geneva) demanded a practical approach as specific questions, a relational analysis to see them within the total functioning of society and a theological reflection that would undergird and inform the position to be taken by the WCC and the churches on these issues. The 1979 MIT conference was both a gathering point of many studies carried out in the WCC and in many member churches and a point of departure for further theological and practical work. Theologically such issues as the understanding of nature,* and consequently the relation between creation and redemption (see creation, Trinity), faith and science,* which in different contexts have been already on the theological agenda of the ecumenical movement, have now become urgent also from the point of view of ethical reflection and decision.

The ecumenical movement has not broken much new ground on ethical issues which have figured prominently in the ethical concerns of the churches in the past, such as marriage,* family* and sexual ethics.* The classical consideration of these subjects under "orders of creation" or "the mandates" or, in the Catholic tradition, natural law* was somewhat alien to the Christological perspective dominant in the ecumenical movement for many decades. But traditional issues now presented new challenges, partly because of changes in culture related to social, economic and political developments, partly because of new human possibilities opened by science and technology, both resulting in the erosion of traditional patterns of behaviour, tacitly or explicitly accepted and supported by the churches. The struggle of women for a new understanding and experience of their role in church and society (see women in church and society, feminism) required a new discussion of both marriage and family and of power in church and society.* The debate about homosexuality,* birth control* and abortion* could not be postponed. Some traditional issues such as divorce* and euthanasia* demanded new consideration. The ecumenical movement is far from having developed a coherent theological approach or clear ethical criteria for facing such issues, but they will undoubtedly figure prominently in the future.

An issue traditionally related to what was seen as "personal ethics" occupied the ecumenical movement in its early stages. The reflection on the meaning of work* and vocation* was part of the attempt to develop a theology of the laity* that would enlarge the understanding of ecclesiology and enrich the life of the churches. In this context Evanston 1954 (sec. 6) took up a theme raised at Amsterdam, i.e. assuming responsibility in terms of the struggle for justice, viewing one's specific place in society as a service (see diakonia) of love, while respecting the autonomy of the secular realm. Another traditional Christian concern, that of health and healing,* has entered the ecumenical agenda and generated a theological reflection of health as wholeness, both in the personal and communal sense and in understanding healing as much wider than the cure of specific physical malfunctioning. The consideration of these two classic themes, while not prominent in the ecumenical movement, points to an important goal: to recover for ecumenical thinking areas of human life that were seen as self-contained and individual and to insert them in a more holistic approach to human life in our complex world society without losing sight of the personal centre, where all these lines converge. Ethical and pastoral concerns should be seen as intimately related.

PROSPECTS FOR ECUMENICAL ETHICS

Ethics remains a touchstone of ecumenicity, not in isolation from other concerns, nor as a one-sided lobby, but as Christian personal and community praxis, as a doctrine that is aware of the practice from which it springs and to which it leads, and as action that acknowledges the doctrine that is implicit in it and its responsibility to the ecumenical Christian community in time and space. It has fulfilled that function to some extent in the period surveyed here, and the prospects that can be envisaged for the future make it necessary to continue and to strengthen that service.

Ethics makes the ecumenical movement ever aware of the world in which it operates, both in the sense of the reality from which it emerges and of the influence it exerts and should exert on it. At the beginning of a new century, that reality is rapidly moving: the growing pauperization of the majority of the human population (both in third-world countries and in significant numbers in the "developed" world) reaches a point where it verges on massive genocide, while the expansion of economic, scientific-technological and communication media endeavours to create a homogeneous world market from which the majority will be excluded. At the same time, the geopolitical and ideological frontiers of East and West, which defined the world from the beginnings of the modern ecumenical movement, are becoming fluid in a movement whose direction we cannot anticipate. Such a situation presents to ecumenical ethics a twofold task. On the one side is the question of priority and commitment: Will the Christian oikoumene be simply integrated in this "world market" as its religious legitimation and "accompanying music", or will it make of the poor of the land the object and subject of its reflection and action? On the other hand, will it engage the rigorous analytical work that is necessary to mediate that fundamental option effectively and to help Christians and churches make the concrete decisions that correspond to it in their different circumstances and possibilities?

Since the 1960s the Roman Catholic Church and the non-Catholic ecumenical movement have entered an ecumenical dialogue in which ethics has occupied a central place, both as an area of cooperation and as a place where differences become explicit. Experiments like SODEPAX* are a good example of both. This dialogue is not easy: there are deep differences in theological tradition, in self-conception, in the understanding of authority and in the role of the magisterium in ethical questions. There are differences of approach to some of the burning issues of today. For all these reasons discussion and, even more, cooperation on ethical questions become at times almost impossible. But there are also other signs. Theologically, Protestants are learning (not so much through theological discussion as by looking at the practice of the Catholic church in certain areas) that notions of natural law and of the common good and classic principles such as solidarity* or subsidiarity* can offer significant guidance for tackling issues and deserve more careful attention than they have usually received. On the other hand, Roman Catholic encyclicals and ethical statements of the last half century have more and more combined the traditional natural-law approach with an appeal to revelation that creatively and carefully incorporates the insights of ecumenical biblical studies of the last half century or more in which Catholics have been active partners. Finally, the increasingly significant presence of Eastern Orthodoxy, of people's base communities of prayer and action and of a growing Pentecostal movement, each with its own approach to ethics deeply related to spirituality, both relativize and correct the more intellectualistic and nomic character of Western Christianity. To make this encounter fruitful for ethics is one of the opportunities for the ecumenical movement.

We have already alluded to the fact that the ecumenical movement has not yet properly developed the theological undergirding of its ethical commitments or profitably developed the theological insights implicit in them. Such shortcomings may be partly due to the pressing nature of the challenges and to the intensity of the commitments that they evoke. But they may also be a result of theological one-sidedness. It seems that the ecumenical movement is led both by the total confessional and geographical scope of participation and by the nature of the global problems that it faces to develop a theological reflection deeply rooted in a Trinitarian faith, responsive to and responsible for the actual praxis of the Christian community in the world and in permanent critical and integrative dialogue with human sciences and ideologies. Such theology could help the churches to be faithful to their mission, not as masters or pioneers of a new world, but as salt in the world that God is creating through human thinking and action and as a permanent reminder of that new earth of promise for which we pray and hope.

ETHICS, SEXUAL

THE BASIS of any Christian sexual ethics can be Gen. 1:27. It is apparent, not controversial or even "mythical", that the human race comes in two kinds, male and female. Those who believe in God the Creator believe that God intended it so. Sexual ethics is concerned with the interpretation of this fact.

Biology and theology are not at odds in understanding that sexual differentiation is primarily "for" reproduction. Nor need science and religion quarrel over the role of the "pair-bond" in the nurturing and protecting of human young through their long childhood. So in Gen. 1:28 human sexuality is immediately linked with procreation and God's blessing upon fertility. The human race has indeed multiplied exceedingly and has filled and subdued the earth, though not always in innocent ways. (The fall is also an evident though not easily interpreted fact about humankind [see sin].)

The Yahwist account of the creation of men and women (Gen. 2) is more complex, and anyone who takes it seriously faces questions both of interpretation and of the authority of the Old Testament for today. It may well be characterized, though not of course written off, as a myth. Whatever other meanings can be drawn from it, this story leads up to the key concept of the "one flesh" union. Human pair-bonding is able to transcend its biological function. The Christian churches have been unanimous, both that in the purpose of God men and women are meant to form faithful unions and that human progeny are meant to be brought to birth and nurtured in this context.

Much scope for differences of opinion remains, and from these foundations the argument has gone in diverse and controversial ways. At one extreme is the view (for which Augustine must take some responsibility) that the fall is all-important and that human sexuality has gone so wrong that the only justification for sexual union is the plain intent by a married pair to raise a family. At the other extreme is the view that sexual pleasure is worthwhile for its own sake, is even a human right, apart from any intention of procreation or even of a lasting relationship. Most Christians in all the churches would repudiate both these extremes, though often with some leaning towards one or the other.

Each extreme in turn can be seen as a way of coming to terms with current human common sense. It is fair to point out that in societies without efficient contraception and with high maternal mortality, it is hardly surprising that sexual pleasure should be feared. Nor is it surprising that when, for a few years, the dangers of uncommitted sexual encounters seemed to be overcome, the view that sex can be just a "healthy form of sport" should come into fashion. Before AIDS* arrived, many Christians were finding the defence of traditional chastity a thankless task, knowing what negative lines the churches have frequently taken.

People expect Catholic Christians to uphold tradition and Protestants to sit loose to it. It has been too easy in the West to see Catholics as rigid, Protestants as antinomian and Anglicans as trying to hold a balance, forgetting the Orthodox meanwhile or drawing upon them belatedly for support. But the arguments are by no means tidily denominational, though two well-trodden controversies, contraception and the divorce issue (see birth control, divorce), have lately lent themselves to such over-simplification. Neither Catholicism nor Protestantism is neatly monolithic, especially not Protestantism, which has given rise both to "situation ethics" and to "fundamentalism" as well as to the monumental contribution of Karl Barth. To set, for instance, Towards a Quaker View of Sex (1963) against such a Roman pronouncement as Casti Connubii (1930) as representatives of the two sides in a straightforward controversy can only darken counsel. Indeed, at times the case could be put the other way round, with “puritans” denying the goodness of sexuality in the name of an ethic of respectability, while Roman casuists shocked Protestants by finding ways round moral demands.

Somewhat paradoxically it has been suggested (e.g. O’Donovan) that, after all, there is no great difference between Catholic and Protestant over sexuality. Their evident divergence is at least partly a matter of their division over authority.* Protestantism has no clear way of “making up its mind” and may tend to follow public opinion, but Roman Catholicism has great difficulty in publicly changing its made-up mind when understanding develops, as has conspicuously happened over contraception (see Humanae Vitae 1968 and the discussions before and since).

There is another way in which a real Catholic/Protestant division can be denied. When Orthodoxy is brought into the picture, the besetting tendency of Western churches towards legalism, of which antinomianism is only the reverse image, is shown up. The choice between prohibitions and permissions has more to do with bureaucracy than with the love of God. The Eastern churches in their teaching on sexuality have put more emphasis upon love both human and divine, and this understanding is beginning to be appreciated by Western Christians (e.g. Church of England).

The teaching of Christ in the gospels in fact includes not much about sexuality, but what there is does not let the majesty or the mercy of God be forgotten. In applying his teaching today, we may find it more constructive to look at problems in the light of traditions, rather than traditions in the light of problems. There is convergence for which we may be grateful and outstanding differences about which one must be honest. It has to be said that the ancient Christian emphasis on celibacy as better than marriage* as carried over into Roman Catholicism – whether or not Protestants have been right to consider it an over-emphasis in itself – has had the practical result that unmarried priests have been responsible for Catholic teaching on sexuality, with inevitably unbalanced results.

No doubt the moralist’s task would look simpler if sexual relationship and procreation had not been made separable by human skills. The development of first contraception and then in vitro fertilization (see bio-ethics) has laid upon human beings the obligation to consider more deeply the meaning of both sexuality and parenthood.

The need is to encourage the expectation that a Christian view will turn out to be, not some arbitrary set of commandments, but the gracious purpose of the Creator for human beings. A Christian at the beginning of the 21st century, respecting tradition and in touch with contemporary developments, will surely be inclined towards an understanding of sexuality which gives great importance to the faithful relationship between a man and a woman. Of course this emphasis is helped, some would say made possible, by greater longevity, smaller families, less pressure simply to keep alive. But, after all, the Christian tradition does have encouragement for such a relational understanding of sexuality, not least in the concept of the “one flesh” union which the Lord picked up and quoted in his teaching on marriage (Mark 10:6-8).

A “relational” understanding of sexuality, at its best, neither belittles procreation nor makes fidelity an optional extra dependent on people’s whims. In all the churches there has been an increasing appreciation that physical sexual union can be a kind of human “means of grace” in effecting, developing and sustaining the unity between a man and a woman. The point of permanent fidelity is neither the disgracefulness nor the danger of unlegalized sex but the need for time for real union to develop.

Such a view sheds light on old problems. It is able to honour both marriage and celibacy as particular vocations without setting either up against the other. It can value procreation as truly pro-creation without making children the rationale of marriage. To believe that human beings are, so to say, relational animals can be a way of talking about natural law* without the finicky legalism of which natural-law theories are suspected. The “hard cases” of this view will be people’s real troubles, to be handled with mercy and imagination, rather than artificial dilemmas imposed by recalcitrant theory.

That is not to say that relational views of sexuality are free from difficulties or create no problems of their own. A characteristic weakness is a tendency to idolize "relationship": either permissively, treating relationship, however transient, as self-justifying and as justifying everything done in its name; or smugly, rejecting and blaming people with unsatisfactory relationships. Christians of different persuasions have thought in slogans here and need each other's balance. In particular, "personalism" has become a word with almost contrary moral implications, suggesting to some people truly Christian encouragement of personal fulfilment, but signifying to others the selfish pursuit of atomistic individualism.

An insidious trap for the liberal-minded is to allow sexuality to colonize, as it were, all loving relationships. It is true that the contrast between agape and eros has been overworked, but it does not follow that all relationship is what is ordinarily called erotic. It has been too easy, in deploring the so-called puritan tradition of prudery and trying to learn from Freud, to seem to imply that "relationship" just means "sexual relationship", needing and deserving physical expression. So the subtleties of human and Christian love go by default.

The outstanding problem, which is by no means fully resolved, is the right understanding of maleness and femaleness. When procreation is allowed to matter less and relationship more, why do we forbid love-making between members of the same sex, at least as a faute de mieux? When women are set free from perpetual child-bearing, can they begin to do everything men can do? If not, why not? (See homosexuality, feminism.)

The question of women priests bids fair to be as divisive ecumenically as contraception and more essentially recalcitrant. It is not easily solved one way or the other, partly because of prejudices, but partly because behind it lie deep questions about the meaning of the fact that there are two sexes (see women in church and society).

Are men and women "equal", and what would that mean? Are they complementary, with different natures and roles? The more we care about fairness and make them equal, the more we seem to make them merely interchangeable. The more we stress complementarity, the more tendency there is to devalue or patronize women as "the fair sex" or as mother-goddesses, and to be cruel to those of both sexes who cannot or will not conform to stereotype.

The arguments in these matters do not, yet, cut neatly across denominational lines. In other words, Christians are still at an early stage of what could become a fresh and deep schism.* Hindsight may show how too much legalism and too little listening, on both sides, is a recipe for bitterness as the cost of reformation. The silliness of some of the arguments masks the importance of the problem. Women in all the churches are learning not to take for granted the time-honoured assumption that real human beings are all men: pernicious just because it is an assumption, not an argued refutable belief. They are being urged to learn "to say 'I', to accept themselves... as good, whole and beautiful"; and beyond "I" to go on and say "we" (Reinhild Traitler). If nobody listens but other women, the "we" will not be men and women together, but ramifying forms of apartheid between the aggrieved and the complacent. Christians who believe that God made human beings for union must have something better to say than feminism or anti-feminism.

ETHNIC CONFLICT

ALTHOUGH ethnicity derives etymologically from the Greek ethnos (ethnikos), people or nation, its use is of recent origin. An ethnic community is a group of individuals who are bound together by language, historical and cultural tradition and religion, which identifies itself and/or is identified by others as such and, but not always, by a well-defined territory. In some cases, ethnic territorial boundaries coincide with the frontiers of a nation state, but most of the time they do not. Ethnic groups can constitute minorities or majorities within a nation state or across boundaries. They can be politically and economically dominant or dominated.

The tensions arising out of ethnicity* have multiple causes, and they have troubled humanity ever since the dawn of history. But the 20th century seems to have witnessed an increase, so much so that some researchers believe that since 1900 internal ethnic conflicts have resulted in more victims than all of the interstate wars together, including the first and second world wars. Several of these ethnic conflicts have degenerated into genocide, for example Cambodia, Sudan, Rwanda, Congo, Maluccas, Chechenya, Tibet and Afghanistan. A number of factors usually contribute: (1) social revolution (e.g. Russia and China); (2) the break-up of multi-ethnic states, such as the Soviet Union and Yugoslavia in 1989 (in addition to Austria-Hungary and the Ottoman empire, destroyed in 1918); (3) unwanted new national frontiers; (4) the imposition of the national security state; (5) increased competition over land and diminishing resources resulting from population pressures; (6) weakening of the democratic nation state due to (a) a globalized economy, (b) instant worldwide communication, (c) transnational migration and intermingling of populations, (d) sub-regional self-assertion within national borders; (7) weakening influence of traditional religion and ideology, coupled with a growth of new religions and of fundamentalism;* (8) positively speaking, oppressed ethnic groups are sometimes awakened culturally and politically, through the influence of international and regional organizations, by new methods of "doing" history (oral history, studies of neglected social groups, women's rights, understanding mechanisms of oppression and "poverty creation", local self-help actions); (9) new forms of "networking" based on modern forms of communication and travel; (10) improved legal standards for the protection of minorities and ethnic groups, both at international (UN and regional) and national levels, which provide legitimacy to the disfavoured. Ethnicity can mean liberation, peaceful and creative co-existence. It can also mean violent repression.

Ethnic conflicts are a troublesome factor to the ecumenical movement and to inter-religious dialogue, because in many situations religion is itself a source of tension. There are memories of past wars of religion, forced conversion or genocide (e.g., crusades,* colonial conquest, antisemitism* leading to the holocaust). While racism was long a major ecumenical concern, ethnicity has rapidly become a central issue (the two elements cannot, at any rate, be readily distinguished), especially as churches are often identified with their ethnic communities at the expense of universal conceptions of faith. Under the impact of ethnic wars in Bosnia and Rwanda, an ecumenical consultation held in 1994 in Colombo, Sri Lanka, on "Ethnicity and Nationalism: A Challenge to the Churches" judged the role of the churches to be "difficult and often ambiguous". The consultation suggested that the theological concept of the kingdom of God in the various church traditions be explored afresh, because it might provide a key to help the churches reassess their history critically and to evaluate their own inadvertent support for nationalist/ethnicist ambitions. During a 1996 encounter of the WCC working group in Berlin on "Racism, Indigenous Peoples and Ethnicity" it was stated that while the support of churches to nations under oppression was fully appreciated, the undue legitimation given to certain ethnic and national values and dominant elites was seriously questioned, especially if these became the pretext for threatening other ethnicities. Such religious involvement has often contributed to the fragmentation of nation states, to oppression and to the disruption of community.

If religion, with Christianity bearing a major historic share, has been a source of ethnic conflict, it can also become an instrument for peace and reconciliation. Some of the principal elements for such re-thinking are: (1) religion demands unconditional obedience to a supreme and universal deity; (2) this deity is not limited to one single territory or to certain ethnic groups; (3) the Creator of the universe is the father and the mother of all human beings; (4) this implies that all human beings are called upon to treat each other and the life-giving earth with love and respect; (5) the organization of life together has to be structured by justice, the respect for human rights, ecological sustainability and life in community; (6) its basis cannot but be in accord with a profound understanding of life's origins (creation) and history's fulfilment (kingdom of God, eternity), which provide meaning for life above and beyond geographical, ethnic and other temporary confines.

ETHNICITY

THE VALUE of patriotism and of ethnic or national identity is assessed in widely varying ways in the text of the Bible and in the course of Christian history. In the Old Testament the Israelites, by virtue of God's special election, constitute "a holy nation" (Ex. 19:6), "a people holy to the Lord... chosen out of all the peoples on earth to be his people" (Deut. 7:6). Ethnicity, so far as the Hebrews are concerned, forms part of God's saving plan (see salvation history). But, more particularly in later strands of the OT, a place is allowed in the divine purpose for other nations as well. In the last days "all the nations" will come to the temple at Jerusalem (Isa. 2:2); "all the nations" are invited to praise and worship God (Ps. 86:9, 117:1); a guardian angel is assigned to each nation (Dan. 10:13,21, 12:1).

In the New Testament the titles previously applied to Israel are now used to describe the church: "a holy nation, God's own people" (1 Pet. 2:9). But this implies a transformation of the concept of nationhood, since the church* is essentially universal; within the community of the baptized all ethnic boundaries are transcended, and "there is no longer Jew or Greek... for all of you are one in Christ Jesus" (Gal. 3:28). This supranational approach was evident in the structuring of the early church, which was organized not on a national but on a territorial basis. The term "church" was in no way applied to an ethnic entity but referred to the entire community of the faithful gathered locally in each place for the eucharist, whatever their nationality (see local church, unity of "all in each place"). In the ancient canons the powers of each bishop extended not to an ethnic group but to a defined geographical area; all Christians in a given city are under the same bishop.

Yet this did not imply that nationhood lost all meaning within the Christian dispensation. It is symbolically significant that at Pentecost* the Holy Spirit* descended in the tongues of the different nations. Ethnic variety was not obliterated, but it ceased to be a dividing barrier; those present spoke different languages, yet each understood the other (Acts 2:3-11). Nationhood is seen, not just as transitory, but as part of the age to come (see kingdom of God): it is not just individuals but “the nations” that enter the kingdom (Rev. 21:24), in all their variety and with their distinctive treasures. Canon 34 of the 4th-century apostolic canons insists that the “bishops of each nation” are to meet together. Of course it is necessary to ask how far, in passages such as those quoted above, the word “nation” bears the same sense as it does today.

The church of the East Roman or Byzantine empire was multinational in character, although with Greek culture as the prevailing influence, while in the Roman Catholic West the papacy has always emphasized the supranational, universal nature of the church. But the churches founded by Orthodox missionaries in Bulgaria, Serbia and Russia (9th-10th centuries) possessed from the start a markedly national spirit, and the same was true of the leading Protestant groups at the Reformation. So strong has nationalism proved in modern Orthodoxy that in 1872 the Ecumenical Patriarchate even issued a formal condemnation of the heresy* of “phyletism” (the view that the church should be structured on ethnic, not territorial, principles). But this has had little effect, as the multi-jurisdictional situation of the Orthodox church in the West shows only too clearly.

The ecumenical movement, while combating religious, ethnic and racial intolerance, has always taken unity* as its ideal, not uniformity. Patriotism and ethnicity, while they need to undergo a searching metanoia, need not be totally rejected. Within a re-united Christendom there is room for the utmost diversity in styles of theology, ways of worship and forms of church government; likewise, a commitment to world peace does not exclude a strong sense of local loyalty. In the words of the Russian writer Vadim Borisov: “The nation is a level in the hierarchy of the Christian cosmos, a part of God’s immutable purpose.” “Nations”, as Alexander Solzhenitsyn observes, “are the wealth of humankind, its collective personalities; the very least of them wears its own special colours, and bears within itself a special facet of divine intention.”

EUCCHARIST

“EUCCHARIST” has become the most widely used name ecumenically for the rite which almost all Christian communities believe to have been instituted by Jesus at the Last Supper: “Do this in remembrance of me” (see 1 Cor. 11:23-25; cf. Matt. 26:26-29; Mark 14:22-25; Luke 22:14-20). Coming from the Greek word for “thanksgiving”, the name “eucharist” refers to the central prayer in the rite, in which God is above all thanked for the works of creation* and redemption* accomplished through Christ and in the Holy Spirit. Other names pick up other features or meanings of the complex rite: thus the Lord’s supper, the breaking of bread, the holy communion, the divine liturgy, the offering, and the mass (though nobody quite knows the etymology of this last).

The various names carry to some extent particular confessional associations, and differences in the understanding and practice of the eucharist have often been a cause, symptom or result of wider doctrinal and spiritual differences among the churches. In the 16th century, for example, differences over the sacrificial character of the eucharist expressed differences between Catholics and Protestants over the roles of God and the human being in the achievement of redemption and the appropriation of salvation.* Differences among Lutherans, Zwinglians and Calvinists over the presence of Christ at the Lord’s supper were connected with differences in Christology as such. Arguments between East and West over the moment and agency of the consecration of the bread and wine – Christ’s words of institution and/or the invocation of the Holy Spirit* – reflect controversies over the relations among the persons of the Trinity.* And participation in the eucharist of other churches, or lack thereof, has usually been the measure of communion among the churches or of its rupture.

The modern ecumenical movement has realized that the restoration of Christian unity* entails a necessary and sufficient agreement in eucharistic doctrine and practice (see communion, intercommunion). While, on the one hand, what is necessary and sufficient are themselves matters of debate with regard to the eucharist itself, it may, on the other hand, legitimately be hoped that agreements attained in this focal area will have wider consequences for unity in faith and life among the churches. Thus agreement on the Lord's supper was at the heart of the Leuenberg concordat, which established new relations among the Lutheran and Reformed churches of Europe (1973). Nor is it accidental that several worldwide bilateral dialogues* from an early stage devoted their attention to the eucharist (e.g. the Windsor statement of the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission I, 1971; Das Herrenmahl of the Lutheran-RC dialogue, 1978; sections of the Denver and Dublin reports of the Methodist-RC dialogue 1971 and 1976; the Orthodox-RC text from Munich 1982, "The Mystery of the Church and of the Eucharist in the Light of the Mystery of the Holy Trinity"). In the international, multilateral Faith and Order movement, the eucharist was never lost from sight between Lausanne 1927 and Lima 1982. The Lima text itself (the "E" of Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry*), the responses of the churches to it, and some directions pointed by the report of Faith and Order in coordinating these responses (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry 1982-1990: Report on the Process and Responses, 1990) may be taken as the measure of eucharistic agreement up to this point.

THE MEANING OF THE EUCHARIST

It begins with a Christological and soteriological concentration. In conformity with strong themes in the biblical scholarship of the past two or three generations, Christ's institution of the eucharist is seen to be "pre-figured in the Passover memorial of Israel's deliverance from the land of bondage and in the meal of the covenant on Mount Sinai (Ex. 24)", surrounded by the significant meals of Jesus' earthly ministry and after his resurrection, and intended as "the anticipation of the supper of the Lamb (Rev. 19:9)". The eucharist is "essentially the sacrament of the gift which God makes to us in Christ through the power of the Holy Spirit. Every Christian receives this gift of salvation through communion in the body and blood of Christ" (E2).

Lima then expounds the meaning of the eucharist according to a Trinitarian pattern and the fivefold sequences of the ancient creeds, as (1) "thanksgiving to the Father", (2) "memorial of Christ", (3) "invocation of the Spirit", (4) "communion of the faithful", and (5) "meal of the kingdom". In general terms, this arrangement meets with the practically unanimous approval of the churches.

In more detail, (1) is welcomed for its inclusion of creation and its recognition of the cosmic scope of redemption, features which had long been eclipsed in many Western liturgies. All recognize that thanksgiving is the appropriate human response to God's work, but some Lutheran responses fear that an emphasis on "the sacrifice of praise" might obscure the fact that the Lord's supper is first and foremost a divine "benefit" towards humankind.

Regarding (2), the two historically most controversial points have been the mode(s) of Christ's presence in the eucharist and the relation of the eucharist to Christ's sacrifice on the cross. The churches rejoice in the confession of "Christ's real, living and active presence" made in E13, and many responses would remain content with that. But some do not believe that the "convergence [so] formulated" suffices to "accommodate" remaining differences concerning the connection of Christ's presence with the bread and wine (E13 comm.). In particular, Roman Catholic and Orthodox responses want a less-guarded acknowledgment that the elements become the body and blood of Christ, while a few Protestant responses ask that precisely some forms of that claim be excluded. This in fact probably remains the single most divisive issue in eucharistic faith, doctrine and theology. The relation to Calvary does not provoke nearly so much comment. There is widespread agreement that Lima adequately protected the uniqueness of the cross; but the Roman Catholic response is doubtful whether the category of Christ's continuing intercession, and the church's participation in it, is sufficient "to explain the sacrificial nature of the eucharist", and several Orthodox responses question whether Christ's sacrifice is sufficiently "actualized" according to the Lima text.

As to the "invocation of the Spirit" (3), the churches welcome this feature as a prayerful recognition that God's gift and the church's action remain entirely dependent on grace.* The traditional Orthodox insistence on the pneumatological dimensions of the Lord's supper has now been largely received by the Western churches, although some Protestant responses continue to question whether the Holy Spirit is appropriately invoked not only on the whole assembly and its action but more particularly upon the bread and wine. The sharpest criticism of Lima's pneumatology comes from some Lutherans who fear for the adequacy of the Word himself and "his promise in the words of institution" (Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Netherlands).

Positively put, there is a very widespread recognition that – even if Lima does not always have the relation quite right – anamnesis and epiclesis (memorial and invocation) do in fact belong together, since Christ and the Spirit belong together in an "indissoluble union" (E14 comm.). The F&O report on the churches' responses suggests that more progress is yet to be made on remaining difficulties over Christ's presence and sacrifice by a deepened reflection, within an acknowledged Trinitarian context, on the biblical realities of "memorial" and "Spirit". Greater development is needed of Lima's recognition that the crucified and risen Christ is the living and active content of the memorial in word and meal (E5-6,12), and that the Spirit is "called upon" in order to make the eucharistic event possible, real and effective (E14). In the Holy Spirit, Christ comes to us, clothed in his mighty acts, and gathers us into his self-offering as Son to the Father, in whom is eternal life (cf. Eph. 2:18).

The ecclesiological dimension of the eucharist (4) includes "communion with all the saints and martyrs" (E11). E19 establishes a link between "each local eucharistic celebration" and "the whole church". This is widely acknowledged in principle, but as Old Catholic, Roman Catholic and Orthodox responses to Lima most evidently recognize, this point raises the question of "catholicity"* and the concrete identification of "the church": what does it take to make a eucharist the eucharist, or what constitutes a eucharistic assembly?

Many responses welcomed the association made in E20 between the eucharist and "appropriate relationships in social, economic and political life"; some asked for more precision as to whether "reconciliation and sharing among all those regarded as brothers and sisters in the one family of God" is meant as a condition or as a consequence of the eucharistic celebration and communion.

Lima's acknowledgment of the eschatological dimension (5) of the Lord's supper finds very widespread approval, whether the accent be placed on joy and hope, or on mission and service, or on the anticipation of the parousia and the feast of the kingdom. The responses of the churches reveal the same tensions between present realization and future consummation as are present in E and as indeed mark the scriptural and traditional material concerning the End and the eucharist's relation to it.

All in all, the reception given to E suggests that the convergence of the churches regarding the meaning of the eucharist is stronger than on almost any other topic of dogma. The United Church of Christ in Japan considers E to be "the best section of BEM and the richest in content"; and the (Anglican) Church of Ireland specifies: "Drawing its inspiration from recent biblical, patristic and liturgical scholarship, it [E] is irenic in approach and successfully transcends the old divisive controversies." It will be important to draw on the agreements here achieved as F&O pursues the wider task of helping the churches "Towards a Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today" (see common confession).

THE CELEBRATION OF THE EUCCHARIST

E3 declares that the eucharist "always includes both word and sacrament", and the features which the Lima text (E27) lists as belonging to the "single whole" of the eucharistic liturgy – hymns, prayers and proclamation as well as the action with the bread and wine – correspond remarkably, even as far as detailed sequence, to the orders now found in the current service books of almost all confessional families (see liturgical reforms). Nevertheless, some Protestant respondents have received the impression that BEM “sacramentalizes” worship, to the detriment of “the word”. Liturgically speaking, the National Alliance of the Lutheran Churches of France prefers to consider word and sacrament as “two foci of an ellipse”. Almost all responses to BEM in fact recognize that it is wrong to oppose word and sacrament to each other. The 1990 report of F&O formulates the matter thus: “Using the term ‘sacramental’ in a general sense, i.e. referring to God’s salvific action in history, the proclamation of the word is a sacramental action just as the celebration of baptism and supper are an event of God’s word.” In its response to BEM, the United Methodist Church (USA) had already declared: “God’s effectual word is there [in the eucharistic service of word and sacrament] revealed, proclaimed, heard, seen and tasted.”

“As the eucharist celebrates the resurrection of Christ, it is appropriate”, declared Lima (E31), “that it should take place at least every Sunday.” The principle of “the supper of the Lord every Lord’s day” (John Wesley) had in fact been the practice of the whole church in the early centuries. Dating from about A.D. 150, Justin Martyr’s classic description records that “on the day called sun-day an assembly is held in one place of all who live in town or country”; “the records of the apostles or writings of the prophets are read”; a sermon is followed by prayers; bread and wine are brought up, and the presider says the prayer of thanksgiving, to which the people assent by their amen; then “everyone partakes of the elements over which thanks have been given”. With the mass conversions to Christianity from the 4th century onwards, the frequency of popular communion declined, although in the middle ages, especially in the West, the mass itself came to be celebrated more and more often, with an emphasis on its propitiatory power.

The Protestant reformers stopped the “multiplication of masses”, but they were unable to establish the regular weekly communion of the faithful which most of the leaders desired, and so the service of prayers, preaching and psalmody became the normal Sunday fare in their churches. In the 20th century, the Roman Catholic Church has been remarkably successful in increasing the frequency of popular communion; and responses from several Orthodox churches to BEM indicate that they share the same goal, provided adequate spiritual and moral preparation is made. On the Protestant side, the Swiss Protestant Church Federation, for instance, recognizes that “celebration [of the Lord’s supper] every Sunday”, understood as a service of word and sacrament, “is in line with the biblical tradition”; and the Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar reports that “at present, thanks to BEM, CJCM accepts the principle of celebrating the eucharist every Sunday”. Many Protestant responses express this as a more or less firm desideratum, having attained a greater or less degree of fulfilment.

In the commentary to E28, Lima noted that “in certain parts of the world, where bread and wine are not customary or obtainable, it is now sometimes held that local food and drink serve better to anchor the eucharist in everyday life”. The responses of churches in the South Pacific showed most interest in this question, although it is also much discussed in Africa. The Church of South India commented: “The symbol should be obvious and meaningful. We have no problem with any type of bread; but it may be difficult to take the coconut water and say, ‘This is the blood of Christ.’” The Apostolic Catholic Assyrian Church of the East observes that “the matter of this sacrament Christ ordained to be of wheat and wine as being most fit to represent body and blood”. The Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches, as well as responses from some Lutheran and Anglican churches, share that view.

EUROPE: CENTRAL AND EASTERN

ESPECIALLY since the end of the cold war,* it has become common to distinguish Central and Eastern Europe: the former being the zone of the smaller nations between Germany and Russia, influenced and shaped by Western Christendom, the latter being the nations which received and assimilated the Byzantine tradition. In broad cultural (and not strictly geographical) terms, the Czech Republic, Slovakia, Austria, Hungary, Croatia, Slovenia, Poland and Lithuania may be considered as part of Central Europe; Russia, Ukraine, Belarus, Armenia, Georgia, Bulgaria, Albania, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Serbia and Romania (except for the Hungarian minority) as part of Eastern Europe.

Ecumenically speaking, during the period of the cold war, all these countries (as well as Estonia, Latvia and the German Democratic Republic, but not including Austria) tended to be considered together as "Eastern Europe". The determinative factor for this designation was their communist governments (in the case of Russia since 1917), the participation of most of them in Comecon and the Warsaw Pact, and their consequent identification in cold-war geopolitical terms as belonging to one of the two super-power "blocs". With the radical changes beginning in 1989, the individual nations in this area re-affirmed their specific identity and their distinct cultural heritages, relating in a new way to their historical consciousness, myths, religiosity, folk songs and fairy tales, and their mother tongues. Central Europe in particular has been profoundly marked by the unique contribution in social and cultural life made by the Jewish people; however, they were almost completely eliminated during the holocaust. The advance of globalization during the 1990s and, at the European level, the aspirations of integration into the European Union have raised questions about how well the nations of Central and Eastern Europe will be able to maintain their distinct cultural identity.

Certain parts of Central Europe received Christian faith in the 9th century through the missionaries Cyril and Methodius. Although later the influence of Western Christendom prevailed for some time, the region was a crossroad for both streams.

The Hussite Reformation in the 15th century aimed at reforming the church universal. Waldensians and Hussites represented a new type of ecumenical cooperation. The Hussite manifestos reached centres such as Venice, Vienna, Barcelona, Paris, Cambridge, Heidelberg and Kraków, and were a challenging factor in Europe for many years. Waldensians and Hussites together with the Unity of Brethren (Unitas Fratrum) represent the first (or radical) Reformation (see first and radical Reformation churches). They emphasized the gospel, especially the sermon on the mount, and lived by the eschatological expectation of Christ's kingdom. Not only the practice of the church but also human society should be governed by the law of the gospel.

The second (or magisterial) Reformation of Luther, Zwingli and Calvin thus laboured in a field prepared in the preceding epoch. These later Reformers discovered the importance of the epistles and deepened biblical interpretation and theological reflection. The first Reformation was a popular movement; the second spread to the middle stratum of society and was therefore socially more conservative.

John Amos Comenius (1592-1670) stressed the complementarity of both trends, embodying in his life and work the continuing dialogue between the two streams that made up the Reformation. For Comenius the church plays a crucial role in the process of renewal. The necessary prerequisite for universal unity and harmony is unity among Christians. Christians are called to introduce a church order such that "you may see all churches if you see a single one". One of his dreams was the convocation of a universal council. Comenius regretted that the Reformers were not able to achieve the full renewal of the churches and that the Reformation remained an incomplete and unfinished task.

In 1570 the consensus of Sandomir in Poland offered a hopeful sign of tolerance and ecumenical cooperation among Protestants. In Czech lands, Protestants achieved religious freedom and equal legal status on the basis of the Confessio Bohemica (1575). The freedom of religion introduced by the emperor's decree was unique in Europe at that time, and it facilitated creation of a united Protestant church directed by a common consistory. Unfortunately, this hopeful development was interrupted after the battle of White Mountain (1620), when a Counter-Reformation was introduced which lasted until 1781. The measures against Protestants were introduced in all parts of Central Europe under the control of the Habsburg monarchy. Peasants and small artisans who could not emigrate were forced to accept the Roman Catholic faith.

During these difficult times some members of the Unity of Brethren from Moravia went to Saxony, where in 1722 they founded Herrnhut on the land owned by Count Zinzendorf. The Moravian Church, led by Zinzendorf and under the influence of pietism, became famous for its diaconal and missionary activity in Greenland, Africa and the Caribbean.

The Edict of Toleration (1781) did not yet put Protestants on an equal footing with the Roman Catholic Church, and it was only with the emperor's decree of 1861 that their situation improved. This enabled contacts with sister churches abroad, especially in Germany, Switzerland, the Netherlands and Scotland; and when the World Alliance of Reformed Churches was founded in 1875, the Reformed churches of Hungary and of Bohemia and Moravia were among the first to join. A Protestant ecumenical weekly (Kostnické jiskry) began publication in Prague in 1903 and it still exists.

By the end of the 19th century the Russian Orthodox Church and the Anglican church were discussing intercommunion. There was a correspondence between the archbishop of Canterbury and Metropolitan Platon of Kiev. An Anglican-Orthodox student conference at St Albans, England, was instrumental in founding the Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius in 1928, which contributed to extending and deepening ecumenical awareness of the Eastern Orthodox tradition.

Most of the major conferences of the two streams of the early 20th-century ecumenical movement – the Faith and Order and Life and Work movements – were attended by church leaders and theologians from Central and Eastern Europe and became the platform on which the Protestant representatives entered into dialogue with their Orthodox colleagues. Especially significant was the conference of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches* in Prague in 1928. National Student Christian Movements, organized in the WSCF since 1895, played a crucial ecumenical role. Such movements existed in Russia (until 1917), Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Bulgaria. Retreats, regional gatherings and the meeting of the WSCF general committee in Chamcoria, Bulgaria, in 1935 deepened the exchange of mutual knowledge and cooperation between the Orthodox and Protestant worlds. Articles in the WSCF quarterly Student World prepared the atmosphere for more sustained ecumenical cooperation also in Eastern Europe. Several Christian student leaders were involved in the resistance movement against Nazism during the second world war. Some of them (J. © imsa, K. Valenta) perished in prisons and concentration camps.

As in many other regions, ecumenical concerns were represented by charismatic leaders who were at the same time outstanding theologians: Stefan Zankov (Bulgaria), Josef L. Hromádka (Czechoslovakia), Vasile Ispir (Romania) and János Victor (Hungary).

After the second world war it was possible for the Orthodox churches to enter into closer cooperation in spite of the new political and ideological division. At the conference of these churches in Moscow in 1948 it was decided not to join the ecumenical movement. However, the Russian Orthodox Church established a link with the WCC, a WCC delegation visited the Moscow Patriarchate, and the Russian Orthodox Church and other churches of Eastern Europe eventually joined the WCC at its assembly in New Delhi in 1961 and later.

The impact of the cold war on the ecumenical movement was foreshadowed by the confrontation between John Foster Dulles (USA) and Josef L. Hromádka at the first WCC assembly held in Amsterdam (1948). Hromádka warned the ecumenical fellowship against the temptation in a world divided into two power blocs to side with one ideological option. The integrity of the WCC was put to the test at the central committee meeting in Toronto in 1950, when the issue of the Korean war was discussed, and with the uprising in Hungary (October 1956) soon after the WCC central committee met in that country. It would be worthwhile to examine how the meetings of the Christian Peace Conference,* founded by Hromádka and others in Prague in 1958 and attended by many church representatives from the East and West, contributed to more open attitudes on the part of the Eastern churches.

For some 40 years the churches in Central and Eastern Europe lived in a frontier situation, on the battle line between two blocs. In this particular context they were called to bring witness to Jesus Christ, to be prophetic without being arrogant or self-righteous. Because of the contribution of Hromádka and others, the ecumenical movement did not fall into the trap of blind, uncritical anti-communism. The awareness of belonging to a worldwide fellowship of Christians helped the churches to endure trials and difficult times. Some have claimed that the witness of the churches was weakened by the "soft" stance which some church leaders took on Marxism and communism. Such soul-searching questions should be discussed in the framework of ecumenical dialogue, not forgetting the remark of Gustav Heinemann that Jesus of Nazareth did not die in opposition to Karl Marx but for Karl Marx.

After the second world war the churches in Central and Eastern Europe lived in societies guided by a Marxist ideology which considered religion a human product arising from a situation of oppression and injustice. Some churches, particularly in Albania, were persecuted and decimated; others were more tolerated and came up with a new convincing witness. Despite interference by socialist governments, many insights and experiences, which have implications for the church universal, were accumulated; and it is regrettable that Christians in East Germany, for example, had no possibility to carry through their own specific achievements after reunification with the West.

From the perspective of Christian faith, the years from 1945 to 1989 should not be considered lost or wasted. It was a time of difficulties and temptations, but also of challenges and new opportunities. Without glorification or demonization, this period, as any other epoch, stood under both the judgment and promise of God. Christian communities living without their earlier privileges and power discovered that their powerlessness was often the source of a new authority and credibility. The churches learned to keep their distance from the corridors of power and to remain close to simple people. It was confirmed again that a well-organized minority can play an important and decisive role, that Christian existence is always a costly discipleship, that a truly Christian life is not possible without the fellowship of sustaining community. In a situation of censorship and self-censorship, Christian local congregations often became places of free speech. Preaching about God's freedom, righteousness and peace prepared the ground for the eventual radical change. Pastors understood anew that each sermon is a political action. A church can be politically relevant without having direct access to political structures. God-talk renders every political power and institution penultimate and provisional. The living God challenges the totalitarian claims of secular rulers. A Christian existence is vulnerable but it ultimately does not depend on a social system and external safeguards. In the dialogue with Marxists Christians learned to take Marxism seriously. Marxist atheism challenged Christians to question whether they were not sometimes practical atheists.

After the changes in 1989-90 many Christians soon realized that the messianic age had not arrived with the advent of democracy, privatization and the free market. Although the new situation seems more friendly and conducive to the witness and presence of Christian churches, it is necessary to distinguish between God and the idol of consumerism. In an atmosphere of neo-liberalism and post-modernism issues of injustice, exclusion, exploitation, unemployment, poverty, hunger and violence should not disappear from the churches' agenda. Also in the new situation the church is called to be prophetic.

Uniatism remains a complex and difficult issue affecting the relationship between the Eastern Orthodox churches and the Roman Catholic Church. Historically the problem stems from the efforts to overcome the split between Eastern and Western Christianity. Groups of Eastern Christians were persuaded to acknowledge the primacy of the pope while retaining Eastern liturgical practices. During communist rule, in some places the Greek Catholics were forced to become members of the Orthodox churches. Memories need to be healed, and the outstanding unsolved questions, often arising in a new situation, need to be approached in a spirit of reconciliation and ecumenical cooperation.

EUROPE: NORTHERN

GEOGRAPHICALLY, Northern Europe extends from Iceland and the Scandinavian peninsula to the northern part of the Ural mountains. Politically, it covers Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, including the autonomous areas of Faroe Islands, Greenland and Åland Islands. Northern Europe is a homogeneous ethnological and cultural region with relatively slight national differences, although there are some special characteristics.

Christian missions reached Northern Europe in the 9th century, mainly from the West. Only some eastern parts of Finland were Christianized from the Eastern church. By the 13th century even the most remote districts were evangelized. Multiple historical, cultural and ethnological links to Germany brought the Lutheran reformation quickly to Northern Europe; and the nationalistic tendencies of the Reformation found fertile soil in Scandinavia, where national profiles were emerging. From the very beginning the Lutheran faith thus strengthened the position of the crown and laid the groundwork for the state-church system (still in existence in Norway and Denmark, and the situation until recently in Finland and Sweden: see church and state).

Historically, the Scandinavian countries resisted non-Lutheran churches and any deviation in the form of their people's worship. However, the first part of the 18th century saw some concessions to other faiths and denominations, often for economic reasons. At the end of the 19th century the influence of the French Enlightenment and German Idealism led, on the one hand, to a less dogmatic Lutheranism but, on the other, to a certain alienation between church and culture.* At the same time, strong pietistic revival movements spread through the Nordic countries. National churches could not welcome such movements, especially as they were led by the laity.* Consequently, Free congregations and churches were formed, especially in Sweden. In Finland, Norway and to some extent Denmark, the pietistic tradition entered the Lutheran churches and soon became a spiritual force, which still prevails in large areas of the region.

In all Nordic countries the church-going rates are very low, but Christian values are still generally accepted as a foundation for life. Such a setting is not particularly encouraging for ecumenism. However, Nordic Lutheran churches have traditionally been active in the international ecumenical movement since the Life and Work* conference in Stockholm in 1925, convened by Archbishop Nathan Söderblom of Uppsala. All the national Lutheran churches in Northern Europe are active members of the Lutheran World Federation* (LWF), the WCC and the Conference of European Churches (CEC), in most cases from the very beginning. Since the 1920s the Nordic Lutheran churches and the Church of England have organized Anglo-Scandinavian theological conferences. The growing immigration and influx of refugees to the region has also greatly encouraged ecumenical attitudes.

The Nordic missionary societies maintain widespread international relations and have significantly advanced the ecumenical interaction of the Nordic churches, as have the growing church-aid organizations in Northern Europe. As an expression of Scandinavian solidarity in ecumenism, Northern European churches created in 1940 the Nordic Ecumenical Institute (NEI), now located in Uppsala under the name Nordic Ecumenical Council (NEC), a study and information centre for ecumenical and interchurch activities. Twenty-two Nordic churches and national ecumenical organizations are represented.

All the Lutheran churches in the Nordic and Baltic region participated in 1989-92 in remarkable theological conversations with the Anglican churches in Britain and Ireland, leading to the Porvoo declaration (see Porvoo communion), subsequently signed by 10 of the 12 participating churches (the Evangelical Lutheran Churches in Denmark and Latvia did not sign). The signatory churches undertake to consider baptized members of another church in the communion as their own members and to welcome episcopally ordained ministers to officiate in other churches, on invitation. The agreement also calls the member churches to work and pray for a further strengthening of visible unity of the church.

Lutheran-Catholic dialogue in the region is in the course of preparation.

DENMARK

In the year 960, the Danish king "Harald the Bluetooth made the Danes Christian" – so says the inscription on a stone in the town of Jelling. Christianity, as the predominant religion ever since, has left its mark on many aspects of Danish life and society. Christian symbols are often used to represent the Danish nationality, such as the cross on the national flag and the picture of the Jelling Stone in the Danish passport.

Today, 84.7% of the population are members of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Denmark (ELCD). There are more than 15 Christian denominations in Denmark, but the churches outside the ELCD only claim around 1% of the population. The Roman Catholic Church is the second largest church in Denmark with about 35,000 members. Immigration is introducing more Christian denominations and also Islam, which since the 1980s has become the second largest religion in the country with about 200,000 adherents.

The significant role of the ELCD and the dominance of Lutheran Christianity in the country since 1536 have resulted in some ambiguity regarding ecumenical involvement. The ELCD has always participated in ecumenical work, and has been a founding member of international church organizations. It has also taken an active part in commissions and conferences, but has not always found it possible to sign ecumenical documents such as the Porvoo declaration and the Joint Declaration on Justification. In 2001, however, the ELCD signed the Leuenberg agreement and became a full member of the Leuenberg church fellowship.

The ELCD is a member of the Lutheran World Federation, the World Council of Churches, the Conference of European Churches, and the Nordic Ecumenical Council. At the national level, it is a member of the Ecumenical Council of Denmark.

The Ecumenical Council was established in 1939, and is an associate council of the WCC. The Council has been involved in Faith and Order work and in projects on refugees, human rights, peace, poverty, and so on.

In 1989, the Council on International Relations of the ELCD was established by law. It is responsible for relations between the ELCD and other churches and church organizations, both nationally and internationally. The members of the Council are elected every four years and represent the ten dioceses in Denmark; the minister of church affairs appoints two bishops, and the Faroe Islands and Greenland, independent dioceses with their own legislation, each nominate an observer.

In recent years, many contacts have been made between Danish parishes and congregations in other countries, especially in Eastern Europe. These relationships have had a positive effect on local interchurch work in Denmark.

A number of religious organizations, such as the missionary societies, do ecumenical and interchurch work. DanChurchAid, an ecumenical organization related to the ELCD, is involved in relief and development work all over the world, in close cooperation with local churches as well as with the LWF, the WCC and Action by Churches Together. In 1992, the entire Bible was again translated into Danish by the Danish Bible Society, and all the churches now use the same text.

FINLAND

More than 90% of the 5.2 million Finns belong to Christian churches or communities: the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland has 4.4 million members; the Orthodox Church of Finland has 56,000 members and the Pentecostals some 50,000 members. Smaller churches and communities are the Evangelical Free Church of Finland, the Catholic church in Finland, Baptist churches, the Seventh-day Adventists and Methodist churches.

In ten years the number of Muslims has grown from 1000 to 20,000. The Jewish community numbers about 1100, most of them descendants of immigrants from Russia in the 19th century.

The Lutheran church is in dialogue with the Evangelical Free Church of Finland, the Pentecostal movement, the Baptist churches and the Orthodox Church of Finland. Since 1970 dialogue has been going on with the Russian Orthodox Church.

The body responsible for ecumenical relations in the Lutheran church of Finland is the department for international relations, which has offices for theology, ministry to Finns abroad, and global mission, and operates Finnchurchaid for international diakonia.

Ecumenical education is given in the theological faculties in Helsinki and Turku. The ecumenical faculty of theology in Joensuu with departments for Eastern and Western theology is to be set up in 2002.

The Finnish Ecumenical Council, founded in 1917, has 12 member churches and communities; 18 Christian communities and ecumenical organizations are observers. The council works through committees such as faith and order, local ecumenism, education and evangelism, and pays special attention to the training of young adults.

ICELAND

The Evangelical Lutheran Church of Iceland (ELCI) is predominant, with a membership of 87.8% of the population. Other groups include the Evangelical Lutheran Free churches (3.9%), Roman Catholics (1.5%), Seventh-day Adventists (0.3%), Pentecostals (0.5%), and some charismatic and/or Calvinistic churches (0.1-0.3%). More and more people are giving up membership of the national church, and most of them have instead registered in one of the Evangelical Lutheran Free churches.

Local ecumenism is rather uncomplicated, as the number of adherents of other churches is very low and church leaders know each other and can work as bridge-builders. Confessional discussions seldom arise, and ecumenical questions are handled by a task-force for promoting interchurch relations.

Icelandic society is becoming increasingly plural. Based on developments in the last decade of the 20th century, membership of the ELCI will probably drop to 80% in the first decade of the 21st, and membership of the Lutheran Free churches is likely to continue to grow. Because of increased immigration, the membership of the Catholic church and of some non-Christian religious groups, especially the Muslim communities, will also grow. For two decades indifference to religion and the church was quite noticeable, but this is changing and interest in religious matters is growing. This will bring more tension between different interpretations and traditions, but also greater attendance at church services and meetings. The prospects for religion in Iceland are bright, but theology, religious interpretation and practices at the local level need to adapt to the times.

NORWAY

Norway has 4.5 million inhabitants, 87% of whom belong to the Lutheran folk state church, the Church of Norway. Of the other churches, the two largest are the Pentecostal church and the Catholic church, both with approximately 45,000 members. There are also small United Methodist, Baptist, Mission Covenant and Free Lutheran churches, and the Salvation Army and Orthodox congregations.

During the last 30 years, the number of Muslims increased to approximately 50,000; there are small communities of Jews, Hindus, Buddhists and Baha'is. The Humanist Association has 70,000 members.

The Christian Council of Norway has 14 member churches including Catholic, Orthodox, the Church of Norway and other Protestant churches. They work at all levels, including internationally, and ecumenical relations and cooperation are good.

The Council has a commission on theology and is also responsible for the national coordination of the Decade to Overcome Violence.

Several dialogues are ongoing. There is an agreement between the Church of Norway and the United Methodist Church called "Fellowship of Grace". The Church of Norway is in continuous dialogue with the Catholic church and the Muslim and Jewish communities. The International Humanist and Ethical Union brings together the ten largest faith and life-stance communities.

The Church of Norway has always cooperated actively with the foreign ministry in the areas of justice, peace and integrity of creation, and human rights.

The Bible Society is the broadest ecumenical forum in the country and Norwegian Church Aid is the Protestant churches aid organization. Theological education is given in several institutions of the Lutheran, Baptist and Mission Covenant churches.

SWEDEN

The largest church in Northern Europe is the Church of Sweden (Lutheran) with a membership of about 83% of the population. Also present in the country are the Roman Catholic Church, the Orthodox and Oriental churches, the Pentecostal movement, the Mission Covenant Church, the Salvation Army, different denominations of the Baptist tradition, Jehovah's Witnesses, and a recent separatist movement called Livets Ord (The word of life). Following the disestablishment of the Church of Sweden in 2000, they all have equal legal status.

Through immigration, the fastest growing churches are the Orthodox and Oriental;

the Muslim community numbers about 90,000 adherents, the Jewish some 20,000. Sweden is fast becoming a multireligious and multicultural society, and consequently a major challenge is to foster inter-religious dialogue in order to increase understanding and further social cohesion, as well as prevent conflict.

Swedish ecumenical history is marked by two key international ecumenical gatherings: the Life and Work conference in Stockholm (1925), and the WCC's fourth assembly in Uppsala (1968), which inspired an ongoing popular series of national ecumenical assemblies representing a wide range of churches.

The Church of Sweden maintains international relations through the secretariat for ecumenism. In addition to current international ecumenical dialogue, many churches are involved in several bilateral theological conversations. Many of the Free churches have conducted bilateral talks with the Church of Sweden on questions of doctrine and practical cooperation at the congregational level.

The faculties of theology at the state universities of Uppsala and Lund and seven theological seminaries of the Free churches teach education on ecumenism.

Most denominations are represented in the Christian Council of Sweden, including the Roman Catholic Church and the immigrant churches, and three have observer status (Pentecostals, Adventists and Free Baptists). Since 1972 a development forum of the Swedish churches has emphasized the churches' responsibility for world economic development, peace and justice, and this work is now integrated in the Christian Council.

The Life and Peace Institute in Uppsala, founded in 1985, is an international centre for peace efforts and peace research on an ecumenical basis. The Swedish Missionary Council coordinates the work of 19 missionary organizations. Other interdenominational organizations include the Student Christian Movement, the Swedish Women's Ecumenical Council, the Swedish Fellowship of Reconciliation and the Association for Christian Humanism and Social Concern.

EUROPE: SOUTHERN

WHILE THE term "Southern Europe" includes, from a geographical point of view, the three great peninsulas – the Iberian, the Italian and the Balkan – the countries ruled by communist parties after the second world war (Albania, Bulgaria, Romania and the former Yugoslavia) are generally considered as belonging to Eastern Europe; at the same time, southern France is culturally part of the Mediterranean world. Ecumenically, Southern Europe is normally considered to include Portugal, Spain, Italy, Greece and Malta.

Italy, Spain, Portugal and to a large extent Malta have in common a Latin and Mediterranean cultural heritage; they include to a greater or lesser degree some of the poorest regions of Europe. In recent decades Southern Europe experienced the consequences of massive internal migration from countryside to town, and external migration to the industrialized countries of Central Europe. All countries are now facing the new phenomenon of immigration from Africa and Eastern Europe.

The three Latin countries are overwhelmingly dominated by Roman Catholicism, even if some show a large degree of secularization.* Greece is mostly Orthodox, though it is not entirely under the jurisdiction of the Greek Orthodox church; Crete has an autocephalous Orthodox church, and some continental areas and Aegean islands are under the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople.

In the 16th century the religious ideas of the Reformation reached both the Iberian and the Italian peninsulas, producing a number of groups, congregations and individuals utterly Protestant in their faith. With the exception of the Waldensians, however, this movement was eventually crushed by the Inquisition. The Waldensians were a medieval movement which joined the Calvinistic Reformation and survived until the 19th century in a tiny area of the western Alps, later expanding to other Italian regions. Otherwise, all the Protestant churches in this area, including Greece, are the result of 19th-century missionary endeavours by Methodists, Baptists, Brethren, Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Lutherans and Presbyterians, and by efforts in the 20th century of Pentecostals, Adventists and a number of US-based denominations. In many cases, the mission was initiated by indigenous believers, who often had become Protestant while living as migrants in Anglo-Saxon countries, and who had returned to their country of origin. Protestantism remains a tiny minority. Orthodoxy outside Greece was until recently confined to small ethnic groups, which are now growing because of immigration. In 1991 the Ecumenical Patriarchate established the Orthodox archdiocese of Italy, with seat in Venice.

Until the Second Vatican Council and the fall of the dictatorships in Spain and Portugal, Protestantism was (and often still is) considered as something suspicious and alien in the Latin countries, and the same attitude prevails in Greece to this day. In the wake of Vatican II a large number of German and English Protestant theological works were translated into Spanish and Italian. Some exchanges of students and visiting professors among Roman Catholic and Protestant theological seminaries do take place.

Local ecumenism has two aspects: among Protestant denominations and between these and the majority church (Roman Catholic or Orthodox). In the Latin countries ecumenical bodies are formed by Protestant and Anglican churches: the Portuguese Council of Christian Churches includes Presbyterians, Methodists and the Lusitanian Church (Anglican); the Federation of Protestant Churches in Italy groups Waldensians, Methodists, Baptists, Lutherans, Salvation Army and a few smaller churches. In Spain ecumenical impulses are represented by the Spanish Committee of Cooperation between the Churches, formed by the Spanish Evangelical Church and the Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church; a broader evangelical federation, FEREDE, includes also the various evangelical churches. In Greece there is no ecumenical structure.

In all the countries of the area, with specific peculiarities for each one of them, the minority-majority ecumenism faces several difficulties. First, the mere numerical disproportion (1% or less Protestants) prevents any encounter among churches as equal partners except under special circumstances. Nevertheless, at the local level ecumenical encounters, dialogue, Bible study and common engagement do take place. In Italy, an official dialogue between the bishops conference and the Waldensian and Methodist churches began in 1988 on the issue of mixed marriages and finally resulted in a common declaration in 1998.

Second, this sense of Protestants as "second-class" Christians is reinforced by the theological and cultural tradition according to which the average clergy and laypersons in these countries call their church the church and often regard Protestant churches as sects.* There is no full mutual recognition among all the churches.

Third, especially for the Orthodox, the issue of proselytism* is a sensitive one. While all are opposed to it, majority and minority churches understand it differently. Minorities tend to consider "proselytism" as bribing or putting psychological pressure on people to lure them into changing allegiances, but admit as perfectly legitimate and honest any theologically grounded invitation to join their faith and, consequently, their congregation. Majority churches tend to consider any invitation to join a denomination different from the one in which the person (even a totally secularized person) was baptized as proselytism, but do not consider as such the pressure put on members of minority churches by the sociological and cultural weight of their large majority, which they often identify, with little ecumenical sensitivity, as the religion of the country.

In areas where the minorities are scarcely present, it is difficult to have any ecumenism in the sense of dialogue or joint action with people of other confessions or denominations. But dialogues and joint actions exist where circumstances make it possible, e.g.

the monthly Italian Confronti, jointly sponsored by progressive Protestants and Roman Catholics since 1974. The term “ecumenical” appears in the title of several Protestant centres (the most prominent being Agape in Italy, Los Rubios in Spain, Figueira da Foz in Portugal) and in organizations such as the Secretariat for Ecumenical Activities, an Italian movement led by Roman Catholic and Protestant laypeople, founded by Catholic laywoman Maria Vingiani in 1949.

Relationships with the WCC, the Conference of European Churches and other international ecumenical organizations vary. The Church of Greece is a member of the WCC and CEC, as are most historic Protestant denominations in Southern Europe. Several fundamentalist denominations contrast “evangelical” with “ecumenical”, considering the latter as inclined to blur unduly the theological discrepancies between confessions, and therefore refrain from participating in ecumenical activities.

Established in 1982, the Ecumenical Forum of European Christian Women is active in all Southern European countries, promoting ecumenical links and commitment among Protestant, Orthodox and RC women’s organizations and groups, especially in the fields of justice for women and of women’s theological creativity.

An interesting process is the integration between Waldensian and Methodist churches in Italy, implemented in 1979. The numerical imbalance (6 to 1) would normally have made traditional church union difficult; integration implies joint government, joint activities and the same confession of faith while preserving denominational identity and separate fellowship in Christian World Communions.* Close cooperation between Waldensian/Methodist and Baptist churches in Italy has developed since 1990: it includes mutual recognition of members, exchange of ministers, and a common weekly newspaper, Riforma.

Protestant mainline churches in Italy, Spain and Portugal (as well as those of France, Belgium and French-speaking Switzerland) belong to the Conference of Protestant Churches of Latin Countries in Europe (CEPPL). Up to the 1960s it was engaged in the defence of religious liberty* for Protestant minorities in Italy, Portugal, Spain and Belgium. Later it developed a keen interest in “diaspora”* issues concerning the problems of Protestant minorities scattered over large areas. It also sponsored seminars for radio preachers. In the three Latin countries of Southern Europe, Protestant churches have developed considerable social programmes (e.g. with refugees and migrants) for which they have received financial help from stronger churches, and lately from state funds.

Besides these institutional ecumenical relations a number of informal movements or groups gathered around themes such as peace, justice, anti-racism, human rights, etc., which are fundamentally ecumenical in nature – they take their inspiration from Christian impulses and forget or largely disregard traditional confessional boundaries. Their number and importance are difficult to assess and are different from country to country and between urban and rural areas.

Events such as the European Ecumenical Assemblies, in Basel on peace and justice in 1989 and in Graz on reconciliation in 1997, revealed a keen ecumenical commitment by interested groups, even if the follow-up back home was limited. The “Charta Oecumenica: Guidelines for the Growing Cooperation among the Churches in Europe”, launched in April 2001 by the Conference of European Churches and its Roman Catholic counterpart, the Council of European Bishops Conferences, has been widely translated and discussed in Southern Europe. The minority churches in this area particularly value the commitment, proposed by the Charta, to “defend the rights of minorities and to help reduce misunderstandings and prejudices between majority and minority churches in our countries”.

EUROPE: WESTERN

FOR THE purposes of this entry, Western Europe comprises Belgium, the British Isles, France, Germany, Luxemburg, the Netherlands and Switzerland. The political boundaries have not changed: e.g., Belgium and Holland were united in one kingdom until 1831, when Belgium split off again; Germany was divided after the second world war and re-united in 1990. In any case, the contemporary geographical boundaries of Western Europe re-group older kingdoms or nations* such as Alemans, Frisians, Saxons, Angles, Picts and Gauls.

Christianity was in Europe already by the 2nd century. In France church history mentions the martyrs of Lyons, c.180 and the council of Arles in 314. The re-Christianization of Europe became necessary after the fall of the Roman empire and the barbarian invasions. In 6th-century Europe the primary evangelists were women, especially Christian princesses who married pagan kings and then influenced them to become Christians; when the kings were baptized so were their subjects. For example, Clothilde played a large part in the conversion of her husband Clovis and so brought about the conversion of the Franks. Later, Justinian I and II made Christianity their concern, suppressing those who would not convert.

While the Roman pattern of conversion was urban, the pattern of the Celtic missionaries, rooted in monasteries, was rural. The Celtic mission began from Rome, spread through southern France and northern Spain into Ireland and from there to Scotland and northern England. The synod of Whitby in 664 settled for Roman traditions but the Celtic spirituality lived on (and has recently been revived in such places as the Iona community). Germany, Holland and Belgium were evangelized by Willibrord, later called Clement (739), and Winifrid, later called Boniface (854).

From the 7th century Islam became a threat. Its impact was not uniform in the world, but it is arguable that the threat contributed to the intensification of monastic life with stress on celibacy, education, copying of manuscripts and the spread of Latin. By the end of the 8th century there was decisive re-alignment of forces within the Christian world under the impact of Islam. Authority was divided between secular and religious powers. But the pope exercised independent moral strength.

Although the power of the pope was strong in Western Europe until the end of the 15th century and unity seemed to exist, there was very considerable dissidence within the church. The activity of John Wycliffe (1330-84) and Jan Hus (c.1370-1415) heralded the Reformation* which came with Luther (1483-1546), Zwingli (1484-1531) and Calvin (1509-64). Lutheranism became strong in Germany and the Scandinavian countries; the Reformed church was strong in Switzerland, Scotland and the Dutch Republic, as well as in Bohemia and Hungary in Central Europe. In 1566 Holland saw the Beeldenstorm, or iconoclastic tempest.

The Reformation followed different patterns. For example, it had its impact in the cities of Holland in the 1570s, while the countryside was not "purged" until early in the 17th century. At around this time, disputes in the church of the Reformation led to the birth of other groups such as the Mennonites. In any case, the Dutch Reformed Church, which was Calvinist, was a "privileged church" (to be distinguished from the established church) until the French occupation (1795), when Napoleon decided that no denomination should be disadvantaged. But when the privileged church was alive, Catholics and other suppressed Protestants were in hidden churches. The Reformation in Holland was not so violent after 1600, and so substantial groups of other churches became signs of a fragmented Christianity which has continued till today. The year 1723 saw the birth of the church of Utrecht, also called the Old Catholic schism.

In England Henry VIII broke with the pope, and his daughter Elizabeth established a religious settlement which brought as many Puritans and Catholics as possible within the Anglican church. All the churches of the Reformation laid stress on the Bible and the vernacular liturgy. The Anglican church also kept the threefold ministry* of bishop, priest and deacon. Attempts at reconciliation* by the Roman Catholic Church failed, as did attempts to bring the churches of the Reformation into a closer unity, partly because of the growth of nationalism.

THE ISSUE OF UNITY

In the 17th and 18th centuries, people spoke of three parts of the divided church, i.e. Lutheran, Reformed and Roman Catholic. In the 17th century there was a search for the unity* of the church through discussion and theological exploration. The growth of pietism led to a desire for ecumenical exchange of fellowship. Hugo Grotius (1583-1645), who saw the connection between ecumenism and mission,* tried to organize an ecumenical synod of all churches except the Roman Catholic Church. His effort failed, as did that of Daniel Jablonski (1660-1741), for whom the cornerstone of the unity of the evangelical churches was to be the biblical orthodoxy of the Brethren and Anglican tradition.

The search for Christian unity, both moral and organizational, continued in the 18th century, and the end of the century saw the formation of the German Christian fellowship, a developed idea of the "spiritual society". Established in Basel, it spread rapidly and gave rise to the Basel Mission House, the Basel Missionary Society, and Bible Tract Societies in Switzerland, Germany and Britain. Throughout the 18th century the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, an Anglican society founded in 1689, kept close contact with the continental Lutheran and Reformed churches and supported Lutheran and Reformed ministers in the mission field.

ECUMENICAL DEVELOPMENTS IN WESTERN EUROPE

As ecumenical interest in the 19th century slowly turned towards ecclesiology (see church), worldwide fellowships of churches arose: the first meeting of the Alliance of Reformed Churches was in 1875, the first Methodist ecumenical conference in 1881, the first Baptist world congress in 1905. Old Catholic churches of the world joined in 1889 in the Union of Utrecht. There were also parallel movements within countries: in 1848 a diet of German churches held in Wittenberg marked the beginning of steps which led eventually to the formation of the Evangelical Church in Germany in 1922.

In the Church of England the "high church" wing sought closer union with Roman Catholics, the "evangelical" wing better relationships with the non-conformists (one result of which was the formation of the [World's] Evangelical Alliance* in 1846) and the "broad church" group a comprehensive church that would bring in as many non-conformists as possible to a re-constituted Church of England.

The voluntary movements associated with the evangelical awakening in the 19th century also gave fresh impetus to the ecumenical movement. The driving force of these movements was mission, both evangelism* and social reform. Most churches founded their own missionary societies, but there were also joint ventures such as the British and Foreign Bible Society. Two great Christian youth movements were founded in England: the Young Men's Christian Association* (1844) and the Young Women's Christian Association* (1855). The same period also saw the emergence of the Student Christian Movements, which in 1895 coalesced in the World Student Christian Federation.* Together, the three movements nurtured many leaders of the ecumenical movement.

In most nations of Western Europe, national councils of churches* were set up: in Britain in 1942, in the Netherlands in 1946, in Germany in 1822 (re-founded 1948). The growing involvement of the Roman Catholic Church in ecumenical activities at the European level was reflected in conversations in a number of countries of Western Europe in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The most extensive alteration of institutional ecumenical arrangements was in the British Isles. In 1990 the British Council of Churches was re-constituted as the Council of Churches for Britain and Ireland (in 1999 re-named Churches Together in Britain and Ireland); it has full Roman Catholic membership. At the same time new national ecumenical bodies were set up in England, Wales and Scotland. The aim of these instruments is to set a new pattern of ecumenical relationships, responding to a sense that councils of churches had acquired a life of their own outside the mainstream of churches and that the decisions they made were largely ignored. The new ecumenical bodies have no decision-making powers of their own; decisions are instead made by the relevant bodies in the member churches, which seek to ensure that there is more genuine ecumenical cooperation at every level. The political process of devolution, with the establishment of the Scottish parliament and the Welsh assembly, has strengthened the role of the national ecumenical instruments.

In the rest of Europe the issue of finding ways to work with the Roman Catholic Church continues. New frictions have also developed between the Orthodox church and the Evangelical churches.

The proliferation of theological dialogue, both multilateral and bilateral, at the global and regional levels during the last third of the 20th century has challenged churches to harvest the fruit of these discussions in agreements at the regional, national and local levels. Notable examples of binding agreements between churches across national boundaries which included churches in Western Europe are the Leuenberg agreement (Reformation churches), the Meissen agreement (Evangelical Church in Germany and the Church of England) and the Porvoo* agreement (Anglican and Lutheran churches).

THE CHRISTIAN WOMEN'S MOVEMENT

In the 18th and 19th centuries many Christian organizations for women were founded, among them the Mothers' Union (Anglican), the Union of Catholic Mothers (RC) and the Baptist Women's League. In the second half of the 20th century a new phenomenon emerged, the Christian feminist movement with a feminist theology.* An important role in this has been played by the Ecumenical Forum of European Christian Women, growing out of a discussion in Brussels in 1978. The forum links together Christian women and Christian women's organizations throughout Europe, both traditional and radical; its members come from all European churches including Roman Catholic. It seeks to bring about the greater participation of women in church and society and also to promote the unity of the churches and the unity and peace of Europe. The fourth assembly of the forum was held in Budapest in 1994 around the theme "Be Not Afraid – Remember the Future"; the fifth assembly, in Madrid in 1998, met under the theme "Facing the New Millennium with Promise".

Another initiative arising in Europe during the 1990s was the Women's Synod Movement. The idea for such a synod at the European level came from Christian feminists concerned about the quality of their own lives and the lives of others in Europe today. From 1990 to 1995 national synods were held in the Netherlands, Austria, Germany and Switzerland; in July 1997 the first European women's synod was held in Gmunden, Austria, under the theme "Women for Change in the 21st Century". It was ecumenical and inter-religious and had no principle of delegation. More than 1000 women attended, many of them Roman Catholic. More regional and European-wide synods are planned.

Women were also present in large numbers at the second European Ecumenical Assembly, held in Graz, Austria, in June 1997, under the theme "Reconciliation – Gift of God and Source of New Life"; they still felt that their issues were marginalized and they were given insufficient leadership positions.

NEW VISIONS FOR EUROPE

After the enthusiasm of the early years, ecumenical life in Europe seems in many ways to have been at a low ebb for some time. Genuine progress in Christian unity has been difficult to achieve. The year 1989 saw tremendous political change in Europe. Along with new political freedom in Central and Eastern Europe came economic collapse and new problems and threats. Ecumenical organizations have sought to respond to these challenges and possibilities in various ways. At a special church leaders meeting in Geneva in March 1990, great emphasis was laid on the mission of the churches in a secularized Europe, a theme also taken up by the Roman Catholic synod of bishops in 1992. While this challenge could give new life to the ecumenical movement in Europe, there are also dangers to be avoided, such as fundamentalism, over-simplification of the gospel and renewed tensions between Orthodox and Catholics over the Eastern Catholic churches* (Uniates). In all this ferment in Europe women must be enabled to play a full part, and the Roman Catholic Church has an indispensable role. The unity and peace of Europe can be a great contribution to the unity and peace of the world; and this perhaps poses a particular challenge in Western Europe, given its historical role in both the divisions of the church and the two global wars of the 20th century.

Divisions in Europe can have widespread harmful effects: the pain and conflict in the former Yugoslavia, for example, pinpoints yet again the importance of Christian cooperation and understanding. The ethnic and religious conflicts also indicate that dialogue with people of other faiths, as well as dialogue between different Christian churches, is vitally important. Since the CEC assembly in Graz, which immediately followed the second European Ecumenical Assembly, more emphasis has been laid on the importance of dialogue and a churches in dialogue commission has been established.

EUROPEAN UNITY

EUROPE, with its eastern end at the Ural mountains, has always been the home of different peoples and cultures, whether of Graeco-Roman, Germanic or Slavonic origin. No single bond has united them more than their adoption of the Christian gospel. In the early Christian era, Rome and Constantinople were influential centres. In their cultural and ecclesiastical spheres these centres represented the different practical expressions of the gospel, with their respective theologies, liturgies, forms of spirituality and structures.

Equally important in each centre, however, is the relationship between church and state,* bishop and monarch. Gradually, the East and West of Europe grew apart until the 1054 formal break in church fellowship between Rome and Constantinople. Thereafter, and still in many instances, East and West each has gone its own way – ecclesiastically, politically and culturally. Thus, one can place the boundaries between the East and West of Europe at the point where peoples and countries of Byzantine heritage meet those influenced by Rome.

At the end of the 1980s, a non-violent revolution brought about the disappearance of the communist system of Eastern-bloc states. These states are slowly developing a new political and cultural profile, and East and West are reaching a new form of living and working together. Whatever the outcome, the churches in Europe, affected by these developments, are taking steps to make their own contribution to the development of this continent. For this purpose, the churches together maintain institutions in the centres of the new united Europe, above all in Brussels and Strasbourg, and take part in the work of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

As other continents re-discover their independence and free themselves of European tutelage, Europe has to take stock of its own identity and how to assume in a new way responsibility for itself and towards other continents. The churches are finding it difficult to respond adequately to the high expectations now being made of them. In varying ways they have been affected by historical developments which have weakened their spiritual life and the vigour of their witness, in particular (1) the fragmentation of the Western church into confessional churches and, in the Eastern church, the rivalry between the patriarchates; and (2) the growing secularization* affecting all areas of life as a consequence of the Enlightenment.

The churches in Europe have banded together to fulfill their common responsibility. In 1959 the majority of non-Roman Catholic churches in Europe joined together to form the Conference of European Churches* (CEC). Formally founded in 1964, its self-understanding corresponds to that of the WCC. CEC brings together Reformation and Orthodox churches. Its activities cross all East-West boundaries and make themselves felt in the political as well as in the church sphere. Europe itself is a central theme in its work. The conference speaks publicly through conferences and documents.

Corresponding to CEC on the Roman Catholic side is the Council of European Bishops Conferences (CCEE = Consilium Conferentiarum Episcopaliū Europae). The council was founded in 1971 and canonically approved by Pope Paul VI in 1977. Each national bishops conference sends a representative to the CCEE annual general assembly, as well as to the triennial European bishops symposium. In general, the tasks of the CCEE resemble those of CEC.

Five joint CCEE/CEC European meetings have been held (Chantilly 1978, Logumkloster 1981, Riva del Garda 1984, Erfurt 1988, Santiago de Compostela 1991). Both ecumenically and politically these meetings attracted wide interest. In May 1989 the two bodies sponsored the European Ecumenical Assembly on "Peace with Justice" in Basel, dealing with the specifically European dimension of these problems. A second assembly, on the theme of reconciliation, was held in 1997 (Graz, Austria).

In the European context, Reformation churches have come together in a new way. They have done this on the basis either of the Leuenberg* concord (Central Europe, 1973) or of the theological declaration of Porvoo* (Northern Europe, 1992).

EUTHANASIA

THE TERM "euthanasia" (literally "good" or "gentle" death or "dying well") covers a wide range of issues, depending upon whether the patient is conscious/competent or not and whether the physician's conduct is active or passive. Many people distinguish simply between voluntary euthanasia (where a competent, informed person asks another to end his or her life and is not coerced into doing so) and involuntary euthanasia where the life of a terminally ill person, who does not have the capacity for informed choice, is brought to an end. Since many believe that the person taking the life should be a trained physician, voluntary euthanasia is increasingly termed "physician-assisted suicide".

However, there are other acts or omissions that may also be seen as forms of euthanasia. A physician may withdraw treatment or medical intervention knowing that this will shorten a comatose patient's life. Or a conscious patient may refuse life-sustaining treatment even though the physician is willing to continue treatment. Or again, a patient might leave a Living Will to the effect that he or she does not wish to be treated in the event of serious illness. Given this wide range of possibilities, very few people remain wholly for or against every form of euthanasia. Even among advocates of "direct" or "active" euthanasia few recommend that the lives of all of those who are permanently comatose or have severe learning disabilities should be actively terminated.

Among Christians there is no unanimity on euthanasia. On this ethical issue, as on many others, there is a range of beliefs across denominations and within denominations. Even when a particular church takes a firm line against, for example, physician assisted suicide, some of its regular church-goers will conclude otherwise.

One recent survey (in the United Kingdom) revealed an increased support over the last two decades for physician-assisted suicide both among church-goers and the population as a whole, although support for euthanasia among regularly attending Roman Catholics was lower than in other churches.

It might once have been sufficient simply to argue that human life is God-given and should never be taken by human beings outside a context of a just war or just punishment. However, the dilemmas created by modern medicine seem to make such a clear-cut position increasingly difficult to hold. Is withdrawing life-sustaining medical treatment or intensive nursing care from a patient whose cortex is destroyed tantamount to euthanasia or not? Is withholding life-prolonging treatment with the agreement of conscious but terminally ill patients tantamount to assisted suicide or not? Modern medicine makes such questions unavoidable.

It is often argued by theologians in this context that human life is a gift from a loving God made known in Jesus Christ. The analogy of the gift-relationship finds its foundation in God's gift of the Logos and continues in the Logos's gift of life to us. We, in turn, should respond to this gift with gratitude, thanksgiving and deep responsibility. In contrast, those who lack this faith may see human life, not as a gracious gift, but as a chance by-product of a world that has meaning only if we choose to give it meaning. In theory at least, this second position allows human beings to shape human life as they will. If people decide to opt for euthanasia, then that is their autonomous choice: life can be shaped as they will. Conversely, for Christians life is God-given and is not simply to be shaped by humans as they will, but to be approached gratefully and responsibly.

Yet in the context of modern medicine the contrast between these two positions is not nearly so clear-cut. Christian doctors, committed to the belief that life is God-given, still face the same dilemmas about prolonging the lives of the terminally ill or permanently comatose. Gift-relationships are by no means all gracious – some can be highly manipulative, especially the required gifts of submission. Gracious gifts should be treated with gratitude and responsibility, but they may not bind the one to whom they are given – it is manipulative gifts that do that. Gracious gifts can be enjoyed for a while and then shared with, or even returned with gratitude to, the giver. Gracious gifts leave both giver and receiver free. Indeed when God-given life becomes nothing but a burden, it might seem appropriate to return that life prayerfully and humbly to the giver.

The WCC has not made any specific statements on euthanasia. The document of the Joint Working Group between the WCC and the Roman Catholic Church on "The Ecumenical Dialogue on Moral Issues" sought to offer general guidance on ethical approaches to such issues as euthanasia.

The 1998 Lambeth conference of Anglican bishops identified five "bedrock principles" which are crucial to this issue from a Christian perspective: (1) life is God-given and therefore has intrinsic sanctity, significance and worth; (2) human beings are in relationship with the created order and that relationship is characterized by such words as respect, enjoyment and responsibility; (3) human beings, while flawed by sin, nevertheless have the capacity to make free and responsible moral choices; (4) human meaning and purpose is found in our relationship with God, in the exercise of freedom, critical self-knowledge, and in our relationship with one another and the wider community; (5) this life is not the sum total of human existence; we find our ultimate fulfilment in eternity with God through Christ.

The bishops argued that a combination of the first, second and fourth principles precludes either voluntary or involuntary euthanasia. They also worried about the consequential dangers of legalizing such forms of euthanasia – especially the danger of abuse, the danger of diminution of respect for human life, and the danger of damaging the doctor-patient relationship. They summarized the dangers as follows: the virtual impossibility of framing and implementing legislation that would prevent abuse by the unscrupulous; a diminution of respect for all human life, especially of the marginalized and those who may be regarded as "unproductive" members of society; the potential devaluing of worth, in their own eyes, of the elderly, the sick and of those who are dependent on others for their well-being; the potential destruction of the important and delicate trust of the doctor-patient relationship.

However, they argued that the following are consonant with their Christian principles: to withhold or withdraw excessive medical treatment or intervention (e.g. life support) may be appropriate where there is no reasonable prospect of recovery; when the primary intent is to relieve suffering and not to bring about death, to provide supportive care for the alleviation of intolerable pain and suffering may be appropriate even if the side effect of that care is to hasten the dying process (i.e. the doctrine of double effect); to refuse or terminate medical treatment (such as declining to undertake a course of chemotherapy for cancer) is a legitimate individual moral choice; when the person is in a permanent vegetative state to sustain him or her with artificial nutrition and hydration may indeed be seen as constituting medical intervention.

The catechism of the Catholic Church (1992) states that “whatever its motives and means, direct euthanasia... is morally unacceptable... An act or omission which, in itself or by intention, causes death to eliminate suffering constitutes a murder gravely contrary to the dignity of the human person and to the respect due to the living God, (the) Creator.” However, it goes on to recognize that “discontinuing medical procedures that are burdensome, dangerous, extraordinary or disproportionate to the expected outcome can be legitimate... Here one does not will to cause death; one’s inability to impede it is merely accepted” (2277).

Euthanasia has not been an object of significant ecumenical debate, although in several countries (e.g., Australia) attempts to legislate for it have found the churches united in their opposition.

In April 2001 the Netherlands became the first country to legalize euthanasia, but only after considerable national debate. The legislation sets down very strict medical guidelines for euthanasia and only permits this practice for patients who are terminally ill and in a situation of desperate suffering. An explicit and well-considered request by the patient is necessary. Among the opposing voices was that of the Vatican which expressed its concern that the bill “violated human dignity” and that euthanasia “opposes the natural law of human conscience”. The Dutch churches reflect the broad variety of opinions found in secular society. The bishops conference of the Roman Catholic Church and the general secretary of the Uniting Reformed Churches, together with more orthodox Reformed churches and evangelical groups, protested against the law, while at the same time a group of 125 local pastors of the Uniting Reformed Churches supported it, emphasizing the very careful way in which doctors and families come to the decision to agree with the patient’s request to end his/her inhuman suffering, and stressing the wish to die with dignity. Many members of more liberal churches also supported the law, by canvassing members of parliament, and arguing in favour of human dignity – also in the terminal phase – human autonomy and free choice.

EVANGELICAL ECUMENICAL CONCERNS

WHILE “evangelical” and “ecumenical” are often used as mutually exclusive labels, Evangelicalism was originally ecumenical, though limited to inter-Protestant. Already in 1846 the World’s Evangelical Alliance* was born, “a new thing in church history – a definite organization for the expression of unity among Christian individuals belonging to different churches” (Ruth Rouse). Thus before Evangelicalism had ecumenical concerns, it was an ecumenical concern.

Nor do “Evangelicals”* and “ecumenicals” occupy two isolated worlds today. Many members of the World Evangelical Fellowship* (WEF), the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization,* and evangelical para-church organizations belong to churches that are members of the WCC and of national and regional councils of churches.* The WEF participates in the annual conference of secretaries of Christian World Communions,* and its theological commission has a task force on ecumenical issues which responded to the WCC Faith and Order documents on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* and Confessing the One Faith.

Commitment to ecumenism on the part of Evangelicals is also evident in the newly developing Evangelical-Roman Catholic relations* of various kinds and at various levels. Furthermore, if one takes into account the ecumenical involvement of Pentecostals* who in many countries are members of national evangelical alliances, it is obvious that a simple disjunction between “evangelical” and “ecumenical” is a myth. The 1985 Evangelical-Roman Catholic Dialogue on Mission (ERCDOM) statement sums up the ecumenical commitment of many Evangelicals: “Fidelity to Jesus Christ today requires that we take his will for his followers with new seriousness. He prayed for the truth, holiness, mission and unity of his people. We believe that these dimensions of the church’s renewal belong together” (see Evangelical-Roman Catholic relations).

Yet, the common use of “evangelical” and “ecumenical” as mutually exclusive is not without ground. For many Evangelicals ecumenism has become a pejorative term. They associate the ecumenical movement with the implicit goal of a “super-church”, and are convinced that in the dominant quest for the visible unity of the church, institutional and structural issues are displacing the confession and propagation of the central message of the gospel of salvation.

The association of modern ecumenism with a “super-church” strikes at the very heart of Evangelicalism and its origins in spiritual revivals or awakenings. Inherent in most of these was a critique of established (sometimes state) churches for perpetuating a form of godliness without its power, and for eclipsing the power of the gospel by hoary traditions, staid rites and clerical privilege. Evangelicalism continues to rejoice in the recovery of the central truths of the faith, such as the supreme authority of the infallible scriptures, the vicarious and atoning death of Jesus Christ and his bodily resurrection, the salvation of the lost through the shed blood of Christ and personal regeneration by the Holy Spirit.

These apprehensions about institutional forms of church unity run very deep when coupled with what is perceived as an affirmation of sacramental efficacy at the expense of the gospel call for personal conversion. Corollary to the Evangelicals’ emphasis on personal regeneration (“born-again”) and the experience of conversion that comes to expression in a personal commitment to Jesus Christ as Saviour and Lord is a pointed critique of the role of “evangelism”* in the ecumenical movement. This critique is twofold: the urgency to reach the “lost” with the gospel and the priority of evangelism over social responsibility.

Evangelical ecumenical engagement directly relates to the understanding and role of mission* and evangelism in WCC circles. Many Evangelicals had mixed feelings about the 1961 integration into the WCC of the International Missionary Council (IMC).* While this was seen as a golden opportunity for the WCC to recover and incorporate the passion for mission, the danger was real that absorption into the complex and multi-pronged WCC structure would blunt the IMC’s missionary-evangelistic edge. Ironically, to the degree that the merger did dissipate the missionary thrust of the former IMC, these evangelical fears may have been self-fulfilling: the decision of many Evangelicals not to participate in the WCC’s department for world mission and evangelism – which carried on the IMC’s work – significantly weakened its evangelical missionary insight and fervour.

Instead, much of the evangelical passion for mission came to be diverted into the alternative “Lausanne movement”. The Lausanne covenant* (1974) laid the theological foundation and framework for evangelization in affirming “the authority and power of the Bible” (art. 2), “the uniqueness and universality of Christ” who is “the only mediator” (3), and “the return of Christ” (15). But as the full name of the Lausanne Committee makes clear, these evangelical dynamics converge in a single thrust: “for world evangelization”. The term “evangelism” was deliberately chosen over “mission” because of the perception that when all activities of the church in the world are called “mission” (see missio Dei), the specific meaning, urgency and primacy of evangelism is lost: “the proclamation of the historical, biblical Christ as Saviour and Lord, with a view to persuading people to come to him personally and to be reconciled to God” (4).

This insistence on the primacy of evangelism, and its urgency “in the church’s mission of sacrificial service”, implicitly stands in critique of the perceived penchant for social, political activism by the ecumenical movement in general and by the WCC in particular. True, “evangelism and socio-political involvement are both part of our Christian duty” as “necessary expressions of our doctrines of God and man, our love for our neighbour and our obedience to Jesus Christ” (Lausanne, 5). But they are not on a par, they relate as “root” and “fruit” (H. Berkhof). “World evangelization requires the whole church to take the whole gospel to the whole world” (6). From this perspective, wholeness is subverted at every point if the centre of gravity of the church’s mission shifts away from evangelization to social action.

Nevertheless, in part as the result of the evangelical critique and the permanence of the Lausanne movement, a degree of convergence between Evangelicals and ecumenicals appears, reaching its high point in the statement “Confessing Christ Today” of the WCC assembly in Nairobi, 1975, and in the 1982 WCC landmark “Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation”. Simultaneously, the evangelical movement embarked on a journey that moves beyond the incipient dualism that lurks in juxtaposing “evangelism” to “social responsibility”, coupling them with an “and”, while giving primacy to the former. For a deepened sense of the integrity of holistic mission, the evangelical movement is indebted to insights gained in the ecumenical movement.

These mutual learnings and convergences have not yet laid to rest the concerns of Evangelicals about the nature and place of evangelism among ecumenicals. This can be demonstrated by the continuing tension within the WCC between its two major forming tributaries: the Faith and Order* stream which bends all its efforts to the visible unity of the church – at the expense, some charge, of service in and to the world; and the Life and Work* stream which concentrates its energies on the struggle for justice and peace – at the expense, others claim, of theological and ecclesiological depth. Although the major WCC study project on ecclesiology and ethics* (1993-96) sought to address this debilitating internal tension, it may be irresolvable as long as the major source from which all of the ecumenical tributaries spring remains hidden from view: mission and evangelism.

The evangelical ecumenical concern, both within and outside the WCC, points to the transcendental dimension of the message of good news in Jesus Christ. Authentic missionary evangelism fundamentally names this Name and calls all people, with their cultures and institutions, to find shalom, true peace, in his name. It moves into the highways and byways of daily life and breaks through the intramural encapsulation of church and world, ecclesiology and ethics. As good news-telling, evangelism reaches into life that has run stuck and into human lives that are at a loss and lost in an often bewildering and pain-wracked world.

The WCC’s “Mission and Evangelism” statement affirms the church’s task to “call all people to repentance, to announce forgiveness of sin and a new beginning in relations with God and with neighbours through Jesus Christ”. This evangelistic task is intrinsically linked to the social dimensions of the good news of Christ’s reign, which calls for conversion. Similar emphases are in evangelical documents such as the WEF Wheaton statement, “Transformation: The Church in Response to Human Need” (1983).

Yet for Evangelicals, the crux remains the universal call to all people to believe in Jesus Christ as the only way of salvation. Evangelicals are heartened by the pledge made at the 1996 conference on world mission and evangelism (Salvador, Brazil): “We... commit ourselves to unequivocal and cooperative witness to the gospel of hope in Jesus Christ in all contexts.” At the same time, Evangelicals ask whether this commitment is amenable to the addition suggested by an Evangelical ecumenist at this conference, “so that all may come to know and love Jesus”.

Expressed in terms of conversion,* evangelical concern about the ecumenical movement is inextricably ecumenical. Vatican Council II’s Decree on Ecumenism* rightly discerned that “there can be no ecumenism worthy of the name without a change of heart”, metanoia, conversion. Conversely, there can be no true conversion to Jesus Christ without a re-discovery of his indivisible body, his church, and thus a conversion to its unity. As Evangelicals acknowledge, the needed emphasis on personal conversion has come needlessly at the cost of a weak ecclesiology, undermined as it is by “our evangelical tendency to individualism and empire-building" (J. Stott). Conversion cuts deeply – in all directions.

To express evangelical ecumenical concerns is not to repudiate but to engage the ecumenical movement. The costs of lack of such engagement are inestimable. "If this ecumenical/non-ecumenical divide is not addressed and bridged, the Christian world could end up as divided as ever, even if major headway is made between churches within the ecumenical camp" (P. Hocken).

EVANGELICAL MISSIONS

DURING the last third of the 20th century, "evangelical" missions grew to surpass "mainline" Protestant missions by far – especially in North America, where the ratio of overseas missionary personnel from evangelical agencies to those from mainline agencies is 13 to 1.

A number of interdenominational evangelical agencies were founded in the 19th century, often to pioneer in non-Christian "inland" areas, e.g. China Inland Mission (1865), Sudan Interior Mission (1893), Africa Inland Mission (1895). Avoiding identification with any specific tradition, such agencies attracted personnel from across the Protestant spectrum. While international, they originally accepted members only from Western nations, but this has broadened in recent years, and in some agencies nearly half of the personnel are third-world missionaries serving outside their own countries. The Interdenominational Foreign Mission Association (IFMA, 1917) links the North American branches of these agencies.

The Evangelical Fellowship of Mission Agencies (EFMA, before 1945 Evangelical Foreign Missions Association) links evangelical denominational agencies in North America, including some Pentecostal. A new network (1985), the Association of International Mission Services (AIMS), serves Pentecostal and charismatic agencies. However, IFMA/EFMA/AIMS personnel account for less than half the total evangelical missionaries sent from North America; the majority serve in agencies unrelated to any mission association, such as the Southern Baptist Foreign Mission Board (1845), Wycliffe Bible Translators (1934), and New Tribes Mission (1942). Only recently have the Southern Baptists, under their newly named International Mission Board, joined the EFMA (1995).

In the United Kingdom, Europe, India, Singapore, Korea, Nigeria and elsewhere, similar mission associations serve scores of evangelical mission agencies. Worldwide evangelical missionaries and their agencies are informally represented by the Missions Commission of the World's Evangelical Fellowship.* As of 1997 there were an estimated 50,000 third-world missionaries; the large majority of these would be classified as evangelical.

EVANGELICAL-ROMAN CATHOLIC RELATIONS

THE INCREASE in contacts between Evangelicals* and Roman Catholics is not only rather recent but also rather startling. For these developments mark a 180 degree turn from the hostile stance that characterized earlier periods (and continues in many sectors of Evangelicalism today).

Even past unitive efforts by Evangelicals stopped well short of RCC doors. The World's Evangelical Alliance* was founded in 1846, designed in large part to form a united front against the RCC. Evangelical Christendom, a journal closely associated with the new Alliance, articulated the anti-theological front of evangelical consolidation in an editorial in its first issue (1847): "[Evangelical Christendom] enters upon the theatre of public life, the friend of all truly Christian communions and the adversary of none. Its only controversy will be with Romanism and Infidelity” – identified in the next sentence as “these common foes”. From the RC side the developing contacts with Evangelicals and Pentecostals* (see Pentecostal-Roman Catholic dialogue) was equally surprising. Although in 1964 the Second Vatican Council’s Decree on Ecumenism* opened the windows to all other willing churches and ecclesial communities, it did not envision on the horizon any positive relations with Pentecostal and Evangelical communions.

Rather than regarding Catholicism as its chief opponent, Evangelicals increasingly look to the RC communion as an ally and preferred discussion partner. Despite the many significant differences between the two groups, considerable affinity exists on many ethical issues (e.g., abortion, euthanasia, genetic engineering and justice). Accordingly, in many countries, regional or national Roman Catholic and Evangelical bodies cooperate directly in the public sphere. Similarly, confronted with many historic Protestant churches that appear to call into question central tenets of the faith, Evangelicals welcome the unswerving commitment by the RCC to the core of orthodoxy as expressed in the historic creeds, as well as to the continuing mandate for mission, as expressed, for example, in papal encyclicals – Paul VI’s Evangelii Nuntiandi (1975) and John Paul II’s Redemptoris Missio (1990).

At the international level, the first significant evidence of the changed attitude on the part of Evangelicals towards Roman Catholicism took the form of a dialogue. In a series of three meetings, held from 1977 to 1984, theologians and missiologists named by the Vatican Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity* and Evangelical participants from denominations both within and outside the WCC and from para-church mission organizations took part in an Evangelical-Roman Catholic Dialogue on Mission (ERCDOM). Although the Evangelicals did not officially represent any international body, all were associated with the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization.* Moreover, they were convened by John Stott of the Church of England, a chief drafter of the 1974 Lausanne covenant.*

The topics on which the ERCDOM report outlined both agreement and serious, sometimes contradictory, understandings of biblical teaching were (1) revelation,* the Bible, the formulation of truth; the Bible vis-a-vis the teaching authority* of the church; (2) the basis and authority of mission, direct evangelism* and socio-political responsibility; (3) God’s workings “outside” the Christian community; (4) the gospel of salvation* and the uniqueness* and universality of Jesus Christ; the role of Mary* in salvation; (5) conversion* and baptism,* church membership and the assurance of salvation; (6) the church* as part, fruit, embodiment and agent of the gospel; (7) the gospel and culture;* (8) our unity* and disunity, possibilities of common witness* and avoidance of “unworthy witness” or proselytism.*

Especially the issue of “proselytism” presents considerable difficulty. Evangelical constituencies range from those who appear to regard all RCs as unbelievers in need of conversion to those who desire a very full cooperation with RCs in mission efforts. Since the ERCDOM report, the rapid growth of evangelical churches in predominantly RC areas such as Latin America, the Philippines, Spain, Italy, Poland and France has made the pastoral and missionary issues of worthy and unworthy witness and of cooperation or common witness more critical, as well as more divisive among Evangelicals themselves.

More fundamentally, the many points of consensus* are linked with deep differences, particularly around the nature and purpose of the church. The ERCDOM report acknowledged that further conversations would be required before it would be possible “to arrive at greater clarity and common terms of ecclesiological discourse”.

The international dialogue in which Evangelicals are currently engaged with the RCC paradoxically has its roots in controversy with and about that church. At the general assembly of the World Evangelical Fellowship (WEF),* held in Hoddesdon, England, in 1980, two RCC representatives were invited as observers and brought greetings to the assembly. As a result of the controversy arising from their presence, the WEF theological commission created a 17-member ecumenical issues task force, which developed a statement that was published in 1988 as Roman Catholicism: A Contemporary Evangelical Perspective. It dealt with topics such as other churches, religious liberty, the place of Mary, authority in the church, the pope and infallibility, justification by faith, and the sacraments. The publication of this product of what was a monologue demonstrated the need for dialogue. For the first time, Evangelicals representing an international body, the WEF, would engage RC representatives to seek greater understanding and to develop better relations.

After preparatory work by a small group of Evangelicals and RC representatives at the secretaries of Christian World Communions* meetings in 1988 and 1990, the first consultation took place in Venice in 1993. This meeting focused on scripture and Tradition and on justification by faith, exploring both serious differences and significant commonalities. The consultation engaged the reciprocal challenge entailed, on the one hand, in the privileged role Roman Catholicism overtly attributes to Tradition and the official teaching authority (magisterium), and, on the other, the role that Tradition covertly plays in Evangelicalism, as evidenced in the place accorded to justification by faith in the interpretation of the scriptures. At the Venice meeting, it became clear that issues surrounding the nature and mission of the church required further exploration. These issues were taken up at the next meeting, which was held in 1997 at the Tantar Ecumenical Institute* in Jerusalem.

At the Tantar meeting the question of "real but imperfect communion", which the RCC says exists between it and other Christian communities, became prominent, as well as the issue of evangelism and proselytism. Discussion of these themes continued at Williams Bay, Wisconsin, in 1999, and at Mundelein, Illinois, in 2001. In fact, these themes proved to be at once fruitful fields worthy of deeper probing, as well as areas of major differences. While both sides share the conviction that all who are in Christ are one, and thus share a deep communion, rather divergent understandings of what it means to be in communion with Christ as well as diverse criteria of determining the marks of belonging to Christ prove to be operative. As a result, subsequent meetings of the consultation continue to work on these issues.

While the differences between Evangelicals and RCs on the issues discussed in this consultation have by no means vanished, marked progress may be noted in the mode and regularity of the discussions. In the initial phase of this consultation, the meetings took place somewhat sporadically. Unlike the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, the WEF task force was unable to commit itself to annual or even bi-annual meetings. Slowly this began to change, until at the most recent meetings annual sessions of the consultation have been planned. In addition to the increased frequency of the meetings changes in the manner of preparation and type of product of the consultation shifted. Not until the second and subsequent meetings were joint communiques issued. As to preparation, for the first three meetings, representatives of each team prepared parallel papers on the assigned topics. At the third meeting, in Williams Bay, a beginning was made on the collaborative preparation of papers. These papers probe for a deeper understanding of what is shared in common, while at the same time exploring the nature and degree of the differences that divide the two traditions. The consultation is now moving into a phase at which an attempt will be made to prepare joint statements. The focus of these consultations, however, is not the quest for unity as such, but better mutual understanding of, and improved relations between, RCs and Evangelicals.

Another international development in which Evangelicals are informally involved is the exploration of a global forum of churches and ecumenical organizations. This venture is of course broader than Evangelical and Roman Catholic communions. Yet, the RC and Evangelical (together with the Pentecostal) groups are the most prominent, since their involvement is crucial for the viability of a venture that seeks to be more inclusive than the WCC.

In addition to these international developments, significant movement in the last three decades is also evident at the regional level. In the USA, the National Council of Catholic Bishops and the Southern Baptist Convention were involved for some thirty years in official consultations on topics such as grace, scripture and mission. This was a conversation with no intention to produce unity or even convergence but rather to clarify commonalities and differences in the faith.

At a regional level, another venture sparked both enthusiasm and controversy. In 1994 a North American group of Evangelicals and RCs, who had been cooperating informally for some time on the social-political front, issued the declaration Evangelicals and Catholics Together: The Christian Mission in the Third Millennium. While recognizing important differences, this statement focused on significant areas of convergence: "We Affirm Together" (the content of the faith as expressed in the Apostolic Creed), "We Hope Together" (for greater unity and commitment to mission), "We Search Together" (for a deeper and clearer discernment of nature and weight of differences), "We Contend Together" (for the role of truth in the public arena), and "We Witness Together" (evangelism that avoids proselytism). Although this collaborative effort was entirely unofficial, both the content of the statement and the ensuing controversy, especially among Evangelicals and Pentecostals, gave it a prominence that belied its informal character. Furthermore, rather than retreating from the controversial and controverted sections regarding theological convergences, this same group produced a statement focusing entirely on theological matters. In the 1998 statement, The Gift of Salvation, the Evangelicals-and-Catholics-together group delineated areas of agreement and disagreement regarding salvation and, more specifically, justification by faith. These statements have caused considerable debate among Evangelicals and precipitated internal dialogue and statements of Evangelical solidarity.

While Evangelical-Roman Catholic relations continue to be surrounded by tension, even turbulence and setbacks (in 2001, for example, the Southern Baptist Convention terminated the official conversations with the Roman Catholic Church, in which it had been engaged for thirty years), the steps taken in dialogue and collaboration are unlikely to be reversed in the present century.

EVANGELICALS

THE TERMS "evangelical" and "evangelicalism" had scant use until Erasmus and others derisively aimed them at what they saw as Lutheran narrowness and fanaticism. Luther used the terms for all Christians who accepted the doctrine of sola gratia, which he saw as the heart of the gospel (evangelion). The treaty of Westphalia (1648) denominated both the Lutheran and the Reformed churches "evangelical". By 1700 the term seems to have become in Europe a simple synonym for "Protestant" or, in German-speaking areas, "Lutheran". In Protestant Britain, however, the religious awakening led by the Wesleys and George Whitefield seems to have been called the evangelical revival from around 1750. Slightly later, advocates of revival in Britain, both in the Anglican and Free churches, called themselves evangelicals. Their trademarks were deep moral earnestness, commitment to strict personal piety, faithfulness in private and corporate devotion and vigorous philanthropic enterprise. Since the introduction of Protestantism in Latin America during the 1800s, its adherents have preferred to call their churches and themselves evangelicals (evangélicos) rather than Protestant.

In London, in 1846, some 800 Europeans and North Americans formed the Evangelical Alliance to counter the political and spiritual revival of Roman Catholicism then in progress and, more positively, to coordinate various Protestant enterprises in missions, publishing and social reform. Its nine conservative theological tenets summarize the contents of the historic Protestant confessions of faith, but its implicit understanding of Christianity in practice rested on the religious bases developed in early pietism and in the evangelical revival.

In British North America, the first great awakening (1730s and 1740s) had emphasized the necessity for a graciously given personal experience of redemption* in Christ, for personal piety, including social concern, and for confessional orthodoxy. The second great awakening (early 1800s) intensified the experiential element, reduced and simplified dogmatic requirements, slowly institutionalized social concern and made the revivalistic mode normative for the 19th century. The formation of a branch of the alliance in the United States in 1867 simply reflected a context already practising the style of Christianity which the alliance advocated.

Between about 1865 and 1900, however, many came gradually to understand the personal evangelical experience central to all evangelical thought and action as a personal moment of spiritual illumination. This understanding encouraged an internalizing of the evangelical experience. The old language remained, but by the 1920s social action and theological reflection were suffering benign neglect among Evangelicals. They sought only a "clean heart and right spirit".

By about 1900, American Methodism had divided into three parties, each seeing itself as "evangelical". The liberals, bent on social action and theological modernity, were evangelical but with the accents of the social sciences. The conservatives, including the Holiness movement,* were evangelical in the sense of the word before the civil war. The mainstream insisted on a highly individualistic and private faith,* which meant that traditional terms and doctrines might carry non-traditional connotations. Thus the Wesleyan tradition as a whole made the very idea of evangelical equivocal.

Calvin's progeny in the US had also divided into three major parties in the late 1800s. The conservative party, with its centre at Princeton, owed much to Charles Hodge and considered US evangelicalism, especially revivalism, theologically and culturally suspect. A mildly activist liberal party, rooted in the work of Nathaniel Taylor at Yale, spoke the language of Evangelicalism, but its deeper concern was to reconcile the Reformed tradition and modern thought and culture.* The revivalist party, which claimed the mantle of Charles Finney, Asa Mahan and William Boardman, was led at the end of the century by D.L. Moody, R.A. Torrey and J.W. Chapman. But these later revivalists, who now inherited the name "evangelical", displaced the radical social concern and perfectionism of their predecessors with a very different agenda: "conversion", understood first and last as an internal religious experience; maintaining the authority of the Bible as the inerrant divine revelation;* and restoring Evangelicalism as the normative form of Christianity.

From the late 1890s, increasing liberal critiques compelled these Evangelicals to explain their position theologically. Here, they found the methods and categories of the conservatives congenial, though they resisted the Calvinist dogmatism and rationalism of the conservatives' systems. A new coalition would soon produce a new definition of "evangelical" among the Reformed.

By the late 1910s, the Reformed tradition fell into civil war, and it drew other traditions in. On one side was the liberal tradition; on the other was the revivalist-confessional coalition, under the names "conservative", "evangelical" and "fundamentalist". The revivalist party became increasingly Reformed and less inclined to revivalism; the conservatives opened up to Evangelicalism.

Conservative Wesleyanism, still evangelical in the 19th-century sense, recognized that its theological method and understanding of the Bible had more in common with the spirit of liberalism than with that of the Reformed Evangelicals. But certain liberal theological conclusions contradicted their deepest commitments. Often, then, they rejected specific theological insistences of the Reformed Evangelicals but joined them in the war against the liberal secularizing of Christ, the Bible and the work of the church. And, little by little, they muted their commitment to social involvement, in part for fear of identification with the social gospel of the liberals. But most also rejected the name "fundamentalist", especially as the theological bases and separatist ethos of fundamentalism became clear (see fundamentalists).

In the mid-1940s, Harold J. Ockenga, a Congregationalist evangelical with Methodist roots, criticized fundamentalism for its theological paranoia, its separatism and its contentiousness and led a number of Reformed Evangelicals in the creation of an anti-fundamentalist "new Evangelicalism". Hence the establishment of the National Association of Evangelicals, Fuller Theological Seminary and the magazine Christianity Today. Doctrinally, the new Evangelicals confessed the infallibility of the Bible, the Trinity,* the deity of Christ, vicarious atonement, the personality and work of the Holy Spirit,* and the personal return of Christ; religiously, they revived the coalitional ethos of the early 1900s.

In the 1960s, the Reformed Evangelicals debated the meaning of "the infallibility of the Bible" as the question at the heart of their faith. The debate led to a clear separation of new Evangelicals from fundamentalists. Also clear was the intention of the former to claim near-exclusive right to the title "evangelical". The large numbers of persons in the Methodist, Baptist and other traditions whose current expressions were more directly rooted in 19th-century Evangelicalism than those of the Reformed new Evangelicals were simply left off the evangelical map by the new evangelical cartographers.

At the same time, the social dimensions of the gospel were coming under study and were being tested in practice by Evangelicals in several traditions. For example, Sherwood Wirt's The Social Conscience of the Evangelical and several of the works of Carl Henry called Reformed Evangelicals to work actively in the world around them. But works such as Donald Dayton's Discovering an Evangelical Heritage revived awareness that the evangelical tradition had originally seen itself as essentially quite radical (although not novel), socially and theologically – a datum somehow lost in the coalitional ethos of new Evangelicalism. Dayton and others insist that the (Reformed) new evangelical model, with its primary concern for doctrinal orthodoxy, cannot produce a historically and theologically consistent definition of "evangelicalism". Rather, the model will have to be based on clear and direct lines back to the period 1830-60, the time of the maturing of the second awakening, with its institutionalizing of revivalism and its insistence on a grace-given experience of redemption as the heart of all true Christianity.

On the international scene, those Christians who call themselves Evangelicals are among the fastest-growing groups within the Christian family, especially in Latin America. They are finding institutional forums for cooperation, such as the World Evangelical Fellowship* and the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization,* and those Evangelicals among the member churches of the WCC are becoming more articulate in voicing their concerns, especially in the area of world mission and evangelism.

EVANGELISM

ONE OF THE main roots of the contemporary ecumenical movement was the commitment to the evangelization of the world which culminated in the world missionary conference in Edinburgh in 1910. Out of this and other manifestations of God's Spirit, not just within Protestantism but also in the Orthodox world, developed a calling to unity* which found its biblical reference and devotional inspiration in the prayer of our Lord "that they may all be one... that the world may believe" (John 17:21).

The WCC basis* itself points to the gospel message, defining the Council as a fellowship of churches "which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit". To true ecumenism belongs the awareness of being part of the missionary movement of God's own self who, in the fullness of time, sent the Son to redeem us and sent the Holy Spirit to gather together a people to be the bearers of the revelation* of God's liberating will in Jesus Christ (see Trinity). As Philip Potter has said: "Evangelism is the test of true ecumenism."

According to the WCC constitution, the churches through the Council "facilitate common witness of the churches in each place and in all places, and support each other in their work for mission and evangelism". This function has been addressed in a wide variety of ways during the WCC's history, especially after its merger with the International Missionary Council in 1961: studies on evangelism, conferences on world mission every seven or eight years, publications such as the International Review of Mission and the Monthly Letter on Evangelism, national or regional consultations on witnessing to the faith, publication of "Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation" (1982). In cooperation with the Bible societies,* the WCC has been associated with the translation, production and distribution of Bibles throughout the world. The worship services and Bible studies which play such an important part in all ecumenical gatherings are ways of reminding people of the gospel and the challenge of its proclamation today.

The responsibility for evangelism and support for common witness* in each place are, then, an integral part of all aspects of the WCC's work. Just as unity is essential to the struggle for justice* in the light of God's promise of reconciliation* in Jesus Christ, so the proclamation of justice and an attitude of service are a testimony to the common faith in Jesus Christ* which has brought together the ecumenical family.

THE EVANGELISM DEBATE

Evangelism has been a major subject of discussion in all WCC assemblies. A point of crisis came at the fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968), where the section debating "Renewal in Mission" sought to understand God's own missionary activity in the whole world and the particular role of churches and Christians in accompanying the action of the Spirit of God. Some saw this approach as a secularization* of faith; for others, it was a kingdom (see kingdom of God) perspective that challenged them to work for justice and development.*

This debate obliged the WCC to concentrate on the substance of the evangelistic message, and that was done first in the world mission conference in Bangkok (1973) on "Salvation Today" and later in the fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975) under the theme "Jesus Christ Frees and Unites". Nairobi affirmed: "The gospel is good news from God, our Creator and Redeemer. On its way from Jerusalem to Galilee and to the ends of the earth, the Spirit discloses ever-new aspects and dimensions of God's decisive revelation in Jesus Christ. The gospel always includes the announcement of God's kingdom and love through Jesus Christ, the offer of grace and forgiveness of sins, the invitation to repentance and faith in him, the summons to fellowship in God's church, the command to witness to God's saving words and deeds, the responsibility to participate in the struggle for justice and human dignity, the obligation to denounce all that hinders human wholeness, and a commitment to risk life itself."

THE EVANGELICAL CONGRESSES

The debate among Evangelicals started long before Uppsala. The series of congresses called by US evangelist Billy Graham deserves special mention. In 1966 he invited people of evangelical persuasion to a congress in Berlin to consider the situation of world evangelism. This was followed in 1974 by a second congress attended by 4000 people, in Lausanne, Switzerland, around the theme “Let the Earth Hear His Voice”. The Lausanne covenant,* drafted by the congress and signed by the majority of the participants, pointed out that “more than 2700 million people had yet to be evangelized”. “Reaching the unreached” – a term coined to refer to all those who have had no chance to hear the gospel of Jesus Christ – became the main slogan with which to mobilize the church.* Lausanne affirmed evangelism as an independent category related to, but independent of, the demand for social justice: “Social justice is not evangelization, but social justice belongs to our mandate.” The awareness of the close relation between these two dimensions of the Christian gospel has been growing in all sectors of the Christian family. So a consultation in Grand Rapids, USA, in June 1982, called by the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization* and the World Evangelical Fellowship,* was able to affirm that evangelism and social responsibility, while distinct from one another, are integrally related in the proclamation of and obedience to the gospel: “the partnership is in reality a marriage”.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC UNDERSTANDING OF EVANGELISM

Philip Potter was one of the contributors to a special synod of Roman Catholic bishops in 1974 on evangelization in the modern world. The subsequent encyclical of Pope Paul VI, Evangelii Nuntiandi, which drew on the results of the synod, affirmed Christ as the supreme evangelist and the task of evangelizing as the essential mission of the church. It declared that “it is impossible to accept that in evangelization one could or should ignore the importance of the problems so much discussed today concerning justice, liberation, development and peace in the world”, going on to say that the church “re-affirmed the primacy of her spiritual vocation and refused to replace the proclamation of the kingdom by the proclamation of forms of human liberation. She even states that her contribution to liberation is incomplete if she neglects to proclaim salvation in Christ Jesus.”

In his 1985 encyclical commemorating the 11th centenary of the evangelizing work of Cyril and Methodius, Slavorum Apostoli, Pope John Paul II commended the two saints as authentic precursors of ecumenism and underlined the impact of the gospel on the various cultures of humankind (see culture, gospel and culture). The encyclical dwells at length on the relation between evangelism and inculturation.

John Paul’s encyclical Redemptoris Missio, as well as statements from several bishops conferences, called for a battle for the soul of the contemporary world. Referring to St Paul’s encounter with the Athenians (Acts 17:16-34), the encyclical speaks of the modern Areopagi found in the worlds of science, culture, media. Following Evangelii Nuntiandi in the use of the expression “new evangelization”, it goes on to speak of re-evangelization, especially for Europe and Latin America. This touched off a critical debate about the actual meaning of that expression “re-evangelization”, with some seeing in it a new call for Christendom. In his book Crossing the Threshold of Hope (1995), John Paul II says with a certain vehemence that “the new evangelization has nothing in common with what various publications have insinuated when speaking of restoration, or when advancing the accusation of proselytism... fears that some are attempting to stir up, perhaps with the aim of depriving the church of its courage and enthusiasm in taking up the mission of evangelization” (p.115). The ecumenical challenge and responsibility posed by this debate here is to encourage a common re-reading of missionary history and a common search for a joint testimony today.

EVANGELISM AND ORTHODOXY

Within Orthodoxy,* too, new developments and a re-assessment of the church’s obligation to render witness (martyria) to Christ have taken place. The Orthodox churches have a long experience of evangelism; through the centuries, they have been telling the story of Jesus Christ through all aspects of family life, and uniquely through the celebration of the liturgy.* Several Orthodox missionary consultations were organized by the WCC’s Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME) between 1974 and 1982. They stressed that evangelism is rooted in Trinitarian theology. Christ’s sending of the apostles stems from his having been sent by the Father in the Holy Spirit (John 20:21-23). The Orthodox consultations articulated the evangelistic significance of the liturgical celebration and the priestly role of the congregation in interceding for the whole of the human community. The evangelistic experience of the Orthodox churches gives special importance to monastic communities (see religious communities) as centres of popular religiosity and of communicative spirituality.*

The radical changes in the political situation in Eastern Europe after 1989 confronted the Orthodox churches with a tremendous missionary challenge: re-building the life of the church, monasteries, parishes, theological schools. They need a re-affirmation and re-consideration of the traditional role of their churches as bearers and expressions of the identity and unity of the people. Their evangelistic and educational task after as many decades of atheistic indoctrination has been made more difficult by the presence of many churches and missionary groups from the West engaging in what they see as evangelism but the Orthodox regard as proselytizing. There are serious ecclesiological and pastoral questions at stake here, but it is obvious that a genuine evangelism in this context calls for a new affirmation of a common witness that will give credibility to the gospel being proclaimed.

It was in recognition of this need that in 1995 the Roman Catholic Church/WCC Joint Working Group* produced a study document on "The Challenge of Proselytism and the Calling to Common Witness". Two years later, in 1997, the WCC central committee approved a document which explored the same issues, "Towards Common Witness: A Call to Adopt Responsible Relationships in Mission and to Renounce Proselytism". The document echoed the call of the Salvador world mission conference (1996), decrying "the practice of those who carry out their endeavours in mission and evangelism in ways which destroy the unity of the Body of Christ, human dignity and the very lives and cultures of those being evangelized; we call on them to confess their participation in and to renounce proselytism". The document made a number of recommendations to the churches and called on the WCC to strengthen its emphasis on ecumenical formation, to undertake a study on ecclesiology and mission, and to facilitate dialogue within and among the churches on these issues. These responses were a further recognition of how essential ecumenism is to the whole mission of the church.

THE CONTEMPORARY CONTEXT OF EVANGELISM

Years of ecumenical reflection on evangelism culminated in the document "Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation", adopted by the WCC central committee in 1982. It makes clear that the spiritual gospel and the material gospel are one and the same gospel of Jesus. Liberation, development, humanization and evangelization are all integral parts of mission.

The 1989 world conference on mission and evangelism in San Antonio, USA, confirmed the perspectives of the ecumenical affirmation and said: "We are called to exercise our mission in this context of human struggle, and challenged to keep the earth alive and to promote human dignity, since the living God is both Creator of heaven and earth and Protector of the cause of the widow, the orphan, the poor and the stranger. To respond to all this is part of our mission, just as inviting people to put their trust in God is part of that mission. The 'material gospel' and the 'spiritual gospel' have to be one, as was true of the ministry of Jesus. Frequently the world's poor are also those who have not yet heard the good news of the gospel; to withhold from them justice as well as the good news of life in Christ is to commit a 'double injustice'."

The presence of Christians practising liberating diakonia* in the life of society and proclaiming the gospel as they participate in the search for new models of society is a concrete announcement of good news. All ethical reflection and social action must be done in constant lively dialogue and interchange between real situations and the gospel history, expressed in theological insights which open up the radiant perspective of the eternal, the "numinous" and the new. In thinking of the future of the ecumenical movement and its evangelistic calling, it is essential to emphasize the need for a greater capacity to relate to the widest possible diversity of churches in local situations, so that links can be created which will enable the churches increasingly to benefit from and contribute to similar experiences in other parts of the world.

Proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ may ring strangely in the world of genes and mutations and phenomena evolving over billions of years. But the name of Jesus Christ speaks of an historic action in which human limitations, sin* and aggressiveness are not simply accepted as the destined limits of the human condition, but are actively assumed as a responsibility, assumed as guilt, and find historic response in his redemptive death on the cross. The new life offered in Jesus Christ is a process of sanctification,* opening the way for the transformation of the whole of reality as a purpose intrinsically present in the creative energies of creation and as a vocation to which all human beings, including scientists, are called. Developments in biotechnology call the churches to re-examine the fundamental Christian understandings of the creation and the relationship between God, humanity and the created world (see bio-ethics). In the process, the fresh resources of biblical witness and the declaration of the churches' ancient creeds* – all beginning with faith in God as the Creator and Maker of heaven and earth, of all things visible and invisible – must be re-affirmed to give a foundation for addressing the challenges of biotechnology.

If the gospel of love is to permeate all human relations, it is absolutely essential for ecumenical structures to maintain a living link between the scholars and the meek of the earth, between the wisdom of the humble and scientific research (see science and technology). The affirmation of new life in Christ and of the dimension of spirituality in the middle of a genetic chain that only seemed to be affected by chance but is now subject to the influence of technological power is an evangelizing vocation that challenges Christians and calls for cooperative effort.

Fulfilling the calling to preach the gospel brings Christians into contact with people and organizations of other religious faiths or of no faith. This encounter is witness. In view of the missionary nature of God's message in Jesus Christ, Christians should approach others in the same spirit of love, sharing and communication that ruled the life of the man from Nazareth. The attitude thus is not only one of respect but of acceptance of the other. Jesus does not hesitate to point to a Samaritan as setting the example of love for his Jewish disciples. In Christ, God offers God's self; God does not impose. The outstretched arms of the cross are perhaps the best symbol of God's attitude towards all humankind – the offering of God's self in an attitude of total powerlessness, and from the depths of despair appealing for and inviting to a free decision. The witness owed to the other is the witness to God's love made manifest in Jesus Christ – a love to which one can testify only in a loving relationship which implies acceptance of the neighbour and co-responsibility for the whole human predicament.

At another level, evangelism in a world of many faiths opens up the issue of the theological value to be recognized in non-Christian religious experience. After an extensive debate, the WCC's sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983) could only state, in terms that left the question open: "While affirming the uniqueness of the birth, life, death and resurrection of Jesus, to which we bear witness, we recognize God's creative work in the seeking for religious truth among peoples of other faiths."

Ecumenical experience regarding the role and place of other faiths does not question the central Christian tenet: that God was in Christ reconciling the world to God's own self. The spirit of dialogue, friendship and encounter with the neighbour provides the ideal context for witness. To accept the questions raised by other religious faiths is to adopt the attitude urged by the apostle: "Always be ready to make your defence to anyone who demands from you an accounting for the hope that is in you" (1 Pet. 3:15). When Paul affirmed his faith and hope in an eschatological understanding of the role attributed to Israel after the coming of Christ, he did so not as an excuse for not bearing witness to his people but out of passionate concern that they should all come to know Jesus (Rom. 9:1-3, 10:1). The missionary conviction of the Christian faith is not called into question but rather purified, strengthened and deepened when we place ourselves alongside our neighbours of other faiths in an attitude of respect, listening and appreciation of the cultural and spiritual treasures belonging to them.

The San Antonio mission conference summarized the situation well: "We cannot point to any other way of salvation than Jesus Christ; at the same time we cannot set limits to the saving power of God. At times the debate about salvation focuses itself only on the fate of the individual's soul in the hereafter, whereas the will of God is life in its fullness even here and now. We therefore state: (1) that our witness to others concerning salvation in Christ springs from the fact that we have encountered him as our Lord and Saviour and are hence urged to share this with others, and (2) that in calling people to faith in Christ, we are not only offering personal salvation but also calling them to follow Jesus in the service of God's kingdom."

EVANGELISM AND CULTURE

The theme of the WCC's seventh assembly (Canberra 1991), "Come, Holy Spirit – Renew the Whole Creation", raised the question of how far Christians may celebrate the presence and action of the Holy Spirit in events, persons and cultures shaped by other religious convictions. Could those cultures challenge and enrich our Christian perspectives? At one level, this debate focused on the Christian validity of appropriating other religious figures or people's experiences as part and parcel of the Christian tradition. What are the limits to diversity?

At a second level the debate concerned evangelism. How does a fresh appreciation of the presence of the Holy Spirit in the diverse cultures affect our evangelistic approach, our missionary being? This became the central issue for the WCC's world mission conference in Salvador, Brazil, in December 1996. At that time, the commemoration of the 500th anniversary of the colonial and missionary expansion of the West provided an occasion for a critical look at the history of evangelism and led to an affirmation of autonomous cultures and traditional religious practices. Similarly, the expansion of the African Independent Churches,* who read the Bible from within their traditional practices, the vitality of the Pentecostal emphasis on the powerful action of the Spirit and the new awareness in many places of ethnic and religious identity fed into what will be one of the key ecumenical debates of the early 21st century.

Section IV of the Salvador conference report offers a helpful overview of the central issues here: "The gospel is the word of God communicated to all humanity in the incarnate Christ, testified to in the biblical scripture and proclaimed by the church; it is not limited to an interpretation of particular biblical texts. Gospel values are present in all cultures in the form of life, justice, freedom, reciprocity and holistic relations with creation. Therefore the gospel is not the property of any particular culture. The spirituality of different people must be respected as an expression of their integral faith. As such, particular language, interpretative devices, symbol systems or forms of Christian worship in one culture are not binding in other cultures. However, in mutual respect and in a transparent act of communion and love, these may be shared among cultures without coercion, enriching the expression of the gospel..."

"Some practices and customs which were once negated and rejected as 'pagan' and 'superstitious' are now recognized as authentic elements of people's spirituality. The use of certain musical instruments and forms of traditional worship are cases in point. The profound need of many peoples to include the living presence of their ancestors in an organic and holistic vision of reality is not seriously considered in some Christian churches. Other Christian traditions, however, provide for this need through commemorative feasts, prayers, liturgical celebrations or visual arts. It is the task of the church to give theological meaning to this profound need through the incarnate Lord, crucified and risen from the dead, who gives the promise of eternal life.

"In re-discovering the catholicity of the church in each cultural context it is the incarnation, life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ that together constitute the known standard for such discernment. Destructive and death-dealing elements in every culture are judged in the light of that standard."

SUMMING UP

The dimension of evangelism is fundamental to the ecumenical calling. Clarity in confessing Jesus Christ as God and Saviour and calling others to faith and Christian discipleship is the guarantee of Christian authenticity and ecumenical work. The only valid theological method for evangelism is conscious participation in the whole of human life and its problems. For the great mass of people, evangelism is a question not of apologetics but of life. What Gustavo Gutiérrez has said about Latin America – that the people are “poor and believing” – applies to the vast deprived masses throughout the world. The discussion is about explaining the faith in terms of joy, faithfulness, justice and solidarity.

The poor* peoples of the world have recognized the gospel message in the solidarity of the WCC’s Programme to Combat Racism* or in the home the WCC offers to groups fighting for justice, peace and responsible care for the environment. In addressing the call and the opportunity to proclaim in situations of oppression the good news of the transforming power which God in Christ brings to every human situation, the San Antonio conference said: “In some parts of the world people face a total system of death, of monstrous false gods, of exploitative economic systems, of violence, of the disintegration of the fundamental bonds of society, of the destruction of human life, of helplessness of persons in the face of impersonal forces. We are called to exercise our mission in this context of human struggle... There is no evangelism without solidarity; there is no Christian solidarity that does not involve sharing the message of God’s coming reign.”

EVDOKIMOV, PAUL

B. 2 Aug. 1901, St Petersburg, Russia; d. 16 Sept. 1970, Meudon, France. Evdokimov participated actively in the ecumenical movement and in the WCC, particularly as a member of the board of the Ecumenical Institute of Bossey,* 1950-68, where he gave many lectures and was one of the professors of the first graduate school, 1953-

54. Teaching at the Orthodox faculty of theology of St Sergius, Paris, from 1953 onwards, he was also involved in the work of Faith and Order.* He studied in Kiev and at St Sergius, and obtained a PhD in philosophy at the University of Aix-Marseille in 1942. In 1921 he left Russia for Constantinople; he arrived in France in 1923, where he worked night shifts at the Citroen automobile factory in order to pay for his studies. From 1943 he worked with CIMADE,* an ecumenical organization set up to help displaced persons and refugees, later the inter-church aid organization of the churches in France. He directed a centre for refugees in Bièvres, near Paris, 1946-47, and the CIMADE students hostel in Sèvres and Massy for refugee students from Eastern Europe and later for WCC scholarship students from third-world countries, 1948-68. Evdokimov was also active in setting up Orthodox student movements and meetings for young Orthodox theologians.

EXCOMMUNICATION

AS OFTEN with questions of church order* and church discipline,* the practice of excommunication is attested prior to the emergence of canonical enactments and even fixed terminology.

The first recorded case of excommunication was pronounced by Paul against a member of the Christian community in Corinth accused of sexual immorality (1 Cor. 5:1-5). Paul uses such terminology as "be removed from" and "pronounce judgment" or "condemn", and states that he is acting "in the name of the Lord Jesus". Later, Matthew attributes to Jesus a saying bearing on the procedure of excommunication (Matt. 18:15-17). The concept of exclusion from the community is expressed in terms reminiscent of Palestinian Judaism: "If the offender refuses to listen even to the church, let such a one be to you as a gentile and a tax collector." Luke 6:22 uses the verb aphorizein, later used to designate the fact of excommunicating, for the exclusion of Christians from the Jewish community.

Patristic literature usually uses aphorizein (and the noun aphorismos) with the meaning "casting out"; however, the ancient church expressed the concept of excommunication by several basically synonymous terms. Thus, regarding the first centuries of Christianity, the real significance and seriousness of excommunication must be inferred from the context in each case.

Taking into account data and canonical materials from both East and West, one may distinguish several kinds of excommunication: (1) minor excommunication – a temporary deprivation of holy communion; (2) excommunication with ecclesiastical censure – a temporary deprivation of holy communion and involvement in communal activities; (3) major excommunication – complete exclusion from the church; and (4) pronouncement of a break of ecclesiastical communion with a segment of the church universal as a consequence of serious disagreement bearing on matters of faith* or church order.

Minor excommunication is related to penance,* and as such it is imposed on those who have committed transgressions which do not require a more severe kind of excommunication. It implies a temporary abstinence from holy communion. Since there was no private sacramental confession in the early church, one must speak in such cases of "self-excommunication": the sinner was encouraged to abstain voluntarily from holy communion for a short time. This suggestion was made by Denys of Alexandria (d.264) in his letter to Basilides; Augustine expressed the same view throughout his works. Resumption of communion took place without necessarily implying a rite of reconciliation.

After private confession appeared in the church during the middle ages, minor excommunication was imposed by the confessor, who usually based the terms of excommunication on indications provided by "penitential books". It is noteworthy that from late antiquity onward there was a continual tendency to relax disciplinary rules regarding penance. In the 3rd and 4th centuries this attitude was opposed by rigorist groups which separated from the church.

Ecclesiastical censure applies to transgressions including aggravating circumstances. In such cases the sentence is to be pronounced either by the diocesan bishop or by a church court with subsequent approval of the diocesan bishop. In the case of a cleric, the penalty is not excommunication but rather suspension (preventing a cleric from exercising his ministry for a determined period of time) or deposition (permanent withdrawal from clerical status). A cleric reduced to the rank of the laity can subsequently be excommunicated.

Major excommunication is the most severe penalty which can be imposed on a Christian, regardless of his or her status in the church. Because of its nature and consequences, imposing this censure does not fall within the competency of a single bishop. It must be pronounced or at least confirmed by a synod of bishops. (During the first centuries a bishop had this power, but at that time every bishop acted in close connection with the presbyterium.) From the 4th century, conciliar legislation established the right of appeal. Later, this censure tended to fall within the exclusive competency of synods.

It is difficult to determine to what extent "anathema"* related to major excommunication in the early church. Paul, for example, uses this phrase in order to express a malediction against anyone who "has no love for the Lord" or preaches a different gospel (1 Cor. 16:22; Gal. 1:8-9). In the East during the 4th century, councils pronounced anathematization against groups accused of doctrinal deviations. The council of Nicea (325), for example, took such a stand against Arius and his supporters. Those who disagreed with the Nicene Creed were subject to major excommunication and were no longer considered members of the church.

Sometimes anathematization is simply equated with excommunication. A canon adopted at the first Constantinopolitan council (381) contains the following specification: "By heretics we mean both those who have been previously cast out and those whom we ourselves have anathematized." The ancient church also used to anathematize persons for ethical reasons inasmuch as deviant conduct was based on doctrine at variance with ecclesiastical teaching. So, the council assembled at Gangra (c.340) anathematized those who condemned marriage and social order. However, the members of this council specified that if those sectarians repented and rejected their false doctrine, they would be re-instated to communion in the church. In the ancient church there was only one exception to the canonical principle relating directly or indirectly anathematization with heresy: the council at Elvira in Spain at the beginning of the 4th century (309?) anathematized various categories of sinners.

The pronouncement of a break of communion with a segment of the universal church has the most general historical consequences. For example, at the end of the 2nd century, Victor, bishop of Rome, broke communion with the church of Asia Minor because of a disagreement bearing on the date of Easter. In such a case, this kind of excommunication affects all the followers and supporters of the bishops or priests specifically excommunicated and anathematized. It is obvious that such an excommunication does not necessarily imply that a simple follower is excluded from the church in a direct, personal sense. It simply means that such an individual is excluded from church membership because he or she is for the time being a member of a dissident community. In cases of schisms* involving no doctrinal issue, the excommunication is automatically lifted if a reconciliation* is achieved at the highest hierarchical level.

PETER L'HUILLIER

EXEGESIS, METHODS OF

THE MODES of interpreting the Bible have varied over the centuries, from the patristic harmonizing interpretation, to the medieval "four senses" of scripture, to the literal (non-allegorical) interpretation of the Reformation, to the contemporary historical-critical method of exegesis. Though isolated patristic interpreters such as Origen, Augustine and Jerome used primitive forms of historical criticism, the method that is widely used today by Protestants and Roman Catholics is traced to the pre-Christian Alexandrian school of interpretation of Greek literature and to the Renaissance, with its "return to the sources" and the study of the Bible in its original languages.

Such interpretation of the Bible further developed at the time of the Enlightenment and of the rise of 19th-century German historicism. Leopold von Ranke and his "objective historiography" (seeking to present the past "as it really was") affected the interpretation of the Bible. Similarly, the "life of Jesus research" of H.S. Reimarus, F.C. Baur, H.E.G. Paulus, D.F. Strauss, Bruno Bauer and Ernest Renan also gave impetus to that development, as they adopted the methods of historical and literary criticism from classical philology, which had grown from the Renaissance study of Greek and Roman literature.

The historical and archaeological discoveries of the 18th and 19th centuries likewise contributed to the development of the historical-critical method. The decipherment of the Rosetta Stone (by Jean François Champollion in 1827) and of the ancient Bisitun Inscription (by H.C. Rawlinson and G.R. Grotefend in 1835-46) opened the literature of Israel's neighbours to the west (ancient Egypt) and to the east (ancient Assyria and Babylonia), making it possible to understand the Old Testament against the literary background of neighbouring cultures. Again, in the 19th century thousands of Greek letters and documents recovered from the sands of Egypt cast unexpected light on the language of the Septuagint and of the New Testament. Such historical discoveries made it no longer possible to interpret the Bible naively, without regard for the ancient world in which it came into being.

Similarly, the 20th-century discoveries of Ugaritic and of the Dead Sea Scrolls had a substantial impact on the historical-critical study of the Bible. Palestinian Judaism of the 1st century is now understood in a way that it had never been known before; this Palestinian Jewish matrix of Christianity cannot be ignored, even if most of the NT writings were composed outside Palestine.

All these factors have influenced the understanding of the Bible and have made the historical-critical method the basic mode of interconfessional interpretation of scripture. Such historical development in the interpretation of the Bible cannot be neglected.

Initially, Roman Catholic interpreters did not use this method, largely because Pope Leo XIII set up a biblical commission to act as a watchdog over biblical interpretation and to guard against the excesses of rationalism associated with the historical-critical method. Vigilantiae was the first word of Pope Leo's apostolic letter (1902-1903) which set the tone for the activity of the commission in the first third of the 20th century, casting a cloud of fear and reactionism over Roman Catholic interpreters of the Bible. That was changed, however, when Pope Pius XII issued his encyclical Divino

Afflante Spiritu (1943), insisting on the study of the Bible in its original languages and according to the forms of ancient literature in which the biblical writings had been composed. In 1964 the biblical commission issued an instruction, "On the Historical Truth of the Gospels" (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 56, 712-18), which explicitly espoused form criticism and recognized three stages of the gospel tradition: what Jesus of Nazareth did and said (A.D. 1-33), what the apostles and disciples preached about his words and deeds (A.D. 33-65), and what the evangelists culled from such preaching, as they synthesized, explicated and ordered it in their gospels (A.D. 65-95). This freed Roman Catholic interpreters from the form of fundamentalism which had prevailed for centuries during the post-Tridentine period. On the Protestant side, meanwhile, form criticism in particular called attention to the pre-scriptural life of material that was eventually consigned to the scriptures;* it thus enabled scripture to be seen as an internal, though still privileged, part of an older and continuing tradition (see Tradition and traditions).

The historical-critical method uses two preliminary steps: consideration of introductory questions (authenticity of the writing, its integrity or unity, date and place of composition, content or outline, literary or cultural background); and textual criticism (the best manuscripts, the best form of the transmitted text, ancient versions). Along with such preliminary questions, certain forms of criticism affect the historical judgment about a biblical text: (1) literary criticism – the genres or forms of the text and its narrative and rhetorical character, e.g. the use of inclusio, chiasmus, catchword bonds, argument; (2) source criticism – origin of often parallel accounts, stereotyped phraseology, documentary differences, synoptic counterparts, all of which affect the historical judgment in an interpretation of a biblical book; (3) form criticism – the kind of psalm, historical, prophetic, apocalyptic or sapiential writings; sayings, parables, pronouncement stories, miracle stories, poetry, letters, exhortations; (4) redaction criticism – the way in which biblical authors have edited or redacted their sources or what they have inherited from the earlier tradition. All these kinds of criticism are aimed at one goal: to determine the meaning of the text as it was intended and expressed by the human author moved long ago to compose it. The truth which has been enshrined in the ancient biblical text corresponds to the form adopted, and the historical-critical method teaches us that that text cannot be properly read without an appreciation of the particular form in which the truth has been expressed.

Problems that the historical-critical method have encountered stem not from the method itself (which, being borrowed from Alexandrian classical philology, is basically neutral) but from the presuppositions with which it has often been used. Thus, when it emerged in modern full-blown form in the "life of Jesus research", it was linked with a rationalistic, anti-dogmatic prejudice that tainted it. As Albert Schweitzer recognized in The Quest for the Historical Jesus, such an approach had sprung not from a purely historical interest in Jesus of Nazareth but from a "struggle against the tyranny of dogma"; he noted that these accounts had been "written with hate", not of the person of Jesus, but of "the supernatural nimbus with which it was so easy to surround him". The association of such an attitude with the method itself made it suspect in the eyes of many.

Somewhat later in the 20th century, the pioneering NT form critics (K.L. Schmidt, Martin Dibelius and Rudolf Bultmann) used the historical-critical method with other presuppositions. Bultmann's emphasis on kerygmatic theology (heavily influenced by Luther's justification* by faith alone) and on Heideggerian existentialism led to demythologization and a lack of concern for the historical Jesus. Again, it is evident that such attitudes coloured the use of the method itself.

Today, the historical-critical method is widely used with other presuppositions. Among Christian interpreters it is recognized that exegesis is not merely philology but "philology plus", and that the "plus" is an empathy of Christian faith* which traces its roots back to the Jesus of history in some fashion. That "plus" reckons with the Bible as the word of God,* as an inspired or authoritative record in which God's revelation* is enshrined, and as a canonical collection (see canon). Hence the historical-critical method does not aim merely at analyzing the Bible according to the various forms of criticism that emerged in the 19th and 20th centuries; rather, all of these must lead to some form of biblical theology.

Such a historical-critical method is interested in the textual meaning of words and phrases, but also in their contextual meaning in a paragraph, chapter or book as a whole, and above all in the relational meaning of such words, phrases and parts to the complex of theological or religious ideas of the sacred writer. The quest for these meanings must dominate the method itself so that its goal is "biblical theology", the synthetic presentation of the religious teaching of the author, an understanding of how he has enshrined God's word (or revelation) in his composition. If this goal does not dominate the method, then it is not the historical-critical method properly understood or properly used in biblical interpretation.

The method is open to still further minor adjustments, and exegetical techniques emerging in recent decades have played a role in this respect: the criticisms called canonical, feminist, narrative, psychological, rhetorical, sociological, semiotic, structural. Although proponents of these techniques sometimes give the impression that these aspects have not been part of the method before, they are in fact refinements of the existing method, and none of them is or can be a substitute for the basic method developed especially since the Renaissance.

What ultimately lies behind such a critical approach to the Bible in the church is the conviction that God's revelation in Christ took place in the past and that the ancient record of that self-manifestion of God is disclosed to the church above all in the Bible, in the word of God couched in ancient human writings and in the Tradition that grew out of them under the guidance of the Holy Spirit.*

Rightly understood and rightly employed (with the empathy of Christian faith), the historical-critical method has thus contributed significantly to the 20th-century ecumenical movement. It is used in the interpretation of the Bible in seminaries of all the major Christian churches of the West (Anglican, Lutheran, Methodist, Presbyterian and Roman Catholic). Through it Protestants and Roman Catholics use the same mode of interpretation and can agree on the biblical basis of Christian faith or at least dispute an interpretation on more or less agreed principles. If ultra-conservative groups in each church are sceptical of its use, that is largely because they misunderstand it and fail to see how it can be used with a proper sense of biblical inspiration* and inerrancy.

The churches of the East have been slow to adopt the historical-critical method, not because of a suspicion about it, but because their tradition has been more tied to the patristic, harmonizing and allegorical interpretation, and especially because they did not share the experience of the Renaissance, the Reformation and the Enlightenment. However, the method is beginning to make its appearance among the Greek Orthodox, some of whose scholars share the experience of the international and interconfessional societies of OT and NT interpretation.

FAITH

FAITH has been and is the source, driving force and common goal of the ecumenical movement. The ecumenical movement aims at “visible unity in one faith” (WCC constitution, art. 3); it is based on the confession of “the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures”, and by participating in it churches are seeking “to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit” (WCC constitution 1, art. 1). Without faith as a God-given reality, there would not be a Christian ecumenical movement. Without that movement, however, the Christian faith could not find its proper identity.

Though most participants in the ecumenical movement would agree on this general affirmation, they have different and still divisive understandings of the form and content of the Christian faith. Disputes remain about the character of that faith as both gift and task, the role of the tradition (paradosis) of faith (see Tradition and traditions) and the authoritative teaching of it (see teaching authority), the relation of personal faith to the faith of the church* community, the intermediary role of scripture,* Tradition, sacraments* and ministry in the development of faith, the relation of faith and practice, faith and doctrinal formulations, faith and science, etc.

The older comparative study of the various confessions and churches considered such differences as fundamental, a sufficient explanation or legitimation of schisms* and divisions. While this debate is still going on, many contextual factors have led to a radical osmosis of various “models of faith”, which are now considered to be more like “modalities” within a legitimate pluralism* of expressions of faith.

FIDES QUA/FIDES QUAE

At a Faith and Order* consultation in Rome (1983) on “The Biblical Roots of the Ancient Creeds”, a tentative definition of faith was proposed as follows: “The term faith indicates at the same time a decisive act and a continuing attitude of believing (fides qua creditur) as well as a set of beliefs and convictions (fides quae creditur). The Old and the New Testament witness that faith in God is expressed by an existential, personal and communal act and attitude of acceptance, decision, trust, confidence, confessing, hope and obedience. This fides qua can never be without or separated from the content of faith (fides quae). Otherwise the act of faith would be an empty or a purely self-generated act. The content of faith is determined by the one towards whom it is directed. This fides quae can be expressed in a great plurality of forms, ranging from short biblical affirmations such as ‘Jesus is Lord’ to massive theological expositions” (The Roots, 20).

A personal act or attitude of faith (= confessing, trust in someone or something) can never be without some clear assertion and decision about God and the works of God, as the prophets of Israel and the gospel of Jesus have shown. The Hebrew word for faith (’emunah) echoes a fundamental trust in God’s presence and care, guidance and sovereignty, as becomes clear from the faith of Abraham, Moses and the prophets (see Heb. 11). A confession of faith is never a conceptual statement about the faith only, but always a doxology, involving a personal commitment of life, structuring the consensus* of a community and inviting, persuading others to assent and to adhere. In the words of the Joint Working Group* between the WCC and the Roman Catholic Church in Towards a Confession of the Common Faith: “The apostolic texts present the faith to us as a vital dynamism by which the whole person (spirit, heart, will), recognizing in Jesus Christ his God and his Saviour, welcomes him through the Holy Spirit and in doing so yields himself to him in all that his mystery admits of and promises. For in giving himself to us, he enables us, always in the Holy Spirit, to give ourselves to him also. Conversion and docility to the Spirit find their source here. And this explains the coming together of the churches in efforts to enable the new creation, of which the Risen Christ is the Lord, to shine forth even now.”

FAITH AND WORSHIP

In the words of Faith and Order at Montreal 1963, this faith is transmitted in a process of tradition, “not only as a sum of tenets, but as a living reality transmitted through the operation of the Holy Spirit” (para. 46). In the worship and liturgy, in the prayer and commitment of the church community, this tradition of faith becomes a corporate reality, directly related to the salvific work of Christ and to the actual situation of humanity in nature* and history.* To quote Montreal again: “Christian worship, set forth in baptism and celebrated in the eucharist, is grounded and centred in the historical ministry of Jesus Christ, his death and resurrection, and his exalted and continuing ministry. Such worship always includes the gathering of Christ’s people, the preaching of the word of God, participation in Christ’s self-offering and intercession for all men, and thanksgiving with joy” (paras 108-109).

The Second Vatican Council* was thinking much along the same lines when it stated in the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963): “The church is essentially both human and divine, visible but endowed with invisible realities, zealous in action and dedicated to contemplation, present in the world, but as a pilgrim, so constituted that in her the human is directed towards and subordinated to the divine, the visible to the invisible, action to contemplation, and this present world to that city to come, the object of our quest” (Sacrosanctum Concilium 2).

In the tradition of the Orthodox churches, faith as such is enacted within the divine liturgy* and in the eucharistic community of the church. In a study document of F&O on the explication of the Nicene Creed,* the matter is put this way: “The individual’s confession of faith, however, is made in communion with the faith of the whole church. Where baptism is conferred within the context of the liturgy of a local church, the community responds: 'This is the faith of the church, this is our faith.' The Nicene Creed is the confession of faith which belongs to the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church. In the Nicene Creed the individual joins with all the baptized gathered together in each and every place, now and throughout the ages, in the church's proclamation of faith: 'We believe in.' The confession 'we believe in' articulates not only the trust of individuals in God's grace, but it also affirms the trust of the whole church in God. There is a bond of communion between those who join together in making a common confession of their faith" (Confessing the One Faith, paras 2-3).

FAITH AND PRACTICE

The biblical terminology for the act of faith ('emunah, pistis) implies a faithful practice, even while, in its character as adherence to the living God and participation in divine life (see Vatican II, Dei Verbum 1), it transcends the concrete works and deeds of sinful human beings. The old controversy over "faith and (meritorious) works" has been superseded in the modern ecumenical movement by a new awareness of the practical implications of faith. From the WCC's first assembly (Amsterdam 1948) onwards, the inter-relatedness of faith and hope,* faith and charity, faith and prophetic confession over against all false ideologies has been stressed. The very first sections of the successive WCC assembly reports form a consistent chain of arguments for the unity of faith and practice. "Confessing Christ and being converted to his discipleship belong inseparably together" (Nairobi, 1.13). "Christians witness in word and deed to the in-breaking reign of God. We experience the power of the Holy Spirit to confess Christ in a life marked by both suffering and joy. Christ's decisive battle has been won at Easter, and we are baptized into his death that we might walk in newness of life (Rom. 6:4). Yet, we must still battle daily against those already dethroned, but not yet destroyed, 'principalities and powers' of this rebellious age. The Holy Spirit leads us into all truth, engrafting persons into the Body of Christ in which all things are being restored by God" (ibid., 1.5).

At the F&O plenary meeting in Bangalore 1978, this idea of faith was expressed in a "Common Account of Hope", echoing the worldwide struggle of people for liberation and renewal as part of their faith. The Vancouver assembly's call for a worldwide conciliar process for Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation* and the world convocation on JPIC in Seoul 1990 demonstrate once more the necessity of relating the Trinitarian faith of the church to the problems of suffering humanity and groaning nature.

THE TRINITARIAN BASIS OF FAITH

Faith is not a mere human form of belief, not an epistemological or ethical "thought-form" or "imperative" only. It refers to the reality of the living God in history and is in fact communion with that God: "Christians believe that 'the one true God', who made himself known to Israel, has revealed himself supremely in the 'one whom he has sent', namely Jesus Christ (John 17:3); that, in Christ, God has reconciled the world to himself (2 Cor. 5:19); and that, by his Holy Spirit, God brings new and eternal life to all who through Christ put their trust in him" (Confessing the One Faith, para. 6).

The Second Vatican Council declared: "It pleased God, in his goodness and wisdom, to reveal himself and to make known the mystery of his will (cf. Eph. 1:9). His will was that men should have access to the Father, through Christ, the Word made flesh, in the Holy Spirit, and thus become sharers in the divine nature (cf. Eph. 2:18; 2 Pet. 1:4). By this revelation, then, the invisible God (cf. Col. 1:15; 1 Tim. 1:17), from the fullness of his love, addresses men as his friends (cf. Ex. 33:11; John 15:14-15), and moves among them (cf. Bar. 3:38), in order to invite and receive them into his own company" (Dei Verbum 2).

This grounding of the faith in the Trinitarian life and communion of God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit (see Trinity), through the history of salvation colours the whole of Christian faith, its liturgy, theology and practice. Although Christians still differ about the actual interpretation of the Trinitarian communion, the ecumenical movement has based itself on the recognition of the glory of Father, Son and Holy Spirit and agrees on the Trinitarian structure of the history of salvation and its narrative functions (see salvation history).

FAITH AND UNBELIEF

Serious challenges to such faith and hope arise in a world which seems to be caught up, at least in the northern hemisphere, in secularization* processes: the rejection of theism and classical metaphysics, the loss of cultural impact from the Christian faith, the quest for human autonomy in a secularized state, in technological advance and scientific freedom, and in heavy criticism of the Christian heritage and the ecclesiastical institutions. Historical criticism and the hermeneutical gap between the faith of the church through the ages and the symbolic universe of people in modern society have made the search for “a common expression of the apostolic faith today” more than timely.

A worldwide reflection on continuity and change in the expressions of faith, resulting in countless new forms of liturgy and prayer, credal statements and confessions of faith, must go side by side with a serious quest to “hand on the faith once received” in the face of those who are inclined to reject it as a hindrance to their autonomy or as an illusory projection of a past state of human development.

FAITH AND DIALOGUE WITH OTHER FAITHS

The Christian faith is rooted in the faith of Israel. But Christians are separated from Jews by a history of antisemitism,* by deep and mutual misunderstandings with regard to the role of Jesus in God’s salvific work, and by an essentially different view on the relation between God’s covenant* for all peoples and his covenant with Israel. The Jewish-Christian dialogue* within the ecumenical movement has changed our understanding of faith through a serious re-reading of the Jewish scriptures, which belong to the Christian heritage as well, and through a new view on the origins of the church in the ministry of Jesus, as a son of Israel and as a prophet to his people.
