Of quite another type is the dialogue with Islam, the faith of Muslims, who share with Christians the patriarchs and prophets of Israel as teachers of the faith. Muslim-Christian dialogue* calls attention to the wider circles of God’s covenant, as the Vatican II Constitution on the Church has put it (Lumen Gentium 13-15), but not all Christian churches are ready to share this theological position. Some see such views as endangering the uniqueness of Jesus Christ,* which they consider fundamental to Christian faith.

This tension is all the more evident in Buddhist-Christian* and Hindu-Christian dialogue, though many Christians in Asia are coming nearer to their Asian religious and cultural heritage without giving up their faith in Jesus Christ. As the Light for the world, Jesus Christ may even be pictured in the New Testament and in Christian iconography as the “cosmic Christ”, present in all stages of creation and near to all the wisdom of old, as it has been delivered in the Asian context through the intermediary of the Asian religions.

The WCC’s Guidelines on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies declare: “It is Christian faith in the Triune God – Creator of all humankind, Redeemer in Jesus Christ, revealing and renewing Spirit – which calls us Christians to human relationship with our many neighbours. It is Christian faith which sets us free to be open to the faith of others, to risk, to trust and to be vulnerable. In dialogue, conviction and openness are held in balance.”

FAITH AS A GIFT OF GOD AND AS HUMAN RESPONSE

In the aftermath of Protestant dialectical theology, it became a theological cliché to affirm against liberal theologies that it is impossible for humankind to construct a reasonable faith or to develop a natural theology. God communicates with us, before we could ever think about him. Believers know and confess that God loved us before we could love him. He is the God of revelation, inviting us to participate in divine life (Dei Verbum 1). Nevertheless, our answer of faith is based on conversion, on a personal decision to confess God as our Creator, Redeemer and Sanctifier, as himself Father, Son and Holy Spirit. We are ourselves involved in the act of faith. In ecumenical discussions of the relation of faith and baptism* and faith and sacraments, this problem has played an important and controversial role. What the Lima text said about baptism – that it is “both God’s gift and our human response to that gift" (B8) – could equally well have been said about faith. But the churches' responses to Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* disclose that this problem of the relation of divine and human initiative, of God's grace* and human freedom, of faith as a divine gift and as a human spirituality, has not yet been solved to the satisfaction of all. Many fear an ungodly synergism. Others, however, stress the anthropomorphic character of the question itself. There is, from the side of God, no competition between God and humans. God does not need force or violence to impose obedience on humans; God rather persuades them, for there is no violence in God (Epistle to Diognetus 7.4). It is perhaps this model of a gentle, persuading, strengthening and justifying, reconciling and inviting God, which might renew the Christian faith and inform the ecumenical movement as a movement towards the mercy of God.

TOWARDS A COMMON PROFESSION OF FAITH

In an intense and long-term study project ("Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today"), the F&O commission at its Bangalore meeting in 1978 embarked on a search for a faithful contemporary explanation of the content of the ancient creeds, for the recognition of the Nicene Creed of 381 by all churches as the ecumenical creed, and for a common expression of that same faith for today. Thus the commission tried to implement the proposals of the Nairobi assembly: "We ask the churches to undertake a common effort to receive, re-appropriate and confess together, as contemporary occasion requires, the Christian truth and faith, delivered through the apostles and handed down through the centuries. Such common action, arising from free and inclusive discussion under the commonly acknowledged authority of God's word, must aim both to clarify and to embody the unity and the diversity which are proper to the church's life and mission" (Nairobi, 2.19).

The search for such a common faith and witness inspires the whole ecumenical movement. In 1980 the Joint Working Group between the Roman Catholic Church and the WCC published a document on "Common Witness", which together with the F&O study on the apostolic faith gives much hope for a growing unity in faith within the one Body of Christ.

See also Apostles' Creed; apostolic tradition; atheism; catechisms; common confession; common witness creeds; dialogue, bilateral; dialogue, multilateral; lex orandi, lex credendi.

ANTON HOUTEPEN

- Common Witness, Study Document of the JWG RCC/WCC, WCC, 1980 ■ Confessing the One Faith: An Ecumenical Explication of the Apostolic Faith as It Is Confessed in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (381), WCC, 1991 ■ A. Dulles, The Assurance of Things Hoped For: A Theology of Christian Faith, New York, Oxford UP, 1994 ■ Guidelines on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies, WCC, 1990 ■ W. Henn, One Faith: Biblical and Patristic Contributions toward Understanding Unity in Faith, Mahwah NJ, Paulist, 1995 ■ Joint Commission between the Roman Catholic Church and the World Methodist Council, The Word of Life: A Statement on Revelation and Faith, Lake Junaluska NC, World Methodist Council, 1996 ■ H.-G. Link ed., The Roots of Our Common Faith: Faith in the Scriptures and in the Early Church, WCC, 1984 ■ Sharing in One Hope: Bangalore 1978, WCC, 1979 ■ Towards a Confession of the Common Faith, WCC, 1980 ■ G. Tsetsis ed., Orthodox Thought: Reports of Orthodox Consultations Organized by the WCC, 1975-82, WCC, 1983.

FAITH AND ORDER

THE FAITH and Order (F&O) movement serves the churches by leading them into theological dialogue as a means of overcoming obstacles to and opening up ways towards the manifestation of their unity* given in Jesus Christ.

HISTORY

Together with the movement for Life and Work* and the International Missionary Council,* the F&O movement shaped the first phase of the modern ecumenical movement between 1910 and 1948. Soon after the 1910 world missionary conference in Edinburgh, the 1910 convention of the (Anglican) Protestant Episcopal Church in the USA resolved "that a joint commission be appointed to bring about a conference for the consideration of questions touching Faith and Order". Several other churches passed similar resolutions, but the responsibility for preparing the envisioned worldwide conference remained with the newly appointed commission until 1920. In that year a preparatory meeting for the planned world conference on F&O was held in Geneva. Under the leadership of Charles H. Brent, this was a first occasion for the nearly 80 churches represented to exchange their respective positions concerning Christian unity and to create an international and interconfessional continuation committee.

After further preparation the first world conference on F&O took place in 1927 in Lausanne. Over 400 participants, representing 127 Orthodox, Anglican, Reformation and Free churches, assembled under the leadership of Brent "to register the apparent level of fundamental agreements within the conference and the grave points of disagreement remaining". This comparative method was continued at the second world conference (1937) in Edinburgh. Again more than 400 participants, representing 122 churches, met and, under the presidency of William Temple, were able to clarify several concepts of church unity. They also agreed, despite some opposing voices, to unite F&O with the movement for Life and Work "to form a council of churches" – a decision which led to the formation of the WCC* in 1948.

After 1948 the tasks of the F&O movement were carried on by the commission on F&O within the WCC. Under the leadership of Yngve Brilioth the new commission held the third world conference on Faith and Order (1952) in Lund, Sweden, and moved from the comparative method to a form of theological dialogue which approaches controversial issues from a common biblical and Christological basis. Oliver Tomkins chaired the fourth world conference in 1963 in Montreal, Canada. After a longer interval the fifth world conference was held in 1993 in Santiago de Compostela, Spain. The conference was chaired by Mary Tanner and outlined the future work of F&O under the programmatic theme "Towards Koinonia in Faith, Life and Witness".

STRUCTURE, METHOD AND MEMBERSHIP

With its 120 members the commission on F&O, which meets every three or four years, is the most representative theological forum in the world. Its aim is, according to its bylaws, "to proclaim the oneness of the church of Jesus Christ and to call the churches to the goal of visible unity in one faith and one eucharistic fellowship, expressed in worship and in common life in Christ, in order that the world may believe". The bylaws provide for membership in the commission of representatives of churches which are not members of the WCC, thus underlining the movement character of F&O. The ongoing work of F&O is supervised by a board (30 members) and is carried out by the Geneva secretariat of F&O.

Since 1948 the work of F&O has found its most important expression in the meetings of the commission. There, study projects have been initiated which were carried out through international consultations and smaller study drafting groups. The results of these studies have been received by or formulated at commission meetings. Increasingly churches, ecumenical organizations and commissions and institutes as well as interested individuals have participated in F&O studies and thus have provided a much broader basis and involvement.

The composition of the commission has changed considerably since 1948. The rather small percentage of Orthodox members and representatives of the churches in Africa, Asia and Latin America has increased to over 20% and 40% respectively. Women, who were once virtually absent from the commission, represent now nearly 30% of its membership. Since 1968 the Roman Catholic Church has been officially represented with 12 members and participates actively in all F&O studies. Moderators of the commission were Brilioth (1947-57), Douglas Horton (1957-63), Paul Minear (1963-67), H.H. Harms (1967-71), John Meyendorff (1971-75), Nikos Nissiotis (1975-83), John Deschner (1983-91), Mary Tanner (1991-98) and David Yemba (1998-).

THEMES AND ACHIEVEMENTS

Since 1910 the F&O movement and the commission have dealt with a broad spectrum of theological issues: understanding and practice of baptism,* eucharist* and ordained ministry;* the church* and concepts of its unity; intercommunion;* scripture and Tradition;* the role and significance of creeds* and confessions; ordination of women;* the influence of so-called non-theological factors on efforts for church unity. Alongside these controversial issues F&O has increasingly taken up themes which are of common concern for the churches or are fundamental for expressing their already-existing fellowship: worship and spirituality (e.g. the commission prepares jointly with the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity* the material for the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity*), Christian hope* for today, inter-relation between bilateral and multilateral dialogues* (since 1978 the commission has organized eight meetings of the forum on bilateral conversations). Three of the present study projects of F&O also belong to this category of themes: "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today", "The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community" (continued after 1993 by a study on "Ecclesiology and Ethics") and "Ecumenical Hermeneutics". The commission continues to serve united/uniting churches* by organizing regular consultations for them, and it publishes a bi-annual "Survey of Church Union Negotiations". Since 1982 the work of F&O has become more widely known than ever before through the unprecedentedly broad and intensive discussion and reception process in connection with its 1982 *Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry** (BEM) document. This process continues, and F&O will deal with some major critical points raised in the almost 200 official responses of the churches to the so-called Lima text within the framework of a comprehensive ecclesiological study on "The Church as Koinonia" – a study which formed the integrating centre of F&O work beginning in 1994.

Within the wider ecumenical movement, and as part of the structure of the WCC, the commission on F&O sees its task in a concentrated theological effort to assist the churches in overcoming their dividing doctrinal differences, in sharing their diverse theological insights and forms of life as a source of mutual renewal, and in re-appropriating and expressing their common apostolic Tradition.* All these efforts have as their goal the manifestation of the visible unity of the church of Jesus Christ. On the way to this goal the churches are called to become a credible sign and instrument of God's plan for the salvation* and transformation of humanity and all creation. With such a commitment F&O has rendered a significant contribution to the radically changed relationships between the churches and the many steps they have taken to express their full (or at least their growing) unity.

GÜNTHER GASSMANN

- M. Brinkman, Progress in Unity? Fifty Years of Theology within the World Council of Churches: 1945-1995, Louvain, Peeters, 1995
- Faith and Order Papers, ser. 1, 1910-48; ser. 2, 1948 to date, WCC
- G. Gassmann ed., Documentary History of Faith and Order 1963-1993, WCC, 1993
- A History of the Ecumenical Movement, London, SPCK: vol. 1, 1517-1948, R. Rouse & S.C. Neill eds, 1954, vol. 2, 1948-1968, H.E. Fey ed., 1970
- The Nature and Purpose of the Church, WCC, 1999
- A. Karrer, Bekenntnis und Ökumene: Erträge aus den ersten Jahrzehnten der ökumenischen Bewegung, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1996
- J. Skoglund & J.R. Nelson, Fifty Years of Faith and Order, New York, Committee for the Interseminary Movement of the National Student Christian Federation, 1963
- A Treasure in Earthen Vessels, WCC, 1999
- L. Vischer ed., A Documentary History of the Faith and Order Movement, 1927-1963, St Louis MO, Bethany, 1963.

FAITH AND SCIENCE

THE ECUMENICAL movement was slow to catch up with science and technology,* although the latter were rapidly changing the world. In a major address to the WCC's third assembly (New Delhi 1961), Joseph Sittler, drawing on Col. 1, appealed for a unity that applied the doctrine of redemption* to the larger orbit of the whole creation.* But the ecumenical movement did not heed this appeal, which Sittler repeated to a US ecumenical gathering in 1970 in a lecture on "Ecological Commitment as Theological Responsibility", apparently fearing that concern about the environment, science and technology would detract it from its major concern with human justice.

The change of heart seems to have come at the WCC's fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968), which became a turning point for ecumenical concern about science, technology and the environment. The presence of Margaret Mead was probably critical in the assembly recommendation that “the WCC give particular attention to science and the problems of worldwide technological change in its study programme”. With staff responsibility carried by Church and Society, the WCC moved vigorously and effectively in this new direction in a study programme on “The Future of Man in a World of Science-based Technology”, beginning with an exploratory conference on “Technology and the Future of Man and Society” in Geneva in 1970, which provided the agenda for years to follow.

The programme indicated both that the churches were out of touch with changes in science and technology and their impact on society and that many scientists were concerned to change this situation. An important aspect of the work for the next two decades was the strong involvement of scientists and sociologists in the study programme. Scientists who had dropped out of the church because they saw it as irrelevant came into this programme with enthusiasm. What was achieved came largely as a result of consultations on specific issues such as limits to growth; nuclear energy and alternative energy technologies; genetics and the quality of life; humanity, nature and God; theology, science and human purpose; science, ideology and theology; genetic engineering; and science education. The method of work included regional consultations in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

A world conference in Bucharest in 1974 on “Science and Technology for Human Development” became famous for introducing into ecumenical circles the concept of the ecologically sustainable society. From its ecumenical birth, this phrase and the concept it embodies spread around the world. It was incorporated into the WCC’s emphasis on the Just, Participatory and Sustainable Society,* launched at the fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975) – only the second assembly to have a plenary presentation on science and faith. As a result, programmes on the ecologically sustainable society were initiated in many countries, linking up with the eco-justice movement in the USA and with serious sociological studies in the Netherlands and elsewhere.

A second world conference was held at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1979. Its preparatory volume, Faith, Science and the Future, and its proceedings, Faith and Science in an Unjust World, became important ecumenical resources for many churches and theological institutions. Anticipation, the Church and Society journal, also published reactions to the MIT conference. Evident at the conference was the division between the developed world and the developing world as to whether science is good or bad and whether nuclear technology is good or bad. In both cases it was clear that science and technology are not value-free; rather, they reflect the values of the society from which they come.

The sixth assembly of the WCC (Vancouver 1983) saw a new emphasis in the call for a conciliar process on Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation.* The issues now were the tension between war and peace, injustice and justice, and industrialization and the integrity of creation. One issue introduced by the discussion of the integrity of creation was the intrinsic value of non-human creatures and animal rights. This was first taken up at a consultation in 1988, and reported in the book Liberating Life (1990). Just as there was concern in the 1960s that issues of science and technology were a distraction for churches and in the 1970s that environmental issues were a distraction, so too the issue of animal rights is regarded in some ecumenical circles as a distraction from what should be the main concern for the poor.*

Unresolved issues in the ecumenical debate on science and faith include a theology of nature* and a non-anthropocentric or biocentric ethic. One important contribution to this debate was that of Larry Rasmussen in his book, Earth Community, Earth Ethics. Rasmussen explores a version of the Gaia principle, which is expressed by Vaclav Havel as follows: “We belong to a larger whole... and our destiny is dependent not so much on what we do for ourselves but on what we do for earth as a whole.” He concludes his exploration by re-stating a moral guideline suggested by James Gustavson in Ethics from a Theocentric Perspective: “The ‘good’ all things are is more than their good for us, and our own interests are relative to larger wholes than those of immediate human welfare... Human beings thereby share with other participants in the community of life the need to make those sacrifices required for the sustainability of this community as a whole..."

These issues and concerns go to the heart of what science is, what theology is and what are the relations between the two. There is a much greater openness on the sides of both science and theology to learn from each other than in 1970, when some theologians argued they should march to different tunes. Instead of simply trying to understand each other better, movement on the frontiers of science and theology is now concerned with ways in which each may become transformed as a result of their encounter.

CHARLES BIRCH

■ P. Abrecht ed., Faith, Science and the Future, WCC, 1979 ■ P. Abrecht & N. Koshy eds, Before It's Too Late: The Challenge of Nuclear Disarmament, WCC, 1983 ■ P. Abrecht & R. Shinn eds, Faith and Science in an Unjust World, vol. 1: Plenary Presentations, vol. 2: Reports and Recommendations, WCC, 1980 ■ Ian G. Barbour, Religion and Science, London, SCM Press, 1998 ■ C. Birch & P. Abrecht eds, Genetics and the Quality of Life, WCC, 1975 ■ D. Bruce and A. Bruce, Engineering Genesis, London, Earthscan, 1998 ■ D. Gill, From Here to Where?, WCC, 1970 ■ D. Gosling & B. Musschenga eds, Science Education and Ethical Values, WCC, 1985 ■ Manipulating Life: Ethical Issues in Genetic Engineering, WCC, 1982 ■ J. Polkinghorne, Science and Christian Belief, London, SPCK, 1994 ■ L. Rasmussen, Earth Community, Earth Ethics, WCC, 1996 ■ J. Sittler, "Called to Unity", ER, 14, 1962.

FAMILY

THE SOCIAL GROUP called family is found in every culture from ancient to modern times. The term has described a diversity of social realities from the extended net of relatives of pre-modern cultures to the contemporary nuclear family.

Definitions of family are forged culturally, and perhaps have always been multi-layered and multi-dimensional. What we call family today probably denotes something very different from what it did to our ancestors. Today, it denotes different relationships in different contexts. However, whatever the use and understanding of the term, one might safely say that what is today called the nuclear family has always been an important, if not central, element in any definition of the family. In parts of the world where a sense of individualism has shaped societies, the nuclear family has become normative. In other parts where other forms of relationships such as kinship continue to be important in the shaping of societies, the term denotes a broader relatedness beyond the still very essential nucleus of father, mother and children. It is important to add that in the languages of many traditional societies, a term is used that embraces both understandings interchangeably and reflects the inter-relatedness of the many nuclei of the family structure. Thus it is impossible to establish a universal normative definition of the family or its nature, functions and purpose.

What has distinguished a family from other social groups has been its functions: nurture, education and formation, spiritual and emotional support, social and economic support and security, procreation and the socialization of new generations. Some of these functions are now being augmented and drastically modified by modern life, especially in the West, through social and state institutions like child care centres, schools, health care, nursing homes, social security and life insurance.

Traditionally, the above-mentioned functions described the role of the tribe, clan or extended family. Historically, it seems that the human race has not lived in nuclear families but in broader social units. Tribes and clans were functional domestic households, genealogically established, where shared interests and divided responsibilities were fairly clear. With the increase in the complexity of human existence, tribes and clans gradually yielded some of their roles to the extended family and a number of secondary social institutions. The nuclear family as such is a later adaptation, emerging along with the processes of modernization and the increasing individualism of Western societies. To be sure, the nucleus of husband, wife and children existed before the industrial era, but this has not always counted as "family" apart from the larger net of interwoven familial relations.

In the Old Testament, says J.H. Westerhoff, “family” refers to “‘a tribal family’ which included a husband, his wives and their children, his concubines and their children, sons and daughters-in-law and their offspring, slaves of both sexes and their children, dependents such as the parentless, the widows and illegitimate children, aliens such as the sojourner passing through and all the marginal folk who chose to live among them” (257). In the New Testament, too, passages dealing with family life (e.g. Mark 1:29-31; Acts 10; Eph. 5:21-6:9) include relatives and servants within the domestic circle.

In short, “family” today could be regarded as the network of relationships established by marriage, birth and adoption. But the ways in which those relationships are established and the rights and duties attached to these various roles differ greatly according to culture, class, religion and region.

STUDIES OF THE FAMILY

Popular books about the family, both secular and religious, often become best-sellers. From the second half of the 20th century there has been a tremendous expansion of study and research on the family. Several journals are devoted entirely to this field.

Families have been analyzed from different perspectives and disciplines. Studies by cultural anthropologists, sociologists, social scientists and psychologists have all made significant contributions towards a better understanding of the family in different contexts. The declaration of 1994 as International Year of the Family by the United Nations bore testimony to this and to the fact that states have been recognizing the family as one of the main caretakers of life, health and culture.

Many theologians and pastoral counselors are trying to reformulate their understanding of family in the light of new knowledge. They are realizing, for instance, that the notions of family in the teaching and the practice of the church have, with a certain inevitability, been conflated with the understanding of person, couple and household. With a better understanding and recognition of person and personality, the increasing differentiation of couple from family, the affirmation of women in their personhood as distinct from men, and the increasing ability to control procreation, there is an unavoidable and irreversible process towards clearly distinguishing the concepts of persons, couples, families and households. This could be conducive to better family pastoral care (see marriage). Sometimes, however, these developments have also led to an unhealthy dichotomy that negates the essential inter-relatedness of these categories, further increasing human individualism.

THE FAMILY TODAY

To be a family today seems more difficult in almost every culture than ever before. More and more families around the globe concentrate most of their energy on trying to survive in situations of poverty and exploitation. Families – in the recent past, the main transmitters of culture and values – now have to compete fiercely with state agencies, the mass media and economic systems, which impose alien values and behaviours.

However, the family continues to endure as a nucleus of affection, socialization and nurturing. Furthermore, it has proved to be a very resourceful entity: it designs creative strategies for survival in social strata where income is inadequate to meet the reproduction of life and labour; in most “developing” countries, where developmental programmes, primary health care attention and universal education have failed, the family keeps providing – at different levels of proficiency – care, attention, socialization. Social scientists, educators and medical doctors are taking a fresh look at the family in order to learn about traditional medicine, popular education and subsistence economics. In the developed world, families have the potential to become emotionally closer in personal ways. Intimacy may rise while authoritarian relations diminish. Equality among sexes may provide solid ground for families to give a better sense of identity and support to new generations.

THE CHURCH AND THE FAMILY

It is probably true that, in the course of history, Christian communities have accepted and even “baptized” certain culturally defined presuppositions regarding the family as normative. This is perhaps because most pre-modern cultures shared many suppositions in common as far as the place and role of the family in human society. This has led to the churches being accused of defending very conservative positions or trying to impose so-called Christian values on non-Christian communities, an accusation that has not always been unjustified.

The Christian family cannot be identified with any one social pattern. Its value extends far beyond the social. Westerhoff states: "A Christian family has nothing to do with structures and roles; it has to do with the quality of life together, a quality of life that can assume many shapes and in which persons can play various roles" (254).

In many Christian traditions, this quality of life has been defined in the light of a certain understanding of the human person seen as an image of the Triune God. According to this understanding, humanity is created in the image and likeness of God in order to share in the life of the Trinity. The creation of humanity as male and female, the command or rather gift of procreation and the whole story of the first family in Genesis (especially ch. 4) are presented as an indication that the family unit is an integral element in how humanity is called or given to share in the life of God. It shows that the human being is not created as a self-contained individual, but rather (as within the Trinity) as person in relation whose very life and being depends on his/her relationship with the other and with God. In that sense, the family belongs to the realm of creation, yet it does so as an essential part of God's economy of sharing God's life with humanity and with creation.

In the realm of salvation, it is the church, according to Christian tradition, that has been called to reflect this life that God freely shares, through Christ and in the power of the Holy Spirit, with God's creation. The church is that body which is called to fulfill God's eternal purpose of reconciling all of humanity to itself, to the rest of creation and to God. In other words, the church is that body in which the human being is in an eternal process of being restored to true personhood as defined above.

From earliest times, the church has seen the family, at least implicitly, as an essential part of the process of restoration. Families and households seemed to play an important role in the life of the early church; St Paul's letters to the Ephesians (5:21-6:9), and to Timothy (ch. 3 and 5:1-8) among others, indicate a close connection in the apostolic equating of the church and the family or household. In certain traditions, this has led to the view of the Christian family or household as a microcosm of the church, or at least that microcosmic community in which the life of the church is first lived and manifested.

Like the extended family, the church, wherever it has been, has always been both a community within a community and a community of communities, reflecting always both the particular and the universal, in a certain kind of essential inter-relatedness. What the church, in its proper function, is to the wider human community, the family, in its proper function, is to the church: the primary, if not essential, unit of the "household of God" (1 Tim. 3:15).

As churches continue to explore new pastoral approaches to the havoc created by war, poverty, uprooting and isolation, they could do well to restore and deepen their understanding of the place and role of the Christian family. As Kenyan bishop David Gitari told the 1988 Lambeth conference: "With so many fractured and lonely families in the cities and so many people living alone, the church should see itself as an extended family where every believer finds a home, not just figuratively but literally. The church must work to build strong homes, exploring extended family models, so that each home truly is a church and the church truly a family."

Among churches all over the world, there is an increasing awareness of the importance of contextual theological reflection and relevant pastoral care for the family today. To work pastorally requires serious knowledge not only of a particular context and history* but also of the major trends of history and the resources that cultures have to cope with in a changing environment. Today, ecumenism has helped to make available insights from different confessional and cultural traditions. These should contribute to better understanding and mutual enrichment. Besides that, a renewed dialogue with other faiths is necessary in order to understand better the universality of the family. All these elements should lead to the deeper spiritual and theological insights urgently required to determine not only the limits but also the links between persons, couples, families, households, communities and the whole oikoumene.

JORGE E. MALDONADO and KWAME A. LABI

■ W. Everett, Blessed Be the Bond: Christian Perspectives on Marriage and Family, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1985 ■ L. Hoffman, Foundations of Family Therapy: A Conceptual Framework for Systems Change, New York, Basic Books, 1981 ■ Masamba Ma Mpolo & C. De Sweemer, Families in Transition: The Case for Counselling in Context, WCC, 1987 ■ J. Meyendorff, Marriage: An Orthodox Perspective, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1970 ■ P. Nellas, Deification in Christ: The Nature of the Human Person, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1987 ■ F.I. Nye, "Fifty Years of Family Research, 1937-87", Journal of Marriage and the Family, 50, 2, 1988 ■ C. Roth and D. Anderson, translated, St. John Chrysostom on Marriage and Family Life, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary ■ J.H. Westerhoff, "The Church and the Family", Religious Education, 78, 2, 1983 ■ J. Zizioulas, Being as Communion, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1985.

FASCISM

FASCISM is a form of totalitarian government (see totalitarianism) and organization of society developed by Benito Mussolini in Italy in the early 1920s. Although its ideology* was not too clear, it included some romantic anti-rational elements together with an extreme nationalism. It claimed Georges Sorel and Vilfredo Pareto as ideological influences, built on certain interpretations of Nietzsche's idea of power and continued the nationalist movement of the poet D'Annunzio. The nation* is identified with the state,* conceived fundamentally as a centre of power* that concentrates the totality of the forces and resources of the people and leads it to its goal, the aggrandizement of the nation. The leadership is elitist and concentrated in a charismatic leader (duce = leader, conductor) who is always right. Rejecting liberal democracy and proletarian communism, it created a corporate form of government, organizing labour and capital in corporations (professionals, industry, etc.) under the leadership of the government, placing all public servants directly under the direction of the (fascist) party. It led Italy into wars of conquest in Ethiopia and Albania and finally into the alliance with Germany in the second world war.

A number of analogous regimes came to power in several European countries at different times after the first world war (Austria, Hungary, Romania, Spain). Since each of them had its own characteristics as a result of historical, sociological and cultural particularities, the word "fascism" became a sort of imprecise catch-all term – which is even more apparent when it is extended to third-world countries (e.g. Brazil under Vargas, Argentina under Peron), whose geopolitical situation defines some fundamental differences. Sometimes the expressions "neofascism" or "dependent fascism" have been used for these cases. Even more, it has become common to use "fascist" to designate a certain type of reactionary, right-wing or totalitarian attitude of mind which can be found in almost any society.

Although originally anti-clerical, Mussolini's pragmatism led him to seek a recognition by the Roman Catholic Church and a solution to the "Roman question", which culminated in the Lateran treaty of 1929. However, the totalitarian character of fascism eventually led into conflict with the church, as on the question of the fascist attempt to control the life and education of youth. Pius XII's letter Non Abbiamo Bisogno (1931) marked the break between the government and the church.

For the ecumenical movement and Protestant churches, the conflict with fascism was more closely related to German National Socialism (see Confessing Church, war guilt). The Oxford Life and Work conference (1937) faced the questions raised by this ideology, and its whole study on church, community and state involved a rejection of fascism. In this and subsequent WCC meetings (Amsterdam, Evanston), fascism was rejected, implicitly or explicitly, under the label of "totalitarianism" on the basis of its total claim on human life and its tendency to assume an unlimited power.

More recently, the churches are facing this threat in the doctrine of national secu-riety.* The ways in which the WCC has portrayed a desirable human society (see responsible society; just, participatory and sustainable society; justice, peace and the integrity of creation) espouse forms of democratic organization, people's participation and human rights and responsibilities that radically exclude all forms of fascism.

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO

FEDERALISM

THE WORD derives from the Latin foedus, meaning covenant, alliance (French alliance), bond (German Bund). In modern ecumenical usage, "federal" relationships have been established within a single country among denominations which, while maintaining their separate identities, desire to collaborate in certain limited areas or for certain limited objectives, especially e.g. in social action or for a combined approach to civil governments. Thus there was the Free Church Federal Council in Britain (1940, after fore-runners) and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America (1908, predecessor of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA). Internationally, a federal relationship could link nationally constituted churches of the same confession for consultative or cooperative purposes, though legislative power rested with the individual constituent bodies (thus the World Alliance of Reformed Churches,* 1875; the Baptist World Alliance,* 1905; the Lutheran World Federation,* 1947). The World Student Christian Federation* (1895) grouped the national Student Christian Movements that were themselves functionally ecumenical but did not raise any ecclesiological pretensions. The comic potential of federalism is suggested by the secular example of the humorist Garrison Keillor, who claimed that his US radio programme was sponsored by the fictitious "American Federation of Associations".

While federalism has a certain provisional utility, most ecumenists have judged it inadequate as a final model of church unity. John Kent wrote that "Christ is more than the president of a federal republic of Christian associations; he is the Head of the Body which is his church" (The Age of Disunity, 1966). The inadequacy of the federal pattern of church unity – what he called denominations "glued together at the edges" – was already perceived by the Episcopalian priest W.R. Huntington (1838-1909), who inspired the Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral.* With papal authoritarianism, it constituted the two extremes between which, according to Huntington, an "organic" alternative should and could be located. Federalism's ecclesiological weaknesses reside in its falling short of a genuinely conciliar capacity for decision making on matters of doctrine and discipline, and in the shallowness of its vision of what is possible and required in a life of koinonia* in the gospel.

It is significant that the Lutheran World Federation in 1990 moved towards a Lutheran "communion" in word and sacrament, a self-understanding as "pulpit and altar fellowship". And in recent "covenantal" plans of church unity between denominations in a single country, the proposed degree of community in doctrine, sacraments, ministry, mission and decision making exceeds the (etymologically equivalent) older idea of a "federation". This was true of the abortive English proposals for a covenant (1982), which saw themselves as only an interim step "towards visible unity". It was true also of the Consultation on Church Union* plan for "Churches in Covenant Communion" (1988), which nevertheless deliberately renounced "consolidation of organizational structures" among the participant churches.

See also communion; conciliarity; covenanting; denominationalism; union, organic; unity, models of; unity, ways to.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

- E.L. Brand, Towards a Lutheran Communion: Pulpit and Altar Fellowship, Geneva, LWF, 1988
- J.H. Schjöring, P. Kumari, N.A. Hjelm, V. Mortensen eds, From Federation to Communion: The History of the Lutheran World Federation, Minneapolis, Augsburg Fortress, 1997.

FELLOWSHIP OF ST ALBAN AND ST SERGIUS

AN INDEPENDENT society whose aim is to increase understanding and cooperation between Christians of Orthodox and Western traditions, the fellowship was founded in St Albans, England, in 1928, by participants in two Anglo-Russian theological conferences organized jointly by the Russian and British Student Christian Movements. It takes its name from St Alban, the first martyr of Britain, and St Sergius of Radonezh, patron saint of the Russian theological academy in Paris, with which many of the Orthodox founder members were connected.

In the early years the fellowship worked mainly with theologians and theological students, through conferences and lectures in Anglican and Free church theological colleges. A key figure in this educational work was Nicolas Zernov, one of the fellowship's founders and its secretary 1934-47 who, with his wife Militza, made its development a life's work. Through his talks and writings, he made a great contribution to the knowledge of Orthodoxy* among English-speaking Christians. Early participants in the conferences were predominantly Russians from Paris and members of the Church of England, but gradually they were joined by Orthodox from Romania, Serbia and Greece, Episcopalians from the USA and Swedish Lutherans. These contacts later led to the formation of branches outside Britain.

An important contribution of the fellowship in the 1930s and 1940s was providing accurate information on the situation of the church in Russia at a time when little of this was generally available in the West. The 1930s saw a high pitch of ecumenical enthusiasm in the fellowship, with hopes that a restoration of communion between Anglican and Orthodox churches could be in sight, but the discussions on practical advances in this direction were not continued.

In 1943 the fellowship acquired a permanent base, a house in London dedicated to St Basil the Great. This served as a centre for meetings, hospitality and prayer, until the fellowship office moved to Oxford in 1993; its chapel, unique in having both an Orthodox sanctuary and an Anglican altar, was dedicated by Archbishop Germanos of Thyateira in 1949. Fr Lev Gillet, known to many for his retreats, meditations and writings under the name of "a monk of the Eastern church", served as chaplain there until his death in 1980.

After the Second Vatican Council* Roman Catholic participation in the fellowship, never totally absent, showed a marked increase. Nevertheless, relations between Orthodox and Anglicans have continued to be central to the fellowship in the English-speaking world. The inauguration in 1973 of the official Anglican-Orthodox dialogue,* involving many prominent fellowship members, could thus be seen as official approbation of the work already being carried on unofficially by the fellowship.

Today, fellowship members number over 2000, about half of them in Britain. Membership is strongest in English-speaking countries, but there are also local meetings in Greece and Scandinavia. The majority of members are Anglican, with a number of Lutherans and Roman Catholics and some Free church members; a large part of the Orthodox members are converts to Orthodoxy.

The main event in the life of the fellowship is still the annual conference, which brings together clergy and laity, theologians and non-theologians of all ages and from several countries. Another annual event is a pilgrimage to St Albans, where the Orthodox liturgy is celebrated in honour of the saint. Local branches also organize meetings and services, and the fellowship sometimes arranges programmes specifically for theological students.

The fellowship has been responsible for the publication of a number of books on Orthodox and Anglican spiritual life and points of convergence between the two traditions. Along with the fellowship journal Sobornost, founded in 1928, these have done much to make Orthodoxy more widely known.

Since the first conference, when Orthodox and Anglican eucharists were celebrated at the same altar on alternate days – a revolutionary idea in the 1920s – eucharistic worship has been at the heart of the fellowship's ecumenical work. In fact, a condition of membership is readiness to attend each other's eucharist.* The founders of the fellowship and their successors believed that this shows both the element of real unity in worship of the same Lord and the pain of disunity. Experience of worship is also seen as a vital element in getting to know another Christian tradition; the fellowship has more than once presented to the wider ecumenical movement a plea for common worship according to various traditions rather than mixed services.

Despite great advances in the ecumenical movement since the fellowship's foundation, it still provides a forum unique outside the official bilateral dialogues* for Orthodox and Western Christians to meet on equal terms and address theological issues together, each in the way that arises naturally from their own tradition.

ELIZABETH THEOKRITOFF

■ N. Zernov & M. Zernov, Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius: A Historical Memoire, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1979.

FEMINISM

THE WORD "feminism" has become a key word of the second women's movement, which began in the late 1960s. While the earlier women's movement was chiefly concerned with improving the position of women in society, emancipation, economic independence and work, the issues for the feminist movement of today are replacement of the established patriarchal order, raising awareness of the disastrous effects of the division woman/nature and man/intellect, and the adoption of female rather than male guiding principles. The question of woman's economic, political and social independence from man has thus been joined by that of her psychological independence from him in a male-dominated culture.* This has led to far more radical solutions and utopias.

Feminist groups hold varying standpoints, but common to all is the view that women need their own organizations in order to assert their interests – not as man-hating caucuses, but as self-help groups for women in an overwhelmingly male culture. The conflict experienced by women is today expressed in the word "sexism",* by analogy with "racism" and "classism", and connoting the oppression of one sex by the other which takes various forms – exploitation, expropriation, rejection, persecution and ill-treatment of women.

The church and theology have been a target of feminist criticism from the start. In Paul's commandment that women should keep silent (1 Cor. 14:34), in Bible passages stating that Eve sinned first and must redeem herself through bearing children (1 Tim.

2:11-15), in the works of the church fathers and the reformers, and in dialectical theology (Karl Barth), there is a wide variety of sexist statements declaring women to be weak, inferior, receptive and passive. In some churches such statements are used as an argument to justify the fact that women have been given a place in the church hierarchy only belatedly or not at all. The predominantly masculine imagery of God and masculine language about God have also served as a religious justification of the oppression of women in society.

On the other hand, there are many examples of Christian groups whose expectation of the kingdom of God* and of the Spirit has encouraged equality between women and men (Cathars, Waldensians, Quakers). In the New Testament there is evidence that men and women were equal in the early Christian communities, though this fact has been glossed over in the course of the patriarchal account of history. Women apostles (Mary Magdalene, Junia), community leaders (Martha, Lydia), and Jesus' vision of a community of women and men not ruled by a father (see Mark 10:29) point to a non-sexist early Christian culture and church which are gradually being re-discovered through the efforts of feminist research and theology. There are many indications that the dichotomy of spirit and nature (body) was unknown in the acts of healing performed by the "Jesus movement" and that women played a prominent role.

The ecumenical movement was ahead of most churches in giving serious attention to the question of the status of women. As early as the 1927 world conference on Faith and Order,* seven women presented a statement demanding that the issue be central at the meeting. Before the WCC's first assembly (Amsterdam 1948) a questionnaire was sent out to obtain information about the life and work of women in the churches, but the hesitant verbal resolutions made in Amsterdam did not lead to a change in practice. In Evanston (1954) the will clearly existed "to help women find the right balance between their family responsibilities and their professional life" as responsible members of society, but the masculine structure of that society, the "exclusively masculine environment", was taken for granted.

Not until 1974 at the women's consultation in Berlin on "Sexism in the 1970s", in preparation for the WCC's Nairobi assembly, were these structures fundamentally challenged. Sexism, it was said, exists where on the ground of sex individuals or groups are assigned on principle to a subordinate position through attitudes, behaviour or institutional structures. During the consultation, however, women from the third world shifted the problem of sexual oppression to the plane of imperialistic oppression and exploitation, also experienced by men, who, in resignation at their inability to alter their situation, react by adopting sexist behaviour patterns.

Sexism, then, is seen not so much as a struggle between the sexes as a common struggle within the wider struggle for liberation of the oppressed classes. Sexism in the white, middle-class sense of the term was resisted. To the disappointment of some North American women, a demand for the rights of lesbian women was not included in the recommendations made by the consultation.

The first consultation of European Christian women in Brussels in 1978 was able to work out a clearer Christian understanding of feminism: "We realized that it does not mean the same to everyone, but that agreement exists on the following...: feminism for us is a strategy, a principle for living which determines our thinking and action. For women in the Western countries of Europe the first important thing is to discover themselves as women. After centuries of being told by society and the church who they should be, what they should and should not do, it is time now to find out who they themselves think they are, what they can do, what they want to do. This process will be linked with a critical examination of the structures of their churches and the society in which they live... The church and theology must be made inclusive, they must be made to see all human beings, including the oppressed... We expressly emphasize that this strategy, this living principle, is not directed against men, but should be an encouragement to them to discover in themselves the attributes they have of the other sex. We want to live together in friendship, as allies and partners on the way to liberation."

The problem of sexism within the church was dealt with in greater depth in the following years through the plan, already presented in 1974 at the meeting of the F&O commission in Accra, Ghana, for a study on the "Community of Women and Men in the Church".* A study booklet was presented to the F&O commission in 1978 in Bangalore for comment and approval before being sent to WCC member churches.

The unique aspect of this study was that its starting point was not what Christian men and women ought to think but their own experience and thoughts. Its aim was to discover the reality of partnership between women and men in different cultures and churches and to invite them to a dialogue. Above all, it sought to let women speak. Parallel to regional meetings in Asia, Latin America and Europe, specialist consultations were held on the ordination of women, a theology of human wholeness and the authority of scripture in the light of women's experiences. Some people felt the study was organized in such a way as to give prominence to the subject area "church, unity, fellowship", thus blurring the issue of sexism in the church. To women from the Western world in particular, the programme seemed to lack bite, "jumping too quickly to community without taking seriously the deep rifts and the breakdown of communication between women and men in our culture". Others, however, were relieved that the community study did not have sexism as its theme. From socialist countries came voices saying they did not want a women's study because partnership was already a reality in their countries. Asia and Africa let it be known that their problems were different. In fact only 20% of the Christian women and men who took part in the study came from outside Europe and North America. Yet the results showed that even in these societies and churches covert but widespread sexism exists. The aim of the study was not, however, to ignore the problems but to challenge as many people as possible to think afresh about creative ways of working together to build the church and make it into a community of women and men.

A final international consultation in Sheffield in 1981 heard the web of oppression – racism, classism, sexism – articulated more clearly than ever, as women from African, Asian and Latin American countries insisted that “wholeness and community within the church” be considered in the context of “a larger struggle for the realization of human wholeness, for liberation from widespread oppression that is classist and racist”. They declared that their sense of priorities constrained them to speak from within and to this larger struggle.

Through the 1980s, study of issues of women and work, women in poverty, violence against women and sex tourism continued in the WCC’s Sub-unit on Women in Church and Society. But the most challenging implications of the community study were dismissed. At Sheffield, WCC general secretary Philip Potter had declared: “For me, this study is a veritable test of our faith and of the ecumenical movement, which is concerned about the unity of the whole people of God, as a sign and sacrament of the unity of all the peoples of the world.” As in Berlin, at Sheffield the inseparability of theological and so-called “non-theological factors”, of unity and renewal, of church and world, was strongly articulated. Pauline Webb has said that it was at Berlin that “for the first time many women came to realize that the question of women’s participation was not simply a matter of social justice, but of theological integrity”. After Sheffield, however, it was clear that World Council ways of thinking theologically and acting institutionally would not be changed in light of the community study.

The Council declared the Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women* from 1988 to 1998. Inaugurated during the Easter season, the opening refrain was, “Who will roll the stone away?” The Decade was, in some measure, a response to the significant role issues of women and religion played at the end-of-the-Decade for Women conference sponsored by the United Nations in Nairobi in 1985.

However, leaders of the Ecumenical Decade were clear that this was not a women’s decade but the churches’ decade. It was envisioned as an opportunity for men and women of faith – for the church – to be in solidarity with all women in church and society, to overcome the years of oppression experienced by women worldwide, to be full partners on the journey towards a world human community from which no one is excluded because of gender, race, ethnic origin or religion. In short, it called the churches to conversion – to a re-interpretation and re-ordering of their faith, life and witness. But the 1997 report of the team visits, Living Letters, revealed that many member churches were not fully committed to or participating in the Decade. As earlier, the churches’ decade was becoming a women’s decade. The closing festival, held prior to the WCC’s eighth assembly in Harare in 1998, challenged the churches “to ensure that the solidarity we seek is sustained”.

A major post-Decade initiative, “On Being Church: Women’s Voices and Visions”, seeks to sustain the solidarity, noting that mid-Decade teams heard not only stories of violence and exclusion but also “stories of women standing in solidarity with each other, of their commitment to their churches and their efforts to develop their own ways of being church together”. The study invites women and men to (1) describe women’s participation in the life of their church; (2) express their visions, theological insights and hope for the church as community and for justice and solidarity; (3) express their faith and struggle in secular groups. The study hopes thereby both to affirm women’s voices and to bring these voices to the churches as contributions to the renewal and unity of the church.

Numerous questions related to the subordination of women in church and society remain unanswered within the ecumenical movement – inclusive language, new images of God, new ways of worshipping, women’s ordination, sexuality. These will not be easily addressed or answered. But as feminist theological voices become more articulate and fully developed throughout the churches and world they may set forth new visions for the ongoing conversation.

See also ordination of women; theology, feminist.

ELISABETH MOLTMANN-WENDEL and MELANIE A. MAY

■ K. Bliss, The Service and Status of Women in the Churches, London, SCM Press, 1952 ■ The Community of Women and Men in the Church, WCC, 1983 ■ Epd-Dokumentation, 25/78 ■

A.L. Eriksson, The Meaning of Gender in Theology, Uppsala, Univ. of Uppsala, 1995 ■ C. Halkes, "Frauen in der ökumenischen Bewegung", in Feministische Theologie: Perspektiven zur Orientierung, Stuttgart, Kassel, 1988 ■ S. Herzel, A Voice for Women: The Women's Department of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1981 ■ M.A. May, Bonds of Unity: Women, Theology, and the Worldwide Church, Atlanta, Scholars, 1989 ■ E. Moltmann-Wendel, Das Land wo Milch und Honig fließt (ET A Land Flowing with Milk and Honey, London, SCM Press, 1986) ■ E. Moltmann-Wendel, I Am My Body: A Theology of Embodiment, New York, Continuum, 1995 ■ M. Oduyoye, Who Will Roll the Stone Away? The Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women, WCC, 1990 ■ L. Russell & J. Clarkson, Dictionary of Feminist Theologies, Louisville, Westminster John Knox, 1996 ■ Sexism in the 1970s; Report of the WCC Consultation in West Berlin, WCC, 1974 ■ P. Webb, She Flies Beyond: Memories and Hopes of Women in the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1993.

FILIOQUE

THE FILIOQUE clause in the version of the Nicene Creed* generally used in the Western churches affirms that the Holy Spirit* proceeds "from the Father and the Son" (Latin filioque) and seeks thus to articulate the personal relation between the second and third persons of the Trinity.

The original text of the creed, as approved by the council of Constantinople* (381; the text is not that of the council of Nicea in 325) and ratified by later ecumenical councils,* stated only that the Holy Spirit "proceeds from the Father". The addition of the filioque came to be accepted in the West, not least under the influence of Augustine (e.g. On the Trinity 15.27.29), but not in the Eastern Orthodox churches. It has remained for more than a thousand years a point of contention between Eastern and Western Christendom, albeit one that has been more eagerly attacked by the East than defended by the West. Not indeed that the West has generally been much inclined to surrender the filioque: the general attitude has been that the filioque is self-evidently correct and that it was not worth troubling to attend much to Eastern objections. In recent decades, however, there have been signs of a change in climate.

The filioque seems first to have been solemnly affirmed as an article of faith* by the synod of Toledo in 589. The occasion was the conversion of King Reccared from Arianism to Nicene Orthodoxy. The filioque served to underline the consubstantiality of the Son with the Father, and the synod had little or no sense of stating anything new or controversial. In the following centuries the filioque became a standard axiom of Western theology. Conflict with the East was provoked in the early 9th century when Charlemagne attempted to impose the filioque on the whole church; he was successfully opposed by Pope Leo III on the ground that the text ratified by an ecumenical council could not be arbitrarily modified. Two generations later Patriarch Photius in Constantinople went on the attack with the deliberately opposed formula "from the Father alone", but this too remained a private initiative.

Around 1014 the singing of the Nicene Creed was introduced with papal approval into the liturgy of the mass in Rome, and the form of the creed adapted included the filioque. This contributed to the schism* between East and West and subsequently to notable theological defences of the filioque, e.g. by Anselm and Aquinas. The attempt to reconcile the two sides at the council of Florence (1439), on the principle that the filioque could be interpreted as equivalent to the formula, acceptable to the East, "from the Father through the Son", foundered on Byzantine resistance. The Reformation brought no change on the matter in the West; the main Protestant churches retained both the filioque theology and the corresponding wording of the Nicene Creed.

Increased contact between East and West began in the 19th century to encourage rethinking on both sides, but only after more Eastern Orthodox churches joined the WCC in the 1960s did the topic become important on the ecumenical agenda and did several Western churches begin to think aloud about deleting the filioque. Especially significant were two ecumenical meetings at Klingenthal, Alsace, in 1979 and 1980; the report Spirit of God – Spirit of Christ states what are still today the chief problems and offers some perspectives on ways forward.

The problems are of considerable complexity. Not only are they not all of the same sort; they tend to appear different from different standpoints in the dialogue. In the eyes of Eastern Orthodoxy, for example, the changing of the wording of the Nicene Creed by any other authority than an ecumenical council is both canonically illegitimate and an offence against Christian community. The very different Roman Catholic view of the locus of authority in the church might concede the second point, but not the first. The attitudes of other churches to these issues naturally vary according to the degree of their commitment to restoring Christian unity, to their sense of the authority of the early church and the ecumenical councils and to the role the Nicene Creed plays in their worship.

More substantial – and even more difficult – is the question whether what the filioque affirms is theologically true in the context of Trinitarian doctrine (see Trinity). This question cannot be settled simply by appeal to biblical texts or to historical tradition conceived as finally authoritative; it is an issue in dogmatic theology, specifically a question of Trinitarian hermeneutics. A major difficulty here is that the tendency and direction of Trinitarian thinking in East and West have been subtly but significantly different since (at the latest) the 5th century; the filioque fits relatively well into the Western scheme, but not into the Eastern.

A further range of issues has to do with possible implications of filioque theology for other fundamental issues. So, for example, the charge has been made that the filioque has led in Western theology to an effectual subordination of the Holy Spirit* not only to Jesus Christ* but also to the church or to the human spirit; the counter-charge in defence of the filioque, advanced in particular by Karl Barth, is that it is an essential bulwark against all kinds of natural theology.

Finally there is the question: If the filioque is abandoned, how can such valid concerns as it sought to defend be upheld? The more distant and more recent past have brought a range of suggestions for alternative formulations, such as “from the Father through the Son” or “who proceeds from the Father and shines forth in the Son”. It remains to be seen whether or how far such proposals can deliver the degree of ecumenical theological agreement that is necessary if the filioque controversy is to be relegated to the past.

ALASDAIR HERON

- M.H. Gamillscheg, Die Kontroverse um das Filioque: Möglichkeiten einer Problemlösung auf Grund der Forschungen und Gespräche der letzten hundert Jahre, Würzburg, Augustinus, 1996
- A. Heron, “The Filioque Clause”, in One God in Trinity, P. Toon & J. Spiceland eds, London, Bagster, 1980
- J. Moltmann, Trinität und Reich Gottes (ET The Trinity and the Kingdom of God), London, SCM Press, 1981, pp.178-90
- B. Oberdorfer, Filioque: Geschichte und Theologie eines ökumenischen Problems, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001
- Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, “The Greek and the Latin Traditions Regarding the Procession of the Holy Spirit”, IS, 89, 1995
- L. Vischer ed., Spirit of God – Spirit of Christ: Ecumenical Reflections on the Filioque Controversy, WCC, 1981.

FIRST AND RADICAL REFORMATION CHURCHES

THESE TERMS have emerged in ecumenical discourse since 1950. The term first Reformation was coined by scholars associated with the Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren to characterize reforming movements within medieval Catholicism from the 12th through the 15th centuries. The leading religious bodies formed from these movements are the Waldensian Church, the Unity of Brethren (Unitas Fratrum), the Renewed Moravian Church (which considered itself to be the direct continuation of the Unity of Brethren), and several Hussite-based churches. These churches were marked by emphasis on the synoptic gospels (especially the sermon on the mount) as a rule of life. The impetus behind the formulation “first Reformation” seems to have been the felt need to consider the reforming energies of these bodies as significant in their own right, over against the customary perception that they were a prelude or prologue to the mainstream Protestant Reformation.

The term radical Reformation was popularized through the seminal work of this title by George H. Williams (1962). He applied the concept to a wide range of dissenters, who had in common the rejection of Catholicism as well as Lutheranism and the Reformed. Williams used the term “magisterial Reformation” to characterize these latter two communions – along with Anglicanism – to highlight their linkage with the state as well as their arrogation of the teaching authority* of the official church. Religious groups emerging from the radical Reformation have also been called “Believers churches” or “Free churches” because of their championing of separation of church and state* and of religious liberty.*

Although discussion continues on how inclusive the term “radical Reformation” should be, there is agreement that it can always apply to the various manifestations of Anabaptism around the world; most of these churches currently use some form of the name “Mennonite”,* although Taufgesinnten and the Dutch form Doopsgezinden are also found. Also stemming from 16th-century Anabaptism are the communally based Hutterian Brethren, now found in the north-western states and provinces of the USA and Canada. In some association with the Hutterian Brethren is the Society of Brothers or Bruderhof, formed in Germany after the first world war.

Other religious movements inspired by Anabaptism but not organically related to it are several Brethren* bodies of 18th-century Pietist origin, of which the largest is the Church of the Brethren. Many Baptist historians have found the historical antecedents of their numerous denominations within Anabaptism, although other scholars firmly maintain that their original matrix within left-wing English Puritanism of the 17th century provides sufficient derivation. Also connected with Radical Puritanism was the Religious Society of Friends,* nicknamed Quakers, who have often felt kinship with Mennonite and Brethren groups, in particular because of their shared peace* testimony (see Friends/Quakers, historic peace churches).

Representatives of all the denominations mentioned above took part in a series of meetings, often called the “Prague Conferences” after the site of the first three (1986, 1987, 1989), hosted by the Comenius Theological Faculty. These meetings sought respectively to define concepts, to study eschatology* and social transformation, and to search for economic implications. A fourth conference was held in Geneva in 1994, with the participation of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches,* the Lutheran World Federation* and the Mennonite World Conference.* This meeting gave particular attention to the import and impact of the sermon on the mount for personal and social ethics.

The fifth conference in the Prague series was again held in Geneva in 1998. Marked by the expansion of dialogue participants to include church leaders from Asia and Africa, it took as its focus the classic theological doctrines of justification and sanctification. This had been suggested by the current discussions on these themes between Lutherans and Reformed, on the one hand, and Lutherans and Roman Catholics, on the other. The same focus was continued in the sixth conference, held in Strasbourg, France, in 2000, with the intent to take up neglected aspects, in particular how dissenting bodies approach justification and sanctification. This perspective was signalled by the title of the consultation, “New Life in Christ”. Although some voices were there raised asking whether the consultation series had run its course, those attending “Prague VI” agreed that further conferences should be held, with Prague again as the site.

DONALD F. DURNBAUGH

- J. Driver, Radical Faith: An Alternative History of the Christian Church, Scottdale PA, Herald, 1999
- D.F. Durnbaugh, The Believers Church: The History and Character of Radical Protestantism, 2nd ed., Scottdale PA, Herald, 1985
- W.R. Estep, The Anabaptist Story: An Introduction to Sixteenth-Century Anabaptism, 3rd ed., Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1996
- M. Opořenský ed., Towards Renewed Dialogue: The First and Second Reformations, Geneva, WARC, 1996
- M. Opořenský & P. Réamonn eds, Justification and Sanctification: In the Traditions of the Reformation, Geneva, WARC, 1999
- D.L. Slabaugh ed., “Special issue on Prague I and II”, Brethren Life and Thought 35, 1990
- G.H. Williams, The Radical Reformation, 3rd ed., Kirksville MO, Sixteenth Century Journal, 1992.

FISHER, GEOFFREY FRANCIS

B. 5 May 1887, Higham, UK; d. 15 Sept. 1972, Sherborne. Fisher became archbishop of Canterbury in 1945, and the next year he preached an influential Cambridge sermon on reunion. Chairman of the WCC at its inauguration at Amsterdam 1948, he was a president from 1948 to 1954. In later years he proposed that the Council should be transformed into an organization for interchurch aid, which then would present no difficulty for the Roman Catholic Church to join. He met Pope John XXIII in 1960, the first archbishop of Canterbury to go to the Vatican since 1397. In the same year he also met with the Orthodox patriarch of Jerusalem and the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople. He presided over the Lambeth conferences of 1948 and 1958, which owed their representative character to his careful preparation, especially in America, and to the establishment of new provinces among the newly independent nations. From 1946 onwards he devoted considerable time to the revision of the canon law,* though new canons were not authorized until 1969. He was headmaster of Rep-ton School, 1914-32.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ G.F. Fisher, The Archbishop Speaks, London, Evans, 1958 ■ Touching on Christian Truth, London, Mowbray, 1971 ■ W. Purcell, Fisher of Lambeth, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1969.

FLOROVSKY, GEORGES VASILIEVICH

B. 28 Aug. 1893, Odessa, Ukraine; d. 11 Sept. 1979, Princeton, NJ, USA. Florovsky

was a universally recognized Orthodox spokesman in the ecumenical movement and the forger of the theological basis for Orthodox participation in that movement. He attended the Faith and Order* conference at Edinburgh in 1937, was a member of the WCC central and executive committees, 1948-61, and in 1950 had a decisive influence on the Toronto statement* "The Church, the Churches and the World Council of Churches". He taught at several institutions in Europe and the US; as professor of philosophy of law at Prague, 1922-26; professor of patristics and later of systematic theology at the St Sergius Orthodox Institute in Paris, 1926-48; professor, and later dean, at St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary in New York, 1948-50; professor of theology of religions at Columbia University, New York, 1951-55; professor of history and dogma of the Orthodox Church at Holy Cross Greek Theological School in Brookline, MA, 1955-56; and from 1956 onwards professor of the history of Eastern Orthodoxy at Harvard Divinity School. He was vice-president of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the USA, 1954-57. Numerous monographs and articles are in the eight volumes so far published of his Collected Works (Belmont MA, Nordland, 1972-).

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ A. Blane & T.E. Bird eds, Russia and Orthodoxy: Essays in Honor of Georges Florovsky, 3 vols, The Hague, Mouton, 1974 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, "Father Georges Florovsky's Role in the Formation of the WCC", St Vladimir's Theological Quarterly, 1979.

FOCOLARE MOVEMENT

THE WORLDWIDE Roman Catholic association known as Focolare (Italian for "hearth" or "furnace") began in Trent, Italy, in 1943. During the most destructive phase of the second world war, Chiara Lubich (b. 1920) and a few other young Italian women were convinced that whether they would die or survive, they should daily act out Jesus' command to "love one another, just as I have loved you" (John 13:34) and his will "that they may all be one" (John 17:21) – the Magna Carta of the movement. After the war, the loose association gradually spread among youth, adult men and women (married and unmarried), clergy and religious (who remain members of their orders or institutes). Many lay members are celibates with private vows.

In the early 1960s, the members, called Focolarini(e), eagerly accepted the new RCC stance towards the ecumenical movement. "Through our love for Jesus, we are able to appreciate the treasures of various other Christians and their churches, grasp their individual qualities and, while remaining totally faithful to our own church, feel that we are brothers and sisters of all Christians through our common baptism and mutual love" (Lubich). The movement then spread among Lutherans, Anglicans, Reformed and other Christians. Non-Christians, such as Jews, Muslims and Buddhists, are also friend-associates.

The Focolare's "New Humanity" movement works at the local and international level for peace and solidarity in society, and is recognized as an NGO at the United Nations. Chiara Lubich is an honorary president of the World Conference on Religion and Peace.*

Over the years 19 little towns or citadels have been founded, together called a "permanent Mariapolis (City of Mary)": 8 in Europe, 4 in South America, 2 in North America, 3 in Africa, 1 in Asia and 1 in Australia. They offer an experience of living the Foco-lare gospel-centred spirituality in everyday life. People stay there for short or longer periods of time learning to build a society based on the law of mutual love. At present in 198 countries the Focolare "core" members are around 110,000.

TOM STRANSKY

■ J. Gallagher, A Woman's Work, London, Harper & Collins, 1997 ■ C. Lubich, Spiritual Writings, 1-2, New York, New City, 1989, 1991 ■ F. Zambonini, A Life for Unity, New York, New City, 1992.

FOOD CRISIS/HUNGER

THROUGHOUT history, churches and Christians have been concerned about hunger in seeking to respond to the words of Jesus: "For I was hungry and you gave me food" (Matt. 25:35). Early church leaders were outspoken on the issue; St Basil the Great said that a person who can prevent somebody from starving and does not do so can reasonably be condemned as a murderer. Over the years, churches and related organizations have channelled foodstuffs worth millions of dollars to places of famine. In addition, they have also engaged in analyses of the root causes of hunger and malnutrition. For example, the East Asia Christian Conference, meeting in Kuala Lumpur in 1959, saw the solution to the food crisis in connection with changing the pattern of land ownership. The issue of land reform can be found in almost any church statement related to food and hunger (see land).

Another recurring theme in such church statements is the concern about population growth. The WCC central committee meeting in 1967 said: "We recognize that even the most promising combination of measures for increased food production will only postpone catastrophe unless there is a vast increase in responsible family life and planning."

Although carefully phrased, the issue of responsible family life was picked up again during a meeting in Beirut in 1968 of the committee on Society, Development and Peace (SODEPAX*), which spoke of the need to develop "appropriate policies to slow down accelerated population increases". Influenced by the optimism prevailing then about the problem-solving potential of science and technology,* the Beirut meeting spoke about more fertilizers as a most promising key to higher farm yields, modern techniques and materials, soil and plant research, new strains of wheat, rice and other food crops, the benefits of modernization and the need for foreign financing and technology.

Fifteen years later, the sixth WCC assembly (Vancouver 1983) adopted a much more critical attitude regarding these factors, noting that the development of technologies of food production which require the use of chemical inputs has in certain instances hampered food production. Transnational corporations and large landowners, which control much of the productive land, were criticized because they prevent farmers, peasants and landless rural workers from participation in decision making.

Some uneasiness about new, sophisticated and capital-intensive technology was expressed at the WCC conference on "Science and Technology for Human Development", held in Bucharest in 1974. Referring to the negative balance of protein exchange between the satisfied and the hungry world, the conference spoke about a "protein empire" that has been built on prevailing trade patterns: "There is something radically wrong about economic systems that result in protein being exported from where it is most needed." The Bucharest meeting sharply criticized the stockpiling of bombs and missiles when not even a start was made to address the urgent need of stockpiling food. The conference concluded that nothing short of a world emergency food programme was urgently needed, thereby echoing similar recommendations made by the WCC conference on Church and Society in Geneva in 1966 and a SODEPAX meeting in Montreal in 1969.

In a message at the time of the 1974 synod of bishops, Pope Paul VI called on governments to change their attitude towards the victims of hunger, to respond to the imperatives of justice and reconciliation and speedily to find the means of feeding those who are without food. In his address to the world food conference in 1974, the pope placed the food crisis in the context of a general crisis of civilization and of solidarity. He argued that the reduction of food supplies was at least partially due to certain commercial decisions, and stressed that the world food crisis would not be solved without the participation of the agricultural workers, which in turn required a radical revision of the present underestimation of the importance of agriculture.

The world food summit in Rome in November 1996 adopted a declaration and plan of action aimed at "reducing the number of undernourished people to half the present level no later than 2015". The final statement of the summit committed the international community to strive for "food security" through "a fair and market-oriented world trade system". A WCC statement welcomed the reference to a "fair" market-oriented system and agreed that deregulation of markets could lead to higher food production. However, the WCC also pointed out the paradox "that hunger continues while more food than ever before in history is available". The WCC statement said that "because markets allocate on the basis of effective demand, the demand of the poor is not registered" and warned that "food security cannot be left to the market mechanism alone". In his address to the world food summit, Pope John Paul II called on world leaders to take radical measures to tackle world hunger - including cancelling the international debt of developing countries. Economic and food policies based not only on profit but also on sharing in solidarity should be implemented. Pointing to the fact that "the starving and the wealthy, the very poor and the very rich, those who lack the necessary means and others who lavishly waste them" are living side by side, the pope called for a change of attitude and habits with regard to life-styles.

Over the years, churches have come to realize that hunger and malnutrition are the result of a complex set of inter-related factors. The complexity of the issue increased with the Green Revolution which took place during the 1970s and 1980s. Recent developments in the field of gene technology and genetically modified food have sparked new debates in the churches (and beyond) about the ethical, social, economic and health implications of genetic engineering for food production.

■ Address of Pope Paul VI to the participants of the world food conference, 9 Nov. 1974 ■ Address of Pope John Paul II to the World Food Summit, 13 Nov. 1996 ■ D. de Gaspar et al., World Hunger: A Christian Reappraisal, WCC, 1982 ■ The Root Causes of Hunger and Food Insufficiency in Africa, CDAA, 1985 ■ "Statement on the International Food Disorder", in Gathered for Life, D. Gill ed., WCC, 1983 ■ Statement of the WCC to the World Food Summit, Nov. 1996.

FREIRE, PAULO REGLUS NEVES

B. 19 Sept. 1921, Recife, Brazil; d. 2 May 1997, Sao Paulo. Freire was a Brazilian educator widely known for his use of the term "conscientization" in education, a process by which "both teacher and pupils simultaneously become knowing subjects, brought together by the object they are knowing". He was special consultant to the WCC Subunit on Education and professor at the faculty of education of the university of Geneva, 1970-80. Exiled by the Brazilian government for his so-called communist-inspired theory, 1964-80, he was first consultant to the ministry of education in Chile and to the Institute of Investigation into Agrarian Reform in conjunction with UNESCO. He then became (1969-70) visiting professor at Harvard University and the Center for Studies in Development and Social Change. On his return to Brazil, he became professor at the Pontifical Catholic University in São Paulo, director of VEREDA (the Centre of Studies in Education), and secretary of education of the municipality of São Paulo. He wrote numerous books which have been translated into many languages.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ P. Freire, Cultural Action for Freedom, Cambridge MA, Center for the Study of Development and Social Change, 1970 ■ Pedagogy of the Oppressed, New York, Herder, 1970 ■ P. Freire & A. Faundez, Learning to Question: A Pedagogy of Liberation, WCC, 1989 ■ D. Collins, Paulo Freire: His Life, Works and Thought, New York, Paulist, 1977 ■ J. Elias, Conscientization and Deschooling: Freire's and Illich's Proposals for Reshaping Society, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1976 ■ A.M.A. Freire & D. Macedo eds, The Paulo Freire Reader, New York, Continuum, 1998.

FRIENDS/QUAKERS

THIS PROPHEMIC-mystical movement developed in England around George Fox (1624-91) and his teaching and preaching. His followers first called themselves "children of the light" or simply "friends" – based on Jesus' words to his disciples, "You are my friends if you do what I command you" (John 15:14) – and later corporately took the name of the "Religious Society of Friends". "Quakers" was an early derisive nickname, associated with the tremblings of the Friends at their meetings. No longer considered derisive, this title is now also used by Friends of themselves.

Fox was convinced that the church* had become apostate, and even reformation "in root and branch" could not re-capture the authentic Christian community of the 1st century. So beginning again on early apostolic beliefs, Fox erected a church. It would depend directly on the risen Lord, and its members would function equally without mediation or rite and clergy but with the biblical gifts of the Spirit and the "inward light of Christ" – men and women equally under the direct headship of Christ. Friends' meetings for worship or for business held the holy expectancy that Christ would be in the midst wherever "two or three are gathered" in his name (Matt. 18:20), inspiring them to speak, enabling life to be transformed and empowering ministries to the world with the same self-giving love that he bore on the cross.

In 1676, Robert Barclay published (in Latin) Apology for the True Christian Divinity, which has never been displaced as the standard systematic treatment of Quaker theology.

The Quakers' early resistance in England to civil laws of religion that included oaths and marks of civil deference and to military service made the Friends targets of legal and popular oppression and imprisonment; more than 400 died from the lack of sanitation. Many fled to the American colonies. The majority sought refuge in Pennsylvania under William Penn (1644-1718), himself a Quaker. Elsewhere several Friends were persecuted; four were hung for religious dissension in Boston, 1659-61.

Social action is characteristic of the Friends. They "have been more concerned with the here and now than with the hereafter. They have sought in many different ways to improve the societies in which they live – locally, nationally, and internationally." They look to the time when God's kingdom will come and his will be done; meanwhile, they are summoned "to exhibit to the world a kingdom mind-set, kingdom values and a kingdom life-style". They are to be "the authentic counter-culture of a better way, the only way that holds true hope and the promise of life for humankind". And they feel "the terrible pull of the unlimited liability for one another which the New Testament ethic lays upon them" (Douglas Steere).

Few Friends have dramatic stories of unusual witness. Most live humbly, barely noticed. Among outstanding role models are some who worked against slavery: John Woolman (1720-72), Anthony Benezet (1713-84), and in the later abolitionist phase Lucretia Mott (1793-1880). Mott was also active in women's suffrage, along with Susan B. Anthony (1820-1906). In prison reform Elizabeth Fry (1780-1845) still excels; and in the humane treatment of the mentally ill William Tuke (1732-1822), his wife and grandson initiated a number of reforms. In the 20th century Alice Paul was the author of the Equal Rights (for women) Amendment to the US constitution, which failed ratification by only one state.

Friends have worked consistently towards the elimination of war and its root causes in militarism, injustice and economic imperialism. Two Friends have received the Nobel peace prize: Emily Greene Balch, leader of the international women's movement for peace, in 1946, and Philip J. Noel-Baker, for his 53 years of participation in every international disarmament conference, in 1959; in addition, the Nobel peace prize in 1947 recognized the humanitarian and reconstruction efforts of the (British) Friends Service Council and the American Friends Service Committee.

For authenticity in all these areas, Friends test "leadings" or "concerns" in a process of group "discernment". One may be way ahead of his or her meeting; the reverse may be true; or there may be a number of correct solutions. Real transformation of society does not come from a programme or an ideology, but from exemplary discipleship. The light, grace, truth or spirit of Christ are the real inspiration and the agent of transformation, moulding groups and individuals. Quakers follow spiritual disciplines, especially in prayer; a number of their writings have become spiritual classics for Christians.

From the beginning women have had an equal role in all aspects of the Quaker movement. Fox used a whole panoply of biblical texts to support the thesis that "souls have no sex", and that men and women are meant to be "help-meets" (Gen. 2:18, King James) rather than antagonists. And Gal. 3:27-28 became the charter not only for equal treatment of women but for the open acceptance of other races and peoples.

Quakers of two varieties (there are four in all, now cooperating closely) were founding members of the WCC. They had accredited observers at Vatican II* (1962-65) and two delegates to the Faith and Order world conferences in 1963 and 1993. Quakers participate in the F&O commission of the National Council of the Churches of Christ, USA. Evangelical Friends are active in the World's Evangelical Alliance* and other evangelical groupings. Most other Quakers participate in local ministerial associations, or in state and national councils.

By May 1999 Quakers in 43 countries totalled 281,860: 92,672 in Kenya, 92,263 in the USA, 31,000 Aymara Indians in Bolivia, 17,189 in Britain, 4000 in Taiwan, 2500 Eskimos in Alaska, 46,500 in the rest of Latin America; there are very small numbers of Germans, Japanese, Koreans, Scandinavians, Dutch, Middle Easterners, Indians and French-speaking people.

By and large their impulse to serve still comes from first-hand contact with the resurrected Christ, who is with us "always, to the end of the age" (Matt. 28:20). The basic thrust of all Quaker structure and activities hinges on George Fox's central dictum, which states (without ruling out Christ's final coming in judgment) that "Christ has come" again – as he did again and again to the early church – "to teach his people himself".

See also historic peace churches.

DEAN FREIDAY

■ H.H. Brinton, Friends for 300 Years, New York, Harper, 1952 ■ E. Potts Brown & S. Mosher Stuard eds, Witnesses for Change: Quaker Women over Three Centuries, New Brunswick NJ, Rutgers UP, 1989 ■ D. Freiday, "The Early Quakers and the Doctrine of Authority", Quaker Religious Thought, 15, 1, 1973 ■ D. Freiday, "Quakers, Ecumenism and the WCC", ER, 46, 4, 1994 ■ M. Garman et al. Hidden in Plain Sight: Quaker Women's Writings, 1650-1700, Wallingford PA, Pendle Hill, 1996 ■ D.V. Steere ed., Quaker Spirituality: Selected Writings, New York, Paulist, 1984.

FRIENDS WORLD COMMITTEE FOR CONSULTATION

THE FWCC was formed by the world conference of Friends in 1927 with an American and a European section, joined in 1971 by an African section. In 1974 the section of the Americas included constituencies in North, Central and South America and in the Caribbean area. The autonomous Friends yearly meetings freely associate themselves with the FWCC. It fosters spiritual life through inter-visitation, study, conferences and a wide sharing of spiritual experiences, across all cultures, countries and languages. The FWCC also brings Quaker pacifist and philanthropic concerns to the world's attention. The United Nations recognizes the FWCC as a non-governmental organization with consultative status.

TOM STRANSKY

FRONTIER INTERNSHIP IN MISSION

FIM, FOUNDED in 1960, is an active partnership between regional councils and conferences of churches, the WCC and the World Student Christian Federation.* It has placed nearly 400 interns (aged 25 to 35) in projects involving justice and liberation-oriented ministry. Interns come from within the Christian community, although projects are often based within communities of other faiths. FIM's current areas of focus include systemic causes of economic injustice, the resurgence of religion and its relationship to global political conflicts and the encounter of cultures (interfaith, interethnic, interracial) in the struggle for peace with justice.

FIM has four principal aims: (1) to serve as a programme of ecumenical leadership formation; (2) to provide experiences in new forms of mission in focus areas, including theological, political, economic and socio-cultural issues; (3) to be a tool for community-initiated organizations to extend, augment and supplement their work through the presence of an intern from a similar group in another country; and (4) to be a catalyst for organizational networking, for the creation of new international alliances, and for engagement of interfaith partners in mission through the use of sending and receiving groups for interns. The intern works with a receiving group for two years and returns to his or her sending organization for a minimum one year re-entry period. This ensures a re-integration with the ecumenical movement in the intern's home country.

New styles of decision making, new forms of community organizing, and new methods of political and social analysis form the basis of theological reflection done by every intern. From its office in Geneva, FIM circulates these reflections.

JOHN BOONSTRA

■ K. Todd, Crossing Boundaries: Stories from the WCC FIM Programme, WCC, 1985.

FRY, FRANKLIN CLARK

B. 30 Aug. 1900, Bethlehem, PA, USA; d. 6 June 1968, Connecticut. Fry was vice-chairman of the WCC central and executive committees, 1948-54, and chairman of both, 1954-68. His services to the Lutheran World

Federation* were no less considerable: one of the founders of the Federation at Lund in 1947, he was treasurer, 1948-52, first vice-president, 1952-57, and president, 1957-63. Educated at Philadelphia Lutheran Seminary and ordained in 1925, he was secretary of the Commission on Evangelism of the United Lutheran Church, 1930-38, and a member of the Board of American Missions, 1934-42, being elected to the executive board in 1942. He went on to become president of the United Lutheran Church, 1944-62, and in 1962 head of the Lutheran Church in America. A leader in the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA since its foundation in 1950, he chaired its Policy and Strategy Commission in 1954, and directed Church World Service, 1946-50. In 1947 he was president of Lutheran World Relief, and first vice-chairman of American Relief for Korea, 1950-54.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ R. H. Fischer ed., "Franklin Clark Fry: A Palette for a Portrait", The Lutheran Quarterly, 1972, supplementary number.

FUNDAMENTALISTS

FOR A LONG time after the term came into general usage in the 1920s, most other Christians tended to regard those who call themselves fundamentalists – and their beliefs and practices – with indifference. This attitude has been changing in recent decades due to two phenomena: (1) the increasing number, especially of young adults, who have left mainline Protestant churches and the Catholic church to join fundamentalist churches and parachurch organizations; (2) the growing political clout of fundamentalists as they move from personal piety to social critique and political activism with voting power.

Most popular descriptions of Christian fundamentalists retain an accusatory edge – “sectarian”, “authoritarian”, “simplistic”, “closed-minded”, “gullible”. Offsetting these caricatures is a growing number of interdisciplinary descriptions and interpretations, including studies by fundamentalists themselves.

In portraying a complex Christian movement which appears in varied social-cultural settings, these studies seek (1) not to blur fundamentalism with all of the conservative movements within Christianity today, whether Pentecostal, evangelical Protestant, Roman Catholic or Eastern Orthodox; (2) not to reduce fundamentalism to a system of theological statements, which can then be juxtaposed to other Christian theologies for comparisons; (3) not to label all fundamentalists as persons of the same psychological type and cognitive mindset (a closed personality who lusts for certitude, ideological purity, and moral rigorism); and (4) not to treat fundamentalism as a religious, social and political movement that is organizationally self-contained.

In general, fundamentalism is only one expression among Christians to meet the needs for fundamental confidences in the face of modernity: the struggle to find a firm foundation in life; the longing to break through the bewildering variety of claims: religious, non-religious and anti-religious, moral, immoral and amoral; and to search for a buttress against social instabilities, marginalizations and dislocations. To this perceived disarray of modernity, fundamentalists believe God has provided the authoritative answer. With certitude in the use of chosen biblical words and doctrines, their leaders identify the actions of a strict God who is saving a religious elite from an evil world and from corrupt forms of Christian faith.

TACTICS AND MESSAGE

Fundamentalists seem to reduce the complexity of the world's experiences to a bipolar, even apocalyptic model: good/bad, true/false, kingdom of Light/kingdom of Darkness, God-and-we/Satan-and-others, Christ/antichrist, Christian/"secular humanist". In a world of such contrasts, they believe God calls them to be disciplined crusaders on a battlefield, who are carrying out God's clear purposes and undisputed will.

First, they focus on what is evil to characterize all of "modern times", which they compare with a reconstructed earlier Golden Age, emphasizing one or other of its traits which they regard as incarnating doctrinal and practical fundamentals for the present. They seek to re-capture and restore the designated glorious ages of their church or of their founders: the first generation of disciples of Jesus, or the 16th-century Reformation, or 19th-century Protestantism or pre-Vatican II Catholicism, or pre-communist regimes. They call for a return to "the old-time religion".

Second, fundamentalists claim authority over a sacred biblical and/or church tradition which they perceive all other Christians to be corroding. As "soldiers of truth" they equip themselves with an armoury of absolute proof-texts, arranged in a way that is most effective to sustain their courage in themselves and to defeat opponents.

Third, fundamentalists fight against general or specific enemies, within or outside churches: "modernists", "secular humanists", "Bible critics". They see all these agents – movements and forces, organizations and individuals – as conspiring both to destroy the community of faithful disciples of Christ and to bless that very social order which by divine imperative true Christians are called radically to change.

Fourth, fundamentalists thus keep at a distance Christians who even waver on certain fundamentals, in particular those who plead for at least an "agreement to disagree". Above all, they warn against those who falsely believe that the Holy Spirit is active in the ecumenical movement. Affiliation with, say, the World Council of Churches, is a biblically prohibited alliance with apostates and unbelievers.

HISTORY

Major Christian traditions and teachers (e.g. Melancthon, Calvin, Wesley) have held that certain articles of faith are fundamentals, while others are non-essential, i.e. open to free debate. In the late 1800s and early 1900s the churches in the West encountered re-interpretations of the Christian faith in terms of contemporary historical, scientific, psychological and philosophical positions, associated with Kant (knowledge of moral norms as independent of religious beliefs), Darwin (biological evolution in creation and the human), Marx (capitalism as evil and religion as an "opium") and Freud (the human animal as basically sexually driven). This range of views came to be regarded under the general pejorative term of "modernism". Pope Pius X judged it to be "the synthesis of all heresies" (Pascendi, 1907).

In order to rectify theological deviations and preserve true Christians from the acids of modernism, North American and British evangelical Protestants widely circulated a series of 12 booklets called The Fundamentals: A Testimony of Truth (1910-15). The series identified five pivotal "fundamentals of faith and of evangelical Christianity" and pressed the question, "Do you believe these or not?" More than 3 million copies were freely distributed; and the yes's and no's led to divisions and schism among Protestant churches.

The series became a symbolic reference point and label for sub-groups among Evangelicals.* Gradually "fundamentalists" (the term was coined in 1920) created narrower definitions of what the five fundamentals mean, and these detailed explanations then became the test of who is a "Bible-believing" Christian. To deny a strict interpretation of all or any of these fundamentals was to betray God. This eventually caused a rift between the less militant, more open "conservative evangelicals" and the fundamentalists, who in turn became even more belligerent and separatist than their predecessors.

THE FUNDAMENTALS

1. The inerrancy of scripture. The originally recorded words of the Bible are "verbally inspired" or "God-breathed". Whatever scripture says on any subject, including historical and scientific affirmations and – especially – prophetic discourse, even by way of passing comment, is the clear will and mind of God. The Bible reveals an ever-consistent theology. The flawless texts in no way can be relativized in terms of the understanding of those who wrote or who hear them in varying cultural and historical contexts. A loving God does not and indeed cannot disclose the divine mind and will in order to confuse. Any human being acting in good faith and with common sense can immediately grasp the biblical word. Thus anyone who reads the same text as the fundamentalist and arrives at a different understanding must be operating in bad faith, or with no faith; and that characterizes accommodation to modernity.

2. The deity of Jesus. Jesus was not just a perfectly God-conscious, God-guided teacher and example, but the Son of the Triune God, born as a man of a virgin, who worked miracles in the name of the Father and in the power of the Holy Spirit.

3. Jesus Christ the Saviour. By his death Jesus took on all the sins of all men and women of all times. Christ's blood shed on Calvary is always sufficient to cleanse every sin from every person. Each remains in a state of sin and damnation until he or she personally commits oneself to Jesus Christ as the Lord and the Saviour, and to moral discipleship.

4. The bodily resurrection of Jesus Christ. The same body born in Bethlehem, suffered, died and was raised from the dead in Jerusalem. And because Christ rose in his body, one day we too will be raised from the dead in our earthly bodies.

5. The second coming of Jesus Christ. The only hope for God's human family and for God's wounded creation is that Jesus is coming again, to set up his kingdom, reward the faithful, and condemn his enemies to hell (some lists have hell as a sixth fundamental).

The "canon within the canon" of scriptures is prophecy, understood as revealed predictions of future historical events. The Bible is a divine jigsaw puzzle which portrays the entire sweep of history. The fundamentalist interpreter fits the biblical pieces of prophecy together in a way that makes clear the movements of history, by discerning in some detail where to map present events on the divine calendar of the whole. An extraorinary complex of events is foreseen as terminating an era and inaugurating a new one.

A host of fundamentalist evangelists have presented a world-historical vision of apocalyptic premillennialism (see millennialism). Since not all the prophecies in the Old and New Testaments have been fulfilled either in the first coming of Christ or in the history of the church, there must be a future millennium ("the thousand years"), a final epoch on earth, during which God's faithfulness requires that the remaining prophecies find their fulfilment. The end is imminent, and the Christ and the antichrist* are the key actors. The primary working images are those of battles and wars, with heavy eternal stakes in the outcome. It is a complicated scenario and fundamentalist interpreters offer many different and controverted sub-plots.

Above all Christian fundamentalist premillennialists locate "divine signs" in the rise of political Zionism and the founding of the state of Israel. Israel is "God's time clock which begins the countdown". Israel awaits the forces of the antichrist in his final rebellion, then the Armageddon of bloody destruction, before Israel achieves political, social and religious fulfilment in a restored and perfected Jewish nation, peacefully ruled by Jesus Christ, who will have returned to occupy the Davidic throne in Jerusalem – the priest and the king of believing Jews and Gentiles. Thus, today's Middle East is seen through apocalyptic scenarios. Israel represents holy fighting against Satan. Palestinians and other Arabs are mere pawns in the drama. In the 1990s, the identity of the invading enemy of God or "the Gog of Magog" (Ezek. 38) has shifted from the north, the former communist Soviet Union, to the south – the Middle East of Islam (in fact, restoring the 19th-century conviction that the "Muslim menace" in the Ottoman empire and in Africa was the antichrist).

To differing degrees, Protestant fundamentalist streams have been severe in their judgments on Roman Catholicism. The Fundamentals set out to prove that "the papal church" is "a satanic delusion" whose clergy preach and practise "another gospel" (Gal. 1:9). Catholics are objects of mission. The "Babylon" of Rev. 18 ("Come out of her, my people", v.4) is identified with the Roman Catholic Church. Yet today some fundamentalist groups will acknowledge in Catholics some biblical truth and authentic Christian commitment. They may even support Catholic leaders, including Pope John Paul II, whom they see as a courageous defender of biblical faith on such issues as right to life against abortion, the indissolubility of Christian marriage and the condemnation of premarital sex and active homosexuality. On such issues many fundamentalists are prepared to enter into public coalitions with like-minded Roman Catholics (and Protestants), and to allow them affiliation with their organizations.

ROMAN CATHOLIC FUNDAMENTALISTS

Fundamentalist strains can be detected among some conservative groups in the post-Second Vatican Council Roman Catholic Church. Just as Protestant fundamentalists are sub-groups within conservative evangelical Protestantism, so Catholic fundamentalists are sub-groups within conservative Catholicism. For them, Vatican II* broke down Catholic identity by causing the sudden death of an unambiguous historical continuity and the clear symbols which expressed and sustained it. Thus Catholic fundamentalists react through policies and strategies of restoration.

The principle of literal interpretation which Protestant fundamentalists apply to a set of biblical texts is used by Catholic fundamentalists to interpret Catholic traditions, seen as pure and intact until Vatican II; for example, selected citations from all general councils and popes, except Vatican II and Popes John XXIII, Paul VI and John Paul II. These Catholic fundamentalists look with particular suspicion and dismay at the shifts in official Catholic teachings on religious freedom, on relations with other Christians and churches, and with Jews, Muslims and adherents of other world faiths.

These Catholics are convinced that, though small in numbers, they alone are saving both the One True Church and the world in fidelity to the Spirit-protected tradition, as they interpret it. Thus it is their right and indeed duty to denounce the infidelity of other laity or clergy, the general hierarchy and recent popes.

The most visible and widely known expression of Catholic fundamentalism is the Society of St Pius X, founded by the late Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre in Switzerland (1970). In Lefebvre's judgment Vatican II was "the greatest disaster not only of the 20th century but of any century since the foundation of the church", and the church of Vatican II is declared heretical because it has corrupted the unchangeable tradition firmly set by the definitions and canons of the councils of Trent* and Vatican I,* and by the statements of anti-modernist popes such as Pius IX (1846-78) and Pius X (1903-14).

EASTERN ORTHODOX

Orthodox fundamentalists, especially in Eastern Europe, combine an extreme neo-nationalism and a cultural suspicion of all things "Western" to fuel the longing to restore pre-communist church life, the Golden Age stripped of its terrors.

Absent in that period was the 20th-century ecumenical movement and its institutions, now perceived to be a seductive Western creation. By citing ancient canons or statements of the 18th and 19th centuries and bypassing more recent ones, Orthodox fundamentalists only judge the ecumenical movement to be a modern "ecclesiastical heresy", and its Orthodox proponents, especially hierarchs, to be betrayers and deceivers of the true faith and the true church.

Similar to Archbishop Lefebvre's Roman Catholic traditionalists are the (non-canonical) Old Calendarists, who regard only themselves as the "true" Orthodox. When "civilization is waning, and the spirit of antichrist is a looming threat", ecumenism is that "seeking for the Truth outside the Truth"; it is "the domain of the wicked, the playground of demons" (Archbishop Chrysostomos of Etna, 1999).

TOM STRANSKY

- K. Armstrong, The Battle for God, New York, Knopf, 2000
- Christian Fundamentalism Today, 1993 consultation sponsored by the LWF, the PCPCU and the WARC, Geneva, WARC, 1994
- N. Cohen ed., The Fundamentalist Phenomenon, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1990
- M.E. Marty & R.S. Appleby eds, Accounting for Fundamentalism: The Dynamic Character of Movements, Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1994
- M. Marty and S. Appleby eds, Fundamentalisms Observed, Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1991
- T. Meyer, Fundamentalismus. Aufstand gegen die Moderne, Hamburg, Rowohlt, 1991.

G

GARRETT, JOHN

B. 15 July 1920, Sydney, Australia. From four years as general secretary of the Australian Council of Churches, Garrett moved to Geneva to become director of communication (then information) at the WCC, 1954-60. As a Congregational minister ordained in 1946, he was a delegate of the Congregational Union of Australia and New Zealand to Amsterdam 1948. Following his period in Geneva, he was a church history teacher and college principal in Sydney, 1960-66. He was a member of the joint commission on church union which prepared the union of Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian churches as the Uniting Church in Australia. From 1968 to 1974 he was on the faculty of the Pacific Theological College, Suva, Fiji.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ J. Garrett, To Live among the Stars: Christian Origins in Oceania, Suva, Institute of Pacific Studies, 1982 ■ Where Nets Were Cast: Christianity in Oceania since World War II, Suva, Institute of Pacific Studies, 1998.

GATU, JOHN

B. 3 March 1925, Kiambu, Kenya. A member of the Presbyterian Church of East Africa, Gatu was a sergeant in the colonial army before he was ordained and later served as the general secretary and moderator of his church. He also served as chairperson of the National Council of Churches in Kenya, and in various capacities with the All Africa Conference of Churches. Gatu is most remembered for his call in 1971 for a moratorium* at a Mission Festival in Milwaukee, USA. Moratorium* was a plea for complete halt in the sending of missionaries and funds from European and North American churches to the churches of Africa, in order to enable the latter to develop their own identity and to define their mission for their time and place. Moratorium, as expounded by Gatu, was a challenge to the assumption that without the large-scale presence of Western missionaries, Christianity could not survive in Africa. Gatu also claimed the influence of Daniel Berrigan, who thought along the same lines in respect to Latin America. Gatu served as a member of the WCC's Faith and Order commission (1961-75) and on its executive and central committees. He attended the Montreal Faith and Order meeting (1963), the world mission conference in Bangkok (1973), and the WCC's fifth assembly in Nairobi (1975). He was educated at St Paul's United Theological College, Limuru (1951-55), New College, Edinburgh (1958), Pittsburgh Theological College (1963) and Princeton Theological Seminary (1970-71).

JOHN S. POBEE

GERMANOS (Strenopoulos)

B. 15 Sept. 1872, Silivria, Greece; d. 24 Jan. 1951, London, England. Germanos was a president of the WCC, 1948-51. He met John R. Mott and Nathan Söderblom at a conference of the World Student Christian Federation* in Constantinople in 1911 and thereafter became actively engaged in the ecumenical movement. He was influential in the publication of the "Encyclical unto all the Churches of Christ", issued by the patriarchate of Constantinople in 1920. Vice-president of the first world conference on Faith and Order* (Lausanne 1927), he stressed that, from the point of view of Orthodox theology, "unity in faith constitutes a primary condition of reunion of the churches". He was also vice-president of the second world conference on F&O (Edinburgh 1937) and a member of the provisional committee of the WCC and much involved in its final creation. Educated in Constantinople, Halle, Leipzig, Strasbourg and Lausanne, Germanos was professor of dogmatics and symbolism at Halki, 1908, then dean of the same theological school. In 1922 he was appointed archbishop of Thyateira, with seat in London, and exarch for West and Central Europe in 1922. He contributed to The Reunion of Christendom (London, Cassell, 1929).

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ Germanos, Kyrillos Loukaris, 1572-1638: A Struggle for Preponderance between Catholic and Protestant Powers in the Orthodox East, London, SPCK, 1951.

GLOBALIZATION, ECONOMIC

THE POLITICAL, economic, technological and social forces that seem to bind the world's nations into an increasingly interdependent whole are referred to as "globalization". Although these processes had been emerging for years, it was during the decade of the 1990s that globalization became the dominant feature of world order as the demise of communism, together with rapid innovations in telecommunications and electronically stored information, facilitated the global expansion of capitalism* as the definitive world economic system.

Names such as "global village" and "spaceship earth" have been used to describe these processes, but others like "information society", "global shopping mall" and "global factory" more accurately typify the meaning of globalization. The principal forces driving globalization are: innovations in telecommunications, electronically stored information, and transportation; transnational finance, commerce and investment; and component production centres transcending national boundaries. These forces are so closely identified with transnational corporations* (TNC) that globalization often appears to be the name for the activities of these companies.

The expansiveness of these driving forces is made possible by international agreements establishing “free” or laissez-faire trade. This concept understands tariffs and other regulations, including those for protecting health or the environment and for ensuring social justice, or subsidies to protect national industries, as barriers to trade. Proponents assert that economic conditions will be improved in both wealthy and poor nations if international commerce is not regulated because this creates favourable conditions for foreign investment, trade and worldwide economic growth.

This global free trade system is governed by the World Trade Organization (WTO) in Geneva. Composed of over 140 member nations, the WTO has legal jurisdiction to enforce trading agreements and to impose sanctions on nations that violate them. In cases of violation, the WTO orders the offending country to remove or weaken the barrier. The WTO deliberates in secret and the reasons for its decisions are not made public. Non-governmental and non-commercial organizations are specifically excluded, and only member nations directly involved can appeal a WTO decision.

These internal processes assure that only the official viewpoint of governments – and the transnational economic interests they often represent – are considered. Rarely are WTO decisions favourable to poor countries when their policies conflict with TNCs and first-world economic interests. Likewise, environmental and health regulations, as well as linking social justice to trade policy, consistently have been ruled as undue interference with free trade, thus mandating their removal or reduction to the lowest common denominator.

Globalization has generated significant increases in the volume of world trade and has rapidly accelerated capital accumulation, yet it has also deeply widened the gap between the rich and poor nations and the gap between rich and poor within nations. One practical result has been the creation of a global division of labour in which poor economies: provide cheap labour for TNCs while offering their territory as tax-free production sites and as exotic tourist destinations; sell raw materials and nationally owned industries at bargain prices; and provide markets for technology and licenses for its use as well as consumer products and fast food options. Net economic benefits accrue to the wealthy, “owner” economies. This, in turn, has tended to create a three level social order: those integrated into the global economy as well-paid executives, consultants and highly skilled workers; minimally remunerated employees of globalized factories and commercial firms; and chronically unemployed or under-employed workers (see unemployment).

Internal, structural adjustments are often required of poor nations for their integration into the global economy, or to qualify for debt relief and financial assistance as well as to create internal conditions favourable to foreign investment. Nations refusing to make such adjustments risk isolation from the world economic community. These structural adjustments have privatized government industries and services; increased taxation; weakened the negotiating power of labour unions; cut wages; increased prices of basic goods; left sectors of the public behind, bypassed by the new economy; forced unemployment; and caused retrenchments in health, education and welfare services. Such measures have contributed to capital accumulation among the wealthy and established select countries as “credit-worthy” but have adversely affected the standard of living of other social sectors, especially the middle classes.

Women particularly have been affected, not only because the structural adjustments often adversely impact traditional women’s concerns such as the home and family health but also because of the global system itself. For example, the “global factory” – especially those that assemble products such as computer parts, toys or clothing – incorporates large numbers of young women as low-wage, unorganized labour. Among other social consequences, young women are attracted from their rural homes to the cities. However, many hopeful women are forced into menial employment or exploitative jobs in “unofficial” industries, e.g. prostitution.

Another consequence of globalization is urban growth. Jobs attracting rural migrants to cities are but one reason for this. The global factory and shopping mall benefit from large concentrations of consumers, many suppliers, providers of services, financial institutions, port and transportation facilities, and quick access to specialized information and telecommunications technology, among other needs.

Advocates of globalization argue that economic growth is stimulated mainly through exports. This theory de-emphasizes the national market and urges countries to orient economic production towards exports. In turn, countries are encouraged to rely on imports, even for basic foods.

This export-import dynamic is believed to improve economic efficiency, drive down prices, and provide basic needs. However, only a few national industries can survive in the worldwide market. Transnational corporations buy many and others go out of business, thus undermining the internal, self-replicating foundation of the national economy. The provision of basic needs becomes dependent on external economies. Finally, success in the global economy depends on a country’s ability to occupy sophisticated, high-value industrial niches. However, this presupposes an educational and technological infrastructure as well as financial and natural resources that most poor nations do not have, and strategic geographic locations that permit ready access to major markets.

Globalization is an uneven process with some countries benefiting far more than others. The poorest nations are simply left out, the middle poor become suppliers and buyers, while the wealthy nations capture the greater part of the profits and control the process.

The idea fostered in the West that everyone has access to the fruits of globalization is scarcely reality. These benefits are limited to relatively small sectors of the world’s population. Even the image of the global factory as de-territorialized is deceiving; there is nothing de-territorialized about their first-world corporate headquarters and profit repatriation.

Because of the changes that are occurring, the eighth assembly of the WCC in Harare (1998) called globalization a “pastoral, ethical, theological and spiritual challenge to the churches”. Indeed, globalization has generated much ethical debate.

Those affirming globalization emphasize the ethical importance of a world bound together by trade and communication. In their view, this promotes dialogue and world peace. These voices also argue that the TNCs and the free market are forces for technological innovation and for the rapid and expansive production of needed goods and services. Some argue that globalizing forces can be understood as instruments of “co-creation” as God uses them to re-shape world order. Thus, through the opportunities afforded them by free trade, the TNCs are viewed as establishing “covenant relationships” with “stakeholders” across the globe. Although recognizing that TNCs can abuse the free market and their economic power, this viewpoint sees globalization as a positive development.

Many others, including the WCC, take strongly critical positions. Since its inception in 1948, the WCC has criticized laissez-faire capitalism and the economic and social injustices of the international order. The critique of globalization is not of international trade itself, but rather the terms and conditions of world trade, its administration by the WTO, and its effects on people, especially the weakest social sectors, and the environment. This viewpoint indicates especially the enormous power of the TNCs, the brutal competitiveness of the world economy, and the quest for economic growth without concern for equity or the welfare of the environment. As one ecumenical study concludes, “economic globalization is about the increasing concentration of economic power, coupled with increasing dependency of the poor on the decisions of the powerful” (Dickinson, p.5).

The Harare assembly referred to these aspects of globalization as a “new form of domination”, whose driving forces are economic powers “as insidious as political colonizers”, having “caused and fuelled fragmentation of the social fabric of societies”. It pointed especially to the unequal distribution of power and wealth, and to “poverty and exclusion” and the worsening situation of the poor – manifested in massive immigration to the economically stronger North – as evidence that globalization hardly signifies a unified, world community. In addition, it criticized global telecommunications for fostering a “consumerist monoculture”. Finally, the assembly noted that the “global economic system is blind to its destructive social and ecological consequences”. According to the assembly, these factors oppose the “vision of oikoumene, the unity of humankind and the whole inhabited earth” that “motivates and energizes the ecumenical movement”.

Finally, ecumenical thought on globalization is mindful that “the churches and the ecumenical movement uphold the affirmations of God’s grace to all human beings and all creation as imperative to life-centred ethics” (Mshana, pp.3-4).

Throughout the world, many groups, both secular and religious, have organized campaigns against globalization and orchestrated protests at gatherings of international leaders.

See also development, economics.

ROY H. MAY, Jr

- H.E. Daly & J.B. Cobb, For the Common Good: Redirecting the Economy toward Community, the Environment, and a Sustainable Future, 2nd ed., Boston, Beacon, 1994 ■ R. Dickinson, Economic Globalization: Deepening Challenge for Christians, WCC, 1998 ■ D.R. Finn, Just Trading: On the Ethics of International Trade, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1996 ■ O. Ianni, Teorías de globalización, Mexico, Siglo Veintiuno, 1996 ■ Diane Kessler ed., Together on the Way, WCC, 1999 ■ J.H. Mittleman ed., Globalization: Critical Reflections, Boulder CO, Lynne Rienner, 1996 ■ R. Mshana, Lead Us Not Into Temptation: Churches’ Response to the Policies of International Financial Institutions, A Background Document, WCC, 2001 ■ J. de Santa Ana ed., Sustainability and Globalization, WCC, 1998 ■ S. Sassen, Globalization and Its Discontents, New York, New Press, 1998 ■ M.L. Stackhouse, D.P. Dennis P. McCann, S.J. Roels & P.N. Williams eds, On Moral Business: Classical and Contemporary Resources for Ethics in Economic Life, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1995 ■ L. Wallach & M. Sforza, The WTO: Five Years of Reasons to Resist Corporate Globalization, New York, Seven Stories, 1999.

GOD

“WHATEVER your heart clings to and trusts in, that is really your god,” said Luther in his exposition of the first commandment in the large catechism. Unfortunately, the human heart and mind is, as Calvin recognized, a “perpetual factory of idols” (Institutes 1.11.8). Phenomenologically speaking, there are therefore “many gods and many lords” (1 Cor. 8:5). But for Christians, the apostle Paul continues, “there is one God, the Father... and one Lord, Jesus Christ” (v.6). To come to the Christian faith is to turn “from idols, to serve a living and true God, and to wait for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead – Jesus, who rescues us from the wrath that is coming” (1 Thess. 1:9-10). Or in Johannine terms: “And this is eternal life, that they may know you, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom you have sent” (John 17:3).

The Christian doctrine of God is Trinitarian (see Trinity). “When I say God”, declared Gregory Nazianzus (d.389), “I mean Father, Son and Holy Spirit” (Oration 38.8; 45.4). Jesus Christ,* the Son, is “God from God,... eternally begotten of the Father”, while the Holy Spirit* “proceeds from the Father” and “with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified” (see Nicene Creed). This Trinitarian pattern is profoundly stamped on all Eastern Orthodox liturgy and theology. The classic Western churches are also Trinitarian in creed; but in their theological reflection they have tended, at least from Augustine (d.430) onwards, to start with the “one simple substance of God” in such a way as to make distinctions among the three persons difficult. From Aquinas (d.1274) onwards, it was for centuries customary for Western dogmatians to treat “the one God” (de Deo uno) before treating “the Triune God” (de Deo trino). Modern Protestantism has stood under the aegis of Friedrich Schleiermacher, who devoted only the last ten pages of his “doctrine of the faith” (Der christliche Glaube, 2nd ed., 1830), and then with “unitarian” sympathies, to the doctrine of the Trinity.

The Western situation changed in the 20th century with Karl Barth’s Church Dogmatics (1932-67), which begins its doctrine of revelation* in a Trinitarian way that is then maintained throughout the work. And on the Roman Catholic side, Karl Rahner's lengthy article on the Trinity in the encyclopedic Mysterium Salutis (Johannes Feiner and Magnus Löhrer eds, 1965-76) has been very influential, especially in its celebrated axiom that "the 'economic' Trinity is the 'immanent' Trinity and vice versa" (vol. 2, 1967, 317-401, in particular 328): God is in very being ("immanent Trinity") as God is self-revealed ("economic Trinity"), namely, Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

The ecumenical movement played a vital role in this "rediscovery" of the Trinity. In particular, the Orthodox churches contributed strongly: liturgically, they insisted on the invocation of the Holy Spirit to energize and complete the sacramental action (epiclesis); dogmatically, they brought to the fore the long controversial question of the procession of the Holy Spirit within the Godhead (see filioque); and in both cases, the pneumatology was part of a full-orbed Trinitarianism. Ecclesiological and missiologically, the Trinitarianly conceived and structured writings of Lesslie Newbigin proved seminal, namely The Household of God (1953) and Trinitarian Faith and Today's Mission (1964). Highly significant was the insertion into the membership basis of the WCC, in 1961, of the phrase "to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit" (see WCC, basis of). The work in Faith and Order that led to the Lima text of 1982 emphasized the Trinitarian pattern of baptism and the Lord's supper (see Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry); and the "apostolic faith study" followed the Trinitarian outline of the Nicene Creed.

In recent years there has been a flurry of books on the doctrine of the Trinity, with varied approaches and different emphases, from across the entire ecumenical board, including Jürgen Moltmann (Reformed), Trinität und Reich Gottes (1980, ET The Trinity and the Kingdom of God, 1981); Robert Jenson (Lutheran), The Triune Identity (1982); Walter Kasper (Roman Catholic), Der Gott Jesu Christi (1982); John Zizioulas (Orthodox), Being as Communion (1985); Boris Bobrinskoy (Orthodox), Le mystère de la Trinité (1986, ET The Mystery of the Trinity, 1999); Bruno Forte (Roman Catholic), Trinità come storia (1985, ET The Trinity as History 1989);

Catherine LaCugna (Roman Catholic), God for Us: The Trinity and Christian Life (1991); and Thomas Torrance (Reformed), The Christian Doctrine of God, One Being, Three Persons (1996). The dominant insight has been that God is in very nature the loving communion of three persons. Such Trinitarianism, in its "positive" or "kataphatic" statements, does not impugn but rather recognizes the insights of "negative" or "apophatic" theology concerning the inexhaustibility of God, which must always transcend the knowledge even of redeemed, sanctified and perfected creatures.

The Christian doctrine of God has to be situated in reference to three developments or ranges of thinking in particular: the revelation embodied in Jesus Christ and the reflection of faith* upon that; philosophical theism and atheism;* and other religions, particularly those which profess faith in "one God".

REVELATION AND REFLECTION

In the course of its history, Israel came to recognize the absolute uniqueness of the one who bore the revealed name of  $\text{YHWH}$ , the Lord, the Redeemer of the people and the Creator of all that is: "There is no other god besides me, a righteous God and a Saviour; there is no one besides me. Turn to me and be saved, all the ends of the earth! For I am God, and there is no other" (Isa. 45:21-22).

Jesus affirmed the "Shema Israel" (Deut. 6:4-5) as the first and great commandment and the way to eternal life: "Hear, O Israel: the Lord is our God, the Lord alone. You shall love the Lord your God with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with all your might" (cf. Matt. 22:37; Mark 12:29-30; Luke 10:27). Jesus also regularly addressed this God by the intimate term of "Abba, Father" and himself appears correspondingly as "the Son" (Mark 1:11 and par.; Matt. 11:25-27; John 1:18, 3:16, 14:9; Rom. 8:32; Col. 1:13). The Father and the Son are "one" (John 10:30, 17:11); while remaining distinct, they dwell "in" each other (John 17:21). Jesus Christ is given the name of Lord (Phil. 2:9-10, echoing Isa. 45:23), though only and always "to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:11), who "gives life to the dead and calls into existence the things that do not exist" (Rom. 4:17; cf. vv.24-25).

The New Testament also links the Spirit – “who comes from the Father” (John 15:26) – with the Son. The Spirit “remains” on the Son (John 1:32-34); and at the prayer of the exalted Christ (John 14:16,26, 15:26; Acts 2:33), the Father sends the Holy Spirit into the world, “the other Paraclete” (John 14:16), the Spirit who “gives life” (John 6:63; Rom. 8:11; 2 Cor. 3:6) and guides into all the truth (John 16:13). The triad of Father, Son and Holy Spirit figures together, sometimes explicitly as a threefold name, in many layers of the NT writings, with Matt. 28:19, 1 Cor. 12:4-6, 2 Cor. 13:14, and Eph. 2:18-22 and 4:4-6 among the more notable passages not already cited.

It took at least four centuries for the church,* particularly in the intellectual and religious context of the Graeco-Roman world, to work out the implications of the Christ-event for belief in “the one God”. Against Marcion and the Gnostics it needed to be shown that the Creator and the Redeemer were the same God. Against temptations to a polytheism that would have jeopardized human salvation* by reducing Christ to a demi-god, it needed to be shown that the agent of revelation and redemption was not a “second god” (deuteros theos) or a “god by courtesy” (katachrēstikōs) but himself “consubstantial with the Father” (homoousios tō patri). Against accusations of tritheism, it needed to be shown that there are “not three gods” (the title of Gregory of Nyssa’s refutation of the charge). The decisive dogmatic decisions were taken by the ecumenical councils* of Nicea* 325 and Constantinople* 381.

Among the questions that have remained open for recurrent theological discussion within the church are the implications for God’s life and being of the liturgical confession that “one of the Trinity suffered” (recent examples are J.A. Baker’s The Foolishness of God, 1970, and Jürgen Moltmann’s Der gekreuzigte Gott, 1972, ET The Crucified God, 1974), and the precise ways in which the Trinitarian “relations” (scheseis) of Father, Son and Holy Spirit are to be described (for a recent discussion see T.F. Torrance’s The Trinitarian Faith, 1988). Yet since the 4th century councils it has been the almost unanimous practice among those claiming to be Christians to profess belief in the one God and to confess the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit. Such Trinitarian faith is required of churches for membership in the WCC (see WCC, basis of).

PHILOSOPHICAL THEISM AND ATHEISM

Since its beginnings in ancient Greece, Western philosophy has included a strand of thinking that arrives at “God” (the word is often used as a proper noun) by two main routes: from the contingency of the world (it need not be or have been) is drawn the conclusion of a necessary being, a first cause beyond the internal series of causes; and for the multiplicity of things, a single coherent ground is sought in the One. Despite counter-arguments that are often claimed or considered to be conclusive, “theism” keeps recurring in variant forms throughout the history of Western thought. It hovers around the contemporary search for “meaning” and “purpose”. Though preferring to speak of “panentheism”, Whiteheadian process theology is a close cousin to “classical theism”, as John Macquarrie’s preferred term of “dialectical theism” also indicates.

While great difficulties attend the notion of a “proof” of “God”, some modern Christian theologians (e.g. Walter Kasper, Macquarrie, Wolfhart Pannenberg) judge the metaphysical quest worth pursuing, even though none would claim that unaided reason could reach the personal knowledge of God granted by the self-revelation of God in Christ. Most would claim that at best the theistic arguments may serve, after the event, to show that belief in the self-revealed God is not irrational, or that the self-revealed God has in fact “answered” the “questions” which serious efforts to reach truth address.

Some Christian theologians, however, are suspicious of the whole theistic route, whether taken a priori or a posteriori. Thus Eberhard Jüngel argues that theism always makes God “necessary”, to ground the world or human self-consciousness (Descartes is a chief culprit). Atheism can then appear as the proper rejection of a “God” in which Christians do not really believe either. Jüngel finds in the God of Christian faith an utterly gracious one who is “more than necessary”. Christian faith begins, and must never deviate, from the cross of Christ and the concomitant confession that “God is love” (1 John 4:8). Moltmann dislikes the term “monotheism” on the grounds that, in the history of Christian thought and society, belief in Eis Theos (in the eponymous title of Erik Peterson’s book of 1926) has too easily gone hand in hand with political oppression and totalitarianism (“monarchism”), whereas a truly Trinitarian doctrine (some would find Moltmann himself to verge on tritheism) is more favourable to a complex and differentiated pattern of human community. None of this, of course, touches the problem of unbelief, whether militant or indifferentist, in face of a Christian message adequately presented.

OTHER RELIGIONS

Throughout Christian history there has been a marked tension in attitudes towards the religions of the world. On the one hand, all worship outside of the church may be considered idolatry, directed towards “false gods”. On the other hand, elements of truth may be detected in other religions that make them a “preparation for the gospel” (preparatio evangelica).

More along the latter line, monotheism has often been seen as a common factor, especially shared with Jews and Muslims, in so far as they, like Christians, claim a descent from Abraham and intend to worship “the God of Abraham”. However, the matter is complex and disputed. For their part, sympathetic Jews have regarded Christians as monotheists, minimizing the significance of the Christian worship of the “mere man” Jesus, which is more strictly idolatry; only rarely have Muslims exempted Christians from the charge of polytheism on account of their belief in “the Father and the Son”. (The Qur’an, 112:1-4, is seen as excluding the Trinity and incarnation; cf. 4:171, 5:72-73.) From the Christian angle again, what constitutes the “children of Abraham” is a matter of contention (see Matt. 3:9; Luke 3:8; John 8:33-59; Acts 7:1-60, 13:26-52; Rom. 4:1-25, 9:6-13; 2 Cor. 11:22; Gal. 3:6-18, 4:21-31); in the Christian era it must seem that Jews and Muslims have either refused or altered the revelation of God in Jesus Christ.

Interfaith dialogues are exploring these issues (see dialogue, interfaith). It is unlikely that Jews or Muslims can accept the kind of “ranking”, however well intentioned, implied in the model of concentric circles found in the Second Vatican Council’s Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to Non-Christian Religions (Nostra Aetate) and in Pope Paul VI’s encyclical Ecclesiam Suam: the outer edge is no less than the limits of a universal humanity; then come all persons of good will; closer in, we find all who believe in “the one God”, people of “the great African and Asian religions”, but more particularly Muslims and more particularly yet Jews; finally come Christians and, at the very centre, the Catholic church.

The most liberal modern Christian theologians, whether Catholic or Protestant, have moved towards regarding religions as “equivalent” or simply (in a benign agnosticism) “incommensurable”; but this position is hard to square with scriptural and traditional faith in the unique and universal significance of Christ and hence in the God revealed by him and the events surrounding him (see uniqueness of Christ, universalism).

A more characteristically Christian approach to dialogue, let alone evangelism, can find resources in a Trinitarian doctrine of God. This is hinted at in the WCC Guidelines for Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies (1979): “It is Christian faith in the Triune God – Creator of all humankind, Redeemer in Jesus Christ, revealing and renewing Spirit – which calls us Christians to human relationship with our many neighbours. It is Christian faith which sets us free to be open to the faith of others, to risk, to trust and to be vulnerable. In dialogue, conviction and openness are held in balance.” In more academic terms, Karl Rahner’s vision provided a valuable Trinitarian framework for many: God is the mystery at the ultimate horizon of human self-transcendence and is constantly pressing upon the human creature in self-communication by word and grace. A more forthrightly biblical account is provided by Lesslie Newbigin in his thoroughly Trinitarian books The Open Secret (1978) and The Gospel in a Pluralist Society (1989).

If, in conclusion, it were to be asked what picture of God emerges in current ecumenical reflection by those committed to the Christian faith, the WCC Faith and Order* study “Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today” suggests that the following traits at least would be noticeable. The picture will be thoroughly Trinitarian (though with perhaps a blurring at the edges, among those who, under feminist criticism, are attempting the difficult, if not impossible, task of finding alternatives to the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit). "The Father" and "the Almighty" will be seen as mutually qualifying, with a recognition of the tender qualities of God which may even be designated motherly or feminine. "The Father" will never be without "the Son", or "the Son" without "the Father". It will be stressed, in a recovery of Athanasianism, that the work of Christ in revelation and redemption depends on the Son's being "consubstantial with the Father". Soteriological motifs will be strongly present, with a stress on God's favour towards the poor* and the oppressed. In face of all the difficulties concerning "interventionism" raised by a scientific world-view, God will still be confessed as "acting" in the world. There will be discussion of the work of the Holy Spirit beyond the bounds of the church, throughout humankind and creation.* The Holy Spirit will be seen in the church not only as a bond of unity* but also as a principle of diversity. Communion and perichoresis will be major categories for expressing the inner-Trinitarian relations. The continuing work of God towards the eschatological consummation will figure prominently.

See also grace.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

■ D.B. Burrell, Knowing the Unknowable God: Ibn-Sina, Maimonides, Aquinas, Notre Dame IN, Univ. of Notre Dame Press, 1986 ■ Confessing the One Faith, WCC, 1999 ■ R.P.C. Hanson, The Search for the Christian Doctrine of God: The Arian Controversy 318-381, Edinburgh, Clark, 1988 ■ W. Jeanrond & C. Theobald eds, God: Experience and Mystery, London, SCM Press, 2001 ■ E. Jüngel, Gott als Geheimnis der Welt (ET God as the Mystery of the World, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1983) ■ W. Kasper, Der Gott Jesu Christi (ET The God of Jesus Christ, New York, Crossroad, 1984) ■ V. Lossky, La théologie mystique de l'Eglise d'Orient (ET The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church, London, James Clarke, 1957) ■ J. Macquarrie, In Search of Deity, London, SCM Press, 1984 ■ A. Manaranche, Le monothéisme chrétien, Paris, Cerf, 1985 ■ W. Pannenberg, Metaphysik und Gottesgedanke

(ET Metaphysics and the Idea of God, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1990) ■ K. Rahner, "Theos im Neuen Testament" (ET in his Theological Investigations, 1, London, Darton, Longman & Todd, 1961) ■ D. Turner, The Darkness of God, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1995.

GOODALL, NORMAN

B. 30 Aug. 1896, Birmingham, UK; d. 1 Jan. 1985, Oxford. Goodall had great gifts for bringing about reconciliation* between churches. He played a leading part both in the re-organization of the London Missionary Society into the Council for World Mission, and in the eventual merger in 1972 of the Congregational and Presbyterian churches to become the United Reformed Church. He was foreign secretary of the London Missionary Society, 1936-44; secretary of the Joint Committee of the International Missionary Council and the WCC, 1955-61, prior to the union of the two in New Delhi, 1961; assistant general secretary of the WCC, 1961-63; chairman of a WCC structure committee; and secretary of the International Congregational Council, 1962-68. After studies in Mansfield College, Oxford, he was pastor of a Congregational church in London in 1922 and also lecturer, broadcaster and author of several publications on ecumenism and mission.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ N. Goodall, The Ecumenical Movement, New York, Oxford UP, 1964 ■ Ecumenical Progress: A Decade of Change in the Ecumenical Movement, 1961-71, London, Oxford UP, 1972 ■ Second Fiddle, London, SPCK, 1979 ■ ed., Uppsala Report, WCC, 1968.

GOSPEL AND CULTURE

AS A FOCUSED way of addressing the issues with which it deals, "gospel and culture" is a relatively recent theme in WCC conversations. Although mandated by the sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983), intensive study of the issue was especially precipitated by the address given at the seventh assembly (Canberra 1991) by Korean theologian Chung Hyun-Kyung and the controversies it stirred. Soon after the assembly, the theme "Called to One Hope: The Gospel in Diverse Cultures" was set for the Salvador, Brazil, conference on world mission and evangelism in 1996. A three-year preparatory study included a series of consultations, gathered the reflections of local study groups from all around the world, produced 18 monographs on the interaction of gospel and culture in particular contexts, and gave shape to a document which guided work at the conference on four sub-themes: authentic witness within each culture;* gospel and identity in community; local congregations in pluralist societies; and one gospel – diverse expressions.

While this focus in the 1990s was new in the WCC, the issues were not. Wesley Ariarajah has suggested that although no "evolution" of the discussion in ecumenical history can be traced, the subject has arisen in a number of ways in major WCC conferences and assemblies. He identifies five central areas of discussion in which the issues have been present: gospel and religions; church, kingdom, world; universality and particularity; theologies in context; and the church and the churches.

Several factors have led to the increase of concern about the dynamic interaction between the gospel and cultures. First, there has been a shift in the Western world's appreciation for the inherent value and dignity of all human cultures, displacing the dominant 19th-century attitude that linked Christianizing with civilizing. Second, the dismantling of the colonial holdings of the Western nations following the second world war spurred on movements towards independence on the part of the so-called "younger churches" over against the missionary structures. Third, the churches of the non-Western world increasingly recognized that their indigenous character includes selfhood not only in the areas of governance, support and mission, but also theologizing. By the time of the Bangkok conference on world mission and evangelism in 1973, the sentiment would be expressed that "culture shapes the human voice that answers the voice of Christ" and the need to engage that affirmation more directly and fully has continued to build ever since. The patterns of domination in new global economic forces, the hungers for communal identity and the tragedies of re-tribalization, and the challenges of holding and commending a particular faith amidst a pluralist world have sharpened the urgency to address the issues.

In wider ecumenical circles the issues have been addressed explicitly for a much longer period than in the WCC, particularly in connection with the crossing of cultural frontiers in mission. The Roman Catholic Church, for example, has had a long history of engagement with issues of adaptation and acculturation that can be traced from Roberto de Nobili and Matteo Ricci in the early 17th century to the present. Following the Second Vatican Council* and the shift to what many Roman Catholic observers call the epoch of the world church, the term "inculturation" has come into use to indicate an approach that envisions a more whole and fruitful interchange between the gospel and the cultures of its recipients.

Conservative evangelical missiologists have carried on a fruitful and extensive dialogue as well. In journals such as Practical Anthropology and its successor, Missiology: An International Review, they gave early leadership among Protestants in the field. Their particular interest in the cross-cultural dynamics of missionary presence and communication was jointly expressed in the Wil-lowbank report, developed at a consultation held by the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization* in 1978.

In the ecumenical reflections brought into focus at Salvador, several features of an emerging perspective are evident. First, the gospel, it is understood, is and always must be expressed in the terms of some human culture's way of understanding and stating it. Language and culture are such that a "culture-free gospel" is a contradiction in terms and inconsistent with an appreciation for the incarnation. Second, the gospel encounters the cultures of the churches where the missionary enterprise originates as much as it does the cultures with which it has contact. The churches of the West are having to re-learn that it is of the missionary essence of every church that the gospel is encountering the culture in which it participates, its own framework for understanding the world and living in it. Third, there is in the gospel-culture dynamic both an encounter calling for conversion and an affirmation of the culture's dignity. That is, as was said at Salvador, the gospel illumines and transforms a culture, and cultures illumine and incarnate the gospel. As Lamin Sanneh has pointed out, this means that every human culture is de-stigmatized and revitalized by the gospel, and every human culture is at the same time de-absolutized and relativized by it. All cultures are the true destiny of the gospel's expression, and no culture can claim to be its sole final expression.

GEORGE R. HUNSBERGER

■ S.W. Ariarajah, Gospel and Culture: An Ongoing Discussion within the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1994 ■ S. Bevans, Models of Contextual Theology, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1992 ■ C. Du-raisingh ed., Called to One Hope: The Gospel in Diverse Cultures, WCC, 1998 ■ G.R. Hunsberger & C. Van Gelder eds, The Church between Gospel and Culture: Emerging Mission in North America, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1996 ■ L. Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society, WCC, 1989 ■ L. Sanneh, Translating the Message: The Missionary Impact on Culture, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1989 ■ P. Schineller, A Handbook on Inculturation, Mahwah NJ, Paulist, 1990 ■ R.J. Schreiter, Constructing Local Theologies, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1985 ■ J.R.W. Stott & R. Coote eds, Down to Earth: Studies in Christianity and Culture, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1980 ■ A. Walker, Telling the Story: Gospel, Mission and Culture, London, SPCK, 1996.

GRACE

BOTH IN its biblical origins and subsequently, the concept of "grace" has been used in the legal realm and in the area of human relationships in general. Applied in a special way to God's relation to human beings, the concept has aroused great passions throughout the history of Christian theology and dogma, making it one of the central concepts of Christian theology, even considered at times to be the quintessence of Christianity as a whole. Theologically and in church politics the theme of "grace" has been affirmed, re-interpreted, circumscribed and nuanced, and has figured in disputes and schisms over its own definition and operation, especially in the Western church. In Judaism, despite a similarly high estimate of the relevant biblical content, the concept of "grace" has never played this kind of central role.

OLD TESTAMENT

The word "grace" or close synonyms are used to translate a variety of related Hebrew words. The range of meanings includes the formula "to find favour in the sight of the Lord" (Gen. 6:8; Ex. 33:12-13,16-17, 34:9); the statement of God's absolute freedom in his gracious election, "I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will show mercy on whom I will show mercy" (Ex. 33:19); and something like a general theological formula describing God as merciful and gracious and as a God of steadfast love and faithfulness (Ex. 34:6; Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2; Pss 86:15, 103:8, 111:4, 116:5, 145:8; Neh. 9:17,31; 2 Chron. 30:9).

It should be observed, all in all, that God bestows his grace freely with no preconditions; he grants it to Israel as a whole. This is a dependable promise, and the individual who in prayer asks to have it can rely on it. Grace is always given precedence over the commandment.

NEW TESTAMENT

In the New Testament the equivalent for the term "grace" is charis. Paul's theology is central to the whole NT understanding of grace. The epistle to the Romans is of special importance here. In particular Paul emphasizes God's gracious action in the death of Jesus Christ* on the cross (esp. in Rom. 3-6) and the presence of God's grace in believers (thus Rom. 5:1-11, 6:14; 2 Cor. 6:1; Gal. 1:6, 5:4; Phil. 1:7); the fullness of the various charismata* as gifts of God corresponds to the charis bestowed by God and makes that charis a reality in the Christian community (thus Rom. 12:3-21; 1 Cor. 1:4-9). In Rom. 3:24f. Paul says that God, through the divine eschatological act in the expiatory death of Jesus, justifies dorean (“as a gift”) those sinners who respond in faith.* The dorean explicitly links grace with the corresponding position that “no human being will be justified... by works of the law” (3:20). Rom. 5:1-11 equates this eschatological divine act of grace in justification* with the love of God revealed in Jesus’ death for sinners. In Rom. 5:12-21 the theme of grace is given expanded treatment. God’s grace flows so abundantly that as the righteousness (of believers) it annihilates the power of sin* and will reign victoriously over the power of death in the eternal life of those who are made perfect. Rom. 6 explains how the baptized and justified have died with Christ to sin and are no longer under the law but under grace (v.14) and so have the prospect of eternal life as a gift (charisma) of the freely given grace of God (v.23).

Among the synoptic writers, only Luke uses charis (e.g. Luke 1:30, 2:40,52, 4:22; Acts 4:33, 7:46, 11:23, 14:3,26, 15:40, 20:24,32). Here Luke speaks of the benefit of grace, “the gospel of the grace of God”, the grace that was “upon him (Jesus)”, the grace which rested upon the (primitive) Christian community, and of mission,* which is represented as a realization of the gracious eschatological act of God. In the Johannine writings charis is found only twice (John 1:14-18; 2 John 3); the conjunction of the two terms “grace and truth” in John 1:14-18 has its own importance, presupposing the incarnation of the Logos, in which the grace of God exceeds that which was to be found in the law of Moses.

THE EARLY CHURCH AND THE MIDDLE AGES

It is not possible to describe the Western doctrine of grace since Augustine without reference to the soteriological and ethical context in which the theme of grace was treated in East and West in the first four centuries, with synergism as a characteristic feature: salvation* is achieved through a conjunction of divine and human action. God’s action establishes the comprehensive and definitive starting point of the human road to salvation and also provides for the goal, but between start and finish lie human ethics and morals made possible by grace as a life in grace, as the appropriation and demonstration of grace in moral behaviour, and as indispensable for salvation.

The interpretation of the doctrine of grace in terms of salvation history* made it possible for Irenaeus (late 2nd century) to understand the whole existence of human beings as life based on grace: in creation* itself human beings receive an existence based on grace, and as the image of God they are called to a fellowship with God that they cannot attain on their own after the fall. That is why the linking of divine grace with human beings in Jesus Christ is both possible and needed. Christ makes the Holy Spirit* available to human beings (in baptism), and thus human nature is healed through grace – all of which happens in the church.* From the time of Irenaeus onwards it is therefore possible to speak of the original state of grace and saving grace, of nature and grace, and of the church as the place where grace is to be found.

For Athanasius Christ is the mediator in creation and redemption; he is the true image of God and thus the original unity of nature and grace which human beings lost in Adam. Achieving fellowship with God requires the new imparting of grace that takes place in the incarnation* and the subsequent bestowal of the Spirit, which inwardly renews human beings. The connection of grace and Spirit remained significant, especially in Eastern theology (e.g. for Basil the Great). Gregory of Nyssa describes the connection between divine grace and the moral behaviour of human beings in relation to salvation as synergeia (synergy), and John Chrysostom puts the main emphasis on grace. These 4th-century reflections on grace remained standard for Eastern theology, particularly in the way it related to pneumatology and was thematically developed.

The situation was completely different for Western theology. The course was set by Augustine, drawing on the tradition already available to him, accepting the 4th-century Christological and pneumatological dogmas, and with particular dependence on Paul. Augustine's own development played an important part in this. In anthropology and ethics he switched under Pauline influence from a Platonic theory of knowledge to an interest in how right action is made possible. By around 396 his doctrine of grace was fully developed (On Various Questions, to Simplician; Confessions). In the controversy with Pelagius it was merely defended and more closely defined (esp. in The Spirit and the Letter, 412). Augustine's new understanding of sin, acquired under Paul's influence, is crucial: human beings are intrinsically characterized by sin (peccatum originale), which finds expression in covetousness and greed and in a radical love of self. Only God can open up the self-centredness and self-concern of human beings. This is the work of grace, which first enables human beings even simply to will what is good. This idea that not only doing good but even willing to do good is a work of grace is something wholly new, corresponding to Augustine's doctrine that everything is effected by God, so that everything good in God's creatures comes from the Deity. As in Paul, grace is freely bestowed by God without any prior works by human beings.

The controversy with Pelagius brought Augustine's doctrine of grace into conflict with what was taught not only by Gregory of Nyssa and John Chrysostom but also by Jerome. Pelagius rejected a peccatum originale as essential to the character of a theological anthropology. The Creator himself had bestowed reason, conscience, freedom of will and the power to will what is good on human nature, which is good. Human weakness results from the seductive power of Adam's sin, which, beyond the merely limited effect of God's grace in the law, is removed through the representation of the grace of God in the incarnation of Jesus Christ and through the moral example he set. This is made transparent in baptism and makes good and just action possible. Against this less radical conception of Pelagius, Augustine (in The Spirit and the Letter) stresses the total incapacity of human beings to turn to God on their own initiative and emphasizes what Paul says in 1 Cor. 4:7: "What do you have that you did not receive?" Only grace awakens faith, is the basis of freedom of the will, and turns us towards the good. Even the free assent to salvation is a work of grace; it is granted to those God foreknows will give that assent. The resort to predestination is intended to safeguard the complete gratuitousness of the grace of God, which the Deity is not under any obligation to bestow. It is because of God's grace that a life in accordance with the divine will is possible at all: Rom. 5:5 speaks of the love of God poured into our hearts by the Holy Spirit. Spirit and grace are thus interconnected: both are God's gift of love; the Spirit is the Spirit of grace, and grace is the Spirit working as love. It is granted gratuitously. Christology and the doctrine of grace are mediated pneumatologically. Contrary to Pelagius, grace is neither nature nor law, but the Spirit who makes us alive; and Christ is thus not merely a person who works powerfully in history but is present and effective "in the Spirit". The Spirit – purely and simply the gift of God – operates through holy scripture, preaching, the sacraments and the ministry, creating love and fellowship, so that the individual partakes in grace in the communio sanctorum, in the ecclesia catholica. Augustine is not thinking in terms of the church itself as actively mediating grace.

The church adopted Augustine's teaching on grace in a cruder form and condemned Pelagius at the council of Carthage (418). The difficulties arising here are clearly shown by John Cassian and by Vincent of Lérins. While not supporters of Pelagius, they represented traditional synergism and were convinced, contrary to Augustine, that despite the fall the freedom to decide in favour of conversion* is crucial; grace is not the source of the will to do good but merely re-inforces it. Augustine's doctrine was defended by Prosper of Aquitaine and Fulgentius of Ruspe, and Caesarius of Arles was finally able to obtain the condemnation of synergism at the provincial council of Orange (529). But its persistence is evident in Gregory I, for whom grace starts at the conversion of sinful human beings through faith and the will to do good, accompanies them after baptism and, together with the free will, is the cause of good works. Human co-operation is indispensable for conversion and for good works, but it also remains clear that there can be no Christian existence without grace. Christian existence is nevertheless bound up with the life of the church. In Gregory I this contributes to an extension of the institutional church's claim to a mediating role in salvation far beyond Augustine's sacramentalism.

Early, high and late scholasticism remained beholden to the Augustinian scheme. Across the spectrum of theological schools, the doctrine of grace in the middle ages was characterized by systematization and what were plainly hair-splitting definitions, falling back on distinctions which already had a very long history. Early scholasticism interprets grace in the context of ethics and articulates it as the constant principle in virtue. Alongside this it recognizes three other contexts where grace has to be discussed: the doctrine of the sacraments, Christology, and the doctrine of creation and the original state of human beings. Faith ("initial grace", linked to justification) and love are the effect of grace. No good work is possible without grace.

For Thomas Aquinas grace is the creative coming "of the eternal love of God into the centre of the human ego" (O.H. Pesch), with which God rescues us from our natural limitations for a fellowship of love with him and endows us in such a way that we find this possible. Faith, hope and love follow from grace. Although Thomas champions the doctrine of the freedom of the will, human beings make no contribution to justification because freedom in Thomas's sense remains tied to God as its source and is therefore a "freedom that is bestowed". Thomas's concept of merit is not easy to understand; for him the doctrine of merit is an extension of the doctrine of grace. The meritum de condigno speaks of the efficacy of the grace of God; only the meritum de congruo belongs on the human side because it designates friendship and not a legal right: it is appropriate that God fulfills the request of a friend, but one who is a friend only through the grace of God.

Thomas's whole structure of ideas was bound to give rise to questions, which is what happened when the crisis in metaphysical thinking made it impossible for the characteristic bracketing of Christian tradition with Aristotelian metaphysics to continue saying what it was trying to say. Alongside a new understanding of freedom, humanism generally developed new and different paradigms of language and thought. Old linguistic models were bound to suffer a crisis which then led, less inevitably, to the split in the Western church. By the 16th century, the doctrine of grace, in both its classical and late scholastic forms, had come to the end of the road – not least in view of the practical situation in proclamation and the cure of souls – and needed to be re-thought.

THE REFORMATION

Martin Luther's new reflections on grace were prompted by the nominalist position that pure love of God was possible for the natural man. Although he was unacquainted with the high scholastic positions, these were by now caught up in the vortex of nominalistic thinking, so that Luther rejected them completely as human self-justification. In a situation of degeneration of theology and church life as a whole, Luther fell back on Paul and took up ideas which were central to Augustine to develop his doctrine of justification, within which grace is an essential constituent. The gospel of Jesus the Christ is grace; it proclaims the gracious God who in Christ has mercy on sinners. In faith human beings "cling" to the Christ who ascends to the Father. God accepts believers who look in faith on Christ and justifies them by grace alone without any merits on their part, vesting them with the righteousness that is God's, since Christ has "drowned" human sins in his death. Justification of sinners is God's act in Christ. It is actively proclaimed, and they partake of it in faith. All this happens in the Spirit.

In Reformation theology of the Lutheran type, this content is summed up in four principles which interpret each other: sola gratia, solo Christo, solo verbo, sola fide. Sinners are justified through these. Grace is seen to consist in the forgiveness of sins. Along with its effects on the whole of life, it grants fellowship with God. In no way is this saying less than what is found in the variations of the scholastic doctrine of grace. Luther's doctrine of grace is a paean to the fact that God is not ours to command and that God alone is efficacious in what he does. In God's sight human beings are always sinners on whom he has mercy in Christ and whom he vests with his righteousness. The Christian is therefore simul justus et peccator, righteous and a sinner at the same time. In relation to salvation human beings have – from a strictly theological point of view – no “free will”, by means of which they could find the way to salvation apart from and prior to any grace, as this way has already been made smooth for human beings in Christ by God’s free will. Even human acceptance of salvation is a work of God’s grace, as the believer confesses in prayer.

For Calvin the divine sovereignty in God’s gracious acts is decisive. In his Institutes it is grace that links the saving work of Christ – which imparts God’s grace and salvation – with its consequences in the Christian’s life, seen as the “appropriation of the grace of Christ” and as the work of the Holy Spirit. Calvin’s doctrine of grace is marked by its Christological focus and pneumatological explication and acknowledges its permanent indebtedness to the Reformation principle of sola gratia.

The council of Trent* was not able to take up the challenges of the Reformation creatively. It carefully avoided taking sides with any of the factions involved in disputes related to the scholastic schools; it sought to counter the situation created by the Reformation pastorally and at the same time to fight the Reformation theologically. The doctrine of grace and justification was described in detail in ways which can in fact be harmonized with Reformation teaching: justification was given a Christological basis, and grace was described as the means of obtaining justification. Like the Reformation, Trent subsumes grace in the doctrine of justification.

Despite vigorous controversies in which the medieval and Tridentine positions on grace were again most violently debated and fanatically defended, the three centuries after Trent were characterized in the Roman Catholic Church by a linguistic deficit and the absence of anything more to say, as the systems had lost any real relation to life, society and faith. Thus despite the Reformation, Trent had not settled the medieval disputes; and the effect of the biblical and Augustinian position adopted by Trent in the positive doctrinal texts (not in the condemnatory canons) was lost.

THE 20TH CENTURY

The major theological systems or schemes arising after the destructive violence of the first world war caused the collapse of the 19th century’s optimistic belief in progress took a radical, fresh look at theological thinking, while recognizing their debt to the spirit of the biblical sources and seeking to hold on to what is best in each confessional tradition in the light of these, and being aware of their indebtedness to a diversity of philosophical “systems” (even if – like Karl Barth – they deny such connections). Protestant theology in German-speaking countries – Karl Holl (and the subsequent Luther renaissance), Karl Barth, Emil Brunner, Rudolf Bultmann, Paul Tillich, Dietrich Bonhoeffer and others – tried in different ways to testify to the grace of God in Jesus Christ in faith and in the implementation of faith, thus placing enough “material” in the hands of the subsequent generation (Gerhard Ebeling, Eberhard Jüngel, Wolfhart Pannenberg and many others) for the independent work they are doing. At the same time, Protestant theology stirred Roman Catholic theology from its lethargy. While the only Roman Catholic theologies genuinely comparable with the Protestant systems are those of Karl Rahner and Edward Schillebeeckx, the serious attention paid to grace in Latin American liberation theology is worthy of note (Leonardo Boff).

When “The Doctrine of Grace” was treated by Faith and Order in the 1930s, W.A. Brown recognized in his synthesis that, despite differences on justification, predestination, the church as locus of grace and the sacraments as means of grace, all bodies of Christians hold to “the conviction that man’s welfare and happiness depend in the last analysis upon God and the conviction that God is moved to his gracious activity towards man by no merit on man’s part but solely by a characteristic of his own nature which impels him to impart himself in free outgoing love”. The 1984 bilateral dialogue between the Lutheran World Federation and the World Methodist Council entitled its final report “The Church: A Community of Grace” and was able, despite differences of emphasis, to come to what it considered sufficient agreement on “salvation by grace through faith”.

Christians who look back attentively at the high scholastic debate, the polemics of the 16th century and the bizarre controversies within the Roman Catholic Church in the 16th, 17th and early 18th centuries will be embarrassed at Christian history and want to pose Paul's question to these contentious fathers in the faith: "What do you have that you did not receive?" (1 Cor. 4:7). The high scholastic, late scholastic, Tridentine and post-Tridentine teaching on grace came to the end of the road because it no longer had any relation to reality and because its central concepts such as "preparation", dispositio, qualitas, "freedom", "merit", "cooperation", etc. even in their best form (e.g., that of Thomas Aquinas) meant in the linguistic usage of the time the exact opposite of what they normally convey in modern usage. To put the point more sharply, "freedom" in Thomas is the same as what Luther meant by the "bondage" of the will; "merit" in Thomas is not merit at all because it is an effect of grace and therefore no longer can be called merit; "cooperation" is a product of grace and therefore also is not cooperation, and so on.

A "re-reading" of Christian traditions in the light of the statements of holy scripture brings all Christians together before God, who has made himself freely available to us once for all in Jesus Christ. This gift is laid hold of in faith through the Spirit, as we hope for the divine consummation which will be effected at the eschaton and is attested here and now in love – as the work of the grace of God.

See also redemption.

JOHANNES BROSEDER

■ L. Boff, A graça libertadora no mundo (ET Liberating Grace, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1979)

■ A. Ganoczy, Aus seiner Fülle haben wir alle empfangen: Grundriss der Gnadenlehre, Düsseldorf, Patmos, 1989 ■ C. Moeller & G. Philips, The Theology of Grace and the Ecumenical Movement, London, Mowbray, 1961 ■ O.H. Pesch & A. Peters, Einführung in die Lehre von Gnade und Rechtfertigung, Darmstadt, Wiss. Buchgesellschaft, 1981 ■ G. Philips, L'union personnelle avec le Dieu vivant, 2nd ed., Louvain, Univ. Press, 1989 ■ E. van Wolde ed., The Bright Side of Life, London, SCM Press, 2000.

GRAHAM, WILLIAM FRANKLIN (Billy)

B. 7 Nov. 1918, Charlotte, NC, USA. "The most attractive public person that evangelical Protestantism has offered in the 20th century", according to historian Mark Noll, Billy Graham stands out in the American religious tradition that reaches back to Jonathan Edwards (d. 1758) whose revival meetings were "the surprising works of God".

After his born-again conversion during a rural revival (1934) and his graduation from Wheaton College (1943), the Southern Baptist minister became the full-time travelling evangelist for Youth for Christ. Following the success of his 1949 two-month campaign in Los Angeles, in 1950 he formed the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association (BGEA) to oversee the expanding work, which also used radio and print. Starting in Britain in 1954, by 1960 he had given urban "crusades for Christ" in six continents.

Graham insists on working through and with local ministers, and on not entering their area unless invited. After the first nationally televised crusade in New York City, 1957, leading fundamentalists* began to oppose him for enlisting the working cooperation of mainline Protestants who dilute the gospel. In the 1960s he expanded "cooperative evangelism" by including willing Roman Catholic and Orthodox.

As a committed evangelist he attended the WCC founding assembly (Amsterdam 1948). But in the early 1960s he identified with those Evangelicals* who disassociate themselves from the WCC because, in the name of dialogue, it underplays or spurns "the unfinished task of reaching the unreached peoples". His biblical preaching moved away from solely personal to social sins also, e.g., racism, poverty and other communal human indignities, but he never wavers in placing personal conversions as the condition for any societal transformations.

Among Evangelicals, his friendly piety, personal integrity and careful stewardship of BGEA funds empowered him to sponsor the Berlin World Congress on Evangelism in 1966 ("One Race, One Gospel, One Task"). BGEA-sponsored regional congresses followed in Singapore, Bogota and Amsterdam, in order to raise up indigenous "itinerant evangelists". He also convened, and subsidized, the 1974 World Congress on World Evangelization; its 2500 participants from about 150 nations agreed to the Lausanne Covenant.* His last intensive round of crusades, 1988-90, covered three continents, and by the time aging illness kept him at home, the BGEA claimed that Billy Graham had preached to nearly 100 million individuals in person.

See also Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization.

TOM STRANSKY

- W. Graham, Just As I Am, San Francisco, Harper, 1998
- L. Drummond & J. Stott, The Evangelist: The World-Wide Impact of Billy Graham, Dallas, Word Books, 2001
- W. Martin, A Prophet with Honor, New York, Morrow, 1991.

GREGORIOS, PAULOS MAR (PAUL VERGHESE)

B. 9 Aug. 1922, Tripunithura, Kerala, India; d. 24 Nov. 1996, Kottayam. Orthodox Syrian Church of the East's metropolitan of Delhi, Gregorios's association with the WCC was long and wide-ranging; he was a president, 1983-91; director of the Division of Ecumenical Action and associate general secretary, 1962-67; observer at the Second Vatican Council, 1962-65; member of the Joint Working Group* between the RCC and the WCC, 1963-75, and of the Faith and Order* commission, 1968-75; moderator of the Working Committee on Church and Society, 1975-83; and chairman of the world conference on "Faith, Science and the Future", MIT, Cambridge, USA, 1979. His studies took him to Union and Princeton theological seminaries and Yale university in the US, Oxford university in the UK, the Gregory of Nyssa Institute, Münster, and Serampore university where he received a ThD in 1975. In India he was general secretary of the Orthodox Student Movement, 1955-57. He was personal adviser to Emperor Haile Selassie and executive secretary of the Government Committee for Relief Aid, Ethiopia, 1956-59. He led WCC delegations to UNESCO, 1966; to heads of African states, 1968; and to UN general assembly special sessions on disarmament, 1983 and 1988. Secretary for interchurch relations of the Orthodox Episcopal Synod, Gregorios was also principal of the Orthodox Theological Seminary, Kottayam, and director of the Delhi Orthodox Centre. He was active in bilateral dialogues in his country: joint organizer of the Oriental Orthodox-Eastern Orthodox conversations, as well as joint chairman of the Indian Orthodox-Roman Catholic Joint Commission, the Orthodox-Mar Thoma conversations and the Orthodox-Lutheran conversations. He was chief editor of the Star of the East and Purobithan.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- P. Gregorios, Cosmic Man, New York, Paragon, 1988
- The Gospel of the Kingdom, Madras, CLS, 1968
- The Human Presence, WCC, 1978
- Science for Sane Societies, Madras, CLS, 1980
- P. Abrecht, "In Memoriam: M. M. Thomas, Paulos Mar Gregorios", ER, 49, 1, 1997.

GROUPE DES DOMBES

THE ECUMENICAL Groupe des Dombes (the Dombes group) sprang from the initiative of Abbé Paul Couturier (d.1953), a priest in the diocese of Lyons, France, and a Roman Catholic pioneer of Christian unity. In 1937

he had the idea of meeting for a few days at the Cistercian abbey of Les Dombes, 40 km northeast of Lyon, with a group of Roman Catholic and Protestant friends, mainly pastors and priests, from France and Switzerland. The purpose of meeting was to get to know one another better, by praying together and listening to one another in an atmosphere of love and friendship. The group today comprises some 40 members, who meet every year at the beginning of September for three full days. After a long period of alternating between a Roman Catholic meeting place (Les Dombes) and a Protestant one (Présinge, Grandchamp, Taizé), the group decided from 1971 on to meet every year at Les Dombes. The theological working sessions are interspersed and energized by three daily periods of prayer, including a morning eucharist service, shared with the monks, one of whom participates in the group's theological work.

Until 1955 the members of the group concentrated on getting to know one another and did not address the outside world. In the doctrinal field, they focused on comparative theological study (esp. justification* and redemption*), the sacraments* and the church,* trying to understand each other's positions better and rid themselves of common caricatures within their respective churches.

The years from 1956 to 1970 marked a second stage. The members of the group felt able to publish the results of their conversations in the form of a short series of theses. Thus they shifted from theological confrontation to collaboration. Leaving behind comparative theology, they started working out elements of a common theology. The subjects chosen were original sin,* the mediation of Christ and the church's ministry, the church as the Body of Christ, pastoral authority, apostolicity,* the priesthood,* the doctrine of the Holy Spirit,* intercommunion,* the apostolic succession and the communion of saints.*

The third stage began in 1971 as the group's work gathered momentum. With the official entrance of the Roman Catholic Church into ecumenical discussions, and in view of the urgent questions being asked by young people, the members decided to move away from the literary genre of theses for a limited audience to producing documents of a wider scope presenting a doctrinal topic on which there was a precise, strong ecumenical agreement. Five such documents were produced: Vers une même foi eucharistique? (Towards one eucharistic faith?, 1971), Pour une réconciliation des ministères (For a reconciliation of ministries, 1972), Le ministère épiscopal (The episcopal ministry, 1976), L'Esprit-Saint, l'Église et les sacrements (The Holy Spirit, the church and the sacraments, 1979), Le ministère de communion dans l'Église universelle (The ministry of communion in the universal church, 1985). To mark the group's 50th anniversary in 1987, all its theses and documents were collected in a single volume, Pour la communion des Églises: L'apport du Groupe des Dombes (1937-87) (Towards communion among the churches: The contribution of the Dombes group).

Since 1987 the group has published two new documents. The first, Pour la conversion des Églises (For the conversion of the churches, 1991), shows that "far from being mutually exclusive, [confessional] identity and [ecumenical] conversion are complementary". The point is not to abolish confessional identities but to convert them, as is shown by an analysis of different forms of such conversion ancient and modern. The second text is a document on Marie dans le dessein de Dieu et la communion des saints (Mary in God's design and the communion of saints, 1997). It proposes an ecumenical reading of doctrinal and confessional history concerning Mary and then a survey of biblical texts about her, arranged according to the three articles of the creed. Subsequently the text tackles the continuing items of controversy (Mary's "cooperation" with God; the brothers and sisters of Jesus; the Roman Catholic dogmas of Mary's immaculate conception and assumption; the invocation of Mary in prayer).

As can be seen, the theological method used by the Groupe des Dombes is based on the spiritual conviction that reconciliation* between the churches can come about only as the fruit of a process of conversion* on the part of the different confessions – converting one another and together being converted to God and his Christ. On this basis, the method used applies the principles of Christological focus (seeking the substance of the gospel in the light of the person of Christ), dogmatic focus (distinguishing the area of necessary unanimity in the faith from that of legitimate plurality in systematic theology), and lastly, overcoming conflict by refining and combining ("to see together how to do justice to all the fundamental and essential demands, in a common truth that is not behind us, but ahead of us, in a Christianity that is spiritually purer and intellectually more demanding, but also more balanced"; J. de Baciocchi).

The Groupe des Dombes is an independent group: it has no mandate from anyone, and the documents it produces have no authority apart from what they are able to command by their own worth. This private status enables it, however, to serve the churches as a force for new ideas, able to risk moving forward on doctrinal issues before official commissions are in a position to do so. Through translations of several of its texts, its reputation has spread beyond the French-speaking world. Many of its statements have been picked up in the documents of special commissions, particularly those concerning the eucharist* and ministries. Its texts are also used in ecumenical catechetical classes in parishes and Christian communities. In this way it fulfills its calling to serve ecumenical dialogue creatively in the field of doctrine.

BERNARD SESBOÛÉ

■ C.J. Dumont, "Eucharistie et ministères, à propos des accords des Dombes", Istina, 18, 2, 1973 ■ "Le Groupe des Dombes", Unité des chrétiens, 14, 1974 ■ Groupe des Dombes, Pour la communion des Eglises, l'apport du Groupe des Dombes 1937-87, Paris, Centurion, 1988 ■ Groupe des Dombes, Pour la conversion des Eglises (ET For the Conversion of the Churches, WCC, 1993) ■ Groupe des Dombes, Marie: dans le dessin de Dieu et la communion des saints: Dans l'histoire et l'écriture. Controverse et conversion, Paris, Bayard/Centurion, 1999 ■ G. Hammann, "Hermeneutische Aspekte in der ökumenischen Arbeit der Groupe des Dombes/Aspects herméneutiques du travail œcuménique du Groupe des Dombes", conference of the institutes of religious hermeneutics of Zurich, Tübingen and Neuchâtel, May 1998 ■ H. Roux, Interchurch Dialogue about Office: Interdenominational Dialogue in France, New York, Seabury, 1972.

GROWTH, LIMITS TO

SINCE THE beginning of the 20th century there have been warnings that the pattern of modern economic and industrial development, together with continuing population growth, was endangering the environment – the air, water, soil and living space on which human life depends – and that the wasteful use of natural resources would sooner or later bring "unacceptable consequences". These early warnings did not, however, weaken general confidence in the need for economic and industrial growth.

In the years between the two world wars the main social concerns in the industrially developed countries were justice in the distribution of the increasing wealth and income which economic growth made possible, and the threats to economic prosperity resulting from the periodic downturns in the business cycle, as in the great depression of the 1930s. After the second world war these issues were effectively addressed by the governments of the developed countries, ushering in a long period of prosperity with increasing social security and welfare, sustained by almost continuous economic growth and technological advance. At the same time, it was recognized that the poorer or developing countries needed to grow economically and industrially. The pressures on the environment and raw materials from this worldwide industrial expansion and economic growth led, however, to a new questioning of the assumptions of unlimited growth in a world of finite resources.

Moral theologians and social scientists in the rich countries noted that the emphasis on economic growth arose not only from the desire to meet basic human needs; in their view modern capitalism* was creating an acquisitive consumer society based on ever-increasing technological power over nature. The Anglican V.A. Demant maintained, in Religion and the Decline of Capitalism (1952), that the capitalist system was leading to an unhealthy emphasis on the autonomy of economic life, glorifying the dynamics of individual economic achievement and stifling "the organic growth of human society". While Christian economists like R.H. Tawney and D.L. Munby challenged Demant's understanding of the market economy and the profit system, they agreed that the spirit of dynamic growth tended to become an end in itself: "Dynamism may be a blessing, but it may equally be a curse; outside a proper theological framework, the curse is likely to dominate" (Munby).

In The Costs of Economic Growth (1967), the English economist E.J. Mishan criticized the modern "growth-mania", unchecked by serious regard for the increasing social costs or diseconomies arising from the single-minded emphasis on economic "progress". As a result, life in rural and urban areas was being robbed of its charm and pleasure. "With a hubris unmatched since the heyday of Victorian capitalism and with a blindness peculiar to our own time, we have abandoned ourselves to ransacking the most precious and irreplaceable good the earth provides, without thought to the desolation of the future and the deprivation of prosperity."

Later, other economists, notably E.F. Schumacher, author of Small Is Beautiful, also challenged the moral and philosophical assumptions of the liberal capitalist society. "In the excitement over the unfolding of his scientific and technical powers, modern man has built a system of production that ravishes nature and a type of society that mutilates man. If only there were more and more wealth, everything else, it is thought, would fall into place... This is the philosophy of materialism... which is now being challenged by events."

In the early 1970s the "limits to growth" debate entered a new phase when an international group of scientists, economists, engineers and business and political leaders formed the so-called Club of Rome to focus attention on "the Predicament of Mankind", as a global problem resulting from accelerating industrialization, rapid population growth, widespread malnutrition, depletion of non-renewable resources and a deteriorating environment. Drawing on the technical facilities and talent of research centres like MIT, they sponsored studies on World Dynamics (1971) and Limits to Growth (1972), using the new techniques of computer modelling to estimate the future consequences of present technological and economic trends. Their studies were criticized for making invalid predictions. In fact, Limits to Growth did not predict but extrapolated from present trends, and the extrapolations turned out to be much closer to what has happened than the critics suggested. The book was also criticized for treating the world as one unit. That was rectified in the subsequent book Mankind at the Turning Point (1974). These studies did encourage much new thinking about the exponential consequences of economic-growth policies, the urgency of addressing the problems of world pollution, limits to resources, overpopulation, and the need to challenge a widespread overconfidence in technological solutions to them.

The WCC and its member churches joined in the discussion of these issues in a study programme on "The Future of Humanity and Society in a World of Science-based Technology", begun in 1969. Over the ensuing two decades this resulted in a series of ecumenical studies and findings in which theologians, technologists and scientists offered their views on the moral and spiritual issues posed by (1) the scientific-technological advances in biotechnology and the resulting "manipulation of life", (2) nuclear energy and the over-riding problem of energy for the future, (3) population growth and its impact on the human and physical environment in rich and poor countries, (4) the pollution of the environment and the threat to human life, (5) the social and political implications of limiting growth worldwide and the need to work for the "sustainable society", and (6) the philosophical assumptions of modern science and technology and the critique of these from various theological and ethical perspectives. Ecumenical reflection on these themes was summed up in two international ecumenical conferences: Bucharest (1974) and MIT (Cambridge, USA, 1979).

The findings of these meetings presented the churches with new perspectives on the future of society, leading to new agreement and new controversy. From the beginning many Christians from the third world saw the questioning of modern science and technology and the concern for nature and the environment as deliberate distractions from what they perceived as the central issue: the problem of social justice. There has also been disagreement also about the relation of these new concerns to the political and ideological systems which many held to be responsible for the misuse of technology and the natural environment. As one of the early consultations reported on its discussion of the relation of political systems and the use of natural resources (Nemi 1971): "Some say the fault in the current gross inequality is the profit system, which encourages the production of unnecessary items by catering to consumers' whims, and which must be replaced before lasting corrections can be accomplished. Some believe socialist countries are also wasteful as well as being poor contributors to the development of the third world. Some argue that the market mechanism can meet the needs of the developing countries... And some see little hope for substantial progress until international agencies control the allocation of resources."

Disagreement on such issues was in part responsible for the inability of the WCC world convocation on "Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation" (Seoul 1990) to arrive at a common understanding either of the "realities we face" or of the "theological and ethical affirmations" which would enable the churches to unite in common Christian witness and action. One of the most difficult continuing ecumenical challenges is finding a way to continue reflection and action on these highly complex and contentious issues, which continue to divide both church and world.

See also development; economics; globalization, economic.

PAUL ABRECHT

- P. Abrecht & R.L. Shinn eds, Faith and Science in an Unjust World, report of MIT 1979, 2 vols, WCC, 1980
- D.L. Munby, Christianity and Economic Problems, London, Macmillan, 1965
- "Science and Technology for Human Development", report of Bucharest 1974, Anticipation, 19, 1974
- "Three Reports from Church and Society", report of Nemi 1971, Study Encounter, 7, 3, 1971.

GRUBB, KENNETH

B. 9 Sept. 1900, Oxton, England; d. 3 June 1980. An Anglo-Irishman, Grubb took great interest in getting to know the unknown lands of Amazonia and the Andes, as well as other areas of Latin America, and wrote several books which were indispensable for missionary policy and work. During the second world war, he was controller of overseas publicity of the British Ministry of Information. From 1946 to 1968 he was chairman of the WCC's Commission of the Churches on International Affairs (CCIA).

Grubb was a member or officer of numerous bodies in church, mission, business and world affairs, including the Church Missionary Society, Unevangelized Fields Mission, the British Council of Churches, the British and Foreign Bible Society, the United Society for Christian Literature, the Institute of Rural Life at Home and Overseas, the London-based institutes for international affairs, race relations and strategic studies. In the post-war period through the CCIA he represented the concern of the churches to governments and to the United Nations. On issues of human rights* in Latin America and Europe, he was the chief spokesperson of the churches to governments. He also tackled the issues of the arms race and disarmament on behalf of the churches and helped pioneer the World Christian Handbook.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- K. Grubb, Crypts of Power, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1971.

GUTIÉRREZ, GUSTAVO

B. 8 June 1928, Lima, Peru. Roman Catholic priest and theologian, Gutiérrez is widely honoured as “the father of liberation theology”* – a term he coined in 1968 for the reflection on ministry in solidarity with the poor* which he and other Latin American priests and pastoral workers began in the 1960s. His own seminal work, A Theology of Liberation, was published in Spanish in 1971; its 1973 English translation sold more than 100,000 copies. Though he has been criticized by political and theological conservatives, especially for the Marxist elements in his thought, Gutiérrez, unlike some other controversial contemporary Catholic theologians, has avoided the language and spirit of defiance, agreeing that theology is produced in and for the church* and that there is thus a legitimate function for church authority* in the process. Responding to the critical “Instructions” on liberation theology (1984 and 1986) from the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, Gutiérrez said that they contained “relevant observations” and stimulated him both to make some corrections and to find phraseology less susceptible to misunderstanding.

Since publishing A Theology of Liberation, Gutiérrez’s interest in social, economic and political analysis has lessened, and his interest in biblical and theological questions increased – as the title of his 1983 book We Drink from Our Own Wells (English, 1984) indicates. His primary concern is not politics or elaboration of a theory, secular or religious: “I am above all a pastor.” He serves a poor parish in the historic Rimac section of Lima; he has limited his teaching (at Lima’s Catholic university) to students not taking degrees in theology.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ G. Gutiérrez, Essential Writings, J.B. Nickoloff ed., Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1996.

H

HARTFORD APPEAL

THE HARTFORD appeal (“An Appeal for Theological Affirmation”) emerged from a three-day unofficial ecumenical consultation of theologians at the Hartford Seminary Foundation (Connecticut) in January 1975. Sociologist Peter L. Berger and Richard John Neuhaus initiated the meeting and prepared a preliminary draft for discussion. In its final and thoroughly revised form, the appeal called for theological response to 13 current themes in religious thought that were deemed to be “pervasive, false, and debilitating to the church’s life and work”. The key problem, said Hartford, is the “loss of transcendence” in religious thought. The rejected themes included the following: “Religious language refers to human experience and nothing else, God being humanity’s noblest creation” (no. 3); “Since what is human is good, evil can adequately be understood as failure to realize potential” (no. 7); “The world must set the agenda for the church. Social, political and economic programmes to improve the quality of life are ultimately normative for the church’s mission in the world” (no. 10); and “The question of hope beyond death is irrelevant or at best marginal to the Christian understanding of human fulfilment” (no. 13). Among the signers of the appeal were Elizabeth Bettenhausen, William Sloane Coffin, Avery Dulles, George W. Forell, Stanley Hauerwas, Thomas Hopko, George A. Lindbeck, Richard J. Mouw, Carl J. Peter, Alexander Schmemmann, George H. Tavard, Bruce Vawter and Robert Wilken.

The appeal received intense popular and scholarly attention, especially in the US and Europe. The general press opined that Hartford might portend "a new reformation", while scholars such as Wolfhart Pannenberg of Munich hailed it as a necessary critique of both fundamentalist obscurantism and liberal secularization. Hartford also provoked a number of counter-statements, notably the "Boston Affirmation", which claimed that Hartford had short-changed Christian social responsibility.

The Hartford signers met again in the fall of 1975 and issued a book of commentaries on the appeal, Against the World for the World. In addition to the text of the appeal, the book contains essays by Berger, Lindbeck, Dulles, Forell, Peter, Mouw, Schmemmann and Neuhaus. The text of the appeal is available also in A Documentary History of Religion in America.

RICHARD JOHN NEUHAUS

■ Against the World for the World, New York, Seabury, 1976 ■ E.S. Gaustad ed., A Documentary History of Religion in America, 2, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1983.

HEALING, HEALTH, HEALTH CARE

MANY OF THE laws of the ancient Hebrews dealt with health matters. Healing was a major activity of Jesus' earthly ministry. He sent his disciples out to teach, preach and heal (cf. Matt. 10:1). Christians since the days of Peter and Paul have been involved in various ways in health ministry, which figured prominently in the missionary enterprise of the last two centuries.

Concern about health care within the ecumenical movement has two main origins: the diakonia* and social service programmes of the churches and parishes, and the church-related health care activities that grew out of medical mission programmes. The former have old roots in the command to heal, and comprise everything from individual action to large hospitals and institutions for the aged and infirm. Many churches have ministries of deacons and deaconesses (see diaconate) as well as lay activities for ordinary parishioners. The underlying concepts of the churches' involvement in health have varied considerably, and the forms it has taken have been influenced by the prevailing health and social policies in the country of action or, in cases where such activities have been initiated by missionaries, in their country of origin.

A natural emphasis on health care as an essential part of the life and witness of every local Christian congregation has been often overshadowed by a preoccupation with larger institutions, which tend to become removed from the day-to-day life of the church and ordinary Christians. Such institutions have nevertheless been an important witness and sign of the kingdom of God in many societies and countries.

The churches' experience in the care of tuberculosis and leprosy patients and, more recently, persons affected by HIV/AIDS, for instance, has influenced not only church-related health care but also more globally important developments in this area. Many church-related programmes for mothers and children in rural areas of developing countries have become models for other agencies and governments. The churches' work in literacy and education has proved the positive effect of education on the health status of people. Care of the suffering and dying has provided examples of a humane approach to situations otherwise all too often neglected or insensitively handled. Many hospices for the terminally ill are church-related or largely staffed by Christians. Many individual Christians, on the other hand, are "voluntary workers" in hospitals and other care centres for the poor as a part of their service to Christ in the person of the weakest.

In 1964 and 1968 ecumenical consultations in Tübingen, Germany, organized by the WCC and the Lutheran World Federation, focused on medical missions in the third world and the role of the church in healing. The WCC created the Christian Medical Commission (CMC) in 1968 to assist the member churches to deal with questions being raised about these subjects and to encourage church-related health programmes to develop ecumenical cooperation.

In its early years CMC emphasized the promotion of primary health care as a means of redressing the imbalance between sophisticated and expensive institutional medical care for a few and hardly any for the rest. Primary health care became a global movement adopted by all World Health Organization members at a conference which CMC helped organize in 1978 at Alma Ata, in the former Soviet Union. At the same time, however, there was growing dissatisfaction with the so-called garage-mechanic approach in modern medicine. This was leading Christian groups in many countries to search for a health care which addressed more fully the needs of the whole person; and in 1978 CMC also embarked on a programme to study "Health, Healing and Wholeness" at the grassroots. In the years that followed, regional consultations in Trinidad, Honduras, Botswana, India, Indonesia, Papua New Guinea, Ecuador, USA, Hungary and Japan brought together over 800 pastors, theologians and health workers to discuss the Christian perspective of health.

In July 1989 in Moscow, the final report was presented to the WCC's central committee. The study affirmed clearly that health is not primarily medical. Although the modern "health industry" is using increasingly sophisticated and expensive technology, most of the world's health problems cannot be best addressed in this way. The causes of disease in the world are social, economic, political and spiritual, as well as bio-medical. Poverty is the number one cause of disease in many parts of the world. War and the resulting migrations of refugees is another major impediment to health. In affluent countries life-style choices increasingly ravage human bodies and the environment. These issues are not best addressed by medical technology, but require a focus on changing the underlying causes of illness, often related to values. The study report called on the churches to see this as part of their Christian mandate.

Also identified as important to health was the spiritual dimension. Unresolved guilt, anger and hopelessness are now being found by medical science to be potent factors in suppressing the body's powerful, health-controlling immune system, while loving relationships in community augment its effectiveness. Those in loving harmony with God and neighbour not only stay healthier but survive tragedy or suffering best and grow stronger in the process.

The increasing influence of technology in medicine has led to the depersonalization of medical care and an emphasis on curing rather than caring. The impressive achievements of science have led many of the churches to abdicate the Lord's mandate to be in healing ministry. Since wholeness of life is a central issue of the Christian gospel, the report called on the churches to play an important role in leading a movement towards the development of comprehensive health care systems in which all aspects of health have an appropriate place – with focus not only on saving lives but also on wholeness of life.

Today the churches' healing ministry ranges from large hospital systems to the laying on of hands in healing services. In some countries as much as half the medical services are provided by church-run facilities. The ecumenical movement has facilitated the formation of networks of ecumenical Christian health associations and helps coordinate their work, especially in Africa.

The ecumenical movement has also highlighted the HIV/AIDS* issue since the 1980s. In June 1986 a WCC study group recommended three main areas where the churches could respond: pastoral care, social ministry and education-prevention. Educational material was produced and disseminated, aimed at equipping health workers, pastors and teachers to assist communities in facing the HIV/AIDS epidemic. Further efforts have focused on theological and ethical reflection on aspects of the church's responsibility in responding adequately to the crisis.

In 1994, the WCC study on AIDS was commissioned by the central committee and in 1996 the statement "The Impact of HIV/AIDS and the Churches' Response" was adopted. The study document Facing AIDS: The Challenge, the Churches' Response (1997), was a clear call for a forthright and faithful response to HIV/AIDS from Christians and churches. Based on these documents, educational materials aimed at attitudinal change were developed and published in 1998. In 2000 and 2001 an HIV/AIDS curriculum for theological colleges and Bible schools with a special focus on Africa was also developed and the faculties of these institutes have been trained.

Apart from this educational process, the health activities of ecumenical networks have been devoted to helping communities understand the churches' policies in relation to the HIV/AIDS pandemic and encouraging positive action by church leaders; strengthening regional HIV/AIDS networks and initiatives; and advocating action of churches in the area of AIDS, internationally and regionally. The formation of the Ecumenical Advocacy Alliance (see World Council of Churches) and its focus on AIDS is an expression of this work.

Persistent age-old diseases like malaria and newer ones such as AIDS present major challenges to Christian organizations with limited resources. Constant political, social and economic changes continue to require new approaches to health and health care. Churches are pioneering health programmes that empower communities to change the conditions that are causing illness, and health care professionals, clergy and laity are discovering together new ways to create healing community in a broken world.

DAVID HILTON and MANOJ KURIAN

■ "Health, Faith and Healing" (= IRM, 356-57, 2001) ■ Ethical Challenges of Health and Healing Today, WCC, 1994.

HERESY

IN ITS ORIGINAL sense, the Greek hairesis meant choice or preference, hence, opinion, party. In the New Testament, the book of Acts uses it to mean "sect" – that of the Pharisees (15:5), that of the Sadducees (5:17), etc. Paul argues that the Christian church is not a sect but a "Way" (Acts 24:14). When divisions begin to emerge in the church (1 Cor. 11:19), he protests, considering heresies as the fruits of sin (Gal. 5:20; cf. Titus 3:10f.). In 2 Pet. 2:1 the term is used in the sense which came to be its general meaning in the history of the church: an error which leads to perversion of the faith* and corruption of the Christian life (cf. Matt. 7:15; Jude).

The church was made particularly aware of the idea of heresy by the serious crisis caused by the Arian heresy in the 4th century. Arius, a priest at Alexandria, denied the divinity of Christ and hence also the divine dimension of the church* and the reality of salvation.* He was condemned by the first ecumenical council (Nicea 325*), which recognized the Son of God as consubstantial with the Father, but the Arian heresy initiated a period of controversies and disturbances in the church and in the empire, with sequels which lingered until after the second ecumenical council (Constantinople 381*). As the church experienced several major heresies in the East (Nestorianism, monophysitism, monothelitism, etc.) and others in the West, Christian doctrine came to distinguish heresy on the one hand from schism,* which also involved separation from the community of the church, but over problems of discipline, ritual or obedience to hierarchical authority (canon 1 of Basil the Great) rather than doctrinal disagreement; and on the other hand from apostasy,* in that apostates leave the church community, abandoning the name of Christian and all their beliefs. Heretics, however, by remaining or calling themselves Christian yet rejecting certain truths of the faith, injure the unity* of the church by damaging the unity of doctrine which is one of its essential marks.

The church has thus traditionally dealt severely with heresy. The second canon of the second ecumenical council declares that heresy is to be punished by excommunication.* Ancient canon law* does not recognize baptism* and ordination* administered by heretics. Marriage with heretics is, in principle, forbidden. A bishop cannot be a heretic; in case of heresy, his people are called upon to withhold their obedience.

The traditional conception of heresy poses a number of problems in the quest for Christian unity and ecumenical dialogue. Are the causes of the division that took place between the churches of East and West in 1054, or that in the 16th century with the Protestant Reformation, to be called heresy or schism? Does the quest for Christian unity mean the restoration of dogmatic unity, or simply reconciliation among the churches? What is to be done in cases where the condemnation of doctrines also involved the condemnation of individuals who have subsequently been canonized by their own communities? This is the problem between the Chalcedonian and non-Chalcedonian Orthodox. Over time, theological reflection has reduced many of the Christological divergences between them, but the council of Chalcedon pronounced anathema* against Dioscorus of Alexandria and Severus of Antioch, who are venerated as saints* by the non-Chalcedonians, whereas the latter anathematized Pope Leo the Great, whom both Orthodox and Catholics regard as a great saint and father of the church.

The same problem arises over the question of how heretics are to be received into the traditional churches. In general the baptism received is recognized when administered by a community which recognizes this sacrament, the dogma of the Holy Trinity* and the divinity of Jesus Christ* (the sacrament of chrismation* is, however, then conferred on those who have not received it). The same recognition applies to the sacrament of orders received in communities which have this sacrament and also apostolic succession. But the Pidalion, the official canonical book of the Greek church, and the practice of Mount Athos demand re-baptism for those coming to Orthodoxy from other Christian confessions, which amounts to denying the church status of these communities and poses the problem of the oneness of Christian baptism.

In modern times, heresy can also be applied to attitudes which contradict the gospel teaching in life, e.g., apartheid in South Africa (see status confessionis).

ALEXIS KNIAZEFF

HERMENEUTICS

THE QUESTION of the interpretation of scripture* has been at the heart of the ecumenical dialogue (see dialogue, intrafaith) from the beginning of the modern search for Christian unity.* Ecumenical discussions of issues related to the interpretation of the Bible hold their own with recent developments in philosophical hermeneutics (Hans-Georg Gadamer, Paul Ricoeur et al.), which have in turn shaped the way in which Christian dialogue with and about scripture has come to be understood (e.g. the introduction of the terminology of "fusion of horizons"). These reciprocal effects of hermeneutical research and ecumenical dialogue can be seen not only in ongoing discussions of Faith and Order* but also in the internal discussions within Roman Catholicism and Protestantism as well as in the Anabaptist and Orthodox traditions.

DISCUSSIONS IN FAITH AND ORDER

In the years after the second world war, many ecumenists were optimistic that the Bible itself could provide the much-desired thematic unity needed for the recovery of unity among the churches. At a F&O conference held in Wadham College, Oxford, in 1949, the influence of "biblical theology" was clearly in evidence. The thematic unity of the Old and New Testaments was presupposed, and combined with a confessing theology to underwrite a renewed emphasis on ecumenism.

Within a decade, however, it was evident that the problem was more complex than Wadham had acknowledged. The theoretical consensus proved vulnerable at the point of practical application. Soon scholars again had to contend with the important ways in which ecclesial traditions (see Tradition and traditions) served to define biblical interpretation. Subsequent discussions of F&O began to focus on different understandings of the relation of scripture and Tradition, leading up to the report of the fourth world conference on F&O (Montreal 1963) on "Scripture, Tradition and traditions". The differentiation between the great Tradition (with a capital T) and particular ecclesial, confessional or denominational traditions (with a lower-case t) helped make way for the discussion of the diverse expressions of the one gospel. This development in turn made it possible to conceive of a more dynamic view of the relationship of Tradition and scripture. "Tradition" and "scripture" are not two independent entities. Rather, scripture can be understood to be the internal norm of Tradition, and Tradition itself must be seen to be the proper context for reading scripture: "Thus we can say that we exist as Christians by the Tradition of the gospel (the paradosis of the kerygma) testified in scripture, transmitted in and by the church through the power of the Holy Spirit. Tradition taken in this sense is actualized in the preaching of the word, in the administration of sacraments and worship, in Christian teaching and theology, and in mission and witness to Christ by the lives of the members of the church."

After Montreal, fresh attempts were made in F&O to explore the hermeneutical significance of these new proposals. About the same time, debates about the diversity of the Bible, particularly the diversity of ecclesiologies in the NT (expressed in the clash between Ernst Käsemann and Raymond Brown at Montreal), led to a deeper sense that the “biblical theology” consensus of Wadham was rather uncritical in its attribution of thematic unity to the biblical witness. Moreover, the interpretative rules of biblical exegesis* which Wadham had confidently announced no longer appeared adequate. The F&O Bristol report on “The Significance of the Hermeneutical Problem for the Ecumenical Movement” (1967) sought to eschew theological presuppositions, emphasizing the literary and human character of the Bible as a collection of writings. One of the results of this report was a clear shift in the way inspiration* of scripture is understood; no longer a matter of dogmatic presupposition, the inspiration of scripture comes to be understood as a conclusion of faith* which arises out of the church’s experience.

By the 1971 F&O Louvain report on “The Authority of the Bible”, the emphasis on diversity resulted in the proposal of “relational” understanding of biblical authority* in place of the earlier claims of a “material centre” (Sachmitte). In keeping with the claims of Montreal, the Louvain report refuses to specify a specific centre of scripture as the hermeneutical key for the interpretation of the whole but instead suggests the idea of a number of “relational centres” (Beziehungsmitten). These proposals led to speculation about the “prolongation” in the church of the “interpretative process” which can be found in scripture itself: as canonical scripture (see canon) itself is the product of fresh interpretations of earlier traditions, so the scriptures invite and require continuing interpretation in the church. By re-opening the issue of the nature of biblical authority, this proposal was also implicitly raising ecclesiological issues: e.g., who is given the authority to interpret scripture?

Discussions of the 1970s and 1980s focused on four specific issues: (1) “the significance of the Old Testament in relation to the New” (Loccum 1971); (2) the use of scripture in the liturgy* of the churches as well as in the devotional life of Christians (thereby counteracting a one-sidedly intellectualist approach to the Bible); (3) the growing awareness of the experience of Christians in Africa and Latin America, which emphasizes the contemporaneity of scripture interpretation in third-world contexts; and (4) the growing recognition of the greater variety of interpretative strategies, including structuralist literary criticism and the emerging discussion of political hermeneutics, as these in turn raise questions for biblical interpretation.

HERMENEUTICAL DEVELOPMENTS IN REPRESENTATIVE TRADITIONS

It will be helpful to outline separately the recent hermeneutical directions of various Christian traditions.

Orthodoxy.* The contribution of the Eastern Orthodox communions to the discussion of hermeneutical issues can be seen since 1945. Perhaps nowhere is this more visible than in the discussions of Tradition and the traditions (Montreal 1963). Not so well known is the important contribution to hermeneutics which a new generation of Orthodox biblical scholars, theologians and literary critics is making in “the Orthodox diaspora”.

For example, Benedict Englezakis has called attention to the complex relationship between Tradition and prophecy* (as mediated by the Holy Spirit) in the biblical witness. Rejecting a positivist application of historical criticism to the Bible, Englezakis argues that “the ‘riddle of the New Testament’ can never be solved except in the Holy Spirit. It is a historical fact that these documents claim to be incomprehensible outside the light of the Spirit, and this is the predicament of the New Testament historian” (New and Old in God’s Revelation, 1972) (see Holy Spirit).

John Breck’s The Power of the Word in the Worshipping Church (1986) and Thomas Hopko’s earlier influential essay “The Bible in the Orthodox Church” (in his All the Fullness of God, 1982) both exhibit the importance of the liturgical context for the investigation of hermeneutical issues. As Hopko has noted, it is one of the paradoxes of Orthodox hermeneutics that the Revelation of St John is not included in the cycle of readings for public worship, yet it is indispensable for explicating the liturgical setting of Orthodox worship.

One of the most promising contributions to emerge out of the Orthodox diaspora is that of Anthony Ugolnik. His essay on "An Orthodox Hermeneutic in the West" (St Vladimir's Theological Quarterly, 27, 1983) offers a striking account of the literary and theological divergence between Eastern and Western Christian use of the Bible. Contrary to the Western "textualist" tradition of hermeneutics, Ugolnik points to the communal or sobornost* dimension of Orthodox hermeneutics. In his The Illuminating Icon, Ugolnik has extended this line of argument, drawing on the works of Romanian theologian Dumitru Staniloae as well as the literary theories of Mikhail Bakhtin. Ugolnik's explication of the ways in which Tradition "lives" in the present as "dialogue" goes beyond the arguments of the previous generation of Orthodox theologians, even as it also draws on the writings of Vladimir Lossky, Alexander Schmemmann and Staniloae.

A further strength of Ugolnik's study is that he is attentive to the ways in which political ideology (East vs West polarities, etc.) frequently distorts discussions of hermeneutics as well as ecumenism. By calling attention to the problem in this way, Ugolnik moves the discussion of hermeneutics out of the common polarities of tradition vs scripture and Tradition vs the traditions, and relocates it in the "politics" of the ecclesial Tradition itself. Certainly, Ugolnik's explication of the communal character of Orthodox hermeneutics has great potential for defusing several tired debates in Western hermeneutics.

Roman Catholicism. Since 1970, theological ferment has characterized Roman Catholic discussion of hermeneutics. On the one hand, Joseph Cardinal Ratzinger has urged that "we must learn to read the documents which have been handed down to us according to the hermeneutics of unity". On the other hand, Latin American liberation theologians (Leonardo Boff, Gustavo Gutiérrez) have called for renewed emphasis on the ways in which scripture nurtures political responses to oppression. While fuller explication of both these approaches is needed, it is especially noteworthy that Catholic discussions of hermeneutics have also moved beyond the so-called two sources impasse (scripture vs Tradition). More dynamic categories of analysis also suggest opportunities for renewed hermeneutical investigation within both scripture and Tradition.

Among the most intriguing proposals is Nicholas Lash's "performative" hermeneutic, explicated in several essays in his Theology on the Way to Emmaus. Lash argues against the stark historical separation of "what the text meant" and "what the text means", preferring a more interactive understanding of exegesis and interpretation. He contends that the "fundamental form of the Christian interpretation of scripture is the life, activity and organization of the believing community... Christian practice as interpretative action consists in the performance of texts which are construed as 'rendering', bearing witness to, one whose words and deeds, discourse and suffering 'rendered' the truth of God in human history." Lash claims further that Christian living, "construed as the interpretative performance of scripture", is a collaborative enterprise. He asserts: "The poles of interpretation are not, in the last analysis, written texts... but patterns of human action: we talk of 'holy' scripture, and for good reason. And yet it is not, in fact, the script that is 'holy' but the people: the company that performs the script." Following up this reference with an analogy to King Lear, Lash concludes: "There are some texts the fundamental form of which is a full-time affair because it consists in their enactment as the social existence of an entire community. The scriptures, I suggest, are such texts... The performance of scripture is the life of the church" ("The Performance of Scripture", 42-44).

Catholic discussion of hermeneutical issues has also been enriched by the growing movement of church base communities* in Latin America, where the use of the Bible among the poor has coincided with the renewal of the church's witness. Ernesto Cardenal's four volumes of The Gospel in Solentiname recount the ongoing engagement with the Bible of the campesinos in a village in Nicaragua. While some of the most intriguing discussions of scripture in these volumes arise out of the villagers' puzzlement when they disagree about how to interpret scripture, they also demonstrate that scripture has become a source of unity in the struggle for freedom in Latin America, where Protestant and Catholic alike find themselves victims of oppression. More academically formulated has been the "materialist" reading of scripture associated with José Porfirio Miranda, or (less ideologically phrased) the "socio-economic" interpretation.

Post-Vatican II Roman Catholicism has also been encouraged by a remark of Pope John XXIII: "The substance of the ancient doctrine of the deposit of faith is one thing, and the way in which it is presented is another." In light of this distinction, Roman Catholics have increasingly been willing to extend the range of the hermeneutical question to include post-biblical pronouncements by the councils of the church and other instances of its magisterium (see teaching authority). Such re-assessment has in turn evoked new responses from Protestant ecumenists. For example, as a result of his experiences in Roman Catholic-Lutheran dialogue, George Lindbeck was stimulated to propose his ecumenically provocative "rule theory" of doctrine, according to which official dogmas* are to be principally taken as regulating Christian discourse rather than being regarded primarily in terms of their substantive content (The Nature of Doctrine, 1984).

Protestantism. The contribution of Rudolf Bultmann ("Is Exegesis without Presuppositions Possible?") preoccupied Protestant hermeneutical discussions for much of the second half of the 20th century. The so-called new hermeneutic of Erich Fuchs, Gerhard Ebeling and James M. Robinson led to increased concern about the relationship of the language of the Bible to the historical character of Christian existence. Bultmann's programme of "demythologization" was also attacked by theologians and biblical scholars influenced by Karl Barth for its lack of "biblical realism" (Hendrik Kraemer) as well as for the existentialist hermeneutic upon which it was built.

More recently, Peter Stuhlmacher has argued that historical criticism itself requires a kind of "hermeneutics of consent" in order to avoid the errors of positivism to which many 19th-century historical critics of the Bible fell prey. Taking Adolf Schlatter as a model and drawing on the insights of Ebeling and Gadamer among others, Stuhlmacher insists upon a "critical dialogue" with the biblical tradition. Such a dialogue will take into account not only the "history of the effects" (Gadamer's Wirkungsgeschichte) of the Bible as a text but also the sense in which "the biblical tradition supports, empowers and limits our life at one and the same time". This line of argument has been continued in Stuhlmacher's book Vom Verstehen des Neuen Testaments: Eine Hermeneutik (1986). Meanwhile the French Protestant Paul Ricoeur has recalled attention to the multivalence of symbols, which provokes thought ("le symbole donne à penser") and enjoins the "conflict of interpretations".

Along with the renewed sense of the critical task as arising from within the biblical tradition itself, there is in fact a growing awareness among Protestants of the inadequacy of the "modernist" attempt to identify the singular meaning of biblical pericopes. Not only is a case put forward for "The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis" (David Steinmetz, 1980; reprinted in his Memory and Mission, 1988), but there is also more interest among Protestants in overcoming the dichotomous separation of scripture from Tradition, and the gospel from the life of the church. In fact, recent developments point to a renewed awareness of the dialectical relationship of scripture and Tradition among Protestants, suggesting the kind of convergence noted by Cardinal Ratzinger's proposal for a "hermeneutics of unity".

Among several positive proposals worthy of note is Geoffrey Wainwright's discussion of "liturgy as a hermeneutical continuum" (Doxology, 1980), within which scripture is rightly interpreted for the life of the church. Wainwright's proposal is noteworthy because he applies the ancient principle of lex orandi, lex credendi in two directions at once: the primacy of scripture remains, but the ecumenical liturgical tradition serves to lend diachronic continuity to the synchronic experience of the church as it gathers to hear the word.

Anabaptism. The contribution of Anabaptist hermeneutics to the ecumenical movement only began to be noticed in the 1980s, but since the 1960s the scholarship of the US Mennonite theological ethicist John Howard Yoder and the Canadian historian and NT scholar William Klassen has prepared the way for this recognition. Building on the historical investigations of 16th-century Anabaptists, such as Klassen's study of Pilgram Marpeck, and on his own studies of Balthasar Hubmaier's writings, Yoder has demonstrated how the "rule of Christ" (Matt. 18:15-20) and the "rule of Paul" (1 Cor. 14:29) functioned hermeneutically among 16th-century Anabaptist communities. In so doing, he has also helped to dispel misunderstandings of the Anabaptist tradition while engaging in ecumenical dialogue regarding the use of scripture in ethics.

Yoder's careful explication of the Anabaptist "hermeneutics of community", arising out of such community-specific practices as the process of "binding and loosing", has also been provocative for theologians outside that tradition, even though his emphasis on the synchronic gathering of the ecclesia sometimes seems to call into question the viability of the diachronic dimension of the greater ecumenical tradition. Indeed, Yoder strongly dissents from the cultural model of "Tradition and traditions" which emerged from the discussions of the F&O commission at Montreal (1963). But at the same time, it must also be said that Yoder has called attention to the biblical mandate for visible unity of the church as a political community before the world. Particularly provocative are his proposals for the embodiment of such unity in "sacramental" (not to be confused with what he calls "sacramentalist") practices such as the eucharist, baptism and the "fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4:13), which exemplifies the gathered ecclesia in ministry.

SUMMARY

As the foregoing summary of developments indicates, given the polyphony of voices which the ecumenical movement comprises, the various ecclesial traditions are nevertheless converging in their awareness of the importance of dialogic unity in hermeneutical investigations. As Ellen Flessemann-van Leer notes: "The ecclesiological counterpart of this renewed emphasis on biblical unity is the insistence that the unity of the churches must find visible expression." This assessment also highlights the source of convergence as well as divergence with respect to the question of hermeneutics.

In the face of continuing disagreements, there are increasing indications of agreement. Among the several noteworthy hermeneutical convergences is the common appreciation in the proposals of Lash, Ugolnik, Wainwright and Yoder for the "ecclesial locus" of hermeneutics. Significantly, each has gone beyond the preoccupation with the "text" of scripture in an effort to understand the interactive dimensions of scripture and liturgy, ethics and ecclesiology, politics and interpretation.

In addition, one can detect a growing sense of convergence among the representative traditions on the relationship of ecclesial unity to hermeneutics. Apart from the real differences in orientation in the different traditions in the ecumenical movement, the recent proposals for a hermeneutics of "unity" (Ratzinger), of "consent" (Stuhlmacher), of "peoplehood" (Yoder) and the Orthodox conception of "sobornost" community (Ugolnik) all presuppose, with varying degrees of emphasis, that the context of the church as a hermeneutical community is crucial. While none of these proposals suggests that all current hermeneutical issues have been resolved, these convergences are serving to re-orient the hermeneutical debate itself towards a dialogue that is interdisciplinary as well as interdenominational.

This circumstance also helps to put into perspective the previous shifts in the ecumenical discussion of hermeneutics. The initial discussions of the F&O movement at Wadham College (1949) were primarily nurtured by the contributions of historical-critical scholarship of the Bible. As is widely recognized, the increasing participation of representatives of the Orthodox tradition (Montreal 1963) has led to a more balanced appreciation for Tradition in relation to scripture, but this rediscovery of the ecclesial locus of hermeneutics in the 1980s has gone beyond the contributions of the Orthodox and Anabaptist traditions. In the process, scholars both within and outside the ecumenical movement have also discovered links between previously disparate disciplines of biblical studies, historical theology, political theory and literary hermeneutics. Through such interdisciplinary studies a renewed awareness of the “unsearchable riches” of the gospel as the source and end of visible unity for the church is emerging.

As a result of this interdisciplinary ferment, as well as newly articulated missional concerns, recent F&O discussions have focused on the question of “ecumenical hermeneutic”. This initiative has been enabled by new interventions such as that of Anton Houtepen, who distinguishes between two needs: “a hermeneutics of tradition”, an agreed-upon set of criteria for determining “the faith delivered to the saints”, and “a hermeneutics of communion”, a common recognition of the essential elements of Christian communion, the “sharing in the gifts of God” manifested in prayer, solidarity and the bonds of love within and beyond the local congregation, including relationships with other local communities of the universal church. By carefully distinguishing and relating the synchronic and diachronic modes of hermeneutical enquiry, Houtepen’s proposal may point the way towards how to re-frame vexing issues in transconfessional dialogue.

At the fifth world conference on F&O (Santiago de Compostela 1993), a variety of confessional and mission voices from Africa, Asia, the Pacific and Latin America called for an “ecumenical hermeneutic”. This concern has arisen less out of questions about classical confessional controversies than it has been evoked by specific missional concerns about how the gospel may be presented – and received – in newly evangelized areas in ways that respect local cultures while also seeking their transformation.

The call for an ecumenical hermeneutic has brought about renewed conversation in F&O about intercultural dynamics as well as ecclesiological issues. A short-term study resulted in a report intended to stimulate more detailed work at all levels and in all contexts of the church as an hermeneutical community: A Treasure in Earthen Vessels: An Instrument for an Ecumenical Reflection on Hermeneutics (1998). On the interconfessional front, a case study can be found in Wainwright’s essay “Towards an Ecumenical Hermeneutic”

(1995), which compares the hermeneutic principles set forth in the new Catechism of the Roman Catholic Church with the principles of interpretation found in the works of John Wesley. Wainwright shows surprising areas of convergence on key issues of interpretation. Such transconfessional comparisons, which highlight commonalities while also taking seriously ecclesiological differences, may provide a way forward in the quest for an ecumenical hermeneutic. In the meantime, as a variety of ecumenists have pointed out, the development of a common lectionary (see liturgical texts, common), which provides a practical means for common study, constitutes an achievement whose significance should not be overlooked in calling the churches to grasp what it might yet mean for Christians to read scripture in communion.

See also Bible, its role in the ecumenical movement; church; New Testament and Christian unity; Old Testament and Christian unity.

MICHAEL G. CARTWRIGHT

- P. Bouteneff & D. Heller eds, Interpreting Together: Essays in Hermeneutics, WCC, 2001
- E. Cardenal, The Gospel in Solentiname, 4 vols, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1976-79
- R.J. Coggins & J.L. Houlden eds, A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, London, SCM Press, 1990
- E. Flesseman-van Leer, The Bible: Its Authority and Interpretation in the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1980
- S. Fowl & L. Gregory Jones eds, Reading in Communion: Scripture and Ethics in Christian Life, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1991
- A.W.J. Houtepen, “The Faith of the Church through the Ages: Ecumenism and Hermeneutics”, Bulletin: Centro Pro Unione, 44, 1993
- N. Lash, “The Performance of Scripture”, in Theology on the Way to Emmaus, N. Lash ed., London, SCM Press, 1986
- I. Mosala, Biblical Hermeneutics and Black Theology in South Africa, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1989
- J. Ratzinger, Church, Ecumenism and Politics, Middlegreen, UK, St Paul, 1988
- L. Sanneh, Translating the Message: The Missionary Impact on Culture, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1989
- P. Stuhlmacher, Historische Kritik und theologische Schriftauslegung (ET Historical Criticism and Theological Interpretation of Scripture), London, SPCK, 1979
- A. Ugolnik, The Illuminating Icon, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1989
- G. Wainwright, Doxology, London, Epworth, 1980
- G. Wainwright, “Towards an Ecumenical Hermeneutic: How Can All Christians Read the Scriptures Together?”, Gregorianum, 76, 4, 1995 ■ J.H. Yoder, The Priestly Kingdom, ch. 1, Notre Dame IN, Univ. of Notre Dame Press, 1984.

HIERARCHY OF TRUTHS

THIS EXPRESSION first appeared in the Second Vatican Council’s Decree on Ecumenism* (1964): “In ecumenical dialogue, when Catholic theologians join with separated brethren in common study of the divine mysteries, they should, while standing fast by the teaching of the church, pursue the work with love for the truth, with charity and with humility. When comparing doctrines, they should remember that there exists an order or ‘hierarchy of truths’ in Catholic doctrine, since they vary in their relation to the foundation of the Christian faith. Thus the way will be open whereby this kind of ‘fraternal emulation’ will incite all to a deeper awareness and a clearer expression of the unfathomable riches of Christ (cf. Eph. 3:8)” (11). Oscar Cullmann regarded the passage as “the most revolutionary” to be found in the 16 Vatican II documents.

The concept aroused hopes for a more refined methodology in the ecumenical dialogue, for the respectful evaluation of Christian traditions other than one’s own, for the enhanced renewal of one’s own church’s thought and action and for common witness* by churches in real but imperfect communion* with one another. But more detailed clarification of the expression and its implications was urged by W.A. Visser ’t Hooft and favoured by John Paul II during the pope’s visit to the WCC in June 1984. Thus the sixth report of the WCC/RCC Joint Working Group* (1990) included an appendix on “The Notion of ‘Hierarchy of Truths’ – An Ecumenical Interpretation”.

Because faith* is organic, revealed truths are not placed side by side in a static listing of propositions, but are organized around and point to a centre or foundation – the person and mystery of Jesus Christ,* our salvation.* Though equally true, beliefs have greater or less consequence to the extent they relate to this foundation. Grace* has more importance than sin,* sanctifying grace more than actual grace, the resurrection* of Christ more than his childhood, the mystical aspect of the church* more than its juridical; the church’s liturgy* more than private devotions.

Furthermore, the mystery of Christ is not only that which Christians believe but primarily the life which they share and experience. Differences about the ordering of revealed truths around this central mystery and about their expression in the actual life of a church are among the reasons for Christian divisions, either because of a failure to acknowledge legitimate diversity of expression, theological reflection and devotional practice or because of basic differences concerning what is and is not revealed (see revelation).

By better understanding how other Christians hold, express and live the faith, each confessional tradition can be led to a better understanding also of itself and begin to see its own formulations of doctrine in a broader perspective. The churches together can clarify the foundational content of what, in common witness, should be proclaimed in word and life in a way that speaks to the religious needs of the human spirit.

In the current ecumenical dialogue on divisive ethical issues, some have proposed a methodology of the “hierarchy of ethical truths and values”.

TOM STRANSKY

- “The Ecumenical Dialogue on Moral Issues: Potential Sources of Common Witness or of Divisions”, ER, 48, 2, 1996 ■ W. Henn, “The Hierarchy of Truths Twenty Years Later”, Theological Studies, 48, 1988 ■ G. Tavad, “Hierarchia Veritatum”, Theological Studies, 32, 1971
- WCC/RCC Joint Working Group, The Notion of “Hierarchy of Truths” – an Ecumenical Interpretation, appendix to sixth report of the JWG, Geneva, WCC, 1990.

HINDU-CHRISTIAN DIALOGUE

ACCORDING to an old and honoured tradition, contacts between Hinduism and Christianity go back to the beginnings of Christianity, when the apostle Thomas preached the gospel in India and suffered martyrdom.* In later centuries the Thomas Christians were given certain privileges in the Hindu kingdoms of the south and formed one of the self-contained communities within Indian society.

The Western "discovery" of India brought about a major missionary effort by Roman Catholic and later by various Protestant churches, leading to the formation of new Indian Christian communities along Western denominational lines. The newly converted Indian Christians were taught to break all links with their Hindu past and to consider the religion of their ancestors as inferior, if not as an outright invention of the devil. Similarly, many Hindus had a contempt for all non-Hindus, believing that contact with them would be polluting. Courageous individuals, such as Ram Mohan Roy and Brahmbandhab Upadhyaya in the 19th century, who suggested a mutual rapprochement, were largely ignored or even opposed by their fellow Hindus and fellow Christians.

In the early 1930s philosopher-statesman Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan (1889-1985) persuasively pleaded for a "dialogue of religions". He was perhaps influenced by his teacher and mentor, A.G. Hogg of the Madras Christian College, although Radhakrishnan frequently complained about the negative criticism which Hinduism had received at the hands of other missionary teachers. Only in the early 1960s was the dialogue taken up seriously by Christians. Two Christian scholars deserve special credit: Paul Devanandan, the founder-director of the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society in Bangalore, and Jacques-Albert Cottat, Swiss ambassador to India from 1960 to 1964. Devanandan lectured and wrote about inter-religious dialogue long before the term became fashionable and helped to institutionalize it at the centre and in its bulletin, Religion and Society. Cottat undertook a major lobbying effort among the Indian Roman Catholic bishops to persuade the Vatican to establish what became known as the Secretariat for Non-Christians (established by Pope Paul VI in 1964), re-named under Pope John Paul II the Pontifical Council for Inter-religious Dialogue. He also assembled what came to be known as the Cottat group, a gathering of about 20 Christians from different denominations who shared an interest in Hindu-Christian dialogue. The Jyotiniketan ashram, established by Murray Rogers near Bareilly, emerged as a kind of central point for dialogue conferences between 1960 and 1970, especially in North India.

Under the leadership of Stanley Samartha of the Church of South India, the WCC Sub-unit on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies, established in 1971, became a major promoter of Hindu-Christian dialogue. Like the Vatican Secretariat for Non-Christians, the WCC Dialogue sub-unit had to contend with a certain amount of opposition from more conservative, traditionally mission-oriented circles within the churches and a certain misunderstanding on the part of Hindus, but the very existence of both signalled a new chapter in Hindu-Christian relations. The Christian side in Hindu-Christian dialogue meetings usually included representatives of a variety of denominations; similarly, the numerous dialogue centres which sprang up in India, though often run by particular Christian denominations, were nevertheless ecumenical in their approach to Hindu-Christian dialogue.

From the early 1970s onwards a new dimension of Hindu-Christian dialogue developed with the growth and spread of Hindu missions in the West. Whereas the Ramakrishna mission addressed mainly intellectuals and propagated a kind of universal religion, Hare Krishna and similar movements brought a new kind of sectarian Hinduism to the West, attracting young people to a life-style rooted in a particular Hindu tradition. Although the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) encountered some hostility in conservative Christian quarters, several of its leading members have actively sought dialogue with Christianity. Saunaka Rishi Das, editor of ISKCON Communications Journal, organized successful Vaisnava-Christian dialogue meetings in the UK and the USA in 1996. Subhananda Das, one of the most active promoters of dialogue, especially on a scholarly level, arranged a memorable three-day seminar in New Vrindaban in 1985 and also founded a review to promote academic dialogue between the Hare Krishna movement and Christianity.

The Christian ashram movement, including Jyotiniketan, now led by Franciscan friars, the Krist-Seva ashram in Pune, and Saccidanandashram, in Thanirpalli, founded by Fr Mochanin and Swami Abhishiktananda (Fr Henri Lesaux, OSB), later under the guidance of Bede Griffiths, is essentially dedicated to Hindu-Christian dialogue in an attempt to integrate Hindu sannyasa into Christianity. After the death of two great pioneers of Hindu-Christian dialogue in India – Swami Abhishiktananda in 1973 and Fr Bede Griffiths in 1994 – friends and admirers have formed associations to keep their memories alive and to continue their work. The Abhishiktananda Society's bulletin Setu includes useful information on Hindu-Christian dialogue activities and reviews of publications. Notable individual efforts to engage in a theological Hindu-Christian dialogue were made by Bishop A.J. Appasamy (Christianity as Bhaktimarga) and Raymond Panikkar (The Unknown Christ of Hinduism). Conferences sponsored by Oratio Dominica in Freiburg, several symposia organized by the De Nobili research library, associated with the Indology department of the University of Vienna, and an international conference sponsored by the Religions-theologisches Institut St Gabriel, Mödling, have brought Hindu and Christian scholars together to reflect on basic concerns of their traditions in a spirit of dialogue and enquiry. Although global in scope, the 1993 Chicago Parliament of Religions was also a memorable event in Hindu-Christian dialogue due to the presence of representatives from both traditions.

A 1987 Hindu-Christian dialogue organized by the Calgary Institute for the Humanities led to the foundation of the Hindu-Christian Studies Bulletin, which serves as a vehicle for an ecumenical Hindu-Christian dialogue. Another source of information is the thrice-yearly Bulletin of Monastic Inter-religious Dialogue, published by the North American board for East-West dialogue. And the forthcoming multi-volume Encyclopedia on Hinduism, whose general editor Seshagiri Rao is himself an active promoter of Hindu-Christian dialogue, not only carries contributions relating to Hindu-Christian dialogue, but also includes several Christians among its editors.

Both Hinduism and Christianity are fragmented into numerous denominations and sects. Hindu-Christian dialogue not only leads to an encounter between Hindus and Christians but also acts as a strong incentive to Hindu and Christian ecumenism. By meeting the other, each side is reminded of its own roots and original beliefs, over against which later events and developments leading to fissions and divisions may appear relatively unimportant. Such dialogue perhaps will lead to a more essential and more relevant Christianity and Hinduism.

KLAUS K. KLOSTERMAIER

- R. Boyd, Indian Christian Theology, Madras, CLS, 1976
- H. Coward ed., Hindu-Christian Dialogue, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1990
- P. Devanandan, Preparation for Dialogue, Bangalore, CISRS, 1964
- K. Klostermaier, Hindu and Christian in Vrindaban, London, SCM Press, 1969
- V. Mataji, Living with Hindus. Hindu-Christian Dialogues: My Experiences and Reflections, Delhi, ISPCK, 1999
- V. Mataji ed., Shabda-Shakti-Sangam, Bangalore, NBCLC, 1995
- S. Radhakrishnan, Eastern Religions and Western Thought, Oxford, Clarendon, 1939
- M.M. Thomas, The Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance, London, SCM Press, 1969
- M.M. Thomas, Risking Christ for Christ's Sake: Towards an Ecumenical Theology of Pluralism, WCC, 1987.

HISTORIC PEACE CHURCHES

HISTORIC Peace Churches (HPC) is a term popularized in 1935 to refer to the Church of the Brethren,* the Religious Society of Friends* (Quakers), and the Mennonite* churches which share a common witness against war. The three traditions date from different times, the Mennonites from the radical Reformation in the 16th century, the Friends from radical puritanism in the 17th century, and the Brethren from radical pietism in the 18th century. Yet all have held an official witness that peace is an essential aspect of the gospel and all have rejected the use of force and violence. Their common position on peace has brought the three traditions into many cooperative relationships, not only during times of war but also in worldwide service and relief projects.

In 1935 the conference of historic peace churches in North America, was held at North Newton, Kansas, USA, one in a series of meetings of pacifist denominations. The term "historic peace churches" was coined in part to distinguish biblical-based peaceful non-resistance from political pacifism, which was becoming a popular movement during the time between the two world wars. At the Newton meeting, which included both theological and political concerns, participants felt that cooperation was urgent because of the growing international crisis, and that they had an obligation to share their message with other Christian bodies and with the United States government. Delegations were formed to visit different denominations and President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and a continuation committee was set up to promote peace concerns cooperatively. With the advent of military conscription in the USA in 1940, peace-church leaders worked to set up an alternative to military service for their members who were conscientious objectors: civilian public service. The work of the continuation committee was extended to Europe after the second world war, most notably through the series of conferences on “The Lordship of Christ over Church and State”, often referred to as the Puidoux conferences after the site of the first meeting in Switzerland.

When the World Council of Churches (WCC) was formed in Amsterdam in 1948, several of the HPC were founding members – the Church of the Brethren, Five Years Meeting (now Friends United Meeting), Friends General Conference (all from the USA), Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, Algemene Doopsgezinde Societeit (Dutch Mennonites) and the Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden (German Mennonites). The first WCC assembly stated that “war is contrary to the will of God”, described three varying positions held by Christians, and urged theological reflections on the issues involved. The continuation committee took seriously this call, especially when a request came specifically from the WCC general secretary, W. A. Visser ‘t Hooft. In the booklet War Is Contrary to the Will of God (1951) each tradition submitted its statement, adding a fourth from the International Fellowship of Reconciliation.* Ecumenical leaders expressed appreciation for the statements but challenged the peace church leaders again. If the HPC could not formulate a common position, they could hardly expect a body as diverse as the WCC to come to agreement. The continuation committee went back to work and in 1953 presented a joint statement, “Peace Is the Will of God”. This was replaced in 1991 by the HPC in the USA, joined by the Fellowship of Reconciliation, in “A Declaration on Peace: In God’s People the World’s Renewal Has Begun”.

Service agencies of the HPC were instrumental in organizing EIRENE to provide openings for alternative service for European conscientious objectors, especially in developing countries. Volunteers from the HPC have served in many peace and service-oriented organizations in both Western and Eastern Europe. Members of these churches continue to be active in ecumenical activities, in particular through the WCC Programme to Overcome Violence and the Decade to Overcome Violence (DOV). In 2001, an HPC consultation was held in Bienenberg, Switzerland, on “Theology and Culture: Peace-making in a Globalized World” as a theological contribution to the DOV and an important marker in continuing ecumenical dialogue among the three HPC traditions and with the wider Christian fellowship.

See also first and radical Reformation churches.

SARA SPEICHER and DONALD F. DURNBAGH

- D.F. Durnbaugh, Fruit of the Vine: A History of the Brethren, 1708-1995, Elgin IL, Brethren, 1997
- D.F. Durnbaugh ed., On Earth Peace: Discussions on War/Peace Issues between Friends, Mennonites, Brethren and European Churches, 1935-1975, Elgin IL, Brethren, 1978
- F. Enns, Friedenskirche in der Ökumene: Ekklesiologische Wurzeln einer Ethik der Gewaltfreiheit, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2002
- M.E. Miller & B.N. Gengerich eds, The Church’s Peace Witness, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1994.

HISTORY

THE GREAT Abrahamic religions – Judaism, Christianity and Islam – are religions of history (Geschichtsreligionen) with a definite direction towards the future, whereas the basic aim of the great religions in the East is to establish an inner and outer equilibrium within nature, society or the human person. Abraham was called by God to leave his home and country and to find a new land, to become a great nation and to be a blessing to many (Gen. 12:1-3). In this primordial and archetypal story are found the basic categories which have created and sustained the Judaeo-Christian faith* and are fundamental for its understanding of history: promise and covenant,* expectation and experience, memory and hope.*

BIBLICAL PERSPECTIVES

From its earliest to its latest parts, the Hebrew Bible reflects a widening understanding of history, which corresponds to a widening understanding of God's work. The ancient memories of Yahweh's guiding the destinies of the patriarchs came alive in the experience of Israel's liberation from Egypt. The ancient covenants with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are realized again in Yahweh's covenant with Israel in the revelation of the torah. From the book of Joshua to the book of Nehemiah, the story of Israel and its rulers is told. Israel's prophets are Yahweh's witnesses, interpreting, judging and guiding this history. As one follows that witness from Nathan to Daniel, Yahweh is understood not only as the Lord of Israel's history but as the Lord of all peoples. Not least, the creation* accounts and related texts see Yahweh as the maker of heaven and earth, thereby placing the history of the universe under God's rule. Finally, the apocalyptic literature, which appears with Daniel and continues in the intertestamental period, envisages Yahweh as the Creator of a new creation and, therefore, of time beyond this earthly time.

This widening awareness of history is intimately related to Israel's experiencing God as continuously creating, calling, guiding, judging, caring. As a consequence of this experience of God, time is discovered as flowing, moving, unique in its possibilities, not closed in eternally recurrent circles; in short, it is eschatological. Yahweh discloses himself as the sense and meaning of time: I AM WHO I AM or I WILL BE WHAT I WILL BE (Ex. 3:14). This name shows history as the modus praesentiae Dei.

History is therefore not simply regarded in terms of a mechanical sequence from past through present to the future but is considered an open, inspired process in which the future holds in store the unfulfilled promises of the past. The present is guided by experiences of past events and expectations of things to come. Faith moves between memory and hope. Life is shaped by judgment and redemption. Time in its eschatological openness calls forth the categories of the possible and the not-yet, of change and renewal.

Israel's understanding of history as the realm of the living God is not simply linear. In its eschatological character, it also contains elements of a cyclical understanding of time. The sabbath is a recurrent time of rest (Ex. 20:10), the sabbaticals are years of restoration (Lev. 25:1-7) and the great year of jubilee is seen as a time of re-creating the original conditions of life for humanity and nature alike (Lev. 25:11). Since history is seen not as an independent entity (this explains why there is no term for it in the Bible) but as a perspective of God's presence, it is conceived not simply as a fatalistic movement forward but as God's time to create, destroy and regenerate. The land and the people are meant to live in God's own rhythm of working and resting.

Nowhere is Christianity more obviously rooted in the Jewish faith than in its understanding of history. What the New Testament says about God incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth (see incarnation) is based on Israel's faith in God's time-creating presence and power. The specific Christian contribution to this concept of history is found in the cross and resurrection* of Jesus Christ.* The Christian faith in the resurrected Christ implies an understanding of history as participation in the process of resurrection. Since in Christ the fullness of God is revealed, all creation shares in the promise of a resurrected life, or life eternal.

So history is placed in the dimension of radicalized eschatology: "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21:5). Christ is not the end of history but the final and decisive revelation of what Israel had learned to believe: God as history's ultimate meaning, God disclosed as love, sacrificial love as warranted by the life and death of Jesus, and love transcending death, as manifested on Easter morning.

The Christ-event is not only a hermeneutical clue in order to find a solution to the age-old question of the meaning of time and of existence. It is at the same time an invitation to participate in it as trustworthy stewards (cf. 1 Cor. 4:1) in the unfolding of God's kingdom.* As history is the realm of God's presence, it is also the realm of discipleship for the believers.

MODERN WESTERN CIVILIZATION

In the early and medieval church, history was largely understood in terms of God's pedagogy of humanity. The four-kingdoms concept of the prophet Daniel served as a way of ordering history in a typological sense. The chiliastic concepts of history (as taught e.g. by Joachim de Fiore) follow a similar typological interpretation of past events. Their aim is to proclaim a message for the present; history thus becomes a tool for specific interests, whether political, apologetic or soteriological.

As a discipline in its own right, history takes shape only within the modern civilization, the Neuzeit. The origins of this epoch are certainly varied. But it can be safely said that with the Renaissance period a great historical process began which first spread through Europe, and from there to the Americas, before reaching out to all parts of the globe in the 19th and especially in the 20th century. Therefore, it is here called the modern Western civilization. It is a process of unprecedented discoveries, conquests and expansions which led to the formation of great colonial empires and super-powers and, even more significantly, revolutionized the sciences that were known and created new ones. Their results, coupled with new technologies, economic methods and communication skills, have drastically shaped the world of today.

It is within this process – which may justly be called the human project of “dominion over the earth” – that the idea of history has developed and turned into a scientific discipline of its own. And inasmuch as the international connectedness of peoples and cultures became more and more apparent, so history took on a universal scope as Universalgeschichte. An impressive example of this is A.J. Toynbee's A Study of History, which endeavours to describe the societies and cultures of the earth.

In the modern Western civilization, the human being (in the form of elites, or peoples, or classes) is the subject of history. The world of nature and also the human body are considered mere “resources”, objectified and instrumentalized matter to be dealt with at will by the human mind.

Philosophers like Karl Löwith have interpreted this project of dominium terrae as the secularized adaptation of the biblical view of history (see secularization). Humanity itself is put in the place of God; it no longer sees itself as part of creation but as creator. It is a decidedly anthropocentric Weltanschauung. The biblical notion of promise has been replaced by the belief in unlimited progress, eschatological openness by evolutionary necessity.

By the end of the 20th century, however, it had become apparent that this great project of dominion over the earth, which began 500 years ago, has run into a deep crisis. The economic relationships and structures of the world are marked by deep injustices causing hunger, impoverishment and marginalization in large parts of the earth. The development of nuclear bombs has led to massive overkill capacities which threaten all life with annihilation. The misuse of the natural resources and the contamination of air, water and soil have produced irrevocable ecological damage. Humankind is facing global catastrophes. While attempting to be the maker of its own future, humanity ends up being the possible maker of its death. No wonder, then, that for many people the belief in progress has turned into despair, cynicism or hedonism.

HISTORY IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

The modern ecumenical movement began in the second half of the 19th century, and young women and men in Western (mostly Protestant) churches took the lead. So this movement is part of what we have called the great project of discovery and expansion. In this case it is the discovery of the oikoumene, the whole inhabited earth, as one great realm of operation. It is the discovery of the church* of Jesus Christ as a global phenomenon, the una sancta ecclesia, transcending all denominational lines and limitations. It is the discovery of a universal calling to bring Christ to all the peoples who have not yet heard of him.

The ecumenical movement can thus be seen as presenting a new level of consciousness gaining ground in the churches. A new perspective appeared, in which the histories of the churches led towards the one history of the one church of Christ on earth. This vision was first grasped by young people who formed international organizations such as the YMCA, the YWCA and the World Student Christian Federation. They provided the generation of leaders who formed the ecumenical movement.

John R. Mott (1865-1955) can be singled out as the most significant of them. Mott was keenly aware of the process by which the Western powers of trade, industry, science and technology were opening up the world. But he interpreted this process in biblical terms. Therefore he considered it as God's way to create the providential kairos for the world to hear the good news of Christ. His famous programme of "the evangelization of the world in this generation" reflected his awareness of this unique historical opportunity as an irrevocable moment in God's plan for history. Now was the time to win the world for Christ, lest other faiths, religious or secular, use that kairos. Mott saw clearly that the other great religions were soon to become active in missionary work. Above all, he considered rising communism as the most dangerous competitor of Christianity for shaping the course of world history.

While the founding generation of the ecumenical movement shared that great optimism about progress, they understood it in a theological perspective. It was God* leading the histories of the peoples towards one great world history. The discovery of the oikoumene was the discovery of God's purpose and providence.* To work for it was a supreme and timely act of obedience and discipleship. The fervent conviction Dieu le veut, "God wills it", transformed itself into three main ecumenical imperatives: the imperative for mission* (represented in the International Missionary Council*), for church unity (represented by the Faith and Order* movement), and for peace* (represented in the Life and Work* movement and the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches*).

From its inception the ecumenical movement has tried to be firmly rooted in the Bible and to follow the Christocentric orientation which appeared as early as the YMCA basis adopted in Paris in 1855: "To confess Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures." This Christocentricity has had a critical influence both in the understanding of the churches' role and in the perception of the world. From the start the ecumenical movement understood itself as a fellowship of believers calling their churches to repentance and obedience and approaching the affairs of the worldly powers with prophetic criticism. History was conceived not only as the realm of human activity but equally importantly as the realm in which God was working out his purpose. Hence different concepts of salvation history* played an important part in understanding this relationship.

The first assembly of the WCC (Amsterdam 1948) chose a theme which illuminates this basic orientation: "Man's Disorder and God's Design". This formulation reflects the faith in God's work in history as well as critical awareness of the world's disorders. The Paris basis appears again in the constitution of the WCC (see WCC, basis of), and with it the Christocentric orientation was firmly established. Its concept of history was universal. This Christocentric universality can easily be detected in all of the Council's varied activities.

This frame of thought also governs most of the world confessional groupings, such as the Lutheran World Federation* or the World Alliance of Reformed Churches.* But it surfaced most explicitly in the Second Vatican Council (see Vatican Councils I and II). Its Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, Dei Verbum, spells out a linear concept of salvation history. This process of salvation* finds its visible historical expression in the (Catholic) church as the human community of salvation (Lumen Gentium). The other religions of humankind are seen as preparatory approximations to this process of salvation (Nostra Aetate). Finally, Vatican II sets this approach in the context of human history in general: Gaudium et Spes speaks of one great organic process leading all history towards its one common goal in God.

Within the theological work of the WCC, two Faith and Order projects have made a significant attempt to clarify the relationship between the mission of the ecumenical movement and contemporary historical awareness.

The first, "God in Nature and History" (1967), connects belief in God's providential guidance of history with the modern concept of evolution and tries to integrate the finality of Christ with the universal nature-history process (see nature). Clearly influenced by visionary thinkers like Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, who considered the coming of Christ the one great telos of the history of the planet earth, the F&O paper emphasizes the convergent processes in the world and places the ecumenical movement firmly in it. The ambivalence of historical progress, e.g. in the area of medicine, is acknowledged, but that this same ambivalence also pertains to the development of philosophies and theologies of history is not realized.

The second study project was conducted during the 1970s under the title "Unity of the Church and Unity of Humankind". In some ways it was the continuation of "God in Nature and History", but now the attempt was made to look more carefully at the role of the churches in the historic process of increasing global interdependence. The Uppsala assembly in 1968 had boldly spoken of the church "as the sign of the coming unity of mankind", but soon thereafter interdependence began to unfold its unjust, exploitative and marginalizing character. At the same time the diversity between the churches received more attention, pushing the idea of organic unity into the background. The belief in a positive convergence of all evolutionary processes began to vanish. By the time of the Nairobi assembly (1975), the key points of the F&O study had changed considerably. The unity of the church, of humankind and of creation were now derived from the faith in the Trinitarian unity of God (see Trinity), thus replacing the earlier, more uncritical relation between evolution and salvation.

Under the impact of the growing anguish of large sectors of the world's population (the third world), Uppsala had also sharpened ethical awareness by underlining the option for the poor* and the oppressed (obviously in relation to the liberation theology* emerging during those years in Latin America). During the 1980s the threefold threat to life on earth led to a further widening of the theological and ethical scope. The call of the Vancouver assembly (1983) for the churches to covenant together for justice, peace and the integrity of creation marks the end of a merely anthropocentric and social concept of ecumenical ethics. The Christocentric orientation does not imply an anthropocentric concept of salvation. In fact, if Christ is understood in cosmic terms – a dimension present at the New Delhi assembly in 1961 but largely overlooked since then – his saving work extends to all of creation.

In summary, the ecumenical movement at the beginning of the 21st century must realize that the anthropocentric paradigm of modern civilization has come to an end. In view of the threat of an end of history brought about by human beings, it will have to re-think its understanding of history. To deny human responsibility and to resort to a fundamentalist apocalyptic view, as certain churches and evangelical groupings suggest, will not do justice to humanity's unique calling within the whole of creation. Once creation is understood as a community of equal dignity and rights for all living things, human beings will see themselves no longer as the centre of history but as trustees of a history which belongs to the earth.

The tension remains that humanity has entered the stage in which it must assume the responsibility for the future of history, even though the destructive forces set in motion appear to be beyond control. But precisely on that account, the notion of human beings as stewards and trustees of the community of life may help to balance this dilemma, for it reduces them to their proper place in the commonwealth of creation and keeps them accountable to God, who remains the ultimate source of history and its goal.

See also eschatology, prophecy.

GEIKO MÜLLER-FAHRENHOLZ

- "Geschichte und Geschichtsauffassung", in Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 2, Tübingen, Mohr, 1958
- K. Löwith, Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschehen: Die theologischen Voraussetzungen der Geschichtsphilosophie (ET Meaning in History, Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1949)
- G. Müller-Fahrenholz, Heilsgeschichte zwischen Ideologie und Prophetie, Freiburg, Herder, 1974
- G. Müller-Fahrenholz et al., Unity in Today's World, WCC, 1978
- R. Rouse & S. Neill eds, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 1:

1517-1948, London, SPCK, 1954 ■ A.J. Toynbee, A Study in History, 12 vols, London, Oxford UP, 1935-61 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, The Genesis and Formation of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1982.

HOLINESS

THE CHURCH* of the risen Christ, victorious over sin and death, can only be holy. In the Nicene Creed,* holiness is one of the four specific “notes” of the church – “one, holy, catholic, apostolic”.

The church’s holiness is participation in the holiness of God, who is the source of all holiness. The church is “a holy nation, God’s own people” (1 Pet. 2:9). The Father so loved the world that he gave his only Son to save it (John 3:16) and made it possible for the church, the “Body of Christ”, to share in the communion of the Triune God (see Trinity). The church is holy through Christ’s righteousness. Jesus, “the holy One of God” (Mark 1:24; John 6:69), full of the Holy Spirit* (Luke 1:35, 3:22, 4:34; Acts 10:38), is one body with his church (Eph. 5:23). He “loved the church and gave himself up for her, in order to make her holy... that she might be holy and without blemish” (Eph. 5:25-27). The risen Christ is “a life-giving spirit” (1 Cor. 15:45; cf. 2 Cor. 3:17): through his Spirit the Christians are “a holy temple in the Lord” (Eph. 2:21; cf. 1 Cor. 3:17). Individual Christians are holy through their relationship to God as members of the church; and they are to live a life worthy of their calling (Eph. 4:1-3; Col. 3:12-15). “Holiness” thus defines the church as the redeeming presence of God’s holiness in our sinful world (see sin), as the call of God to all humankind to that participation in the divine life and love “which is the very mystery of the church” (Cardinal Basil Hume).

The creed relates the holiness of the church to the mission of the Holy Spirit, “Lord and Giver of life”. In communion with the Father and Son, the Spirit is the principle of all holiness of, in and through the church. The succeeding articles – communion of saints* (Apostles’ Creed), forgiveness of sins, resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come – make explicit the Spirit’s role in salvation.*

The holiness of the church confessed by Trinitarian Christian faith transcends the concept of the sacred or wholly other, described in such terms as “out of human reach”, “awesome” and “fascinating”. In the church, God manifests his absolute closeness, shares his “wholly other” life with sinful humans. God is met as love dispelling fear and removing guilt, as Father communicating himself through his Son and his Spirit in our flesh and history.* God’s love overcomes sin in his very “enemies”: “God proves his love for us in that while we still were sinners Christ died for us... While we were enemies we were reconciled to God through the death of his Son” (Rom. 5:8-10).

The church is the place where mortals find holiness and salvation. It is holy in order “that they may have life” (John 10:10). It is the place for proclaiming the gospel, for baptism,* for praying, worshipping, celebrating together, for the forgiveness of sins. It is sign or sacrament* of the healing and reconciling action of Christ and the Holy Spirit through such “means of sanctity” (Vatican II) as scripture, the ministry of the word, sacraments, church structures and discipline. God’s sanctifying economy* constitutes the “objective” holiness of the church. Faithful and self-involving response to the gospel makes the church into a communion of “saints”, a fellowship of life, love and truth, expecting the resurrection* of the body and the life of the world to come. Many faithful persons whose lives reflected the holiness of the church have been canonized (declared saints) in the course of history. The Second Vatican Council emphasized that “the holiness of the church expresses itself... in a special way” through the monastic life. The saint bears witness to the presence in the world of God’s saving power. The “holy” church is recognized in the first place through sanctity in its members.

The church in its pilgrim state is at once holy and, at least in a sense, sinful (see people of God). A “subjective” sinfulness of the church can be attributed to its members: “The church herself is sinful, in that her own members are sinners” (Karl Rahner). But also “the church will never lack holiness in her members” (Karel Truhlar). Montanism and Novatianism in the early church refused to reconcile Christians guilty of apostasy,* murder or adultery or to grant penance* more than once in a life-time. Later currents – such as the Albigensians, Waldensians, Hussites, the radical Reformation and the Jansenists – also disputed that sinful Christians remain members of the church. But Christianity on the whole never evolved into a fellowship of the perfect. It also followed Augustine's rejection of Donatist doctrine that sinful ministers do not dispense valid sacraments: sin cannot impair the efficacy of the church's ministry in so far as it is Christ's own saving action. Although Roman Catholics claim that the fullness of "objective" sanctity is found only in their church, Vatican II* affirmed the existence of "great holiness" outside it.

The correlation of holiness and sinfulness is constitutive of the very conception of the holiness of the church. "It is precisely through its paradoxical structure of holiness and unholiness that the church is the form of grace in this world" (Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger). Luther saw that such a structure points to Christ's holiness as being our sole holiness and of course the church's holiness. Or in the words of modern Protestants quoted by Yves Congar: "To affirm the holiness of the church is not to exclude sin in it but to proclaim the indissolubility of the union of Christ and the church." As Body of Christ, the church is patterned upon the paradox that Christ has been made sin: "For our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (2 Cor. 5:21). The mystery of the holiness of the church is derived from the primary fact that a man deeply involved in (others') sin is given as the very holiness of God bestowed upon sinners so that they may be freed from sin.

The churches of the Reformation* rejected the Roman theses on the objective holiness of the church. Protestant theology holds that the church as a fellowship of sinners has no power over the process of sanctification.* There is no proper "sanctifying" capacity of the clergy or even of the sacramental rites as such. Thus a fundamental difference continues to exist between Roman Catholics, who maintain the constitutive role of the church and its ministry, as Body of Christ, in God's sanctifying work, and those Protestants who deny the church, as "creature of the word", any "authorship" in salvation.

Theological discussions about the holiness of the church have consistently demonstrated that to interpret human reality in terms of holiness is fruitful only within the polarity of God's holiness and human sinfulness. Neglecting this specific structure of the topic may lead, for example, to expecting from the church an unreal, "stainless" purity, a notion of holiness alien to our sinful human condition, in which we constantly face the destructiveness of sin and also perceive it as lying as heavy as the momentous victory of the Crucified One over it. The holiness of the church is rooted in this victory of God's holiness over sin, in Christ "made sin for us", in us, with us sinners. It is as the One who agreed to be "all the sinners" that Christ has become the event of divine holiness, redemptive in the faith of "a holy church of sinners", ecclesia simul sancta et peccatrix. Like his "holy" church, Christ has been known and condemned on earth as sinner: but in the Spirit the believer is given an insight into the life of the church "hidden with Christ in God" (Col. 3:3).

In contemporary Christianity the notion of the holiness of the church has become further controversial in connection with the concern for Christian commitment to justice.* "There is no holiness without justice" (Paul Tillich). Catholicism has come to admit injustice committed in the past by the Roman church and to acknowledge the need for continual reformation of the church, in the spirit of the Reformation theme of the ecclesia semper reformanda. Church bodies come under heavy criticism and are deemed "unholy" wherever they fail to attend to social needs, to appear convincingly committed to active struggle against sin "in the world". The holiness of the church is measured according to the parable of the Good Samaritan and the account of the last judgment in Matthew 25. The conception of the church as "congregation of saints" (Augsburg confession) is criticized as omitting the church's function in world history. "The salvation it proclaims is not merely salvation of the soul but also the realization of the eschatological hope of justice" (Jürgen Moltmann).

Churches today have thus sought to work together for such "worldly" concerns as justice, peace,* the integrity of creation, freedom and life (see life and death). This commitment to engage “secular” problems is not always very successful, and not totally without the risk of compromising with sin, as some have argued in the case of WCC support for liberation* movements involved in armed violence,* one of the factors leading the Salvation Army* to suspend its membership in the WCC. But coming to grips with institutionalized sin through commitment to peace and human rights, through coping with the problems of the people most in need, living as a servant community in the spirit of Jesus – all this has brought to Christianity a fresh understanding of the gospel in the context of a radically changed world. In the face of the experience of holiness given in attending to Christ’s most suffering members, many traditional views about holiness collapse. The church realizes and confesses its guilt in much of the injustice in the world, for failing to do anything worthwhile to redeem many awful situations, for being indifferent to them. But the epiphany of “Christ made sin” in the socially or politically “crucified” of our times reveals God’s forgiveness granted to his people in the Son, whom the Father gave up for the sins of the world. The risen Christ, who has buried sin in his death, is the only righteousness of his “body”, its life-giving spirit for a new creation. In him is recalled that at human level nothing “just” is spared sinfulness. In his church’s struggle, it is Christ who continues to fight “against all ungodliness and wickedness of those who by their wickedness suppress the truth” (Rom. 1:18) – also within the church.

This new gospel awareness owes much to the “discovery” of the Holy Spirit through the ecumenical dialogue with the Orthodox. In Orthodoxy the Holy Spirit has always been known as the ever-active agent of the holiness of the church. Pentecost* inaugurated an economy of holiness in which sin is not yet totally suppressed but no longer reigns. Through the eucharistic invocation to the Spirit, the church calls upon itself the power that makes it “the icon of the kingdom to come” (John Zizioulas). The Spirit is the one who bears witness in the church to the risen Christ as the eschatological Lord over sin.

Today’s deeper understanding of the holiness of the church is prompted by the interaction of the best insights in Western and Eastern Christianity. “The Holy Spirit leads us to understand more clearly that holiness today cannot be attained without commitment to justice, without human solidarity, that include the poor and the oppressed” (Roman Synod on the Laity, 1987). Conversely, the theology of the Crucified makes clear that charisms* are not powers that would allow the church to be, so to say, holy “on its own”. Holiness is the church’s respiration dependent on the holy breath of Christ, in constant prayer,* the very struggle of life.

The criterion of a “holy” church is this life in the Spirit, not an abstract sinlessness. As long as the process of sanctification is going on in the church, sin remains and calls for forgiveness; but it is also overcome by this “holiness” which consists in the struggle of Christ’s Spirit against evil. To manifest the church’s holiness today is to foster Christian fellowship through interchurch thinking and acting on vital issues, in response to the one undivided gospel of God in Christ. The church’s entire reality rests on the holy gospel, whereby God’s merciful action is made known and redemptive for our times.

See also redemption.

DANIEL OLIVIER

- J. Ansaldi, Ethique et sanctification: Morales politiques et sainteté chrétienne, Geneva, Labor et Fides, 1983
- Y. Congar, “Die heilige Kirche”, in Mysterium Salutis, IV/1, J. Feiner & M. Löhrer eds, Einsiedeln, Benziger, 1972
- E.A. Johnson, Friends of God and Prophets: A Feminist Theological Reading of the Communion of Saints, London, SCM Press, 1998
- Lutheran/Roman Catholic International Dialogue, Church and Justification: Understanding the Church in the Light of the Doctrine of Justification, Geneva, LWF, 1994
- K.V. Truhlar, “Holiness”, in Sacramentum Mundi: An Encyclopedia of Theology, London, Burns & Oates, 1969.

HOLINESS MOVEMENT

THE HOLINESS movement is a group of individuals and church bodies in the US whose principal purpose is the propagation of what they believe to be the biblical doctrine and experience of Christian perfection. Most accept John Wesley’s teaching on “entire sanctification” as normative but not absolutely definitive.

The Holiness movement understands Christian perfection to begin in an act of divine grace* in which the already-regenerate recipient, totally submissive to the will of God, is cleansed of original sin,* endowed with perfect love for God and neighbour and empowered to witness to the saving grace of God in Christ through service. It is received instantaneously by faith.* It is provided for in the atoning work of Jesus Christ* and is wrought by the Holy Spirit.* The Holiness movement distinguishes purity from maturity and insists that while Christian perfection is wholly accomplished at its inception, the sanctified believer will seek to grow in grace and Christlikeness.

Holiness people consider themselves strictly orthodox Christians and, with the exception of restorationist elements, accept as their own the creeds,* doctrinal understandings and ethical principles of the ecumenical and undivided church, as well as the history of the church catholic. They are Protestant, holding stoutly (as basic and essential doctrine) to sola gratia, sola scriptura and the priesthood of all believers. They are Augustinian in their understanding of the human condition apart from saving grace and Arminian in their understanding of universal atonement, free grace and free will, though popular thought has sometimes run to Pelagianism. Currently, some awareness is dawning of affinities with the Eastern Orthodox tradition in the areas of creation and soteriology.

Methodism’s Twenty-five Articles of Religion provide the basis for most of the movement’s confessional statements. Such statements usually both affirm catholicity* and declare distinguishing tenets.

Beyond the fundamental agreements noted, the Holiness movement bodies vary greatly, as the following differences in sacramental theology illustrate. Most Holiness groups celebrate both baptism* and eucharist,* but the Salvation Army* and some Friends* congregations celebrate neither. The Church of God (Anderson) advocates the term “ordinances” and celebrates three: baptism, the Lord’s supper and foot-washing. The Church of the Nazarene, Wesleyan Church and Free Methodist Church practise infant baptism; the Church of God (Anderson), Church of God (Holiness) and Missionary Church practise believer’s baptism only.

Holiness people have insisted that these and other differences do not divide their witness to the propagation of Christian perfection. The Christian Holiness Association (CHA – originally the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness, later the National Holiness Association) serves as a coordinating and galvanizing agency for that purpose. A similar function is carried out for a constituency of perhaps 100,000 in some 30 smaller groups who fear that the mainstream of the movement is spiritually lukewarm, by the Interdenominational Holiness Convention (IHC, 1947). Some persons and groups belong to both CHA and IHC. The Church of God (Anderson) identifies and works with the movement, but as a restorationist body refuses to join either CHA or IHC. Only racial prejudice has prevented the Holiness movement from recognizing that African American Methodism (African Methodist Episcopal, AME Zion, Christian Methodist Episcopal) has historically differed from it not one whit in faith and piety.

The Holiness movement has two major historical roots. By far the larger and more significant is the largely successful mid-19th century Methodist attempt to revive a flagging commitment to Wesleyan perfectionism, led before the civil war by Phoebe Palmer, George and Jesse Peck and Nathan Bangs, joined immediately after the war by Randolph Foster, John A. Wood and John Inskip. The second major root is in the perfectionist revivalism of Asa Mahan and Charles Finney, especially its emphases on biblical “proofs” for entire sanctification, “free moral agency”, the work of the Holy Spirit as the agent of the sanctifying experience and spiritual power. Such fundamentalism in method and content as there is in the movement has generally arisen from this latter source, but its Wesleyan roots have kept the movement free of the debates over biblical inerrancy and millennialism which have been divisive in other US groups.

The Holiness movement bears deep commitments to the transformationist social ethic characteristic of its roots in the aboli-tionism of the Wesleyans and Free Methodists and its primary expression in the Salvation Army. After nearly a half-century of dormancy induced by embourgeoisement, this tradition re-appeared in strength in the 1970s.

The movement has had two periods of denomination-building: roughly 1880-1920 and 1960-80. In the former period, Holiness people formed congregations and associations on the basis of three convictions: that the major denominations did not want them, that those denominations were neglecting the inner cities, and that they needed to nurture those converted and sanctified in their revivalistic ventures. The original congregations and associations quickly entered a period of merger which ended only as the new denominations gained a generation of "tradition" and identity. From 1960 to 1980, a number of groups broke away from older Holiness denominations, usually protesting worldliness and abuse of ecclesiastical power. The 1968 merger of the Pilgrim Holiness Church and the Wesleyan Methodist Church to form the Wesleyan Church and increasing interdenominational cooperation in such matters as hymnody and materials for Christian education may herald a new period of merger.

Several of the Holiness bodies and a number of individuals belong to the National Association of Evangelicals, in spite of deep concerns on the part of some with the rationalistic style of much of evangelical theology, the supposed emotionalism of the Pentecostals, and the traditional programmatic social conservatism of the NAE. Through the Wesleyan Theological Society, the scholarly commission of CHA, the movement is represented on the Faith and Order commission of the National Council of Churches of Christ in the USA.

See also sanctification.

PAUL MERRITT BASSETT

- Black Holiness: A Guide to the Study of Black Participation in Wesleyan Perfectionist and Glossolalic Pentecostal Movements, Metuchen NJ, Scarecrow, 1987 ■ D.W. Dayton, Discovering an Evangelical Heritage, New York, Harper & Row, 1976 ■ M.E. Dieter, The Holiness Revival of the Nineteenth Century, Metuchen NJ, Scarecrow, 1980 ■ C.E. Jones, A Guide to the Study of the Holiness Movement, Metuchen NJ, Scarecrow, 1974.

HOLY SPIRIT

THE THEOLOGY of the Holy Spirit, or pneumatology, is not so much one specific chapter of Christian theology as an essential dimension of every theological view of the church and of its spirituality and liturgical and sacramental life. The Holy Spirit is first and foremost the Spirit we invoke, the Spirit who presides over the upbuilding and renewal of the church,* the Spirit who infuses everyone that comes into the world with the light of Christ.

BIBLICAL TEACHING

In the figures of the Old Testament, the link between dabbar (word) and ruah (wind, breath, spirit) is one of the things which most forcefully heralds Trinitarian theology (see Trinity). The Word of God is alive and sanctifies. It is suffused by Spirit and transmitted by the divine breath. This anthropological image suggests the intimate and essential link between the divine persons of the Son and the Spirit.

Gradually the Word achieved greater definition, disclosing its identity and, in some passages from the Psalms, being treated as a person.* The same process of development held good for the Spirit or wisdom. In the post-exilic writings a theology of the Spirit and a theology of wisdom were worked out.

In Gen. 1 the pneumatological prologue is followed by acts of God sustained and signalled by a living Word. But in the work of creation the Word of God is not merely preceded but also accompanied by the Spirit, who ensures that it "carries" and reaches its audience. Thus Word and Spirit go together in the order of creation. Of this the Bible gives evidence in fullest measure (e.g. Pss. 33:6, 147:18).

The entire sacred history of Israel displays God's teaching work as he speaks to this people "whose hearts are hardened", but whom he has chosen for himself and loved. God's hand can be traced in the web of historical events itself, in the summons of the prophets who communicate the word of God. The Spirit of God is always there and suffuses the prophets and fills the poetical writers and the psalmists. The Spirit guides the people and, as it were, ensures the slow rising of sap so that they may become mature and await ever more anxiously and impatiently the Saviour and the pouring out of the Spirit in the last days.

The dual presence and action of the Word and the Spirit is pre-eminently embodied and displayed in biblical messianism. Frequently the pneumatological dimension of this messianism has been neglected. If the Messiah can keep the word of the law given by God to Moses and bring about justice on this earth, it is because the Spirit of God rests upon him (Isa. 61:1). If the "Suffering Servant" can "bring salvation to the nations", it is for the same reason. And if the people as a whole will be able one day to accept the Word in their inmost selves, this is because the heart of each person will be renewed by the Spirit.

The two constants of the Spirit and the Word, of the Spirit and those who are the elect, of the Spirit and the Servant, merge in the anointing of Jesus by the Spirit at his baptism. Here the Elect One of God not only states the Word of God as something outside himself but incarnates and manifests it.

In the period of the incarnation the Holy Spirit is the Spirit of the incarnation, in and by whom the Word – the logos – of God breaks into history, the Spirit who prepares a human body for that Word as the temple of its godhead.

The baptism of Jesus by the forerunner in the Jordan is a major stage of the revelation of the Spirit, who proceeds from the Father and rests on the Son, thus accompanying and confirming the witness of the Father. This is a revelation of the eternal movement of the Spirit of the Father, who remains in the Son from all eternity. The Holy Spirit is the Spirit of Jesus, permeating him, revealing him and disclosing him to the world.

Jesus' first words in his public ministry express his awareness of being Christ, that is, of being anointed and permeated by the Spirit (Luke 4:18,21; Matt. 12:17-18) and even led by him (Matt. 4:1; Mark 1:12). From then on, consecrated by the anointing of the Spirit, who remains in him and sends him, Jesus proclaims the good news to the poor. And in the Spirit he works miracles, heals the sick, raises the dead and expels demons.

All of Jesus' prayers are – or rather the entire prayer of Jesus is – in the Spirit (Luke 10:21; John 4:23, 11:33,41). His praying is something continuous in which the whole being of the Saviour is defined in a constant existential relationship to the Father in the Spirit. Thus the Holy Spirit is the centre, where the indescribable occurs in the exchange of the eternal Trinitarian words "You are my Son" and "Abba, Father". From the incarnation* to the ascension the entire earthly life of Jesus is a life filled by the Spirit, moving through the passion, the cross, the supreme impoverishment in which Jesus achieves the ideal of the Beatitudes, of which he is the great and only true example, so that we can paraphrase: "Blessed are the poor in Spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. 5:3 and 1 Pet. 4:14).

It is indeed in the Spirit that Jesus consecrates himself to the Father (John 17:19) and offers himself to the Father as a sacrifice without blemish (Heb. 9:14) and, according to the passion stories in Luke (23:46) and John (19:30), commits his spirit into the Father's hands and breathes his last. In answer to this definitive gift of the Spirit, the Father raises his Son from the dead by that same Spirit (Acts 2:32-33). Thus henceforward the Spirit is the irresistible force which breaks the seal of the empty tomb, the overflowing joy which fills the disciples and the women who bring spices, the blinding light of the resurrection,* the presence which remained in Jesus himself in death and which hell cannot swallow up.

The Spirit as a person also remains to some extent unmentioned by name and is concealed behind symbols (the finger of God, power, light, cloud, kingdom) and so is inseparable from the living experience of the fruits of the kingdom (peace, joy, gentleness, mercy, wisdom, courage, etc.). This anonymity of the Spirit is confirmed by Paul's words that "in him the whole fullness of deity dwells bodily" (Col. 2:9; cf. John 1:14). In these Pauline and Johannine expressions we have the feeling that the Spirit is hidden and somehow confounded with the gifts of the Spirit, with the energies of the Spirit which radiate eternally from the divine Trinity. These deeply scriptural intuitions were developed in Byzantine and Palamite theology.

The certainty of the coming of the Spirit is affirmed in the preaching of Jesus. We remember the exposition by Jesus himself (cf. Luke 11:13) of the petition in the Lord's prayer, "give us each day our daily bread". All the needs of men and women are signs of the Spirit and an opportunity for proclamation: bread, fire, water, light, etc. (cf. Luke 12:49).

The imminence of the Saviour's passion gives him the opportunity for some final teaching of the most exalted kind on the Holy Spirit on the occasion of the great "words of consolation" found in the farewell discourse (John 13:31-16:33) and the high priestly prayer (John 17), which are indivisibly part of these words. The promise of the Holy Spirit is given there more solemnly than ever in the setting of Jesus' "departure" (see John 16:7), which acquires its whole meaning as a necessary condition for the coming of the Holy Spirit. Thus because Jesus "is spirit" (John 4:24; 2 Cor. 3:17-18) from all eternity, and "in the days of his flesh" was wholly filled with the Spirit and united with the Spirit to the ineffable core of his being as God-man, he communicates the Spirit to human beings in the unceasing Pentecost* of the church, which is his body and the temple of his Spirit.

The gift of Pentecost is the necessary completion of the mystery of Easter. Christ, being filled with the Spirit, becomes the giver of the Spirit in the morning of Pentecost in the upper room. This is when the church, baptized and re-born through the blood of Christ, is confirmed and strengthened once for all in the new life which is the life of the Spirit, or life in the Spirit of God.

In the actual life of the early church, the Spirit genuinely is an everyday reality which Christians know from their experience: "do not quench the Spirit" (1 Thess. 5:19), "be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5:18), "be ardent in the Spirit" (Rom. 12:11). Paul describes very fully the experience of the church in the Spirit: "God's love has been poured into our hearts through the Holy Spirit that has been given to us" (Rom. 5:5). Rom. 8 sets out the new life of the Christian in the Spirit. At the heart of our renewed personality, our spirit, it is the Holy Spirit himself who acts, speaks, groans and prays (v.26).

Like the New Testament, the patristic writings equally reflect the church's fundamental confession of faith in Jesus Christ dead and risen, in the certainty of the experience of the Spirit who makes alive. Rather than reflecting on the Spirit, the fathers pass on to us an expression of the experience of the Spirit in the church.

THE HOLY SPIRIT AND THE CHURCH

Christian worship is worship in spirit and in truth (John 4:23-24), both through the strength of the Spirit, who works in the church, and through the purpose of this worship, which is to make us bearers of the Spirit (pneumatophoroi), transformed by and in the Spirit into new people till we attain "the full stature of Christ" (Eph. 4:13), who both humbled himself in taking human form and was exalted by God (Phil. 2:6-11).

While Christian worship involves us in the great movement of prayer – in the intercession both on earth and in heaven of Jesus the High Priest – it must also be said that the Holy Spirit is the object and the entire content of that invocation, or epiclesis,* by Christ. The whole of Christian worship thus constitutes an unceasing epiclesis which culminates in the continual Pentecost of the Spirit in the church, which is the temple of the Holy Spirit.

Between the liturgical expression of the eucharist – the continuing Pentecost of the Spirit – and the experience of the saints there is a profound connection: in both it is the Holy Spirit who creates the dynamic of the call, the encounter and the transformation of human beings into a temple of God. This sense of the prayer of the Spirit in the human heart is experienced very strongly in the tradition of the Jesus prayer, in which Jesus' name is unceasingly invoked: "When the Spirit comes to dwell in human beings, they can no longer cease from praying, for the Spirit never ceases praying in them" (Isaac of Nineveh).

All the structures of the church are determined by the dual, simultaneous and reciprocal mediation of the Son in the Spirit and the Spirit in the Son, by that dual, real presence of the Lord Jesus and the Comforter, and in and through them by the encounter with the Father who is the source and end (i.e. alpha and omega) of the divine fellowship or communion. Thus there is in the church a fundamental balance between, on the one hand, the principles of tradition, obedience, order, sacramental, liturgical and canonical forms, and, on the other, the principles of freedom, creativity, personal responsibility, the irreducible integrity of the human person, the local community, the divine grace which gives spiritual content to the forms and structures and ensures a unique and necessary vertical relation between the individual person and God, between the local congregation and the Master. This balance is never achieved once for all but must always be renewed. With this in mind, the inspiration* of the Spirit must always be renewed and cannot be codified but becomes incarnated: truth is always alive and is never wholly the same as the dogmatic formulas expressing and enshrining it.

The Word – the Logos – is the guarantor that it really is the Spirit that is acting. The Word identifies the Spirit in the gift of distinguishing between spirits. But this does not mean that the Word is subordinating the Spirit to the hierarchy or the institutions. Today the Spirit still creates prophetic gifts or charisms which can come into conflict with the hierarchy, which, though it is established, is not infallible. These charisms may call on the hierarchy to repent or may proclaim God's judgment to it. Prophecy* is just as intrinsic to the nature of the church as is the royal priesthood, or rather it represents one of the essential, inalienable aspects of the priestly anointing of the church by the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. Prophecy is a characteristic mark of the genuineness of the Spirit and of the Spirit's continuing, sovereign presence. The Spirit is a Spirit of order, but the divine order does not always correspond in every respect to that of the established hierarchy.

See also charism(ata), holiness, sanctification.

BORIS BOBRINSKOY

■ For bibliography, see Holy Spirit in ecumenical thought.

HOLY SPIRIT IN ECUMENICAL THOUGHT

REFERENCES to the Holy Spirit in the reports of major ecumenical conferences prior to the formation of the WCC followed the lines of traditional Protestant thinking and piety in those years. The Holy Spirit was understood mainly as divine power working in the church* and in the life of the individual Christian. While the Trinitarian confession of the faith was acknowledged formally, the affirmation of the Spirit as person* in communion* with the Father and the Son remained largely undeveloped (see Trinity).

A new emphasis began to be evident in 1952 at both the world mission (Willingen) and Faith and Order (Lund) conferences. The understanding of the missionary task as participation in the missio Dei* is based on a Trinitarian conception of the divine economy, the sequence of God's saving acts in the history of salvation.* God has sent his Son to reconcile all things unto himself in order that all people might become one with God through the power of the Holy Spirit. As Jesus Christ* has accomplished his work of salvation, God sent the Spirit – the Spirit of Jesus who assembles people into one body, leads into all truth and enables the church to continue the divine mission. Through the Holy Spirit, the church can both press forward as ambassador and witness to Christ and wait with confidence for his final victory (cf. Willingen's declaration on the "Missionary Obligation of the Church").

In its sections on "Christ and the Church" and "Continuity and Unity", Lund repeated many earlier affirmations about the Holy Spirit. Through the Spirit, Jesus Christ is the head of the church, which is his Body, and is present in his church. The continuity of the church in history* is assured "by the constant action of the risen Lord through the Holy Spirit". It is through the "unifying power of his indwelling Spirit" that the organic unity of the Body of Christ is formed and sustained. However, in describing the inseparable relation between Christ and his church and in speaking of the nature of the church in terms of a double movement (called from the world, sent into the world), Lund recognized the distinct work of the Holy Spirit as the present manifestation of the reign of God. "Through the indwelling of the Holy Spirit the new age of the future is already given to participate in the power of the resurrection." Indicative of the new orientation is the conclusion of the report on "Christ and His Church": "It is of decisive importance for the advance of ecumenical work that the doctrine of the church be treated in close relation both to the doctrine of Christ and to the doctrine of the Holy Spirit."

The WCC's third assembly (New Delhi 1961) made this new orientation clearly visible in several ways. One was the decision to set the Christocentric affirmation of the original WCC basis* into an explicitly Trinitarian setting by adding the doxological formula "to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit". The preamble to New Delhi's statement on the church's unity, which has served as an ecumenical yardstick ever since, places the understanding of unity* in a Trinitarian setting: "The love of the Father and the Son in the unity of the Holy Spirit is the source and goal of the unity which the Triune God wills for all men and creation. We believe that we share in this unity in the church of Jesus Christ... The reality of this unity was made manifest at Pentecost in the gift of the Holy Spirit, through whom we know in this present age the first-fruits of that perfect union of the Son with his Father, which will be known in its fullness only when all things are consummated by Christ in his glory." Later, the report explains the distinct work of the Holy Spirit in these terms: "The church exists in time and place by the power of the Holy Spirit, who effects in her life all the elements that belong to her unity, witness and service. He is the gift of the Father in the name of Jesus Christ to build up the church, to lead her into the freedom and fellowship which belong to her peace and joy. For any achievement of a fuller unity than that now manifest, we are wholly dependent upon the Spirit's presence and governance."

A much more fully developed exposition of this Trinitarian approach was found in the plenary presentation to the assembly by Nikos Nissiotis on "The Witness and the Service of Eastern Orthodoxy to the One Undivided Church". Nissiotis stated: "Unity among men in the church is the result, the reflection of the event of the Father's union with Christ by his Spirit realized in the historical church on the day of Pentecost."

Nissiotis's presentation – the first by an Orthodox theologian at a WCC assembly – marks the official beginning of the full Orthodox impact on ecumenical thought, underscored at New Delhi through the entry of the Russian Orthodox Church in the membership of the WCC.

The period up to the fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968) was characterized by an increasingly clear recognition in ecumenical thought of the work of the Holy Spirit. The fourth world conference on Faith and Order (Montreal 1963) summed up the insights gained so far and provided the stimulus for more detailed analysis and study.

MONTREAL 1963

Based on the prior study of "Christ and His Church" and the understanding of the church in the context of the history of salvation, the Montreal report on "The Church in the Purpose of God" stated: "The church is founded on the mighty acts of God in calling his chosen people Israel and supremely in his decisive act in the incarnation, suffering, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, and the sending of the Holy Spirit... The community of the church was founded to proclaim God's saving act to the world through all ages, and to be continually used by the Spirit to make Christ present again and again through the proclamation of the Word and the administration of the sacraments. Through these means Christ is always at work afresh through the Spirit, bestowing his salvation on man and calling him to obedient service."

Tradition.* Based again on extensive preliminary study, Montreal affirmed: "We exist as Christians by the Tradition of the gospel testified in scripture, transmitted in and by the church through the power of the Holy Spirit... What is transmitted in the process of Tradition is the Christian faith, not only as a sum of tenets, but as a living reality transmitted through the operation of the Holy Spirit." A little later the report adds: "The scriptures as documents can be letter only. It is the Spirit who is the Lord and Giver of life. Accordingly we may say that the right interpretation... is that interpretation which is guided by the Holy Spirit."

Ministry. Stimulated by new interest in the ministry of the laity,* the people of God,* Montreal addressed the difficult issue of a common understanding of the ministry.* All ministry in the church is rooted in the threefold ministry of Christ, which is made effective in the church through the action of the Holy Spirit. "The Holy Spirit dwells in the church. He comes to each member in his baptism for the quickening of faith. He also bestows differing gifts (charismata) on groups and individuals. All his activities are to enable men to serve and worship God. All members of the church are thus gifted for the common good." The Spirit equips God's people to live and work in the world; he builds up the Body of Christ in mutual love; and he calls some to the special ministry, which depends entirely on the Spirit's presence and action in the church.

Worship. Within a Trinitarian understanding of worship as "a service to God the Father by men redeemed by his Son, who are continually finding new life in the power of the Holy Spirit", the report addresses in particular the action of the Holy Spirit in the sacraments* of baptism* and the eucharist.* Both sacraments have their central meaning in the participation in Christ through the Holy Spirit. Therefore, the celebration of each should include an explicit invocation of the Holy Spirit (see epiclesis).

Montreal not only brought together the fruits of previous work but initiated a fresh approach. Studies commissioned by F&O at Aarhus (1964) reflected a desire to intensify the dialogue between the Western and Eastern traditions and to explore further the understanding of the work of the Holy Spirit. Thus began a programme of patristic studies from an ecumenical viewpoint which for several years focused on a new reading of the important treatise by Basil the Great on the Holy Spirit. As a follow-up of the Montreal discussion on ministry, a study was initiated on "Christ, the Holy Spirit and the Ministry" which came to a first point of fruition at the commission meeting at Louvain 1971 and served as background for the Lima document on the ministry. Aarhus said the work of the Holy Spirit needed "more thorough and comprehensive treatment than it received in these Montreal paragraphs. In particular it may be noted that the work of the Holy Spirit enabling human response to the word and action of God in Christ would require explicit treatment; but groups may wish to develop much more their understanding of the ministry of the Holy Spirit."

The renewed interest in the eucharist and its ecclesiological significance was pursued in the context of a study on "The Eucharist – a Sacrament of Unity". Among the questions to be given particular attention was the following point: "How is the activity of the Holy Spirit to be understood when the eucharist is celebrated?" The first report on this study, presented at Bristol (1967), devoted a long section to the "anamnetic and epikletic character of the eucharist", affirming that "it is the Spirit who, in our eucharist, makes Christ really present and given to us in the bread and wine, according to the words of the institution".

But the most significant impulse emerging from Montreal concerned a more conscious exploration of the relationship between ecclesiology and pneumatology. This was pursued through the study on "Spirit, Order and Organization" and through a process of reflection on "The Holy Spirit and the Catholicity of the Church", leading up to section 1 at the Uppsala assembly. Both deserve brief comment.

The outline of the study on "Spirit, Order and Organization", prepared at Aarhus, took its departure explicitly from the New Delhi statement on the unity* of the church, with its recognition of the action of the Holy Spirit. "This understanding of the action of the Holy Spirit in guiding Christians towards unity is important and needs to be fully explored in the light of the biblical and historical doctrine of the Spirit." The outline recognizes the Spirit both as the source of continuity in the life of the church and as judging and transforming power.

The reflection on "The Holy Spirit and the Catholicity of the Church" developed out of a fresh study of the "nature of unity" following Montreal. It was then re-focused as a contribution to the preparations for the Uppsala assembly. Uppsala's section 1 report was the first WCC assembly document to address explicitly the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, and the fullest summary of ecumenical thinking on the Holy Spirit up to that moment is provided in para. 8.

The F&O meeting in Louvain (1971) brought together most of the results of the studies initiated after Montreal. Especially the reports on "The Authority of the Bible" and on "Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry", as well as the concluding report on "Spirit, Order and Organization", help to substantiate more fully the insights gained during the previous period into the various dimensions of the work of the Holy Spirit.

An important new aspect was added through a statement on "Conciliarity and the Future of the Ecumenical Movement": "By conciliarity we mean the coming together of Christians – locally, regionally or globally – for common prayer, counsel and decision, in the belief that the Holy Spirit can use such meetings for his own purpose of reconciling, renewing and reforming the church by guiding it towards the fullness of truth and love... The central fact in true conciliarity is the active presence and work of the Holy Spirit. A council is a true council if the Holy Spirit directs and inspires it, even if it is not universal; and a universally representative body of Christians would not become a true council if the Spirit did not guide it." This statement served as the background for the attempt to describe the unity we seek in terms of "conciliar fellowship", which came to its fruition at the Nairobi assembly (1975); it regained significance in the context of the "conciliar process of mutual commitment for justice, peace and the integrity of creation" initiated by the Vancouver assembly (1983).

Some of the more recent emphases in ecumenical thinking about the Holy Spirit go significantly beyond earlier affirmations.

THE HOLY SPIRIT IN THE CONFESSION OF THE FAITH

The Nairobi assembly devoted one of its sections to the theme "Confessing Christ Today". The report, speaking about the confessing community as a community in the Spirit, affirms that to confess Christ today means to be led by the Spirit into struggle, to revive the witness of the prophets, to speak and act with concern and solidarity for the whole of creation.

At its meeting in Bangalore (1978) F&O accepted a statement on "A Common Account of Hope" which includes an affirmation of hope* in God the Spirit: "The living God becomes accessible to us by the Holy Spirit, who confirms God's presence in our lives and makes us members of Christ's body, the church. By the Holy Spirit, we have hope that already our lives can show signs of the new creation... The Spirit sets us free from the powers of darkness, stirs up our spirits, rekindles our energies, gives us visions and dreams, presses us to work for real communion, overcoming the barriers which sin has erected." These last affirmations are taken up again in the statement's often-quoted description of Christian hope as "a resistance movement against fatalism": it is the Spirit who sustains people in the struggle against the threats to the integrity of creation, peace and just relationships in human community.

Two special initiatives regarding the Holy Spirit in the confession of the faith may also be mentioned: the study on the ecumenical significance of the filioque* controversy, and a very tentative discussion of the "maternal office of the Holy Spirit" in the context of the 1981 Sheffield conference on "The Community of Women and Men in the Church".

The third part of the F&O study "Confessing the One Faith" enters into a full discussion of the affirmations about the Holy Spirit in the Nicene Creed,* beginning with the following comprehensive statement: "The church confesses and worships the Holy Spirit, 'the Lord and the Giver of life'. And it is only in the power of the Holy Spirit that Christian faith and its confession are possible. Because the God whom we confess in the creed is revealed as Triune God, faith in the Holy Spirit is never to be isolated from faith in the Father and the Son. In the church, the Holy Spirit is never experienced, confessed or worshipped apart from the Father and the Son. As the Lord and the Giver of life, the Holy Spirit enables our communion with the Father and the Son and is, therefore, fundamental to Christian faith, life and hope."

THE HOLY SPIRIT AND THE CHURCH

This has been the concern most thoroughly considered since the beginning of the ecumenical movement. Here a brief paragraph from the section report on "Confessing Christ Today” of the Nairobi assembly may serve as starting point. “Those who take part in the life of Christ and confess him as Lord and Saviour, Liberator and Unifier, are gathered in a community of which the author and sustainer is the Holy Spirit. This communion of the Spirit finds its primary aim and ultimate purpose in the eucharistic celebration and the glorification of the Triune God. The doxology is the supreme confession which transcends all our divisions.”

One of the most important ecumenical contributions to understanding the relation between the Holy Spirit and the church is undoubtedly the Lima document on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.* The sections on baptism and the eucharist both include extensive reference to the Holy Spirit: e.g. baptism as a gift of the Spirit (B5), the eucharist as invocation of the Spirit (E14-18). The statement on ministry, in its introductory part on “The Calling of the Whole People of God”, develops a pneumatological understanding of the church: “The church lives through the liberating and renewing power of the Holy Spirit. That the Holy Spirit was upon Jesus is evidenced in his baptism, and after the resurrection that same Spirit was given to those who believed in the Risen Lord in order to re-create them as the Body of Christ. The Spirit calls people to faith, sanctifies them through many gifts, gives them strength to witness to the gospel, and empowers them to serve in hope and love. The Spirit keeps the church in the truth and guides it despite the frailty of its members” (M3).

The fifth world conference on Faith and Order in Santiago de Compostela (1993) explored the understanding of the church as koinonia. In his presentation on “The Church as Communion”, Metropolitan John of Pergamon clarified the relationship between Christ and the church. “The Spirit is a spirit of koinonia. If we cannot have Christology without pneumatology, this means that we must stop thinking of Christ in individualistic terms and understand him as a ‘corporate person’, an inclusive being. The ‘many’ are a constitutive element of the ‘one’. The ‘head’ without the ‘Body’ is inconceivable. The church is the Body of Christ, because Christ is a pneumatological being, born and existing in the koinonia of the Spirit.”

Section I of Santiago applied this interpretation to the understanding of unity and diversity in the life of the church and of catholicity: “The interdependence of unity and diversity, which is the essence of the church’s koinonia, is rooted in the Triune God revealed in Jesus Christ. The Father, Son and Holy Spirit is the perfect expression of unity and diversity and the ultimate reality of relational life. In the Holy Spirit, he makes human beings partakers of this relational life which is his own... The relational dynamic of catholicity within each local church to the universal (the ‘one’ and the ‘many’) echoes the relationship of the Trinity. The Holy Trinity actualizes the one body of Christ by making each local church a full and ‘catholic’ church. For the fullness of catholicity to be safeguarded within the life of the local church, both equally strong pneumatological and Christological emphases are needed.”

THE HOLY SPIRIT AND RELIGIOUS PLURALISM

Especially since it began a programme on interfaith dialogue* in 1971, the WCC has faced the issue of a Christian theological understanding of religious pluralism. In this context a new, though tentative, emphasis in ecumenical thinking about the Holy Spirit has taken shape.

In a presentation to the central committee meeting at Addis Ababa (1971), Metropolitan Georges Khodr interpreted the situation of Christianity in a pluralistic world in light of the work of the Holy Spirit. He challenged the traditional understanding of the oikonomia of God, particularly in Western theology, in terms of the history of salvation. “Contemporary theology must therefore transcend the notion of ‘salvation history’ in order to recover the meaning of oikonomia. The economy of Christ cannot be reduced to its unfolding in history; the heart of it is the fact that it makes us participants in the very life of God. It must involve reference to eternity and to the work of the Holy Spirit. For inherent in the term ‘economy’ is the idea of mystery.”

Stanley Samartha, the first director of this programme, has commented: “What we seek here is not so much to extend the work of the Holy Spirit outside the hedges of the church as a more inclusive doctrine of God himself. A more sensitive recognition of the wider work of the Holy Spirit may also help us to broaden our understanding of God's saving activity." The question of the Holy Spirit and people of other faiths, Samartha concludes, "must inevitably lead to the doctrine of God himself and of the Trinity in far more inclusive ways than Christian theology has done before. It must take into account the unknowability, the incomprehensibility and the mystery of God and the work of his Spirit among others no less than his revelation in Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit" (Courage for Dialogue, 24, 76f.).

A statement on "religious plurality" from a consultation in 1990 in preparation for the WCC assembly at Canberra affirms unambiguously that "God, the Holy Spirit, has been at work in the life and traditions of people of living faiths. Further, we affirm that it is within the realm of the Spirit that we may be able to interpret the truth and goodness of other religions and distinguish the 'things that differ', so that our 'love may abound more and more, with knowledge and all discernment' (Phil. 1:9-10). We also affirm that the Holy Spirit, the Interpreter of Christ and of our own scriptures (John 14:26), will lead us to understand afresh the deposit of the faith already given to us, and into fresh and unexpected discovery of new wisdom and insight, as we learn more from our neighbours of other faiths."

THE HOLY SPIRIT AND THE CHARISMATIC RENEWAL

Over the past three decades many member churches of the WCC have experienced manifestations of a charismatic renewal, characterized in particular by instances of baptism in the Spirit, the gift of tongues and of healing. The WCC gave attention to this phenomenon as part of its concern for a renewal of spirituality, and a preparatory paper for a 1980 consultation, "Towards a Church Renewed and United in the Holy Spirit", offered a tentative theological interpretation of the charismatic renewal, distinguishing an ecclesiological, a cosmological and a sacramental approach to the Holy Spirit. The ecclesiological approach starts from an experience of the church which can be described as a social experience of God. "The Holy Spirit is God 'in between', or 'the go-between God'. His purpose is to establish relationships between us and to produce a common experience among us." The cosmological approach affirms the Holy Spirit as the one who renews creation and bestows fullness of life. "Within the context of this renewal of creation we expect healing of social relationships, healing in our relations with our own human self, healing of bodily sickness." The sacramental approach is based on the experience of conversion as a "once-for-all event which needs constant and repeated renewal and reinforcement by the power of the Holy Spirit". Reference is made particularly to baptism, confirmation* and ordination.*

Such a distinction of approaches to the reality of the Holy Spirit could prove helpful far beyond this particular consultation. The same could be said of the opening remarks by Kilian McDonnell in his presentation on "Church Reactions to the Charismatic Renewal". Commenting on the excessive fear among the churches of an exaggerated doctrine of the Holy Spirit, he said: "A mutuality exists between Christ and the Spirit. Christ sends the Spirit from the Father, but it is only through the Spirit that one can say Jesus is Lord. There is no Christological statement without its pneumatological counterpart. Also the renewal is saying that the Holy Spirit is constitutive of the church. In the West we build up the church in Christological categories and then when it is an already constructed Christological reality we then, in the second moment of her existence, add the Holy Spirit as a vivifier and animator. The second moment is already too late. The Holy Spirit belongs to the first constitutive moment of the church's existence."

The concern for a renewal of spirituality* was also the focus of the reflections of section IV at the Canberra assembly, under the theme "Holy Spirit - Transform and Sanctify Us!" "An ecumenical spirituality for our times should be incarnational, here and now, life-giving, rooted in the scriptures and nourished by prayer; it should be communitarian and celebrating, centred on the eucharist, expressed in service and witness, trusting and confident. It will inevitably lead to suffering, is open to the wider oikoumene,

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

joyful and hopeful. Its source and guide is the action of the Holy Spirit. It is lived and thought in community and for others. It is an ongoing process of formation and discipleship."

A CONCLUDING NOTE

What has emerged from ecumenical thinking on the Holy Spirit is much less than a coherent "doctrine": there are more indications of important questions perceived than of common answers found. The remarks by McDonnell point to two fundamental challenges the ecumenical movement has only begun to face. Though formulated against the background of the charismatic renewal, they have been raised consistently by Orthodox theology. Since they go to the very core of the inherited "consensus" in the ecumenical movement, enshrined in the Christocentrism of the basis of the WCC and its implications for the understanding of church and world, it has been difficult to meet this challenge.

José Míguez Bonino has also challenged the traditional Christocentric theological framework in the ecumenical movement, calling for a Trinitarian enlargement which interprets "the second article in relation to the first and the third, both creationally and pneumatologically". The Canberra assembly, with its theme "Come, Holy Spirit – Renew the Whole Creation", opened up precisely this double perspective.

While the assembly did not go beyond the common insights generated so far, two brief passages from the report of section IV can serve as a summary. On the "Mystery of the Holy Spirit", the report says: "The Holy Spirit cannot be understood apart from the life of the Holy Trinity. Proceeding from the Father, the Holy Spirit points to Jesus of Nazareth as the Christ, the Messiah, the Saviour of the world. The Spirit is the Power of God, energizing the people of God, corporately and individually, to fulfil their ministry. The Holy Spirit is 'holy' by virtue of the very nature of the Holy Trinity. It is distinct from other 'spirits', benign or demonic (1 John 4). The Holy Spirit is gloriously free and unbound (John 3), freeing and unbinding God's people from the structures and strictures of this world (Rom. 12)."

Regarding the "Holy Spirit in the world", the report states: "The Holy Spirit, the Giver of life, continues to breathe life into all creation. As all life emanates from God and ultimately will return to God (Ps. 104), the ethos of holiness requires holding an attitude towards all that exists as if it by nature belonged to God. We do not own ourselves, our bodies, our lives, the air and the soil. All is given by God... The Holy Spirit is at work among all peoples and faiths, and throughout the universe. With the sovereign freedom which belongs to God, the Wind blows wherever it wants." It concludes: "The Holy Spirit accompanies us on our ecumenical journey; keeps alive the vision that all things in heaven and on earth will be united in Christ; encourages, corrects, challenges and moves us forward until we come to our true unity and glory in God through Christ. Come, Holy Spirit, come!"

KONRAD RAISER

- T.F. Best & G. Gassmann eds, On the Way to Fuller Koinonia: Official Report of the Fifth World Conference on Faith and Order, WCC, 1994
- A. Bittlinger ed., The Church Is Charismatic: The World Council of Churches and the Charismatic Renewal, WCC, 1981
- "Come, Holy Spirit" (= ER, 41, 3, 1989)
- Confessing the One Faith: An Ecumenical Explication of the Apostolic Faith as It Is Confessed in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (381), WCC, 1991
- Joint Commission between the RCC and the World Methodist Council, Toward an Agreed Statement on the Holy Spirit, IS, 46, 1981
- V.M. Kärkkäinen, Spiritus ubi vult spirat: Pneumatology in Roman Catholic-Pentecostal Dialogue (1972-1989), Helsinki, Luther-Agricola Society, 1998
- G. Khodr, "Christianity in a Pluralistic World: The Work of the Holy Spirit", in Living Faiths and the Ecumenical Movement, S. Samartha ed., WCC, 1971
- M. Kinnamon ed., Signs of the Spirit: Official Report of the Seventh Assembly of the WCC, WCC, 1991
- G. Müller-Fahrenholz, God's Spirit: Transforming a World in Crisis, WCC, 1995
- N. Nissiotis, "The Pneumatological Aspect of the Catholicity of the Church", in What Unity Implies: Six Essays after Uppsala, WCC, 1969
- N. Nissiotis, "The Witness and the Service of Eastern Orthodoxy to the One Undivided Church", in The Orthodox Church in the Ecumenical Movement, C. Patelos ed., WCC, 1978
- S. Samartha, "The Holy Spirit and People of Various Faiths", in Courage for Dialogue, WCC, 1981
- L. Vischer ed., A Documentary History of the Faith and Order Movement 1927-1963, St Louis MO, Bethany, 1963
- L. Vischer ed., Spirit of God, Spirit of Christ: Ecu- menical Reflections on the Filioque Controversy, WCC, 1981 ■ A. Yong, Discerning the Spirit(s): A Pentecostal-Charismatic Contribution to Christian Theology of Religions, Sheffield, Academic Press, 2000.

HOMOSEXUALITY

THE TERM “homosexuality” usually refers to a persistent desire for and/or repeated engagement in intimate sexual behaviour with persons of the same sex; a distinction is made between “orientation” and “practice”. The phenomenon is known in many, perhaps all cultures, and appears in many forms; but the term “homosexuality” was invented in the 19th century by European physicians who viewed this as a medical condition, a kind of “third sex”, and thus not a moral or cultural condition. Persons who were “of this condition” should, they said, not be treated as deviant or disordered males or females.

While earlier studies suggested that 7-10% of the population experience such orientations and/or engage in such practices on a sustained basis, more careful recent research set the figures at less than 3% for males and 1.5% for females. Comparative studies suggest that patterns vary cross-culturally and historically and that participation in same-sexed practices may increase or decrease as cultural values, social expectations and sexual opportunities change. Some say that sex is genetic but that sexual orientation, like gender, is a social construct.

The issue of homosexuality has prompted heated debates in North American and European Protestant churches, where family patterns are changing rapidly and matters of sexuality and gender were already under discussion. The main issues in the debate can be identified:

1. The advocates for change view contemporary societies as trapped in an archaic, imposed moralism, backed by forms of religiosity that crush freedom and deny the variety and particularity of personal needs and relationships. Often they claim that resistance is rooted in “homophobia”, an irrational fear of sexual ambiguity or difference, or “heterosexism”, an attempt to defend or enforce older standards by reasoned, if mistaken, conviction.

Those who hold to heterosexual norms acknowledge that some resistance to change is homophobic, but deny that all of it is. They affirm that heterosexuality is normative, based on scripture, tradition, reason and the deepest experiences of true love humans have known.

2. Advocates point out that homosexuality is rarely mentioned in the Bible, and while all of the references are negative, some are only ambiguously so, or are based in now discarded teachings about ritual purity, property or the need to procreate for survival. Still others refer to behaviours that were condemned because they were exploitative, violent or otherwise unrelated to sustained, mutual, caring relationships between consenting adults in private.

Defenders of more classical views argue that homosexuality is rarely mentioned in the Bible because the moral presumptions throughout scripture are clear: God created humans male and female, made reproduction and companionship with an “other” possible and established a structure for sexual relations that is genuinely humane, and not altered by whatever distortions may be present in obsolete ritual behaviour, property law, procreative needs or subsequent interpretations and use of texts. They sometimes accuse advocates of manipulating texts to remove obvious ethical meanings.

3. Advocates claim that the church has long promulgated or accepted false doctrines about the right order of things – slavery, kingship and patriarchy – and allied itself with false understandings of the way the world works, as seen in its opposition to Galileo, Darwin and some modern social science. They claim that negative attitudes towards homosexuality are another instance of dogmatic closure to new insight, of holding that there is one right order.

Others disagree, arguing that prophetic voices in the church have historically opposed the exploitation of workers, political domination by arbitrary authority and the oppression of women, and that wherever the gospel has been carried it has borne the seeds of justice with it, promoted human rights for all and welcomed the insights of science. Contritely recognizing that Christians have not always been consistent in this, they claim that the truly prophetic stand today denies that there is no right order of things and doubts the scientific validity of evidence used to back arguments for the moral approval of homosexuality.

4. Advocates often hold that the churches' view of "nature" needs challenge, for it has confused sexuality with oppressive gender roles and failed to recognize that God saw the creation as "good". Thus, it has denied both the goodness of sexuality and ignored the fact that some people experience themselves as homosexual by nature, and that orientation as good.

The proponents of a more classic view often draw a distinction between the goodness of creation as made by God and the experiences we have of what is "natural" in a fallen world, which may need transformation. Those who accent natural law* theory in ethics, meanwhile, argue that nature as we encounter it may be disordered, even if pleasing, and may need to be converted, rightly re-ordered according to God's primal design and higher purpose.

5. Many advocates argue that it is immoral to deny the experience of love that some find in same-sex relationships, and that since genuine love is rare, precious and possibly an indicator of God's redemptive power, it is legalistic, even flatly unethical, to deny the reality of these experiences – especially since some cannot find love heterosexually. Others argue that to say that God is love does not mean that love is God, and that it is not legalism but ethical wisdom to identify the marks and forms of love as they bear on all areas of life, including sexuality. Some may find affection only in same-sex relationships, and this is not to be utterly condemned; but few hold that experience itself can generate ethical norms. Experience needs moral and spiritual discernment and guidance, by reason, Tradition* and scripture.

After years of intense and often rancorous discussion of such matters, various church bodies are coming to decision on homosexuality, generally by modulating, while re-affirming classic norms. Debates remain, but a summary of the present, uneasy consensus can be stated: (1) Most churches affirm that genital activity is a moral issue, and should be confined to monogamous, enduring, heterosexual marriage. Celibacy is strongly commended for singles. (2) Most churches support the human rights of those who do not conform to these ideals, but deny approval to extra-marital or homosexual behaviour, or to same-sex marriage. (3) Most churches deny ordination* to those engaging in homosexual practice, and some withhold the privilege of pulpit from those who argue that same-sex unions are equal to heterosexual ones. (4) Most churches advocate pastoral care for adults who are single but sexually active, including those who see themselves as homosexuals, even if their behaviours are not approved. (5) An increasing number of churches have accepted feminist arguments about justice in regard to the equality of the sexes in church and society, but resist efforts to view all social issues in gender terms or to treat homosexuality as the same kind of issue.

While the general contours of this set of debates have remained constant for more than a decade, one new element has to do with whether or not clergy may approve, even if they do not perform or officially bless, "civil unions" – a kind of state-ratified social contract between same-sex partners that does not call the relationship marriage, but allows certain legal privileges (health or tax benefits, co-ownership of property, etc.) to be administered on the same basis as a marriage. Policies in this direction inside or outside the church are vigorously opposed by church leaders in Africa, Asia and Latin America against the "decadent sexual morality" advocated by "liberals" in the West, as well as by Catholic, Orthodox and Evangelical branches of the Christian family in the West. Nevertheless, the practice has been adopted in the Netherlands and in the state of Vermont in the USA and is being discussed elsewhere. The question raises the issue of the role of the church in giving moral instruction to state authority on matters where equity and freedom appear to contradict long traditions of biblical, sacramental and moral views of the better ways to order human love.

It is uncertain what impact such views will have on cultural and political debates over "family values" generally and over public policies governing homosexuality, privacy and marriage,* nor is it yet clear how legal decisions in various contexts may influence the churches. Convictions on these issues are intense, and it is possible that minority advocates will form or join dissenting church bodies. Protestant churches which sustain something like the described consensus, however, are likely to find themselves drawn closer to Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic and evangelical communions, where comparable norms are well established.

See also ethics, sexual.

MAX L. STACKHOUSE

■ A.A. Brash, Facing Our Differences: The Churches and Their Gay and Lesbian Members, WCC, 1995 ■ L. Cahill, Sex, Gender, and Christian Ethics, New York, Cambridge UP, 1996 ■ ER, 50, 1, 1998 ■ D.F. Greenberg, The Construction of Homosexuality, Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1988 ■ D. Kessler ed., Together on the Way, WCC, 1999, pp.145-46 ■ C.-L. Seow ed., Homosexuality and Christian Community, Louisville KY, Westminster/John Knox, 1996 ■ M.L. Stackhouse, Covenant and Commitments: Faith, Family and Economic Life, Louisville KY, Westminster/John Knox, 1997.

HOPE

THE CHARACTERISTIC emphasis in 20th-century ecumenical discussions of Christian hope has been the linking of hope for church unity,* for the healing of human community and for the evangelization of the world. The joining together of movements representing these hopes at mid-century to create a new World Council of Churches posed a large theological question: What is our “one hope” of which the scriptures speak?

Much occurred in the succeeding years to test and darken these hopes. Faith and Order’s* optimism about “church union” was encountering Amsterdam’s acknowledgment of “our deepest difference”. Life and Work’s* confidence about social amelioration was facing “rapid social change” and a clamour of conflicting ideologies. And as for mission,* it was shaken to its foundations by the realization that the sending and receiving institutions, and the agreements which had served the cause so well, needed not repair but fundamental re-design in a world where the majority of Christians now lived outside the North Atlantic region.

Such considerations contributed to the choice of “Christ – the Hope of the World” as the theme for the WCC’s Evanston assembly (1954), a choice whose vitality and timeliness were attested by the sharp controversy which came with it. An advisory commission of 32 theologians spent three years drafting a 51-page text that offered a profound discussion of the ultimate Christian hope and its relation to the more provisional hopes of our time.

The commission’s report makes a sustained effort to view the various basic ecumenical concerns in the light of “Christ our hope”. Because his kingdom is to come, “the pilgrim people of God”* have realistic hope for their unity and their mission. And the rich meaning in this Christian hope for our “earthly tasks” in history* requires us to be in dialogue with other “hopes of our time”: democratic humanism, scientific humanism, Marxism, national and religious renaissance, the hope of the hopeless.

For whatever reasons, this direct excursion into eschatology* did not bring consensus or even convergence in the early 1950s. The more impressive work on what we hope for as churches actually took place in the narrower church unity discussion during these years, especially in the straightforward attempt to define the nature of “the unity we seek” in the famous New Delhi statement of 1961 about “all in each place” seeking communion* with “the whole Christian fellowship in all places and all ages”.

The 1960s brought new dimensions into the discussion of the unity we hope for. A new third-world majority in the Christian household of faith was urgently asking for an ecumenical vision of hope which was relevant to the rapid social changes in the human community as such. Everywhere there were growing demands that “the unity we seek” deal not simply with confessional divisions but with racism,* sexism* and classism as church-dividing issues. Moreover, weighty new ecumenical voices from Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches brought powerful new momentum and a demand for apostolic depth to this growing discussion about ecumenical hopes.

Indeed, a crucial contribution came from Vatican II’s* emphasis upon the sacramentality of the church, and the new light which this ecclesiology brought to the Council’s vision of “the church in the modern world” (Gaudium et Spes). In Uppsala (1968) the WCC underwent a parallel development: a fresh perception of the catholicity of the church opened the door to the importance of church unity for human community. "The church is bold in speaking of itself as the sign of the coming unity of mankind."

THE F&O STUDY OF CHRISTIAN HOPE

Against this background, F&O undertook an ambitious study in the 1970s, not only of the relation of church unity to human community, but also of the Christian hope which both share. The study was called, after 1 Pet. 3:15, "Giving Account of the Hope That Is within Us", and began not with an international group of theologians but with scores of local study groups attempting to produce "accounts of hope" relevant to their own situations. At Accra (1974) the F&O commission was then charged with attempting, in the light of these particular hopes, to give "a common account". To its credit, this meeting refused to make a universal "a-political, non-ideological" statement. It honestly presented a statement faithful to the local statements and frankly faced the challenge of a conflicting plurality of hopes within the Christian community. "There is only one hope in Christ, but many relevant ways of expressing it."

After four years of further study the attempt to give "a common account" was renewed at Bangalore (1978), where, after 18 days of intense debate and re-drafting, "A Common Account of Hope" was unanimously adopted by the entire commission. The text openly faces the problem: "hopes encounter hopes", yet "we refuse to believe that the hopes of humankind are ultimately contradictory". A Trinitarian confession then spells out "our hope in God", and an ecclesiological section deals with the church* as "a communion of hope" which "provides the possibility of encounter across human barriers". This section also includes honest confession about "how we in our churches actually look" in spite of our hopes "to establish a credible communion". The statement then turns to hope for the human community. Rather than trying to generalize on the vast situational diversity in local studies, the account attempts to identify common international threats to Christian hope which F&O itself faces as an international community: excessive concentrations of power, increasing capacity to shape the physical world, growth of armaments, attacks upon human community, assaults on human dignity, the sense of meaninglessness and absurdity. "We believe that each rightful action counts because God blesses it... The Christian hope is a resistance movement against fatalism." And the text concludes with a much-quoted section on "hope as the invitation to risk".

OUTWORKINGS

In subsequent F&O work, the study on hope was perhaps most directly related to the study on "The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community" (1984-92), in which the essential move was to view both humanity and the church in the light of the kingdom. The kingdom with its judgment and its promise is addressed to the whole of humanity. The church is that part of humanity which receives and affirms the mission of proclaiming the kingdom as its effective sign and instrument. In the perspective of the kingdom it is then possible to speak of the relation of church and world* without one-sided distortion. They belong together eschatologically; the church is truly in the world, even if not of it; and their close inter-relation shapes the life and mission of the church both as the mystery of the presence of Christ's body among us and as the prophetic sign or instrument of God's grace for the world. On this basis the study then addresses the relationship between the search for unity among – and within – the churches, and the churches' calling to mission, witness and service. This link is explored in light of the churches' engagement in the specific areas of prophetic witness for justice and the community of women and men. Strikingly, the final chapter of Church and World, the culminating report from the study, ends with a strong affirmation of Christian eschatological hope – not as an escape from Christian engagement with issues of the day, but precisely as the foundation of and empowerment for that engagement. Thus the unity and renewal study was fully in accord with the "characteristic emphasis" in ecumenical discussions of hope.

The hope study also led directly to the major new study of the 1980s, "Towards a Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today". "Doctrine divides," said an earlier ecumenical dictum. But it was the experience of the study on hope which encouraged F&O to begin the more difficult project, with its unavoidable questions of apostolicity* and ecclesial teaching authority.*

Finally, the hope study has strengthened the provisional ecumenical hopes invested in the “Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry”* study. The BEM text is completed: the urgent questions about it have to do with the reception among the churches of the apostolic faith to which it bears witness. BEM has thus become a concrete question of Christian hope for the church unity movement. And BEM’s claim to be a statement that is a “convergence”, not yet a “consensus”,* confronts the ecumenical movement with a fresh theme. What, actually, is a “convergence”? If, as has been claimed, a convergence envisions a point of consensus out ahead of the churches which responsible theological judgment in each church considers attainable in faithfulness to its own confession of the apostolic faith, then a so-called convergence is nothing less than a concrete expression of Christian hope. Bangalore’s vision of the church as a communion of hope and of hope as the invitation to risk then becomes directly relevant to the quest for visible eucharistic fellowship among the churches.

The notion of hope received a renewed prominence as one aspect of the theme (“Turn to God – Rejoice in Hope!”) for the WCC’s eighth assembly (Harare 1998). Pre-assembly reflection on the theme emphasized the distinct qualities of Christian hope: it is radical and world-challenging, rooted in God’s act of salvation through the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ (Rom. 1:4); it is inclusive, grounded in the vision of Christ as the incohering principle of all creation (Eph. 1:10); it is eschatological, sustained by the power of the Spirit which draws us and all creation towards that liberation and transformation which God wills as our final destiny.

The assembly’s opening plenary placed the notion of hope within the context of its partners anamnesis (that active “remembering” which makes present the past and anticipates the future) and metanoia (the “repentance” rooted in our awareness of the pain and suffering in the world, and committing us to newness of life). Hope crowns these, rooted as it is in the mystery “of a compassionate God who embraces the world” so that “the more desperate the world becomes, the more intimate and determined becomes the life-sustaining embrace of God” (Koyama). Hope confounds our expectations and limitations, opening us for love and just service to all humanity.

It is clear that the dimension of hope is fundamental to the Christian life, to the life of the churches and to the churches’ continuing search for a common confession, witness and service before the world. Therefore the theme of hope must, in whatever form, remain on the ecumenical agenda.

See also kingdom of God, salvation history.

JOHN DESCHNER

■ R. Bauckham & T. Hart, Hope against Hope: Christian Eschatology in Contemporary Context, London, Darton, Longman & Todd, 1999

■ T.F. Best, “Turn to God – Rejoice in Hope!”: An Approach to the Theme of the Eighth WCC Assembly”, ER, 48, 3, 1996 ■ Church and World: The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community, 2nd rev., WCC, 1992 ■ Faith and Order, Louvain 1971: Reports and Documents, WCC, 1971 ■ For the Years Ahead: Programme of the Commission on Faith and Order, WCC, 1976 ■ D. Kessler ed., Together on the Way, WCC, 1999, pp.28-42 ■ Minutes of the Meeting of the Standing Commission, 1977, Loccum, WCC, 1977 ■ Minutes of the Working Committee, 1972, Utrecht, and 1973, Zagorsk ■ Report of the Advisory Commission on the Main Theme of the Second Assembly: Christ – the Hope of the World, New York, Harper, 1954 ■ Sharing in One Hope: Commission on Faith and Order, Bangalore 1978, WCC, 1978.

HOUSE CHURCH

IT COULD be said that a house church is the oldest form of Christian gathering. New Testament Christians met in prayer, worship and eucharist in private homes (Mark 14:15 and par.; Acts 1:13-14, 20:7-9). Before the building of basilicas and cathedrals began in the 4th century, archaeological evidence confirms that house churches were the usual site of Christian liturgical gatherings. Today, however, the term “house church” is associated specifically with certain kinds of Christian community in China and in Britain.

In China, the term “house churches” refers generally to groups outside the formal structures of the China Christian Council. They range from small fellowship groups regularly worshipping in homes to huge congregations of hundreds of people organized into closely built networks spanning several provinces and running income-generating enterprises. Some have come into being because there are no public churches in the area to serve the aged believers; others are intentional communities seeking freedom of expression from religious and political authorities. During the years of the cultural revolution (1966-75), when all forms of organized religion were suppressed, house churches served as the only means of Christian fellowship and worship. Even then, the number was relatively small. With the modernization policy in the early 1980s, alongside the re-opening of thousands of public churches throughout China, house churches have blossomed in rural areas. By the end of 1988, the China Christian Council reported 20,602 "meeting points", the official name for house churches. House churches in China own no one theological tradition. Generally, it is easy to detect influences from the Jesus Family, the Little Flock, China Inland Mission and, most prominently, a form of Pentecostalism* with emphasis on faith healing and exorcism, similar not so much to charismatic non-denominationalism as to Christian animism.

In the Church of England in the 1950s, priests such as E.W. Southcott in Leeds experimented with "house churches" as sub-units within the parish. In Britain and English-speaking countries (e.g., New Zealand), the term "house churches" is now used of networks of charismatic, non-denominational churches originating from conferences convened by David Lillie and Arthur Wallis in Britain in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Plymouth Brethren ecclesiology and Pentecostal pneumatology combine in house church theology for the "restoration" of the church. Early teachers were largely from these two denominations. In the early 1950s George North ministered "Wesleyan Holiness" in many small home groups, and Sidney Purse at Chard introduced, from the "Jesus Only" Pentecostal movement, deliverance and healing. These, together with a general spiritual hunger for new church life in the country, contributed, along with the charismatic quest, to the movement's rise in the 1960s.

Today "house churches" is a misnomer because many meet in large premises, even church buildings. But the emphasis on local church, charismatic worship and gifts, relationships, a radical discipling (at one time called heavy shepherding, introduced by Ern Baxter from the USA in 1974) is still characteristic. The fivefold ministries of Eph. 4:11 are restored, and groups of churches are led by different leaders who, though divided, yet remain in fellowship and share a common vision for the church and the kingdom (which is primarily for this age). In the early phases evangelism, interchurch relations and social action were low on the agenda. This has now changed. The house churches have been acknowledged as a stimulus and catalyst by many mainline churches.

See also church base communities.

RAYMOND FUNG and ROGER T. FORSTER

■ R. Fung, Households of God on China's Soil, WCC, 1982 ■ A. Walker, Restoring the Kingdom, rev. ed., London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1998.

HROMÁDKA, JOSEF LUKL

B. 8 June 1889, Hodslavice, Moravia, Czechoslovakia; d. 26 Dec. 1970, Prague. Theologian, ecumenist and pioneer of Christian-Marxist dialogue, he was founder of the Christian Peace Conference,* vice-president of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (1954-64) and long-time member of the WCC central and executive committees.

Hromádka began teaching systematic theology at the John Hus faculty in Prague in 1920. His outspoken opposition to Nazism put him at risk when the Germans invaded Czechoslovakia in 1938; he then went to the US, where he taught apologetics and ethics at Princeton Theological Seminary until 1947. Returning to Prague after the war, he became dean of the Comenius faculty of Protestant theology in 1950, a post he held until 1964. Influenced by the philosophy of T.G. Mazaryk and the theology of Ernst Troeltsch, Hromádka took great interest in the role of the church and religion in a secularized world. He studied Roman Catholicism and its re-evaluation in the eyes of Czech Protestants; and in order to understand Orthodoxy, he learned Russian and read Russian literature and theology.

Hromádka's involvement in the ecumenical movement was long and varied. An architect of 1918 unification of Lutherans and Reformed in the Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren, he was also a founder of the Union of Evangelical Churches in Czechoslovakia (1926). Internationally, he attended conferences of the World Alliance for Promoting Friendship through the Churches (1928) and Faith and Order (1937), on whose commission he served until 1961. At the WCC's founding assembly in Amsterdam in 1948 (where he was elected to the first of his three terms on the central committee), Hromádka defended the socialist revolution in a famous exchange with US Presbyterian (later secretary of state) John Foster Dulles.

Convinced that "Western civilization" was a spent force in world history, Hromádka emphasized the socialist vision of a society "in which man will be free of all external greed, mammon and material tyranny, and in which a fellowship of real human beings in mutual sympathy, love and goodwill will be established". In 1950 he protested that the WCC's approval of the United Nations action in Korea represented a yielding "to the mood of one side of the present world".

During the late 1950s a number of European theologians began to speak out against the nuclear armament of West Germany. Their platform, under the leadership of Hromádka, led to the founding of the Christian Peace Conference (CPC), of which he was president until shortly before his death. Warning that rigid anti-communism would lead to catastrophe, he devoted much of his attention in the 1960s to Christian-Marxist dialogue, both in his country and abroad, and sought to maintain contacts between Western and Eastern churches by inviting Christians from abroad to travel "behind the iron curtain" (see Marxist-Christian dialogue).

When Warsaw pact troops invaded Czechoslovakia in 1968, crushing the "Prague spring" and its effort to build "socialism with a human face", Hromádka wrote to the ambassador of the USSR in Prague that "the Soviet government could not have committed a more tragic error... The moral weight of socialism and communism has been shattered for a long time to come. Only an immediate withdrawal of the occupation forces would, at least in part, moderate our common misfortune." In 1969 he resigned from the CPC.

Though respected for his courage and integrity, Hromádka's views aroused a good deal of criticism, also from his friends in the West. Barth – himself attacked for complaining about the anti-communism of some theologians – wrote to Hromádka in 1962 that he was disturbed "by the arbitrariness with which you not only champion one of the fronts personally but also expect the church and the world to do the same". A successor to Hromádka as ethics professor at Princeton, Charles West, suggested in Communism and the Theologians (1958) that Hromádka had a "naive unanalytical picture of social history" and criticized his "silence in the face of flagrant violations of other men's freedom and welfare..., lack of searching critique towards his own society... and acquiescence in government control of the church itself".

In a tribute at his funeral, WCC general secretary Eugene Carson Blake, calling Hromádka "a man of hope... despite his deep disappointments", noted that "many Americans during the cold war supposed he must be a communist and therefore an enemy, while many communists distrusted his loyalty even while for 21 years he was the strongest force in Eastern Europe in persuading his fellow churchmen to support in faith and hope their revolutionary socialist governments and societies. During these same 21 years he was the outstanding moral interpreter to the West of the vision of justice and peace that has inspired the best in the socialist nations.”

ANS VAN DER BENT

■ J. Hromádka, Doom and Resurrection, London, SCM Press, 1945 ■ Thoughts of a Czech Pastor, London, SCM Press, 1970 ■ D. Neumärker, Josef L. Hromádka, Munich, Kaiser, 1974 ■ M. Opořenský ed., From the Reformation to Tomorrow: In Memory and Appreciation of Josef L. Hromádka, 1889-1969, Geneva, WARC, 1999 ■ J. Smolik ed., Von Amsterdam nach Prag: Eine ökumenische Freundschaft an Josef L. Hromádka, Hamburg, Herbert Reich, 1969.

HUMAN RIGHTS

THE SCHOLARLY formulations contained in many of today's human rights instruments do scant justice to the driving force behind them: the determination of people demanding respect for their human dignity. The conviction that the human person has inherent worth and dignity is as old as the experience of oppression. The modern term “human rights” derives from the notion that on the grounds of these paramount values, limits and duties can be placed upon authorities and the community, nationally and internationally, and that these can be codified and guaranteed by law (see international law).

The Stoic idea that all human beings have a common nature and the Judaic teaching that all people are created in the image of God are two striking ancient examples of concern for human rights. The Magna Carta, granted more than seven centuries ago, is often seen as the point of departure for modern human rights.

In the wake of the Reformation and the European religious conflicts of the 16th and 17th centuries, safeguards for religious tolerance and civil liberties began to be enacted in law, most explicitly in England with the bill of rights of 1689. The rights guaranteed in these documents, however, are tied to citizenship or social class. The American revolutionaries who framed the Virginia Declaration of Rights in 1776 went a step further by ascribing innate rights, independent of status within a society or state. This conception was incorporated into the 1789 US constitution by means of the amendments of 1790.

The 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, one of the initial documents of the French revolution, was infused with the anti-clerical spirit of the revolution itself. Whereas the American human rights conception was based on Christian enlightenment and natural law,* the French version derived exclusively from rational philosophy. “Human” rights were juxtaposed to the “divine” rights of monarchs, the traditional recipients of the church's patronage. This was a major reason why Roman Catholic and Orthodox teaching as well as most Protestant theology on the European continent rejected the notion of human rights, preferring instead to emphasize human duties.

The profitability of colonialism* and the industrial revolution were prominent factors in the rise to power of the merchant and manufacturing classes, who managed nevertheless to introduce certain human rights into practically all European constitutions during the 19th century. These were almost exclusively what has more recently been termed the first generation of rights, “bourgeois” freedoms guaranteeing the right to personal property* and the free accumulation of wealth. They required of the state a laissez-faire attitude, non-interference in free trade and economic competition.

The granting of civil and political freedoms meant little to the emerging industrial working class, who found themselves in an unprecedented straitjacket of exploitation. Marx and Engels's Communist Manifesto of 1848 inspired a re-thinking of human rights, requiring of the state a positive intervention for the good of the majority. Although many measures for the implementation of these social and economic rights achieved legal expression through the activities of labour unions, it was only after the Russian revolution of 1917 that states began to guarantee such “second-generation” rights as employment and fair working conditions, education, health care and social security (see labour).

The 20th-century struggles against colonialism and for independence highlighted more the human rights of collectivities than those due to individuals. Emerging nations were demanding the right to self-determination and to development, freedom from want and aggression. To these “third-generation” rights were added newer concepts related to concerns about peace* and the environment, sometimes referred to as the rights of future generations.

The idea of the universality of human rights, with a validity not only independent of the legal constraints of governments but also as an international responsibility, gained new respectability in the wake of the wanton disregard for human dignity during the second world war, symbolized by Auschwitz and Hiroshima. At the inception of the United Nations,* the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (10 December 1948) linked world peace and the respect for human rights, stressing that “recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world”.

To make the contents of the declaration binding obligations of international law, various conventions relating to human rights have been formulated and ratified, the most important of which are the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, adopted in 1966. Regional human rights instruments have also been created, notably the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 1950, the American Convention on Human Rights of 1969 and the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights of 1981.

CONTENT

This survey shows that the content of human rights is open-ended, related to the forms of inequality and oppression against which individuals, groups or nations demand their rights. As new expressions of injustice arise, human rights standards must be expanded or refined. Nevertheless, the foundation on which all human rights are constructed includes four basic elements: (1) Human rights affirm the inviolability of the person.* Life, physical and psychological integrity, and privacy of the family, home, correspondence and property are protected against violation, intrusion or dispossession. (2) Human rights uphold freedom over against illegal restriction, especially on the part of state power; this includes freedom of thought, conscience and religion, of opinion and expression, of movement, assembly and association. (3) Human rights proclaim the equality of all persons, precluding discrimination on the basis of distinctions of any kind. (4) Human rights postulate participation in decisions affecting the life of society, as well as in the production and consumption of society’s goods.

The heated ideological debate between proponents of first- and second-generation rights has merely served as a smokescreen for governments to delay the full implementation of both. If all four basic elements of inviolability, freedom, equality and participation are taken seriously, then the question of priorities in human rights becomes a pragmatic matter. Those immediately threatened with death will seek the implementation of the right to life as a priority. Those marginalized by decision-making processes will seek political freedoms.

More useful distinctions can be made regarding the nature of the obligation involved in the respective rights. Some rights are immediately enforceable, while others involve programmatic aspects that require time and perhaps even systemic social or economic changes for their implementation. Those rights requiring a negative obligation of the state, such as not intruding, interfering or discriminating, are presently demandable no matter what the political system or the level of economic development. When the obligation involved is positive, where the state has to do or to give something as a contribution to the fulfilment of some economic or social right such as work, education or health care, full implementation will depend on appropriate means and programmes. When these are lacking, the immediately enforceable right to participate in political decision making becomes a high priority.

THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATIONS

In light of early official church opposition to human rights, that they viewed for

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

much of their history as the product of humanistic philosophy, the claim of a "theological basis of human rights" might be considered somewhat presumptuous. It is only after the second world war that serious theological work related to human rights surfaced, and even then much of it concentrated solely on the right to religious liberty. In the Roman Catholic Church, human rights received official sanction through Pope John XXIII's encyclical Pacem in Terris (1963) and in the Second Vatican Council's pastoral constitution Gaudium et Spes (1965). Ecumenically, the WCC coordinated an interconfessional study project on theology and human rights beginning in 1979, in which Anglican, Lutheran, Reformed, Baptist and Methodist world bodies as well as the preparatory committee of the pan-Orthodox council and the Pontifical Commission for Justice and Peace participated.

Institutional efforts which for the most part try to derive human rights systematically from traditional theological concepts such as natural law, covenant,* grace,* Christology or redemption* have been criticized for functionalizing theology in order to re-gain the churches' credibility or to justify Christian engagement in human rights activities. Such an approach differs radically from that adopted by Christians and theologians who are themselves engaged at the forefront of human rights struggles, impelled by their Christian faith, but without an articulated prior justification. Theological literature emanating from Christian reflection on concrete life-and-death experiences grew rapidly in the 1970s, especially in regions where the violation of human rights was most severe. Much of this discussion evaded or resisted systematic classification according to traditional theological categories and was therefore open to controversy, as for example Latin American liberation theology,* Korean minjung theology* or the Kairós document* by South African theologians. The free development of such unorthodox theological approaches itself became a human rights claim and raised the question as to whether the limits imposed by church hierarchies on theological or ecumenical dialogue are themselves an infringement of human rights.

ECUMENICAL ACTIVITIES

The ecumenical movement has accompanied and at times led the human rights movement at local, national and international levels. O. Frederick Nolde, the first director of the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs (CCIA), served as a consultant on religious liberty* and freedom of conscience to the drafters of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights from 1946 to 1948. The WCC's inaugural assembly in Amsterdam (1948) issued a declaration on religious liberty and underlined the importance of the churches' work for human rights. For 40 years the WCC continued to sharpen its concern, highlighting particular violations, e.g. racism (1968), torture (1977), and extra-judicial executions (1982).

While statements were being made regularly over the years in international ecumenical circles, it was the local churches living in situations of oppression which pioneered the methods of effective church activities and underlined the need for international solidarity. At the international level, the churches underwent a learning process that took several decades before a consensus could be reached on the meaning of human rights, the nature of the churches' responsibilities and the strategies for effective action to combat violations.

Highlights in this history are the creation of the Programme to Combat Racism* following the WCC's Uppsala assembly in 1968, the consensus on an ecumenical understanding of human rights arrived at during the Nairobi assembly in 1975, the creation of a WCC Human Rights Resources Office for Latin America following a number of coups in that continent in the mid-1970s, the creation of a Human Rights Advisory Group within the CCIA in 1978, and the creation of numerous regional ecumenical human rights programmes.

Along with increased awareness of the extent and sophistication of contemporary human rights violations, ecumenical engagement at all levels in monitoring, advocacy and public education for human rights increased markedly in the 1980s. Christians of all confessions have suffered imprisonment, torture, disappearance and martyrdom as a result of their human rights activities. The right to be engaged in the struggle for justice and human dignity has itself become a component of religious liberty.

By the end of the 1980s, the realization that effective human rights work requires international ecumenical solidarity was put into practice through inter-regional exchange programmes among churches and human rights organizations. These experiences showed that the ecumenical community had to achieve far greater political sophistication in dealing with the root causes of human rights abuse, causes which are international in scope and cannot be dealt with by humanitarian approaches within offending countries alone.

During the 1990s, globalization and increasing interdependence of national economies had a negative impact on the social rights of workers, especially migrants. The rising importance of the economic and communal rights of peoples gained prominence at the 1993 UN conference on human rights in Vienna. Rights to a healthy environment, land access and land security were increasingly acknowledged as essential to the enjoyment of other recognized human rights. Fresh challenges from Asian and Islamic countries to Western interpretations of the universality of human rights encouraged critical dialogue in the international human rights community. The present conflict of views may intensify – or it may lead to genuine dialogue resulting in understanding of and consensus on the importance and dynamics of shared values and structures within regional societies, while discouraging exclusive cultural claims to exemption from human rights norms and practices.

Finally, the impunity from justice enjoyed by perpetrators of crimes against humanity, such as torture and the forced disappearance of persons in many regions of the world, has been sharply challenged by victims and their families, by advocates of international law and by the ecumenical community, particularly in Latin America. The South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission created after the fall of the apartheid* regime provided a significant model of how to deal with the question of past crimes in a way that could contribute to the post-conflict healing of societies. The programme of the WCC on impunity, truth and reconciliation created in 1993 has furthered legal, theological and pastoral thought and practice in this field.

See also Amnesty International, economics, land, migration, nation.

ERICH WEINGÄRTNER

- J.F. Collange, Théologie des droits de l'homme, Paris, Cerf, 1989
- H. Hannum, Guide to International Human Rights Practice, London, Macmillan, 1984
- C. Harper ed., Impunity: An Ethical Perspective, WCC, 1996
- Human Rights: A Compilation of International Instruments, Geneva, UN, 1983
- C. John ed., Human Rights and the Churches: New Challenges, WCC, 1998
- M. Reuver ed., Human Rights: A Challenge to Theology, Rome, CCIA/IDOC, 1983
- P. Sieghart, The International Law of Human Rights, Oxford, Clarendon, 1983
- T. Mitri ed., Religion and Human Rights: A Christian-Muslim Discussion, WCC, 1996
- E. Weingartner, "Human Rights on the Ecumenical Agenda", CCIA Background Information, 3, 1983
- E. Weingartner, Protecting Human Rights: A Manual for Practitioners, Geneva, CEC, 1994.

HUMANUM STUDIES

THE HUMANUM Studies, undertaken in the WCC between 1969 and 1975, were launched by the Uppsala assembly (1968) and grew out of the concern of the Geneva 1966 conference about the meaning of "humanization". Within the context of theological trends in the 1960s they may be seen as (1) a consequence of re-defining the mission of the church in terms of the agenda of the world in the light of missio Dei;* (2) an ecumenical response to the rapidity of changes and developments, particularly in Western societies, as a result of technological and social progress; (3) a first attempt to develop an interdisciplinary methodology of ecumenical study and social thought in the light of a new appreciation of disciplines like sociology, psychology and anthropology.

The Humanum Studies were closely linked with the name of David Jenkins, a British theologian (later Anglican bishop of Durham) who contributed most of the 25 articles found in the WCC library's portfolio on Humanum Studies. The study was carried out in close cooperation with other contemporary WCC studies, including "The Future of Man and Society in a World of Science-based Technology" (Church and Society), "The Unity of the Church and the Unity of Mankind" (Faith and Order), "Humanization and Mission: The Role of Christians in Changing Institutions" – all reflecting the shift in interest to the social and human dimension of the gospel in the 1960s. The contributions – most of them published in Study Encounter and Anticipation – covered a wide range of issues from the theology of development and the understanding of human rights to problems of biotechnology and human criteria of health care. This reflected the twofold emphasis of the Humanum Studies – a "survey of the secular", trying to discern the contemporary frontiers where human dignity was at stake, and a search for a theological interpretation of the problem area involved which could provide a meaningful orientation and bridge the gap between Christian tradition and contemporary experience.

However, the final report of the study, presented to the WCC central committee in Berlin 1974 under the title "The Anguish of Man, the Praise of God and the Repentance of the Church", centred on fundamental issues of theological methodology, reflecting a remarkable shift in emphasis from the question "What is man?" to the question "How do we do theology?" Rather than producing a deductive and universally applicable Christian doctrine of the human, the studies thus led to a passionate plea for methodologically taking seriously the social context and contemporary struggles to be human "in all their anguish and richness". The question of what the human really is led to a fundamental critique of detached ways of doing theology which, according to the study, have not yet been overcome in the churches and can in themselves be dehumanizing. A realistic account of both human suffering and liberation was seen as vital for any genuine theological study. Christological insights formed the basis for this approach: "The true motivating forces for understanding and coming to grips with 'the Humanum' are, as we have called them, the anguish of man and the praise of God uniquely united and reconciled with one another in Jesus Christ." This inter-relation of a Christology of incarnation and a theological methodology of contextuality constituted the long-term importance of the Humanum Studies for ecumenical social ethics. The final report affirmed: "The incarnation of Jesus Christ declares to us that the nearer we come to reality the nearer we come to God, and that the more accurately we achieve an analysis of reality the more closely we come to suffering and sharing with God in his redemptive and creative work."

The Humanum Studies thus provided the theological and methodological rationale for the immense widening of the horizon of ecumenical social thinking in the action-oriented period after Uppsala, with the WCC initiating programmes on development,* racism,* sexism,* human rights.* Without reducing theology to anthropology, they made it clear that the contemporary quest for the "human" is a crucial way of asking for God and is thus the theological question of modern times. They also paved the way for the development of contextual theologies in non-Western countries by clearly criticizing Western cultural particularism and enquiring into the sources of "indigenous cultural energies" in the "development of responsible indigenous theologies" for the non-Western world (see Humanum Studies: A Collection of Documents, pp.45f. and 97ff.). Finally, they produced new insights with regard to interdisciplinary and cooperative methodologies in applying social sciences to ecumenical social ethics.

The Humanum Studies remain relevant in this respect, even though they came only at the beginning of the process of re-formulating Christian anthropology and the meaning of humanization in an age of ecological awareness. Jenkins's far-reaching recommendations about the structure and inter-relation of the WCC's programmes (made in his final paper, "Implications of the Humanum Studies for the Future Programmes of the WCC") are still pertinent. A continuation of the theological concerns of the Humanum Studies is reflected in both the WCC study on "The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Humankind" and the Lutheran World Federation study on "The Identity of the Church and Its Service to the Whole Human Being".

DIETRICH WERNER

■ D.J. Coles, The Search for Methods in Contemporary Ecumenical Social Ethics, thesis, Univ. of Manchester, England, 1973 ■ Hu-

manum Studies 1969-1975: A Collection of Documents, WCC, 1975 ■ D. Jenkins, "Man's Inhumanity to Man: The Direction and Purpose of the Humanum Studies", ER, 25, 1, 1973 ■ K. Raiser, "Prozess für den Menschen: Das Humanum-Studienprojekt des ÖRK", in Ev. Komm., 6, 1973 ■ P.A. Stauffer, The Meaning of Humanization: An Emerging Understanding of Man in WCC Discussions 1965-1970, Ann Arbor MI, University Microfilms, 1972.

HYMNS

SINGING is fundamentally an ecumenical activity, both in the spatial sense (we know of no peoples in the world who do not sing as an integral part of their culture)* and in the temporal sense (anthropologists say that in the process of human evolution singing came into being even before speech).

In individuals, singing is one of the most intimate and profound expressions of the human being, coming from the very heart. Sung sound, technically defined as "the musical expression, through the voice, of every emotion suggested by thought and imagination" (Groves' Dictionary of Music and Musicians), thus becomes an expansion of the singer's spirit and was recognized as such by the church fathers, who described tunes sung to the word "Hallelujah" as the climax of the believers' praise and prayer, poured out when they could not organize their ideas articulately to express their feelings. Augustine commented: Qui cantat bene, bis orati – Who sings well, twice prays.

GROUP SINGING: UNISON

Singing is most expressive and impressive when done in community. The uniting of many voices – in a new expression different from each of them individually – in unison has a privileged place in most Eastern civilizations. It is a symbol of joining everyone's spirit in one as well as a basic focus for concentration and meditation, i.e. mystical activity with a strong emphasis on the emotions (see selection 1).

Unison is the sound preferred in the Gregorian chants, associated with the papacy of Gregory the Great (1073-85), and the Genevan Psalter, which came into being around John Calvin (1509-64) – but for reasons wholly different from those mentioned regarding Eastern music.

Even though the strong influence of the beauty of the Gregorian chant on Eastern music is well documented by musicologists, the strict control of its theory and practice implemented when it was codified in Rome gave it the character of "official church music", identified with the papacy's attitude of expanding dominance at that period. Unison thus "subjected to rules" came to express the profound cohesion of an ecclesiastical elite and an oikoumene seen as having its centre in Rome. Through Gregory's missionary activity the form of singing which bears his name was imposed throughout the known world and sometimes overwhelmed local cultural expressions such as the Ambrosian hymns, genuine community forms associated with Ambrose, bishop of Milan (d.397).

The Genevan psalms were sung in unison for a different reason, though it was stated with the same authoritarian emphasis. Calvin inherited from Augustine a fear that music would distract worshippers or create in them emotions whose strength would obscure the clear sense of the word; thus he strictly forbade the use of musical instruments as an accompaniment (associated as they were with secular music) and multi-part harmony.

GROUP SINGING: POLYPHONY

As a variety of religious music, polyphony began in the northern hemisphere in the 12th century as a derivative of the Gregorian chant. It exists as a natural form in other parts of the world such as Africa, where it developed its own characteristics independent of European music, by which it was influenced through the missionary movement in the 18th century, as students of African cultures have shown. In the traditions which use polyphony, both in the North and the South, it is regarded as symbolizing the variety of expressions within an integrated, harmonious whole. In Africa, for example, this multiplicity of voices allows a high degree of freedom for individual improvisation alongside the group performance, thus adding a new dimension to the significance of the symbol.

In European Christianity polyphony is synonymous with freedom of expression, especially in terms of the artist's independence

I-to Loh, Taiwan

求 主 憐 憫 我 們 求 基 督
 Ch'iu__ Chu lien - min__ wo - men. Ch'iu__ Chi - tu Lord__, have mer - cy__ on us. Christ ____, have lien - min__ wo - men. Ch'iu__ Chu lien - min__ wo - men.

憐 憫 我 們 求 主 憐 憫 我 們
 mer - cy__ on us. Lord ____, have mer - cy__ on us.

Selection 1. Copyright © 1965 by I-to Loh. Used by permission. Reprinted from Jesus Christ – the Life of the World: A Worship Book for the Sixth Assembly, WCC, 1983, p.117.

from ecclesiastical direction. Not a few papal bulls and edicts tried to stem its luxuriant, disorderly and fascinating growth in the middle ages. Regulations specified in extravagant detail what was permitted and what was not, sometimes even deploying theological arguments. All of this merely served to stimulate the imagination and subtlety of the composers – at a period when polyphony had not yet attained the height of musical art which it would achieve in the northern hemisphere in the 18th century.

One of the most lowly and elementary forms of polyphonic music, called the “chorale” in Germany and “hymn” in England, became the most valuable tool of the churches from the time of the 16th-century Reformation, precisely because of its simple structure and straightforward, explicit nature. The idea of the priesthood of all believers is accompanied in Lutheranism by a clear encouragement of active participation in the worship by everyone. The challenge of making the semi-literate masses sing when they packed the cathedrals of 16th-century Germany surely has few parallels in the history of liturgy, music or education. Luther and his fellow workers met it by creating the chorale, adapting all kinds of musical expression to a simple form – Gregorian chants (as well as those of Ambrose, who was perhaps closer in spirit to Luther, a man of the people), folk tunes both religious and secular, contemporary popular songs and, of course, works they themselves produced.

The structure is simple. The same musical phrase is repeated several times, vocalization is infrequent, the original tune is found in the highest part of the harmony (so that it can be easily heard and reproduced), and it is given a lower register which is suitable for all voices. The organ sustains the whole force of the singing with its powerful accompaniment, and the choir (which is not abolished but encouraged) supports the congregation and also contributes to the final result with its own more elaborate polyphony (see selection 2).

Such a musical setting is clearly both impressive and expressive. The ancient Greek philosophers already recognized the importance of hymns both for committing basic content to memory and for creating appropriate modes of behaviour. Paul no doubt had something similar in mind when he juxtaposes singing of psalms, hymns and spiritual songs with teaching and exhortation (Col. 3:16). Of Luther, indeed, it is said that his enemies feared his songs more than his sermons.

It was in the 18th century that a second important step was taken in the development of the ecumenical character of liturgical singing. In 1737 John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, published the first modern “hymnal”, that is, a collection of hymns, psalms and chorales for worship, coming from a variety of traditions – in other words, “ecumenical” (so far as that was possible at that period). Musically, the Methodist hymns were quite different from those previously known. They did not have one note per syllable, and they used tunes with a great range of vocal and rhythmic development. This was largely due, no doubt, to the metrical variety of the poems by Charles Wesley, the movement's most prolific author, and to the attitude of John Wesley himself, who encouraged, rather than folk melodies, the use of elements from the non-ecclesiastical "classical" music of his day, thus breaking down the isolation of the church from secular modes of expression (for which he was widely and harshly criticized).

the world, perhaps dazzled by the splendour of what was in their trust, seldom appreciated the musical values in the cultures they encountered, and thus did not incorporate them into the treasury of Christian hymnody. In most cases, they rather overwhelmed the indigenous cultures and divorced the peoples from their own roots.

Germany / Johann Walter 1541 / Harm. 1934

1. All Mor - gen ist ganz frisch und neu des
1. Each mor - ning with its new - born light pro -

Her - ren Gnad und gro - ße Treu, sie hat kein End den
- claims the Lord of life is great! His faith - ful - ness will lan - gen Tag, drauf je - der sich ver - las - sen mag.

have no end; to him our songs of praise as - cend.

Selection 2. Original German text by Johannes Zwick. English text by Fred Kaan. English words copyright 1974 by Hope Publishing Company, Carol Stream IL 60188, USA, for the USA and Canada, and Stainer & Bell Ltd, London N3 1DZ, England, for all other territories.

Wesley's hymnal established the foundations for an ecumenical repertoire in the fields of music and liturgy.* Despite their many divisions, the churches of the West have been united by a musical inheritance that to a substantial extent cuts across all barriers to produce the surprising discovery, when church members encounter a different tradition, that "they sing the same songs we do"!

The missionaries entrusted with the export of these musical riches to the rest of

THIRD-WORLD HYMNODY

Two more centuries were to pass before the churches of the third world achieved enough awareness and strength to offer the rest of the Christian world their own musical expressions of faith on an equal footing with those of others, which till then had been regarded as "universal". The independence movements in Africa and the claims of the indigenous peoples and the African diaspora in the Americas, Australia and elsewhere certainly helped to create this confidence.

Misa Popular Salvadoreña: El Salvador

Muy movido

San - to, San - to es nues - tro Dios, Se - ñor de to - da la tie - rra, San - to, San - to es nues - tro Dios, San - to, San - to, San - to, San - to, San - to es nues - tro Dios, Se - ñor de to - da la his - to - ria San - to San - to es nues - tro Dios. Que a - com - pa - ña a nues - tro pue - blo, que vi - ve en nues - tras lu - chas, del u - ni - ver - so en - te - ro el ú - ni - co Se - ñor. Ben - di - tos los que en su nom - bre el E - van - ge - lio a - nun - cian, la bue - na y gran no - ti - cia de la li - be - ra - ción.

D.C. al Fine

Introducción y Final

Music and Spanish © Guillermo J. Cuellar, Residencial El Cortijo senda B#2, Ave. Monte Urales, Colonia Montebello, San Salvador, El Salvador.

Selection 3. Reprinted by permission of the composer, Guillermo Cuéllar, El Salvador.

While it is perhaps too early to evaluate the contribution by third-world Christians to hymnody, certain characteristics stand out clearly: the African musical idiom which fits so well the idea of participatory, spontaneous and expressive worship; the texts of Latin American songs for the strength and poetic imagination with which they state the claim for social justice as an unmistakable sign of the coming of the kingdom; the genuine expressions of folk culture in music from Christian base communities (e.g. the Salvadorean mass; see selection 3).

ECUMENICAL HYMNODY

The panorama of contemporary Christian hymnody is completed by a mention of poets who have given their work a clearly ecumenical focus that goes beyond their national or church origins. Two key figures are Fred Kaan, a Dutch native living in England, and Dieter Trautwein of Germany; associated with them on the musical side have been Erik Routley (England), Joseph Gelineau (France) and Doreen Potter (Jamaica). Their efforts culminated in the publication (melody ed. 1974, full music ed. 1980) of the hymnbook Cantate Domino. This work, begun in 1924 by the World Student Christian Federation, was certainly the most significant expression of ecumenical hymnody in the 20th century.

Mention should also be made of the unique contribution to ecumenical hymnody of the ecumenical community of Taizé* (France), whose prior, Brother Roger, encouraged the creation of much liturgical and popular music within the framework of selective traditional European models. Brother Robert and the musician Jacques Berthier had the responsibility for this work.

EXPERIMENTAL LITURGIES

In the widely heralded worship at the WCC assembly in Vancouver in 1983 two things converged: the call of the third-world churches for their forms of cultural expression to be respected, and the innovations to the liturgy in the northern hemisphere. The result has been the growth of a new experimental ecumenical liturgy in which music and singing have a number of specific characteristics.

New forms. To the traditional hymn with several stanzas has been added the “short liturgical response”, sometimes consisting of merely a single sentence. These have been widely accepted among Christians of the most diverse traditions for several reasons: (1) the brevity of the response makes it easy to memorize, thus allowing more flexible participation by the congregation; (2) though short, the content generally uses key words (“hallelujah”, “kyrie”, etc.), a prayer or im-clusive role in accompanying communal singing, especially with music for which other instruments (guitar, zither, mbira, percussion, piano, synthesizer, etc.) are clearly more suitable for interpreting the style.

Broadening the idea of vocal technique. Voice production as understood in the West (mainly derived from 17th-century Italian opera) has ceased to be the sole criterion. Congregations are now encouraged to get closer in their singing to ways in which the voice is used in other cultures as an important form of identification. Just as African Christians were once taught to sing German chorales, using a vocal style other than their own (which in its time was also classed as “sacred”), so too German Christians are now being taught to sing African songs in a vocal

Orthodox liturgy, USSR

Ky - ri - e e - lei - son, Ky - ri - e e - lei - son, Ky - ri - e e - le - i - son.

Selection 4. Reprinted from Jesus Christ – the Life of the World, p.117.

agery, which emphasizes the emotional rather than the intellectual dimension of what is being sung (e.g. Russian kyrie, see selection 4); (3) repetition, sometimes frequent, creates a degree of “unconsciousness” in which worshippers momentarily cease to focus on their own identity in order to become one with the larger body of the community. They can also stop singing at specific moments without affecting the overall results, because the congregation continues with the repetition. In other words, the community overshadows the individual’s participation and appears to be independent of it.

Changed ideas on “sacred music”. The identification of certain styles and forms of European music with Christianity has been replaced by acceptance of every kind of rhythm, timbre and structure of melody and harmony that represents a form of authentic human expression. The organ has lost its ex-style quite different from that of the chorale.

Use of the original languages. Similarly, cultural barriers to identifying in worship with “the other” can be overcome by using the sounds of the original languages of the songs, with assistance to help those who do not know the words to pronounce them. Here, a pastoral approach is needed to overcome initial reactions of reluctance or displeasure.

THEOLOGY AND DOXOLOGY

Ideally, a hymn is a balanced and indissoluble unity of words and music. The music is not a slave to the words, as has sometimes been said in Christian circles, but neither is the word shackled. Rather, both are liberated by the gospel to attain new levels of expression. The hymns which achieve genuine recognition ecumenically, i.e. those which overcome the profound and sometimes artificial barriers which keep human beings apart, seem to be those which express people's deepest and most genuine aspirations. Or, to put it negatively: hymns whose texts primarily represent doctrinal statements of a decidedly academic nature and are resistant to the soaring of the melody generally do not succeed in getting beyond the limits of the community that shares these statements. Nor do hymns which use only parts of the gospel truth and reduce it to the repetition of sentimental adjectives mainly about the person of Jesus, with tunes which mirror the dearth of theological content. Examples of these can be found in Christian hymnody of every age and tradition.

In the ideal symbiosis of poetry and music, both undergo change. The music takes on meanings beyond "pure" sound; the poetry is expanded in an ambience in which it is the emotions rather than the intellect which makes the sound come across meaningfully. With such hymns it may be possible to stop singing and not be able to repeat the words but yet to experience a very intense and definite emotion. The admonition to "pay attention" to what is being sung (i.e. the text) stresses the intellectual aspect of the hymn in an effort to put in the forefront something which has already become secondary because it is united to the music.

The apostle Paul's advice to sing with the spirit and with the mind (1 Cor. 14:15) reflects a certain fear, still present in Christianity, of "unintelligible" forms of expression which may take Christians into regions where emotions cannot always be controlled or classified. But the most important contribution of hymns to the Christian world may be that they provide a means of community worship which is easily accessible, and through which brothers and sisters may identify with each other on the basis not of agreements in doctrine but of deeply shared emotions.

Although in some respects the ecumenical spirit seems to be declining, the ecumenical future with regard to music and singing can be seen as already with us and in the course of fulfilment.

See also church music, worship in the ecumenical movement.

PABLO SOSA

- Cantate Domino: An Ecumenical Hymn Book, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1980 ■ P. Harling ed., Worshipping Ecumenically, WCC, 1995 ■ F.H. Kaan, The Hymn Texts of Fred Kaan, London, Stainer & Bell, 1985 ■ I-to Loh ed., African Songs of Worship, WCC, 1986 ■ I-to Loh ed., Asian Songs of Worship, Manila, Asian Institute for Liturgy and Music, 1988 ■ C.S. Pottie, A More Profound Alleluia! Gelineau and Routley on Music in Christian Worship, Washington DC, Pastoral Press, 1984 ■ E. Routley, Ecumenical Hymnody, London, Independent, 1959 ■ S.J. Savas, The Treasury of Orthodox Hymnology: An Historical and Hymnographic Examination, Minneapolis, Light & Life, 1983 ■ Sound the Bamboo: CCA Hymnal 1990, Manila, Asian Institute for Liturgy and Music, 1990 ■ Thuma Mina: International Ecumenical Hymnbook, Basel, Basilea, 1995 ■ G. Wainwright, "The Hymnal between Confessional Particularity and Ecumenical Openness", Bulletin: Internationale Arbeitsgemeinschaft für Hymnologie, 24, 1996 ■ J.R. Watson, The English Hymn: A Critical and Historical Study, London, Oxford UP, 1997.

I

IBIAM, FRANCIS AKANU

B. 29 Nov. 1906, Unwana, Nigeria; d. 1995. Ibiham was the first African student at the medical school, University of St Andrews, Scotland (1927-35), and thereafter became a missionary doctor. He was founder and director of Abiriba hospital (1936) and doctor at the Church of Scotland mission hospital in Itu (1953). The list of his official positions is long: he established SCM Nigeria in 1937, was president of the Christian Council of Nigeria 1955-58, served on the standing committee of the International Missionary Council 1957-61, was chairman of the provisional committee of the All Africa Conference of Churches and AACC representative at the inaugural conference of the East Asia Christian Conference in Kuala Lumpur 1959, was a speaker at New Delhi 1961, attended Uppsala 1968, and was present as a guest at Nairobi 1975. He also served as a president of the WCC, 1961-68.

Ibiam was a key figure in national political life also. Britain appointed him as the first indigenous governor of Eastern Nigeria, 1960, from which position he led the churches to host the WCC central committee in Enugu. In the Biafra war, he sided with his people of Eastern Nigeria and consequently had to go into exile near Zurich until he was received back honourably in Nigeria. Identifying with his people, and in protest against British government support of the central Nigerian government against Biafra, in 1967 he renounced knighthood and other honours that Great Britain had bestowed on him.

JOHN S. POBEE

■ D.C. Nwafo, Born to Serve: The Biography of Dr Akanu Ibiam, Lagos, Macmillan, 1988.

ICON/IMAGE

THE WORD "icon" is an adaptation of the Greek eikon, "image". Strictly speaking, the word covers all forms of representation, but it gradually came to denote a specific form of sacred painting on wood in the Byzantine tradition. The basic theological principles are the same for all other forms of visual sacred art (frescoes, mosaics, etc.) as for icons.

From early times Christians have used images along with the verbal proclamation of the good news of Jesus Christ. At first, they were mainly symbolic: Christ as the shepherd, the lamb, a fish (Greek ichthys, acronym for Iesous Christos Theou Hyios Soter = Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour), although according to some traditions, the figurative representation of the holy face of Christ goes back to Christ's own times (cf. the legend of Abgar, king of Edessa, and the "image not made by human hands", as well as the legend of the linen or shroud of St Veronica, a name that means "true image").

From the time Christianity became the official religion of the empire, Christian art played a role in all parts of the oikoumene, with images of Christ, the theotokos, martyrs, saints and scenes from the Old and New Testaments playing a part in worship and as objects of veneration for the faithful. Such veneration came under severe attack during the iconoclastic crisis in the 8th and 9th centuries. Iconoclasm (the breaking of images) began in Byzantium in the first quarter of the 8th century with Emperor Leo III the Isaurian and was finally overcome only in 843 under Empress Theodora. During that time, images were destroyed, and many who venerated images were persecuted.

Two aspects of this crisis deserve mention from the ecumenical point of view: the theological issue at stake, and the repercussions in the West. The first was in a sense a continuation of the Nestorian and the monophysite controversies. The adversaries of images began by asking which of Christ's natures is represented on the icon of Christ: the human or the divine? If it is the human, then it amounts to a form of Nestorianism in that it implies two separate persons in Christ; if it is the divine, it is either monophysitism, in that the human is absorbed in the divine, or it is plain blasphemy, since the divine nature or essence is ineffable, invisible, unknowable and therefore cannot be represented. To this was added the argument that the veneration of a material object amounts to idolatry.

The Orthodox, or upholders of the catholic faith (John Damascene, the fathers of the seventh ecumenical council, Nicea II 787, Theodore of Studios), replied to the first set of questions that an icon of Christ represented neither his human nor his divine nature but his divine incarnate Person, or his hypostasis. Since the Word became flesh, the uncircumscribed became circumscribed, all matter is assumed in the mysterious process, and the invisible Word who made himself visible can be visibly represented.

In the view of the church expressed in the second council of Nicea, such a theological view is a direct consequence of Christ's incarnation,* and if the incarnation is to be taken seriously, it is by no means a secondary matter, for it concerns the participation of the flesh and the material universe in salvation.* On the charge of idolatry, the texts of Nicea II are very clear. They take up (after John Damascene) a formula used by Basil in the 4th century to the effect that the honour rendered to the image goes to the prototype, so that when an icon is venerated, the honour goes to Christ, his mother or the saint represented, not to the actual icon. Besides, the texts draw a very clear distinction between the "veneration" of the icon and "adoration", which is due only to God.

When in 843 iconoclasm was finally overcome and the feast known as the triumph of Orthodoxy was appointed to be celebrated on the first Sunday in Lent (it is still solemnized each year in the Orthodox church), the implications were deeply Christological. Liturgical texts show that the veneration of images is the outward expression of taking seriously the consequences of the incarnation.

The repercussions of the iconoclastic crisis in the West were complex. The papacy remained faithful throughout to the catholic faith and practice. Pope Hadrian I sent legates to the seventh ecumenical council, and the council was received in Rome. Meanwhile Charlemagne and his theologians, basing their case on a totally corrupt translation of the acts of Nicea II, attacked it violently and rejected its decisions concerning the veneration of icons in the early 790s. They accused the "Greeks" of enjoining the "adoration" of images (exactly the opposite of what the council had said) and altogether of being heretics. These accusations and rejections are expressed in the Caroline Books (Libri Carolini) and were repeated solemnly at the council of Frankfurt in 794.

Although Pope Hadrian I and his successor, Leo III, resisted Charlemagne's requests to reject the second council of Nicea and defended the Greeks' orthodoxy, Carolingian theologians continued to regard the Eastern practice as suspicious well into the 9th century. Vestiges of this suspicion have remained in the Christian West, where the tendency became widespread to accept images, icons, frescoes, mosaics and statues merely as decoration and visual aids for the illiterate. It is of interest ecumenically to recall that some of the Reformation "iconoclasts" referred to the Caroline Books to denounce the "superstitions" of the medieval West in the realm of veneration and that in reply the council of Trent* referred to Nicea II.

In spite of the undeniable diversity due to the peculiar genius of each place and each epoch, there is a striking unity of spirit in the visual sacred art of the Christian church throughout the period of the 3rd to the 12th centuries. Certain features characteristic of what today tends to be described as Byzantine art (stylized features, figures and landscapes, absence of naturalistic representation, inversed perspective, etc.) are to be found all over Christendom (in the West, until the Romanesque period on the European continent, the Norman period in England). After the separation between East and West, there appeared a tendency in the Christian West to depart from these features and go for more and more "realism" in the naturalistic sense and towards more and more freedom from the theological principles expressed by Nicea II. In the Christian East, the manner of representation of the divine continued unchanged until "decadence" set in roughly in the 17th century. The 20th century saw a resumption of "traditional" art.

In the ecumenical context, the 20th century witnessed another striking phenomenon whose consequences are yet to be measured: icons, which for obvious historical reasons have long been associated with Byzantium and the Orthodox church, began to become more and more common in Roman Catholic places of worship and many homes, as well as in some Anglican and even Protestant churches, to say nothing of ecumenical gatherings and centres. What is more, they are very often appreciated by non-Christians. Icon painting is being practised both within and outside the Orthodox world.

Whether this is only a passing fashion, no one can say. But from the ecumenical point of view, this trend obviously presents an opportunity to recall what visual sacred art (and sacred art in general) means within the Orthodox context, where it has never completely died (in spite of periods of decline).

Icons in the Orthodox perspective, which strives to be faithful to the seventh ecumenical council, are “theology in colour”. In other words, all the responsibility which rests with the theologians, whose service in the church is an endeavour to express for the contemporary world the truth of Jesus Christ “the same yesterday and today and for ever” (Heb. 13:8), rests also and in the same measure with the icon painter (and other artists). Iconography is a liturgical art. It is part of worship where the truth of the kingdom is not only preached but, in a mysterious way, experienced as a foretaste. All visual representation therefore refers to the transfigured reality of all things called to salvation. Hence the stylized, non-naturalistic manner of representation.

The decision of Nicea II says that iconography (and therefore sacred art in general) “is in accord with our preaching of the gospel”. Therefore there can be no contradiction between the gospel preached (which is true theology) and what the eyes contemplate (and the other senses perceive). More important still for the ecumenical situation is another statement of the council concerning iconography (and sacred art, i.e. liturgy in general): it is “useful to strengthen our faith in the truly real, non-fictitious incarnation of the Word of God”.

It is to be hoped that the present generalized use of icons in prayer by many Christians may serve precisely this purpose of a united confession of the true consequences of Christ’s incarnation for the whole of creation.

NICHOLAS LOSSKY

■ F. Boespflug & N. Lossky, Nicée II, Paris, Cerf, 1987 ■ P. Evdokimov, L’art de l’icône (ET = The Art of the Icon, Redondo Beach CA, Oakwood, 1990) ■ Icons: Windows on Eternity. Theology and Spirituality in Colour, G. Limouris comp., WCC, 1990 ■ C. Kalokyris, Orthodox Iconography, Brookline MA, Holy Cross, 1985 ■ L. Ouspensky, Theology of the Icon, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir’s Seminary, 1978 ■ L. Ouspensky & V. Lossky, The Meaning of Icons, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir’s Seminary, 1952 ■ C. von Schönborn, L’icône du Christ, Paris, Cerf, 1986.

IDEOLOGY

ALTHOUGH the term “ideology” gained currency only during the 19th century, preoccupation with its central problem – the relation between representation and reality – has a long history. Xenophanes and Plato were critical of those who, like Homer and Hesiod, misrepresented the nature of gods, creating an illusory fiction.

The problem of misrepresentation has continued throughout Western history. It received a more systematic treatment with Machiavelli, who contrasted the use of open force in the exercise of power with the use of fraud. Fraud is efficacious to the extent that the gap between reality and appearance can be widened. Francis Bacon went further by recognizing that the human mind distorts even scientific observations, for it is beset by “idols” that prevent the acknowledgment of truth. Later the notion of prejudice (Etienne de Condillac, Paul-Henri Holbach, Claude Adrien Helvetius) inherited the basic features of Bacon’s theory of idols.

The term “ideology” was first used by Destutt de Tracy at the end of the 18th century. Within the context of the French Enlightenment, his Eléments d’idéologie (1801) offered a systematic proposal for a new science. Ideas were understood as natural phenomena expressing the relation of the human body with the environment.

Ideology is thus the science that recognizes and systematizes the accumulated knowledge of such relation. Auguste Comte extended the meaning of the term further to describe not only the study of the relationship between the human and the environment on the basis of sense perception, but also the ensemble of ideas of an era characterizing the evolving stages of the human mind (theological, metaphysical and scientific).

For these authors the term “ideology” is devoid of critical significance. Napoleon, in 1812, was the first to present “ideology” as a pejorative concept. He attacked the idéologues (de Tracy and his followers), his former allies, accusing them of causing the disgrace of France by building a “tenebrous metaphysics” instead of basing knowledge in “the human heart and in the lessons of history". Although Napoleon's attack was political, since the ideologues were legitimate children of the anti-metaphysical convictions of the French Enlightenment, it would become the fundamental insight in the use of the term by Marx, for whom the ideologue was one who inverts and distorts the relation between ideas and reality.

MARXISM AND IDEOLOGY

With Marx the concept of ideology is coupled with critical thinking, restoring into it elements of the critique of representations throughout history. The fundamental thesis of The German Ideology (1846), which Marx wrote with Engels, asserts the priority of being over consciousness; in their words, "life is not determined by consciousness, but consciousness by life". Since for Marx life is historical existence and history is conditioned by its mode of material production – with the division of labour and the resulting struggle of classes with interests for themselves – the dominant ideas of an epoch, its ideology, are the ideas of the dominant class.

Hence for Marx the function of ideology is to veil the contradictions inherent in a historical mode of production in defence of the dominant class, so that those who are dominated will not raise their consciousness to the need to transform reality. At the same time, only revolutionary practice will bring about the possibility of overcoming ideology. An ideology is maintained as long as an economic system produces fetishes which are reifications of real relations, e.g. labour turns into commodity or exchange into money. Ontologically, ideology distorts the real contradictions of a mode of production; epistemologically, it inverts the relationship between theory and practice.

For Marx the critique of ideology is a necessary but not sufficient condition for revolutionary practice. Ideological critique liberates consciousness from the dominant ideology in order to grant space for a new consciousness to emerge out of revolutionary practice. Yet Marx left this problem unsolved: if ideological critique is necessary, though in a negative sense, under what conditions would such a critique be possible?

In the subsequent interpretation of the concept, we find two trends attempting to address this problem left by Marx. One tends towards positivism, the other towards historicism.

The former proposes to solve the problem by moving the discussion from the theory-practice frame of reference to the structure-superstructure relationship. Ideology was conceived as a super-structural reflection of the structural (economic) relations and forces of production in a society. If a dominant ideology would reflect the interests of the dominant class in order to maintain domination, a competing ideology would emerge as a reflection of the revolutionary interests of the dominated class, the proletariat. Such consciousness does not emerge spontaneously, but as a result of the political and pedagogical work of a group within this class which is conscious of its own historical role, i.e. the party. The party as the conscious vanguard of its class has an ideology radically different from the dominant ideology. Lenin, arguing this view, would recognize that without such an ideology a party would not fulfill its historical role.

Along these lines, a positive assessment of ideology results. Ideologies not only reflect but create the objective world. The resolution of historical conflicts passes through these new ideologies, which are in conflict among themselves. Later development in this interpretation emptied ideology of its Marxian meaning and approached it more generally as an instrument that defines the psychological, social and political project of a class. In Louis Althusser, science is distinguished from ideology in that the latter is only an unconscious expression of the relation of the human to the world, but essential for the ordering of any social formation. Elements of the historical interpretation of the problem that goes through Machiavelli, de Tracy and Comte are here maintained.

The second trend, which recovered Baconian tenets in the assessment of the problem, was developed by the historicist tradition. It is represented by the sociologists of knowledge and is also present in the theoreticians of the Frankfurt school. According to this view, all understanding is socially, culturally and existentially rooted. Knowledge is permeated by social interests. Science itself is ideological, given that it is interest-laden. Karl Mannheim would go so far as to say that there are ideological elements in the process of knowledge which will remain, even after all efforts are made to recognize interest in any proposition. The reading of any socio-cultural fact has to be done from the standpoint of the interests of the actors. To do this systematically is to apply "ideological suspicion". The point of exercising ideological suspicion is not to remove the layers of ideological husk to get to the pure scientific kernel but to achieve a new level of knowledge surpassing subjectivism, without falling into an illusory objectivism. The goal is to relativize ideologies through an open community of intersubjective communication in which conflicting points of view will allow for a permanent recognition of ideologies and their underlying interests.

In Marx the term "ideology" was confined to its pejorative meaning. It was applied both to religious and theological discourse and to the philosophies and critiques of those who attack religious forms and systems (Bruno Bauer, Claude Lévi-Strauss, Ludwig Feuerbach, etc.) with "phrases" instead of doing it through revolutionary practice.

Only with Lenin does "ideology" receive a positive assessment. Being different from science, ideologies belong to the super-structure of a mode of production reflecting at the level of ideas the struggle of social classes. The ideological struggle is a function of class struggle. The triumph of the Russian revolution (1917) was then also the triumph of the communist ideology of the proletariat.

The positive assessment of ideology as a constitutive component in the struggle for the truth to be triumphant would lead to still another and this time fundamental shift in the understanding of the concept. If the ideological struggle is a function of truth-saying and not only of false consciousness, then the question of truth cannot be dissociated from the question of power. Hence the question of ideology is newly situated, neither at the level of consciousness formation nor at the level of practical and technological application, but at the level of the institution of discourses (scientific or not) with their power of configuring normative knowledge and of excluding other forms of knowledge. This has been the contribution of Michel Foucault who shifted the axis of discussion from the science-ideology relation to the one between truth and power. Ironically it was Lenin's positive assessment of ideology, which lent support to the Russian revolution, that would ultimately evince the indissoluble relationship between truth and power, the very issue that helped to corrode the legitimacy of the Soviet Union.

IDEOLOGY IN ECUMENICAL THOUGHT

Religious and theological thinking turned itself against such a notion of ideology in the first half of the 20th century. In the ecumenical movement from the 1930s to the 1960s, "ideology" was used exclusively in a pejorative sense, referring primarily to communism as a system of thought competing with Christianity for the spiritual allegiance of humankind. The 1938 Tambaram conference of the International Missionary Council stated (although not using the term "ideology") that "Marxist communism in its orthodox philosophy stands clearly opposed to Christianity". On the Roman Catholic side, Pope Pius XI declared in Divini Redemptoris (1937) that "communism is intrinsically wrong".

In the first assembly of the WCC (Amsterdam 1948), the term "ideology" received an expanded meaning. Though still pejorative, it was no longer used exclusively to attack communism; Amsterdam called on the churches "to reject the ideologies of both communism and laissez-faire capitalism". The Evanston assembly (1954) maintained the Christian rejection of ideologies but recognized the effects which sterile anti-communist rhetoric and practice were producing in many Western societies under the impact of the cold war.

Not until the world conference on Church and Society (Geneva 1966) was the term "ideology" ecumenically assessed in a non-pejorative sense. It was defined as "the theoretical and analytical structure of thought which undergirds successful action to realize revolutionary change in society or to undergird and justify its status quo". It was also recognized that "Christians, like all other human beings, are affected by ideological perspectives". The challenge that came with the world conference was to work out the relationship between faith and ideologies. In 1971 the WCC central committee decided to insert "and Ideologies" in the title of the sub-unit dealing with "Dialogue with People of Living Faiths" (see Marxist-Christian dialogue).

An important ecumenical development was the political challenge that Latin American Christians brought to the theological agenda. As a result, the WCC Faith and Order* commission, meeting at Accra in 1974, recognized that Marxism or communism is not the exclusive or even the main reference of ideology, but that all our ideas have material roots and that the conceptions people hold often have an ideological function. The concern shifted from the sheer rejection of ideologies to the need to recognize them and to understand how they function. This was well expressed in the title of the report "Churches among Ideologies" of the Geneva consultation on ideology and ideologies sponsored by the WCC in 1981.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RESPONSES

In the Roman Catholic Church the notion of ideology was also marked by prejudices until the Second Vatican Council. In the Council the concept is understood as the systematic expression of ideas debased by interests of nations or groups. Gaudium et Spes regards ideologies as instruments to impose the interests of profit, nationalism or militarism. The building of the Christian community, says Presbyterorum Ordinis, implies that priests can never put themselves at the service of any ideology. While the main concern of the Council when dealing with ideology is to reject "systematic atheism" (a concept that includes but avoids an exclusive attack on communism), the final text has a view of ideology that is still negative but more balanced.

A further step on the Roman Catholic side was taken by the Latin American bishops conference in Puebla, Mexico, in 1979. The bishops defined ideology as a vision of several aspects of life elaborated from the point of view of a determined group in society. It is legitimate if the interests being defended are also legitimate and show respect for the fundamental insights of the other groups of a nation. In this non-pejorative sense ideology functions as mediation for action. Claiming that ideologies have a tendency to absolutize themselves and become idols, the conference defined the three main ideologies of Latin America as capitalist liberalism, Marxist collectivism and the ideology of national security.*

The ecumenical movement, in its approach to the notion of ideology, has moved from sheer rejection of it (in order to affirm faith) to an attitude of tolerance which recognizes it as a psycho-social and cultural phenomenon. But the challenge of the F&O Accra meeting remains, demanding a further enquiry into the relationship between faith and ideology. It is by no means enough to examine the material rootedness of ideologies if the spiritual ground of faith is dualistically divorced from it. A critical approach to ideology requires also the examination of the necessity of the faith-ideology relationship. Such an approach will bring into the agenda of Christians in the oikoumene the discussion of the relationship between Christian practice and ecclesial teachings, between charisma and structure, or still better, between truth-claims and the power by which they are instituted.

VÍTOR WESTHELLE

■ M. Foucault, The Archeology of Knowledge and the Discourse on Language, New York, Pantheon, 1972 ■ J. Larrain, The Concept of Ideology, Athens GA, Univ. of Georgia Press, 1979 ■ K. Mannheim, Ideology and Utopia: An Introduction to the Sociology of Knowledge, London, Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1960 ■ K. Marx & F. Engels, The German Ideology, Moscow, Progress, 1976.

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

IGNATIUS IV (Hazim)

B. 1920, Mhardah, Syria. Patriarch of Antioch and All the East since 1979, Ignatius was a president of the WCC 1983-91, a member of the central committee 1968-83, and president of the Middle East Council of Churches 1974-94. Ordained to the priesthood in 1953, he studied philosophy at the American University of Beirut and theology at the St Sergius Orthodox Institute in Paris. He was founder and director of the Annunciation School in Beirut 1953-62, and principal of Balamand Seminary and School 1962-70. Elected patriarchal vicar and ordained bishop in 1962, he became metropolitan of Latakia, Syria, in 1965. From 1970 to 1974 he was dean of St John of Damascus Theological Institute, Lebanon.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ Ignatius IV (Hazim), An Anthology of Homilies, 2 vols, Beirut, Al-Nour, 1977.

IMAGES OF THE CHURCH

SINCE BIBLICAL times, images have functioned more powerfully than concepts or definitions in shaping the ways in which the church* and its unity* are understood. The images, in so far as they are taken from ordinary human experience, are generally metaphorical; they are predicated only analogously of the church as a mystery of grace.* In ecclesiology, the images serve as models for thinking about the church and its attributes.

In the New Testament the church is described through a number of metaphors taken from spheres of life that range from agriculture, fishing and business to family relations, domestic chores and religious practice. Temple worship, political memories and living organisms furnish material for ecclesiology. Paul Minear's classic study Images of the Church in the New Testament (1960) considers some 96 analogies. Among the "major images" he lists several taken from the covenant* history of Israel (e.g., people of God, Israel, holy nation, temple), several based on the universal cosmic order (e.g., new creation, kingdom of God,* communion* in the Holy Spirit*), several referring to the mutual union of Christians in the faith (e.g., fellowship of saints,* disciples, household of God) and several pointing up the organic relations between God and his people (e.g. Body of Christ, fullness of God).

Patristic and medieval theology, while exploiting these NT images of the church, at the same time tended to enrich them with allegorical interpretations of biblical texts that did not refer literally and immediately to the church. Thus Cyprian, in his treatise on The Unity of the Church, speaks of the seamless robe of Christ, of Noah's ark (outside of which no one can escape death) and of the immaculate spouse who cannot be unfaithful to her husband. The Greek fathers show a marked preference for the image of the church as Christ's mystical body, animated by the Holy Spirit, who sustains all the members with the same divine life. Augustine, incorporating material from the Greek fathers, develops the image of the "whole Christ", head and members. He speaks likewise of the church as bride of Christ and as mother of all the faithful. Mining some of the parables of the kingdom, Augustine argues against the Donatists that the church is a mixed society, containing good and evil members, some of whom are not predestined to eternal life.

In the monastic theology of the medieval Western church, the symbolic interpretation of scripture was in great favour. The church was depicted, e.g., as the heavenly Jerusalem, the new ark of the covenant, the new tabernacle, the new temple, the moon, the Samaritan woman, Martha and Mary, and the woman giving birth to a child. In canon law,* ecclesiastical office was discussed in terms of the "power of the keys" conferred upon Peter (Matt. 16:19). The doctrine of the two swords, founded on Luke 22:38, was used to justify the spiritual and temporal powers of the papacy. The scholastic theologians of the middle ages, more sober in their use of metaphor, interpreted the supernatural life and wisdom of the church in Neo-platonic categories, mediated through Pseudo-Dionysius.

Luther and Calvin developed a critical ecclesiology, resistant to what they saw as exaggerated Roman claims. Both of them, in certain texts, distinguished quite sharply between the visible and the invisible church, according greater dignity to the latter. Yet both of them sought to defend, against radical spiritualism, the importance of the visible church as the place where the gospel is preached and the sacraments* are administered. Calvin described the church as the Body of Christ and as the mother in whose womb the faithful are conceived. Lutheranism, with its strong emphasis on proclamation, tended to emphasize the local congregation and to let the universal structures of unity recede into relative neglect. The dominant image of the church in Lutheranism, and in much of classical Protestantism, is that of a herald.

The Catholic theologians of the Counter-Reformation reacted vigorously against the reformers. They tended to prefer categories borrowed from Aristotelian philosophy and Roman law and to interpret the biblical data by means of these categories.

Robert Bellarmine, for instance, portrayed the church as a universal society under the government of the legitimate pastors, and especially under the pope as vicar of Christ. This type of ecclesiology was still dominant at the time of Vatican I* (1869-70), which defined the powers of the pope as "shepherd and teacher of all Christians". The biblical metaphor of shepherd was still used but was interpreted in juridical and societal terms, with the accent on jurisdiction.

Many Catholic theologians of the 19th and early 20th centuries felt the need to complement the official juridical ecclesiology with a more organic ecclesiology, having a richer biblical and patristic basis. Influenced by the romantic idealism of his day, Johann Adam Möhler (1796-1838) placed the primary accent on the church as mystical communion, drawing abundantly from the Greek fathers. During the following century the theology of the mystical body underwent a notable development. It received official blessing from Pope Pius XII, who in his encyclical Mystici Corporis (1943) stated that the expression "the mystical Body of Christ" was the noblest and most sublime description of the church. Warning against any dualistic spiritualism, the pope went on to insist that the church, as a body, was necessarily visible and that to be cut off from the visible communion of the society was to be placed outside the Body of Christ. In the concluding section of the encyclical, Pius XII called for prayers that straying Christians might receive the grace to "enter into Catholic unity... in the organic oneness of the Body of Jesus Christ".

With Vatican II (1962-65) official Catholic ecclesiology took a new turn. In its Constitution on the Church, the Council records four mutually complementary sets of biblical images: flock of Christ, vineyard of the Lord, temple of the Holy Spirit and spouse of the Lamb (Lumen Gentium 6). The following article (7) goes on to expound at some length the image of the church as Body of Christ. Finally, chapter 2 (arts 9-17) unfolds the mystery of the church as new people of God, the image that seems to be dominant in Vatican II. But this image cannot be played off against the teaching of Vatican I. Vatican II, rejecting populist models, taught explicitly that the people of God is a hierarchically structured society in which the pope and the bishops in union with him hold the plenitude of power.

In other passages Vatican II developed the idea of the church as sacrament, i.e. as sign and instrument of Christ's redeeming and reconciling activity. The Decree on Ecumenism* recognized that the Catholic church, in its present condition, is in some ways deficient and that the sacramentality of the church called for progress towards unity among all Christians. In line with this sacramental ecclesiology, Vatican II muted the rhetoric of "return" and called for a movement forward on the part of all Christians, including Catholics, to the fullness of grace and truth that God wills for the church (Unitatis Redintegratio 12).

The highly complex history of Protestantism over the past four centuries precludes any simple generalizations about its ecclesiological imagery. Some Protestants, such as Paul Tillich, have tended to look on the visible church as a merely human organization having no necessary relation

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

to eternal life. For them the essential is the invisible spiritual community that exists dialectically within the churches. The mainstream of Protestant thought, however, has depicted the church as the place where the saving word of God resounds and is accepted in faith.* Conservative Protestants, adhering to the Reformation emphasis on correct doctrine, magnify the preaching office and the Bible as text. In some 20th-century authors (e.g. Karl Barth, Rudolf Bultmann, Gerhard Ebeling) the church is presented primarily as an event in which the living Lord makes himself present here and now through proclamation. This ecclesiology attaches little importance to the continuing life of the church from one generation to another or to the overarching structures of unity.

In the 20th-century ecumenical movement it is evident how different ecclesiological images are linked with different visions of unity. At one end of the ecumenical spectrum are those who maintain that the church of Christ (as divine institution, sacrament or Body of Christ) continues to exist in a single divinely established fellowship of truth and grace. Incorporation in Christ is obtained through sacramental participation in the life of one particular, historically continuous church. This position may be called the catholic concept of ecumenism. It is represented by many Roman Catholics, Orthodox and members of other sacramental churches. This model can be set forth in a way that acknowledges deficiencies in every church and admits that separated churches may be partial or incomplete realizations of the church of Christ. Indeed both of these points were asserted by Vatican II.

At the other end of the spectrum are Christians who hold that the church exists primarily in local congregations where the gospel is faithfully preached and that structures of unity are a matter of human negotiation. Synodical unions, federations and conciliar organizations are seen as beneficial but unessential. This view of unity is often connected with the image of the church as herald or a community of faith.

According to a third view – that of ecclesiological dualism – the unity of the church is in some sense a given; it can be neither constructed nor dissolved by human effort. The church exists as a spiritual, invisible communion of grace within a multiplicity of bodies that are separated from one another on the empirical plane. This theory of unity rests on a vision of the church in which spiritual unity can exist without bodily or external unity. The task of the ecumenical movement, in this perspective, is not to create but to manifest the unity of the una sancta.

Still another ecclesiological model has emerged in secular theology. According to this view, the church has the task of pioneering the unity of the larger human society. It sees itself as a servant of the coming unity of the whole human race. In this perspective the internal unity of the church is not a primary consideration. The main focus is on the goals of universal peace,* justice* and solidarity, to which the service of the church is ordered. The unity of Christians may take the form of provisional coalitions for secular goals, such as civil rights.

The various models of union have been intensely discussed within the ecumenical movement in recent years. Distinctions are made between organic union,* corporate union, fellowship through concordats, conciliar fellowship, unity in reconciled diversity and the like. Upon examination it becomes apparent that a preference for certain models over others is usually a consequence of an option for a particular image of the church. Thus ecumenism must concern itself with images and models in ecclesiology.

See also Jesus Christ; people of God; unity, ways to.

AVERY DULLES

- K. Blücker, The Church as Nation: A Study in Ecclesiology and Nationhood, Frankfurt, Lang, 2000
- A. Dulles, Models of the Church, Garden City NY, Doubleday, 1987
- P. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1960
- L. Newbigin, The Household of God, London, SCM Press, 1953
- Roman Catholic/Lutheran Joint Commission, Facing Unity: Models, Forms and Phases of Catholic-Lutheran Church Fellowship, Geneva, LWF, 1985
- G. Wainwright, "Unité confessionnelle et confession des chrétiens", Irenikon, 57, 1984.

IMPERIALISM

TRADITIONALLY understood as “a policy aiming at the formation and maintenance of empires”, imperialism has been re-defined, mainly in the terms of Hobson, Hilferding and Lenin, or in the terms of third-world nationalisms, as the policy of international capitalism or of powerful “central” states to achieve control through economic domination, political pressure and, if necessary, armed intervention. The term can also refer to the ideological legitimation of such policies.

While the ecumenical movement has seldom spoken of “imperialism”, probably to avoid the ideological connotations and emotional resonance characterizing such vocabulary, issues related to imperialism have been the object of ecumenical reflection, pronouncements and action under such rubrics as capitalism,* colonialism,* decolonization,* dependence,* economics,* international order,* liberation* and third world.*

See also debt crisis; fascism; ideology; investment; justice; militarism; nation; national security; totalitarianism; world community.

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO

INCARNATION

THE DOCTRINE of the incarnation has been accorded greater or lesser importance at different periods of Christian history. In the theology of the early centuries, both in East and West, it was of fundamental significance. More recent centuries have sometimes seen a tendency to set “incarnation theologies” over against “redemption theologies”, and to trace these different lines of thought back to the New Testament in different emphases in the Johannine and Pauline writings respectively.

While many theologians would now question how far these tendencies are really mutually exclusive, there can be no doubt that since the Reformation a certain style of incarnational theology has characterized those theologians who have sought in the theology of the early centuries, particularly in its Greek form, to find a way through some of the impasses of Reformation and Counter-Reformation controversy. This strategy has been followed by a large number of Anglican writers from the 16th century onwards.

The origins of this line of thought in Anglican tradition are found in the work of Richard Hooker (1554-1600), the greatest English theologian since the Reformation. In the fifth book of the laws of ecclesiastical polity, Hooker writes: “Forasmuch as there is no union of God with man without that mean between both which is both, it seemeth requisite that we first consider how God is in Christ, then how Christ is in us, and how the sacraments do serve to make us partakers of Christ” (5.1.3). In this way he established a direct connection between the doctrine of the incarnation, the church* and the sacraments.*

This line of thought was developed further during the 17th century, and it came to new life in the teaching of the Oxford movement in the middle of the 19th century, particularly in Cardinal Newman and R.I. Wilberforce. A somewhat different elaboration of these ideas is to be found in F.D. Maurice (1805-74), who draws out the social and political implications of such a doctrine of the incarnation and sees in the sacraments models for a more human and participatory ordering of society.

An emphasis on the doctrine of the incarnation is also to be found in the Lutheran tradition, e.g. the great Danish churchman N.F.S. Grundtvig (1783-1872). In a different theological style, he also emphasizes how in Christ the original goodness of creation* and humanity, which is masked but not destroyed by sin,* is transfigured and fulfilled. Grundtvig’s theology is grounded in a way which is uncommon in the 19th century. His teaching had its effects not only in the world of education but also in that of agricultural production. It provides interesting suggestions for a theology able to respond to the ecological dilemmas of our time.

No Christian theology which is worthy of its name can evade the mystery of the

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

cross, the mystery of Christ's triumph over death by death. But the doctrine of the incarnation, with its affirmation of the Word made flesh, is also vital to a full and balanced presentation of the Christian message. It is particularly important at the present, in that it provides both a way of looking at God's action in the material world and a way of understanding the action of the Word in different cultures and different traditions. In the fourth gospel, as in the epistles to the Ephesians and the Colossians, the Word is seen at work in all things. No part of human experience is altogether alien to him. In the words of the great Greek theologian Maximus the Confessor: "The Word of God, who is God, wills at all times and in all places to work the mystery of his embodiment."

See also Jesus Christ, resurrection, uniqueness of Christ.

A.M. ALLCHIN

■ A.M. Allchin, N.E.S. Grundtvig: An Introduction to His Life and Work, London, Darton, Longman & Todd, 1997 ■ A.M. Allchin, The Kingdom of Love and Knowledge: The Encounter between Orthodox and the West, London, Darton, Longman & Todd, 1979 ■ B. Hebblethwaite, The Incarnation, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1987 ■ R. Swinburne, The Christian God, Oxford, Clarendon, 1994 ■ G. Wainwright, For Our Salvation, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1997 ■ R. Williams, On Christian Theology, Oxford, Blackwell, 2000.

INCLUSIVE LANGUAGE

LANGUAGE which is carefully chosen, ensuring that both vocabulary and content include all people, is known as inclusive language. Inclusive language is important for many people not only because it reflects a change in culture, in particular in the status of women, but also because it may actually effect that change. It encourages people to examine attitudes which may be exclusive and alter them.

By baptism* all people become full members of the Body of Christ, yet the language of theology and liturgy often seems to deny that basic equality. Those who are not male, white, young and healthy find their existence and experience is rarely mentioned. Women have become increasingly aware of, and vocal about, their exclusion. They have observed that language reflects the culture* which has formed it. A language in which a masculine noun or pronoun can be used to denote members of both sexes reflects a culture in which the male is normative. Language which includes only male metaphors for God reflects a culture for which the most sacred is male. Such language has begun to change. As women emerge from subordination, the language has begun to adapt to make them visible and encourage their inclusion.

Yet it has been easier to revise language about the worshipping people than language about the One they worship. The scriptures were fashioned in a patriarchal culture. Biblical images for God are predominantly masculine, and although the Christian God is stated to transcend gender and although devotion to a motherly God is well attested within the tradition, there have been strong negative reactions to feminine imagery. The creative use both of non-personal (love, rock, light) and non-gender-specific descriptions (healer, friend, lover, disturber) is inevitably found to be less troublesome, albeit with its own limitations.

In the Christian community, especially but not exclusively in the English-speaking world, concern focused initially on language referring to the worshipping community. Many liturgical revisers in Canada, the US, New Zealand and England agree that alternatives should be found for terms such as "men", "sons", "brothers" and "mankind", and for masculine personal pronouns, on the premise that although these words once had a broad meaning, they are now not believed to be inclusive. It is also accepted that the biblical distinction (in Hebrew, Greek and Latin) between "male human" and "human" should from now on be clearly observed in translation.

Recent liturgical writing and hymnody have gone beyond the use of inclusive vocabulary. Drawing on neglected scriptural and spiritual traditions and the reflections of contemporary women, worship can increasingly benefit from the wealth of women's experience now offered in canticle and prayer, reading and blessing. The worship of the people of God* can begin to include the experience of all the people of God.

Close attention to biblical texts has encouraged debate about translation. Some scholars argue that if texts are to be adequately understood, translation must include a considerable amount of interpretation. An inclusive-language translation might refer to Jesus as "child of God" rather than "son of God", as "human one" rather than "son of man", on the assumption that Jesus' humanity is of greater significance than his masculinity. Exclusively masculine descriptions for God might also be modified, "lord" being replaced by "sovereign", "father" by "father and mother". Suggestions such as these test the elasticity of the Christian faith.

While the 1981 central committee mandated the use of inclusive language in all WCC publications, the question of appropriate language for God was a point of growing ecumenical controversy during the 1980s. The 1988 central committee asked for a theological study of this issue. Some Orthodox argue that the scriptural and patristic source of the Trinitarian formula "Father, Son and Holy Spirit" in the WCC basis* means any change in such language has theological implications affecting the foundation of ecumenical fellowship (see Trinity).

Interim guidelines for worship at the seventh assembly (Canberra 1991) affirmed adherence to biblical texts and early creeds while recognizing a need to encourage people creatively to express their faith in contemporary language. The spirit of these guidelines was also applied at the eighth assembly in Harare (1998). In Liturgiam authenticam (2001), the Roman Congregation for Divine Worship issued strict instructions limiting the adaptability of original Latin texts undergoing translation into modern vernaculars.

See also sexism, women in church and society.

VIVIENNE FAULL

- D. Cameron, Feminism and Linguistic Theory, London, Macmillan, 1985
- Liturgical Commission of the General Synod of the Church of England, Making Women Visible, London, Church House Pub., 1989
- C. Milla & K. Swift, The Handbook of Non-sexist Writing, London, Women's Press, 1980
- National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA, An Inclusive Language Lectionary, Philadelphia, Westminster, years A, B, C, 1983,84,85
- R.D. Witherup, A Liturgist's Guide to Inclusive Language, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1996.

INCULTURATION

ETYMOLOGICALLY, "inculturation" means the insertion of new values into one's heritage and world-view. This process applies to all human dimensions of life and development. Within contemporary Christianity, inculturation signifies the movement which takes local cultures and their values as the basic instrument and a powerful means for presenting, reformulating and living Christianity. Within this process effective dialogue between Christianity and local cultures is carried out. Inculturation, therefore, becomes the honest attempt to make Christ and his liberative message better understood by people of every culture,* locality and time.

Inculturation can be traced back to biblical history, which produced an inculturated Bible. From the beginning, Christianity has passed through various stages of inculturation as it moved from the Jewish to Greek, Roman and Germanic cultures. Since the 16th century, however, missionary Christianity became less willing to be truly incarnated within the cultures and world-views of non-Europeans. In the second half of the 20th century, the inculturation movement reasserted itself, especially in Africa and Asia, following the achievement of political independence, the indigenization of the local churches and the movement for cultural independence.

Inculturation asserts the right of all peoples to enjoy and develop their own culture, the right to be different and to live as authentic Christians while remaining truly themselves at the same time. It makes Christianity feel truly at home in the culture of each people, thus reflecting its universality. It becomes a prophetic and liberative movement which rejects colonial Christianity and proclaims the liberty of all peoples to serve God within their own basic world-view, thus eliminating the constant danger of dualism or dichotomy in their lives. It is not the aim of the movement to create a faulty, separatist, easy, syncretistic or racist Christianity.

The scope of inculturation extends to the totality of Christian life and doctrine, the central ministry of Christ and all other ministries which derive from it, the manner of witnessing to Christ, proclaiming his message, worship, organization of church, study of the Bible and theology and pastoral methods. There is no area of Christianity that can be considered to be outside the scope of inculturation.

To inculturate Christianity authentically there is a need for a deep knowledge of both Christianity and culture and an intimate link between liberation and inculturation. The people must be fully involved in the entire process in a new way of doing theology. They need the necessary freedom to think, research and experiment, with the cooperation of church leaders at all levels and an adequate catechesis for active participation. Inculturation is best promoted through ecumenical endeavours when all Christian churches within a similar cultural milieu work towards a common goal.

See also theology, contextual.

JOHN WALIGGO

■ Authentic Witness within Each Culture, IRM, 84, 35, 1995 ■ M.C. Azevedo ed., Inculturation and Challenges of Modernity, Rome, Pontifical Gregorian Univ., 1983 ■ F. Bowie, "The Inculturation Debate in Africa", Studies in World Christianity, Edinburgh, Univ. Press, 5, 1, 1999 ■ H. Carrier, Guide pour l'inculturation de l'Évangile, Rome, Pontifical Gregorian Univ., 1997 ■ A.J. Chupungco, Cultural Adaptation of the Liturgy, New York, Paulist, 1982 ■ Confessing the Faith in Asia Today: EACC statement, Redfern, UK, Epworth, 1967 ■ N. Greinacher & N. Mette eds, Christianity and Cultures: A Mutual Enrichment, London, SCM Press, 1994 ■ Proceedings of Symposia of Episcopal Conferences of Africa and Madagascar, 1969, 1970, 1981, 1984 and 1987 ■ J.M. Waliggo et al. eds, Meaning and Urgency of Inculturation, Nairobi, 1986.

INDIGENOUS PEOPLES

THE WORKING definition of indigenous peoples used by the United Nations Sub-commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities is that they are "the existent descendants of the peoples who inhabited the present territory of a country wholly or partially at the time when persons of a different culture or ethnic origin arrived there from other parts of the world, overcame them and, by conquest, settlement or other means, reduced them to a non-dominant or colonial situation".

Questions regarding the status, rights and conditions of indigenous peoples were raised during the meetings of the International Missionary Council, but the issue as such did not appear on the ecumenical agenda until the establishment of the WCC's Programme to Combat Racism* in 1969. Global ecumenical awareness of the situation of indigenous peoples was subsequently stimulated by the visible participation of Native Canadians in the WCC's sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983) and the even more prominent role of Aboriginal Australians in the seventh assembly (Canberra 1991) – the latter coming just a year before worldwide commemorations of the 500th anniversary of the voyage of Christopher Columbus, which had devastating consequences for the indigenous peoples of the Americas.

One factor that distinguishes indigenous peoples from national minorities* and other groups suffering racist oppression is the fact that they were the original inhabitants of the land before being displaced by an invading group. While indigenous peoples can be a national minority – and in fact constitute the largest minority in Mexico, Peru and El Salvador – elsewhere they make up the majority of the population, as in Bolivia, Ecuador, Guatemala and South Africa.

The 2001 edition of the Yearbook of the International Work Group for Indigenous Affairs gives the following figures for indigenous peoples in the world: 290,000 Aborigines in Australia, 350,000 Maoris in New Zealand, 80,000 Sami (Lapps) in the Scandinavian countries, 150,000 Inuits (Eskimos) in circumpolar states, 29 million indigenous in Central and South America, and 1.5 million in North America. In Africa there are an estimated 14.5 million, in Asia 148 million, with some 1 million in Siberia and the Russian Far East, and 1.5 million in the Pacific. (Of course, population statistics are, at best, approximate: many people of indigenous ancestry are not acknowledged by government statistics or by some indigenous governing councils, for a variety of reasons. This would tend to make the estimates of indigenous populations low.) The overwhelming majority of these populations are landless, live in desperate poverty and have little or no access at all to health, water supply, shelter and education services.

A second, related characteristic of indigenous peoples, no matter where they live or what their political or social culture and beliefs may be, is that they all view land* as the basis of their very survival. While other groups suffer from landlessness, they do not have the same affinity to the land as indigenous peoples, for whom it is basic not only for economic survival but also for cultural and religious survival.

Indigenous peoples have three major goals: politically, they seek self-determination or autonomy; economically, they seek control over the resources of their land in order to use them for their development; socially, they seek the right to practise their cultures and religions and struggle against assimilation and integration, which bring the risk of cultural genocide.

Within the Programme to Combat Racism, specific attention to indigenous peoples and the major issue of land rights came in two consultations of anthropologists and indigenous peoples themselves, convened by the WCC in Barbados (1971 and 1977). In 1981 a WCC team visited Australia to investigate the condition of the Aboriginal people, and this resulted in the Australian churches' returning property to them valued at $250,000. The results of these investigations were incorporated in a 1982 WCC central committee statement on indigenous peoples and land rights: "The indigenous peoples' struggle for land rights is challenging the church to be faithful to its gospel of reconciliation and the biblical affirmation of the creation of all human beings in the image of God. The racist denial of indigenous people's identity can only be combated when the oppressed are empowered spiritually, economically and politically."

The ecumenical movement held several consultations in Latin America between 1980 and 1996, with special attention to racism, the land issue, the pursuing of constitutional rights for indigenous peoples and the ways in which churches may develop a policy of solidarity and accompaniment.

The issue of indigenous peoples is also connected with the integrity of creation and problems of pollution and ecology. Current efforts of the WCC are likely to further the ecumenical concern and action with indigenous peoples; they include a land rights consultation (1989), a Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation* convocation (1990), and the WCC assembly in Australia (1991).

In 1992 the churches were forced to face their past and present responsibility in the 500 years of genocide, land theft and cultural destruction that has resulted from the invasion of the Americas. In many cases indigenous peoples have brought the churches and governments to court over the issue of treatment in residential schools: physical and sexual abuse, and also cultural and spiritual loss. Since 1999, these areas of concern have been addressed in the courts of the land as well as through Alternative Dispute Resolution mechanisms (ADRs) and face-to-face dialogues.

The churches have actively worked with the indigenous peoples and the government in developing reconciliation and healing initiatives and alternative resolution strategies. Although indigenous peoples pursue the aim of having their own government recognized and their own legal systems acknowledged as valid, they know that only through national and international laws can justice be presently sought – that is, where governments respect and follow their own laws and international conventions.

Concern for the preservation of the earth and interest in indigenous peoples cannot be separated. Mission approaches profoundly affect relations with indigenous peoples, their culture, their spiritual heritage and their ways of life. Respect is the key to walking and working together as equals.

See also environment/ecology, ethnicity, racism.

JEAN SINDAB and ALF DUMONT

■ Indigenous Peoples: Walking Together towards Tomorrow, Geneva, WCC, 1998

INDIGENOUS RELIGIONS

THE TERM "indigenous religions" covers a very wide range of religious traditions around the world. No completely satisfactory term has been found for the religions treated in this entry: other terms include traditional, primal, tribal or native religions, shamanism, and, inaccurately and often disrespectfully (generally by anthropologists, missionaries and some Western comparative religion scholars), primitive, ancestral, natural or spiritist.

Indigenous religions have no single founders but seem to have evolved gradually as people reflected on the mysteries of life such as birth and death (see life and death), joy and suffering,* the forces of nature* and the purpose of life itself. They are generally integrated into the whole of life, and their history is closely intertwined with the history of the people and region concerned.

DISTRIBUTION

Indigenous religions are found today in Africa, South, Central and North America, Asia, Australia and the Pacific region. The total number of adherents is virtually impossible to specify with statistical precision. The accompanying table suggests that there are more adherents of indigenous religions than of many so-called major world religions, including the Jewish, Sikh, Confucian, Shinto and Baha'i faiths. In fact, the numbers are no doubt far greater than available statistics indicate. In many places followers of indigenous religions may be disregarded in official censuses or included among the adherents of the dominant national religion. Furthermore, the presence and impact of indigenous religions are much greater than the statistics might indicate, in terms of their long integration in the history, language, culture* and world-view of the peoples where they have evolved.

Apart from those areas in eastern and north-eastern Asia and Siberia where shamanism has its stronghold, Christianity generally won converts from followers of indigenous religions. To a much lesser extent Islam has also won converts, by persuasion and the sword, among adherents of indigenous religions in Africa and regions of Southeast Asia. But converts to other religions do not necessarily abandon altogether their traditional world-views, which tend to surface in situations of stress and in key moments of life like birth, initiation, marriage, sickness and death. While statistics identify them only as adherents of their new religions, converts bring with

Indigenous religion type	1900	1970 (thousands)	2000
Tribal Religionists	106,340	166,525	255,950
Shamanists	11,341	15,930	9,947
Afro-American Spiritists	247	1,777	7,133
Other Spiritists	59	1,385	5,606
Total	117,987	185,617	278,636

Source: Adapted from World Christian Encyclopedia, Oxford, Oxford UP, 2001 and International Bulletin of Missionary Research, Jan. 99.

them into their new religions a variety of elements from their indigenous religions.

SOURCES OF INFORMATION

The primary sources for the study of indigenous religions are oral, in the form of stories, myths, proverbs, prayers, ritual incantations, songs, names of people and places, and the secrets of religious personages. To these can be added art, language, ceremonies and rituals, religious objects and sacred places like shrines and altars, ceremonial symbols, and even the so-called magical objects and practices. Indigenous religions have no written scriptures,* though ancient hieroglyphs such as those of Egypt and Latin America may carry religious texts. The unique traditional art of the Australian Aborigines tells much about the religious life of the people, going back to their "dream time".

Indigenous religions are tied to the cultures of the peoples concerned. Their adherents do not propagate them to win converts in the same way as Islam, Christianity and some modern religious movements do. But where sizeable numbers of the adherents move to new areas, they carry with them their religions and practise them in their new home, with modifications. A good example of this is the transfer and spread of indigenous African religion to the Western hemisphere through the slave trade. Millions of Africans brought their religion with them to the West Indies and the Americas, and it has never totally disappeared.

COSMOLOGY

The various indigenous religions have much in common in their respective views of God, spirits, force, nature and humankind.

God. In many cases, such as among African peoples, cosmological ideas are built around the concept of God as Creator of all things. He is invisible, but his works are evidence of his existence. For some, God is thought to be little involved in the daily life of individuals; for others, he is personally involved in the welfare of society, and people speak of him as Father or Mother, Parent, Friend, Saviour, Protector, Giver of life (children, health, food), etc. God is good, just and loving to all people. Prayers, sacrifices or offerings are directed to him, either regularly or in times of communal needs. The name of God is used in pronouncing blessings and in making solemn agreements such as covenants and oaths. In some areas priesthood systems have evolved, forming an active link between people and God. The priesthoods (in many cases, carried out by both men and women) are also transmitters of traditional wisdom, theology, history and other cultural values. In some areas temples exist, with priests and priestesses serving in various religious duties. They officiate at religious ceremonies, pray on behalf of their communities, give advice, and in some cases perform health functions.

In other societies there may be a number of divine figures or a plurality of gods, some having specific responsibilities in the universe. Nevertheless, one of these figures is generally regarded as ranking above the others, whether or not people have direct contact with this one. In others (e.g. among some Amerindians), there is no special concern with the origin of the cosmos as such, and this is taken for granted.

Spirits. Many indigenous religions believe strongly in invisible spiritual figures and beings which interact with the world of human beings. Some spirits are personifications of natural objects and phenomena, both heavenly (sun, moon and stars, thunder, lightning, wind and rain) and earthly (oceans, lakes, rivers, waterfalls, mountains, forests, earthquakes). Other spirits are human beings who have died.

In many traditional societies the links between the living and the spirits of the departed are so active that their religion is referred to as spiritism or spirit worship. Spirits are often involved in matters of health, such as diagnosing the cause and nature of sickness, treatment and healing procedures, measures to ward off disease and misfortune, spirit possession and exorcisms.

Force. Indigenous religions acknowledge the existence of a force or power in the universe, often referred to by the Melanesian word mana, although it is differently interpreted in different areas. This force is often feared and avoided, especially if it is used negatively as magic. Many African societies see magic and witchcraft as an explanation of sickness, misfortune, accident and even death. In moments of communal crisis, those suspected of using this power in the form of magic and witchcraft may be beaten or stoned to death.

Within traditional societies, however, the normal use of this power has always been for the good. It is often used in the treatment of diseases, in divination, in exorcising spirits, in promoting success, in rain-making ceremonies, in protecting against misfortune. It may also be displayed in abnormal feats like walking on fire, lying down on sharp pieces of metal or pushing nails through the tongue, and even in entertainment (e.g. in conjuring tricks and hypnotizing the audience).

Nature. Nature in its various forms has an important place in indigenous religions. Even though some natural forces are destructive, the life of the people depends in countless ways on nature – the food, water, air, fields and hunting grounds, fishing waters, herbs and minerals, animals and many insects, and even its infinite beauty. Indigenous religions cultivate nature and generally make friends with it, protect and respect it to the point of even worshipping some natural forces and objects. Certain places and natural objects – mountains, caves, waterfalls, trees, rocks, animals – may be set apart as sacred and held in awe. Some are sanctuaries in which no human beings or animals may be killed and where no trees may be felled. People endeavour to live in harmony with nature, and rituals supporting and defending this mystical relationship are found in all indigenous religions. Rather than destructive masters over nature, people are one with it and must be wise stewards of it.

Humankind. Countless myths tell about the creation or origin of human beings. According to some, humans were created at the end of the primal creation. Some depict a creation from clay, others say that humankind (as husband and wife or as two pairs) was created in heaven (the sky) and lowered to the earth. Some say that the creation occurred in a vessel, in water or in the fruit of some tree.

These creation stories often tell further that the original state of the first people was one of bliss; many say that there was neither sickness nor death. Others tell that the earth was directly linked to heaven (the sky), with God and the human(s) living close to each other. For various reasons the link between heaven and earth was severed, and the two separated. Death came about, and the original bliss also disappeared.

In indigenous religions the life of the individual is marked with a variety of rites, particularly at birth, initiation, marriage and death. Birth and name-giving ceremonies are occasions for rejoicing and expressing gratitude to God for the living gift of a child. Initiation ceremonies for the youth can be highly elaborate in many places; some may involve undergoing hardships and painful experiences like circumcision, while others may involve periods of seclusion for the initiates, during which they learn a wide variety of matters pertaining to adult life. Some initiations have secrets that are strictly safeguarded.

Marriage is generally a religious duty in indigenous religions. Many customs and ceremonies are connected with marriage, which is primarily a family-to-family arrangement and not simply a private affair between man and woman. The bearing of children is an integral part of family life, and no efforts are spared to make sure that there are children in each family. Kinship plays a crucial role in the life of society, with ties extending to embrace not only the family but in varying degrees the whole tribe or nation. Religious rituals are often performed within the family or community, some of which are intended to strengthen the kinship ties.

Burial and funeral rites – some coming months or even years after a person's death – are observed carefully. They serve to comfort the bereaved and to send off the departed in peace to the spirit world. Belief in the continuation of life after death is held in many places where indigenous religions have evolved. While indigenous views concerning the hereafter vary considerably, the next world is generally pictured as very much like the present life. Even if those who inhabit it are spirits and not humans, they retain their human characteristics. According to some indigenous religions there is neither reward for good life on earth nor punishment for evil life, but others depict a form of reckoning in the hereafter. The departed may appear to their relatives through dreams, in the waking, or through divination. The living remember their departed through various acts, such as naming new children after them, taking care of their graves, pouring libation of various drinks and setting apart bits of food as an expression of sharing meals. In some societies prayers may invoke some departed members of the family, asking them to carry the message further until it reaches God. There is thus a kind of unity between the living, the departed and God (or other spiritual realities).

ETHICS AND MORALS

The ethics and morals of indigenous religions are embedded in customs, traditional laws and taboos. God (or some high-ranking spirit) is ultimately the sanctioner and upholder of morality. Custom regulates what ought and ought not to be done in each society. Offences such as stealing, disrespect towards elderly people, sexual abuse, murder and the like are punished through beating, payment of fines, shame, ostracism or even death. Kindness, politeness, generosity, hospitality, hard work, caring for elderly parents, generosity towards others and friendliness are good virtues which earn social respect, praise and admiration.

Community life is a strong feature in indigenous religions, and many values and activities are directed towards promoting, preserving and safeguarding the community of the living, those who are yet to be born and in many cases those who have departed. The notion of the community extends also to nature as part of the community. In many indigenous religions, clan or tribal totems symbolize the ties between human community and nature.

Indigenous religions have had contact with other religions of the world, chiefly Buddhism, Christianity and Islam, and with other cultures, especially Western. In many cases their adherents often convert to these religions. The expansion of colonial Christianity beginning in the 16th century virtually conquered indigenous religions in the Americas, in the process destroying tribal, national cultures and human. Since the 18th century Christianity began to spread in Asia (with comparatively little or no success, except in Korea), Africa, and the Pacific. Indigenous religions have been very accommodating to these other religions and to Western culture, with all its positive and negative contributions to modern life.

But conversion or accommodation does not mean abandoning the world of indigenous religions. To the contrary, many Christians in Africa, for example, derive spiritual enrichment from indigenous religions. Some Christian values become absorbed in indigenous religions, and in turn some indigenous religions values have been absorbed in Christianity and Islam.

Written studies of indigenous religions in the 19th century (and in some cases earlier) were all done by foreigners with a Western point of view – missionaries, anthropologists (see anthropology, cultural), colonial rulers and other self-styled experts. On the whole, indigenous religions were negatively presented, often falsely interpreted and blatantly ridiculed by attitudes of racism and a superiority complex. Since the middle of the 20th century, a more objective approach has been gaining ground, and the number of indigenous or native researchers and scholars has increased. Forms of inter-religious dialogues are also opening up, and some values of indigenous religions are seeping into circles of Christian discussion or even practice. The WCC's dialogue programme has included indigenous religions, especially in Africa and the Americas; apart from holding special meetings to promote dialogue, representatives of indigenous religions are also invited to multifaith dialogue meetings.

JOHN S. MBITI

- R. Bastide, The African Religions of Brazil: Toward a Sociology of the Interpenetration of Civilizations, Baltimore, John Hopkins University Press, 1978
- R. Pierce Beaver, D. Bergman et al., The Eerdman's Handbook to the World's Religions, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1982
- W.H. Capps ed., Seeing with a Native Eye: Essays on Native American Religion, New York, Harper & Row, 1976

A.W. Longchar & V. Yangkahao eds, Traditional Tribal Worldview and Ecology, Jorhat, India, Eastern Theological College, 1998 ■ J.W. Martin, Native American Religion, New York, Oxford UP, 1999 ■ J.S. Mbiti, African Religions and Philosophy, 2nd ed., Oxford, Heinemann, 1990 ■ T. Sundermeier, The Individual and Community in African Traditional Religions, Hamburg, LIT, 1998 ■ I. Yule ed., My Mother the Land, Galiwin'ku, Galiwin'ku Literature Centre, 1980.

INFALLIBILITY/INDEFECTIBILITY

IN THE ECUMENICAL discussions between the Roman Catholic Church and other Christian communities, the question of infallibility remains one of the areas in which complete agreement appears an impossible achievement. Nevertheless, the final report of the first Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC) bore witness to a remarkable degree of consensus* with regard to the main issues involved. Even so, the report had to recognize that Catholics and Anglicans differ in their perception of the manner in which infallibility is exercised through the solemn (i.e. ex cathedra) definitions pronounced by the bishop who is "charged by God to maintain the universal church in the unity of faith".

THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE CHURCH OF GOD

The Orthodox churches and the RCC have always affirmed that the people of God,* by virtue of their being God's own people, remain free from error in keeping the faith* (infallibility in credendo) through the indwelling presence of the Spirit of the risen Lord (Vatican II, Lumen Gentium 10,12). Infallibility is understood, therefore, as the gift of the Holy Spirit.* This gift enables the church,* through its creed* and its living witness, to adhere with unflinching certainty (asphalôs, without a doubt, without faltering) to what God himself has revealed (see revelation); and this certainty remains unaffected by any particular reasons or motives which may be advanced as rational vindications of the faith. Handed down through a living Tradition,* this faith is bound to the Spirit of truth and is present in all the local churches. It is confessed and celebrated in their liturgy* (*lex orandi, lex credendi**), explained and defended by their bishops (either preaching individually from their cathedra or acting together in a conciliar decree), witnessed by the public and private life of the Christian community, and proclaimed abroad in mission.*

It is worthy of note that in the US, Lutherans and Catholics in dialogue have found themselves to be in fundamental agreement over the church's perseverance in the truth received from Christ. This steadfastness has its origin in the assistance of the Spirit, who ensures the transmission and safekeeping of all that has been revealed.

THE INFALLIBILITY OF THE EPISCOPAL BODY AND OF THE PRIMATE

When the apostolic community had passed away, the faithful transmission and preservation of the substance of revelation was assured by God in willing the church to possess, in its ordained ministry, an instrument of the Spirit of truth (see apostolic Tradition). The RCC speaks of an infallibility of teaching as manifested in certain pronouncements, whether of the episcopal college as such (i.e. united in a communion which the bishop of Rome "watches over") or of the bishop of Rome (in communion with the entire episcopal body). On these occasions a final judgment may be delivered.

It is not a question of introducing any new word by revelation or inspiration but rather of providing a definitive judgment on an essential point of the Christian datum. Where salvation* is concerned, it is necessary to know what to believe and what to reject in the sphere of faith and morals; thus, the final judgment declares and defines what is true and what is false, and in so doing provides the rule of faith for the whole church. The content of revelation remains unaffected, nothing new has been introduced (LG 25). But the meaning of revelation, i.e. its underlying truth, is made explicit in the form of a judgment which brings to an end uncertainty and controversy. This judgment is infallible or, in other words, free from error. It eliminates all doubt concerning what it has expressly formulated qua judgment, but not necessarily concerning other related issues. Thus, the judgment of the bishops assembled at Chalcedon defined the authentic meaning of faith in Jesus Christ, true God and true man. It proclaimed the faith that has been revealed from the beginning and celebrated in the local churches, over which the bishops presided; in so doing, it bore witness to the presence of the Spirit of truth, by whom the churches were firmly united to Christ, the one who declared himself to be “the way, and the truth and the life” (John 14:6).

Although definitions of dogma* may be closely linked to a particular historical or cultural environment, they nevertheless express the essential truths of faith and are devoid of error; they remain valid, even though it may become necessary at a later date to complete or perfect them by a change in their formulation. This situation occurred at Vatican II* with regard to some definitions of Vatican I. A further requirement to be noted is that all dogma should be “received” by the local churches, although reception* does not constitute truth. Infallibility in doctrinal judgment, according to the RCC, does not have its source in reception; on the other hand, it is through reception that judgments pass into the life of the ecclesial community in order to become what they are meant to be: living truth, not archival monuments.

The RCC is alone in affirming that, under certain special circumstances and within conditions that are strictly defined and limited by numerous safeguards, the bishop of Rome outside of a council may deliver an infallible judgment. In this he is assisted by the same Holy Spirit who ensures that the people of God dwell in the truth as it has been revealed; in the words of the decree of Vatican I, he is empowered to “exercise the infallibility with which Christ chose to endow the church” (Pastor Aeternus, DS 3074).

The bishop of Rome is given this infallibility only for certain very specific judgments. It does not apply to all the pronouncements, decrees, declarations and documents which he issues, nor to all the doctrinal precisions included in his encyclicals* and bulls. Thus, it cannot be regarded as a guarantee which covers all his “magisterial” acts. The divine assistance which guarantees the infallibility of a judgment is given only when the bishop of Rome speaks ex cathedra, i.e. when he specifically invokes the function of the Roman see in its “supreme apostolic authority” over the communion of faith of the churches. This solemn judgment must be directed to the universal church with the intention to elucidate a truth, in the realm of faith and morals, which is essential to salvation. Vatican II (LG 25) specifies that it must be “in accord with revelation itself”. Of equal importance is the prerequisite that there must be painstaking inquiry into the contents of revelation “by recourse to all the appropriate resources”.

A judgment of this kind can be promulgated only when the bishop in so doing is aware of being in communion with the whole episcopal body and therefore with all the local churches; this explains why Pius IX and Pius XII consulted the local churches before defining the two Marian dogmas. The origins of both can be traced back to the important affirmation of Mary as theotokos, as defined by the ecumenical council of Ephesus, and both concerned truths which popular devotion had previously “received”. These judgments are irreformable in the sense that they are not subject – as was claimed by the Gallican Articles of 1682 – to adjudication by any higher instance. Moreover, these are judgments issuing from the episcopal college through the one who in his person holds it together in communion: that is, the bishop of Rome. While his definition of a particular truth may not be expressed in precisely the same language which an ecumenical council* might have chosen, the difference is one of terminology and not of truth.

The final report of ARCIC I has clarified the Anglican position. Contrary to Roman Catholics, Anglicans do not accept that the bishop of Rome (keeping within the prescribed regulations) can make an infallible pronouncement; for them the infallibility of his judgment can be recognized only in retrospect. They are also worried by the fact that Pius IX and Pius XII exercised this “privilege” to define two dogmas when the faith was not under threat. To Anglicans this prerogative is of such momentous import that it should be asserted only in cases of extreme urgency or necessity.

The Orthodox churches reprove the RCC because it developed and defined this view of papal infallibility after the separation between East and West; thus it precluded the possibility of discussion and decision by a strictly ecumenical council in which all the apostolic traditions were represented.

“Indefectibility” is the term generally used to describe the indestructible and permanent character of the church as one and holy in spite of the sinfulness of its members. This indestructible unity and holiness is based on the promise of Christ that “the gates of Hades will not prevail against it” (Matt. 16:18). The conception of the church as “without a spot or wrinkle or anything of the kind” (Eph. 5:27) is shared by most Christian churches: the RCC, the Orthodox churches, many Anglicans, Lutherans and also some other Protestants, even if they vary on the use of the phrase ecclesia peccatrix. All seem to agree that the sinfulness of its members demands a constant purification of the concrete life of the church.

See also primacy, teaching authority.

J.-M.R. TILLARD

- P.C. Empie, T. Austin Murphy & J.A. Burgess eds, Teaching Authority and Infallibility in the Church, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1978
- R.R. Gaillardetz, Teaching with Authority: A Theology of the Magisterium in the Church, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1997
- Gift of Authority, London, CTS, 1999
- H. Küng, Infallible? An Unresolved Enquiry, New York, Continuum, 1994
- John Paul II, Apostolic Letter Ad Tuendam Fidem, Rome, 1998
- F.A. Sullivan, Magisterium: Teaching Authority in the Catholic Church, New York, Macmillan, 1983
- B. Tierney, Origins of Papal Infallibility, 1150-1350, Leiden, Brill, 1972.

INSPIRATION

THROUGHOUT the history of the Christian church, theories of the inspiration of scripture* have used a variety of adjectives:

dictatorial or mechanistic, personal vs verbal, natural or ecstatic vs organic, partial/dualistic/fundamental vs plenary, static vs dynamic, inspiration restricted to the historic event or the book itself vs inspiration including the effective receiving of the message (through the illumination by the same Spirit), dialectical/actual/existential inspiration, and many permutations. These theories have sought to address the same issues, but in terms of differing cultural and philosophical contexts: the relationship between human and divine; the Bible’s authority* and uniqueness; the role of the Holy Spirit* in interpretation; the role of the church* and therefore Tradition in interpretation (see Tradition and traditions); the aim and purpose of scripture; its trustworthiness, including its historical and scientific reliability; and the final ground for believers’ assuredness.

Especially in post-Reformation orthodoxy, terminology and philosophical ideas were used which led to serious debates during and after the Enlightenment, and these have continued until today. During the 20th century Karl Barth and Karl Rahner made major contributions towards new and positive interpretations of inspiration in their respective traditions.

Although it is too early to speak of an ecumenical consensus,* the last 40 years have seen a significant rapprochement between Catholics, (ecumenical) Protestants and the Eastern Orthodox, though many conservative Evangelicals* still adhere to the essentials of the orthodox Protestant position and strongly debate its nature and implications (esp. the question of inerrancy). The ecumenical convergence is reflected in the Constitution on Divine Revelation (Dei Verbum) of Vatican II* and some of the documents of Faith and Order.*

At the world conference on F&O in Montreal (1963) a report on “Scripture, Tradition and traditions”, expressing the common views of Protestant and Orthodox participants, addressed several issues traditionally related to inspiration: the Reformation principle of sola scriptura was qualified by the reminder that the Bible is part of Tradition and embedded in tradition; it in fact becomes living Tradition only when correctly interpreted in ever-new situations; Tradition as source of revelation* was qualified by the assertion that it is accessible only in traditions whose trustworthiness must be tested in the light of scripture. The role of confessional traditions in biblical interpretation, the necessity of constant re-interpretation in different cultural contexts, the diversity within the Bible itself and the accompanying difficulties in speaking of the biblical doctrine on any particular issue, as well as the theological consequences of critical scholarship, were discussed, with direct bearing on authority and inspiration (see hermeneutics).

At the F&O meeting in Louvain (1971) a study on "The Authority of the Bible" followed. The authority was seen not as a fixed quality belonging in some way to the Bible but as a "relational concept", present when experienced as the authority capable of leading people to faith,* as the impact of the self-demonstrating biblical testimony, which is ultimately the authority of God himself. While recognizing the importance of the canon,* the report insisted that the dividing line between canonical and non-canonical writings is not hard and fast. It dealt explicitly with inspiration, saying that it cannot be seen, as often in history, as an a priori dogmatic presupposition, on which the Bible's authority is based, but rather as a conclusion of faith, acknowledging the powerful activity of the Spirit behind the experienced authority of the biblical message. The report regarded critical distinctions within the biblical materials as necessary, held that different "relational centres" within the Bible were possible, and re-emphasized the ongoing process of interpretation and the role of the present-day situation.

This development shows convergence with Dei Verbum, which also affirmed divine inspiration, but in a "de-psychologized" way. Repeating the essential teaching of Vatican I, it depicted inspiration functionally, in terms of the canonical book which was to be the result (ch. 3, paras 11-13). Referring to 2 Tim. 3, it said: "Since, therefore, all that the inspired authors... affirm should be regarded as affirmed by the Holy Spirit, we must acknowledge that the books of scripture, firmly, faithfully and without error, teach that truth which God, for the sake of our salvation, wished to see confided to the sacred scriptures."

Drawing conclusions, Dei Verbum dealt with biblical interpretation in a way similar to F&O. Dulles (in McKim) mentions several related points of convergence: the treatment of "without error" (the fundamental idea of inerrancy but not the term, leaving scope for interpretation); the contents of the canon; the "canon within the canon"; the relationship between the two Testaments; scholarly methods of interpretation; and the material sufficiency of the Bible. "The documents... while they do not totally overcome all the historic disputes... go a long way towards reconciliation... It is no longer safe to assume that either Protestants or Catholics adhere to the classical orthodoxies of their own churches, as expressed in past centuries. Protestant and Catholic biblical reflection, since the mid-1960s, has embarked on a common history."

See also Bible, its role in the ecumenical movement; exegesis, methods of.

D.J. SMIT

- P.J. Achtemeier, The Inspiration of Scripture, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1980
- E. Flesseman-van Leer ed., The Bible: Its Authority and Interpretation in the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1980
- D.K. McKim ed., The Authoritative Word, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1983
- W. Vawter, Biblical Inspiration, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1972.

INSTITUTE FOR ECUMENICAL AND CULTURAL RESEARCH

THIS RESIDENTIAL centre for study, research, writing and dialogue was founded in 1967 by Kilian McDonnell, OSB, and the Benedictine monks of St John's Abbey on the campus of St John's University, in Collegeville, Minnesota, USA. It is an independent corporation with its own ecumenical board of directors, most of whom are laypersons. The Benedictine tradition of worship and work, together with the stimulation of the academic community, creates the atmosphere for institute activities.

The institute's task – “to dispel religious ignorance and promote better understanding and harmony” – is conceived broadly as the encouragement of constructive thought in historical, literary, artistic, philosophical, sociological, theological and other kinds of research that bear upon the Christian tradition, including the relationship of Christianity to culture. The institute welcomes men and women scholars, together with their families, for one or two semesters of study and writing on their own projects.

During summer months the institute holds invitational conferences to deal with timely ecumenical issues. A feature of these consultations is the insistence that participants speak in the first person; no one comes as an official representative of an ecclesiastical institution. The institute has pioneered in crossing conventional ecumenical lines by including in dialogue persons from traditions that have historically been wary of the ecumenical movement, and by giving such persons an opportunity to name their agenda instead of assuming they will enter into the ecumenical agenda already set by decades of discussion.

The various projects of the institute seek to discern the meaning of Christian identity and unity in a religiously and culturally diverse nation and world, and to communicate that meaning for the mission of the church and the renewal of human community.

The institute publishes twice a year Ecumenical People, Programs, Papers.

PATRICK HENRY

INSTITUTE FOR ECUMENICS

FOUNDED in 1957 in Paderborn, Germany, by Archbishop Lorenz Jaeger (1892-1975) and named after the Catholic ecumenical theologian Johann-Adam Möhler (d.1838), this RC institute pioneered the serious scientific study of Protestant churches and their theologies with objective, non-polemical methods. Originally called the institute “for Kontroverstheologie”, in 1966 the title changed to “for ecumenics”. The title recognizes that one must study not only the theology but also the total life of other churches, i.e. their liturgies, pieties, disciplines, politics, and that the aim is not articulated differences and counter-statements but acknowledged commonalities, in the light of which one can better understand and evaluate the differences.

In addition to such studies, the institute promotes ecumenical dialogues in the search for visible church unity* in truth and love; arranges lectures, conferences and study days, especially for those who are committed to pastoral ministry and who teach religion; trains specialists in ecumenism; builds up a research library in ecumenics (now over 150,000 volumes), open to scholars and students; and publishes studies through the quarterly Catholica and a special ecumenical series (over 80 books).

ALOYS KLEIN

INTERCESSION

“INTERCESSION” literally means “going between” and has come to mean particularly praying for others, caring for them in the presence of God, sharing in the divine caring, pleading their cause and offering their need, in what has been called “the prayer of love”. There are many biblical examples of intercession. Abraham prays for the righteous remnant in the city of Sodom (Gen. 18:22-33); Aaron carries the names of the children of Israel with him into the holy place (Ex. 28:29); the psalmist prays for the king (Ps. 72); the king prays for the people (1 Kings 8:30-66). In the New Testament the church prays for Peter in prison (Acts 12:5); Paul prays for the church in Ephesus (Eph. 1:15-23); James instructs the elders of the church to pray for the sick (James 5:14). In the Apocrypha there is reference to prayers for the dead (2 Macc. 12:43-45).

The focus of all Christian intercession is the incarnate Christ himself, who, with the Spirit, makes intercession for the whole of humanity (Rom. 8:26,34). Jesus gave his followers a pattern of intercession in a prayer whose framework is the petition that God's will be done and that the rule of his kingdom prevail. Christ's own intercession for his disciples, for the church and for the world is the great ecumenical prayer that "they may all be one... that the world may believe" (John 17:21).

While essential in the liturgy of all churches, intercession itself has sometimes been a cause of dissension between them. Already early in Christian history, controversy arose over the question of prayers for the dead, of which there are examples in the catacombs, and which have continued as a permissible custom in some churches in the form of requiem prayers and commemorations. In the medieval church, dissension arose over the invoking of angels, saints and the Blessed Virgin as aids to intercession, a custom strongly attacked by the reformers, who saw here a threat to their insistence on Christ as the one and only mediator, but defended by Catholics as a way of calling on the prayer offered continually within the communion of saints.*

Though intercession in recent times has come to play an increasingly important role in all forms of Christian worship, there are many diverse ways of engaging in it. Through the ecumenical movement these have been shared across the whole life of the church. Litanies in the Orthodox tradition, bidding prayers from Catholic liturgies and extemporaneous prayers from Protestant usage find their place now in the growing number of ecumenical gatherings for prayer, both local and international.

Ecumenical intercession is prayer in unity as well as prayer for unity, shared by people of all traditions, expressing solidarity with all God's creation. In the annual Week of Prayer for Christian Unity,* the material prepared for use in all the churches gives opportunities for intercession that is well informed about the whole ecumenical movement. The World Day of Prayer,* prepared annually by women of different countries, highlights each year the particular needs of the country responsible for the theme. Current ecumenical prayer cycles* enable the churches to pray not only for one another but also with all God's people.

The growing emphasis on intercession in the eucharistic observances of all the traditions is seen as an important part of that growing together reflected in the Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* document (BEM, E21,27). Lukas Vischer has suggested that the divided churches anticipate unity "by practising mutual intercession" and that it should thus form an integral part of every celebration of the eucharist. Theologically speaking, "the entire work of Christ can be presented as intercession". Vischer likens intercession to the "act of blessing", believes that it "entails suffering" and refers to the "prophetic intercession of Jesus as the hallmark of the prayer in John 17". Thus, as the churches "accept the common bond of mutual intercession..., [they] will also strengthen one another in their freedom for the future and their openness for love".

See also prayer in the ecumenical movement.

PAULINE WEBB

- J. Carden comp., With All God's People: The New Ecumenical Prayer Cycle, WCC, 1989
- P. Harling ed., Worshipping Ecumenically, WCC, 1995
- Kirchliches Ausse-nant der Evangelischen Kirche in Deutschland, Leiden von Christen in der Welt: Empfehlungen zur Fürbitte, Frankfurt, Lembeck, 1977
- L. Vischer, Intercession, WCC, 1980.

INTERCHURCH AID

In 1938, WHEN W.A. Visser 't Hooft was invited to become the WCC's first general secretary, he accepted on condition that the Council would be active in the field of aid, because "there could be no healthy ecumenical fellowship without practical solidarity". Few, if any, have disagreed with him. Even the provisional committee of the WCC, which began meeting in 1942 against a background of massive destruction in Europe and mounting need for reconciliation, set up what soon became known as the Department of Refugee and Inter-Church Aid (1945); and since the first WCC assembly in 1948 a whole succession of departments within the Council have reflected Visser 't Hooft's conviction, most notably: the Department and then Division of Inter-Church Aid and Service to Refugees (DICASR, 1949); the Division of Inter-Church Aid, Refugee and World Service (DICARWS, 1960); the Commission on Inter-Church Aid, Refugee and World Service (CICARWS, 1971); and Unit IV: Sharing and Service (1992) whose responsibilities were shared out between a number of teams within a newly-formed "cluster" on relations following the Harare assembly of 1998.

And these have not been the only actors. Within the structures of the WCC itself, CCPD (the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development), ECLC (Ecumenical Church Loan Fund), PCR (Programme to Combat Racism), CWME (Commission on World Mission and Evangelism), ACT International (Action by Churches Together, jointly managed with the Lutheran World Federation) and others have all played their part.

Outside the structures of the WCC, though within the same ecumenical family, the most important contributors to interchurch aid have of course been the churches themselves, both individually and together in their local, national and regional councils. Standing alongside them have been the increasingly professional and specialized aid and development organizations to which the churches gave birth and to which their offsprings have usually remained accountable even though they have tended to take on a life of their own. These organizations may relate to a single church or to several churches and so be ecumenical in their own right. In addition they have formed ecumenical alliances and networks of which the European APRODEV (Association of WCC-Related Development Organizations in Europe, 1990) and the much larger ACT International (1995) are examples. These organizations began to appear in Europe, North America, Australia and New Zealand in the 1940s. They are often referred to as "agencies" since they carry out the churches' work, and as "donor agencies" since they have been major sources of funding. They are now found in most corners of the world. Some, like CASA (Church's Auxiliary for Social Action) in India, are very large indeed.

The understanding of "interchurch aid" has broadened over the years. This is partly the result of internal debates within the ecumenical family often stimulated by the growing presence and influence of the churches of Africa, Asia and Latin America. But it is also due to external pressures. The persistence of poverty and inequality has been one, deepening the debate about the adequacy of the churches' response. The "wind of change" which swept across Africa and elsewhere was another, drawing the churches into the struggle for liberation and inspiring for example the Ecumenical Programme for Emergency Action in Africa (EPEAA) in 1965 and, later, the Programme to Combat Racism* (1969). The end of the cold war opened up greater cooperation with the churches in Eastern Europe and also brought with it the demands of a growing number of conflicts elsewhere. Most recently interchurch aid, as part of the life of an intrinsically "international" community, has been challenged to re-express itself in response to the phenomenon of "globalization".

"Broadening" has therefore been both geographical and conceptual. At the start interchurch aid was thought of largely in terms of helping the churches in Europe to recover from the ravages of the second world war; but its geographical remit soon widened to include most other parts of the world. At the start interchurch aid was concerned with "emergencies" which it was hoped would soon be resolved, for example by enabling refugees from conflict or famine to survive and then to return home and re-build their lives. That concern has never been abandoned. Indeed it was re-invigorated in 1995 when the WCC's Unit IV marked the 50th anniversary of the Council's service to refugees by re-commitment to solidarity with uprooted peoples; and the response to emergencies is now on a scale undreamed of at the outset, through ACT International for example which not only improved efficiency but gave the churches and their agencies a single common identity. But many of the underlying causes of these so-called "emergencies" were soon recognized as being far from temporary. A more sustained approach was required and the concept of aid broadened out to include the concept of development.* Again at the beginning, and the attitude still persists, aid was understood to be a matter of the materially rich helping the materially poor. Gradually it came to be understood that all peoples are both rich and poor in their different ways, spiritually as well as materially, and need each other's help. If ever interchurch aid was conceived rather narrowly as churches helping churches, it soon became clear that any such help had to enable churches to serve the needy, whether inside or outside their ranks, irrespective of ideology or religious creed. Finally, the understanding of interchurch aid has broadened to include advocacy which tries to meet human need in a different but complementary way by campaigning for changes in the policies and practices of governments and some of the world's largest and most influential institutions such as the World Bank, the IMF, the WTO and the UN. One result has been the formation of the Ecumenical Advocacy Alliance in 2001 preceded by the Jubilee 2000 campaign to cancel the debts of the poorest countries which was a thoroughly ecumenical movement of the churches and other faith communities.

Interchurch aid has been marked and stimulated by several long-running debates of which three are mentioned here. First comes the debate about holism. At the conceptual level it has kept on insisting that we are not just economic beings. If life is more than food, aid is more than emergency rations, and development is more than economic development. As human beings we have minds and spirits as well as bodies: we exist not just as individuals but in cultures and communities. Our needs and aspirations have to be dealt with in the round. Basically livelihoods may be the precondition of everything else but there is little point in gaining the whole economic world and losing our souls.

This holistic approach was a major theme running through the Larnaca consultation, organized by CICARWS in 1986, and the work of Unit IV in the early 1990s. At the practical level it led, for example in the Rwandan crisis of 1994, to attempts to deal with the psychological needs of people traumatized by conflict and to foster reconciliation between them as well as providing food and shelter.

More difficult was the attempt to honour both the Christian vocation to witness through evangelism, upheld by the missionary movement and incorporated within the WCC as the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism, and to witness through service, upheld by the development movement and incorporated within the WCC as various commissions on aid, development and service. Not to combine these two seemed to fly in the face of an holistic approach, but to combine them could rapidly put the work of aid and development under suspicion of being a cover for proselytism.*

Second is the debate about structural change. No one doubted that emergency aid was necessary but did little to deal with underlying causes. It provided a sticking plaster but not a cure. The force of the argument was not so readily accepted however when it came to the myriad development projects and programmes reported by ecumenical partners throughout the world. They too eased the pain but according to some did little to change the inequitable economic and social structures which created and perpetuated poverty. Structural change could only be brought about if the churches, along with others, engaged in political activities, and for many they needed to be of a radical, even revolutionary kind. Practical examples included efforts to protect victims of human-rights violations in Chile and other Latin American countries and standing alongside the racially oppressed in Southern Africa.

Several objections were raised however. The most familiar, and the most misguided, was that Christianity and politics do not mix. The more pragmatic was that it would bring the aid and development work of the churches under another cloud of suspicion especially from donors, both personal and corporate, who might well withdraw their financial support. More measured was the argument that political attempts to bring about structural change should not be allowed to eclipse projects and programmes which were a necessary support to poor people whilst they waited, perhaps for a life-time, for change to come about. In any case, if planned strategically, these programmes could in fact be instruments of structural change, not merely a substitute for it.

The third debate has been about partnership. At first it was hardly mentioned. Interchurch aid was dangerously like hand-outs and hand-downs. Churches of the "South", however, insisted that interchurch aid was in many ways perpetuating the very dependency it sought to eradicate whereby powerful and well-off churches and nations dictated what should happen to the less powerful and the poor and kept the decision making, whether with good or bad intentions, firmly in their own hands. This was objectionable for several reasons. It denied poor people the right to take control over their lives. It assumed that others knew better than they did what was good for the poor. Worse still, it behaved as if so-called poor people had nothing to give and had no riches of their own to share. As a result relations between the churches were not mutual but one-sided and over-bearing.

Numerous attempts have been made to promote real partnerships. The priority projects list administered by the WCC for many years tried to ensure that priorities for funding were decided by the recipients and not the donors. In 1987 a consultation at El Escorial produced fresh "Guidelines for Sharing". The WCC created a desk dedicated to resource sharing understood as a respectful and mutual enterprise. Round tables were formed and reformed in countries and regions where all the parties involved, donors and recipients alike, met together and made joint decisions about programmes and strategies and were accountable to one another. Whilst unequal power structures in both church and world and the unequal distribution of resources, together with the widening gap between rich and poor, jeopardize all such attempts, they nevertheless underline the importance of fostering a community of sharing in which all are seen as vulnerable and as responsible for each other.

Interchurch aid will no doubt continue to be endorsed by the whole ecumenical family; and it will continue to be the focus of controversy. It is too close to the heart of the churches' calling to serve and to bring good news to the poor, and it is too close to the harsh realities of life for millions of God's people to be otherwise. Nevertheless, for the time being we may perhaps define it as: churches helping each other to play their part according to the gospel in opening up for everyone, especially the most deprived, an equal chance to live their lives to the full.

See also globalization, economic.

MICHAEL H. TAYLOR

- H. van Beek ed., Sharing Life: Report of the World Consultation on Koimonia, El Escorial 1987, WCC, 1989
- H.E. Fey ed., The Ecumenical Advance: A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol 2: 1948-1968, London, SPCK, 1970
- Fifty Years and More: World Council of Churches' Sharing and Service 1994-1995, WCC, 1995
- K. Poser ed., Diakonia 2000: Called to be Neighbours: Larnaca 1986, WCC, 1987
- K. Slack ed., Hope in the Desert: The Churches' United Response to Human Need, 1944-1984, WCC, 1986
- M. Taylor, Not Angels but Agencies, WCC, 1995.

INTERCOMMUNION

FOR MOST of the 20th century, intercommunion was the slogan around which the ecumenical debate concerning the point at which churches might properly enter into eucharistic fellowship with one another took place.

The Orthodox rejected altogether the term and concept of intercommunion – which the Bulgarian and Romanian responses to Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* suspect "Eucharist" (E33) of still favouring – on the ground that there is either "communion"* in the one church or no communion at all. A similar substantive position was held by the Roman Catholic Church (RCC), some Anglicans, some Lutherans and some Baptists, although they differed on what was required for the unity* of which eucharistic communion was or would be the sacramental expression. On the other hand, those churches which accepted a federal model of unity (see federalism) used the word "intercommunion" without any pejorative intent or sense of provisionality, to describe their sacramental sharing across persisting denominational boundaries.

Between these two positions were to be found those ecumenists who had most stake in the notion of intercommunion: they held that at some point along the road to an ever fuller unity it became possible and desirable for churches to practise intercommunion as both a sign of the unity they already enjoyed and a means towards more perfect unity. Sometimes adopting an eschatological perspective (for the Lord's supper prefigures the banquet of the final kingdom, where a divided fellowship is unthinkable), they argued that the goal of unity could become prophetically effective through the active anticipation of it in the sacrament. At the Faith and Order* meeting in Lund (1952) T.F. Torrance spoke of the eucharist as "the divinely given sacrament of unity, the medicine for our divisions".

On the recommendation of the Montreal world conference on Faith and Order (1963), the WCC central committee that year formalized a procedure that ecumenical conferences, in order to bear witness to the tensions inherent in the theory and practice of communion in the painful and scandalous situation of a divided Christianity, should include both a celebration "according to the liturgy of a church which cannot conscientiously offer an invitation to members of all other churches to partake of the elements" and one "in which a church or a group of churches can invite members of other churches to participate and partake". In the long-standing custom of an occasional "open" communion at ecumenical events, it was most often the Anglicans who had acted as hosts, since this usually ensured a maximum number of communicants (if only because Anglicans themselves, whatever their churchmanship, were ready to receive at the hands of an Anglican celebrant, whereas they were not sure to do so in the case of a Methodist, Presbyterian or Baptist presiding).

During his tenure as WCC general secretary, Emilio Castro pressed for greater eucharistic sharing and pleaded at Canberra in 1991 that "this should be the last assembly with a divided eucharist". Faith and Order studied the matter again in 1995-96 but concluded that "it is still not possible to move beyond the guidelines" established in 1963. Thus the 1998 assembly of the WCC in Harare did not include any eucharistic service as part of official assembly worship, given the current impossibility of a fully common celebration. The programme included a service of penitence in recognition of continuing divisions; and various local congregations representing the Orthodox, Oriental Orthodox (see Oriental Orthodox churches), Reformation and Roman Catholic streams of Christianity hosted WCC delegates at their respective celebrations of a Sunday eucharist,* in the understanding that existing protocol be observed.

It was probably the official entry of the RCC into the ecumenical movement which did most to shift the terms of the problematic to those of "eucharistic hospitality" (in fact a better description than intercommunion – which implies mutuality – for what took place in many "open" communion services). Vatican II* recognized that other Christians, by virtue of baptism* and faith* in Christ, still or already enjoy "a certain, though imperfect, communion with the Catholic church" (Unitatis Redintegratio 3). On this ground, pastoral provision could be made for rightly disposed non-Catholics whose sacramental faith is consonant with the Catholic faith to receive, upon request, the Catholic eucharist in the emergency circumstances of mortal danger, persecution, imprisonment, or serious spiritual need (Ecumenical Directory, 1967, 55; cf. Ecumenical Directory, 1993, 129-31). According to the Directory of 1993 (159-60), Catholic bishops may allow the admission of the non-Catholic partner to Catholic communion at the celebration of a mixed marriage, provided all the other conditions are met; but such "eucharistic sharing can only be exceptional".

The RCC would have liked the Orthodox churches – and thereby Rome made a considerable recognition of their ecclesiality – to offer reciprocal hospitality in the sacraments of penance, eucharist and the anointing of the sick to Roman Catholics in exceptional circumstances (Vatican II, Orientalium Ecclesiarum 26-29; Ecumenical Directory, 1967, 39-45; cf. Direc- tory, 1993, 122-28); but with the temporary exception of the Moscow patriarchate for some years after 1969, this has not occurred. In 1984, however, Pope John Paul II and Oriental Orthodox Syrian Patriarch Ignatius Zakka I entered into such a mutual pastoral agreement for the sake of their faithful who had no access to their respective priests. In the case of Protestants, it was clearer that the Roman emergency hospitality would be offered to them as individual Christians, the limited ecclesiality of their own communities being indicated by the fact that Catholics were still expected not to communicate in Protestant churches (Ecumenical Directory, 1967, 55; cf. Directory, 1993, 132), whose Lord's supper was marred by a "defect" at the level of ordination (UR 22).

The largely individual character of eucharistic hospitality is evident in those churches which practise "open communion" or "general admission". Perhaps the Methodists were the first; but at Princeton in 1954 the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* recommended the admission to the Lord's table of "any baptized person who loves and confesses Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour". In 1975 the German Lutheran churches (VELKD) adopted the position that "access to the Lord's table is in principle open to every baptized Christian who comes trusting in Christ's word of promise as spoken in his words of institution"; and the (Lutheran) Church of Norway, in its response to BEM, declared that while it did not "feel that what is stated in the BEM document yet provides an adequate basis for full eucharistic communion between the churches involved", yet it had "long practised the principle of open communion" on the grounds that fellowship around the Lord's table was "a natural expression" of baptismal unity. The common theological thread in the argument appears to be that, in case of ecclesial conflict, the sacraments belong to the Lord rather than to the church(es); but this itself is of course only one possible answer to the question of the instrumentality of the church* in the mediation of salvation.*

Beyond and amid the various current disciplines of the respective churches, there are groups of Christians who, on the basis of local advances in ecumenism or in the context of collaboration in significant projects of witness and service, do in fact practise a certain intercommunion. Although an element of self-indulgence cannot always be discounted, these communions sauvages are an understandable expression of impatience at the failure of church authorities to enact the degree of unity that is already possible, and they may benevolently be interpreted as prophetic acts.

While the official admission of individuals in pastoral emergencies is charitable, while the ultimate sovereignty of the Lord over his sacraments* must be maintained, and while the flouting of institutional discipline may bring local and temporary relief, yet the question of ecclesial relations cannot be evaded. That is why we are driven back to the possibility of, and need for, communion agreements between the churches. These have recently come in various kinds: thus the US Lutheran-Episcopal interim agreement of 1982 required that a minister from each church preside at a joint celebration, though this has now been transcended in the relationship of "full communion" inaugurated in 2001 (see Anglican-Lutheran dialogue). The 1973 Leuenberg concordat between European Lutherans and Reformed, in its full mutual recognition of members and ministries, allows for the interchangeability of sacramental presidency, as does the "pulpit and altar fellowship" declared in Germany in 1987 and 1990 between the Methodists and the Lutheran, Reformed and United churches. Churches have to decide when their relations with particular partners are ripe for a certain kind of agreement and what is the future road they still have to travel together.

Since 1975 the express constitutional goal of the WCC has been to help the churches to advance to "visible unity in one faith and in one eucharistic fellowship". This is an urgent task. In a passionate paragraph, BEM declares: "The eucharist involves the believer in the central event of the world's history. As participants in the eucharist, therefore, we prove inconsistent if we are not actively participating in this ongoing restoration of the world's situation and the human condition. The eucharist shows us that our behaviour is inconsistent in face of the reconciling presence of God in human history: we are placed under continual judgment by the persistence of unjust relationships of all kinds in our society, the manifold divisions on account of human pride, material interest and power politics and, above all, the obstinacy of unjustifiable confessional oppositions within the body of Christ" (E20). An earlier draft said, even more sharply, that such divisions "make a mockery" of the eucharist.

See also church discipline.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

■ D. Baillie & J. Marsh eds, Intercommunion, London, SCM Press, 1952 ■ P. Beffa, "Intercommunion: Some Personal Reflections and Testimonies", ER, 44, 1, 1992 ■ "Beyond Intercommunion: On the Way to Communion in Eucharist", in Faith and Order: Louvain 1971, WCC, 1971 ■ "Eucharistic Hospitality" (= ER, 44, 1, 1992) ■ W. Elert, Abendmahl und Kirchengemeinschaft in der altern Kirche hauptsächlich des Ostens (ET Eucharist and Church Fellowship in the First Four Centuries, St Louis MO, Concordia, 1966) ■ Faith and Order, Minutes of the Board, Bangkok, Jan. 1996, pp.54,133-38 ■ D. Heller, "Eucharistic Fellowship in the Third Millennium?: The Question of the Eucharist in Future Ecumenical Discussions", ER, 51, 2, 1999 ■ L. Hodgson, Church and Sacraments in a Divided Christendom, London, SPCK, 1959 ■ G. Wainwright, The Ecumenical Moment: Crisis and Opportunity for the Church, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1983, chs 4-5 ■ G. Wainwright, "The Nature of Communion", Ecumenical Trends, 28, 1999.

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR MISSION STUDIES

THE FORMAL organization of the International Association for Mission Studies (IAMS) in 1972 in the Netherlands realized a proposal made more than 20 years earlier by Norwegian missiologist Olav Myklebust, to which some personnel of the International Missionary Council* had objected on the ground that it would duplicate the activities of the IMC research department. The aim of IAMS is "to promote the scholarly study of theological, historical, social and practical questions relating to mission, to promote fellowship, cooperation and mutual assistance in the study, and to relate studies in mission to studies in theological and other fields". IAMS achieves this through research, publications, triennial congresses and the journal Mission Studies.

Research activities have centred on biblical studies and mission, healing, and mission documentation, archives and bibliography. Congress venues are chosen to expose participants to the varied contexts of mission in the oikoumene.

In its origins a Western European and Protestant organization, IAMS is now a broadly ecumenical body, including Roman Catholics, Orthodox, conciliar and evangelical Protestants, and members of the Pentecostal, charismatic and Independent churches from all six continents among its more than 500 individual and corporate members. In 1988 it elected its first non-Northern president; and it seeks to increase its number of women members.

JOHN S. POBEE

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

THE INTERNATIONAL Association for Religious Freedom was founded by Unitarians in 1900 in Boston (USA) as the International Council of Unitarian and Other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, and held its first congress in 1901 in London. It is the oldest international inter-religious organization in the world. Originally designed to unite Unitarian and related groups and individuals, IARF membership gradually grew to include representatives of a wide variety of faith groups, including Buddhist, Shinto, Hindu, African tribal religion, as well as liberal Christian. Encompassing 86 member groups in 27 countries, IARF holds a triennial congress as well as many other meetings for inter-religious cooperation and dialogue. A social service network provides direct aid and relief, principally in India.

WILLIAM F. SCHULZ

INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIAN YOUTH EXCHANGE

AS A MEANS of post-second world war reconciliation, the Church of the Brethren (USA) in 1949, in cooperation with the US state department, began to bring German youth to the USA for a year of living with a family, going to school and sharing in church life. In 1957 the Brethren and four other US denominations formed the ICYE as an independent church-sponsored agency for one-year ecumenical exchanges of young people of 16-18 years. In cooperation with ecumenical youth movements and the WCC youth department, the ICYE initiated exchanges with other countries in Europe, later in Asia, Latin America and Africa. In 1965 student exchanges began among European countries and among regions. By the late 1960s 450 youth in 27 countries participated annually.

In the 1950s there was a strong emphasis on the church, Christian commitment and ecumenical education. In the 1960s religious commitment did not weaken but was interpreted in different ways. The decade was marked by turmoil, protest by youth and students, the demand for international economic justice, and the experience of liberation from traditional ideas and patterns of behaviour. Vigorous discussions in the ICYE took place on how to understand its aims and purposes, and the meaning of "Christian" in its name.

In 1967 the ICYE, the World Student Christian Federation's European section for Christian school movements and the WCC youth department co-sponsored a youth conference: "Revolution: The Struggle for True Humanity". Out of the 183 participants, 115 were ICYE students who had spent a year overseas. They were critical of educational systems which ignored the dimensions of social change in a world of economic and political injustice.

A statement of the international committee (Berlin 1969) reflected the debate about the ICYE's Christian character and purpose: "ICYE sponsors the exchange of young people among nations as a means of international and ecumenical education to further Christian commitment to and responsibility for reconciliation, justice and peace in the world. ICYE seeks to enable all participants to discover the common bonds they share with the whole of humanity. ICYE therefore seeks encounter with persons of all convictions and invites participation of those who share its aims and who wish to take part in its programmes."

Separating itself from the US programme, the ICYE international council was formed in 1969. The US separation caused a precarious financial situation. The nature of international exchange and of Christian commitment was called into question; internal tensions increased. In 1977 the council dissolved itself, and in a new federation the national ICYE committees were free to interpret and develop programmes according to their own convictions.

The ICYE retains ecumenical links. It develops new patterns alongside the traditional one-year school and family programme, including opportunities for voluntary service and community action, independent or group living, and special exchanges for youth with disabilities. Over 500 youth from more than 30 countries in all continents participate annually. Since the ICYE's beginning, over 14,000 young people from over 40 countries have joined in this exchange programme, and 25,000 other persons of all ages have been involved as hosts or co-workers.

See also youth.

WILLIAM A. PERKINS

INTERNATIONAL ECUMENICAL FELLOWSHIP

THE INTERNATIONAL Ecumenical Fellowship is an informal European organization founded in Fribourg, Switzerland, in 1967. Its aim is to develop fellowship between Christians of different denominations and nationalities through regional meetings and an annual international conference. It provides a forum for discussion and an opportunity to share in the worship of different traditions as far as church discipline and consciences permit. Its headquarters is in Belgium, and there are branches in several European countries.

JOSINE HAUTFENNE

INTERNATIONAL FELLOWSHIP OF EVANGELICAL STUDENTS

THE INTERNATIONAL Fellowship of Evangelical Students was founded in 1946-47 by leaders of evangelical student movements of ten nations – Australia, Britain, Canada, China, France, Holland, New Zealand, Norway, Switzerland and the USA. Each successive decade has added 10-20 new members, so that by 2000 IFES was active in 140 countries, with local student chapters together numbering several hundred thousand. Some IFES affiliates have roots which go back to the Student Volunteer Movement and the World Student Christian Federation.* Others arose indigenously, while still others owe their origin to the pioneer labours of international IFES staff.

IFES groups identify with conservative evangelical theology. They emphasize combining personal and group Bible study with evangelism. Inter-Varsity,* as the movement is commonly known from the name of the British movement at its founding in 1928, stresses student leadership. The Cambridge University chapter traces its evangelical heritage to Charles Simeon, past mentor of students, in the late 18th century. Cambridge Inter-collegiate Christian Union has served as a model of Inter-Varsity work around the world.

The two largest affiliates are Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship-USA (1941), represented on some 600 campuses, and Nigeria Fellowship of Evangelical Students (1968), represented in more than 270 schools. Some affiliates have had impressive growth without the benefit of national staff (e.g. the Tertiary Students' Christian Fellowship of Papua New Guinea, with several thousand members). In East Africa several IFES-affiliated groups claim that about 10% of the students are members.

Over the years IFES has helped to identify and nurture many third-world Christians who are now leaders in various missions and international agencies, such as the Lausanne movement (see Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization) and the World Evangelical Fellowship.* IFES headquarters are in London.

ROBERT T. COOTE

INTERNATIONAL FELLOWSHIP OF RECONCILIATION

THE INTERNATIONAL Fellowship of Reconciliation, founded in 1919, is an international spiritually based movement of women and men committed to active non-violence as a way of life and as a means of personal, social and political change.

IFOR's members include Christians, Jews, Buddhists, Muslims, Baha'is and Hindus. Other members express their faith not in terms of one of the major world religions, but in a spiritual or philosophical understanding that has led them to a commitment to non-violence. IFOR has branches and groups in over 40 countries and on every continent.

The issues may vary, but there is an underlying vision. This vision involves moving towards a culture of non-violence, where relationships and models of destruction and domination are replaced by those of nurture and cooperation. IFOR members are determined to be in solidarity with people struggling for human rights and to overcome oppression. Members believe that the spiritual dimension of non-violence can be a resource for healing. Some IFOR members, such as Jane Addams, Adolfo Perez Esquivel and Mairead Corrigan-Maguire, have been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for their work. Members have always believed that preparation for peace is essential. The Fellowship's long tradition of peace education and non-violence training stems from this conviction.

The IFOR secretariat, located in the Netherlands, serves the international network by facilitating communication among the membership. IFOR is a non-governmental organization with consultative status at the Economic and Social Council (Ecosoc) of the United Nations.

SUSAN H. ROSS

- J.A. Donaghy, Peacemaking and the Community of Faith: A Handbook for Congregations, Nyack NY, Paulist, 1983
- L. Stevenson, Towards a Christian International: The Story of the International Fellowship of Reconciliation, London, FOR, 1941
- W. Wink ed., Peace Is the Way: Writings on Nonviolence from the Fellowship of Reconciliation, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 2000.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

THERE ARE considerable differences between national law and international law. In most states national law has developed as part of a legal and constitutional order which attributes authority to legislative, judicial and executive branches of government. Thus, at the national level institutions exist to enact and to enforce the law. However, the international community does not (yet) have central institutions at the global level vested with authority to legislate, to adjudicate and to enforce the law. The law that governs relations between nations* does not primarily derive its authority from institutions created to enact and to enforce the law but rather from the degree of consent and acceptance on the part of the nations individually and collectively.

The scope of international law has evolved over the centuries. The origin of the international community as presently constituted is usually traced back to the peace of Westphalia (1648), which brought about a recognition of the concept of national sovereign states, initiated a development of making the state independent from the church and affirmed a new political distribution of power in a large part of Europe.

The European nations which at that time were expanding their power positions in the world, shaping the content of the law of nations according to their own interests, used to call themselves "Christian nations". Belonging to the community of Christian nations was considered an entitlement to dominate and rule over peoples in other continents who were to be converted and educated. Christian authorities were an important source for determining the nature and the content of the law of nations, as is also evident from the writings of Francisco de Vitoria and Hugo Grotius, two of the founding fathers of the law of nations.

In the 19th century this limited group gradually lost its exclusively Christian character. To maintain the European balance of power, the Ottoman empire was invited in 1856 "to participate in the public law and concert of Europe"; subsequently Japan, after its military defeated China, was also accepted in the community of nations, known by then as the "civilized nations". One factor which qualified a nation to belong to the "civilized" world was the capacity to wage war with modern technological equipment. After the war against China a Japanese diplomat observed: "We showed ourselves at least equals in scientific butchery, and at once we are admitted to your council tables as civilized men."

The notion of civilization was very much a guiding principle for shaping international law during the late 19th and the earlier 20th centuries. The conclusion of the Congo act at the congress of Berlin (1885), where Western powers divided among themselves spheres of domination over large parts of Africa, was done with the justification of spreading civilization. The law of warfare codified at The Hague in the beginning of the 20th century stated that in the absence of treaty provisions, belligerents were bound to observe "the principles of the laws of nations, as they result from the usages established among civilized peoples, from the laws of humanity and the dictation of the public conscience". The covenant of the League of Nations (1919) referred to the "sacred trust of civilization" as the basis of the mandates system; the statute of the International Court of Justice still contains an echo of the same notion when it refers to "the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations" as one of the sources of international law (art. 38, para. 1c).

The brutalities committed during the second world war by nations that carried the flag of "civilization" fully discredited this notion. Thus article 4 of the United Nations* charter requires states that wish to become members of the organization to be "peace-loving". The community of nations has lost the exclusive character inherent in the notions of "Christian" and "civilized", and has assumed universal dimensions, as reflected in the membership of the UN, which comprises virtually all nations that have acquired statehood.

This development has influenced the nature and scope of international law. Traditional international law aimed particularly at guaranteeing the liberty of the sovereign state* in its relationships with other sovereign states. With the widening of the community of nations into a global society, the claims of the developing nations for more equitable international structures and relationships brought about, albeit in a compromise fashion, new approaches to international law which take into account the interests of all rather than the interests of the privileged few. Examples of such new approaches can be found in the law of the sea and in the international law of human rights.*

An enlightening distinction can be made between the international law of co-existence and the international law of co-operation. The essential function of the legal system in traditional international law is to permit and guarantee the coexistence of rival and competing entities, organized in the form of sovereign states, without recognizing a higher authority. The law of coexistence aims at keeping states peacefully apart rather than working actively together. The principles of sovereign equality, self-determination and non-intervention are characteristic of the international law of coexistence, which typically views peace as the absence of war.

The international law of cooperation requires positive measures on the basis of the interdependence of peoples and nations. Its essence is the recognition of common interests and common needs which can adequately be met only by collaborative efforts. This is reflected in the United Nations charter, which provides for international cooperation in the social, economic, cultural and human rights fields.

One of the most obvious present-day threats to the planet and to humanity, the degradation of the environment, can be effectively tackled only by means of international cooperation, and since the UN conference on the human environment (1972), numerous multilateral conventions have been concluded on a variety of environmental aspects, most in the framework of international organizations.

Development of the international law of cooperation and shaping an international order which upholds the values inherent in peace, justice and the integrity of creation can be realized only through collective efforts in international organizations. Of crucial importance in this respect are the activities of the UN and its specialized agencies. Thus the WCC, through its Commission of the Churches on International Affairs (CCIA), has from the outset strongly supported the central importance of the UN as a forum and instrument of multilateral cooperation. Moreover, among the tasks listed in the bylaws of the CCIA is encouraging "the development of international law and of effective international institutions".

The development of international law was especially prominent on the WCC agenda in its earlier years. The first assembly (Amsterdam 1948) made the point that international law requires international institutions for its effectiveness. Amsterdam regarded international law not only as a means of regulating issues of international concern – such as the use of atomic power, multilateral reduction of armaments, provision of health services and food for all, promoting respect for human rights – but also as a common foundation of moral conviction, "without which any system of law will break down".

This linking of international law with principles of morality was echoed at the second assembly (Evanston 1954), which saw as one of the most obvious barriers to a genuine world community the lack of a common foundation of moral principles, and thus argued that the world of nations needs an international ethos to provide a sound groundwork for the development of international law and institutions. Again in New Delhi (1961) reference was made to the need for an international ethic and for a study of the nature and content of the moral foundations of international law and order to help nations of different traditions understand and accept their common allegiance to basic ethical conceptions. This call was repeated at the assembly at Uppsala (1968); but later WCC pronouncements tended to perceive international law more in terms of its concrete function than in its ethical foundation.

The Evanston assembly also advanced several considerations related to the scope, content and role of international law, among them the principles that all nations should honour their pledged word and international agreements they have accepted and that international disputes should be settled not by unilateral action but by direct negotiation, conciliation, arbitration or judicial settlement. The New Delhi assembly spoke in the same vein of the need for peaceful settlement of disputes.

The New Delhi report introduced an important new element into the WCC approach to international law: the role of international law as a means to effect just and peaceful changes. Especially in the context of many newly independent states, New Delhi asserted that the protection of the existing order should be accompanied by the recognition of legitimate demands for its alteration, in so far as these further the maintenance of peace and serve the common good of the international community. Uppsala also underscored the twofold role of international law as a means to preserve and to change. Legal enactments and international treaties reveal that law can be a force of order and of change and reform.

A constant theme in the WCC support for the development of international law is the call for the strengthening of international institutions – in particular, the UN as an instrument of cooperation and as a centre for harmonizing the actions of nations. Already in Amsterdam the WCC deemed that the purposes of the UN deserved the support of Christians. New Delhi stressed that the universal vocation of the organization implied the need for universal membership, referring in particular to the People's Republic of China. While New Delhi's positive appreciation of the UN as developing from a conference of national delegations into an organization with an authority and special responsibilities of its own was not always maintained in later years in such optimistic terms, depending on the political climate, WCC support for the world organization remained undiminished.

On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the UN, the WCC central committee, meeting in Buenos Aires in 1985, stated that the world was witnessing a crisis of confidence in international institutions, a growing breakdown in multilateralism and a gradual erosion in the authority of the UN. The strengthening of international institutions for peace and for the respect of international law was more important than ever. A decade later, in a statement on the 50th anniversary of the UN, the central committee said that a crisis of confidence in the United Nations persisted and had grown, especially in the "South". The crisis in multilateralism "continues almost unabated", further widening and deepening the chasm between rich and poor nations, and virtually abandoning the least developed countries, the vast majority of which are in Africa. The central committee called for significant UN reform that would assure full participation in effective decision making by all member states, and for a comprehensive public review of the structure and functioning of the Security Council, especially with regard to its domination by the present permanent members invested with veto powers.

Sceptical as it was about the ability of the UN to uphold the international rule of law, the central committee strongly reiterated its commitment to the UN, citing as still relevant the statement of the 1966 WCC conference on Church and Society that had said: "The UN is the best structure now available through which to pursue the goals of international peace and justice. Like all institutions it is not sacrosanct and many changes are necessary [for it] to meet the needs of the world today. Nevertheless, we call upon the churches of the world to defend it against all attacks which would weaken or destroy it and to seek out and advocate ways in which it can be transformed into an instrument fully capable of ensuring the peace and guaranteeing justice on a worldwide scale."

As the overall position of the WCC shifted from a predominantly theoretical ethical stand to a more contextual and pragmatic approach to international law after the Uppsala assembly in 1968, fewer references were made in its statements to the role of international law as such. However, frequent appeals were made for respect of existing international agreements or for concluding new agreements, especially in the areas of disarmament, arms control and human rights. For instance, the Vancouver assembly (1983) appealed urgently to all governments of the world to adopt and ratify international human rights instruments, to respect the rights included in these agreements, and to promote by all means both in law and in practice their fuller realization in every country. A similar appeal was made with respect to international refugee conventions. The WCC also appealed at Vancouver for a comprehensive test ban treaty as a necessary step to stopping the further development of nuclear weapons technology. This functional and pragmatic approach to international law and international institutions is clearly consonant with the strong conviction that they are indispensable means to promote universal peace and justice and to preserve and enhance the integrity of creation.

The Canberra assembly (1991), speaking in the midst of the Gulf war, sharply defended the UN as the chief guardian of international law, criticizing the Gulf coalition powers for sidelining it in this first major world confrontation after the conclusion of the cold war. "For the Security Council or the secretary-general, in the exercise of his good offices, to be for some reason unable to act independently and in the true spirit of the UN charter would be unacceptable... The community of nations cannot afford such a weakening of the UN system. For the sake of world peace, for the sake of the rule of law, for the sake of the authority of the UN, its position as guarantor of a comprehensive international peace order must be strengthened."

This statement set the tone for ecumenical approaches to the series of conflicts that exploded in the Balkans during the 1990s. The central committee in 1999 summarized its discussions through that decade, expressing deep concern about "the erosion of the authority and capacity of the United Nations and its institutions created to develop, codify and guarantee respect for the international rule of law", re-affirming the WCC's support for the United Nations as "the unique instrument of the peoples of the world for guaranteeing respect for the international rule of law".

During the 1970s the WCC was especially active in defending human rights in societies governed by martial law imposed by military dictatorships, especially in Latin America and Asia. A natural outgrowth of this work was a CCIA programme begun in 1993 to address the question of impunity granted to former military rulers. The WCC was also active in an international coalition to promote the creation of an International Criminal Court. Such a court was first proposed by the UN general assembly in 1948 as a means to deal with the authors of genocide during the second world war, but serious efforts were not engaged until the general assembly in 1989. The debate gained momentum in 1993 in the light of the "ethnic cleansing" that characterized the civil conflicts in the former Yugoslavia. Over the objections of the USA, the statute of the International Criminal Court was adopted in Rome on 17 July 1998. As distinct from earlier international instruments for human rights and international law that sometimes took decades to gain the required number of government ratifications for them to be applied, support for the Rome statute came quickly and it came into force on 1 July 2002. Thus the "missing link" in the international legal system was established. The International Court of Justice at The Hague handles only cases between states. For the first time an instrument is now available to try individuals for their involvement in acts of genocide and egregious violations of human rights.

See also international order, law.

THEO VAN BOVEN and DWAIN EPPS

- A.J. van der Bent, Christian Response in a World of Crisis, WCC, 1986
- A. Cassese, International Law in a Divided World, Oxford, Clarendon, 1986
- N. Koshy, Churches in the World of Nations: International Politics and the Mission and Ministry of the Church, WCC, 1994
- O.F. Nolde, "Ecumenical Action in International Affairs", in HI-II
- K. Raiser, "International Affairs: Continuity and Discontinuity", in Commemorating Amsterdam 1948: 40 Years of the World Council of Churches, ER, 40, 1988
- B.V.A. Roling, International Law in an Expanded World, Amsterdam, Djambatan, 1960.

INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY COUNCIL

THE INTERNATIONAL Missionary Council grew out of the world missionary conference (Edinburgh 1910) and was formally constituted in 1921 in Lake Mohonk, New York, uniting the Protestant national missionary councils and councils of churches in Africa, Asia and Latin America in a federation with Protestant councils of missionary agencies in Europe and North America. Of the original 17 IMC members, 13 were Western missionary councils. One cannot understand either the missionary enterprise in the 20th century or the preparatory stages of the WCC without appreciating the IMC's development through its global network of coordinated activities, common studies, consultations and conferences, and united action.

The IMC's development in thought and activities up until its integration with the WCC in 1961 is chronicled in the entry on mission,* and the entry on ecumenical conferences* outlines the highlights of major IMC meetings (Jerusalem 1928, Tambaram 1938, Whitby 1947, Willingen 1952, Accra 1958). This entry considers the ecumenical dynamics leading up to the 1961 integration, noting issues which caused prior hesitations on both sides. Despite 40 years of structural unity within the WCC, these issues still persist, leaving institutional divisions within the missionary enterprise.

An important phenomenon of the early ecumenical movement was the way in which many of the same people were active in and gave leadership to the variety of organizations which were ecumenical in intent, and how these pioneers then sought, inspired and formed talented younger disciples to stand on their shoulders.

John Mott (1865-1955), for example, a Methodist layman, was intercollegiate secretary of the Young Men's Christian Associations (1888), founded the World Student Christian Federation* (1895) and became its general secretary. He chaired Edinburgh 1910 and its continuation committee, helped establish national missionary councils in Asia, chaired the IMC, helped lead the Oxford Life and Work conference (1937), and became vice-chairman of the WCC provisional committee. After the Edinburgh conference Charles Brent (1862-1929), Episcopalian bishop in the Philippines, actively participated in the first Life and Work conference (1925) and organized and became president of Faith and Order (1927). Willem Visser 't Hooft (1900-85), Dutch Reformed, was secretary of the World Alliance of YMCAs* and general secretary of the WSCF before becoming the first WCC general secretary. Lesslie Newbigin (1909-98) was a bishop of the Church of South India, became the last IMC general secretary (1959) and, after the integration, the first director of the Division – later Commission – on World Mission and Evangelism of the WCC (CWME). This general network of friendship and shared commitment meant that those active in the IMC and the pioneers of the WCC were not strangers to one another. But because of differing constituencies, emphases and organizational demands, the IMC as such stood apart from the WCC until 1961.

The IMC Tambaram conference in 1938 discussed the proposed creation of the WCC. It urged cooperation in the formation stage through a joint committee between the two bodies, which Mott chaired. But most members wanted the IMC to maintain its own "separate organization, autonomy and independence". The IMC preferred to be only "in association" with the WCC-to-be, and to give the WCC time to discover its own role in the ecumenical movement.

After 1948 the IMC and WCC had a number of joint activities, e.g. a single IMC-WCC secretariat in the Far East, meeting refugee and other emergency needs in Asia and the Middle East, and integrating the IMC mission research department into the WCC division of studies. But much overlapping and duplication of energies, time and personnel remained. Already in 1945 Samuel McCrea Cavert had judged that it would be "a failure of Christian statesmanship to divide the ecumenical forces permanently into two groups". Underlying the logic of events, organizational alignments and ecumenically committed and talented personnel was a perceived deeper unity of calling and purpose.

The Evanston WCC assembly (1954) set up a joint committee with the IMC to study full integration. In 1956 the committee recommended to the parent bodies the possibility of integration, "subject to an adequate safeguarding in any plan... of the distinctive expression of the mission of the church as this has been embodied in the IMC". In the next years the joint committee would uncover hesitation and anxiety on both sides.

From the IMC side, the 19th-century missionary advances by European and North American Protestants were seen as the work of missionary societies* and mission councils who had organized, educated and financed themselves in varying degrees of independence from the classic Reformation churches. Could the large churches in the WCC, with their slow bureaucratic ways and their safe agendas, be trusted to take direct responsibility for world mission, or would that sense of gospel urgency be gradually placed on the margins? Would the direction of missionary strategy be too centralized in Geneva? Would "the greatest achievement of the IMC be put at risk" – a forum of such disparate groups, including those from very conservative theological traditions which were in no way concerned to promote organizational unity, but "exclusively to serve Christians in the task of preaching the gospel and in advising them on the varieties of experience in this preaching which no group could hope to possess by itself" (Max Warren)?

Thus, many IMC member mission councils, especially in Europe, were reluctant to have the close administrative connection with the churches which they saw as an inevitable outcome in any IMC-WCC integration.

There was also anxiety on the WCC side. Would the WCC be altering its character as a council of churches if independent mission agencies came aboard the ten-year-old ship? Furthermore, many IMC missionary societies retained a theological tradition and practice of direct evangelism to other Christians whom they judged "nominal" or not truly "Bible-believing". What one mission group regarded as its true witness in evangelism,* some WCC churches would judge as downright proselytism.* The WCC Orthodox churches, such as those in the Middle East, directly experienced Protestant missions which had built up churches composed almost exclusively of converts from among the Orthodox. Would an IMC-WCC integration be sanctioning such proselytizing activities and purposes?

Similar misgivings were discreetly noted by Roman Catholic friends of the WCC, right up to the 1961 integration. The integration, they suggested, could lend more formal and conspicuous support to what RCs judged to be Protestant proselytism among vulnerable flocks in Latin America, Spain, Portugal, Italy, the Middle East and elsewhere. Integration could also break the WCC trend towards doctrinal catholicity* which F&O was stressing: because of the anti-RC stance and weak ecclesiologies of so many IMC mission societies, the WCC could easily shift towards a diluted "undenominational" form of Christianity.

Proponents of integration pointed out the strong theological currents which wedded mission and church and emphasized the missionary nature of the church (see missio Dei). The issue, as Visser 't Hooft put it in 1956, was not one of "churchifying mission but of mobilizing the church for its mission". For their own spiritual health, the churches cannot continue to delegate the missionary enterprise to mission societies; these, in turn, should broaden their understanding of the church in their activities. The WCC should bring the missionary task into the very centre of its life, and the missionary councils and agencies should place their studies and activities in an ecumenical perspective that includes not only the mission of the church but also its unity.*

As to fears of proselytism, it was argued that the stronger tradition in the IMC was one of cooperation and unity in mission (see common witness) and that one of the preparatory documents for approval at the New Delhi assembly was entitled "Christian Witness, Proselytism and Religious Liberty in the Setting of the WCC". Furthermore, the issue of proselytism and practical cases in dispute could be more frankly discussed and more effectively handled within an integrated council than by two separate bodies. The Middle East Orthodox were even “happy with the idea of having Protestant missionaries somewhat controlled through an organization of which the Orthodox themselves were members” (John Meyendorff).

More important, a non-integrated IMC would still remain a council of councils, and the churches of Asia had been seeking direct links with the WCC rather than with the IMC. In 1961, the majority of the 38 member councils represented the churches in what were formerly called “the mission fields”. The integration would offer entrance into the life of the WCC for many churches that had related to international forums through national councils of churches and missionary organizations. And the integration would introduce mission thinking far beyond the traditional borders of the IMC constituency, e.g. the majority of the Orthodox churches and “independent” third-world churches.

In the vigorous discussion (which lasted over four years) these positive voices won the day. In late 1961 both the IMC and WCC assemblies were held in New Delhi. Integration was approved, with only two IMC dissents: the Norwegian Missionary Council, which feared the submergence of mission in the WCC, and the Congo Protestant Council, which wanted to maintain cooperation with local conservative evangelical bodies that refused WCC membership. The IMC history came to an end, but not the fundamental debate. Many mission agencies, parachurch groups and evangelical churches which are not part of the WCC have judged that the WCC, especially through the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME), has not highlighted missionary activity in its thinking, actions and budgets – despite its understanding of church mission and its good intentions to provide “a new frontier, a new dimension of the WCC” (New Delhi). They have questioned whether the aim of CWME remained basically the same as that of the IMC: “to help the churches in the proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ in word and deed so that all may believe and be saved”. Some have said that the WCC has so changed the understanding of mission and evangelism that it means almost everything the church is called to do, except direct evangelism – using all available means to reach out to “the two-thirds of humankind yet to be evangelized”, so that “every person will have the opportunity to hear, understand and receive the good news” (see Lausanne covenant). Such WCC critics prefer to rally themselves, their mission societies and their old or new churches around the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization* and associations of evangelical missions.

Consequently, structural divisions remain in world mission, forcing too many churches, mission agencies and groups to take sides in their stewardship of personnel, funds and energy and in their search for a world forum of fellowship in mission. A sad symbol was spotlighted in 1980, the 70th anniversary of Edinburgh’s world mission conference. To celebrate their being the children of Edinburgh and of their prolific offspring (now in six continents), Christians held two large mission conferences, independent of one another – the CWME at Melbourne and the Lausanne committee at Pattaya, Thailand.

TOM STRANSKY

- W.R. Hogg, Ecumenical Foundations: A History of the IMC, New York, Harper, 1952
- J. Meyendorff, “An Orthodox View on Mission and Integration”, IRM, 70, 280, 1981
- L. Newbigin, “Integration: Some Personal Reflections”, IRM, 70, 280, 1981
- L. Newbigin, “Mission to Six Continents”, in HI-II
- T.F. Stransky, “From Mexico City to San Antonio”, IRM, 79, 313, 1990
- M. Warren, “The Fusion of IMC and WCC at New Delhi”, Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research, July 1979.

INTERNATIONAL ORDER

THE TERM “international order” refers to the principles, structures and instruments regulating the relationships between peoples, nations and their governments with the aim of settling disputes, preventing armed conflict and furthering justice and the rule of law. Concern for international order has been one of the driving forces of the modern ecumenical movement since its beginnings. Used initially at the Stockholm Life and Work conference in 1925, it was fully developed at the time of the Oxford conference on "Church, Community and State" in 1937. Present usage speaks in more neutral terms of "international relations", "international affairs" or "international cooperation". The concern for international order is described in the constitution of the WCC in terms of "breaking down barriers between people, promoting one human family in justice and peace" (art. 3). Ecumenical thought and action regarding the establishment of an international order has moved through several phases in close interaction with world political events.

DEVELOPMENT OF THE IDEA OF INTERNATIONAL ORDER

The early ecumenical movement was to a large extent a response to the international consciousness at the turn of the 20th century. The expanding missionary enterprise, following in the footsteps of European colonialism,* awakened (esp. among the Protestant churches) the sense of the supranational character of the church. The young Nathan Söderblom wrote in 1891: "How glorious it is that Christianity is international." This conviction carried with it the new sense of responsibility for promoting a true international order. The first phase extends from the participation of a Christian delegation in the second peace conference in The Hague (1907), through the founding of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches* (1914) to the large ecumenical meetings in Birmingham (COPEC – the Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship, 1924), Stockholm (1925) and Jerusalem (1928). The common basis for all these efforts was the conviction that all peoples were meant to form "one human brotherhood" under the "fatherhood of God". Christianity, because of its universal and supranational character, was believed to be the only force that could hold the world of nations together. While the establishment of the League of Nations in 1919 was widely welcomed (see the Orthodox encyclical of 1920), it was felt that its "body" lacked a "soul", that it had to be filled with Christian moral and spiritual principles. This Christian leadership in international life was guided by the ideal of the kingdom of God,* which was to be translated into the social order of humankind.

The hopes for the establishment of a true international order based on Christian principles which would secure justice for all people and eliminate the threat of war were shattered as a consequence of world events from 1929 onwards (world economic and financial crises; emergence of Stalinism, fascism and National Socialism; paralysis of the League of Nations; and finally the second world war). "Man's disorder" (Amsterdam 1948), experienced in the form of growing secularism, aggressive nationalism, totalitarianism* and eventually the utter destructiveness of war, became the central preoccupation of ecumenical thinking. Christian realism took the place of the liberal optimism of the earlier phase, but it continued to be rooted in the conviction that there existed a basic moral order willed by God. The highlights of ecumenical discussion during this period were the conferences at Oxford (1937) and Tambaram (1938), the joint decision (1946) taken by the WCC and the IMC to form the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs (CCIA), and the first assembly of the WCC at Amsterdam (1948).

All ecumenical statements about international order during this period were directed towards calling and enabling the churches to be truly the church.* "In a world where disruptive nationalism and aggressive imperialism make [human] brotherhood seem unreal, the church offers not an ideal but a fact, man united not by his aspiration but by the love of God" (Oxford). Therefore, the Christian church has the responsibility of bringing those who exercise power (states, governments) to the recognition of their responsibility before God. This duty means, in particular, challenging power politics by extending the rule of law* into the relations between states, coming to terms with the threat of war and promoting human rights and fundamental freedoms, especially religious liberty.*

The founding of the United Nations in 1945 and the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) re-kindled the expectations regarding international order. However, a number of events (e.g. the Berlin blockade, the Korean war, revolution in China) brought into the open the antagonism between the two super-powers in East and West which, under the label of "cold war",* marked the whole period from the Amsterdam assembly to the early 1960s (e.g. the Cuban missile crisis in 1962). The rapidly expanding threat of nuclear weapons placed the efforts to prevent a further world war into the forefront of the concern for international order. At the same time, however, a basic change of perspective began to take place with the emergence of new nations in Africa and Asia (Bandung conference in 1955). Thus, during the 1960s a new discussion about international order took shape, crystallizing around the goals of "peaceful co-existence" and socio-economic "development" (the first development decade, formation of UNCTAD 1964). The ecumenical debate received fresh impulses from the integration of the International Missionary Council* into the WCC (New Delhi 1961), from the study on rapid social change (beginning in 1954) leading up to the Geneva conference in 1966, and from new openings in the Roman Catholic Church (Vatican II,* esp. Gaudium et Spes and the encyclicals Pacem in Terris, 1963, and Populorum Progressio, 1967). The new orientation is captured well in this sentence from Populorum Progressio: "Development is the new name for peace."

The basic feature of ecumenical thinking about international order during this period is the gradual shift from the earlier static notion of order* towards a dynamic understanding of historical change and its meaning in the providence* of God. Thus, preoccupation with the defence of the order of a "free society" against the threat of totalitarianism and hesitations about the concern for nation-building in Asia and Africa gave way to a dynamic notion of justice* and of the role of states in the framework of a "welfare world". As the historical perspective of formerly dependent people increasingly influenced ecumenical thinking, the breaking down of traditional forms of order as a consequence of rapid social change was interpreted as a positive sign of God's renewing action in history,* preparing the way for the order of God's shalom. This led to a new understanding of the role of the state and of the function of law, not only in preserving order but even more in shaping a new social order.

The extensive re-ordering of international relations was brought to an end through a series of developments in the early 1970s: the end of detente and the reappearance of aggressive competition between the super-powers, which was now extended into Africa, Asia and Latin America (Vietnam, Chile, the Middle East, Angola, Mozambique), the failure of international development strategies and blocking of the project of a New International Economic Order (note the effects of the oil crisis beginning in 1973), the promotion of a capitalist international order through the trilateral commission and the implementation of the doctrine of national security.*

Within the ecumenical movement this emerging crisis in international relations led to a sharper awareness of the critical issues regarding international order: development,* understood as the promotion of justice through self-reliance, economic growth and people's participation; human and people's rights, especially the right to basic guarantees for life; racism* as a fundamental denial of justice; a critical analysis of militarism,* of the transnationalization of capital and production and of the power of science and technology.* The earlier emphasis on participation in change gave way to the struggle for justice and liberation. An international order based on the maintenance of the existing political, economic and financial structures was perceived as the main obstacle to true liberation and justice. Thus, ecumenical thought and action have increasingly turned away from the preoccupation with international structures to movements of the people with the aim of building up an "oikoumene of solidarity" over against the "oikoumene of domination".

This change in emphasis found expression in the invitation issued by the WCC's Vancouver assembly (1983) to a "conciliar process for justice, peace and the integrity of creation".

The expansion of ecumenical thinking on international order through this process is reflected in the statement by the Canberra assembly (1991) on the Gulf war: "For the sake of all peoples, it is time to build a new world order of justice, the foundation stone of peace: (a) a world economic order which ends the domination and exploitation of the poor by the rich; (b) information and communication systems which... offer all peoples truth in place of distortion, and media disposed to peace rather than violence; and which redress the concentration of control over global communications media in the hands of a few powerful nations and corporations; (c) an environmental order which respects the integrity of God's creation and controls the industrialized nations' insatiable thirst for oil... and leads them to adopt new energy policies which promote conservation." Since then, the emerging features of globalization, particularly of economic and financial systems, pose new challenges to the ecumenical search for a viable international order which counteracts increasing fragmentation and exclusion.

THE ECUMENICAL UNDERSTANDING OF INTERNATIONAL ORDER

The concern for an international order has been and is being addressed within the ecumenical movement under a number of different aspects.

Who are the subjects of an international order? Traditionally, international affairs have been considered as a matter of organized states and their governments (see state, nation). Thus, the ecumenical movement during its early phase and until the mid-1960s focused attention primarily on the responsibility of governments as the primary subjects for establishing and maintaining international order. This emphasis found expression in the efforts to develop criteria and instruments for limiting national sovereignty, especially with regard to war as a means for settling international disputes. Since then the picture has become more complex. The process of decolonization gave rise to popular liberation movements which challenged the legitimacy of existing governments. Some have been recognized internationally as legitimate representatives of their peoples and thus as "subjects" in terms of international order. Furthermore, since the 1970s large transnational corporations and banks have begun to influence international order, not only in the economic and financial field. Their effective power exceeds that of most governments, yet they have no formal recognition as international "subjects" and escape control or accountability. And finally, in many countries the military has become the primary reference point for international order. As a consequence, ecumenical discussion has progressively moved away from its earlier concentration on states and governments and has begun to address these new "subjects".

The most important structures for promoting international order have been the League of Nations and the United Nations,* with their specialized agencies and organizations. The ecumenical movement has consistently given its support to these structures as the best available, while encouraging their continuous critical review. Most activities of ecumenical agencies regarding international order during the first half of this century were directed towards these intergovernmental structures. Through the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs the WCC has enjoyed consultative status with the Economic and Social Council of the UN. A special office for UN relations is maintained in New York. Increasingly, however, attention has been given to regional structures within or related to the UN system, especially the Organization of African Unity. With the emergence of the debt crisis,* the structures maintaining the existing international financial system have come under critical analysis. Very little explicit thinking has been directed towards military alliances as structural elements within the existing international order. However, other structures outside the framework of intergovernmental relationships have become increasingly important for ecumenical efforts regarding international order, such as international federations of trade unions, the International Committee of the Red Cross and the vast network of non-governmental organizations* (e.g. the International Commission of Jurists and the Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies).

Regarding the principles of international order, it has been the conviction within the ecumenical movement from the beginning that international order presupposes bringing the relations between states out of the realm of pure power politics and under the rule of law. This principle is closely related to the modern notion of human rights* as expressed in the preamble of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The rule of law refers to all principles, institutions and procedures which protect individuals, peoples and states from arbitrary action and oppression and safeguard human dignity. Much attention was given in earlier decades to the possibilities of further developing the system of international law* based on an international ethic, rooted in principles either of natural law* or of divine order. Already at Oxford in 1937 there was a strong call for an international bill of rights, and through the CCIA the ecumenical movement has actively participated in the drafting of the universal declaration, especially its provisions for religious liberty. Similarly, close attention has been given to the preparation of the other human rights covenants and conventions. More recently, ecumenical concern has focused on the full implementation of accepted human rights standards in view of increasing gross violations and the challenges of "impunity". Human rights, as the rights both of individuals and of peoples, have become the elementary criterion of justice. At its assembly in Vancouver (1983) the WCC urged the churches to press governments to "elaborate and ratify an international legal instrument which would outlaw as a crime against humanity the possession as well as the use of nuclear arms".

The main instruments available for building up international order are inter-governmental negotiations with a view to agreeing on treaties, conventions, covenants, etc. Such negotiations take place either directly between the governments concerned or under UN mandates. Since many international legal instruments of crucial significance still lack ratification by the required minimum number of governments, the WCC has consistently pressed governments to honour their responsibility for international order. Special attention has always been given in the ecumenical movement to the interstate conflicts, e.g. through mediation, arbitration, peace-keeping or observation teams. In recent years the consequences of the application of sanctions as a non-violent means for exercising pressure on parties in conflict as provided for in the charter of the United Nations (art. 41) have received particular attention, especially in connection with the conflicts in Southern Africa, the former Yugoslavia and Iraq.

The concern for international order constitutes a basic ethical challenge. Since international law is still deficient in terms of inner cohesiveness, and in the absence of effective instruments of enforcement, international order is largely dependent on some kind of common ethos of humankind. This issue has been addressed in the ecumenical movement from the beginning. Starting from the conviction that only Christian principles could provide a sound basis for an international ethos, the ecumenical movement has come to recognize that in a religiously pluralistic and increasingly secularized world, neither the appeal to Christian principles nor one to some kind of natural law or so-called orders of creation will be universally accepted. In a world where hunger and poverty, wars and violent oppression not only threaten the lives of millions of people but place the very survival of humankind itself at stake, justice and peace coupled with a caring attitude towards nature have become the central ethical issues in the search for international order. Both justice and peace, however, presuppose recognition of human dignity and respect for it.

While in the early phase of the ecumenical movement the concerns for peace and disarmament and for fundamental human freedoms were paramount, the emerging conflict between North and South has focused attention on the issues of justice and human dignity (poverty, violation of human rights, racism, etc.). In the light of the biblical tradition, justice and peace are inseparable. Yet in concrete situations they frequently enter into tension and conflict. The struggle for justice against structures of oppression often leads to disorder and conflict, including creating threats to peace. Development has been called the new name for peace, yet development inevitably leads into the struggle for justice. This fact brings about the paradoxical situation that struggling for justice and the conflicts it gives rise to must be understood as action that actually is for peace. The ways of achieving a just peace or peace with justice have therefore been at the centre of the more recent ecumenical discussion about international order, particularly in view of the threats posed by the increasing number of intrastate conflicts. This has posed the ethical problem of violence (see violence and non-violence) in terms of both the structural violence of oppressive systems and the actions of violent resistance and has inspired the search for non-violent, peaceful ways of conflict resolution. By analogy, the traditional criteria of a just war* have received renewed attention. But ultimately both the maintenance of peace and the realization of justice are questions of power, and hence recent ecumenical discussions about political ethics have raised again the question of the different forms of power and their legitimization.

What is the role of the churches regarding international order? Internationally, the Christian churches represent the largest religious community, but they are a minority among minorities. While the Roman Catholic Church through the Vatican enjoys international status and can directly participate in intergovernmental negotiations, the WCC lacks any such international recognition except its consultative status with the UN as a non-governmental organization. Its member churches have very different forms of relationships with their governments. But generally, the power of the churches to influence actions and decisions about international order has been decreasing steadily since the beginning of this century. The World Conference on Religion and Peace* has been trying to bring the united weight of world religions to bear on the questions of world community. The results have so far been very limited.

The ecumenical understanding of the role of the churches in the search for international order has changed radically since the beginning of this century. Starting from the conviction about the Christian leadership role in holding the community of nations together, through the notion of the church as a "factor" or a "sign and instrument" of the coming unity of humankind, the ecumenical movement has come to the recognition that the churches are meant to live as confessing and witnessing communities among the nations of this world. In their ecumenical solidarity, especially with the poor and the victims, the churches are called to manifest God's unconditional love for humankind (see unity of humankind). This task implies both the priestly calling for reconciliation* and the prophetic calling for resistance (see prophecy). The relationship between these two dimensions of Christian witness for international order poses the same problems as the relationship between justice and peace. The tension is resolved in the messianic perspective of the witness and praxis of Jesus Christ announcing the presence of the kingdom of God.

KONRAD RAISER

- A.J. van der Bent, Christian Response in a World of Crisis, WCC, 1986
- EATWOT, Search for a New Just World Order: Challenges to Theology, Bangalore, EATWOT, 1997
- D. Hudson, The Ecumenical Movement in World Affairs, London, Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1969
- Z.K. Matthews ed., Responsible Government in a Revolutionary Age, New York, Association, 1966
- J.H. Oldham ed., Foundations of Ecumenical Social Thought: The Oxford Conference Report, Chicago, Willett, Clark, 1937
- The Role of the WCC in International Affairs, WCC, 1986
- K. Srisang ed., Perspectives on Political Ethics: An Ecumenical Enquiry, WCC, 1983
- E. Weingärtner, "Human Rights on the Ecumenical Agenda", CCIA Background Information, 3, 1983
- World Conference on Church and Society: Official Report, WCC, 1967.

INTER-VARSITY CHRISTIAN FELLOWSHIP

THE INTER-VARSITY Christian Fellowship, a non-denominational movement of Evangelical college and university students in the US and Canada, is part of an international movement known as the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students* (IFES). In 2000 IFES counted 114 national affiliates and it has work in about 140 countries.

IVCF is known for evangelism* and discipleship through student-led inductive Bible studies. In the US some 400 staff members minister on more than 550 campuses, offering training, counsel and encouragement. Weekend retreats and summer camps provide evangelistic outreach and leadership training. InterVarsity Press and Twentyonehundred produce Christian literature and video programmes designed to strengthen intellectual foundations and expand horizons for Christian life and service.

IVCF-Canada, in addition to its university-level work (about 150 chapters), also has an extensive high school programme (some 400 groups), which prepares students for Christian life and witness in tertiary schools.

In the late 1940s IVCF launched the triennial Urbana missions convention at the University of Illinois at Urbana. In 1996 and again in 2000, during the week between Christmas and New Year, more than 19,000 people, mostly students, attended Urbana, and the majority indicated they would consider overseas mission service.

ROBERT T. COOTE

INVESTMENT

WORLDWIDE, the number of churches and church-related bodies which have capital to invest at their disposal is rather limited, and most of these are in the richer countries. Such investment capital is generally used to help finance ongoing church activities and programmes or in pension and similar funds. For many years, some churches and church-related bodies applied ethical criteria to their investments according to what might be called an "avoidance" strategy, i.e. not investing in companies which produce tobacco or liquor.

However, since the late 1960s, there has been a growing awareness that investments can also be used actively to promote corporate social responsibility. As shareholders in private companies, churches and church-related agencies can try to exercise their influence by raising questions about social and environmental issues, requesting information or asking companies to take specific actions. One way of doing this is through submitting shareholder resolutions at the company's annual meeting of shareholders. The first shareholder resolution from a church investor, filed in 1971 by the Episcopal Church in the USA, asked General Motors to cease operations in South Africa. Since that time, the corporate responsibility movement in the US has grown tremendously to include churches and public and private pension funds. It is estimated that nearly 10% of all US investments are made with ethical as well as financial considerations in mind. A major protagonist in this movement is the Interfaith Center on Corporate Responsibility (ICCR), sponsored by and related to the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA. The ICCR is an international coalition of 275 Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish institutional investors, including religious communities, pension funds, health-care corporations, foundations and dioceses, with an estimated portfolio worth some $100 billion. Every year ICCR-related organizations sponsor many resolutions to dozens of companies on issues related to social justice, military production and environment.

Since the early 1970s, this second model of using investments as a tool to promote corporate responsibility has spread to a number of other countries where this model is applicable, e.g. England and the Netherlands. At the same time, initiatives have mushroomed for establishing alternative investment funds which concentrate on socially responsible activities. This could be seen as a third model of using investments. While definitions of what constitutes socially responsible investment differ, in general they are seen as those which promote social justice, peace and the protection of the environment. Although the movement for corporate responsibility and alternative investments is much broader than the churches, it is fair to say that some churches and church-related organizations have been and are major protagonists of this movement.

The WCC assembly in Uppsala (1968) recommended that investments in “institutions that perpetuate racism” should be terminated. This recommendation was taken up by the WCC central committee meeting in Utrecht (1972). The committee decided to sell forthwith existing holdings and to make no investments in corporations which were directly involved in investment in, or trade with, a number of countries in Africa, including South Africa. At the same time, all member churches, Christian agencies and individual Christians were urged to use all their influence, including stockholder action and investment, to press corporations to withdraw investments from and cease trading with these countries.

The WCC went beyond merely criticizing certain investment policies. In 1974 the central committee unanimously decided to establish the Ecumenical Development Co-operative Society (EDCS), which changed its name to Oikocredit* in 1999. The objective of Oikocredit is twofold: first, to work with poor people in their efforts to achieve self-reliance through productive enterprises, by providing loans, guarantees or investment capital; second, to mobilize investment capital of the churches and church-related organizations to be used for human development. Most of the investment capital of Oikocredit is provided through support organizations in which individual people can participate. Churches and church-related organizations account for approximately 20% of the share capital. The WCC itself channels 10% of its investment capital through Oikocredit.

See also economics, Programme to Combat Racism.

ROB VAN DRIMMELEN

■ R. van Drimmelen, Faith in a Global Economy: A Primer for Christians, WCC, 1998.

IONA COMMUNITY

THE IONA Community was founded in 1938 by George MacLeod (1895-1991), then a parish minister in Glasgow, who was concerned at the lack of impact of the church and Christianity on the lives of working people. MacLeod gathered a group of young ministers and craftsmen, joined by many volunteer workers, and raised money to re-build the ruined buildings of a 13th-century Benedictine abbey on the small island of Iona, off the west coast of Scotland, where Columba had formed a monastic community on coming from Ireland in 563. The re-building – begun as a sign of hope in times of high unemployment and impending war, and as an experiment in mission and ministerial formation affirming the relevance of faith to the whole of life, through the integration of work and worship, prayer and politics – was completed in 1967.

Alongside the work on Iona, where many came each year to visit the abbey and youth camp and to find inspiration and fellowship, the community’s activities also developed on the mainland – through political commitment, particularly in peace-making and nuclear disarmament; through the work of community members, many of them parish ministers and industrial chaplains in difficult situations; and through the opening of Community House in central Glasgow, with a range of activities in education and politics, drama and film, and social services.

In 1951 the community was formally integrated within the life and organization of the Church of Scotland, although from the outset it has maintained a thoroughly ecumenical dimension.

There are now around 240 members, mostly in Britain but a few serving overseas, drawn from most of the branches of the church, with the Church of Scotland still the largest single tradition. The community remains committed to the process of re-building the lives of individuals, of the church and of society through seeking new ways of living and expressing the gospel in today's world. There have been significant changes since the early years, particularly with the admission of women to full membership from 1969 and increasing numbers of lay members who are now in the majority.

The members share a commitment to the community's fivefold rule, involving, within a framework of mutual accountability, a spiritual discipline of daily prayer and Bible reading, an economic discipline of tithing for the work of the community and other causes, the planning and balanced use of time, action for peace and justice in society, and regular meeting together (in local family groups, normally meeting monthly, and quarterly plenaries). A wider constituency of around 1500 associate members and over 1500 friends also provides much valued support.

The community maintains two centres on Iona – Iona abbey and the MacLeod centre, which has special facilities for young people, families and people with disabilities – and Camas adventure camp, a former salmon-fishing station in a remote location on the nearby Ross of Mull, a peninsula on the adjoining Isle of Mull. These centres are staffed by a resident staff group, assisted by volunteers, who provide hospitality for over 100 guests each week from March to October.

Besides what members do locally to live out their commitment to the community's aims and concerns, there is also a range of corporate activities on the mainland, based in the community's administrative headquarters in Glasgow. The Wild Goose resource group promotes and explores new and participatory approaches to worship through producing liturgical material, holding workshops and leading worship at ecumenical and local events. The community also supports a youth development worker, publishes the bi-monthly magazine Coracle and funds Wild Goose Publications, which produces worship resources and books and pamphlets relating to the community's concerns.

In recent years there has been a strong commitment to peace-making and opposing nuclear weapons, promoting social justice through supporting the cause of the poor and the exploited in Britain and abroad, political activity to combat racism, and engagement with environmental and constitutional issues. Other concerns relate to the strengthening of inter-denominational understanding and the sharing of communion, the encouragement of inter-religious relations, and the development of the ministry of healing. Undergirding all the community's work is a concern for the re-discovery of an integrated approach to spirituality which recognizes the social dimension and expression of spirituality, affirms that God is to be encountered in engagement with rather than withdrawal from the struggles and issues of everyday life, and reflects the links between work and worship, prayer and politics, based in the conviction that God's Spirit permeates, as George MacLeod put it, "every blessed thing".

NORMAN SHANKS

- R. Ferguson, Chasing the Wild Goose, Glasgow, Wild Goose Pubs, 1998
- N. Shanks, Iona – God's Energy: The Vision and Spirituality of the Iona Community, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1999
- What Is the Iona Community?, Glasgow, Wild Goose Pubs, 2000.

ISRAEL AND THE CHURCH

THE TERM "Israel" in traditional Christian theology referred to the Jewish people, understood in continuity with the biblical Israel of the Hebrew scriptures. In that sense, the theme "Israel and the church" is discussed in the entry on Jewish-Christian dialogue. Today, the word is also used more specifically to refer to "the land (eretz) of Israel", in which case the theme "Israel and the church" refers to the wide range of Christian reactions, historical and theological, to the return of the Jewish people to the land of Israel during the 20th century (Zionism) and the rebirth there of a sovereign Jewish state for the first time since the destruction of the temple in the year 70 C.E. While the two understandings cannot finally be separated, this entry will concentrate primarily on the latter.

The theological issues have their origins in the earliest patristic writings, well before the divisions among the churches of the East and the West and so are inherently ecumenical in that all churches encounter them on virtually equal footing. Two major themes are central. The first, wholly negative, flowed from the logic of the charge that the Jews were collectively guilty for the death of Jesus (“deicide”). The Romans’ destruction of the Jerusalem temple and their expulsion of the Jews from the land of Israel were interpreted as evidence of divine punishment for the crime. Jews were doomed to “perpetual wandering” among the nations until the end of time when they would repent and accept Christ and a remnant would be saved. The anti-Jewish writings of St John Chrysostom represent perhaps the most vivid evocation of this theme.

The second theme also served to undercut Jewish claims to the land. This replaced the Jewish emphasis on the “earthly” (or “carnal”) Israel with stress on a “heavenly Jerusalem” and an eschatological Zion as fulfilling the biblical promises. Justin Martyr, in whose work the phrase “the Holy Land” appears for the first time, argued that “there will be a resurrection of the dead and a thousand-year period in which Jerusalem will be rebuilt, adorned and enlarged, as the prophets Ezekiel, Isaiah and others declare” (Dialogue with Trypho, 80.5). Conspicuously absent in the re-building, however, are the temple (cf. the letter to the Hebrews and the book of Revelation) and the Jewish people, whose possession of the land was only temporary, while that of those who accept Christ (and who are therefore the true heirs of the promises) will be eternal. While Justin envisioned a real reign on concrete territory, already in the 3rd century Origen argued that the biblical prophecies and Pauline texts did not refer to an earthly Jerusalem at all, but only to the “heavenly Jerusalem”, a conception supported by his disciple Eusebius.

The tradition of Christian pilgrimage to the holy land beginning already in the 4th century, and, more spectacularly, the crusades* illustrate that Christianity could not quite free itself from faith in the numinous quality of the land in which Jesus lived and died, or its “sacramental” and eschatological significance as concrete territory. In either case, the widespread presumption that the diaspora of the Jews was a sign of divine punishment for collective guilt argued powerfully against any Jewish claims to Jerusalem and the holy land. Some Christians, especially among the more fundamentalist British and American Protestants, were persuaded by the theological claims of Zionism in the late 19th and early 20th centuries that the ingathering of the Jews in the land was a necessary precondition for the eschaton and became “Christian Zionists”. However, this was normally within the context of the conversion of Jews to Jesus as the Christ, as was the WCC Amsterdam statement of 1948.

The rejection by Pope Pius X of Theodore Herzl’s plea for formal support for the Zionist cause in 1904 likewise appears to reflect ancient patristic presumptions. When in 1947 the United Nations voted to approve the partition of Palestine (and therefore to legitimize the creation of a Jewish state), the holy see did not oppose the resolution, which in fact passed largely because of the virtually unanimous support of the “Catholic” countries, especially in Latin America.

Significantly, the UN partition plan also mandated the establishment of Jerusalem as a corpus separatum under international control, a resolution the holy see continued to promote actively until Israel took control over the city of Jerusalem in 1967, when its language changed subtly from a call for “international status” to “international statute” guaranteeing the rights of Jews, Christians and Muslim alike in the city.

Despite the lack of opposition to the creation of the state, suspicions lingered among most Jews that the holy see’s refusal to grant full diplomatic recognition to the Jewish state was motivated by theological concerns reflecting the Christian “teaching of contempt” towards Jews and Judaism dating back to the patristic period. In 1965, the Second Vatican Council* formally rejected the notion of collective Jewish guilt for the death of Jesus, thus cutting out the basis for the “displacement/perpetual wandering" interpretation of the Jewish diaspora. If the Jews were not guilty, then there never existed a reason for divine punishment. God's "eternal" covenant with the Jewish people, including the promise of eternal possession of the land (e.g. Gen. 17), had never been revoked by God (Rom. 9-11). Clearly, a profound re-assessment of many ancient theological notions was needed.

This work was undertaken by the churches and denominations, Protestant and Catholic alike, in a series of national and international statements in Europe and the Americas (see Jewish-Christian dialogue). In 1985, for example, the Vatican issued official Notes for preachers and teachers, which gave a positive interpretation to the diaspora, "which allowed Israel to carry to the whole world a witness... while preserving the memory of the Land of their forebears at the heart of their hope". In 1993, the holy see and the state of Israel signed an historic "fundamental agreement", paving the way for full diplomatic relations and the exchange of ambassadors in 1994.

While all this points to an essential breakthrough, Christian theological reflection on its significance is, as John Pawlikowski has commented, "still at an embryonic stage" among Protestants and Catholics alike. Jews and Christians still understand the holy land and the holy city of Jerusalem* differently from a theological point of view, a difference which combines with pastoral reasons (e.g. sympathy with Palestinian Christians) to influence political judgments within the two communities. As Christians need to dialogue with other Christians as well as Jews to understand the implications of a more positive theology of Judaism, so too is the dialogue among Christians over these implications necessarily an ecumenical one.

EUGENE J. FISHER

- D. Burrell & Y. Landau eds, Voices from Jerusalem, New York, Paulist, 1992
- S. Colbi, A History of the Christian Presence in the Holy Land, Lanham MD, Univ. Press of America, 1988
- R. Everett, "The Land: Israel and the Middle East", in M. Shermis & A. Zannoni eds, Introduction to Jewish-Christian Relations, New York, Paulist, 1991
- E. Fisher, Visions of the Other: Jewish and Christian Theologians Assess the Dialog, New York, Paulist, 1994
- L. Hoffman ed., The Land of Israel: Jewish Perspectives, Notre Dame IN, Univ. of Notre Dame Press, 1986
- A. Kenny, Catholics, Jews and the State of Israel, New York, Paulist, 1993
- A. Kreuzt, Vatican Policy on the Palestinian-Israel Conflict, New York, Greenwood, 1990
- R.L. Wilkin, The Land Called Holy: Palestine in Christian History and Thought, Cambridge MA, Yale UP, 1992.

J

JERUSALEM

FOR OVER 4000 years “the chosen city of God” (Ps. 48:2) has been a religious palimpsest of political control – “pagan”, Jewish, Roman, Christian, Muslim, again Christian, again Muslim, and again Jewish. For all three Abrahamic faith communities the city remains central to their sacred geography, “an echo of eternity” (A. Heschel).

King David made Jerusalem his capital (c.1000 B.C.) and his son Solomon built the first temple, home of the special Presence of the covenantal God. The Babylonians destroyed it (586 B.C.) and exiled the Jews, prompting the prayer, “If I forget you, O Jerusalem, let my right hand wither!” (Ps. 137:5). Herod re-built the temple, the Romans razed it (A.D. 70), levelled the city (135), and the Jews again dispersed. After Israel had declared itself a state in 1948, it proclaimed Jerusalem “the restored and eternal capital”. For religious Jews it is the holiest focus of messianic hopes. It awaits that redemption which will come only when Yahweh’s Anointed One chooses to arrive.

For the Muslims Jerusalem is the last of their three holiest cities, after Mecca and Medina. They believe that on the mount where Abraham had offered to sacrifice his beloved son (Ishmael) and where the former Jewish temple had stood, Muhammad ascended a ladder to the throne of Allah. This ascension confirmed the continuity between Muhammad and all previous prophets and divine messengers, including Jesus of Nazareth. The entire esplanade is a mosque, the noble sanctuary of prayer, the centre of the final judgment. The Arabs prefer to call the city al-Quds (The Holy), and to claim it as the capital of the new Palestine.

Christian medieval maps place Jerusalem at the centre of the earth, indeed of the universe. The city witnessed the death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus the Messiah and Son of the Triune God. Jerusalem also birthed “the mother church”, the locus of “the first-born” (Gal. 4:26; Heb. 12:22), and the mother of all churches of all nations: “Every Christian is born in Jerusalem.”

As elsewhere in the holy land (Israel/Palestine), the number of Jerusalem Christians is decreasing. In 1948 they were around 32,000, or 19%, of the urban population; at the end of 2001, primarily because of forced or voluntary emigration, they were 12,000, or 2%, of the 650,000 city-dwellers – 62% Jewish, 36% mostly Muslim Arabs. Some are concerned that Jerusalem and nearby Bethlehem will become bereft of the Christian “living stones”, a museum for pilgrims.

Jerusalem Christians may be small in number but they are many in churches: Orthodox – Greek (including Russian and Romanian), Armenian, Syrian, Coptic, Ethiopian; Catholic, in full communion with the see of Rome – Melchite, Syrian, Coptic, Ethiopian, Maronite (see Eastern Catholic churches), Latin; Protestant – Anglican, Lutheran, Baptist, Pentecostal; non-denominational – Messianic Jews and foreign Zionist fundamentalists.* Eighty percent are of the Eastern churches, 15% Latin Catholic.

The mother church still bears the not yet fully healed wounds of internecine divisions, long focused on control of the holy sites and, since the 19th century, on practices of crude proselytism.* With some success, Latin missionaries “converted” Orthodox, and even lured Eastern Catholics into the Latin fold. Through the Anglo-Prussian first Reformation church in the Middle East (Jerusalem 1842), Anglican and Lutheran missionaries “converted” Latin and Eastern Christians. Memories linger as a warning: a few Orthodox leaders wonder whether ecumenism is not in fact a new, more subtle missionary attempt to soften up vulnerable flocks.

As a very small minority vis-à-vis Jewish and Muslim majorities, since the Palestinian uprising (intifada 1987) Christian laity, clergy and hierarchs are overly conscious of necessary common witness in conflictual Jerusalem, called to be what its Hebrew name means – city of peace. Ecumenical and inter-religious sensitivities are becoming pervasive, e.g. in Christian schools and hospitals, and in groups of human rights activists, environmentalists, women, youth leaders and teachers. A spectrum of instruments gather a variety of willing constituents, such as the Ecumenical Fraternity, the Sabeel Centre of Palestinian liberation, the Interfaith Association, and the Tantur Ecumenical Institute.*

Although there is no local council of churches, twelve church leaders, including the three patriarchs – Greek, Armenian and Latin – try to meet monthly. Occasionally they issue widely publicized joint statements. Their 1994 “Memorandum on the Significance of Jerusalem for Christians” joined the Vatican in proposing for the walled old city a special juridical and political statute which the international community would guarantee. At least in the old city, Jewish, Christian and Muslim dwellers, visitors and pilgrims could say, “it’s ours”, and should not claim, “it’s ours, not yours”.

See also Middle East.

TOM STRANSKY

- L. Levine ed., Jerusalem: Its Sanctity and Centrality to Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, New York, Continuum 1998
- A. O’Mahoney, G. Gunner & K. Hintlian eds, Christian Heritage in the Holy Land, London, Scorpion Cavendish, 1995
- P. Walker ed., Jerusalem: Purposes of God, Cambridge, Tyndale House, 1992
- B. Wasserstein, Divided Jerusalem, New Haven CT, Yale UP, 2001.

JESUS CHRIST

THE CONSTITUTION of the WCC declares that the council is “a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures” (see WCC, basis of), and every major ecumenical conference since the Faith and Order* meeting at Lausanne in 1927 has included in its report some account of Christological fundamentals. However, the apparently straightforward formulation in the constitution (which entered by way of the Faith and Order movement) conceals a number of theological problems. It has become increasingly clear that the unambiguous description of Jesus Christ as “God” can be inadequate and misleading when divorced from the context of a fully stated theology of the Trinity.* If “Jesus Christ” is thought to exhaust the meaning of “God”, there is a real risk of what some, especially Eastern Orthodox, theologians have called “Christomonism” – a concentration on the person and narrative of Jesus which ignores the question of how the Holy Spirit* conforms the life of believers in community to the likeness of Christ, and which tends therefore to keep Jesus at a distance from the community.

From Lausanne onwards, care has been taken to minimize this risk: Lausanne’s report (para. 11) very clearly associates forgiveness and revelation* with the mission of the Holy Spirit as well as the life, death and resurrection* of Jesus; and Edinburgh 1937 (paras 2,6,7,20) echoes this. Lund 1952 (para. 10) has a particularly impressive account of Christ’s lordship in the church and of the way in which the Spirit makes believers partakers in the suffering and the sovereignty of Jesus. Since 1961 the membership basis of the WCC has itself included a reference to “the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit”. However, the phraseology of the constitution remains awkward. More recently, the simplistic equation of God with Jesus has provoked some searching questions from feminist theologians, who have pointed out the implications of identifying God, without remainder, with a male human being. A further problem has been opened up as the churches have considered their responses to the Lima document *Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry** (BEM): the constitution speaks of confessing Jesus “according to the scriptures”, but as the 1981 Princeton consultation on the implications of BEM for the project “Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith” noted, BEM (in common with many other WCC documents) gives no direct attention to the principles of interpretation by which we may draw from scripture material for contemporary faith statements about Christ (see hermeneutics). How are we to move beyond the repetition of New Testament idiom to a theology which is critical, challenging and constructive for the churches today?

This question relates to the very serious problem that arose in the 1930s when the German Confessing Church* sought to ensure that it would not be participating in the work of F&O alongside the Reich church. In 1935 Leonard Hodgson, then secretary of F&O, wrote to Dietrich Bonhoeffer that the ecumenical movement could not repudiate any body accepting “Jesus Christ as God and Saviour”. Bonhoeffer pointed out in reply that the Confessing Church had, in the Barmen declaration of 1934, effectively denied the claim of the Reich church to believe in Christ as God and Saviour: Barmen had condemned as incompatible with the confession of Christ the ascribing of revelatory authority to any other source than “the one Word of God”, Jesus Christ, and also the idea that there could be any areas of individual or corporate life not answerable to this authority. The German state church, by accepting the antisemitic legislation of the Third Reich, had betrayed the Christian faith. It could not be enough to rest content with a mere verbal conformity with the F&O definition.

In several respects, therefore, the wording of the WCC constitution requires glossing and putting into context. What is it today to confess Jesus as “God and Saviour according to the scriptures”?

JESUS AND THE EARLY CHURCH

There is no completely unambiguous use of the title “God” for Jesus in the NT (John 20:28 is the nearest; Rom. 9:5 and Titus 2:13 present considerable problems of translation and interpretation). However, it is clear that, within 20 years of the crucifixion (i.e. by the time Paul was writing 1 Cor.), there were Christian communities accustomed to thinking of Jesus as embodying the action of God towards the world, God’s “power” and “wisdom” (1 Cor. 1:24). By the end of the 1st century C.E., when the gospel of John was probably written, Jesus could be seen as the one in whom dwelt the creative and mediating logos of God, the divine mind and purpose, the one upon whom the glory of God’s tangible presence permanently rested. Jesus has become for believers what the temple was to Israel, the place where God is met, but is also the visible form of the power that makes the world. Both Paul and John suggest that, because Jesus is experienced as inaugurating a new age, a new creation, because he bestows on the believer a new identity in which human life is no longer bound and limited by a past of moral failure and staleness, or self-deceit and spiritual blindness, the history of Jesus is completely continuous with the infinite resource of divine life which brings all things into reality. Just as in the Jewish scriptures, especially the Psalms and Isa. 40-55, the exodus and the return from exile are seen as images of the creation itself, so now is the formation of the new human race through the history of Jesus. The difference is that here the creative act of God is bound up with a single human story as never before and that the scale of the restoration and renewal expands all the time towards the limits of the human world, including all men and women equally. It is inevitable that Jesus, as the one who enacts the saving action of God, should, like the God of Israel, be called Lord and should be seen as the touchstone by which all human events are to be judged, the one who possesses “all authority in heaven and on earth” (Matt. 28:18).

Yet this is only part of the picture. Jesus possesses supreme authority but does not simply stand in the place of the God of Israel. He prays to this God as “Father”, “Abba”, and interprets his mission and destiny as the fleshing-out of a purpose not his own. His authority is inseparably interwoven with a loving dependence upon the one he worships, a steady “obedience” – i.e. he allows the pressure of God’s love for the world to mould his human identity without interruption. Particularly in John’s gospel, Jesus is presented simultaneously as entirely and sovereignly free – and as doing nothing from his own human initiative alone. It is this paradox in the way the figure of Jesus is understood in the NT (cf. Phil. 2) that prompts the development of a technical theological account of his person and a new Trinitarian conception of God.* If Jesus’ life is entirely moulded by the loving will of God, it makes sense to say that it is that loving will “made flesh” (see incarnation), that there is no obstacle in Jesus to God’s action in renewing the face of the earth.

But the life of Jesus, as we have seen, does not simply express the outgoing action of God but is also a loving response to God. So the conclusion is slowly drawn that the very life of God – if it is this which is expressed in the life of Jesus – involves both the outgoing, generative, creative element and the product or issue of that outgoing in the form of total and perfect response, reflection back of the love given. God comes to be conceived as both “Father” and “Son”. In the doctrinal controversies of the 4th century, out of which the Nicene Creed* emerged, the crucial point established was that God is never to be thought of as a solitary individual: God is eternally in relation and so eternally open to the “other”. It is because God is thus that there is no problem about God’s will to create: although this is a free action, it is rooted in the divine life itself, whose nature is to generate in love and to generate love. Because of the relation of Father and Son, creation* has access to a share in this movement of creative love: creatures can also be creators. This theme, set forth classically by Athanasius in the mid-4th century, is what lies behind the Eastern Christian understanding of salvation* as theosis, sharing in God’s life.

JESUS AND SALVATION

The confession of Jesus Christ as God must therefore, if it is to be faithful to the NT witness, involve the belief that through Jesus the renewal of the whole human race has become possible and that all human beings may find in Jesus the good news of their absolution and liberation; through Jesus, all have access to the life he lives, the life of liberty and creativity founded upon complete openness to the divine will for the salvation of women and men. In other words, to confess Jesus as God is to presuppose something about the radical character of the salvation he brings – the “new creation” – and to be committed to the new human race, without barriers of race, sex and status, which has begun to exist as a result of his life, death and resurrection. Bonhoeffer was certainly right in insisting that it is impossible to confess Christ as God and Saviour while refusing to be committed to the hope of an integrated, reconciled humanity: the Christological confession poses clear and sharp questions to our political and social loyalties, to our partial and distorted models of human community.

Remembering Paul’s words in 1 Cor. 12:3, “no one can say ‘Jesus is Lord’ except by the Holy Spirit”, we may conclude that to know Jesus as “Lord”, to acknowledge him as the Creator and final Judge of the new humanity, and as the one who opens for us the way to a share in the freedom of the Creator, is to live in or by the power of God’s Spirit. God is “Father” and “Son” but is equally that agency which draws us into the relation between the eternal creative source and the eternal creative response – that which realizes in us the possibility established in the history of Jesus Christ and in the coming-to-be of a community committed to Jesus Christ.

Often in the history of theology, the salvation brought by Christ has been analyzed and theorized about without reference to the witness and work of the Spirit. Some have tended to think (as a superficial reading of certain early Christian writers might suggest) that salvation occurs because God, in becoming flesh, transforms human nature by the mere fact of contact with it. Others have stressed that the cross of Jesus alone brings about our redemption,* as a sacrifice or an expiation for our sin, and have refined and developed the language of Paul and the letter to the Hebrews about atonement through sacrifice. Both themes have a significant place in Christian theology. It is essential to see Christ as God’s way of pledging absolute faithfulness to our “cause”, God’s identification with the need and agony of human beings. Salvation does involve a transformation of our situation by God’s contact with it. No less is it essential to see the death of Christ as pivotal to the process. Only in the cross do we see clearly the depth of our unfreedom, the way in which our moral, religious and political systems of power fear and reject the life God offers, and strive to obliterate the threatening hope of conversion. Only here do we see the cost of our slavery to ourselves and protection of ourselves. To say, as Christians have consistently said, that the cross is God’s bearing of this cost may be a metaphor, but it is an untranslatable and irreplaceable one.

However, neither of these themes alone will carry the full weight of what the Bible understands as salvation. For this we need a doctrine of the work of the Spirit actively forming Christ’s likeness in us, ceaselessly bringing us to conversion and hope.

We cannot speak of Jesus as God without speaking of him as Saviour; but equally we cannot speak of him as God without speaking of the God he calls Father, and we cannot speak of him as Saviour without speaking of the life in us of God as Spirit. This point is made with admirable clarity in the 1979 document from the Klingenthal consultation on the filioque:* “We are ‘christified’, ‘made christ’, in the church by the indwelling in us of the Holy Spirit, who communicates the very life of Christ to us, who in Christ makes us the brothers and sisters of Christ, and strengthens us in our new condition as the adopted children of the Heavenly Father.”

THE CHALCEDONIAN SCHISM

In the early centuries of the church, Christology proved to be a deeply divisive force at least as much as it was a unifying one. The classic definition at Chalcedon* in 451 of the inseparable co-existence in Jesus of full divinity and full humanity looked back on what was already a complex history of controversy and was itself to fuel further division. The churches that refused Chalcedon did so because some believed it to compromise the necessary distinction between divine and human nature, while others saw it as over-emphasizing the disjunction between the divine Word and the human Jesus.

The 20th century saw great advances in overcoming the ancient schism. Representatives of Chalcedonian and non-Chalcedonian churches (esp. those of the so-called monophysite tradition – a misleading label – in Egypt, Syria, Armenia, Ethiopia and India) have had candid, fruitful conversations; recent popes have issued joint statements of faith with leaders of the non-Chalcedonian churches (e.g. the joint declaration of Pope John Paul II and the Syrian Orthodox patriarch of Antioch in 1984). There is a growing recognition that terminological confusion and misunderstanding, as well as political and ethnic rivalries, have long embittered what is at heart a disagreement in idiom and emphasis within a common faith. Non-Chalcedonians have played an active role in the work of F&O, not least in the recent studies towards an ecumenical explication of the apostolic faith as confessed in the Nicene

Creed (381) (the sub-title of the 1991 study document Confessing the One Faith). These studies have made it clear that a Christology firmly anchored in Trinitarian belief, grounded in a careful, critical and imaginative reading of scripture, and oriented towards the priorities of mission and of proclaiming a shared hope for the human world, remains the fundamental inspiration and critique of all ecumenical endeavour. Such an emphasis has increasingly dominated reflection on the doctrine of Christ outside the European and North American context.

JESUS CHRIST IN NON-WESTERN THEOLOGIES

As with all theological topics, the doctrine of Christ has largely been explored and developed by theologians from a particular social and cultural world, that of Western Europe and its North American offshoots. Recent years have witnessed the rapid development of theologies whose priorities and criteria do not depend in the same way on a Western tradition moulded by classical Hellenism and the medieval cultural synthesis (what Bernard Lonergan called the world of "classical" thought in the widest sense). Christology is now being written from the standpoint of newer Christian communities, or Christian communities that have only recently discovered a voice of their own, and the insights coming from this burgeoning world of fresh reflection have put some serious questions to aspects of "traditional" Christological thinking in the North Atlantic intellectual world. Asia, Africa and Latin America are all developing distinctive styles of Christological thought, in response to the pressures of being Christian in these diverse environments. What it means to have the life of Christ communicated to us and, indeed, what the divinity of Christ means in terms of critically available images of God in a particular cultural context are matters not to be resolved by easy abstractions and generalizations.

Asia. Perhaps the longest tradition of trying to express Christological convictions in non-Western language and thought-forms is to be found in India. Since the middle of the 19th century, a variety of Indian Christian writers have attempted to re-conceive the doctrine of the Trinity in terms of the classical Hindu threefold formula for the absolute: saccidānanda, i.e. sat (being), cit (consciousness) and ānanda (bliss). In this perspective, the second person of the Trinity becomes the divine as active and communicative, the exemplar of creation, and, in the remarkable phrase of Keshab Chandra Sen (1838-84), "the journeying God". Jesus is the absolute turned towards relation and love, made particular in the world so as to become the first moment of a new creation in which human beings are enabled to overcome the cycles of karma (the determinism of moral cause and effect, the round of expiation requiring re-birth again and again until the effects of the past are neutralized). These themes are very common in Indian theologians of the later 19th and early-to-mid-20th centuries (Brahmabandhav Upādhyāya, Pandippedi Chenchiah, etc.); they are sometimes combined with a stress on Jesus' self-emptying, so that he becomes without ego, a "universal person" to whom all without exception can relate (Chandra Sen, V. Chakkarai).

This appropriation of classical Hindu metaphysical and mystical categories, reaching its most sophisticated form perhaps in the early writings of Raymond Panikkar, has not been the only Indian response to Christ. Some Indian Christians (Sundar Singh, A.J. Appasamy) have preferred to underline the native tradition of Bhakti, devotion to a personal "lord", as the entry point for Christian insight. Without necessarily denying the identification of Christ with the relational form of the divine usually referred to as Isvara, they concentrate on how that relational form generates individual love and devotion in the believer. There is a rich and little-known heritage of poetry in several Indian languages, especially Tamil and Marathi, expressing this approach, concentrating on the saving work of Jesus, and strongly reminiscent of both Western evangelical piety and the passionate religious poetry addressed in various Indian languages to Krishna or Siva.

More recently, however, Indian writers have become conscious of the difficulties implicit in an approach which privileges either the speculative religion of the higher caste groups or the individualized piety of devotional circles, in a country of acute social divisions and inequality. M.M. Thomas, one of the greatest of Indian Christian writers and a formidably important figure in the history of the WCC, produced an influential book on The Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance (1970), pointing out that Hindu reformers had seen in Christ a stimulus towards the critique of classical Hinduism, a vision of the just social order, even a challenge to the idea of a sacrally validated society. Hindu culture itself is not as static as some Indian speculative theologians seemed to assume. For the first time, Thomas argues, India is discovering a critical dynamic in its life, a sense of the imperative to make history;* the Jesus who creates a new historical community of human beings in unrestricted fellowship, a new humanity, is the Jesus who must now be preached in India. The interest of some earlier writers in Jesus as Second Adam, as the beginning of the new creation and as the one whose ego does not stand in the way of any other person's full humanity, is here given a more directly political focus. Thomas's work, prolonged in his own Risking Christ for Christ's Sake (1987), has been of the first importance in preparing the way for a "liberation" Christology in India, and for engagement not simply with the philosophy of a Hindu elite but with the images, hopes, stories and songs of the working people of India in their search for a fuller humanity. The work of Roman Catholic theologians such as Samuel Rayan and Sebastian Kappen has, in recent years, extended this theme in a dialogue with both popular religions and Marxism.

Elsewhere in Asia, distinctively Christological developments have been less in evidence. The minjung theology* of Korea has moved a little in this direction, identifying the oppressed and marginal peoples of today with those with whom Jesus identified in his ministry; so that the minjung, the marginal and despised classes, become, like the friends of Jesus, an eschatological people, the bearers of God's ultimate distance from and repudiation of worldly power. In this perspective, Jesus becomes not only the fellow sufferer but also the fool, the "clown", wholly free from anxiety about status and dignity, knowing the (divine) truth that God laughs the powerful to scorn. More than one Japanese theologian (Kazo Kitamori, Kosuke Koyama) has found that a theology of the cross, a theology of divine passion and suffering, is a necessary critical tool in confronting both Western abstraction in theology and a Buddhism one-sidedly concerned with overcoming rather than transforming history. Koyama has written of the need to keep Buddhism and Christianity in a close and balanced interaction as two responses to human violence and acquisitiveness – the moment of distance and detachment and the moment of creative and vulnerable engagement, neither making sense without the other. The crucified Jesus once again acts as a challenge to notions of human power and security.

The encounter with Buddhism has gone further still in the work of Aloysius Pieris, a Sri Lankan Jesuit, who has written of "Buddhology" and "Christology" as complementary ways of identifying a particular human being with the non-worldly power of liberation. Both are "crystallizations" of liberating praxis, understood as the movement into the world of final truthfulness and freedom (God for the Christian, the dharma for the Buddhist). Buddhist "gnosis" and Christian agape are both the ways of the divine in the world, and only in mutual relation can they be fully themselves. Pieris's approach has much in common with some of the Indian approaches outlined earlier but is more definitely pluralist in its implications.

Africa. African theology as a whole is still in a fairly inchoate condition, though developing rapidly; it will likely have some very distinctive questions to put to classic formulations from the point of view of a world-picture dominated by a spirituality of creation, of continuities with the natural order and with the human past. Gabriel Setiloane, writing from a South African perspective, notes that incarnational language presents few difficulties in a culture for which possession of a human subject by divine spirit is a readily accessible notion; the difficulty comes in understanding what is unique about this. Setiloane gives a hint at an answer in drawing attention to the Sotho-Tswana concept of "flowering" or "coming into vision" (like the sun rising) as a possible "carrier" for traditional doctrinal approaches to conversion in the African context. Jesus' status would be defined, in this perspective, as that of the bringer of a corporate "flowering" of the human family in its new unity and communion. Earlier African theologians had debated the question of how far traditional African language about the status and authority of the tribal chief could be used to describe the position of Jesus. An initial enthusiasm for this possibility gave way to caution about borrowing an uncriticized model of political power which in fact carried associations of remoteness in many contexts.

John Pobee of Ghana suggested a middle way, using the Akan idea of the royal spokesman as a metaphor for the role of Christ. It is important to preserve the positive aspects of the imagery of the chief – as the one who connects the living and the dead, as the one whose word is wholly to be relied on, as the community's priest – while both maintaining the difference between Jesus as the "speaker" and mediator and the real chief, the High God, and also developing a theology of the cross which insists that the metaphor of chiefship, like every other metaphor, stands under the judgment of the sacrificial death of Jesus.

Both African writers mentioned here are at best ambivalent about the doctrine of a Trinitarian sharing of the divine substance; the African context seems to assimilate more readily a narrative pattern focused on Jesus' relation to the Father, who delegates to him the power of conserving the community and freeing its members from evil and alienation.

Latin America. The liberation theology of Latin America has proved particularly resourceful in the exploration of Christology. Heavy emphasis has been laid upon the humanity of Jesus as the keystone of a theology of liberation; however, this stress is meant not as a denial but as a re-locating of classic confessions of his divinity. Leonardo Boff has presented this relocation in terms of seeing Christ's divinity in the freedom and the universal accessibility of his humanity. Because the human being Jesus takes his stand beyond the slaveries of history to speak for and from the "utopian" position of God's justice and love for all, he stands in judgment upon the whole of history. Because he offers himself as the focus for an unrestricted human fellowship, he is bound by no local constraint. As the one who proclaims the possibility of a worldwide exodus from unfreedom and oppression, he is outside the realm of the merely human. And from the side of God, it can be said that Jesus has and communicates this freedom by virtue of realizing completely the human potential for communion with God; his life, death and resurrection show that to be thus given into God's hands without reserve is to be given to the human world without reserve, and so to be the place where all may meet – once they have abandoned their struggles for dominance or privilege. Jesus' self-gift to the Father is of immediate political significance because it is creative of a different social network.

Jon Sobrino shares with Boff the concern to present Jesus as the paradigm of faith as well as its creator and its object; he has linked this understanding with a new and challenging exegesis of the spiritual exercises of Ignatius Loyola, the foundational text for Jesuit spirituality. His contention is that the following of Jesus along the way presented by the gospel narrative is to move from seeing this following as dictated by a logic independent of Jesus (Jesus as a way to arrive in a kingdom whose nature and promise are already known from elsewhere) to grasping that Jesus is to be followed even when there is no correspondence to what we think the kingdom should be. This attitude means following Jesus to the "failure" of the cross; walking in the way of justice, exposed to the power of oppression, even where there is no tangible hope of what we would consider a successful outcome. Doing this, Sobrino argues, is what it means to confess Jesus as Lord and God; it is a praxis which, by putting the following of Christ and the search for the kingdom above and beyond all refutation and undermining by history, sets Jesus himself above the vicissitudes of this world's present order, and so places him with God. Orthodoxy lies in this kind of commitment to the justice of God, to the kingdom, to Jesus crucified.

Latin American theology has also been involved in examining the images of Christ available in its culture. The "official" faces of Christ tend to be either the Man of Sorrows, expressing the helplessness of the sufferer, or the glorified heavenly Monarch.

Neither of these provides a vehicle for hope. To do that, an image of Christ must somehow articulate the way in which, because of Jesus' cross and resurrection, human pain is now taken up into the story of God's struggle with human rebellion and alienation, our alienation from our own humanity. Hugo Assmann has argued that practically all images of Christ, like all formulas about Christ, turn a process into a substantive state of affairs; when this happens, the inevitable corruption sets in of identifying the rule of Christ with the prevailing administration of human power, and we lose sight of Christ as the permanent "counter-power". Cross and resurrection must be kept inseparably together in their dialectical relation within the human story of the struggle for humanization – which is the story God has made his story.

Liberation Christologies have generally understood the belief in Jesus' divinity to be intelligible only through commitment to the authority of Jesus in social practice. They have thus – without necessarily wanting to deny or set aside the traditional creeds and formulations of faith – drawn our attention back to the origins of Christological confession in the simple acceptance of Jesus as authorized to define the shape of one's human hope and effort, Jesus as judge and prophet. The divinity of Jesus is shown rather than defined, shown in the radicalism of this commitment. Although many liberationists are heavily influenced by a residually liberal conviction about the "natural" utopian aspirations of human beings and hold to a theological anthropology still marked by the influence of writers such as Karl Rahner, their central direction is towards a more austere and cross-centred account of the cost of discipleship.

See also theology, liberation; uniqueness of Christ.

ROWAN D. WILLIAMS

■ R. Boyd, An Introduction to Indian Christian Theology, Madras, CLS, 1969 ■ A.C. Cochrane, The Church's Confession under Hitler, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1962 ■ Confessing the One Faith: An Ecumenical Explication of the Apostolic Faith As It Is Confessed in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (381), WCC, 1991 ■ P. Gregorios, W.H. Lazareth & N.A. Nissiotis eds, Does Chalcedon Divide or

Unite? Towards Convergence in Orthodox Christology, WCC, 1981 ■ K. Kitamore, Theology of the Pain of God, Richmond VA, John Knox, 1965 ■ K. Koyama, No Handle on the Cross, London, SCM Press, 1977 ■ W.H. Lazareth ed., The Lord of Life: Theological Explorations of the Theme Jesus Christ – the Life of the World, WCC, 1983 ■ J. Míguez Bonino, Faces of Jesus: Latin American Christologies, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1984 ■ G. O'Collins, Christology: A Biblical, Historical and Systematic Study of Jesus, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1995 ■ K.H. Ohlig, Fundamentalchristologie: Im Spannungsfeld von Christentum und Kultur, Munich, Kösel, 1986 ■ A. Pieris, An Asian Theology of Liberation, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1988 ■ J. Pobee, Toward an African Theology, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1979 ■ R.J. Schreier ed., Faces of Jesus in Africa, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1991 ■ J. Sobrino, Christology at the Crossroad: A Latin American Approach, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1978 ■ R.S. Sugirtharajah ed., Asian Faces of Jesus, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1993 ■ M.M. Thomas, The Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance, Madras, CLS, 1970 ■ L. Vischer ed., Spirit of God – Spirit of Christ, WCC, 1981.

JEWISH-CHRISTIAN DIALOGUE

INCREASING awareness of the horror of the Shoah (holocaust) of 1938-45, in which 6 million Jews were exterminated, is bringing about a gradual but radical re-appraisal of the relationship between Christians and Jews. The long history of anti-Judaic sentiment, the systematic teaching of contempt, legal discrimination and pogroms prepared the ground for 19th- and 20th-century anti-semitism,* which culminated in the Nazi tragedy. A recognition of this history has brought about a determination by all Christian bodies to oppose every form of anti-semitism. This was expressed at the first assembly of the WCC at Amsterdam (1948) and even more strongly at the third assembly at New Delhi (1961). The International Council of Christians and Jews (composed of Protestants, Catholics and Jews), meeting at Seelisberg in 1947, published ten points to make such good intentions a reality, including the need to correct distorted images of Judaism and to present the passion of Christ in a way that avoids anti-Judaic references.

The Second Vatican Council* published its historic document Nostra Aetate in 1965, and this has revolutionized official Roman Catholic attitudes. Affirming a common "spiritual patrimony", it said that the passion of Christ "cannot be charged against all the Jews" and affirmed that the relationship between Jews and Christians "concerns the church as such". Numerous documents from bodies in the Vatican and conferences of Catholic bishops in the USA and Europe and guidelines for individual dioceses have developed this teaching and sought practical ways of implementing it. However, despite this and the work of Service internationale de documentation judéo-chrétienne in giving detailed teaching on how to avoid negative images of Judaism, it is questionable how much has really changed at the parish level. In Protestant churches, where there is less systematic follow-up, it may be that despite expressions of good will, even less has actually changed.

Another factor in bringing about a new relationship between Christianity and Judaism is a historical study of the Bible. It is clear that the New Testament was written when the church and the synagogue had already split, and its writings reflect a mutual hostility which need no longer be shared by us. Furthermore, the re-discovery of Jesus as a Jew, against a Jewish background, as much by Jewish scholars as by Christian, shows how important it is for Christian self-understanding to reach a proper appreciation of Judaism.

The WCC at Amsterdam stressed the Christian responsibility to bring Jews to faith in Christ. This is still the view of agencies such as the Church's Ministry among the Jews and the Jews for Jesus movement which, at the same time, urge that converted Jews should retain their Jewish heritage and identity. In contrast, the Roman Catholic order of the Sisters of Zion, which was founded in the 19th century to convert Jews, has totally changed its role and now works to help Christians to understand Judaism, and vice versa. Similarly, many official church pronouncements, for example that of the synod of the Protestant churches of the Rhineland in 1980, repudiate all attempts to convert Jews to Christianity. This approach emphasizes the one hope for the kingdom, shared by Jews and Christians, the joint mission that God's name be hallowed, and the mutual witness for equal partners in the dialogue. It provides the basis for the growing cooperation of Jews and Christians on social and moral issues. The question of mission to the Jews remains highly contentious.

Behind the disagreements lie unresolved theological questions. There is agreement that the Christian church has not directly replaced or superseded the people of Israel, in any easy sense, and that God remains faithful to those with whom he has made a covenant.* There is not yet a common mind, however, on whether there is one covenant or two and, if two, how they are related. For some, faith in Christ admits to a relationship with God which Jews already enjoy by virtue of their historic faith; and the resurrection* validates belief in the God and Father of Jesus, who was then, and is now, in a loving relationship to Jews.

Jews, for their part, stress that Judaism must be defined in Jewish, not Christian, terms and that Judaism is a living religion, culture and people which has continued to develop through the centuries and should not simply be equated with the religion of the Hebrew scriptures. For most, though not all, Jews, the state of Israel is seen as fulfilling the religious longing of centuries and as providing the political homeland which has been denied them for nearly 2000 years. The recognition by the Vatican of the state of Israel ended years of unease on this issue. However, the political policies of some Israeli governments have been cause for anguish among many Jews as well as Christians. Furthermore, the natural sympathy of church bodies for the Palestinian cause is sometimes a cause of disquiet for many Jews. Despite the real advance that has been made since 1947, great sensitivity is required to avoid the hurts that still continue to be caused, and at a parish level there is still an enormous educational task to be done.

The key documents of the major Christian bodies up to 1983 are collected in Stepping Stones and More Stepping Stones, listed below. Since then there have been major statements by, among others, the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the USA (June 1987), the Episcopal Church of the USA (October 1987), the Lambeth conference (August 1988), Notes on the Correct Way to Present Jews and Judaism in Preaching and Catechesis in the Roman Catholic Church (Vatican 1995) and other instructions by the Catholic hierarchy of different countries.

The WCC held a consultation in 1988 in Sigtuna, Sweden, where a set of affirmations were made trying to sum up what Christians have learned in the Jewish-Christian encounters during past decades. (1) In God's love for the Jewish people, confirmed in Jesus Christ, God's love for all humanity is shown. (2) Christians share spiritual treasures with the Jewish people. (3) Jesus Christ both binds together and divides Christians and Jews. (4) Christians reject the view that the sufferings of Jews in history are due to any corporate complicity in the death of Christ. (5) Out of the Jewish community emerged two communities of faith, sharing the same spiritual roots, yet making very different claims. (6) Claims of faith as weapons have been used against the Jewish people, culminating in the Shoah. (7) The Jewish people are not rejected by God. (8) The continuing vocation of the Jewish people is a sign of God's love. Their covenant remains. (9) The Jewish people today are in continuation with biblical Israel. The dialogue is gradually becoming more truly ecumenical with the presence of Christians from Africa, Asia and Latin America and continuing involvement in the Middle East.

See also Israel and the church.

RICHARD HARRIES

■ H. Croner comp., Stepping Stones to Further Jewish-Christian Relations, London, Stimulus, 1977 ■ H. Croner comp., More Stepping Stones to Jewish-Christian Relations, London, Stimulus, 1985 ■ H. Ditmanson ed., Stepping Stones to Further Jewish-Lutheran Relationships: Key Lutheran Statements, Augsburg, Minneapolis, 1990 ■ E. Fisher & L. Klenicki eds, In Our Time: The Flowering of Jewish-Catholic Dialogue, New York, Paulist, 1990 ■ E. Fisher & L. Klenicki eds, Spiritual Pilgrimage: Texts on Jews and Judaism 1979-1995. Pope John Paul II, New York, Crossroad, 1996 ■ M. Perry & F. Schweitzer eds, Jewish-Christian Encounters over the Centuries, New York, Lang, 1994 ■ The Theology of the Churches and the Jewish People: Statements by the World Council of Churches and Its Member Churches, with a commentary by A. Brockway, P. van Buren, R. Rentdorff & S. Schoon, WCC, 1988 ■ H. Ucko, Common Roots – New Horizons: Learning about Christian Faith from Dialogue with Jews, WCC, 1994 ■ H. Ucko ed., People of God, Peoples of God: A Jewish-Christian Conversation in Asia, WCC, 1996 ■ G. Wigoder, Jewish-Christian Relations since the Second World War, Manchester, Manchester UP, 1988.

JIAGGE, ANNIE

B. 7 Oct. 1918, Lomé; d. 12 June 1996, Ghana. A president of the WCC (1975-83), she was moderator of the WCC's commission on the Programme to Combat Racism and the committee on laity and CIGARWS. Daughter of Robert Domingo Baeta, a revered synod clerk of the Evangelical Presbyterian Church, Ghana, she became interested in the ecumenical movement already in 1947 when she attended the world conference of Christian youth in Oslo.

After studies in law at the London School of Economics and Political Science and Lincoln's Inn, she practised law in Ghana (1951-56) and went on to be a magistrate (1956-59), circuit court judge (1959-61) and high court judge (1961-69). She served the YWCA in various capacities at home and abroad, including as vice-chairperson of the World YWCA (1958-62). As president of the UN Commission on the Status of Women (1962-72), she was the author of the basic draft of the UN Declaration on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, and for this service received the Gimbles International Award in 1969. She attended WCC assemblies at Evanston (1954), Uppsala (1968), Nairobi (1975) and Vancouver (1983). In 1968 she represented the WCC at the Roman Catholic laity conference in Rome. At home in Ghana she served as counsellor of the Christian council and as chair of the commission on the churches' participation in development. For her numerous contributions to the nation and the world, the University of Ghana awarded her an LLD (1974), and the government of Ghana the Grand Medal of Ghana (1969).

JOHN POBEE

JOHN XXIII (Angelo Roncalli)

B. 25 Nov. 1881, Sotto il Monte, Italy; d. 3 June 1963, Rome. Born of peasant farmers on the slopes of the Italian Alps and ordained a priest in 1904, in 1910 Roncalli became secretary to the bishop of Bergamo, Giacomo Radini-Tadeschi, who was so strong-minded in the church's social mission and defence of the working class that he and Roncalli were suspect in some Vatican circles. He served in the army as chaplain during the first world war, then in 1921 became the first national director of foreign missions, with his office in Rome.

In 1925 Roncalli began a Vatican diplomatic career. For nine years he was the apostolic visitor to Bulgaria where, amid the Muslims, the dominant Christians were Orthodox then divided among themselves, and the Catholics were both Latin and Eastern. As part of what he called his "mission of peace", his ecumenical apprenticeship began in a ministry of charity among the Orthodox laity, clergy and hierarchy. His 1927 visit to Patriarch Basil III of Constantinople strengthened his conviction that "one can hasten the unity of the church by charity... rather than theological discussion".

Roncalli then served as apostolic delegate to Turkey and Greece (1934-44). He quickly became known for his diplomatic skills amid hostile nationalities, governments and religious factions, and during the grim war years for his practical charity towards various social groups, in particular among prisoners of war and refugees, especially Jews. Roncalli tried to be "above all nationalistic disputes... as a teacher of mercy and truth" with "principles and exhortations from my lips and encouragement from my conduct in the eyes of all - Catholics, Orthodox, Turks and Jews" (1940).

The archbishop left Turkey in late 1944 for Paris. As the apostolic nuncio in post-war France, his primary task was to heal the divisions between the victorious followers of De Gaulle and the discredited compromising bishops of the Vichy regime. He had frequent contacts with Orthodox, Protestant and Catholic promoters of church unity, especially with Lambert Beauduin, the Benedictine liturgist and ecumenist. In Paris he was also the first permanent observer of the holy see to UNESCO. In 1953 Pius XII appointed Roncalli cardinal patriarch of Venice. There he resumed direct pastoral work, especially with the working class, and initiated reconciliation with the socialists.

After the long firm papacy of Pius XII (1939-58), the college of cardinals elected the 77-year old Roncalli as pope on 28 Oct. 1958, thinking they had put an elderly transitional person at the helm. On 25 Jan. 1959, three months into his pontificate and without prior consultation, John XXIII announced his intention to convoke “an ecumenical council for the universal church”, envisaging the event as “an invitation to the separated communities to seek again that unity for which so many souls are longing in these days throughout the world”.

In 1960 he set up the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity (now Pontifical Council for Christian Unity*), approved the delegation of official observers to the WCC 1961 assembly (New Delhi), and invited the Orthodox, Anglicans and Protestants to delegate observers to Vatican II. He eliminated antisemitic expressions in the Good Friday liturgy, and placed Catholic-Jewish relations on the Council’s agenda.

The Council was the pope’s major achievement. His own public contributions to it were his contagious confidence that the Roman Catholic Church needed serious aggiornamento (updating) in order to be faithful; his optimism about the action of God in the world as discerned in “the signs of the times”; and his conviction that the church should “use the medicine of mercy rather than severity” and that since error was best dissipated by the force of truth, dialogue could not begin or end with mutual fulminations. He considered his private contribution to be “what the Lord requires from me – my suffering”, for he kept secret what his doctors had told him a month before the Council opened: he had inoperable stomach cancer and his months were numbered.

Most noteworthy among his seven encyclicals* were Mater et Magistra (1961) on modern social questions, Princeps Pastorum (1959) on updating missionary activities, and his last will and testament addressed “to all people of good will” – Pacem in Terris (1963) concerning peace among all nations based on truth, justice, charity, freedom and the right organization of society.

After increasing continual pain, he died in June 1963, before Vatican II began its second session. “At least I have launched this big ship,” he said; “others will bring it into port.” His successor was Paul VI.

Transparently wide-hearted and affable, humble with his own gifts and limitations, lively and witty, “good pope John” shattered the cult of the aloof pontifical personality and easily won the affection of Catholics and non-Catholics alike. As bishop of Rome, John XXIII restored the tradition of visiting the parishes, hospitals, schools, charitable institutions and prisons of the city. His posthumously published diary reveals the journey of a priest who never felt awkward with his traditional Italian Catholic piety and who had unwavering trust in divine providence (his episcopal motto was voluntas Dei, pax nostra – God’s will, our peace). The “mere transitional pope” had initiated a new age in Roman Catholicism. He was declared saint by John Paul II on 3 Sept. 2000.

TOM STRANSKY

■ Peter Hebblethwaite, John XXIII, London, Chapman, 1984 ■ John XXIII, Journal of a Soul, tr. Dorothy White, New York, McGraw-Hill, 1964 ■ T. Stransky, “John XXIII”, in Ecumenical Pilgrims, I. Bria & D. Heller eds, WCC, 1995.

JOHN PAUL II (Karol Wojtyła)

B. 18 May 1920, Wadowice Poland; elected bishop of Rome and pope, 16 Nov. 1978. During the early Nazi occupation he laboured in a quarry and chemical plant in Wadowice, near Krakow. During his Krakow university studies in literature, when he had begun to write poetry and dramas and to act on stage, he decided to study for the priesthood in a clandestine seminary (1942). Ordained in 1946, Wojtyła was sent to Rome for a doctorate in philosophy. Two years later he returned to Krakow for pastoral ministry in parishes and among university students. In 1953 he became professor in ethics and moral theology at Krakow and at Poland’s only Catholic university, Lublin. He was named auxiliary bishop of Krakow (1958), later its archbishop (1964) and cardinal (1967).

During the four sessions of Vatican II* (1962-65), Wojtyła strongly defended the draft on religious freedom, and on other subjects he spoke often in the name of his fellow Polish bishops. He participated in the first five bishops’ synods in Rome, whose members always elected him a European representative on the synod’s interim planning committee. After Paul VI’s death in Aug. 1978 and the month-long papacy of Albino Luciani as John Paul I (26 Aug.-28 Sept.), Cardinal Wojtyła was elected pope – the first non-Italian in the papal chair since the Dutchman Adrian VI (1522-23), the first not from Western Europe since Zaccaria (741-59), and the youngest since Pius IX (1846).

In the 19th century Roman Slowachi, a Polish romantic poet, forecast a Slavic pope who would be “brave as God himself”, dispense love and charm “as great powers today distribute arms”, and “stand and give fight”. The first Slavic pope may fit that prophecy; perhaps he also has made it fit himself. Against the background of Vatican Council II and the papacy of Paul VI, the heroic image seems to strain to the limits the church’s power to contain it, as he intentionally is trying to pull back in line a church that “threatened to run away” from what he understands were the contents and intent of Vatican II. For some, he is not conservative enough (e.g. Archbishop Lefebvre’s schismatic Traditionalist movement); for others, he is wrongly putting a brake on authentic renewal; for some, he is saving Roman Catholicism from disintegration; for others, the pope has an impossible task, whatever the intent.

In any case, for most, especially Western Christians, the pope cannot be typecast. Even in his vigorous, forward stances towards a more just world order, he seems free from Western preconceptions: “The future of the world cannot be Moscow, and it cannot be New York either.”

Early on in his papacy, he pulled Eastern Europe away from the margins on the world’s map, judging as “the key fact of our times” that “millions of our contemporaries legitimately yearn to recover those basic freedoms of which they were deprived by totalitarian and atheistic regimes”. Some historians already trace the extraordinary and sudden demise of autocratic communist governments in Eastern and Central Europe to John Paul II’s trip to Poland in June 1978.

Despite the internal injuries which inflicted the pope from the gunshots of an attempted assassination (May 1981), he continues to seem indefatigable, whether in Rome or not. As the city’s bishop, he visits a different parish almost every Sunday, and Italy has become accustomed to his presence throughout the land. By June 2001 the pope had taken over 93 journeys outside Italy, to over 127 countries in six continents – on the road for the equivalent of almost two years. The pope is careful to meet other Christian leaders during his travels (e.g. to the WCC offices in Geneva, June 1982) and in Rome.

By 2000 his writings and speeches (Insegnamenti di Giovanni Paolo II, Vatican Press) filled over 60 thick volumes, ranging (as of May 2001) from his 13 encyclicals* to the hagiographic addresses on the many occasions of canonization of saints (447) and beatification of exemplary men and women (999).

He oversaw the completion of the revised code of canon law for the Latin church (1983) and the code of canons for the Eastern churches (1990), as well as the Catechism of the Universal Catholic Church (1992). He tightened the organization of the Roman curia* (1988) and initiated a more careful management of Vatican finances. He clearly wants men sympathetic to his views in key episcopal sees and in his diplomatic corps (papal nuncios and apostolic delegates). At the every-five-year ad limina visits of national or regional conferences of bishops, the pope offers more than formal courtesies, and the bishops exchange updatings with the staffs of key curial offices.

Pope John Paul champions religious freedom and defends all liberties as consonant with strong convictions, yet he seems over-restrictive in freedom within the church, especially in the enterprises of theologians (e.g. regarding sexual ethics*). He supports the strong cautious positions taken by the curial congregations for the doctrine of the faith, for seminaries and institutes of study, and for divine worship.

In his 1995 encyclical Ut Unum Sint,* John Paul II reflects on the ecumenical experiences of the post-Vatican II church and of his own. “Ecumenism is the way of the church” and “the commitment is irrevocable”. The pope’s own explicit commitment has been lauded, and questioned. He has contacts with Anglicans and Protestants but pays more attention to the healing of the schism between the church of Rome and the Orthodox church. Yet that very interest in the political and ecclesial Ostpolitik suddenly proved an objective priority in the delicate post-1989 relations in Eastern Europe between the Orthodox and the Eastern Catholic churches* (esp. in the Ukraine). A wide spectrum of Evangelical Christians support the pope as a courageous defender of biblical faith on such issues as the right to life against abortion, the indissolubility of Christian marriage, and the condemnation of premarital sex and active homosexuality.

Wojtyla frequently expresses his own glimpse into the future. His vision is almost apocalyptic in describing the present battle between good and evil – “a culture of life and a culture of death” – which the pope believes cannot be won except with a united renewed church, humbly marching with non-compromising steps into the new millennium.

TOM STRANSKY

- A. Dulles, The Splendor of Faith: The Theological Vision of Pope John Paul II, New York, Crossroad, 1999
- John Paul II, Crossing the Threshold of Hope, New York, Knopf, 1994
- John Paul II, ecumenical-related speeches and activities, IS, Vatican City
- J.B. Raimond, Jean-Paul II, Paris, le cherche midi éditeur, 1999
- G. Weigel, Witness to Hope, New York, Harper Collins, 1999
- G.H. Williams, The Mind of John Paul II, New York, Seabury, 1981
- M. Zieba, Jean-Paul II, un prophète incompris, Paris, Cerf, 1998.

JOINT WORKING GROUP

THE JOINT Working Group (JWG) is the official consultative forum of the WCC and the Roman Catholic Church to initiate, evaluate and sustain collaboration between their respective organs and programmes. Established in 1965 by the WCC central committee and the Vatican, the JWG meets annually and publishes official reports to its two authorities: the WCC assembly and the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity* (1966, 1967, 1971, 1975, 1982, 1990, 1998). The JWG seeks to be flexible in its styles of collaboration. It keeps new structures to a minimum while concentrating on ad hoc initiatives in proposing new steps and programmes.

The JWG has facilitated RC membership in the Faith and Order* Commission, membership in the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism, consultative relations with other WCC bodies (e.g. the Christian Medical Commission), and staff visits and consultations between the Geneva offices and the Roman curia.* It helped to form the 1968-80 joint committee on Society, Development and Peace (SODEPAX*) and collaborates in the annual joint preparation of the materials for the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.* The JWG has conducted its own studies, notably “Catholicity and Apostolicity” (1968), “Common Witness and Proselytism” (1970), “Common Witness” (1980), “Hierarchy of Truths”* (1990), “The Church: Local and Universal” (1990), “Ecumenical Formation” (1994), “Common Witness and Proselytism” (1996) and “Ecumenical Dialogue on Moral Issues” (1996).

Since 1980 the JWG has structured its agenda around the unity of the church, common witness, social collaboration and ongoing collaboration. The JWG interprets major streams of ecumenical thought and action, as well as present successes and obstacles in common witness;* relation between bilateral and multilateral dialogues; mission,* dialogue and evangelism;* Christian women in church and society; education (general and religious); mixed marriages;* national and local councils of churches; ethical issues as new sources of division; human rights and religious freedom.*

From its beginning the JWG has been conscious that despite a shared commitment to common witness within one ecumenical movement, a disparity between the two parent bodies affects the extent, style and content of collaboration. The WCC is a fellowship of churches, and its members do not take direct juridical responsibility for WCC studies, actions and statements; the RCC is one church with a universal mission and structure of teaching and governance as an essential element of its identity.

This RC self-understanding and structure of operation on a world level, which differs from those of the WCC member churches, was offered as a main (but not the only) reason why the RCC in 1972 declined to ask for WCC membership* “in the immediate future”. Since then the question has not been buried. The consequence of non-membership is that no further structural links between the two bodies would be developed, and even existing ones would come under critical scrutiny. But WCC senior officials note that the RCC is in fact a more active partner in most WCC programmes than many of the member churches.

The JWG mandate gives priority to encouragement of collaboration on local and national levels, but besides the offering of JWG reflective studies this task has become more difficult. It has proved equally difficult "to establish or maintain cooperation in areas where WCC programmes are oriented towards action, that is, where the WCC relates directly to particular local constituencies and responds to stated needs of its member churches" (K. Raiser).

Furthermore, it has been noted that the very common ground or basis which the JWG has forged to undergird its present RCC/WCC collaboration with the member churches works more naturally and with less strain when neither the RCC nor the WCC as such is directly involved.

TOM STRANSKY

■ Accounts of collaboration in each quarterly issue of IS (English and French), Vatican City ■ JWG official reports in ER, 18, 2; 23, 1; 24, 3; 28, 1; 35, 2; the sixth and seventh reports, Geneva-Rome, 1990, 1998 ■ K. Raiser, "Thirty Years of Ecumenical Service: The JWG", ER, 47, 4, 1995 ■ T. Stransky, "A Basis beyond the Basis: Roman Catholic/WCC Collaboration", ER, 37, 2, 1985 ■ T. Stransky, "The History of the JWG", appendix to the seventh report, 1998 ■ T. Stransky, "Zur Zusammenarbeit zwischen Genf und Rom – Gemeinsame Arbeitsgruppe", ÖR, 40, 1, 1991 ■ M. Velati, Una difficile transizione: Il cattolicesimo tra unionismo ed ecumenismo (1952-1964), Bologna, Il Mulino, 1996.

JUST, PARTICIPATORY AND SUSTAINABLE SOCIETY

THE SEARCH for a just, participatory and sustainable society (JPSS) was a major theme for study and reflection during the period between the fifth WCC assembly at Nairobi (1975) and the sixth assembly at Vancouver (1983). The central committee meeting in 1976 identified it as one of the four main programme emphases for the WCC in the ensuing years. As a programme emphasis, JPSS was to be treated as a framework for the coordination of programmes and as an area of concentration for concerted efforts by the different sub-units, especially those in-involved in the social field. But it was soon recognized that JPSS could also serve the more important role of evoking a common vision of a new human society, the need for which had long been a concern of many in the ecumenical movement. The first assembly at Amsterdam (1948), with its concept of "responsible society", had attempted to address the issue. Since then, however, enormous changes had taken place in world society, with societal issues becoming more complex and challenging. Changes had also taken place in the ecumenical movement itself and in Christian social thinking and experience.

Believing that the concept of JPSS might meet this need, the central committee initiated a process of enquiry and reflection. In 1977 it appointed an advisory committee to stimulate theological reflection on JPSS among the churches, assist the sub-units of the WCC to intensify their action/reflection programmes towards JPSS, and prepare a document to clarify and elaborate the concept.

The choice of JPSS was not arbitrary but arose out of the experiences of the churches and the ecumenical movement through the years. The issue of justice* had been a central concern of the WCC throughout its history, with the promotion of justice one of the functions of the WCC listed in its constitution. Since the Church and Society conference in 1966 and the Uppsala assembly in 1968, the efforts in combating injustice became more intense and wide-ranging. Justice was the primary goal of the development concern, a major preoccupation of the WCC and member churches during those years. Systemic injustice had been recognized as the root cause of poverty. The ecumenical concern for peace* also had to include the issue of justice, as situations of injustice posed a constant threat to peace. The re-structuring of society and the elimination of injustice were called for by those engaged in combating racism,* discrimination against women, and human rights violations. These and other societal issues in which the WCC was heavily involved in the 1960s and early 1970s had revealed the intensity, complexity and universality of the forces of injustice entrenched in the social, economic and political structures.

The issue of participation* had emerged as a vital concern in the ecumenical discussions on development.* People's participation was identified as a major goal of development and the most effective means of promoting it. The Nairobi assembly re-defined development as "essentially a people's struggle in which the poor and the oppressed should be the active agents and immediate beneficiaries". Similarly the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development came to the conviction that "people, the poor and the oppressed, are the subjects and not the objects of the development process". The right of people to participate in making decisions that affect their lives was also a guiding principle in many other ecumenical concerns, such as decolonization, racial equality, human rights* and women's liberation.

The concept of sustainability* was relatively new in ecumenical discussions, with the first major discussion of this issue taking place at Bucharest in 1974. The concern arose out of the recognition of several alarming trends in modern society that threaten the lives of people now living, future generations, all living creatures and nature itself: environmental deterioration; pollution of water, air and land; deforestation and desertification; depletion of non-renewable resources such as oil and minerals; changes in eco-systems, the atmosphere and the ozone layer, etc. The major source of these threats to survival was identified as the patterns of production and consumption. The concept of sustainability was introduced to challenge the rapidly accelerating growth process pursued in recent years and to recognize the need instead for selective growth and limits to growth.

Following the discussions and decisions of the central committee on JPSS, a series of consultations were held at national, regional and world levels, assisted and monitored by the JPSS advisory committee. The committee had two meetings of its own and later submitted a report to the central committee in 1979.

The report identified the search for a just, participatory and sustainable society as the major thrust of the ongoing struggle of the people. The need for the churches to strive for JPSS arises from this historical reality, as God's call to the church is a direct response to the cries of God's people, the poor* and the oppressed. The report articulated theological perspectives on justice, participation and sustainability, affirming the emphasis on justice in the biblical tradition. "Justice is a messianic category. It embraces both God's righteousness and fidelity and his will for a right ordering of human community... In messianic perspective, 'participation' is an essential manifestation of the true koinonia in which there is no domination of one over the other, but where all are mutually accountable to one another... 'Sustainability' in the Bible is expressed by the faithfulness of God to his lasting covenant. God blesses continually his creation, preserving it from destruction and leading it to the fullness of life abundant. We have received God's earth as our common inheritance, not as a privilege for some and a source of frustration for others."

Discussion of the report raised important theological issues, such as the tension between realism and utopianism and the relation between God's justifying righteousness and human justice. The majority of the central committee, however, rejected the theological framework and approved only later the recommendations made to the WCC. The old debate about the relationship between the kingdom of God and history, which had been carried on around the Oxford conference (1937), now re-surfaced, with much the same tensions and contradictions.

One of the major recommendations for follow-up was a programme of study and reflection on political ethics, i.e. "an examination of structures of power, participation and political organization on local, national and international levels". As a result, an ecumenical consultation was held in Cyprus, the report of which was published under the title Perspectives on Political Ethics.

Vancouver 1983 issued a historic call for churches "to engage in a conciliar process of mutual commitment (covenant) to justice, peace and the integrity of creation". The JPSS programme paved the way for this momentous decision.

See also human rights; justice, peace and the integrity of creation; responsible society.

C.I. ITTY

JUST WAR

THE DOCTRINE of just war constitutes the dominant teaching of the mainline churches concerning war and violence. Traceable back to the classical teaching of Cicero (d.43

B.C.), the doctrine appeared in Christian theology through Ambrose of Milan (c.339-97). Subsequent teachers of the church such as Augustine and Aquinas established just-war theory as a part of the Christian ethos, and Luther and Calvin carried it into the Protestant Reformation.

Each of these writers and subsequent scholars have emphasized different aspects of the doctrine of just war. At times it has been firmly in the service of the rulers; at other times the church has struggled to distance itself from oppressive regimes by affirming an alternative liberative tradition. The following are the essential emphases of just-war theory.

Just cause. The church has traditionally taught that, in order for a war to be regarded as just, it must be fought for a just cause (a notion whose meaning has admittedly differed over the years). Just-war theorists commonly argue today that it involves restraint of an aggressor, protection of the innocent, restoration of rights wrongly taken, and restoration of a just order.

Just end. Perceptions of a just or acceptable end differ vastly. For those living in situations of extreme oppression, the possibility of future anarchy is often seen as an end to be preferred to continued oppression. The point of the criteria is that the goal of war ought to be peace and justice, rather than merely vengeance or increased power.

Just means. Possibly the most difficult of all just-war criteria to follow in the heat of battle, this criterion requires restraint in the choice of weapons, with a view to minimizing suffering and death. The Geneva convention (1949) and two subsequent Geneva protocols (1977), for example, are in accordance with this criterion in seeking to prohibit "direct intentional attacks on non-combatants and non-military targets", arguing for the banning of nuclear arms and seeking to prohibit the use of torture.* Using this criterion, some argue that modern military technology has rendered all wars unjust.

Last resort. This is possibly the most important emphasis of just-war theory. All other means of correcting a wrong are to be tried before a resort to arms can be regarded as justifiable.

*Legitimate authority.** The dominant tradition of the church since the time of Constantine has consistently favoured de facto rulers over armed revolution. In this context resort to arms was seen to be a legitimate function solely of the king. The church also, however, allowed that a de facto leader is not necessarily a legitimate leader; the time may come when a tyrant needs to be removed from power. There is little agreement in the church, however, on whose responsibility it is to do the removing.

Calvin took the first cautious step towards allowing for just revolution.* He recognized that in extreme situations of tyranny it could be the obligation of the magistrate (a recognized leader of the people) to lead the people in rebellion. "In South Africa", a young black Christian once said, "it is our legitimate community leaders who are required to protect our right and lead us in such actions as may be necessary to ensure that the present unjust rulers are removed from power." Theodore Beza, Calvin's successor in Geneva, went beyond Calvin in legitimating revolution, and in the turbulent religious wars and rebellion that followed much of the restraint of earlier ages was thrown to the wind. The teaching that resulted ranged from Zwinglian notions of legitimate war and the exploits of Thomas Münzer, Karlstadt and the Zwickau prophets, to Oliver Cromwell and John Knox, who insisted that to remain passive in the face of tyranny was tantamount to complicity with the tyrant.

Just-war theory has been abused over the years to legitimate a variety of unjust wars, and there can be a narrow line between the theology of just war and that of holy war or crusade. This distinction makes the challenge of pacifism* a disturbing factor in the church. Believing that in extreme situations armed struggle may be the only responsible option available to a suffering people but being unwilling to affirm pacifism in principle, many committed just-war theorists nevertheless find that the option of non-violence continues to haunt their conscience.

Discussion of this question has been a part of the ecumenical movement from the beginning. While the Stockholm Life and Work* conference (1925) limited itself to expressing its horror of war and its hope for peace, the Oxford conference (1937), with the world then on the verge of an almost inevitable conflict, was forced to discuss the issue of Christian participation. The conference recognized the existence of “widely diverging views regarding war”, which it summarized in three positions. Eleven years later, after the second world war had been fought, views had not changed significantly. The three Oxford positions were taken up at Amsterdam 1948: “(1) There are those who hold that, even though entering a war may be a Christian’s duty in particular circumstances, modern warfare, with its mass destruction, can never be an act of justice. (2) In the absence of impartial supranational institutions, there are those who hold that military action is the ultimate sanction of the rule of law, and that citizens must be distinctly taught that it is their duty to defend the law by force if necessary. (3) Others, again, refuse military service of all kinds, convinced that an absolute witness against war and for peace is for them the will of God and they desire that the church should speak to the same effect.”

The ecumenical discussion on just war has so far produced no larger agreement. Efforts have concentrated on the means and ways to prevent war, an emphasis on which all can agree (see peace). Meanwhile, new situations have re-opened the debate, posing the question of “just revolution”. It was extensively discussed in relation to the decision in 1970 of the WCC central committee to establish a special fund to make financial grants available to liberation movements engaged in armed combat against oppressing regimes in Southern Africa and other areas (see Programme to Combat Racism).

The theology of just war was originally written from the perspective of the dominant classes of society. Developed from the perspective of the poor and oppressed, just-war theory acquires the character of a theology of just revolution. Theological continuity requires that such a theory, like that of just war, be used only in a restraining manner. Just-war theory traditionally allowed that in certain extreme situations war might be justified, even if never entirely “just” or “good”; as a theory of revolution it also allows that revolution, under certain circumstances, might be justified.

See also church and state; justice; violence and non-violence; violence, religious roots of; war guilt.

CHARLES VILLA-VICENCIO

■ L.S. Cahill, Love Your Enemies: Discipleship, Pacifism, and Just War Theory, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1994.

JUSTICE

DIFFERING ideas of justice exist in the Bible and throughout church history, and indeed in the modern ecumenical movement.

JUSTICE IN THE BIBLE AND IN CHURCH HISTORY

Biblically speaking, justice is a relational concept involving structures and behaviours based on trust, solidarity and mutuality versus those relying on betrayal, oppression and exploitation. When relations among God, human beings and creation are whole, shalom (peace) prevails (Isa. 32:17). Particularly through the power structures of highly advanced civilizations, community relations have in practice been endangered or destroyed. In this situation God’s judgment means the restoration of justice and shalom as God in his mercy hears the cries of the oppressed and liberates them (J. Miranda). In the light of the sinful structures of unevenly distributed power, justice implies struggle. If the oppressors do not repent, God’s justice becomes their punishment.

The classic example is Yahweh’s liberation of the Hebrews from slavery in Egypt (Ex. 3-15). After their liberation God’s people were to act as God himself acts and create an alternative, just society for which God gave them specific ordinances (see Ex. 21:1-23:19 and 20:1-17). When Israel’s civilization itself took the form of a monarchy (1 Sam. 8), serving the idol of power (1 Kings 18) and thus dividing into poor and rich (1 Kings 21), Yahweh sent prophets calling for justice (Amos 5:24). Helping the poor* and the weak to obtain justice is identical with the knowledge of God (Jer. 22:16). After the fall of the kingdom, hope grew of God’s kingship, the kingdom of God.*

Jesus inaugurated this kingdom and God’s justice and was thus seen to be the Messiah. The poor were encouraged (Luke 4:16-22), and small communities of the new righteousness developed (Matt. 5:13-14 and Acts 4:32) that were to reject unjust structures of power (Mark 10:42-45). Jesus' resurrection* proved God's power to show that life is produced by suffering* and dying for the sake of justice. Paul saw the righteousness and justice of God in God's calling even the gentiles and the entire creation through the Holy Spirit* and giving them the power to turn away from injustice and perdition and to serve justice (NRSV margin: righteousness) unto eternal life (Rom. 5:21).

Biblically there is no conflict between God's justice and human justice. God's just action calls for the participation of God's creatures. Receiving answers in prayer is thus indissolubly bound up with cooperation in the struggle for justice.

In the history of the church, monastic movements and the historic peace churches* followed the early Christian pattern of resisting injustice and building up an alternative community as (preliminary) signs of the kingdom of God, born of suffering. The majority churches, especially of the West, have developed a different model. After Christianity was accepted as the official religion of the Roman empire in the 4th century, the church tried to share in power. Justice and peace were thus changed from their biblical setting into a Graeco-Roman and later a European imperial context. Plato's concept of justice as an ordinance of authority* was taken over politically in the rule over the artisans by the philosopher-kings, assisted by the warriors, and anthropologically in the rule over the desires by reason, assisted by the will. Thus justice became a virtue. Aristotle distinguishes between commutative justice (in acts of exchange) and distributive justice (in the distribution of goods). In Roman legal thought justice is "the constant and enduring will to grant their rights to all" (Ulpian, fragment 10).

In the Roman context "to each his own" meant pre-eminently the protection of those with possessions, not the protection of the poor. In the periods of the middle ages and the Reformation, law* as an order* was understood primarily as penal and compulsive (the ordinance of the sword). The participation of Christians and churches in this order was tied to criteria: within a particular society, the order must minister to the common good, and in foreign politics any war waged had to be judged a just war.* If compulsion was exercised on Christians to make them sin,* they must refuse to do so (see also, e.g., the Augsburg confession, art. 16).

Defined as the human virtue of mastery over the desires and as the established power of the authorities to exercise compulsion, justice as a human concern ended up in tension with divine justice. Various classifications of the two types of justice were attempted: supremacy of divine justice as the rule of the church over the world (the Curialists), a harmonious graded order (Aquinas), a correlative status (nominalists) and a dialectical relationship (Luther). The theological basis for the correlation of biblical faith* with power structures is the assumption that the perspectives of love and reason are essentially the same. In the modern bourgeois age a rigid dualism developed between, on the one hand, divine justice for the individual soul and personal relations and, on the other, rigid arbitrary laws in economics* and politics that, like the laws of nature, are wholly separated from religion and ethics.* Indeed in economics justice is replaced by market value (first of all in Hobbes). For the most part the majority churches either refuse or are unable to resist this view.

Not till the 1960s did a third way of "being the church" develop – the liberation church model, which harks back to biblical traditions. The majority church of Constantine's day did not succeed in taming power* in the interests of justice (i.e. of God's will), while later the misuse of power in countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America by this same "Christian" European civilization became increasingly violent and destructive. Hence counter-movements have arisen "from below", struggling for liberation including various people's movements and new social movements and, on the basis of their praxis, liberation theology (Latin America), minjung theology (Asia), black theology (South Africa and North America) and feminist theology (see theology: Asian, black, feminist, liberation, minjung). These movements reject "imperial", Constantinian-type civilization and create new participating communities (see church base communities) that, at the cost of suffering, have been building up the counter-power of the people, thus trying to transform the unjust structures to achieve justice and participation.

JUSTICE IN ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION

The first major world conferences of the ecumenical movement were entirely under the influence of the majority churches. The crux of the conflict they considered was how to understand the kingdom of God and God's justice in relation to history.

At the world missionary conference in Edinburgh (1910), realization of the kingdom of God meant primarily the Christianization of the world (i.e. educating people into the ways of Western civilization), although it undoubtedly also meant criticism of the colonialist policies of the colonial powers. In Stockholm at the first world conference of Life and Work (1925), the German and English positions clashed violently. The German bishop Ludwig Ihmels, for instance, took the view that the kingdom of God was supramundane, that it had to do with human hearts and that it penetrated the community life only of Christians, and even then never completely, because of sin. In contrast, English bishop F.T. Woods spoke in terms of setting up "the kingdom of God on earth". Stockholm defined the aim of the movement as "united practical action in Christian Life and Work".

The second world missionary conference (Jerusalem 1928) gave practical shape to the social relevance of the kingdom of God by rejecting in principle the worship of money as the "religion of a capitalistic society". The object of mission* was to shape not merely the life of individual Christians and Christian communities but also social and political life as Christ intended, though no questions were asked here about the relevance of the model represented by the positive aspects of Western civilization.

Following these initial and still-tentative attempts to mobilize the biblical perspective of the kingdom of God against modern secularism and the worldwide structures of exploitation in the economic system and in colonialism,* the 1937 Oxford Life and Work conference ("Church, Community and State") reverted to the medieval and Reformation majority church model of "taming power" by participating in it, which laid the foundation for ecumenical social ethics until 1966-68. The great world economic crisis and the rise of fascist totalitarian states (see fascism) constituted the background to this "Christian realism", behind which stood theologians like Reinhold Niebuhr, J.H. Oldham and Emil Brunner. Between the line taken by the kingdom-of-God theology (transformation of the worldly orders and resistance on the basis of an alternative Christian society) and resigned accommodation to the worldly orders in privatized piety, the majority at Oxford supported a critical but constructive approach which was intended to contribute to relative justice on the basis of natural law* or the "moral law". Conference participants openly admitted that this approach was not taken from the Bible. Rather, the criterion for prophetic criticism of the existing orders and for their relative improvement was middle axioms* (Oldham), which could mediate between the absoluteness of Christian love and the realities conditioning socio-economic and political life.

On this basis the founding assembly of the WCC in Amsterdam (1948) developed the idea of the responsible society* as a socio-ethical criterion for assessing all individual questions. This idea seeks to balance freedom, justice and the control of power. Ideologically and politically this position rejects both laissez-faire capitalism* and communism and endorses a kind of social-democratic liberal democracy.

The world conference on Church and Society (Geneva 1966) and the Uppsala assembly (1968) represent the beginning of a new period in the life of the ecumenical movement. Prompted by the greatly increased participation of the churches of Africa, Asia and Latin America, the WCC shifted its orientation from the top (seeking to influence power holders) to a perspective more from below (participating in the actual struggles of the oppressed in their imitation of the suffering Messiah).

In terms of method, this new approach means a switch from studies of universal concepts to models of contextual participatory action and reflection (see praxis), from "value-free" education to "conscientization" (Paulo Freire) and from aid hand-outs to committed participation. Spirituality and prayer complement struggle as a second pole in the new approach, which expresses the transcendence of the kingdom and justice of God.

Within the WCC this approach from liberation theology was adopted against racism* (Programme to Combat Racism*), against economic exploitation (Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development; Just, Participatory and Sustainable Society;* and Urban Rural Mission) and discrimination against women; it also supported human rights, including socio-economic and political rights. The 1983 Vancouver assembly extended this approach in two ways. First, the inter-related study of justice, peace and the integrity of creation* was placed on the agenda. Second, it became clear that this new approach has profound consequences for the understanding of the church. As Visser 't Hooft said at Uppsala in 1968: "Church members who deny in fact their responsibility for the needy in any part of the world are just as much guilty of heresy as those who deny this or that article of the faith." The two lines of Life and Work* and Faith and Order* came together.

Labelling as heresy* the structural racism of apartheid* and its theological justification (LWF 1977/WARC 1982) first raised the issue of justice to that of status confessionis. As regards the idol of the all-powerful transnational economic system, Vancouver 1983 also stated: "The church is... challenged not only in what it does but in its very faith and being" (see economics, transnational corporations). In extreme situations of systematic and flagrant injustice, the approach of the liberation church is therefore linked to that of the "confessing church".* It also relates to the Orthodox-inspired understanding of the eucharist* as the sacrament that shapes the life of its participants who have encountered God as movement from death to life (see life and death), from injustice to justice, from violence to peace, from hatred to love, from vengeance to forgiveness, from selfishness to sharing, from division to unity.

Attempts to create a worldwide socialist alternative failed dramatically in 1989. Since then finance, business and the media have been using their transnational power over human beings and nature for the one goal of profit-making (see globalization, economic). The rich industrialized countries (G8) and their international instruments (IMF, World Bank and GATT/WTO) have tolerated and even fostered this goal by implementing policies of deregulation, liberalization, privatization and "structural adjustment". In this neo-liberal approach justice is no longer an issue; the laws of the capitalist market are regarded as the only normative principle.

What can the church do in this situation? First, it can reject the ideological totalitarianism* of the deregulated global market and its values, which lead to social disintegration and environmental degradation. Then it can adopt the twofold strategy of getting involved in small-scale alternatives and helping to regain ideological and political control of the economy at all levels. In practical terms the church must therefore stand alongside those who are suffering in refusing to countenance injustice, and it must itself begin to practise justice in its own life. Only thus, as a peace church and liberation church, can it transcend the majority church model. In so far as the liberation church model seeks, in cooperation with people's movements, to have a transforming effect on socio-economic and political structures, it must itself develop aims and criteria for change. Methodologically it thus has points of contact with the majority church approaches, e.g. the middle axioms* or Roman Catholic social teaching, despite all the differences in content. All approaches remain dependent on the twofold prayer "thy kingdom come, thy will be done". "For our struggle is not against enemies of blood and flesh, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the cosmic powers of this present darkness, against the spiritual forces of evil..." (Eph. 6:12).

See also ecclesiology and ethics, peace.

ULRICH DUCHROW

- U. Duchrow, Alternatives to Global Capitalism, Drawn from Biblical History, Designed for Political Action, 2nd ed., Utrecht, International Books, 1998
- U. Duchrow, Global Economy: A Confessional Issue for the Churches?, WCC, 1987
- "Fifty Years of Ecumenical Social Thought", ER, 40, 1988
- W. Lienemann, Gerechtigkeit, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1995
- J.P. Miranda, Marx and the Bible: A Critique of the Philosophy of Oppression, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1974
- W. Stierle, D. Werner & M. Heider eds, Ethik für das Leben: 100 Jahre Ökumenische Wirtschafts- und Sozialethik, Rothenburg ob der Tauber, Ernst Lange-Institut, 1996.

JUSTICE, PEACE AND THE INTEGRITY OF CREATION

THE PHRASE “justice, peace and the integrity of creation” (JPIC) is shorthand for a fuller statement: “To engage member churches in a conciliar process of mutual commitment (covenant) to justice, peace and the integrity of creation should be a priority for World Council programmes.” Originally intended as a programme priority for the WCC by its Vancouver assembly (1983) and addressed to its member churches, it was subsequently expanded to include churches that are not members of the WCC, regional and national ecumenical organizations and all other movements committed to these issues.

In issuing this invitation, Vancouver was responding to a situation of crisis as outlined in the assembly statement on peace* and justice:* “Humanity is now living in the dark shadows of an arms race more intense and of systems of injustice more widespread than the world has ever known. Never before has the human race been as close as it is now to total self-destruction. Never before have so many lived in the grip of deprivation and oppression.” It goes on to state what the Christian response to this situation should be: “The churches today are called to confess anew their faith and to repent for the times when Christians have remained silent in the face of injustice or threats to peace. The biblical vision of peace with justice for all is not one of several options for the followers of Christ but is an imperative for our times.” And it repeats what it considers to be the nature of the Christian response at this time: “The [single, though twofold] foundation of this emphasis should be confessing Christ as the life of the world and Christian resistance to the powers of death in racism, sexism, caste oppression, economic exploitation, militarism, violations of human rights, and the misuse of science and technology.”

In taking this position, Vancouver clearly shifted from the position of understanding Christian involvement in world affairs largely as a concern of Christian ethics – to translate the values of the kingdom into achievable social goals (the middle axioms* of the responsible society). Instead, it placed the emphasis on confessing the faith,* which calls for a new understanding of the missionary task of the church. To realize this intention, the assembly envisaged a “conciliar process of mutual commitment” that would bring the churches together to take a common stand on the urgent issues concerning the survival of humankind. It envisioned such a council taking the churches to a new stage in the covenant relationship into which they had entered at the inaugural assembly at Amsterdam (1948).

GOALS

The JPIC preparatory group, constituted by the WCC executive committee to oversee and bring to fruition the process, had to clarify the intention in terms of realizable goals.

A world convocation rather than a council. Except as a general reference to JPIC, the term “conciliar process” had to be abandoned. In the Vancouver call it was used rather loosely to mean a method of churches in a common fellowship or koinonia,* as in the WCC, working together to resolve differences and achieve common goals that are to be given public expression in a council. In view of the differences that persist between the churches, however, it soon became clear that the time for holding a council in the strict sense of the term had not yet come. It was therefore decided to call the first global Christian gathering on JPIC a world convocation. Its purpose, as defined by the WCC executive committee (March 1988), was “to make theological affirmations on justice, peace and the integrity of creation, and to identify the major threats to life in these three areas and show their interconnectedness, and make and propose to the churches acts of mutual commitment in response to them”.

Justice, peace and the integrity of creation. Vancouver intended these elements to be viewed as three aspects of one reality: as a single vision towards which we work and as three entry points into a common struggle in these areas. The addition of the term “integrity of creation” to help clarify “the biblical vision of peace with justice” was particularly useful. Besides alluding to the damage being done to the environment and the threat posed to the survival of life, the term also gave a new prominence to the doctrine of creation and the opportunity to re-affirm our Trinitarian faith, beginning with God as Creator and therefore also Liberator and Sustainer.

Covenant for JPIC. At first, the term “covenant”* given in brackets in the JPIC formula did more to confuse than to clarify the meaning of “mutual commitment”. Four main difficulties were encountered. (1) The term is used in common parlance to refer to pacts and alliances between human partners, so that it is not clear what more is meant when it is used as a theological term in conjunction with “mutual commitment”. (2) The Bible mentions several types of covenant, each with its own character and emphasis, so that we cannot assume a common biblical understanding of the term. (3) The term has ecclesiological significance in some church traditions but not all, which makes it suspect as a way of stating the mutual commitment of all churches to JPIC. (4) Churches generally understand God’s covenant to have been accomplished “once for all” in Jesus Christ. So what does it mean theologically to speak of covenanting?

The way out of this impasse was to use an insight from scripture. Because God is a faithful covenant partner, the people were often called upon in times of crisis to renew their covenant with God, which they had broken, and to re-constitute themselves as a covenant community open to the world, especially to the suffering and the destitute. With this basic biblical understanding of covenant renewal, we can speak of covenanting for justice, peace and the integrity or wholeness of God’s creation at this time of crisis as a way of working together to resist the threats to life and to seek alternatives that will affirm life in all its fullness for all people and the world.

A WORLDWIDE PROCESS

The Vancouver call touched off a worldwide JPIC process, as many national, regional and confessional ecumenical initiatives contributed to the richness of JPIC and the preparations for a world convocation. “A Historical Survey of the JPIC Process”, in Between the Flood and the Rainbow, lists the major events on JPIC. The world convocation that took place in Seoul, Korea, in 1990 was “an important stage on the road towards common and binding pronouncements and actions on the urgent questions of survival of humankind” (WCC central committee 1987). The convocation made ten affirmations, regarding the exercise of power as accountable to God, God’s option for the poor,* the equal value of all races and peoples, male and female as created in the image of God, truth is at the foundation of a community of free people, the peace of Jesus Christ, the creation as beloved of God, the earth as the Lord’s, the dignity and commitment of the younger generation, and human rights* as being given by God. The participants at Seoul also entered into covenant regarding four concrete issues: a just economic order and liberation from the bondage of foreign debt; the true security of all nations and peoples and a culture of non-violence; building a culture that can live in harmony with creation’s integrity and preserving the gift of the earth’s atmosphere to nurture and sustain the world’s life; the eradication of racism* and discrimination on all levels for all peoples and the dismantling of patterns of behaviour that perpetuate the sin of racism.

At its Canberra assembly (1991) the WCC gave prominence to JPIC. The assembly section reports have extensive discussions on JPIC, with specific recommendations on why and how it is to be continued. Reflecting the work in the sections, the assembly programme policy committee said: “Working towards justice, peace and the integrity of creation will help the churches understand their task in the world, provided we develop a rigorous social analysis, deepen our theological reflection and vigorously promote these concerns. This has emerged as the central vision of the WCC and its member churches.” The theme was re-affirmed in the Harare assembly programme guidelines committee report.

The specifics of the world situation have changed since 1983. The underlying threats continue, however, leading JPIC to spawn new ecumenical initiatives. In seeking a renewed basis for ecumenical social thought and action, a theology of life focuses on the life of all creation and not just on human life. Various local groups are endeavouring to achieve the concerns of the civil society for inclusiveness and equity. Projects on costly unity, costly discipleship and costly obedience are creating new opportunities for relating unity and mission as well as ecclesiology and ethics. As yet to emerge is a coherent theology for Christian cooperation with people of other faiths and beliefs who are also committed to the cause of JPIC.

See also church and world; just, participatory and sustainable society.

D. PREMAN NILES

- A. van der Bent, Commitment to God's World: A Concise Critical Survey of Ecumenical Social Thought, WCC, 1995 ■ T.F. Best & M. Robra eds, Ecclesiology and Ethics: Ecumenical Ethical Engagement, Moral Formation and the Nature of the Church, WCC, 1997 ■ ER, 38, 3, 1986; 41, 4, 1989; 43, 4, 1991 ■ D.P. Niles, Resisting the Threats to Life: Covenanting for Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation, WCC, 1989 ■ D.P. Niles ed., Between the Flood and the Rainbow: Essays Interpreting the Conciliar Process of Mutual Commitment (Covenant) to Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation, WCC, 1992 ■ D.P. Niles ed., Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation: Documents from an Ecumenical Process of Commitment, WCC, 1994.

JUSTIFICATION

THE DOCTRINE of justification can be properly treated only within the wider context of the doctrine of salvation* as a whole. The will of God – Father, Son and Holy Spirit (see Trinity) – is to reconcile to himself all that he has created and sustains, to set free the creation* from its bondage to decay and to draw all humanity into communion* with himself. Though we, God's creatures, turn away from God through sin,* God continues to call us and opens up for us the way to find him anew. To bring us to union with himself, the Father sent into the world Jesus Christ,* his only Son. Through Christ's life, death and resurrection, the mystery of God's love is revealed, we are saved from the powers of evil, sin and death and we receive a share in the life of God.

Within the Christian tradition there has always been a great deal of agreement about the doctrine of salvation, including justification, despite some familiar controversies. It has been agreed, above all, that the act of God in bringing salvation to the human race and summoning individuals into a community to serve God is due solely to God's mercy and grace,* mediated and manifested through Jesus Christ in his ministry, atoning death and rising again. Nor has it been disputed that God's grace evokes an authentic human response of faith* which takes effect not only in the life of the individual but also in the corporate life of the church.* Difficulties have arisen in explaining how divine grace relates to human response: (1) the understanding of the faith through which we are justified, in so far as this includes the individual's confidence in his or her own final salvation; (2) the understanding of justification and the associated concepts of righteousness and justice;* (3) the bearing of good works on salvation; (4) the role of the church in the process of salvation.

BIBLICAL ORIGINS

The biblical terms "righteousness" and "justification" have a rich background and a wide variety of uses. As images they are drawn from juridical, forensic (law court) settings and are employed to describe the right relationship of human beings to God or one another and the mode or process by which such a relationship comes about. The descriptions of the way in which a person is brought to righteousness in the sight of God vary among the Old Testament authors and in the New Testament, especially in the writings of Paul. When predicated of God, "righteousness" is understood as God's fundamental uprightness; God's triumph(s) in a holy war, in a law-court dispute with Israel, or in legal decisions (Ps. 9:4); but above all, especially in the post-exilic period, as God's gracious salvific activity, manifest in a just judgment (Isa. 46:13, 51:5-8, 56:1; Hos. 2:18-19; Pss. 40:9-10, 98:2).

Clearly in the 30s and 40s of the 1st century the early Christian community was making use of this OT imagery to express the claim that by Christ's death and resurrection human beings stand righteous before God's tribunal. Inheriting the righteousness/justification language of the OT and its previous applications to Christ, Paul sharpened the meaning, especially, though not exclusively, in Galatians, Romans and Philippians. He related the process of justification to grace and set forth the theme of "justified by faith apart from works prescribed by the law" (Rom. 3:28), though he also insisted on "the obedience of faith" (Rom. 1:5) and response to the gospel in believers' lives. Justification is not simply a future or past event, but it is an eschatological reality which stretches from the past through the present and into the future. Hence Paul, in writing to the Philippians, can enjoin: "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling", and then immediately adds: "For it is God who is at work in you, enabling you both to will and to work for his good pleasure" (2:12-13). Faith includes for Paul both allegiance to God in Christ and the inescapability of good deeds flowing therefrom. It thus differs greatly from the "faith" dismissed as insufficient in James 2, namely, acceptance of revelation* without corresponding behaviour.

PATRISTIC USAGE

Historical research has greatly increased our awareness of the degree to which the 16th-century debate over justification was conditioned by a specifically Western and Augustinian understanding of the context of salvation which, in reliance on Paul, stressed the scriptural theme of righteousness. Eastern theologians generally saw salvation within the framework of a cosmic process and stressed the divinizing character of grace. Augustine's intention in developing the doctrine of grace was to protect the absolute priority of God's action over all human endeavour. His distinctions between "operating" and "cooperating", "preventive" and "subsequent" grace point in this direction. Early scholasticism added further categories such as first grace, grace freely given (gratia gratis data) and justifying grace (gratia gratum faciens) in order to clarify various stages of the process of the transformation of the individual believer. In view of a growing awareness that the difference between the natural and the supernatural is not simply identical with that between creatures and God, a distinction came to be made between two types of supernatural grace – the uncreated grace (gratia increata, i.e. God himself or the indwelling of the Holy Spirit) and the created "habit", or disposition, of grace (gratia creata). For some theologians, such as Aquinas, God remained in total command as the initiator and perfecter of the movement from sinner to saint, but for many the insistence on infused grace and on the presence of special assisting graces (gratiae gratis datae) was combined with a strong emphasis on the ability of free will to contribute to salvation, not simply on the basis of grace, but independently.

A similar shift can be traced in the expanding thought on merit before the Reformation. Augustine wanted to emphasize God's absolute priority: "When God rewards our merits, he crowns his own gifts." The shift of interest to the role of human nature eventually led to the distinction between "congruous" and "condign" merit. The former in one of its meanings designated the basis for a hope that God "does not deny grace to those who do what is in them". This assertion can be understood as affirming God's priority in the sense that merciful inspiration and direction are necessary for every good action of the human creature. It is in this sense that Aquinas speaks of doing what is in one's power. This formula, however, can also be used in a Pelagianizing sense if "doing what is in one" is thought of as a consideration which calls for the conferral of grace but which human beings can and must fulfill by relying on the unaided powers of their fallen nature.

THE 16TH-CENTURY CONTROVERSIES

Instead of a progressive transformation under the power of grace, the imputation of an alien righteousness received in faith implies for Luther an ongoing and paradoxical simultaneity; the justification is complete in the imputing of it, so that the believer is "simultaneously a righteous person and a sinner" (simul iustus et peccator). It is not on the basis of their gifts of infused grace, or inherent righteousness of good works, that God declares sinners just, but on the basis of Jesus Christ's righteousness. For the reformers, the "alien", "extrinsic" justification is the article on which the church stands or falls.

The theological opposition, as indicated by the censures passed in 1518-21 by the theological faculties of Mainz, Cologne, Louvain and Paris, centred not on the doctrine of justification by faith taken by itself but on questions related to free will, the alleged sinfulness of all good works, the role of contrition, confession and satisfaction in the sacrament of penance,* the ex opere operato efficacy of the sacraments,* the sinfulness of concupiscence and the value of indulgences.

The council of Trent (1545-47, 1551-52 and 1562-63) dealt extensively with many interconnected topics such as original sin, justification, grace and merit, the sacraments and indulgences. In its teachings on justification the council re-affirmed the unique role of Christ, who died for all and who grants grace "through the merits of his passion" to those reborn in him, and without rebirth in him one can never be justified. The council further taught that "nothing prior to justification, whether faith or works, truly merits the grace of justification".

In a central paragraph the council of Trent expounded the nature of justification with the help of scholastic causal categories. The final cause is the glory of God and of Christ, and eternal life. The efficient cause is the merciful God, who freely cleanses and sanctifies, sealing and anointing by the Holy Spirit. The meritorious cause is Jesus Christ, who by his passion merited our justification and made satisfaction for us to God the Father. The formal cause is "the righteousness of God – not that whereby God is righteous but that whereby he makes us righteous".

RECENT HISTORY

In the centuries since the Reformation both the Roman Catholic and the Lutheran churches continued to affirm their 16th-century pronouncements on justification. Since the council of Trent and their own Book of Concord, Lutheran theologians have usually claimed that the doctrine is of central importance but have interpreted it in a variety of ways; Roman Catholics, although debating the issues of sin, freedom, nature and grace, have for the most part not made justification itself a primary object of attention. In both cases, furthermore, the discussions have been chiefly within, rather than between, the two communions.

In the 19th and 20th centuries, however, there has been renewed attention to the Reformation doctrine of justification. Especially the growth of dialogue in recent decades between Catholics and the heirs of the Reformation has stimulated research into the interconfessional aspects of justification. Vatican II* (1962-65) gave little explicit attention to the theme of justification, but it touched on the subject indirectly in its teachings on matters such as faith, grace, salvation and the ministry of the church. By broadening the definition of faith beyond intellectualistic concepts that had been prevalent in modern scholasticism, the Council left open the possibility that faith might include the entire response of the faithful to justifying grace. In its references to cooperation and merit, the Council showed sensitivity to Protestant concerns and to the need to resist any Pelagianizing tendencies that might exist among Catholics.

The fourth assembly of the Lutheran World Federation* (Helsinki 1963) gave particular attention to justification. The Reformation witness to justification was said to have been in a threefold "Babylonian captivity" of "doctrinalization, individualization and spiritualization". The opposition between forensic and transformationist views of justification was questioned: "The old alternative whether the sinner is considered justified 'forensically' or 'effectively' is begging the question, for God's action brings about 'rebirth'." The document "The Gospel and the Church" of the international Lutheran-Roman Catholic study commission also deals with the question of how the two sides understand justification. In its Malta report (1972) the commission says: "Catholic theologians also emphasize in reference to justification that God's gift of salvation for the believer is unconditional as far as human accomplishments are concerned. Lutheran theologians emphasize that the event of justification is not limited to individual forgiveness of sins, and they do not see in it a purely external declaration of the justification of the sinner. Rather the righteousness of God actualized in the Christ event is conveyed to the sinner through the message of justification as an encompassing reality basic to the new life of the believer." Besides issues relating to understanding the doctrine of justification itself, other questions arise here. What is the theological importance of this doctrine? Do both sides similarly evaluate its implications for the life and teaching of the church?

A beginning of an answer is given in the document "Justification by Faith" of the US Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue* group (1983). Lutherans and Catholics wholeheartedly accept the "fundamental affirmation" that their "entire hope of justification and salvation rests on Christ Jesus and on the gospel, whereby the good news of God's merciful action in Christ is made known; we do not place our ultimate trust in anything other than God's promise and saving work in Christ" (paras 4 and 157). They admit that this affirmation is not fully equivalent to the Reformation teaching on justification, according to which God accepts sinners as righteous for Christ's sake on the basis of faith alone; but by insisting that reliance for salvation should be placed entirely on God, their agreed affirmation expresses a central concern of that doctrine. While granting that the principle of justification by faith alone must not be employed to erode the fullness of the apostolic heritage and of the means whereby this heritage is to be mediated in any given time and place, the Lutherans maintain that this principle retains its critical importance. Catholics, on their side, are wary of using any one doctrine as the absolute principle by which to purify from outside, so to speak, the Catholic heritage. While conceding that the church stands under the gospel and is to be judged by it, Catholics insist that the gospel cannot be rightly interpreted without drawing on the full resources available within the church. To speak of "Christ alone" or "faith alone", they contend, could lead, contrary to the intentions of Lutherans themselves, to the position that the grace of Christ is given apart from the external word of scripture, Christian preaching, the sacraments and the ordained ministry.

Here, as on other points such as the imputational or forensic character of justification, the sinfulness of the justified, the sufficiency of faith, or questions of merit and satisfaction, there is much common ground, but there are still divergences too. So the Lutherans, e.g., continue to ask whether, even in modern Catholicism, it has been made sufficiently evident that (as the Malta report expressed the Lutheran position) "the rites and orders of the church are not to be imposed as conditions for salvation, but are valid only as the free unfolding of the obedience of faith".

Based on the results of the Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue in the US (1983) and in Germany ("The Condemnations of the Reformation Era: Do They Still Divide?", 1986) and of the international dialogue between these two traditions ("Church and Justification", 1994), it became possible to produce a Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification (JDDJ), which representatives of the Lutheran World Federation and of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity signed in Augsburg on Reformation Day 1999. The heart of the JDDJ lies in paragraphs 15-17, which read as follows:

"[15] In faith we together hold the conviction that justification is the work of the triune God. The Father sent his Son into the world to save sinners. The foundation and presupposition of justification is the incarnation, death and resurrection of Christ. Justification thus means that Christ himself is our righteousness, in which we share through the Holy Spirit in accord with the will of the Father. Together we confess: By grace alone, in faith in Christ's saving work and not because of any merit on our part, we are accepted by God and receive the Holy Spirit, who renews our hearts while equipping and calling us to good works.

"[16] All people are called by God to salvation in Christ. Through Christ alone are we justified, when we receive this salvation in faith. Faith is itself God's gift through the Holy Spirit who works through word and sacrament in the community of believers and who, at the same time, leads believers into that renewal of life which God will bring to completion in eternal life.

"[17] We also share the conviction that the message of justification directs us in a special way towards the heart of the New Testament witness to God's saving action in Christ: it tells us that as sinners our new life is solely due to the forgiving and renewing mercy that God imparts as a gift and we receive in faith, and never can merit in any way."

Subsequent paragraphs then expound current positions on historically controversial questions as “differences of language, theological elaboration and emphasis in the understanding of justification” that do not destroy the stated “consensus in basic truths”, so that the Lutheran and Catholic explications are “open to one another” in the matters of “human powerlessness and sin in relation to justification”, “justification as forgiveness of sins and making righteous”, “justification by faith and through grace”, “the justified as sinner”, “law and gospel”, “assurance of salvation” and “the good works of the justified”. Finally, the mutual condemnations of the 16th century are declared not to apply to the teachings jointly and respectively laid out in the present document.

A further elaboration of the ecclesiological consequences of the doctrine of justification is given in the agreed statement “Salvation and the Church” by the second Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission (ARCIC II). The church is itself a sign of the gospel, for its vocation is to embody and reveal the redemptive power contained within the gospel. The once-for-all atoning work of Christ, realized and experienced in the life of the church and celebrated in the eucharist,* constitutes the free gift of God which is proclaimed in the gospel. In the service of this mystery the church is entrusted with a responsibility of stewardship. The church is called to fulfill this stewardship by proclaiming the gospel and by its sacramental and pastoral life. The church is also an instrument for the realization of God’s eternal design, the salvation of humanity. The church is therefore – so the ARCIC II texts say – called to be, and by the power of the Spirit actually is, a sign, steward and instrument of God’s design. For this reason it can be described as sacrament of God’s saving work. The church, as the community of the justified, is called to embody the good news that forgiveness is a gift to be received from God and shared with others. Thus the message of the church is not a private pietism irrelevant to contemporary society, nor can it be reduced to a political or social programme. Only a reconciled and reconciling community, faithful to its Lord, in which human divisions are being overcome, can speak with full integrity to an alienated, divided world and so be a credible witness to God’s saving action in Christ and a foretaste of God’s kingdom.*

To work out these eschatological perspectives will be a test case for a really ecumenical understanding of the relation of justification and sanctification.* The church participates in Christ’s mission to the world through the proclamations of the gospel of salvation by its words and deeds. It is called to affirm the sacredness and dignity of the person, the value of righteous social and political structures and the divine purpose for the human race as a whole; to witness against the structures of sin in society, addressing humanity with the gospel of repentance and forgiveness and making intercession for the world. It is called to be an agent of justice and compassion, challenging and assisting society’s attempts to achieve just judgment, never forgetting that in the light of God’s justice all human solutions are provisional.

MARTIEN E. BRINKMAN

- H.G. Anderson, T.A. Murphy & J.A. Burgess eds, Justification by Faith, Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue, vol. 7: Justification by Faith, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1985
- M.E. Brinkmann, Justification in Ecumenical Dialogue: Central Aspects of Christian Soteriology in Debate, Zoetermeer, Meinema, 1996
- Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification: A Commentary by the Institute for Ecumenical Research, Strasbourg, 1997 (full and final text, with appended “official common statement” and elucidatory “annex”, in GinA-II)
- H. Küng, Rechtfertigung (ET Justification: The Doctrine of Karl Barth and a Catholic Reflection, New York, Nelson, 1964)
- K. Lehmann & W. Pannenberg eds, Lehrverurteilungen – kirchentrennend? I: Rechtfertigung, Sakramente und Amt im Zeitalter der Reformation und heute (ET The Condemnations of the Reformation Era: Do They Still Divide?, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1989)
- Lutheran-Roman Catholic Joint Commission, Church and Justification, Geneva, LWF, 1994
- A.E. McGrath, Iustitia Dei: A History of the Christian Doctrine of Justification, 2 vols, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1998
- H. Meyer, “The Doctrine of Justification in the Lutheran Dialogue with Other Churches”, OC, 17, 1981
- Proceedings of the Fourth Assembly of the LWF, Helsinki, 1963, Berlin, Lutherisches Verlagshaus, 1965
- P. O’Callaghan, Fides Christi: The Justification

Debate, Dublin, Four Courts, 1997 ■ J. Reumann ed., Righteousness in the New Testament: Justification in the United States Lutheran-Roman Catholic Dialogue, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1982 ■ "Salvation and the Church: An Agreed Statement by the Second Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission, ARCIC II", OC, 23, 1987 ■ G.H. Tavad, Justification: An Ecumenical Study, New York, Paulist, 1983.

K

KAGAWA, TOYOHICO

B. 10 July 1888, Kobe, Japan; d. 23 April 1960, Tokyo. Social reformer and evangelist, Kagawa in 1928 was in the forefront of an evangelistic campaign – the “Million Souls” movement – which led, with the National Christian Council’s nationwide campaign, to the formation of the Kingdom of God movement, 1930-32, of which Kagawa was the central figure. He played a leading role at the International Missionary Council’s Tambaram conference, 1938. After the second world war, Kagawa led many Christians in the national penitential movement. He was the president of the Japanese cooperative federation, travelling widely and insisting everywhere that evangelism must be “spiritually motivated, educationally undergirded and industriously demonstrated”. His writings had a significant influence on the ecumenical movement and on the development of Asian theology, especially his emphasis on the vital role of lay Christians.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ G.B. Bikle, The New Jerusalem: Aspects of Utopianism in the Thought of Kagawa Toyohiko, Tucson, Univ. of Arizona Press, 1976 ■ T. Kagawa, Meditations on the Cross, Chicago, Willet & Clark, 1935 ■ J.M. Trout, Kagawa, Japanese Prophet, New York, Association Press, 1959.

KAIROS DOCUMENT

THE KAIROS document is a biblical and theological comment on the political crisis in South Africa. First published in 1985, it arose out of the struggle to discover how to respond as Christians to what it calls a situation of death.

The "moment of truth" (kairos) is defined as "the moment of grace and opportunity, the favourable time in which God issues a challenge to decisive action". The document critiques "state theology", which justifies theologically the status quo. It also critiques "church theology", which in only "a limited, guarded and cautious way... is critical of apartheid". The document promotes "prophetic theology" as an alternative, in which biblical teaching on suffering and oppression is considered in relation to a social analysis of the structures of oppression in South Africa. Defining the South African regime as tyrannical, the document challenges Christians to participate in the struggle for liberation.*

The theological methodology employed in writing the document is as important as the document itself. The document emerged from serious group theological reflection. Frank Chikane (general secretary of the South African Council of Churches, 1988-95), a formative influence in the production of the Kairos document, has said of the process: "Reflection on experience in faith becomes the word of God. This document is actually a byproduct of a process, the process of struggle to remove the apartheid regime. This is the issue, not the document per se."

The writing process began as a group, consisting largely of grassroots black Christians, who met in Soweto to initiate the reflection process. The writing of the document was assigned to different people at different times. These drafts were often rejected by the group as theologically too traditional, failing to reflect their experience of oppression and of faith. The language of the document, severely criticized by some traditional theologians as being too millenarian and apocalyptic, reflects the context out of which the document emerged. Vigorous debate on the wording continued right until it was submitted for publication. "The first publication, therefore," as the preface puts it, "must be taken as a beginning, a basis for further discussion by all Christians in the country." Numerous responses from the international community and from within South Africa led to a second edition of the document, published in September 1986.

In South Africa the Kairos document is regarded as a theological watershed. It calls for Christian action against a state which it described as "having no moral legitimacy" and which had become "an enemy of the common good". For the church to be the church, it must stand "unequivocally and consistently with the poor and the oppressed". Not all Christians or churches in South Africa were prepared to receive this "Challenge to the Church" (the subtitle of the Kairos document).

See also apartheid, kairos documents.

CHARLES VILLA-VICENCIO

■ The Kairos Document: Challenge to the Church, 2nd ed., Johannesburg, Skotaville, 1986 ■ A. Nolan, God in South Africa, Cape Town, David Philip, 1988 ■ C. Villa-Vicencio, Between Christ and Caesar: Classic and Contemporary Texts on Church and State, Cape Town, David Philip, 1986 ■ C. Villa-Vicencio, Trapped in Apartheid: A Socio-Theological History of the English-Speaking Churches, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1988.

KAIROS DOCUMENTS

INSPIRED by the South African Kairos document* of 1985, many similar kairos documents were drafted, accepted and published in different forms, by a large number of diverse groups and in different contexts, in the years to follow. Some of the well-known documents or initiatives include the following.

“Kairos Central America: A Challenge to the Churches of the World” was published in 1988. A variety of Christian groups in countries of Central America cooperated. The signatories, from different denominations and backgrounds, included laypeople, members of religious orders, Protestant pastors, Catholic priests and three bishops. Some North Americans living and working in Central America also signed, but because of the controversial content the names of most of the participants from El Salvador, Guatemala and Honduras were omitted in order to protect them. Other countries represented included Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, Mexico and Belize. The document consisted of three parts. The first described “the reality we live in”, reflecting on life and specifically on geopolitical presence in Central America. The second part was an attempt at “seeing this historic hour in Central America from a perspective of faith”: signs of the kingdom and of the anti-kingdom were discerned, in what was described as constituting a kairos, posing concrete challenges and calling for specific responses. In the final part, on “acting today”, different audiences were challenged directly, including the ecumenical church, Latin American communities, the United States government, Latin American governments, the United Nations, multilateral organizations, churches and Christians worldwide, all in the name of the urgent need for “a new order with justice and peace”.

During 1989, on the occasion of the tenth anniversary of the triumph of the Sandinista revolution in Nicaragua, “The Road to Damascus: Kairos and Conversion” was issued as a joint effort by people in Africa, Central America and Asia, following a two-year process of reflection and consultation. The signatories included people from Korea, the Philippines, Namibia, South Africa, El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua. In spite of the difficulties of communication and geographical distance, the preamble claimed that hundreds of people had been involved in the preparation and that thousands to whom it had been circulated agreed to sign it. Although this document also contained social and historical analysis, the main focus was on a struggle perceived within churches, between “two antagonistic forms of Christianity”. What they had in common was “not only a situation of violent political conflict, but also the phenomenon of Christians on both sides of the conflict”. The one form was seen as a deep commitment to the liberation of the poor. The other, different according to context, was seen as seeking to use church and theology to protect and serve the interests of the rich and powerful. The document’s four chapters laid bare the historical and political roots of the conflict; affirmed the faith of poor and oppressed Christians; condemned the sins of those who oppress, exploit, persecute and kill people; and called to conversion those who have strayed from the truth of Christian faith and commitment. The term “conversion” in the title, therefore, refers to a need for continuous conversion on the part of the signatories, but even more to the conversion of those who use Christian faith to sanction the evils of injustice. The sense of historical urgency in the original South African Kairos document is again present: “The time for us has come to take a stand and to speak out.”

Already in the late 1980s many individuals and groups in the USA were asking whether it was time for a Kairos USA document, and initiatives through a number of networks led to many consultations, drafts and publications. In 1989 conferences at Kirkridge, Pennsylvania, and Minneapolis, Minnesota, attempted “to discern the signs of the times” characteristic of their situation. An important question was whether there was a need for confession of their historical complicity in “ruptures of the social good”. The multiple and even contradictory agendas of diverse groups in the USA raised the question whether a single Kairos document would indeed be possible and meaningful. The anniversary in 1992 of the arrival of Columbus became the occasion for intense discussion of a 1992/Kairos USA. As many as 500 groups were participating in grassroots theological discussion, in local congregations, denominational and ecumenical bodies, and especially among movements for justice and peace. Both internal conflicts, like racism, and international policies and conflicts further fuelled these initiatives to “repent, remember, renew”. A racially, ethnically and geographically diverse steering committee issued a “Call to the Work of Re-penance”, urging discernment of the Kairos. A draft was discussed at a gathering of Kairos participants in Washington, DC, in 1993, where the theme of Jubilee came to the fore. A final document, “On the Way: From Kairos to Jubilee”, was published at Pentecost 1994.

In 1995, at a celebration of the tenth anniversary of the South African Kairos document in Chicago, with people from the Netherlands and the WCC, Geneva, also present, the issue of land was added and the theme of “Jubilee justice” developed, which led to a new statement of purpose, “Jubilee Justice – Free the Land”. This became the focus of an international network of groups and meetings, until a new mission statement was adopted in 1999.

Similar processes were taking place in Europe, through a grassroots network of justice initiatives, cooperating with social movements, churches, trade unions, and NGOs in and outside Europe, called Kairos Europa. In 1992, after five days in Strasbourg, 800 people, calling themselves “Parliament of Peoples”, agreed on a Kairos declaration for Europe, also addressed to the European Parliament, claiming: “We do not accept this Europe, it is destroying us and our future! We do not accept this economy, it is plundering our planet! We do not accept politicians, who despise the people they are supposed to serve. No to a Fortress Europe perpetuating the old colonial claims to domination. Yes to a Europe of justice with borders open to all continents as part of a humane society worldwide!”

There have been many foci in this complex alliance-building process, but resistance against what is called neo-liberal globalization started to play a crucial role. A European Kairos document was published in 1998, calling for a socially just, life-sustaining and democratic Europe. It consisted of two parts. The first “saw the truth of the situation”, “recognized the causes”, “made a judgment with our hearts and minds”, and finally offered alternatives for “acting together”, which included resistance through boycotts, designing a new vision, developing small-scale alternatives at local and regional levels, and building alliances to push for the political regaining control of transnational capital. In the second part, the focus is on churches and theology, including criticism of superficial reconciliation in church theology and a call for prophetic theology. An open letter is offered in summary.

Through the campaign starting from the United Kingdom called Jubilee 2000, the concept of a Jubilee was popularized throughout Europe. Soon calls were made for moving “beyond Jubilee 2000”. The Kairos 2000 project declared 1999 a year of reflection for liberation, 2000 a year of action for liberation and 2001 a time of liberation. The purpose was “to build alliances for liberating people from the stranglehold of the globalized deregulated economy and its culture of competition, by developing concrete alternatives in a double strategy, strengthening local economies, communities and a new spirituality of solidarity, resistance and identity among people, as well as promoting proposals for politically re-regulating the economy at all levels according to more social, ecological and democratic criteria”.

In post-independent Africa kairos theology has also found expression. Shortly before the WCC’s eighth assembly in Harare, Zimbabwe, in 1998, a group of Zimbabwean Christians published a Zimbabwean Kairos document, denouncing “poverty, ill-health, bad governance, corruption, fear and hopelessness” in their country. The document, in preparation since 1996, was produced by the Ecumenical Support Services. It explicitly employed the methodology of the South African Kairos document, arguing that the Zimbabwean nation “had been plunged into a political, economic, and above all moral crisis shaking its very foundation”. It particularly criticized the ruling ZANU (PF) party of President Robert Mugabe, claiming that “despite our hopes and expectations (at independence and the end of white minority rule) in 1980, today we find new black political and economic elites within the same structures”. The churches were also criticized, since “while some have constantly challenged injustice, both before and after independence, many have failed to educate their members about abuses of power by authorities”. The Zimbabwean Kairos document responded not only to the political situation, but also to the economic system and the marginalization and poverty it caused. It was intended “to encourage debate among Christians and as a guideline for those who want to engage in prophetic action”.

During the eighth assembly itself a plenary session dealt with “ubuntu and the African kairos”. Ubuntu refers to an African sense of belonging and sharing and finding identity in being with and for others. Well-known African ecumenical theologians Barney Pityana (South Africa) and Mercy Oduyoye (Nigeria) gave introductions, linking the lived experience of African believers with the global context. Oduyoye concluded her presentation with a prayer-like “call to conversion and commitment”. The session ended with a liturgical act of “commitment to a journey of hope” by all Africans “from the continent and diaspora” to work for a better Africa, saying “never again” to the many forms of suffering and humiliation that the continent’s people have known, and joining in an act of “covenant with God”. The assembly was called to accompany them on their journey of hope and the delegates sang Nkosi Zikilela Africa as a symbol of mutual ecumenical solidarity.

All these documents and initiatives share characteristics, based on a common methodology which is often described as kairos theology.

It always begins from a sense of extreme urgency, irrespective of the deep differences between contexts and the diverse foci of the analyses of causes and consequences. It is always described as an either/or situation. The moment is decisive. The stakes are immeasurably high. They concern matters of life and death. Neutrality is no longer possible. One must be for or against. Everyone should be challenged to make this choice, to take an option. Prophetic action is called for.

All the documents and initiatives claim to be the result of group processes, over a long period of time, and representing the masses or popular, grassroots movements. They are never official, institutional documents, commissioned by authoritative bodies. The signers always claim to represent a wide variety of faith convictions, church memberships, races, classes, colours and degrees of learning.

Although in different ways, they all begin by analyzing a particular situation in the present, using diverse forms and tools of social analysis, whether concentrating on violence, exploitation, injustice, oppression, exclusion, class struggles or corruption, and regard theological reflection as a second-order activity, preceded by active engagement with and commitment to poor, suffering, oppressed and marginalized people.

All these documents take the role of churches in these historical struggles very seriously, often by being very critical, challenging others and calling them to conversion and radical change; but mostly they are self-critical and aware of their own complicity in the historical development of the evils, injustices and spirals of violence.

They all prophetically dare to name a concrete historical enemy and to locate the major causes of destruction in their respective contexts. Attempts to unmask contemporary forms of idolatry are common.

They all affirm hope, historical and social hope for those often without hope, as a major contribution of the gospel, and conclude with often detailed and specific calls for a variety of practical steps and actions, always controversial and challenging.

D. J. SMIT

- R. Hinz, K. Lefringhausen & J. Schroer eds, Das “Damaskus Dokument” – Stimmen zu einer ökumenischen Anfrage der Armen an die Reichen, Stuttgart, Dienste in Übersee, 1993 ■ R. McAfee Brown, ed., Kairos: Three Prophetic Challenges to the Church, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1990.

KING, MARTIN LUTHER, Jr

B. 15 Jan. 1929, Atlanta, GA, USA; d. 4 April 1968, Memphis, TN. A leader in the mass civil rights movement in the USA from the mid-1950s until his assassination, King won the Nobel peace prize in 1964 for his leadership in applying principles of non-violent resistance to the struggle for racial equality. Educated at Morehouse College, Crozer Theological Seminary and Boston University (PhD 1955), in 1954 he became pastor of Drexler Avenue Baptist Church, Montgomery, AL, and in 1959 co-pastor with his father of Ebenezer Baptist Church, Atlanta. Involved in the struggle over segregation on buses in Montgomery, in 1955 he organized a boycott by blacks which lasted more than a year. It inspired opposition to discrimination, which resulted in an order of the supreme court imposing desegregation on Alabama public transportation. He organized the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, was the leading figure in the march on Washington in 1963, which led to the 1964-65 civil rights acts, and was active in voter registration drives. He arranged further demonstrations in Florida, Alabama, Mississippi and elsewhere. Much influenced by the thinking of Gandhi, he was also committed to the belief that the reconciliation of the black to the white population was as important as that of the whites to the blacks. His success was more marked in the South than in the North, where the black church was less well organized and less discrimination existed. He urged settlement of the Vietnam conflict and admission of China to the United Nations.

He was invited to give the opening sermon at the WCC's Uppsala assembly in 1968, and the reference in the assembly message to "the shock of assassinations" recalls his tragic death three months before the meeting. The WCC established a Martin Luther King memorial fund for reconciliation, rehabilitation and relief, and invited national and regional councils of churches throughout the world to subscribe to a project of the Mississippi Delta Ministry, set up by the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ T. Branch, Parting the Waters, New York, Simon & Schuster, 1988 ■ D. Garrow, Bearing the Cross, New York, Morrow, 1986 ■ M.L. King, Stride toward Freedom, New York, Harper & Row, 1958 ■ M.L. King, Strength to Love, New York, Harper & Row, 1963 ■ M.L. King, Where Do We Go from Here?, New York, Harper & Row, 1967.

KINGDOM OF GOD

THE ECUMENICAL movement inherited conflicting historical understandings of the concept "kingdom of God". When the early church's imminent hope waned, chiliasm (Tertullian, Irenaeus) and spiritualization (Clement, Origen) helped the church to bear with persecution. After Constantine, it became a political category, almost identical with the earthly rule of the sacrum imperium, establishing the peace of God within human history (Eusebius). In Augustine's distinction between civitas Dei and civitas terrena as ideal types, an identification of the kingdom either with the church's rule over society or with a Christian emperor's political rule was rejected. Soon, however, these ideal types were exchanged for identifications of the earthly state with the civitas terrena and the institutional church with the civitas Dei, with the resulting power struggles of the middle ages between regnum and sacerdotium, including a loss of the kingdom's eschatological aspect. To settle this struggle, the Western church distinguished between emperor (potestas) and pope (auctoritas), both instituted by God, to lead the christianitas, the society of church-and-state, to the kingdom, but soon the church claimed identity with the kingdom (Gregory VII, Innocent III, Boniface VIII) against the emperor's religious claims. Repeatedly, interpretations were given critical of these identifications of the kingdom of God with church and/or state (e.g., by Joachim of Fiore, the Franciscans, mystics, also philosophers, Dante).

Luther spoke of two realms to criticize the claims of the papal church and to see earthly government as autonomous, yet ac-ording to God's will. Again, implications and variations included diverse attempts to realize the kingdom immediately in either church or society. Well known was Thomas Münzer's radical political interpretation, with the imminent kingdom to be brought about by divinely elected instruments through struggle against oppression from the side of the official church, spurred on by the certainty of God's own final victory. Calvinists sought to erect a theocratic society wherein individuals played an active part under God. Catholic theology often identified church and kingdom. After the Enlightenment new interpretations became popular: pietism, linking the coming of the kingdom with individual faith and the winning of souls; utopian visions of a secular kingdom (Thomas More, Campanella, but also Marxism), expecting a final state of consummation; religious perversions like Nazi Germany's propaganda; philosophical notions of a realm of ideal human relations on earth, with ideas of development, evolution and material prosperity (Hobbes, Herder, Lessing, Fichte; also Kant, Schleiermacher, Ritschl). Important was the motivation of the kingdom in the social gospel, a practical kingdom theology (Walter Rauschenbusch), and religious socialism (Ragaz, the Blumhardts).

Ecumenism inherited all these occurring tensions: between present and future aspects, between different concepts of power* or rule, between the kingdom and the church, between socio-political and individual interpretations, between views that the kingdom is completely a gift of grace* and that human beings participate in its coming, between gift and responsibility or hope and action, between salvation history* and world history. In the 20th century, important shifts took place: Western theology witnessed a re-discovery of the eschatological dimension, influenced especially by biblical scholarship in German Protestantism, where Johannes Weiss, followed by Albert Schweitzer, rejected the dominant ethical notion of a kingdom to be built.

In ecumenical circles, the concept, although undefined, played a major role in several contexts. Generalizing, one can say that the notion of the kingdom as an ideal society, characterized by equality, justice and freedom, has gradually been accepted. Socio-ethical implications, and conclusions critical of church structures and its life and worship, are often drawn.

Already at Edinburgh (1910), Sloane Coffin, from the social-gospel tradition, said: "Christianity's... ethical ideal is the kingdom of God – a redeemed social order under the reign of the Christlike God in which every relationship is Christlike, and each individual and social group – the family, the trade-organization, the state – comes not to be ministered unto, but to minister, is perfect... and the whole of human society incarnates the love of God once embodied in Jesus of Nazareth." This vision led to controversy. Again, for example at Stockholm (1925), the theological debate of the day between this (evolutionary, ethical) Anglo-Saxon view and (eschatological, a-political) European views was reflected, and in the early ecumenical movement these differences continued.

The WCC Humanum Studies* (1969-75) can serve as a typical illustration of the growing use of the concept of the kingdom of God in ecumenical documents. Without definition, it is used to criticize the present state of affairs in church and society, in that full community between human beings is not practised and that "churches are in open and hidden alliance with various exploitative kingdoms of men". Similar use of the concept is made in other places: "Christ – the hope of the world" (Evanston 1954); studies on the community of men and women; several discussions of the eucharist as "paradigm of the kingdom"; etc. More explicit discussions of the concept appeared in the study "Giving Account of the Hope That Is within Us" (Faith and Order: Accra 1974, Bangalore 1978) and the 1977 Chiang Mai papers Faith in the Midst of Faiths.

A major occasion was the Melbourne world conference on mission and evangelism (1980). "Our theme, 'Your Kingdom Come', has been at the heart of the missionary movement throughout Christian history, and not least in this century" (Philip Potter). The sections discussed good news to the poor,* the kingdom of God and human struggles, the church witnesses to the kingdom, and Christ – crucified and risen – challenges human power. Special emphasis was attached to a vision of the kingdom in which “the gospel is meant for the poor, and Christians and the church must be involved in all the struggles of history, resisting the oppressive realities and oppressive forces of the anti-kingdom”.

Another important context is the F&O study on “The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community”, focusing on “the church as mystery and prophetic sign”. The concept plays a major role, as “church” and “human community” are related within the broader perspective of the kingdom (Limouris, 58ff.; F&O minutes Madrid 1987, 16-30). Careful distinctions are made in attempts to avoid the misunderstandings inherited from the conflictual history.

In 20th-century Catholicism, the concept has functioned, for example, in Vatican II’s Lumen Gentium (e.g., 3,9,35ff.) and Gaudium et Spes (e.g., 39,72), and in theologies of liberation. During Vatican II,* in spite of some formulations to the contrary, the results of biblical investigations came to the fore. In theologies of liberation, the kingdom serves as central paradigm for the human condition, where all people will participate in God’s total salvation* as subjects in freedom, equality and justice; a salvation of which the church must provisionally be an active sign and promise in the divinely qualified kairos of the present situations of death. Discipleship in this kingdom consists in following Jesus’ option for the poor in concrete praxis and prophetic criticism. Although the final realization of the kingdom remains God’s gift, so that the “eschatological proviso” must remain as a critical instance against all partial realizations, human beings are nevertheless liberated to participate actively in establishing at least signs of the kingdom.

From the perspective of the Orthodox, several other questions are related to the theme of the kingdom of God, specifically, how the salvation history of Jesus Christ (the same yesterday, today and forever, Heb. 13:8) is actualized in the life of the church, and what concept of history – time and space – undergirds the vision of the ecumenical movement. The Orthodox tradition underscores the doctrine that not only justification but also glorification (theosis – the transformation by divine uncreated energies) begins in this life. It is not only the life and ministry of Jesus that are eschatological, but in his cross and resurrection the new rule (basileia) has come into history. This rule affects not only mystical experience and liturgical life but also the institutional character of the church. The church is not a mere copy of society; its historical structures, offices and decisions should be constantly judged by what the reign of God calls us to be: glorified in Christ. Without such an eschatological vision the ecumenical movement will deteriorate into an ephemeral secular affair. Some are doubtful whether “such an eschatological vision marks the ecumenical movement in its entirety and in a decisive way” (Metropolitan John Zizioulas). According to the Orthodox, there must be a real correspondence in the life of the church between the vision of the reign of God and the permanent invocation of the Holy Spirit (epiclesis*). The identity between the manifestation of the Holy Spirit and the basileia is the key to keeping alive the eschatological vision in ecumenical spirituality.

See also church and state, eschatology.

D.J. SMIT

- G.H. Anderson ed., Witnessing to the Kingdom: Melbourne and Beyond, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1982
- E. Castro, Freedom in Mission: The Perspective of the Kingdom of God: An Ecumenical Inquiry, WCC, 1985
- Church and World, WCC, 1990
- M. Dhavamony, God’s Kingdom and Mission – Le royaume de Dieu et la mission, Rome, Pontifical Gregorian Univ., 1997
- G. Limouris ed., Church, Kingdom, World: The Church as Mystery and Prophetic Sign, WCC, 1986
- G. Wainwright, Eucharist and Eschatology, London, Epworth, 1971
- John Zizioulas, “History and Eschatology”, in Whither Ecumenism?, T. Wieser ed., WCC, 1986.

KOINONIA

IT IS NOTEWORTHY that from its inception the Faith and Order* commission has perceived the essential nature of the church* as koinonia. The 1927 conference in Lausanne referred to the “communion of believers in Christ Jesus” (sec. 3.17-18) and described this unity* without, however, making use of the term “koinonia”. But it was at the centre of discussions at Edinburgh in 1937 on the “communion of saints” (4.52,54,56-58,61; 5.69), and again at Lund in 1952 (1.26-30).

The Evanston assembly of 1954 was indebted to the F&O commission for the following declaration: "Thus the fellowship (koinonia) that the members of the church have is not simply human fellowship; it is fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit and fellowship with the saints, in the church triumphant" (report, B.8).

The report of the section on unity produced by the assembly at New Delhi (1961) offers further elucidation: "The word 'fellowship' (koinonia) has been chosen because it describes what the church truly is. 'Fellowship' clearly implies that the church is not merely an institution or organization. It is a fellowship of those who are called together by the Holy Spirit and in baptism confess Christ as Lord and Saviour. They are thus 'fully committed' to him and to one another" (para. 10).

Section 2 (paras 3-7) of the Nairobi (1975) report depicted "conciliar fellowship" in terms of the Triune God (see Trinity) drawing Christians together, in all their diversity, into a communion in the Spirit around the eucharistic presence of the Lord. It is clear that the notion of koinonia has emerged as one of the motivating ideas of the ecumenical movement in this century; it has thus not been by chance that since Lima (1982) the F&O commission has directed a great deal of its attention to this theme. The theme of the fifth world conference of F&O (Santiago 1993) was "Towards Koinonia in Faith, Life and Witness" and its report was entitled On the Way to Fuller Koinonia.

The concept of koinonia has also come to the fore in several of the bilateral discussions. Often, as in the case of ARCIC I (see Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue), it has arisen in the course of clarifying points of Catholic theology and studying the texts of Vatican II* rather than directly from the work of F&O. Another example is the Munich document involving the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox churches; in it koinonia was quite literally the centre around which the whole document was constructed (see 2.1-4, in which the word appears over two dozen times). The theme is equally prominent in the Moscow statement (1976) which followed the Anglican-Orthodox conversations.

The introduction to the final report (1981) of ARCIC I affirmed that reference to koinonia is fundamental to all reflection on the nature of the church and that, in consequence, it is the base on which the whole report rests. The report then proceeded to demonstrate how the eucharist,* episcopacy (see episcopacy) and primacy* are all to be understood in terms of koinonia. Koinonia was also given a predominant place by the 1986 Nairobi report of the Roman Catholic-Methodist International Commission, Towards a Statement on the Church. Here there was an endeavour to define the term, which was seen to represent a reality and an experience transcending all other models of union as their origin and goal. There are several references to koinonia in the opening phase of the conversations between the Disciples of Christ and the Roman Catholics (see the 1981 report, secs 6-7), where "fellowship" is used to translate koinonia.

In the 1977 final report of the Reformed-Roman Catholic conversations, The Presence of Christ in Church and World, both koinonia and communio are used in order to emphasize a dual affinity that comes to expression in the eucharist, i.e. the believers' relationship with the Lord himself and with his other followers. The Anglican-Lutheran Pullach report (1972) also interprets koinonia in the same sense of "fellowship".

The ecumenical revival of koinonia is without doubt significant in the sphere of ecclesiology. It is illuminating to observe that the Roman Catholic Church's reconsiderations of ecclesial doctrine at Vatican II were based on the ecclesiology of communio (see Lumen Gentium 7,9,13,15,18,50, etc.). The encyclical letter Ut Unum Sint* (1995) is the latest illustration of this influence. Koinonia functions as a leading theme if not the fundamental concept in the major post-Santiago project of F&O on ecclesiology (interim report, The Nature and Purpose of the Church, 1998).

THE DATA OF REVELATION

The word "koinonia" is found fairly often within the apostolic writings (Acts 2:42; Rom. 15:26; 1 Cor. 1:9, 10:16; 2 Cor. 6:14, 8:4, 9:13, 13:13; Gal. 2:9; Phil. 1:5, 2:1, 3:10; Philemon 6; Heb. 13:16; 1 John 1:3,6-7). It does not occur in the gospel narratives and is never explicitly used as a synonym of ecclesia. Sometimes it may have no religious significance (as in Rom. 15:16; 2 Cor. 8:4), which is also true of other expressions with the same root.

But we should not be bound by any limitation requiring the use of the actual word “koinonia”, for the concept is recurrent throughout the New Testament, implicit in such terms as covenant,* unity, participation* and sharing, and in images such as vine, temple, Body of Christ, spouse and others (see images of the church).

The Christian community sees an objective reality which is bestowed by God upon all who accept the gospel: God gives the Holy Spirit,* object of the promise (Rom. 5:5, 8:15-17; Gal. 4:6; Acts 2:33,38, 10:44-47, 11:15; John 7:39, 16:7, 20:22; Eph. 1:13, 2:22, 4:30; 1 Pet. 1:2). This Spirit of the “last days” is, on several counts, a gift of communion.* It is linked to the pardon which restores the communion desired by the Creator. It harks back to what Ezekiel described as an interior principle of obedience to the law by a purified Israel once again gathered together in its own land (Ezek. 11:19, 36:26-28, 37:14, 39:29; cf. Jer. 31:31). In Christ this gift acquires a hitherto unsuspected depth. It changes the meaning of our human destiny.

The reality which establishes this koinonia belongs to the mystery of the living God.* For Paul, our koinonia is with the Son of God (1 Cor. 1:9), the one and only Lord (8:6). It has its “sacramental abode” in the communal sharing of the cup and of the one and only broken bread, which is a participation in the blood and the Body of Christ in association with his sacrifice (10:14-22). If it leads to an association with Christ’s victory (15:12-28; cf. 1 Thess. 4:14-18), it does so by way of real communion with his sufferings (Phil. 3:10 and, without the word “koinonia”, 2 Cor. 4:10; Gal. 6:17). In order to explain this union Paul writes: “It is no longer I who live, but it is Christ who lives in me” (Gal. 2:20; cf. Phil. 1:21).

According to Paul, this is the richness of the divine gift. In taking hold of people, it draws them into what the letter to the Romans calls adoptive sonship: without resort to the term “koinonia”, the passage abounds in phrases depicting this intimate relationship to Christ and to God (Rom. 8:15-17). The participation of believers in Christ’s relationship to his Father results from koinonia of and in the Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14; Phil. 2:1). It does not distort Paul’s intuition to say that koinonia represents the sure substance of God’s gospel; it is God’s work, his gift (see Gal. 4:7; cf. Rom. 1:1, 15:16).

The beneficiaries of this gift are among themselves in a “state of koinonia”. The expression is used to describe their association in the faith* (Phil. 1:5-6), the sufferings endured for the gospel and the consolation given by God (2 Cor. 1:7). More precisely, from now on both Jews and pagans are synkoinōnoi (partners together) because the pagans are to share in the richness which has its “root” in Israel (Rom. 11:17, cf. 4:16; Gal. 3:26-29). The image of the body stresses the bond uniting to Christ and to one another all those who are quickened by the “one and same Spirit” (cf. 1 Cor. 12:11-14; Rom. 12:4-5; Gal. 3:26-29). Unity and diversity are both proclaimed. The latter appears in the multiplicity of ministries and responsibilities (1 Cor. 12:4-6,27-31), in the wide range of social conditions (12:13) and in the different rootage in the divine plan and covenant (12:13). There is no question of a simple addition of persons or of a fusion into a tertium quid which would eliminate all differences. Out of a diversity which continues to manifest its richness, the indivisible reality of the Spirit brings forth a unity of immeasurable depth.

In directing attention to the association of the gentiles with privileges conferred on the Jews, the letter to the Ephesians (which makes no use of the word “koinonia”) develops a Pauline thought (Eph. 2:11-22, 3:4-6). Communion is not to be limited to the personal relationship of each believer with Christ and his Father; it also involves the reuniting in Christ of the two sections of humanity. The breaking down of the wall of division means that from henceforth “the others” participate in what had been set aside for Israel until the cross. The frequent use of terms prefixed with some form of syn- (“with”) – synklēronomoi (inheritors together), syssōmos (a body together), symmetochoi (participating together) and sympoli- tai (citizens together) – clearly points to the reality of koinonia. And this reality is the church (2:19-22, 3:10).

The first letter of John employs “koinonia” in order to signify in one word the simultaneous union of Christians with the Father and the Son and among themselves (1 John 1:3, 6-7). Similarly, although without making use of “koinonia”, John’s gospel speaks of the disciples’ “being-one” and of this state of oneness finding its source in the “being-one” of the Father and the Son “before the world existed” (John 17:5). The disciples are meant to be one just as (kathōs) the Father and the Son are one. The word kathōs does not imply merely similarity but includes the notion that Christians are taken up into the divine relationship which is the ground of their unity. This relationship is a profound one which not only embraces communion in the Son’s mission (17:18) but extends also to the participation in his state of glory (v.24). The Johannine tradition never states that koinonia or “being-one” constitutes the church, but these phrases sum up what it is to “gather into one the dispersed children of God” (11:52), and they correspond to what the image of the true vine seeks to convey. The community of disciples is far more than the sum of its members.

Koinonia must express itself in a relationship of fraternal communion. This intuition is the basis of Paul’s insistence on an authentic agape, which translates in terms of human conduct the meaning of communion with Christ. Or, as the author of the letter to the Hebrews describes it, communion with Christ passes over into human communion, in flesh and blood (Heb. 2:14). Once again it is clear that the reality conveyed by koinonia may be equally well conveyed by other expressions: it is only necessary to read 1 John 3:16-17 and all the passages on agape.

Paul’s line of thought is particularly revealing when he was occupied with the collection for the church in Jerusalem. Recalling his meeting with James, Cephas and John (Gal. 2:1-10), he remarked that they had extended to him the hand of koinonia, thus confirming the unity of the mission* to both pagans and circumcised. Here the koinonia thus sealed is bound up with the injunction to “remember the poor” in Jerusalem (2:10). The way in which Paul repeats and develops this point suggests that he regards it as the concrete expression of the unity between the mother church (Jerusalem) and the gentile churches (Rom. 15:25-26; 1 Cor. 16:15-17; 2 Cor. 8:1-9,15; Acts 24:17). This is far more than a simple distribution of alms (Rom. 15:25-26). The action of sharing material goods corresponds to a call that is implied in the logic of ecclesial communion; the differences between Jews and gentile, rich and poor are transformed into agape.

In Acts the summary descriptions of the church at Pentecost are concerned to show the interior unity of a single community (Acts 2:42-47, 4:32-35, 5:12-16). The word “koinonia” and the expression hapanta koina (everything in common, 2:44, 4:32) are employed in a cluster of expressions to describe the many facets of communion. To list some of these phrases is illuminating: they were together (Acts 2:44,47), of one heart and one spirit (4:32), devoted to the apostles’ teaching and to the temple (2:42,46), holding everything in common (2:44, 4:32), sharing the proceeds from the sale of their possessions according to the needs of each (2:45, 4:34-35), faithful in the breaking of bread and in prayer (2:42), safeguarding the koinonia (2:42). With the restored unity of language as its sign (2:6-11), the church is born by the fire of the Spirit, not simply as a society but as a communion. At once palpable and deeply hidden, this communion seeks willing hearts prepared to take such practical steps as the sharing of possessions, even to the point of privation. In this context koinonia (2:42) discloses its real meaning, about which exegetes continue to debate. However, one thing is certain: koinonia means more than table fellowship; nor is it simply interior harmony. Rather, it also actively engages people in a communal sharing, the sign of spiritual unanimity expressed within the fabric of daily social life. The terms used in the “summaries”, for their true meaning to be understood, must imply a communion in the Lord’s own generosity, which may extend when necessary to following him in the total gift of self. This is what Luke stresses in his first book (Luke 14:26-27,33, cf. 12:13-34, 16:1-13, 18:1-30), and probably a similar meaning should be given to koinonia in Heb. 13:16.

The scriptures never provide a precise definition of the church (local or universal). Nevertheless, some texts like 1 Cor. 12:11-28, Col. 1:24 and Eph. 1:22-23 reveal that there was present right from the beginning the awareness of something profound which transcended all of its members and which was established by the binding together of Christians to God and to one another. When 1 Pet. 2:4-10 applies the titles of the qahal (assembly) of the old covenant to the church, it transforms the latter into the long-awaited communion between God and his people. Thus, in koinonia is expressed the most profound and all-embracing reality which founds and establishes the ekklēsia tou theou, church of God. The church of God is given to participate in the life of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit and to manifest this participation in a fraternal koinonia. The ministries, too, are held in this embrace.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE FATHERS

The Tradition of the early centuries attaches great importance to the reality of koinonia, usually translated in Latin by communio or communicatio.

The bold identification of God's plan with communio was suggested by Irenaeus at an early date. If the mission of the Son brought him into a close communio with humanity, this was in order that our communio with God in adoptive sonship might be complete (Against Heresies 3.18.7, 5.1.1, 5.14.2). Again, if Christ poured out the Spirit of the Father, this was to bring about a true and effective union and communio of God and humankind (5.1.1). Thus, the eucharist, in which we in our human bodily state communicate in the risen state of the Lord, is essential (4.18.5, 5.2.2-3). Our whole being must express this communio (5.1.1). This view of salvation as koinonia runs through the whole of Tradition and is found in the West, e.g. in Thomas Aquinas (Against Gentiles 4.54-55, etc.), and in the East in Nicholas Cabasilas (Commentary on the Divine Liturgy 26.4, 36.1, 49.29; Explanation of Rites 12).

There was a similar conviction with regard to the bond between eucharist and church. Writers in the early centuries linked 1 Cor. 10:16-22, 12:27 and Eph. 1:22-23 and reasoned that the eucharist "makes" the church. At the dawn of Tradition, Ignatius of Antioch clearly affirmed that the eucharist is the food of the unity that was won on the cross, for "it gathers together all holy and faithful people both Jews and gentiles into the unique Body which is the church" (Letters to the Smyrnaeans 1.2, to the Magnesians 8.1-2, to the Philadelphians 4). This unity is of such importance that where division is found, God is not present (Letter to the Philadelphians 8.1), and the eucharist ratifies the presence of unity only when it is received in unity. The guarantee of unity lies in communion in the one and only faith, gathered around the bishops with his presbyterium and the deacons (Letters to the Philadelphians 4, to the Smyrnaeans 7.2, 9.1). It is the divine will that "you unite in one and the same faith and in Jesus Christ... obeying the bishop and the presbyterium, living in harmony, breaking the one bread, the medicine of immortality" (Letter to the Ephesians 20.2). The eucharist is woven into the very fabric of the communion that it establishes.

Very early the Didache (9.4) made the connection between the one bread and the "assembling of the church". Cyprian wrote on the same theme in more explicit terms (Letters 63.1-4, 69.5.2) and Hilary of Poitiers took it up (On the Trinity 8.12.13, 8.16); then liturgies began to incorporate it in the realization that it encapsulated the fruits of the Spirit invoked at the epiclesis* or proclaimed by the post-communion prayers. Several rites such as the fermentum and the commixtio draw attention to the importance of this association.

Since the documentation is extensive, this discussion will have to remain focused on those fathers whose reflections on this subject are the most fully developed. The most compelling among them is, without doubt, John Chrysostom (above all in Homily 24 on Cor. and Homily 48 on John): "We are this body... not several bodies, but one single body." In a penetrating passage he insists on the indivisible bond uniting the eucharistic body and the koinonia of the afflicted members of the Body of Christ (Homily on Mat. 50.2-4). Theodore of Mopsoestia is among the most forceful in proclaiming the unifying power of the eucharist (Homily 15, no. 1 on the Mass, 40; Homily 16, no. 2 on the Mass, 24). Cyril of Alexandria chose realistic language in order to make clear that in the eucharistic koinonia all, with their individual peculiarities, are formed into a single body, the ecclesial Body of Christ (Against Nestorius 4.4-5; Commentary on John 11.11, ed. Pusey 735ff.; On the Trinity 1).

A place must be reserved here for Augustine; he is the master. In his most important writings on the subject (esp. Sermons 71,112,131,227,272; Denis 6; Guelferbytanus 7; Treatises on John 25,26), he explains how the sacramental body and the ecclesial body comprising all communicants are one and the same: "It is to what you are that you respond Amen" (Sermon 272); "it is the sacrament of our unity that you behold" (Guelferbytanus 7); "it is the Lord alone who bears us all within himself... receive what you are" (Sermon 272). However, to receive truly one must already be in unity. This unity is nothing less than the communio between Father and Son into which believers are, in the love of God, introduced by the Holy Spirit (Sermon 71,12,18). In order to receive the Lord's body, it is necessary to be part of it, most importantly by faith: "It is not what we see but what we believe that nourishes us" (Sermon 112.4); "believe, and you have eaten" (Treatises on John 25.12). No communio without eucharist, no eucharist without communio.

Towards the end of the patristic age John of Damascus summarized the position held in both East and West in a passage that has frequent recourse to the terms "koinonia" and the related verb koinōnein (On Orthodoxy 4.13; PG 94.1153). Other writings from all the early Christian traditions which make use of koinonia and communio to signify the act of reception in the eucharist do so only within an ecclesial context.

It was soon understood that to participate (koinōnein) at the same eucharistic table was to belong to the koinonia or communio which is the church. The next step was to regard exclusion from koinonia as severance from the church, as is clearly stated by Cyprian in Letters 55.6, 69.6, 75.14, and this expression came into common use. To be in the church is to be in koinonia (communio) and vice versa.

Tertullian insisted on the communio of each local church with the apostolic churches (On the Prescription of Heretics 21.7, 38.2), and he thereby gave to communio all of its ecclesiological dimensions. This overtone comes through at least implicitly in the majority of texts which identify "being in koinonia" (or communio) with "being in the church". To be in koinonia, to maintain communio, goes further than belonging to the local eucharistic assembly; it involves a close relationship with the whole multitude of churches. No one has expressed this idea more poignantly than Augustine: "As for me, I am in the church, which has for its members all the churches born and established thanks to the labour of the apostles, and all of them together noted down in the canonical writings. With the help which the Lord gives to me, I shall never abandon their communio, neither in Africa nor anywhere else. If in this communio there are traitors of any kind, show them to me" (Against Cresconius 3.35,39). It should be noted that alongside the use of "koinonia" (communio) to denote this "being together" of all the churches, in monastic circles the term was applied to the small community inspired by Pachomius. Its members sought to live in accordance with the ideal expressed in the "summaries" in Acts, the invitation being given to "all of you to embrace the common life following the example which was given us in the apostles' time" (Letters 295). A similar ideal was set forth by Augustine in his celebrated regula. In his theological treatises, Aquinas used the distinction between communio and communicatio: the church is the communio whose cause and perpetual source is God communicating a share in his own life through the Son and the Holy Spirit.

CONCLUSION

At the end of this brief survey it should not be difficult to recognize in koinonia the deepest stratum within the church of God on earth, by means of which we are enabled to see God's fundamental gift to humanity. It is not only on the mystical level that a person who has received the Spirit is introduced into the koinonia of Father and Son; it is also on the practical level that this supreme grace takes form in a community that binds together a common faith, a fellowship of sharing and of service, a common undertaking for the sake of the gospel and common acts of divine worship. In other words, all the biblical images which serve as representatives or models of the church are intended to convey the single reality which is koinonia.

See also communion of saints.

J.-M.R. TILLARD

■ T.F. Best & G. Gassmann eds, On the Way to Fuller Koinonia: Official Report of the Fifth World Conference on Faith and Order, WCC, 1994 ■ A. Birmelé, La communion ecclésiale: progrès œcuméniques et enjeux méthodologiques, Paris, Cerf, 2000 ■ P. Bori, Koinonia: L'idea della comunione nell'ecclesiologia recente e nel Nuovo Testamento, Brescia, Paideia, 1972 ■ G.R. Evans, The Church and the Churches: Towards an Ecumenical Ecclesiology, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1994 ■ M.E. Chapman, Unity as Koinonia: The Ecclesiology of the Faith and Order Movement 1927-1933 – A Dissertation, Ann Arbor MI, UMI Dissertation Services, 1998 ■ F. Hauck, Koinōnós...”, in Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, vol. 3, 1938 ■ N. Sagovsky, Ecumenism, Christian Origins and the Practice of Communion, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 2000 ■ J.-M.R. Tillard, Eglise d'églises (ET Church of Churches), Colleville MN, Liturgical Press, 1992) ■ J.-M.R. Tillard, L'Eglise locale, Paris, Cerf, 1996 ■ J.-M.R. Tillard, Flesh of the Church, Flesh of Christ: At the Source of the Ecclesiology of Communion, Colleville MN, Liturgical Press, 2001.

KRAEMER, HENDRIK

B. 17 May 1888, Amsterdam, Netherlands; d. 11 Nov. 1965, Driebergen. Kraemer was the first director of the WCC's Ecumenical Institute in Bossey* (1948-55), advocate of the “spiritual mobilization” of laity* in the ecumenical movement (his 1958 book Theology of the Laity is a classic in the field) and one of the most influential Protestant thinkers of his time on the question of the relationship of the gospel to the great world religions and cultures.

Assisted by Suzanne de Diétrich, Kraemer taught courses at Bossey to young laypeople from many countries who had lived through the war years and were eager to take part in re-building their churches and nations. Afterwards, he was the leading figure of the institute Kerk en Wereld (“church and world”) in Driebergen, travelling and lecturing widely and rendering pastoral services to parishes in the Netherlands.

W.A. Visser 't Hooft wrote of Kraemer that his “life work has so many different aspects that anyone who desires to write about him must first select which of Kraemer's varied contributions he will discuss. There is the philologist; there is the expert on Islam; there is the leader of the spiritual resistance against National Socialism; there is the fighter for the renewal of the Netherlands Reformed Church; there is the professor of theology who is really a layman and there is the layman who asks theological questions about modern culture; there is the first director of the Ecumenical Institute who gave shape to that new adventure; and there is, of course, the missionary, or rather the missionary thinker, strategist and statesman.”

After studying Javanese at the University of Leiden and Islam at El Azhar University in Cairo, Kraemer worked for the Dutch Bible Society in Indonesia from 1922 to 1937. His experiences there convinced him that the missionary should be a guru kedewasaan – a guide to maturity. Only if “mission fields” became indigenous churches would Christians be able to relate the Christian message to their social and cultural environment and be in responsible dialogue with neighbours of other faiths.

In 1937, Kraemer, who had received an honorary doctorate from the University of Utrecht the year before, was appointed professor of sociology of religion at Leiden. Later he was interned in the concentration camp of St Michielgestel for protesting the removal of two Jewish colleagues. After the war, he was a member of the delegation of the churches of the US, UK, France, Netherlands and Switzerland which met in Stuttgart with the new Council of the Evangelical Church of Germany and issued the Stuttgart declaration* of guilt.

In preparation for its 1938 meeting in Tambaram, India, the International Missionary Council* (IMC) commissioned Kraemer to write what became his best-known book, The Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, which influenced subsequent decades of missiological thinking. Insisting on “biblical realism”, Kraemer argued that “the radical religious realism of the biblical revelation, in which all religious and moral life revolves around one point only, namely the creative and redemptive will of the living, holy, righteous God of love, the exclusive ground of nature and history, of man and the world, has to be the standard of reference". But while this "biblical realism" has been seen as an important contribution to the ecumenical vision of "the whole church with the whole gospel to the whole world", many subsequent missiologists have faulted Kraemer for over-emphasizing the exclusiveness of the Christian message and "its radical discontinuity" with other faiths, thus not doing sufficient justice to God's active presence in them (see uniqueness of Christ).

Kraemer was also a chief proponent of the plan, taken up by the IMC following its Willingen meeting (1947), of setting up regional study centres at which specialists could devote time to study, research and promotion of dialogue with representatives of living movements of thought outside the church.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ "The Church and the World of Religions and Cultures: Kraemer in Retrospect", ER, 41, 1, 1989 ■ C.F. Hallencreutz, Kraemer towards Tambaram, Lund, Gleerup, 1966 ■ A.Th. van Leeuwen, Hendrik Kraemer, Pionier der Ökumene, Basel, Basilea, 1962.

KÜNG, HANS

B. 19 March 1928, Sursee, Switzerland. Küng, a controversial and widely influential Catholic theologian, has studied at the Gregorian University and the Institut catholique at the Sorbonne in Paris (doctorate, 1957). His published dissertation on Karl Barth and justification prompted new questioning of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation positions. At the university of Tübingen from 1960, he was professor of dogmatic and ecumenical theology in the Catholic faculty and director of the Institute for Ecumenical Research. In 1961 his popular best-seller on the ecumenical necessity of the renewal of the church through the upcoming Vatican Council II* (Konzil und Wiedervereinigung, ET The Council and Reunion) was attacked by conservatives. Nevertheless, he was an official expert (peritus) for the theological commission at the Council.

His writings on the structures of the church and on infallibility generated a worldwide debate among theologians and church authorities. After censures, the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith finally declared in December 1979 that Küng could no longer be considered "a Catholic theologian", and it withdrew his canonical mission to teach Catholic theology. At Tübingen he continued to direct the Institute for Ecumenical Research until 1996.

TOM STRANSKY

■ H. Küng, Christianity and World Religions, New York, Doubleday, 1986 ■ The Church, London, Burns & Oates, 1968 ■ Global Responsibility: In Search of a New World Ethic, London, SMS, 1991 ■ Infallible? An Inquiry, London, Collins, 1971 ■ Judaism, New York, Crossroad, 1992 ■ On Being a Christian, London, Collins, 1978 ■ Theology for the Third Millennium, New York, Doubleday, 1988.

L

LABOUR

THE LABOUR movement is the product of the 19th-century industrial revolution in the West. To defend their interests and protect themselves from exploitation, those employed in the new manufacturing industries organized themselves in political parties and trade unions, thereby seeking to promote social justice and to benefit economically.

Defining the relation of the churches to this movement is complicated by geographical and confessional variations and by the difference between churches with a high proportion of working-class members and those more predominantly middle class. The influence of the latter on the labour movement has largely been indirect.

Ecumenical influence on the labour question has been very minimal. Despite such international ecumenical gatherings as the Oxford Life and Work conference (1937), relations with the labour movement have on the whole been denominational and national.

The most interesting exception to this generalization has occurred in the United States, largely because of its more cosmopolitan society and its widespread church membership. The claim that in the US "the ecumenical movement and church support for labour developed hand in hand" could hardly be applied to any European country. Across US denominational boundaries a powerful concern for social justice developed from the end of the 19th century. George McClain writes: "With the flowering of the social gospel in the 1890s, the labour question for the first time became also a religious question. Outspoken church leaders such as Vida Scudder, Washington Gladden, Richard T. Ely, George D. Heiron and Walter Rauschenbusch challenged laissez-faire economics and championed labour's right to organize."

Commitment to the social gospel waned in face of theological criticism of its too facile optimism about the possibility of establishing the kingdom of God* by human effort, and US churches as a whole retreated from any pretence of being the voice of the labour movement. The most notable personal exception was probably Reinhold Niebuhr, whose early ministry among the workers of Detroit led to his developed theological and political realism, a combination which others have been slow to emulate.

The impetus for involvement of US churches in the labour movement came from outside the ranks of working people. The picture is different in the predominantly Roman Catholic countries of Europe. For example, in Italy, France, Spain and Ireland, working people have constituted the majority of those owing some kind of allegiance to the church, but their influence has been severely restricted by the official policy of the hierarchy. Reasons include Vatican concern to retain political power and its fear of communism.

Giorgio Girardet identifies different stages in relations between the Italian state and the Roman Catholic Church: "After the crisis of 1870 when Rome was occupied by the Italian army, with subsequent prohibition for Catholics to participate in political life, in 1891 the encyclical Rerum Novarum of Pope Leo XII admitted, though paternalistically, the right of the workers to organize. From 1906 to 1914 a Democratic-Christian movement was created, prudently open to workers; and the first Catholic unions were created, without support from or against the will of a more conservatively oriented church."

After the first world war Pope Benedict XV allowed the formation of a new popular party under the inspiration of a Sicilian priest, Luigi Sturzo, who was general secretary of Catholic Social Action. It won over 100 seats in the national assembly and promised to become a leading promoter of working-class interests. However, this movement came to an abrupt end with the concordat between Mussolini and Pope Pius XI in 1929. Henceforth conservative views prevailed in the Vatican; more informal groups had to advocate social change, without official ecclesiastical support.

Although 80% of the French population is claimed as Catholic, the separation of church and state in 1905 led to the rapid secularization* of national life. But from within the church and among its working-class members, powerful voices have arisen for social justice, despite the conservative orientation of the hierarchy and the majority of its members. To quote Girardet again: "The French Catholic church has manifested from the 19th century a strong concern for what may be called the social question." The most important manifestation of this concern was the movement of worker-priests, who identified themselves with those engaged on the shop floor in industry. Beginning in 1943 with the Mission de France, the movement was terminated abruptly in 1954 by the intervention of the Vatican because of fears that it could lead to too close an alliance with the then powerful French Communist Party. Thus the Italian pattern of a hierarchy suppressing identification with working-class aspirations was repeated. Nevertheless, social witness continued through such organizations as Action catholique ouvrière and Jeunesse catholique.

In Latin America the stream of European immigration, particularly to the Atlantic coast, brought people who had been active in the labour movement in their countries of origin (esp. Italy and Spain), who introduced the trade-union movement in the incipient industrial proletariat of these countries. The churches were not paying much attention to this issue. The RCC had just produced the first declaration on the labour movement (Rerum Novarum), and the Protestant missions reflected a liberal view more interested in the entrepreneurial and educated sectors. However, the large percentage of Italian and Spanish immigrants in missionary churches in Argentina, Uruguay and Chile created a certain sympathy for the labour movement, expressed in their publications in the first two decades of the 20th century.

Since the 1930s the RCC developed Young Christian Workers. Less institutionally related to the RCC but adopting a philosophical and ideological stance based on Catholic social doctrine, the Christian democratic trade unions later organized themselves as the Latin American Confederation of Workers, with its headquarters in Caracas, Venezuela, as an alternative both to the Marxist trade-union organizations and to the Regional Inter-American Organization of Workers, which was clearly related to the US trade-union movement. Among the Protestant churches the sector related to the ecumenical urban industrial mission* has since the 1950s developed a relation to the trade unions.

The British story is very different. The working class has never been identified with the Church of England, and only a tiny minority with the Church of Scotland and the Free churches. The rise of the labour party in the early years of the 20th century and its dependence on the trade unions, with their leadership drawn from the ranks of the working class, meant that the churches have had only a peripheral relationship to these two arms of the labour movement. There are, however, qualifications to this generalization. In the 19th century the Free churches, particularly the Methodist, were the backbone of the old Liberal party, out of which the Labour party emerged and which it replaced as the main challenge to conservatism. Its early leaders included a number of Free churchmen; a case can be made for saying that the Labour party was born out of Methodism and its reaction to conservatism and the Anglican church. However, Free church influence diminished over the century, despite the involvement of prominent Free church lay leaders. Roman Catholic involvement in labour has closely paralleled that of the continental churches.

From outside the ranks of the labour movement significant voices have been raised within the Anglican church to champion the cause of the working class, most notably the Christian socialist movement of the 19th century, primarily associated with the name of Frederick Maurice. And still more significantly in the interwar years, William Temple, later to become archbishop of Canterbury, attacked conservative complacency in public utterances and in his famous paperback Christianity and Social Order. With his friend R.H. Tawney he took a leading part in the workers educational association. Tawney, an Anglican layman, was recognized during these years as the leading theoretician of the labour party, even writing its manifesto for the general election of 1929.

In so far as a generalization is possible, it may be said that only Roman Catholicism has had a hold on the working population at large. They have played a passive role, discouraged by a hierarchy entrenched in the perpetuation of its own power structures and fearful of the spread of Marxism. Such influence as other churches have exerted has largely been from middle-class origins.

In light of the marked right-wing tendency in the West following the collapse of Marxist regimes and the weakening of the trade-union movement, an underclass of the underprivileged is now emerging which comprises the unemployed, one-parent families and ethnic minorities. Churches are beginning to see their fidelity to the gospel in terms of "a bias towards the poor" (see poor), thus aligning themselves with the clear emphasis of the WCC and reflecting in a different context the liberation theology* of Latin America and the church base communities* throughout the third world. The traditional labour movement has scarcely begun to come to terms with this new agenda.

See also capitalism, socialism, work.

PAUL ROWNTREE CLIFFORD

- R. Aubert, Le christianisme social, actes du XIII congrès international des sciences historiques, Moscow, 1970, Louvain, Publications universitaires, 1972
- P.A. Carter, The Decline and Revival of the Social Gospel, Ithaca NY, Cornell UP, 1954
- M.F. Fogarty, Christian Democracy in Western Europe, 1920-1953, London, Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1957
- A. Hastings, A History of English Christianity, 1920-1985, London, Collins, 1986
- J. de Santa Ana ed., Separation without Hope, WCC, 1978
- D. Shepherd, Bias to the Poor, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1983
- L. Vischer, "The Work of Human Beings as Creatures of God", ER, 48, 3, 1996.

LACEY, JANET

B. 23 Oct. 1903, Sunderland, UK; d. 11 July 1988, UK. An ecumenical administrator, writer, dramatist and speaker, Lacey produced her first play at the age of 13 with 25 children in the local Wesleyan chapel. She studied drama and elocution at a small private drama school. As a young woman she saw poverty in the raw among the Durham miners in the strike of 1926: "I was shattered, and drama did not seem to matter any more." After training at the YWCA as a youth leader, she worked for many years with youth clubs, employing her dramatic talents to help build membership. From 1931 to 1945 she worked in a vast housing estate in Dagenham, Essex, where 200,000 artisans had been uprooted from the East End of London. Later she was secretary of the youth department of the British Council of Churches, where she encouraged youth to be aware of community responsibilities, including the quarter million refugees who had come to Britain. From 1952 to 1968 Lacey was director of Christian Aid, the inter-church aid and refugee service of the British Council of Churches. During these years she built Christian Aid into an internationally recognized organization, raising millions of pounds annually through drama, advertising, films, television, concerts in Trafalgar Square with folk singers and a variety of other innovative techniques.

For the WCC's Evanston assembly (1954), Lacey wrote a drama called By the Waters of Babylon: the play was later published in Britain and performed in churches all over the country. For New Delhi (1961), she produced a film for the interchurch aid presentation. From 1961 to 1968 she was vice-chairperson of the WCC's Division of Inter-church Aid, Refugee and World Service. She was what she called the "token female" president for the world conference on Church and Society in Geneva, 1966. Again acting as impresario, she arranged for director Patrick Garland to write and produce a play about revolutionaries called The Rebel, which was performed at the conference.

A layperson, Janet Lacey was the first woman to preach in St Paul's Cathedral, London, and in St George's Cathedral in Jerusalem. Although brought up as a Methodist, she became an Anglican. In the 1950s and 1960s, when women were seldom found in leadership roles in the WCC, she was an exception. Her keen mind, her gifts of diplomacy and courage, and her eloquence earned her a place in the male-dominated structures of the ecumenical movement.

BETTY THOMPSON

LAITY

"NEVER in church history... has the role and responsibility of the laity in church and world been a matter of so basic, systematic, comprehensive and intensive discussion in the total oikoumene as today" (Hendrik Kraemer, 1961). The re-discovery of the laity was probably the most important aspect of the renewal* of the church in the 1950s and 1960s.

DEFINITION

In the history of Christianity the concept of laypeople as it is now understood was a later development. Only from the 3rd and especially the 4th century onwards did the term gradually become part of ecclesiastical language, usually referring to what is profane, distinguishing the laity from the priests/clergy and deacons.

Laypeople are the unordained members of the church.* That is the most common definition of the word "laity". The problem with it is its negative character: laypeople are defined by the lack of ordination,* the lack of training and competence, and thus are seen as being secondary to the ordained members of the church. This misconception of their place and role in the church has often led to negative connotations regarding the ministry of the laity. Indeed, throughout church history the clergy has seen the laity mainly as the objects of its preaching, teaching and pastoral care, and theologians have not developed a positive description of the function of the laity. Very often laypeople have had to assert themselves against the clergy (see laity/clergy). Lay movements fought the clericalization of the church in the middle ages and during the early stages of the Reformation. The Reformation proclaimed the biblical concept of the priesthood of all believers (1 Pet. 2:9).

There is no exact equivalent in biblical vocabulary for the word "lay" or "laity". The Greek term laikos as noun or adjective appears only in the writings of the fathers (Clement of Rome in 95). But the word laos from which it derives has an important place in biblical writing. In the Septuagint (the Greek translation of the Old Testament) it is predominantly used for the people of God,* Israel; in the New Testament it refers to Christians, the people of God including both Jews and gentiles. In the church, therefore, laikos means "pertaining to the community chosen in Christ" (Hans-Herman Walz).

The ecumenical movement uses the biblical concept of the people of God in order to define the laity not by comparison with the ordained clergy, the theologians, the professional church workers, but by a new appreciation of the church in the world (see church and world). The real battles of the faith today are being fought in factories and shops, offices and farms, in political parties, government agencies and countless homes; in the press, radio, television, and in the relationship between nations. It is often said that the church should go into these spheres, but the church is in fact already there. Laypeople are "those members of the church, both men and women, who earn their livelihood in a secular job and who, therefore, spend most of their working hours in a 'worldly' occupation". "The phrase 'the ministry of the laity' expresses the privilege of the whole church to share in Christ's ministry to the world" (Evanston 1954).

TOWARDS THE RE-DISCOVERY OF THE LAITY

One of the roots of the 20th-century ecumenical movement was the ecumenical lay movements founded in the 19th century: the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association and the Student Christian Movement. John R. Mott, himself a layman and leader in these worldwide movements, called for "liberating the lay forces of Christianity" in order to participate in the missionary task of the church. Also in the Roman Catholic Church there has been a new emphasis on the laity. In 1922 Pius XI, in his pastoral letter Ubi Arcana, called on the laity "to participate in the hierarchical apostolate" and proclaimed the foundation of the Catholic lay movement Action catholique.

Another reason for the re-discovery of the laity was the world situation: the breaking down of the corpus Christianum and growing secularization,* as recognized by the Jerusalem meeting of the International Missionary Council in 1928. J.H. Oldham, in preparing the Oxford world conference on "Church, Community and State" in 1937, pointed to the role of the laity as a crucial matter of ecumenical concern: "If the church is to be an effective force in the social and political sphere, our first task is to laicize our thought about it. We stand before a great historic task – the task of restoring the lost unity between worship and work."

Another impulse for bringing the laity on to the ecumenical agenda came from the founding of lay academies* as attempts for re-thinking and renewal. Such institutions appeared in both parts of Germany after 1945 and in Sweden, Switzerland, the Netherlands, France, Italy and Scotland. They were centres for dialogue among laypeople of different professions and functions, who tried to understand the relevance of the gospel in their secular activities. Even before the foundation of the WCC, in 1946 the Ecumenical Institute at Bossey* near Geneva had been opened, led by Suzanne de Diétrich and Hendrik Kraemer, for a similar purpose: "The laity, men and women, had discovered a new vision of their responsibility for expressing the true nature and task of the church, not only within its own fellowship, but in the world in which the church has been set and their own lives are lived." The German Kirchentag movement, also a post-war phenomenon, initiated by a layman, Reinhold von Thadden-Trieglaff, was another form of church renewal which emphasized the vocation of the laity.

THE LAITY DEPARTMENT OF THE WCC

It was in the context of these ecumenical developments that a committee on the "significance of the laity in the church" was appointed at the first assembly of the WCC in Amsterdam in 1948, with Kraemer as its secretary. The report underlines the need for "relevant Christianity" in the modern secularized world: "Only by the witness of a spiritually intelligent and active laity can the church meet the modern world in its actual perplexities and life situations." In 1949 Walz was appointed as WCC staff person responsible for a Secretariat for Laymen's Work. He organized a European laymen's conference in Bad Boll, Federal Republic of Germany (1951), followed by a North American conference in Buffalo (1952), and published a bulletin Laymen's Work (1951-55).

This secretariat and the Ecumenical Institute increasingly became the focal point for pioneer thinking and experimentation regarding the ministry of the laity. During the first post-war years the attention was on Europe and North America, but soon it became clear that it was a burning issue in the churches of all continents. When the second assembly of the WCC at Evanston in 1954 was planned, the rediscovery of the laity became one of the six major subjects. The assembly report on it focused on the Christian in his or her vocation* but also made an attempt to define the ministry of the laity and to see its implications for the renewal of the life and structure of the church (see ministry in the church).

Evanston also acknowledged the importance of the issue by replacing the provisional Secretariat for Laymen's Work with a regular Department on the Laity, of which Hans-Ruedi Weber became the secretary (1955-61). He edited a new periodical, Laity (from 1959 onward co-edited with Madeleine Barot from the Department on the Cooperation of Men and Women), in which laypeople from all traditions and regions discussed and shared experiences. The publication had a wide circulation and considerable impact on the ecumenical thinking of laypeople and church leaders throughout the world. The ongoing studies of the department were reflected in the topics dealt with, which included laity training, the house church, saints in everyday life, Christians in power structures, stewardship concepts, the role of the laity in church history, the world of tomorrow. In 1959 one issue was devoted to Asia and reported on the inaugural assembly of the East Asia Christian Conference in Kuala Lumpur, which decided to establish a standing committee on the witness of the laity.

In Africa the Laity department played an important role in the founding of the Mindolo Ecumenical Foundation in 1958, a centre for study, leadership training and worship with special reference to the laity. Mindolo "attempts to relate the Christian faith to the mainstream of life in Africa today" (Peter Matthews, first director).

The increasing influence of the work of the Laity department was obvious at the New Delhi assembly in 1961, where the ministry of the laity was a central issue in all three sections: witness, service and unity. Under the theme "The Laity: The Church in the World", three laypersons addressed the assembly. And the message from New Delhi states: "The real letter written to the world today does not consist of words. We Christian people, wherever we are, are a letter from Christ to the world." The majority of Christians are laypeople, whose witness comes through their daily lives, work and relationships wherever they are. New Delhi called for full lay participation in the ecumenical movement. Several subsequent sessions of the WCC's central committee dealt with questions relating to the various ministries of the laity.

New Delhi also decided that the Department on Evangelism, with the cooperation of the Laity department, should undertake a study on the "missionary structure of the congregation",* clearly a consequence of the new understanding of the church in the world. During the time of the Second Vatican Council the Laity department cooperated closely with the related Roman Catholic bodies. In 1964 a joint consultation took place in Glion on "The Ministry of the Church".

The ecumenical theology of the laity as the people of God had prepared a new approach to the world as the place of God's action. The emphasis of the Uppsala assembly (1968) was on the dilemmas and hopes of the world, on development,* justice* and peace* issues, and on the participation of Christians in God's renewal of the world. Soon after the assembly new programmes and commissions were created: the Programme to Combat Racism* (1969) and the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development (1970), of which C.I. Itty, who had worked for several years with the Laity department, became the director.

In a sense, Uppsala was a turning point. Further consideration of the laity and their self-understanding became less important than the content of their mission and service in the world in the struggle against racial, economic and political injustices. During a re-structuring of the WCC in 1971, with the integration of the World Council of Christian Education, the Laity department was absorbed in the Sub-unit on Renewal and Congregational Life. Thus began a period when the word "laity" disappeared from ecumenical discussions. The main emphasis of the sub-unit was spiritual and liturgical renewal; it conducted workshops and related to church base communities* and networks. It had a desk for lay and study centres, which functioned as a secretariat for the World Collaboration Committee for Christian Lay Centres, Academies and Movements for Social Concern (WCOLC), founded in Crete in 1972. The academy movement has spread into many parts of the world, and continental associations have been formed.

ACADEMIES, LAY CENTRES, COURSES

The origins of the World Collaboration Committee go back to the first course for leaders in lay training (CLLT) in 1968, sponsored by the directors association of evangelical academies and lay institutes in Europe and the WCC Laity department: lay trainers from Africa, Asia and Latin America saw what was being done in Europe, which enabled them to understand better their own work. A second course took place in 1970. In Africa and Asia CLLT participants and other leaders began organizing their own regional associations, partly as a consequence of the new self-confidence that resulted from participation in the CLLTs.

In 1972, representatives of academies and lay centres who attended a WCC consultation on centres for social concern and related Christian movements at the Orthodox academy in Crete, Greece, set up the World Collaboration Committee. Originally composed of African, Asian and European associations, it grew into a worldwide network, offering opportunities for an exchange of experiences, renewal of faith, and encouragement and hope.

The impetus for the establishment of the WCOLC came from the associations of Africa and Asia (both founded 1970). The committee always operated jointly with the WCC. At its 20th meeting in 1997, it concluded an evaluation of its work since 1972, and decided to take a new name: OIKOSNET – a global ecumenical network of Christian laity centres, academies and movements for social concern working for an inclusive, just, participatory and sustainable community and society. Today, about 600 centres are related to the WCC, and some 300 to the regional associations. Most are ecumenically oriented and committed to the renewal of the churches.

OIKOSNET is currently focusing on the WCC's Decade to Overcome Violence (DOV), and on a world gathering in 2005 to evaluate work done so far around the DOV, share findings and evaluate achievements and obstacles at mid-decade point; to support and strengthen one another; and to plan input for the next WCC assembly. There are plans to hold a global course for lay leadership training every five years.

Since the evaluation of the regional CLLTs, the African association has focused on training-of-trainers CLLTs.

The European association organized a CLLT in France in 1998 on the theme "Globalization and Ecumenical Action", at which participants developed an ecumenical response for the lay centre movement to engage the dynamics of globalization.

The courses and programmes organized by the World Collaboration Committee/

OIKOSNET aim to equip participants to become dynamic agents of social development in their countries in the light of the Christian faith; to help them understand the nature, problems and forces at work within personal, societal and global dimensions; and to enable them to develop styles and methods of involvement which put the Christian faith into the context of local and regional situations. The courses offer opportunity for encounter and exposure, and are thus different from seminary courses.

LAY PARTICIPATION TOWARDS INCLUSIVE COMMUNITY

In 1992, as a result of re-structuring of the WCC following the 1991 Canberra assembly, the ecumenical concept of the laity re-appeared under the stream on Lay Participation towards Inclusive Community. The laity issue no longer implied the old distinction between the church and the world and hence the contrast between the clergy and church office bearers on one side and the laity on the other. Instead, the main emphasis was now on the wider question of participatory structures in the church and in society. One of the key programme priorities of the stream on Lay Participation was the development of a new profile of the laity, which was to emerge from a number of consultations.

The meeting in Montreat, North Carolina, USA, in 1993 was a historic moment in the story of the ecumenical lay movement. The issue of the laity was re-discovered after a long period of silence, and the discussion moved from the concept of the post-war period to beginning to bridge the gap between spirituality* and secularization, koinonia and community, the promise of the kingdom and the struggle for justice, peace and integrity of creation.* Montreat resulted in a new focus on ecumenical learning, laity formation and lay training leadership, and a new impetus for lay training courses.

A special plenary session on the laos at the WCC's central committee in Johannesburg in 1994 highlighted the ecumenical concept of the laity and its new profile. The discussion underlined that further work was needed on the clarification of the terms, especially in view of the strong ecclesiological implications attached to the term "laity", and on the general issue of lay movements and their relationship with the church.

In 1995, an international course in lay training leadership for women in Brazil focused on questions of justice and sustainability, particularly the debt issue and climate change.

Marking the 50th anniversary of the WCC and the 500th of Vasco da Gama's voyage around the world, in 1998 Asian and African centres organized a missionary journey to Europe, specifically to visit churches, banks and the institutions of the European Union.

Another result of the Johannesburg plenary was the course in lay training leadership in Zimbabwe in 1998 under the theme "Being Communities of Hope", which included exposure visits to South Africa, Zambia and Zimbabwe, and led to a covenanting document entitled "Towards a Shared Vision for Our Work as Laity".

LAITY IN THE ORTHODOX CHURCH

The idea that laypeople have only an inadequate knowledge of their faith* and therefore need the constant help of the ordained ministry is quite alien to the Orthodox tradition. Therefore the Orthodox member churches of the WCC shared readily in the ecumenical re-discovery of the laity. Several Orthodox lay movements like the Russian Orthodox Student Christian Movement in France, Germany and the USA; the Zoe brotherhood and Aktines movement in Greece; and Syndesmos* in the Middle East were related to international lay movements. Orthodox academies were founded in Crete and Finland.

In the Orthodox tradition all members of the church are qualitatively equal in receiving God's grace and in realizing it as a new life. The laity is not unordained according to Orthodox tradition. At baptism* they receive the anointing of the Holy Spirit* in the sacrament of chrismation and participate as members of the Body of Christ in the royal priesthood (1 Pet. 2:9). The important discovery of post-war Orthodoxy was that God is Lord both in the church and in the world. The life of the world itself was seen to be of significance to the gospel. In the eucharist the whole world is presented to God. "The whole church participates in the priesthood of Christ and in his continuing shepherdly ministry in the world" (Paul Verghese, later Metropolitan Mar Gregorios). "The laymen can be, must be and are, by what they say and by the example they give, the best witnesses of Christ to non-Christians and non-believers" (Vitali Borovoy).

THE LAY APOSTOLATE IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

In 1922 Pope Pius XI called the laypeople "to participate in the hierarchical apostolate"; in 1946 Pope Pius XII spoke of the laity as "not only belonging to the church but being the church". Under his pontificate two world congresses on the lay apostolate took place in Rome, in 1951 and 1957. They emphasized the participation of the laity in the apostolate of the church and their calling to be evangelists to their fellow human beings and to humanize the conditions of the world. In 1959 a permanent committee for international congresses of the lay apostolate was formed by Pope John XXIII.

Vatican II* approved officially what had developed, and in several statements it underlined the importance of the lay apostolate. The Dogmatic Constitution on the Church (1964), which includes a chapter on the laity, begins by stating that all who are baptized are the people of God, the holy priesthood (1 Pet. 2:4-10), and all of humankind is called to become the people of God. Following a chapter on the hierarchical structure of the church, the chapter on the laity describes the particular function of laypeople as leaven and salt: "The laity is called in particular to make the church present and effective in those places and circumstances where only through them can she become the salt of the earth" (no. 33).

The Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity (1965) argues that because of the growing autonomy of many realms of human life, the work of the lay apostolate is more important than ever before and needs to be intensified. The church has one mission and many different services. The realms of service – family, community, society, profession and politics – and the different forms in groups, congregations, lay movements and the training for the lay apostolate are outlined. Finally the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World (1965) affirms that involvement in cultural, social, economic, political and international affairs is to be seen as a task of the church in the world. "The people of God and the human race in whose midst it lives render service to each other. Thus the mission of the church will show its religious, and by that very fact, its supremely human character" (no. 11). In 1989, following the bishops' synod of 1988, Pope John Paul II appealed in a pastoral letter for a clear distinction between ordained and unordained members of the church.

THEOLOGICAL CONCEPTS OF THE MINISTRY OF THE LAITY

No systematic ecumenical theology on the laity has yet been evolved, but many new theological insights have been gained. Nothing less than a "re-defined ecclesiology" (Yves Congar, Kraemer) was required in considering the ministry of the laity as God's action in the world. New insights have come in at least four areas.

The ministry of the laity. "We must understand anew the implications of the fact that we are all baptized, that, as Christ came to minister, so must all Christians become ministers of his saving purpose according to the particular gift of the Spirit which each has received, as messengers of the hope received in Christ. Therefore in daily living and work the laity are not mere fragments of the church who are scattered about in the world and who come together again for worship, instruction and specifically Christian fellowship on Sundays. They are the church's representatives, no matter where they are. It is the laity who draw together work and worship, it is they who manifest in word and action the lordship of Christ over the world, which claims so much of their time and energy and labour. This, and not some new order or organization, is the ministry of the laity" (Evanston 1954).

The church – gathered and dispersed. The church has traditionally been regarded from the aspect of the gathered flock, while the fact that it lives and works mainly as a scattered community is largely neglected. Two biblical images of the Christian community – the salt of the earth and the city on the hill – have been used to illuminate the two poles of the life of the Christian community. The church's function as salt of the earth can be carried out only by the laity. The church is seen in terms not of an established institution but of a "pilgrim people", constantly on the move into the world but also returning to the city on the mountain, where God's people come together for worship (WCC, Galyatetö 1956).

The function of the ordained ministry. Trained theologians and ordained ministers are in a bad position to be evangelists: they are in a good position to be the biblical and theological instructors of the evangelists. "It is not the duty of the laity to help the pastor to carry out his pastoral work, it is the pastor's duty to equip the laity to carry out their work in the world. The work of the laity is not secondary to that of the pastor, but vice versa" (Weber). Laypeople do not leave the church when they leave the church building. They are fulltime Christians just as much as the pastor is.

Christ in the world. God loved the world so much that he gave his Son. It is the world that matters. "Christ the light did not remain outside the world to illuminate it from above, but entered into human life, conquered the darkness and radiates light from within. This says to us that wherever we are in the world, God is there before us – the light is already there. The responsibility of the laity is to serve as reflecting mirrors or focusing lenses, to beam the light into all parts of the life of the world" (New Delhi).

A new form of lay activities has emerged in church base communities, peace movements, solidarity and ecological groups and the women's movement, often outside traditional church structures, in dialogue or co-operation with non-Christians. What was said about the laity in the churches could be said of these groups too: "The laity are members of God's people, specifically God's people present in the world" (Weber).

ELISABETH ADLER and JONAH KATONEENE

■ All Are Called: Towards a Theology of the Laity, London, CIO, 1985 ■ N. Apostola ed., A Letter from Christ to the World: An Exploration of the Role of the Laity in the Church Today, WCC, 1998 ■ Y.M.J. Congar, Jalons pour une théologie du laïcat (ET Lay People in the Church: A Study for a Theology of the Laity, London, Bloomsbury, 1957) ■ M. Gibbs & T.R. Morton, God's Frozen People, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1964 ■ H. Kraemer, A Theology of the Laity, London, Lutterworth, 1958 ■ "The Laity", Student World, 3, 1956 ■ Lay Participation towards Inclusive Community, Report to the WCC's Eighth Assembly, 1998 ■ S.C. Neill & H.R. Weber, The Layman in Christian History, London, SCM Press, 1963 ■ K. Raiser, "Laity in the Ecumenical Movement: Redefining the Profile", ER, 45, 4, 1993 ■ "Re-opening the Ecumenical Discussion of the Laity", ER, 45, 4, 1993 ■ W. Simpfendorfer, The New Fisherfolk, WCC, 1988.

LAITY/CLERGY

THE SEMANTIC field covered by these words is immense, and their meanings vary, depending both on the sociologist's analysis of them as an outsider and on the theologian's interpretation of them from the inside.

Sociologists note a difference among church members between those with a function or special status (the clergy) and other people (the laity). They ask whether that difference is connected with certain professional qualifications of members of the clergy, with the exercise of legal or moral authority,* with the existence of "clergy" as a social group, and so on.

For their part, theologians raise questions about whether the nature of this difference lies in the exercise of some power or "divine right" or in just serving the community, or whether it has some symbolic or "sacred" quality and so on. To a great extent the theory and practice of the various churches in this regard are a historical legacy: social positions and theological arguments have conditioned each other within it.

For sociologists the variety of models is more closely bound up with socio-political situations than with the confessions. The clergy of national churches (paid by the state and perhaps appointed by the civil authorities) are on a similar footing in Lutheran Sweden, Orthodox Greece or (until recently at least) Roman Catholic Spain – just as elsewhere the Roman Catholic worker-priest or the émigré Orthodox priest who works to earn his living or the Protestant pastor in Japan scarcely counts as part of the "clergy".

In contrast, theologians see a disparity between the great Christian confessions. In this connection, a significant gulf has come into existence between the old (Roman Catholic and Orthodox) churches and most of the churches which resulted from the Reformation, with the Anglican communion occupying a special position.

Among the Roman Catholics or the Orthodox, developments in the theology of the ordained ministry led to an accentuation of the difference between a cleric who has received ordination* and a layperson, as the sacramental interpretation of ordination leads to its being understood as inner transformation of the persons concerned (the theory of character [indelibilis] which we find in scholastic theology). In reaction to this view, the Protestant churches stress the fundamental sameness of all baptized persons, the difference between ministers and other people being only an organizational matter, so that it can be said (etymologically, at least) that ministers are also laypeople, i.e. one of the people.

During the last few decades the Roman Catholic Church has again stressed the importance of the idea of the priesthood of all believers, while some of its theologians have been warning against improperly ontological interpretations of "character". In the same period all the churches have felt the need or desire for more active participation* by all baptized persons in the life of congregations and in the ministry of evangelism.* Thus the gulf between Roman Catholics and Protestants is in this connection less noticed in practice than it is emphasized in theory.

For the sake of rather more completeness, an ambiguous use of the terms within the Roman Catholic Church must be noted: generally not only ordained ministers but also those persons described as religious (monks, recluses or members of other communities) are distinguished from those called the laity. It should finally be noted that, from a totally different standpoint, the word "lay" is used in some countries not to refer to a person's status within the Christian community but to describe facts or people which are, in a secularized world, alien or even hostile to the church.

See also church order, diaconate, episcopacy, laity, ministry in the church, presbyterate, priesthood, religious communities.

JEAN ROGUES

■ Y. Congar, Jalons pour une théologie du laïc (ET Lay People in the Church, rev. ed., London, Chapman, 1965) ■ H. Kraemer, A Theology of the Laity, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1958 ■ D.N. Power, Gifts That Differ: Lay Ministries Established and Unestablished, New York, Pueblo, 1980.

LAMBETH QUADRILATERAL

THE SO-CALLED Lambeth Quadrilateral is a four-part statement of the basic elements which the Anglican communion* wants honoured in any plans for reunion with other churches. Originally intended as a basis for organic union* within American denominationalism,* the four points were accepted by a general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church at Chicago in 1886. This church affirmed these elements to be "the substantial deposit of Christian faith and order committed by Christ and his apostles to the church unto the end of the world".

"As inherent parts of this sacred deposit, and therefore as essential to the restoration of unity among the divided branches of Christendom, we account the following, to wit: (1) the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament as the revealed word of God; (2) the Nicene Creed as the sufficient statement of the Christian faith; (3) the two sacraments – baptism and the supper of the Lord – ministered with unfailing use of Christ's words of institution and of the elements ordained by him; (4) the historic episcopate locally adapted in the methods of its administration to the varying needs of the nations and peoples called of God into the unity of his church."

The 1888 Lambeth conference of the Anglican communion adopted the Chicago Quadrilateral but slightly altered the wording and added the Apostles' Creed* to the second article. The 1920 Lambeth conference incorporated the Lambeth Quadrilateral into its "Appeal 'for Reunion' to all Christian People", though now the fourth article was more cautiously worded: "A ministry acknowledged by every part of the church as possessing not only the inward call of the Spirit but also the commission of Christ and the authority of the whole body." A "claim" follows that the episcopate alone can meet these criteria.

The 1958 Lambeth conference endorsed this form, though the more general use of the phrase “Lambeth Quadrilateral” usually is thought to be including the historic episcopate as a sine qua non within the text, and not as a lesser commentary on it. In the Lambeth Quadrilateral’s role as a clear statement of Anglican desiderata in the reunion of the churches, some have criticized it either as being too minimal or as making too much of the historical episcopate. Arguably, the Lambeth Quadrilateral has served its purpose well, for example, in the coming into being of the united churches of the Indian sub-continent.

COLIN BUCHANAN

■ J. Draper ed., Communion and Episcopacy, Cuddesdon, UK, Ripon College, 1988 ■ R.B. Slocum, “The Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral: Development in an Anglican Approach to Christian Unity”, JES, 33, 4, 1996 ■ J.R. Wright ed., Quadrilateral at One Hundred, Cincinnati OH, Forward Movement, 1988.

LAND

AWARENESS of the fundamental significance of the land has played a major role in the cultural, social and religious history of humankind. In different forms, almost all cultures have celebrated the life-giving power and beauty of the earth, offered it sacrifices, offerings and libations, recognized it as primal Mother and tireless fountain of existence and related her to the crucial moments of human life (birth, marriage, fertility and death). This “spirituality” of the land must be recognized and honoured as we face the crucial questions of land rights, land reform or the relation of peoples to “their” lands.

The biblical creation stories point to the inseparable relationship between the three actors that are central to the whole biblical story: God, Adam (humankind) and the land. The last, as the solid space and location but also as a determining factor in the development of this history, is created by God on “the third day”. Then God creates humankind and commends the land to it as a gift, a responsibility and a task (Gen. 1-2). As the story develops (Gen. 3-4), however, the land and its fruit become an object of temptation and strife for humankind and, as a consequence, a place of suffering and a threat.

Land as promise and gift, as task and demand, and as temptation and threat is ever-present in the biblical history of Israel. As promise it accompanies the people as landless sojourners in the desert or as temporary dwellers in slavery in a foreign land. As gift it is appropriated and celebrated in the conquest and occupation of the promised land. As task and demand it occupies a prominent place in the law. As the temptation for greed and injustice and as threat of a new landlessness, it is prominent in the message of the prophets.

The gift of land to Adam is not exhausted with the land of Israel, for every people has its land. As the universality of Yahweh’s rule is more clearly perceived, it becomes evident that the same God of Israel has brought the peoples to their land (Amos 9:7-15) and determined “the boundaries of their habitation”, as Paul would put it (Acts 17:26, RSV). Biblical thinking thus affirms an indissoluble bond between the people and the land.

In our contemporary situation, the churches have faced serious theological and ethical questions related to land. It is unfortunate, however, that modern theology, in both its confessional and its ecumenical expressions, has hardly developed a theology of the land or seriously grappled with the theological dimensions of the concrete issues now needing resolution. The proper concern to recover the biblical message of the relation of God and humankind to time and history has overshadowed an equally biblical concern, namely, the relation of God and humankind to “space” as a dimension of God’s revelation and of human identity.

THE USE OF THE LAND

The land itself can be abused and must be protected. The Deuteronomic and Levitical regulations prescribe the “rest” that the land should enjoy – what could be called the rights of the land – in terms of the rights of the poor* and the question of justice.*

The appropriation, distribution, care and use of the land have taken very different forms through human history but have remained a significant human issue, frequently connected with religious faith, doctrine and ritual. With capitalism,* however, land becomes a source of profit. The accumulation of land, therefore, is not merely a form of social prestige but an investment from which the greatest possible profit is sought. This perspective has led to the dispossession of the land in the colonized territories and to the accumulation of land in the hands of a few people or families or, recently, agribusiness companies, creating masses of landless peasants. Land reforms (see below) aim at redressing these situations.

LAND RIGHTS

Over the centuries, aboriginal and indigenous peoples* have been brutally subjugated as a result of colonization and national development. Pseudo-philosophical and religious theories of racial inferiority were used to justify the large-scale genocide perpetrated in the Americas within decades after the arrival of the Europeans. Those who survived were systematically denied title to and use of land. Their land was expropriated (in Mexico, Puerto Rico, Guatemala); they were forcibly relocated (in Brazil, Paraguay, Philippines); treaties with them were abrogated (by Canada, USA, Aotearoa New Zealand) and they were subjected to ill-conceived and badly administered policies of assimilation (in Chile, Australia, Colombia), if not genocide. The rising economic value of their lands has led to increased national and private appropriation for cattle raising, mining, the construction of roads or the opening of forests to logging in lands once considered the exclusive territories of indigenous peoples (see colonialism).

Even where governments have guaranteed reserves to indigenous peoples, such guarantees have not generally included rights to the natural resources of their land, and the laws have not included the provision of resources, tools and adequate (bilingual) education necessary for a more profitable use of the land. In Australia the government has given only limited protection to sites of religious or cultural importance. In the USA, Australia and Canada, various agreements about royalty payments and compensation have been made, but governments retain the final decision over whether and under what conditions mining will occur on the lands of indigenous peoples.

Over the past 20 years, indigenous peoples have organized themselves nationally and internationally to defend their rights, especially their land rights. Simultaneously, international conferences jointly sponsored by indigenous and non-governmental organizations, including the churches, have increasingly argued that establishing and preserving land rights is the first step towards ensuring the physical and cultural survival of indigenous peoples.

Important international agreements include the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention and Recommendation, adopted by the International Labour Organization in 1957; the International NGO Conference on Discrimination against Indigenous Populations in the Americas (1977); and the 1989 revision of the 1957 ILO convention, rewritten because of indigenous opposition to the "integrationist" tendency of the 1977 document. In 1982 the UN itself set up an open working group on indigenous peoples with advisory capacity to the UN Commission on Human Rights. Its task was to provide hearings for the indigenous peoples and to draft UN standards with a view to producing a declaration on the rights of indigenous people. That draft was finally completed in 1997 and has been accepted by indigenous nations and communities as "the minimum standard for their survival". It is still being debated by governments, however, before it is finally sent to the UN general assembly.

Churches have frequently legitimized the colonial policies of their respective countries and have even entertained doctrines of racial inferiority of indigenous peoples, thus supporting discrimination and subjugation. In contrast, prophetic voices have sometimes denounced indigenous oppression, genocide and forced exile in slavery, particularly in the Americas and Africa. Colonization made missionary societies* owners of land that traditionally belonged to indigenous inhabitants, which created dominance-dependence relationships between them. Geographical concentration (e.g., in the "reductions" in Latin America) was seen as facilitating the missionary goal of evangelization. Indigenous people reacted either by refusing evangelization and abandoning huge areas of their traditional territories in order to preserve their own cultural patterns or by reluctantly accepting evangelization and relocation, thus losing part of their territory. Over the last few decades, some missions have inserted in their titles a clause promising to transfer the land in their possession to indigenous communities free of charge when it is legally allowed. Churches are working with indigenous peoples to seek legal formulas for their collective ownership of the land and guarantee of their sovereignty.

Through its Programme to Combat Racism* the WCC has supported many groups of indigenous peoples in their struggle for land rights. In 1971 and 1977 it also sponsored two symposia, both held in Barbados, of anthropologists, ethnologists and representatives of the indigenous peoples, who discussed the situation of indigenous peoples in South America. Participants' severe criticism of church and mission activities as interfering in the life of the Indian societies provoked considerable criticism and continues to be debated.

In 1979 the WCC central committee received a PCR staff document on "Land Rights and Racially Oppressed Peoples", which it requested be made available to WCC member churches and to organizations of the racially oppressed and their support groups, particularly in Australia and Brazil, on which the document focused. The 1980 WCC world consultation on racism* devoted considerable attention to land rights, considering the issue in relation to the people's right to sources of water, minerals, clean air and political rights, including the right to self-government.

In 1982 the WCC central committee adopted its first statement on land rights, declaring: "Indigenous people claim that the recognition of prior ownership of their traditional territories is fundamental to the issue of land rights. Thus for them, land rights must include the right to political power through self-government and economic power through the right to choose what happens on the land... The indigenous people's struggle for land rights is challenging the church to be faithful to its gospel of reconciliation and to the biblical affirmation of the creation of all human beings in the image of God." The committee recommended that member churches commit significant financial and human resources to the struggle of indigenous peoples for land rights and that they become politically involved on the side of indigenous peoples against powers which seek to deny their land rights and human rights.

The issue of land rights was also on the agenda of the Vancouver (1983) and Canberra (1991) assemblies. In 1989 the WCC sponsored the first international indigenous meeting on land, called "Land Is Our Life", held in Darwin, Australia.

LAND REFORM

Both in the Bible and in most ancient cultures, land is a gift of the deity which humans must preserve and cultivate as a source of life and peace. In most ancient cultures land belongs to the extended family. In some Near Eastern cultures, however, the land belongs to the king as the representative or a manifestation of the god. The clash between these two understandings appears dramatically in the episode of Ahab and Naboth (1 Kings 21). Prophets like Isaiah, Amos and Micah denounced the greed of "the palace" and its clients which takes land from the common people. The Mosaic law has a number of measures, including the jubilee laws, to redress dispossession of land which occurs through accident, carelessness or injustice.

In our time, land reform laws, which follow different models, aim at redressing these situations. The power struggle related to this question, which results in many cases in violent confrontation, raises issues of justice* which the churches cannot ignore.

Traditional Christian thinking on this issue rests on a pre-capitalist view which sees a direct relation between people and land. Now, however, the relation of people to the land is mediated by the global economic structure and therefore poses difficult ethical, economic and ecological problems which demand from the churches a greater attention and reflection than they have so far received.

Churches have individually or ecumenically expressed concern for issues related to land possession. The Pastoral Letter on Catholic Social Teaching and the US Economy, prepared by the US Roman Catholic bishops, devotes an entire section to this issue. In his visits to Latin America, Pope John Paul II has vigorously defended the right of peasants to own land. Churches in many countries have worked ecumenically to support land reform, developing in Brazil what is called a "pastoral of the land" (pastoral da terra). Regional ecumenical organizations in Africa, Asia and Latin America have repeatedly denounced situations of injustice in relation to land, identifying land reform as an important priority.

A 1989 Lutheran World Federation consultation "Land Is Life" concluded that although land problems must be confronted in the light of particular national, historical, cultural and religious contexts, they "are part of many other economic, social and cultural struggles which in turn are inter-related on an international level". Within the WCC, the need for "radical reform of land tenure systems" was identified as essential to a "positive programme for social justice" in East Asia (1952 study conference in Lucknow, India).

The WCC has channelled ecumenical support to landless people, notably through its programme on Urban Rural Mission.* URM's advisory group said in a 1979 report that "lack of access to land, though a problem for both urban and rural people, is for the rural poor a threat to their very survival. Land is the key commodity coveted by dominant powers, especially by repressive regimes, large landowners, ranchers and transnational corporations", adding that "dramatic and brutal" repression against the rural poor often goes unnoticed because of their geographical remoteness and lack of access to the legal and pastoral services available in urban areas. In recent episodes in the Amazonia hundreds of peasants who were claiming their land according to the provisions of a land reform law which was not being enforced were murdered by private armies of landowners. This outrage, which illustrates the seriousness of the problem, has been denounced by the Brazilian council of churches. Roman Catholic bishops and the pastoral da terra are playing an important role of public advocacy in this tragic situation. In 1996 the WCC sponsored a consultation on "Mining and Indigenous Peoples" with representatives from indigenous communities involved in land claim struggles against transnational mining companies. Since then, a global information network linking indigenous peoples on these specific issues has arisen.

The WCC's sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983) linked landlessness with the so-called international food disorder: "Much of the productive land is controlled by large landowners and transnational corporations who exploit the land and do not allow the farmers, peasants and landless rural workers to participate in making decisions which would benefit them." "Just Sharing of the Land" was one sub-theme in the section report on "The Earth Is the Lord's" at the 1989 world mission conference in San Antonio, which said the WCC should "stand in solidarity with landless people in their struggles, organizations and movements to occupy land for their sustenance and survival". But it also called for a global ecumenical strategy "for a genuine land reform programme controlled by its beneficiaries, beginning with the sharing of church lands with the landless and homeless". Land figured in one of the affirmations from the world conference on justice, peace and the integrity of creation (Seoul 1990), again under the heading "The Earth Is the Lord's". Participants pledged to resist policies that allow land speculation at the expense of the poor or prevent "those who live directly from the land from being its real trustees".

Following the appointment of a consultant on indigenous peoples in 1995, the WCC expanded its contacts with indigenous communities, assisting them especially to advocate their own concerns at the United Nations. A series of regional workshops, beginning with a consultation on "Indigenous Spirituality and the Land", held in Norway in 1997, made their insights available to the 1998 WCC Harare assembly where 42 representatives of indigenous peoples from 19 different countries attended as delegates of their churches. Noting that their lives, spiritualities, languages and cultures as distinct peoples are constantly under threat, they appealed to the WCC to include the issue of indigenous peoples in the core programme of the Council, and a staff position was included when the WCC was re-organized in 1999. The assembly's statement on human rights called upon the churches to support indigenous peoples' right to self-determination with regard to their political and eco-conomic future, culture, land rights, spirituality, language, traditions and forms of organization, and intellectual property.

LAND AND THE STATE OF ISRAEL

The return of Jews to Palestine and the establishment of the state of Israel opened a problematic for which the churches were not ready. Since the diaspora, Christianity was used to a Jewish people who were landless and had no universally recognized organization. Christians believed that God's covenant* with Israel was fulfilled in Jesus the Christ: but did that mean that the new covenant had superseded the old? If the old covenant is still valid, what does it mean for the theological understanding of the return of the Jews to the promised land and the creation of a state? The terrible record of many Christians and Christian churches in relation to Israel coloured their pronouncements on the subject. "We all have to realize that Christian words have now become disqualified and suspect in the ears of most Jews," said the Bristol meeting of Faith and Order in 1967 (see antisemitism).

Slowly and falteringly, in church pronouncements, ecumenical discussion and dialogue with the Jews themselves, the churches and the ecumenical movement began to hammer out some shared convictions. "We believe that God's promise to the people of Israel which he elected is still in force," said the synod of the Evangelical Church of Germany in 1950 (see Israel and the church). "The Christian church shares Israel's faith in the one God," said the executive committee in 1982.

The meanings of these affirmations for an understanding of the relation between the land and the state, however, were not so clear. The Roman Catholic Church, in the much-debated declaration Nostra Aetate (1965), formulated in a carefully worded sentence the idea of continuity and the validity of the covenant, but it did not include any reference to the question of the land or the state of Israel. In successive dialogues and declarations it has continued to distinguish between the theologico-religious question of the church and Judaism and the question of Israel's land and state, which is seen as a purely social and political reality. Other churches, although perhaps less rigorously, have also pointed to the need for proper consideration of this distinction.

In 1970 the general synod of the Dutch Reformed Church made perhaps the first attempt to face this issue directly. It recognizes the Jewish people of today as the continuation of the biblical Israel; it argues forcefully for the indissoluble relation of the people to the land. Then it concludes: "If the election of the people and the promises connected with it remains valid, it follows that the tie between the people and the land also remains by the grace of God." It affirms that "anyone who accepts the reunion of the Jewish people and the land for reasons of faith, has also to accept that in the given circumstances the people should have a state of its own". It further specifies that the state of Israel is one of the forms "in which the Jewish people appear". In its affirmations and hesitations this statement seems to reflect the state of the question for most churches. Some Christians, however, particularly from the third world and from the Middle East, are radically critical of these views. "We have come to recognize", said Anglican canon Naim A'teeq (St George's, Jerusalem) in 1986, "that God is no longer the God of Israel." Rather, "God is the God of all people. I understand the Jewish origin, I recognize the Israel of God, but with Jesus Christ the church continues the line that began in the Old Testament."

The war of 1967, the annexation of the new areas and the condition of the Palestinian populations have made this issue even more vexing. The United Methodist statement of 1972 recognizes that "dialogues presently are complicated by... turbulent political struggles such as the search for Jewish and Arab security and dignity in the Middle East". The plight of the Palestinians appears quite strongly in recent ecumenical documents. Perhaps the American Lutheran statement of 1974 best portrays these difficulties when it identifies three positions: theology of the land, which recognizes the return of the Jews to the promised land (and consequently the creation of a state) as "a sign of the faithfulness of God towards its people"; theology of the poor, in which concern for the plight of the Palestinians makes a favourable theological statement on the state of Israel quite problematic; and theology of survival, which affirms the validity of the state of Israel on "juridical and moral" (rather than theological) grounds. Its conclusion that "there is no consensus among Lutherans with respect to the relations between 'the chosen people' and the territory comprising the present state of Israel" reflects quite faithfully the ecumenical understanding of this issue.

We are still far from having found an adequate theological hermeneutic for addressing the issue of the covenant and the land as related to present historical and political issues. It seems clear that the attempt to separate the theological and the politico-religious issues misunderstands both the biblical teaching and the meaning of land and state for Jews then and today. Yet to deal with the issue simply on the basis of God's choice of Israel and the covenant leaves us unable to articulate the theological significance of the political situation, the rights of Palestinians, the complex history of that land and the universal covenant of God with humankind.

A 1984 document of the Presbyterian Church (USA) is probably the most elaborate church pronouncement on this question. After affirming that God's covenant with Israel "included a promise of the land", it places this promise in the context of God's universal purpose for all peoples. "We understand land to be an earthly, geographical, political place where one can be safe and secure, free from pressure and coercion. It implies a home, a means of life, a source of wealth and a place where individuals can become a people." After briefly developing this theology of the land, it deals with the specific question of "the abiding character of God's promise of a particular land to the Jewish people", noting that it "does not assign fixed boundaries to the promised land" and that "land and political sovereignty are by no means identical". It goes on to discuss the issue of the state of Israel, affirming it but also keeping a distance from its concrete operation ("the ways of God... should not be confused with the policies of the state"). A more Trinitarian approach to the theology of the land and the state would give the churches a clearer basis both for dealing with the undeniable particularity of the promise to Israel and for interpreting it in the context of God's universal covenant and promise to humankind.

See also Jewish-Christian dialogue; justice, peace and the integrity of creation.

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO
and BALDWIN SJOLLEMA

- N.S. Ateek, Justice and Only Justice: A Palestinian Theology of Liberation, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1989
- M. de Barros & J.L. Caravias, Teología de la Tierra, Petrópolis, Brazil, Vozes, 1988
- W. Brueggemann, The Land, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1977
- H. Croner ed., Issues in the Jewish Christian Dialogue, New York, Paulist, 1979
- Land Rights for Indigenous Peoples, PCR Information Reports and Background Papers 16, WCC, 1983
- L. Swepston & R. Plant, "International Standards and the Protection of the Land Rights of Indigenous and Tribal Populations", International Labour Review, 124, 1, 1985
- The Theology of the Churches and the Jewish People: Statements by the WCC and Its Member Churches, WCC, 1988.

LATIN AMERICAN COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

THE CONSEJO Latinoamericano de Iglesias (CLAI) is a continental ecumenical body covering Latin America and the Hispanic Caribbean, with headquarters in Quito, Ecuador. It consists of 150 churches and ecumenical organizations. The latter are associate or fraternal members.

The Panama conference (1916) is traditionally recognized as the starting point of the ecumenical movement in Latin America. That conference was convened as a Latin American response to the great Edinburgh missionary conference of 1910, at which Protestant missions working in Latin America were not accepted, as it was considered that this region was Roman Catholic territory which had already been evangelized. In Panama, Protestant missionaries met to discuss questions of relations and strategies, including evangelization and mission, secular education and training of ministers. Since then, a number of conferences and consultations have brought Protestant Christians in Latin America and the Caribbean closer together. Several bodies came into existence for cooperation and study, among them the Latin American Protestant Commission for Christian Education (CELADEC), the World Student Christian Federation in Latin America (FUMECAL), Church and Society in Latin America (ISAL) and the Latin American Union of Protestant Youth (ULAJE). In the 1960s the Protestant "Pro-Unity" Commission in Latin America (UNELAM) came into existence. UNELAM soon saw the need for Protestant churches to adopt a more realistic position in relation to the ecumenical question and resolved to invite the churches to a continental assembly to decide on the possibility of setting up an ecumenical council. The theme of that assembly was "Unity and Mission in Latin America".

This assembly of churches, meeting at Oaxtepec, Mexico, in September 1978, approved the setting up of a Latin American council of churches. It also decided that no later than four years afterwards, a constituent assembly should be convened to discuss all the ecclesiological and constitutional points relating to this kind of council. CLAI was, therefore, described as being "in formation". That assembly in fact met at Huampaní, Peru, in 1982, when the constitution of CLAI was promulgated and its standing orders were approved. The second assembly was held in Indaiatuba, São Paulo, Brazil, in 1988; the third assembly took place in Concepción, Chile, in 1995; and the fourth assembly was convened in Barranquilla, Colombia, in 2001.

CLAI includes Methodists, Lutherans, Presbyterians and Reformed, Anglicans, Waldensians, Pentecostals, Baptists, Moravians, Disciples of Christ, united churches, independent churches and Orthodox churches. In ecumenical fellowship all these churches and the associated or fraternal bodies recognize the doctrinal basis of CLAI, i.e. the confession of "Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures". In unity, they seek to "fulfill together their common calling to the glory of God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit" (see WCC, basis of).

The main object of CLAI is to promote the "unity of the people of God in Latin America as a local expression of the universal church of Christ and as a testimony and contribution to the unity of the Latin American people". The ecumenical purpose of CLAI is indissolubly linked to the great political, economic, social and religious issues and the hopes of the peoples of this continent. CLAI is governed by an assembly that meets at an interval of not less than four or more than six years. Between these meetings the council is managed by a board that consists of a president and 16 members. In this board a balanced denominational and regional representation is sought, including representatives of the neglected sectors (indigenous peoples, women, blacks, young people, etc.)

The priorities of CLAI have been determined by the various demands and challenges coming from the most deprived sectors of Latin American society and the churches. It has separate programme areas for women, children and family; pastoral work with indigenous peoples and blacks; pastoral care, solidarity and human rights; evangelization, spirituality and worship; communications; health and environment; education for peace and ecumenical peace efforts; and ecumenical dialogue. The liturgy network created by CLAI connects dozens of ministers, theologians, liturgists and church members all over the region by the Internet; its work has renewed worship and has strengthened Latin American identity at local church services. The work for peace and human rights has been very strong. In the early 1990s it focused in Central America, and at the end of this decade it selected Guatemala, Peru and Colombia as focal points to develop a peace programme. Involving churches, civil society organizations and the people, this programme includes peace actions, education and theological reflection. CLAI has also endorsed joint work among theological institutes and seminars to promote ecumenical thinking and exchanges. Dialogue with the new Pentecostal independent movements that grow rapidly in the region is one of its main concerns. With its work centred in the churches, CLAI promotes practical participation, the training and enabling of leaders, the contribution of women and youth and of indigenous and black theology to the ecumenical movement, common celebration, dialogue and cooperation among its member churches and bodies.

CLAI edits books, the quarterly magazine Signos de Vida (Signs of Life) and the monthly newspaper Rápidas.

See also South America.

JUAN SCHWINDT, SERGIO MARCOS
PINTO LOPES and DAFNE SABANES PLOU

LAUBACH, FRANK CHARLES

B. 2 Sept. 1884, Benton, PA, USA; d. 11 June 1970, Syracuse, NY. A Congregational educator and evangelist, in 1929 Laubach began an educational project of teaching reading by phonetic symbols and pictures, eventually developing literacy primers for some 300 languages and dialects in over 100 countries and localities in Asia, Africa and Latin America. As originator of the “each-one-teach-one” concept of adult literacy instruction, he founded Laubach Literacy in 1955, with headquarters in Syracuse, but with branch offices and centres in many parts of the world. Educated at Princeton and Union theological seminaries and at Columbia University, he was a missionary for the American Board among the Lanao Moros in the Philippines. He later became professor at the Manila Union Theological Seminary, dean of Union College in Manila, dean of the College of Education at Manila University and director of Maranaw folk schools. He also served as special counsellor to the Committee on World Literacy and Christian Literature of the Division of Foreign Missions of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ F.C. Laubach, The Silent Billion Speak, New York, Friendship, 1943 ■ Teaching the World to Read, New York, Friendship, 1947 ■ D.E. Mason, Frank C. Laubach: Teacher of Millions, Minneapolis, Denison, 1967.

LAUSANNE COMMITTEE FOR WORLD EVANGELIZATION

THE LAUSANNE Committee for World Evangelization (LCWE) came into existence after the International Congress on World Evangelization (Lausanne 1974). The congress, sponsored by the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association, brought together almost 2500 participants from about 150 nations for ten days of intensive focus on “the unfinished task of world evangelization”. According to honorary chairman Billy Graham, one main purpose of the congress was to “frame a biblical declaration on evangelism... [and] state what the relationship is between evangelism and social responsibility”. The result was the 15-article Lausanne covenant,* drafted under the leadership of Anglican John Stott and signed by a majority of the participants. Both Graham and the Lausanne covenant challenged “the whole church to take the whole gospel to the whole world”.

The congress organizers did not anticipate an ongoing “Lausanne” structure and let it be known that they did not envisage a new version of the International Missionary Council,* which had been integrated into the WCC in 1961. During the congress, however, the participants favoured a vehicle which could sustain the spirit and momentum of Lausanne. A few months later some 50 Evangelical men and women, nominated by regional groups around the world, met in Mexico City to give shape to the LCWE. In 1989 the committee almost doubled in size and secured balanced representation from the six continents.

In the early 1990s the movement’s current leaders, drawn from a new generation, restructured Lausanne to make it less dependent on Western funding as well as more flexible to regional leadership and to non-Western agendas. Two recent consultations – on modernity (Sweden 1993) and on Islam (Cyprus 1995) – resulted in new titles in the Lausanne Occasional Papers series.

See also evangelical missions; evangelism.

ROBERT T. COOTE

LAUSANNE COVENANT

IN JULY 1974 some 2500 evangelical leaders from about 150 nations met in Lausanne, Switzerland, for the International Congress on World Evangelization, called by evangelist Billy Graham to “frame a biblical declaration on evangelism”. Under the leadership of John R.W. Stott, an Anglican pastor in London, the Lausanne covenant was discussed and revised during the congress and finally presented for acceptance. While no single document can represent all Evangelicals,* the covenant is widely acknowledged as a major milestone, reflecting the spirit and stance of the evangelical community in the late 20th century.

In 3000 words, organized in 15 articles, the covenant articulates the biblical basis of the Christian world mission as its signers understood it. Typical of Evangelical hallmarks is article 2: it identifies the Old and New Testaments as “the only written word of God, without error in all that it affirms, and the only infallible rule of faith and practice”. This wording prevailed over one using “inerrancy”, a term many conservatives preferred. Other articles addressed “the uniqueness and universality of Christ”, “Christian social responsibility” (the covenant expresses “penitence... for having sometimes regarded evangelism and social concern as mutually exclusive”) and “the urgency of the evangelistic task”. The last grants that a missionary moratorium* “may sometimes be necessary to facilitate the national church’s growth in self-reliance and to release resources for unevangelized areas”.

Not infrequently the Lausanne covenant is studied alongside of, and compared favourably with, Pope Paul VI’s Evangelization in the Modern World (Evangelii Nuntiandi, 1975), with the section report “Confessing Christ Today” (WCC fifth assembly, Nairobi 1975), and with “Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation”, prepared in 1982 by the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism of the WCC.

The substance of the Lausanne covenant was affirmed and elaborated at the 1989 congress, Lausanne II, in Manila, where Stott again provided leadership in drafting the Manila manifesto, informally affirmed by some 3600 participants.

See also evangelism, Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization.

ROBERT T. COOTE

■ C.R. Padilla ed., The New Face of Evangelicalism: An International Symposium on the Lausanne Covenant, Downers Grove IL, Intervarsity, 1976 ■ J.R.W. Stott ed., Historic Documents from the Lausanne Movement 1974-1989, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1997.

LAW

THE IDEA of law is an indispensable element, and plays an important pragmatic role, in the life of individuals and social groups. At the same time, it is a concept whose content and basis are far from self-evident. Its obscurity is particularly evident in secularized societies (see secularization).

LAW AND JUSTICE

In common usage, what is lawful is confused with what is just, and injustice is what fails to conform with the law. In the legal sense, however, law is what is laid down in a set of rules or norms by the political and social authorities in accordance with various procedures. These rules are embodied in codes which govern the relationships and conduct of human beings in society. Known also as laws, these rules are legion. The proliferation of laws is indeed a salient feature of our societies: whenever a new activity is established, new rules need to be formulated. Thus alongside the penal code and the civil code, which apply in principle to every human being endowed with normal mental capacities, special codes have also come into existence for labour, taxation, social security, various professions (doctors, lawyers, journalists, etc.). Given this proliferation and increasing complexity of laws, the principle to which the courts appeal in penalizing breaches of the law (i.e. “ignorance of the law is no defence”) becomes inapplicable. A significant difference emerges here between law and morality. An enlightened educated conscience ordinarily manages to distinguish between good and evil. But only with the greatest difficulty is the same conscience able to discern what the law allows and what it forbids. It has to consult the experts (lawyer, solicitor, notary, etc.).

In modern societies, law has come to replace custom and tradition, though often retaining many of their elements. But in the attempt to systematize and rationalize, law has become increasingly complex. The effect of this trend has been to deepen the divide between justice* and law, between morality and law. Behind the constant revision of the system of laws lie purely technical considerations, but moral considerations also play a part. It has come to be realized that the law is not always just, that it can even generate injustice. In South Africa, apartheid* was built into the law until 1994, but who would say that this fact made it just? The Geneva convention is an international law regulating the conduct of war; it outlaws the execution or inhumane treatment of prisoners of war and the wounded, attacks on civilians, etc. But even if these regulations were scrupulously respected, the war being fought would not thereby become a just act.

In the Old Testament the terms for law and justice are in practice interchangeable. But we no longer today have the same situation; we are sometimes obliged to combat this or that provision of a legal code in the very interests of justice.

Is there then no longer any connection between law and ethics? No, for many rights recognized by law (the right to life, the right to human dignity, freedom of conscience) are the legal expression of axiomatic moral values. Yet these moral values must also be deeply embedded in custom and be really the expression of majority public opinion. Clearly this is not always the case. Nazism was the subversion at the same time of both law and the moral conscience. In the Christian churches themselves, while there may be a certain consensus on the individual right to property,* there is also very vigorous argument over the limits to this right and the possibility of legal expropriation in the name of justice. The relationship between law and morality may be envisaged schematically as that of two overlapping circles with an area common to them both. This common area varies in size depending on the historical epoch and the society in question. Our impression is that today this common area is contracting.

There are several reasons for this partial dissociation of law and morality. One of the most important is the uncertainty in our secularized and specialized societies concerning the source of law; another is the uncertainty concerning the basis of law.

The source of law. In the Old Testament and in the New, the unique author of law is the holy God, who is just in judgments and who abhors sin.* God is free to delegate divine power to chosen human beings: Moses, judges, kings, priests and also prophets, who denounce the injustice of rulers and people when they depart from God's laws and who declare the just judgments of God on the failure of one or the other to repent. This justice, however, though it can be extremely severe (note the many examples in the book of the prophet Jeremiah), is always set within a divinely initiated covenant* in which God freely chooses a partner (the people of Israel). This covenant is irrevocable, which is why, beyond the threats of dispersion, destruction and annihilation, there shines the hope of re-establishment, re-integration and a happy future. The law – the content of this covenant (the ritual code of Ex. 34:10-26; the decalogue in the strict sense, Ex. 20:2-17 and Deut. 5:6-21), the code of the covenant (Ex. 20:22-23), the code rediscovered in the reign of King Josiah (Deut. 1-26), the holiness code of Lev. 17-26, the priestly code, which is scattered throughout the Pentateuch and deals with the respect due to the institutions which are the basis of Israel's identity (i.e. the sabbath and circumcision) – is not exclusively repressive but is located within a promise of which God is author. It nonetheless fulfills the function of all law, i.e. it regulates the relationships of the people with God, the relationships of human beings with one another, of tribe with tribe.

In many parts, moreover, the law also focuses attention primarily on those who, in virtue of their weakness or marginal situation, are more likely than most to become victims of injustice: the widow, the orphan, the foreigner. God as the author of law is revealed as the friend of the weak. This concern for the weak is emphasized again, even more, in the NT. For the Reformers, particularly Calvin, the rejection of legalism does not intend to diminish the positive functions of the law: to admonish believers, disclose human sinfulness, deter evil, protect the community from the unjust, restrain malefactors, lead to grace, show God's righteousness, encourage believers to do good.

In our modern secularized societies, which, before the rise of technology, were strongly influenced not only by the Judaeo-Christian tradition but also, and sometimes still more strongly, by the Graeco-Roman tradition, the author and guarantor of law has become increasingly a more uncertain, vague and abstract figure. In the Graeco-Roman tradition, law has its source in reason or in human nature as subject to reason, though also the figure of the legislator may be prominent (e.g. Solon). In accordance with the Judaeo-Christian tradition as interpreted by the Catholic church, from the moment Christianity became the official religion of the Roman empire and, above all, from the time the church had to take the place of that empire in its decline, God became once more the legislator par excellence. At the same time, however, the church integrated the idea of the natural or rational law into its theology. To be sure, God is the author of such law. But since God made humanity in God's own image and this image, though damaged by original sin, still subsists in humanity, the law which God wills is one which conforms to, and expresses, the nature of humanity. It is also a rational law, since reason is the human faculty least damaged by sin. But God delegates power to establish and interpret laws to the human beings God has specially chosen – and first and foremost to the head of the church, the pope. It can be said that the church was the sole lawgiver in the West in the 12th century and that, thanks to the work of the monk Gratian in compiling what is known as Gratian's Decretum (c.1140), not only the church but society as a whole was ruled by the same canon law* (see church and state).

This reign of canon law was fairly brief (though it lasted until 1919 in the church), since the temporal lords (emperor, king, prince, free town) claimed the right to publish a civil law more or less independent of canon law. This second source of law explains many conflicts, for it introduced a certain secularization of law. In virtue of their consecration, emperors and kings to some extent share the religious authority. Just as the pope is assisted by the council, so too are temporal lords assisted in their legislative task by assemblies: the diet in the holy Roman empire, the provincial or national "estates" and parliaments in certain kingdoms (England, France, etc.).

The breach caused by the Reformation in the corpus Christianum and the constitution of national churches are related to this development. The two-kingdoms doctrine – formulated in similar terms although with different emphases by Luther and Calvin – marks the beginning of the secularization of law. The temporal lord was not to meddle in spiritual matters, and the churches recognized the lord's right to legislate in the temporal realm. In Reformation thought, however, it still remains clear that these two legislative powers (independent but parallel) are both meant to serve the dual aspects of the same goal – the conservation and the salvation* of creation – and that both aspects are conjoined in God.

The advent of constitutional monarchies and democracies in the West from the 18th century onwards modified radically the system of law and ended in the establishment of an exclusively civil law. Legislative power was gradually passed to elected assemblies in a variety of arrangements, and in the future, despite the emergence here and there of unchecked dictatorial regimes, the notion of "popular sovereignty" prevailed. The people, holding power directly but more often indirectly through its elected representatives, became the sole author of law. A constitutional state is one whose laws are voted by the majority of the people's representatives, are universally valid throughout the nation and cannot have retrospective force. But what one parliament has done can obviously be undone by its successor. Another feature of the constitutional state is the separation of powers. Parliament legislates and controls the application of laws though the executive (government), whose power to make rules and regulations is limited to the framework defined by the laws. A third power, independent of the two already mentioned, is charged with the punishment of breaches of the law by individuals, social groups and even the administration itself.

While democracy has in this way made a major contribution to the promotion of human rights (especially the idea that all human beings are equal before the law) and diminished the arbitrary exercise of power by an authority believing itself free simply to do as it pleases, still it rests in a morally debatable postulate, namely, that the popular will as expressed in free elections is the sole source of all law. Is it legitimate to affirm as axiomatic that the voice of the people equals the voice of God (vox populi, vox Dei)? Laws are rarely passed unanimously; the majority imposes its will. But is it enough to be in a majority to be also in the right? Nothing could be less axiomatic. Who would dare to claim that the code of law which emerges is always just? Even in a genuine democracy, might not an appeal be appropriate against a law promulgated by the political establishment (as of Antigone against the law of Creon)? One of the tasks of the Christian church, whether or not it enjoys full freedom within a state, is in certain circumstances to oppose the law in the name of justice and, by its influence on public opinion, to secure a change in the law whenever it violates the dignity of God's creatures and the integrity of God's creation (see the statement adopted by the 1968 Uppsala assembly on the role of the churches in the formation of public opinion).

A number of modern democracies have realized the dangers of an exclusive appeal to popular sovereignty. They have therefore provided themselves with constitutions and declarations of human rights* which, placed above the laws voted by parliament, constitute a possible court of appeal against unjust laws. Although these constitutions and declarations have themselves also been established by popular suffrage, they nevertheless constitute a sort of self-limitation which checks and balances the power of the legislature, particularly if there are supreme courts or constitutional councils with a mandate to monitor the agreement of laws with constitutional principles. But such institutions must enjoy genuine autonomy vis-a-vis the political establishment. These fundamental texts (e.g. the 1945 Universal Declaration of Human Rights; the 1966 covenants on economic, social and cultural rights; the international conventions on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination and on the rights of the child finalized in 1989) often contain principles in a secularized form which nonetheless reflect values deriving from the Judaeo-Christian tradition.

The content of law. The same uncertainty surrounding the source of the law also clouds its content. Lawyers have always distinguished between, on the one hand, a fundamental law or right, often called natural law,* which is in principle unaffected by the hazards of politics and out of reach of modification by political regimes, and, on the other hand, a positive law as elaborated by legislative bodies with the aid of experts. Natural law is held in principle to be superior to positive law. Unfortunately, this natural law is often left undefined and of uncertain content, especially at the international level. During the famous Nuremberg trials, international judges had to formulate the concept of "a crime against humanity", which had never previously been either defined or recognized. In consequence, regardless of the monstrous acts these judges had to penalize, it is impossible to recall this historic trial without a certain feeling of unease. The Nazi leaders were condemned in the name of a law made retrospective in effect, which constitutes, from a formal standpoint, a dangerous precedent. It is indeed difficult to predict just how far "man's inhumanity to man" may go; some legal scholars therefore proposed the notion of "a natural law with variable content", but this too is a bastard concept.

As for positive law, the proliferation of special codes has often made it difficult to identify its basis. Projects of laws which are submitted to parliamentary vote generally emanate not from the parliament itself or even from the government. The latter may have intuited the existence of a need – or the absence of any need – to legislate on a given matter. The content of the proposed text, however, is drafted by specialists, experts and lawyers. A veritable legal technology has established itself in our modern societies. Taught and brought to perfection in the law faculties, it enjoys a real autonomy and is sometimes constructed in accordance with mathematical models. In consequence, the relation between positive law and natural law becomes extremely problematic. The difficulty is not a new one. In the OT the decalogue, with its very clear profile and perfect intelligibility, was taken in hand by doctors of the law who developed a real casuistry which was hard to understand and already constituted a legal technology. In our modern societies, however, where the need has been felt to develop a fiscal law, a commercial law, an industrial law, etc., legal technology has undergone a considerable scientific development.

The fundamental uncertainty surrounding both the source and the content of law in modern secularized societies and the relationships existing between natural or rational or even universal law and positive law can actually result in a growing gap between law, on the one hand, and justice and equity, on the other. We continue to honour with the name of justice the courts whose business it is to state the law, ensure respect for the law and determine the penalties to be imposed in order to erase infringements of the law and to prevent it from falling into desuetude. But the law which the courts enunciate can be unjust law. In democratic regimes, to be sure, parliaments can always revoke an unjust law and replace it by a more equitable one. But parliaments are inescapably exposed to the pressures of a public opinion which can itself be moved by concerns which have nothing to do with justice. Economic interests, class interests, racial interests can direct the passing of the laws which the courts must implement.

ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION

In view of the gap between (1) law and (2) equity or justice, what attitude are Christians and churches to adopt towards law? The ecumenical movement, especially in its early stages, made several attempts to come to grips with this question. The issue of penal theories was discussed at the Stockholm Life and Work* conference in 1925, and at a similar conference in Oxford in 1937 the question of law was placed in the context of church-state relations. After 1945 the study department of the WCC discussed the relationship of law and justice to biblical authority in the modern world. Questions of natural law, law and ethics,* and international law and justice were debated at several conferences, as well as the question of a Trinitarian and Christological approach to law and justice. These conferences culminated in 1950 in a conference in Treysa, Federal Republic of Germany, and the publication of The Biblical Doctrine of Justice and Law (1955). The WCC's 1975 Nairobi assembly, the Melbourne declaration on participation in struggles for human rights (1980) and the 1983 publication on human rights in the ecumenical agenda have continued and deepened this tradition.

On the basis of our own study and the ecumenical discussion of this theme, the answer to the question may be summarized in the following points. First, Christians and churches must defend the constitutional state, i.e. a state in which each citizen enjoys equality before the law and is not judged according to one's opinions but only according to one's actions measured against a law promulgated prior to these actions. They must therefore resist the opposing dangers of anarchy and tyranny. Civil disobedience and even revolution may be necessary as a last resort in a situation of flagrant injustice and violation of justice, but the legal vacuum thus created must be speedily filled to avoid the danger of a reign of terror.

Second, Christians and churches must be especially vigilant to point out and denounce a growing gap between law and justice as well as violations of justice, a stand taken courageously by organizations such as Amnesty International, the WCC, and Action of Christians for the Abolition of Torture. Although Christians should as a rule be reformist rather than revolutionary, revolution can be a final resort when all attempts at reform fail.

Third, Christians and churches should constantly re-examine the law established by legislation, not only because it may be unjust, but also because account must be taken of new problems, such as those arising from advances in biology and the human sciences (bio-ethics,* genetic engineering, euthanasia,* abortion,* etc.). But while recognizing the need for legislation, conscience and responsibility may in certain circumstances set a limit to the intervention of law.

Fourth, Christians and churches regard the word of God* as the norm for their conduct. This norm holds good whenever a body of law must be formulated and clothed with authority, but it would be legalistic to look for ready-made answers in scripture to all legal problems. We find in scripture indications, directions and warnings about limits that may not be transgressed, but it offers no possibility of formulating "a Christian legislation". Above all, in Jesus Christ, scripture provides a fundamental inspiration which Paul calls the law of love.

Finally, the realm of law is not that of love. The law authorizes, forbids and punishes. In the creation of law, however, Christians and churches should do their utmost to ensure that despite its inadequacies, the law remains – in the words of Karl Barth – analogous to the order and justice of the kingdom of God.* Law is not ethics, but the creation of law is an ethical task which cannot be left solely either to political authorities or in the hands of experts. Christians should not try to impose the demands of their Christian faith on all the rest of their society, although they are indeed called to promote a law which is universal in scope. They should devote themselves to this task in a way which corresponds to the provisional order of this sinful world.

See also authority, international law, order.

ROGER MEHL

■ J. Ellul, Le fondement théologique du droit (ET The Theological Foundation of Law, Garden City NY, Doubleday, 1960) ■ R. Cotterrell, Emile Durkheim: Law in a Moral Domain, Edinburgh, Edinburgh UP, 1999.

LEUENBERG CHURCH FELLOWSHIP

THE LEUENBERG Church Fellowship (LCF) comprises over 100 churches – Lutheran, Reformed, United, Hussite, Waldensian, and Czech Brethren – which have by now endorsed the original Leuenberg agreement of 1973 (see Lutheran-Reformed dialogue) or, as with the Methodists, signed a “joint declaration of church fellowship”. Located principally in Europe (though including some South American churches earlier founded by German immigrants), these “churches with different confessional positions accord each other fellowship in word and sacrament and strive for the fullest possible cooperation in witness and service to the world” (LA 29). The relationship includes mutual recognition of ordination and the practice of reciprocal presidency at the Lord’s table.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

LEX ORANDI, LEX CREDENDI

LITERALLY “law of praying, law of believing”, the Latin tag “lex orandi, lex credendi” is used with varying degrees of precision. Its origin resides in the phrase ut legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi, which was long attributed to Pope Celestine I (422-32) but is now considered to come from a lay monk of that time, Prosper of Aquitaine. A disciple of Augustine, Prosper was arguing against semi-Pelagianism that all true faith, even the beginnings of good will as well as growth and perseverance, is from start to finish a work of grace.* In various writings he points out that, following 1 Tim. 2:1-4, catholic churches everywhere, led by the Spirit of God, daily plead the cause of the human race, asking that all categories of unbelievers may be brought to salvation. In this context, the expression then means quite precisely that “the apostolic injunction to pray [for all people, which the church obeys in its intercessions, that they may come to the faith] sets the obligation to believe [that even the first motions towards faith are themselves a gift of God]”.

In more recent use, the phrase has come to represent the more general claim – which may be descriptive and/or normative – that liturgical practice has in historical fact governed, and/or should in theological right govern, what is taught, whether as solemn dogma, official doctrine, catechetical instruction or academic exposition. Historically, it can easily be shown, for instance, that the worship of Christ, the practice already in the first three centuries of addressing praise and prayers to him, helped to establish the Nicene teaching of the Son as homoousios with the Father, the dogmatic recognition of Christ’s deity. Theologically, it can be argued that the more immediate, spontaneous act of worship rightly possesses priority over the more distanced activity of theological reflection itself, in which believers, as it were, “step back” a little to think about their faith.

From historical research and theological reflection, however, it soon emerges that it is too simple, both descriptively and normatively, to attribute priority to “praying” over “teaching”, or at least to see the shaping and controlling influences as flowing only in the one direction; and so the abbreviated phrase “lex orandi, lex credendi” often serves, in a vague but useful way, as a rubric under which to explore, both historically and theologically, the rather complex relationships between worship and doctrine. To stay with the example of Christ’s deity: it can only have been by theological reflection – admittedly on the basis of a present experience of salvation* in Christ – that Christians very early came to attribute to him a role in the creation of the world, which they then sang in the hymns from which the apostle in turn quotes in a doctrinal argument (1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:15-20); and in its own day, the council of Nicea chose to insert its teaching in a creed,* a form which was used in both catechesis* and baptism* and which before too long found a place also in the eucharistic liturgy. Nor did the Arians, however, hesitate to appeal to the catholic liturgy for evidence of an alleged “subordination” of the Son, which the Nicenes then had the theological task of explaining in an orthodox sense. Clearly there is much historical material here for theological reflection.

WORSHIP AND DOCTRINE DISTINGUISHED

Perhaps the first task is to see how and why worship and doctrine inevitably became and become distinguished and the problems which, with equal inevitability, thereby arise. According to the gospels, the first declaration of the Christian faith can be either a second-person address to its object (“You are the Christ”, Mark 8:29) or a first-person proclamation to others concerning him (“We have found the Christ”, John 1:41). Transferred to the third person, the confession “Jesus is Lord” (Rom. 10:9; 1 Cor. 12:3) is at once an acclamation, an announcement and an assertion. In the most elemental cases of Christian speech, “liturgy” and “doctrine” thus coincide. However, a diversification of purposes and contexts soon brings a differentiation of linguistic usage.

In its loving address to God, worship tends towards exuberance and abandon. In the very act of self-surrender (note “a sacrifice of praise”, Heb. 13:15), worshippers will not find it necessary to justify what is taking place, but they will quickly want to sing the praises of their divine Lover before the world.

In evangelization Christian preachers have to accommodate to the culture* which is hearing the gospel for the first time. Other languages will be corrected and filled, converted and brought captive to Christ, as their speakers are challenged and changed by the gospel. This process, when successful, will also enrich the linguistic repertoire of the whole Christian tradition.

In apologetics the defenders of the faith engage with those who resist, oppose and even attack it. Here language acquires a sharp point, a combative edge. Yet the aim must remain to persuade opponents and win them for God’s church and kingdom. Linguistic swords and spears are destined to become ploughshares and pruning hooks.

In its internal controversies the church is seeking by argument to clarify the gospel and the faith.* Fine distinctions are drawn. When, after examination and debate, a position is deemed heretical, a doctrinal definition is made that will exclude it. In a combination of positive statement and explicit or implicit exclusion, the definition declares the faith. It thereby sets the rules for other Christian speech on the topic and may even itself get taken up into direct doxological usage.

Signalled by the shifts and variety of linguistic usage, an element of theological reflection thus belongs to debate within the church, to the defence and proclamation of the gospel, and even to the Christian worship of God. While such reflection, which also develops its own linguistic style, is in a sense secondary, it is not essentially alien to the faith. Since the gospel is addressed to the whole person and calls for a total response, faith involves the intelligence from the very start. The initial gift and act of faith already contain a moment of understanding, the intellectus fidei, whereby God enlightens the heart and mind and enables it to accept the truth of God’s own being and history as these are testified in the gospel.

Since Christians speak differently according to these different functions and circumstances just enumerated, there is a danger that they will cease to be substantially consistent. There is a perpetual need to correlate what is said in the several modes in order to ensure that the reference and meaning remain the same. Part of the servant task of reflective theology is to assist in that correlation for the sake of the more primary activities of the church. Yet it is also in reflective theology that critical inquiry and speculative construction may seek to rule and thereby lose touch with the message and purpose. The over-riding consideration must, of course, be fidelity to the gospel (lex credendi), so that God may be rightly glorified (lex orandi). That is not the responsibility solely of reflective theology, let alone “professional theologians”. The controversial question of pastoral authority inescapably arises.

CONFESSIONAL PATTERNS IN CONTROVERSY

There is a case to be made that differences, both theoretical and practical, in handling the sometimes problematic relations between worship and doctrine have played a part in the maintenance, and perhaps even the origin, of different “confessional identities” within the broader Christian movement. At the unavoidable risk of caricature, three or four types may be sketched by way of example. The purpose of this analysis is to set the background for various efforts already made towards some use of a lex orandi, lex credendi approach in ecumenism, and for some suggestions as to what is further needed.

In Eastern Orthodoxy the relation between worship and doctrine is so close that the Reformed theologian Dietrich Ritschl was misled into suspecting that the Orthodox “worship the doctrine of the Trinity” (Zur Logik der Theologie, 1984, 154). Certainly the Orthodox liturgy bears a high dogmatic density, and Orthodox theologians in turn are expected to operate within and for the worshipping community. The Orthodox do not make the sharp distinction between the doxological and the scientific genres that the more critical Westerners make. The heavy reliance upon inherited texts certainly raises hermeneutical problems (see hermeneutics); but the writings of an Alexander Schmemmann, such as his theological commentary on the rites of initiation (Of Water and the Spirit, 1974) and his The Eucharist – Sacrament of the Kingdom (1987), show that it is possible to expound the Tradition* from within its own continuum in ways that challenge rather than simply confirm the surrounding culture. Nevertheless, Orthodox theologians rightly owe their Western counterparts an account of the authority* that is accorded to the liturgy, as also of what is happening when the liturgical tradition becomes (as Schmemmann admits) distorted in certain particulars, and of the criteria and means of correction.

Roman Catholicism offers some notable examples of devotion leading doctrine. But even here the matter is complex. For while, say, the spontaneous celebration of Mary’s holiness marks a starting point, it took many centuries of theological debate – and this in relation to the (itself speculative) Augustinian interpretation of original sin – before Pius IX came in 1854 to the point of declaring her immaculate conception as a dogma,* thereby re-inforcing also the obligatory character of its feast (which it had not enjoyed before the 18th century). The Roman see has in fact a history of increasing doctrinal and pastoral control over the worship of churches in the papal communion, so that Pius XII, speaking magisterially in Mediator Dei (1947), could even reverse the ancient maxim to say that “the law of believing must set the law of praying”, in the sense that the liturgy “is subject to the church’s supreme teaching authority”.

The Protestant Reformation may be understood, at least in part, as a doctrinal revolt, on the basis of a Bible that was believed to be clear in its own message, against liturgical and devotional practices that expressed false understandings of God, humankind and salvation. In the revised, recast – indeed, newly created – service books, the reformers sought to provide for worship that would be in accord with the pure gospel. In turn, of course, the worship service would function as a teaching instrument, so that it would indeed sometimes acquire such a strongly didactic character that the prayers and sermons sound like courses in dogmatic or moral theology rather than praise and proclamation.

Anglicans, with appeal to a more or less uniform Book of Common Prayer, have often proposed an ostensive definition of their faith: “If you want to know what we believe, look at what we pray” (and Methodists have sometimes pointed in a similar way to the Wesley hymns). But, as S.W. Sykes has shown in The Integrity of Anglicanism (1978) and The Identity of Christianity (1984), this is to be rather disingenuous about the play of forces between scripture, Tradition, experience, reason, culture and church order. As recent liturgical revisions in most Western churches have made clear, all these factors enter into any theologically responsible attempt to shape and re-shape worship; and “books” of worship have to be in some way both authorized and accepted within the communities for which they are intended.

ECUMENICAL EFFORTS AND POSSIBILITIES

In a seminal essay of 1957 on "The Structure of Dogmatic Statements as an Ecumenical Problem", the Lutheran Edmund Schlink observed that a "category shift" takes place when what is expressed in prayer and preaching is translated into the form of dogma. In worship and witness, we face God and our fellow human beings more directly. In dogmatic statements, however, we are talking about (the proper way to) worship and witness; we are teaching about God, God's acts, and the human response. The risk is that the teacher withdraws to "a neutral position from which the encounter between God and man may be observed, described and be cast into didactic formulas". Problems arise when "attention moves away from the experience of salvation which comes through the gospel and is concentrated instead on giving a theoretical definition of the relationship between the divine and human contributions in redemption". Schlink holds that the "structural change" from doxology to doctrine is responsible for some of the most persistent dogmatic problems in Christendom, for it is at the second level that differences show up. Schlink is not so naive as to think that dogma is unnecessary, but it is secondary and subject to marked historical and anthropological conditioning. He proposes an ecumenical concentration upon the primary forms of worship and witness, where (he is persuaded) we shall re-discover an already-existing unity and fullness which differences in doctrinal statements had obscured.

Meanwhile, the Roman Catholic theologian H.J. Schulz in 1976 devoted a substantial book to arguing that an adequate "unity in faith" can be drawn from the ancient eucharistic tradition which the divided churches have retained or restored. The words, actions and celebration of the eucharistic rites, and particularly the great eucharistic prayer or anaphora, provide sufficient expression of Trinitarian faith and of doctrine concerning church, sacraments and ministry. It was to relations between the Roman and the Eastern churches that Schulz gave most attention, but he saw positive prospects also for reconciliation with the churches of the Reformation by this route. (In a later work, of 1996, Schulz pointed even more sharply the priority of "confession" over "dogma".)

Faith and Order* was already working along somewhat similar lines and across the widest ecumenical range, as the Lima text on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* was to show (1982). The principal source of BEM was the holy scriptures, which are themselves the main liturgical book of the church: much of the material in the scriptures arose in the context of worship or was destined for it; it was their use in worship which helped to establish the canonical status of the biblical writings (see canon); and the liturgical assembly remained the chief locus of their preservation, transmission and interpretation. That the scriptures thus used within the continuing Tradition govern BEM is appreciated by the official response of the Roman Catholic Church, which says in part: "The sources employed for the interpretation of the meaning of the eucharist and the form of celebration are scripture and Tradition. The classical liturgies of the first millennium and patristic theology are important points of reference in this text." Or in the words of the response from the United Methodist Church, USA: "BEM deftly unites the truths and testimonies of the New Testament and the ecumenical creeds." The popular reception of the Lima liturgy* in many places – even though it was an "occasional" composition which does not enjoy the "maturity" of BEM itself – is at least an indication of the felt need for an instrument whereby a common faith can be confessed, celebrated, proclaimed and taught together.

Yet the responses of the churches to BEM also indicate that there is still some way to go along this liturgical road to fuller unity in faith, order and life. While BEM is found to imply a significant rudimentary agreement in matters of Trinity, Christology, soteriology, ecclesiology and eschatology, most churches still require greater clarification and confirmation of the dogmatic context before unity can be declared. Hence the importance of the F&O project "Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today". Here again it is remarkable that the Apostles' and Nicene creeds were taken as the "theological basis and methodological tool" of the study. For it is the faith learned in catechesis, confessed at baptism and renewed by the eucharist which brings closest together the lex orandi and the lex credendi. It is an encouraging fact that several prominent contemporary theologians have expounded the faith in terms of the creeds: thus Karl Barth's Dogmatics in Outline (1947, ET 1949), Joseph Ratzinger's Introduction to the Christian Faith (1968, ET 1969), Wolfhart Pannenberg's The Apostles' Creed in the Light of Today's Questions (1972, ET 1972), Jan Milic Lochman's The Faith We Confess – an Ecumenical Dogmatics (1982, ET 1984).

Our theme returned to the Faith and Order agenda following the fifth world conference at Santiago de Compostela (1993). A consultation held at Ditchingham (near Norwich), England, in 1994 produced a significant report that began to draw out the theological and practical implications for growth in ecclesial koinonia* of several developments in liturgical life during the 20th century: "convergence towards fundamental patterns of Christian worship... rooted in the New Testament, witnessed to in the sources of the ancient church, practised increasingly, and with more conscious intent, among more and more churches today"; inculturation,* whereby "different local churches... tend to grow together in adopting local cultural forms to express the universal Christian faith"; and the experience of uniting churches, where "theological agreements are put into liturgical form, thus bringing them most effectively into the life of local congregations", and of ecumenical parishes, where "together various traditions shape worship which expresses their commitment to common confession, witness and work".

What Yves Congar says of the Dombes Group (see Groupe des Dombes) is true of much modern ecumenical work towards doctrinal agreement: "The hallmark of their method is the integration of theological discussion and prayer, and the fecundity of the Group is due to this interaction"; and it is by pressing on in this direction, both theoretically and practically, that divided Christendom may most likely come to a unity in a lex orandi and a lex credendi that are themselves mutually consistent. The mainspring of the ecumenical movement from the start has been the prayer of Jesus, into which Christians themselves have entered, that they might be one in order that, through their witness to the faith, the world also might believe in the divine mission of the Son (John 17).

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

- T.F. Best & D. Heller eds, So We Believe, So We Pray: Towards Koinonia in Worship, WCC, 1995
- K. Federer, Liturgie und Glaube. Eine theologiegeschichtliche Untersuchung, Fribourg, Paulus, 1950
- K. Schlemmer ed., Gottesdienst – Weg zur Einheit. Impulse für die Ökumene, Freiburg, Herder, 1989
- E. Schlink, Der kommende Christus und die kirchlichen Traditionen (ET The Coming Christ and the Coming Church, Edinburgh, Oliver & Boyd, 1967, esp. pp.16-84)
- H.J. Schulz, Bekennnis statt Dogma: Kriterien der Verbindlichkeit kirchlicher Lehre, Freiburg, Herder, 1996
- H.J. Schulz, Ökumenische Glaubenseinheit aus eucharistischer Überlieferung, Paderborn, Bonifatius, 1976
- C. Vagagini, Il senso teologico delle liturgia (ET Theological Dimensions of the Liturgy, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1976)
- G. Wainwright, Doxology: The Praise of God in Worship, Doctrine and Life, London, Epworth, 1980
- G. Wainwright, Worship with One Accord: Where Liturgy and Ecumenism Embrace, New York, Oxford UP, 1997.

LIBERATION

THE WORD "liberation" has assumed a special significance in ecumenical discussion, providing a touchstone for determining an authentic mode of theologizing and a fundamental guideline for ethical reflection and action.

Broadly defined, liberation is a process by which a subjugated or marginalized group of people, having gained an awareness of their condition of oppression, take control of their destiny and fight until overthrowing all the fetters of bondage. This process may include a new social consciousness (conscientization) in a submerged group, appropriation of the means of production by the poor,* a freeing from colonialism,* movements against racially oppressive and authoritative regimes and organized struggle against all forms of cultural and gender domination. Liberation involves the struggle of the marginalized everywhere – blacks, women, dalits, tribal and indigenous people, landless and unorganized workers – for their dignity and justice.

The perspective of people as subjects of history, who resist manipulation by external forces, raises sharp challenges to traditional ways of knowledge, ideologies, systems of government, church structures and forms of service. Education that legitimizes the value system of the dominant groups in a given society is rejected for the sake of education for liberation. Social action directed towards a radical alteration of unjust structures is preferred to charitable services which cause no ripples in the existing system.

In three areas of concern, liberation has brought a distinctively new emphasis: development, political movement and theology.

DEVELOPMENT

The concept of development* is gradually being replaced by the more dynamic and humanistic concept of liberation. The term “development” does not adequately express the aspirations of the poorer nations and peoples simply because, even after considerable developmental activities, a wide gap remains between the rich and the poor countries. The pattern of economic growth today is linked with globalization, which integrates economies of the different countries into the world capitalist system. The most significant aspect of this integration is the increasing centralization of the world’s production and trade in the hands of a few hundred multinational companies and financial institutions like the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. Media and information systems are agents of this development and its culture. Human relationships are distorted by a consumerist ideology and life-style, which a commodity mentality pervades. Rural communities that had maintained a degree of interpersonal relationships are fast coming under the influence of technology, which destroys much of the traditional infrastructure. It is increasingly realized today that liberation from the domination of economically powerful countries is a prerequisite for the development of countries in the third world. Unless development is placed within the control of international social justice, “development” is an empty word.

Economic development within the third-world countries, which is controlled by a powerful elite with the cooperation of multinationals and external resources, favours the rich and continues to create imbalances between different sections of the people. Capital investment is concentrated primarily in the industrial or advanced sector in the belief that rapid industrialization will create conditions for wider use of the abundant labour available and reduce inequalities in income distribution. In fact, however, the advanced sector achieves considerably more expansion, leading to the greater relative impoverishment of the traditional sector, thus widening the gap between the two. In other words, the majority of the population are left outside the development process. This growth-oriented development has the concomitant problem of ecological crisis, with pressures created on the ecosystem largely caused by the life-style of the rich. Without a change, pollution and other ecological problems will only worsen.

As a critical response to this scenario, development needs to become a liberating process. Ecumenical documents, particularly those of the WCC’s Commission on the Churches’ Participation in Development (CCPD) and material related to issues of justice, peace and the integrity of creation, articulate this perspective forcefully. The central issue is posed as “development by whom and for whom?” Development becomes a liberating process when the oppressed and marginal are able to identify their own needs, mobilize their own resources and shape their future on their own terms. The church is challenged to commit itself to that form of development.

POLITICAL MOVEMENT

The political dimension of liberation is best illustrated in the freedom fighting in Asia and Africa that led to the overthrow of colonialism (see decolonization). Today liberation struggles are being waged on many fronts. Some vestiges of colonialism and forces of neo-colonialism continue to strangle the life of many countries in the third world. Regimes by racial minorities and military dictatorships and other totalitarian systems of governments continue to oppress people.

Even in presumably democratic countries in the third world, the political system often features a concentration of the decision-making process in the hands of persons or groups whose interests are fundamentally inimical to the well-being of life as a whole. They typically keep the masses away from the centres of power and fail to resolve the basic problems of mass poverty, glaring inequalities, growing unemployment and rising prices. Organized efforts by the masses to redress their grievances may be brutally suppressed. Imposition of authoritarian and repressive regimes, denial of human rights and excessive dependence on foreign resources are the natural consequences of domination by the elite.

The emergence of liberation groups as a countervailing power to unjust systems of government has created many situations of conflict, some of which have turned violent. What form must a Christian presence take in the face of such violent conflicts? Dogmatic renunciation of violence can reduce Christian principles to empty slogans and talk of justice to a mockery. But uncritical acceptance of violence destroys the critical edge of our Christian witness to the gospel of love. This issue cannot be settled in abstract academic debate. The church's commitment to violent or non-violent strategies must be evaluated in each situation in light of its overall commitment to liberation. In any case, the church's commitment to liberation necessarily expresses itself in its solidarity with liberation movements.

THEOLOGY

Concern for liberation has brought a distinctly new emphasis in theology (see theology, liberation). Radically challenging the traditional mode of theologizing at every point, Latin American theologians have argued that authentic theology is reflection on faith and praxis for the poor. A commitment to liberation is the starting point from which to think through the faith.

The concept of liberation appears in ancient philosophy and in the religions of Asia, where it is primarily personal and interior and does not envisage any radical change of social structure. The present emphasis, however, situates liberation in concrete historical events (see history) and arises out of a fresh reading of the Bible). The God of the Bible is a liberator God, the God of the exodus. The biblical view of liberation is integral, not divided into an inner, private or religious realm and an outer, public or secular realm. It is from the outset a personal and social reality which brings the whole common life to a new fruition. Furthermore, there is a recognition that the poor play a pivotal role in God's liberation.

Asian discussion of biblical liberation has emphasized its cultural and religious dimensions. More than a class struggle, it is seen there as a religious experience of the poor. To affirm the biblical faith in the liberator God is to affirm a life in solidarity with the poor. But in a context like Asia, where the majority of the poor are not Christians, to make this affirmation is to enter deeply into the religious and cultural (non-Christian) experience of the poor. The conviction gained is that in the third world, where all religions together face the challenges of enslaving social and cultural systems and the need to struggle for justice, religions should meet each other, exploring and sharing their liberative elements. Inter-religious dialogue should be concerned about what each religion can contribute to human liberation.

See also globalization, economic; hermeneutics; violence and non-violence.

K.C. ABRAHAM

- N.S. Ateek, Justice and Only Justice: A Palestinian Theology of Liberation, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1989
- J. Comblin, The Holy Spirit and Liberation, London, Burns & Oates, 1989
- M.H. Ellis & O. Maduro eds, The Future of Liberation Theology: Essays in Honour of Gustavo Gutiérrez, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1989
- A.T. Hennelly, Liberation Theology: A Documentary History, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1990
- J. Pixley & C. Boff, The Bible, the Church and the Poor: Biblical Theological and Pastoral Aspects of the Option for the Poor, London, Burns & Oates, 1989
- J. Rieger ed., Liberating the Future: God, Mammon and Theology, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1998
- V. Wan-Tatah, Emancipation in African Theology: An Inquiry on the Relevance of Latin American Liberation Theology to Africa, New York, Lang, 1989.

LIBERTY/FREEDOM

THE TENSION between freedom and order* at the ethico-social and political and economic levels represents a dialectics that seems intrinsic to human culture* and that finds expression in one's theology of humankind and of the church.* Although this article is concerned with liberty as related to theological social ethics in the ecumenical movement, such discussion should not be isolated from the wider cultural and theological context.

USE OF THE NOTION OF LIBERTY/FREEDOM

At the ethico-social level, the tension has been present in the discussion of development,* reform and revolution* as the relative priorities between justice and order, in the economic debates about planned and market economies and in the consideration of the role of the state* in granting security for the whole society and preserving individual rights and liberties. The effort to find a balanced and dynamic relation of these terms is clearly visible in the attempts to delineate a type or vision of society which can become a criterion for judging and a stimulus for pursuing a social order closer to God's design and human fulfilment. From the beginning of the ecumenical movement, the ideal of freedom/liberty played an important role. It is part of the mandate of the WCC to assist the churches in combating poverty, injustice and oppression and to facilitate ecumenical cooperation in service to human need and in promoting freedom, justice, peace, human dignity and world community. However, the concept of liberty/freedom as a basic element of social organization was never systematically analyzed in WCC studies and discussions, which makes it impossible to provide a neat conceptual or philosophical account of the way in which it has been understood in the ecumenical movement.

The reasons for this situation are manifold: in many different contexts and studies the word "freedom" has been used almost rhetorically, as if its meaning were clear and speaks for itself: freedom of the church itself, freedom within the church, freedom as "freedom for" as opposed to "freedom from", freedom "through" but also "from" technology, freedom from poverty, freedom "from" but also "for" culture, freedom from racism,* freedom from sexism,* freedom from national-security or law-and-order ideologies. Even when it was used in the theme of conferences, meetings or study groups, it was not necessarily reflected in the documents but almost seen as a generally accepted umbrella term.

Several synonymous terms have been and still are used in ecumenical documents on the structuring of society, e.g. self-reliance, affirming the selfhood of people, self-government, self-determination, defending human dignity, participation, people's power, emancipation. The plural "liberties" was part of the human rights studies, which in itself witnessed a shift from an accent on individual rights and liberties to contextual involvement in the struggles for social rights, especially in third-world situations.

As religious liberty,* it has been an important issue since Oxford's report on church and state (1937). As liberation,* it was introduced in the early 1970s to replace the concept of development.

FREEDOM IN ECUMENICAL HISTORY

Some important events, conferences and documents are highlighted here, indicating a few general periods and trends.

The pre-WCC period (1925-48) can be seen as a first phase. The accent of ecumenical social thought was on a commitment to social justice* and peace,* conceived mainly in terms of Western perspectives on justice, human dignity and freedoms.

Stockholm (1925) offered an idealistic vision of Christian action in society. The Oxford conference on "Church, Community and State" (1937) then focused more realistically on the ambiguity of all attempts at achieving social justice, emphasizing among other things economic planning and justice in a "free society". It offered criticisms both of "the economic order in the industrialized world", and of "the actual development of communism". Although reflecting the views of its participants, coming mainly from industrialized democracies and presupposing the existence of dominantly capitalistic economies, it did not identify Christianity with capitalism* or any other system.

During a second phase, the Amsterdam period (1948-61), the first WCC formulations of political and economic policy were made. Now the concept of liberty/freedom was used in important definitions, still from the then-prevailing Western, first-world perspective, within the context of the search for a responsible society.*

J.H. Oldham defended the preference for a “free” or “responsible” society, in the world power struggle of the time, by saying that “two things belong inseparably together – liberty and equal justice”. The term “responsible society” was preferable to “free society”, which was associated with old-fashioned laissez-faire liberalism. In explaining the principles of this vision, Oldham said: “Christians must stand firmly for the freedom of men to obey God and to act in accordance with their conscience. This is the foundation of a responsible society... To obey God men must be free to seek the truth, to speak the truth and to educate one another through a common search for the truth. Only through the freedom of its members to expose error, to criticize existing institutions and to express fresh creative ideas can society advance to fresh levels of life... Political freedom [the freedom of a people to control, criticize and change its government] is the foundation and guarantee of all other freedoms. It is not the source of all freedoms... But so far as freedom in an earthly society is involved, no freedoms are in the long run secure without political freedom” (The Church and the Disorder of Society, 1948, 147,152).

The report of the WCC’s founding assembly in Amsterdam (1948) summarized: “For a society to be responsible under modern conditions, it is required that the people have freedom to control, to criticize and to change their governments, that the power be made responsible by law and tradition, and be distributed as widely as possible through the whole community. It is required that economic justice and provision of equality of opportunity be established for all members of society” (77-78). The perspective was clear: “A responsible society is one where freedom is the freedom of men who acknowledge responsibility to justice and public order.”

Already in the first year after the assembly, the commission on Christian action in society made the vital connection between freedom and social justice even clearer: “Freedom lacks substance unless it is combined with economic justice, and... the quest for economic justice leads to new forms of oppression unless it is united with an insistent concern for political and spiritual freedom.”

Through the 1950s, this tension remained, while attention was increasingly focused on worldwide movements for political and economic independence and self-determination, especially in areas of rapid social change. This development, together with the rapidly changing constituency of the ecumenical movement itself, made it urgent that the applicability of ecumenical social thought to the new situations be reviewed.

The years 1962-68 can be regarded as a third phase, “a time of review” (Paul Abrecht). The 1966 Geneva world conference on Church and Society represented the focal point of this process. The report on “Towards Justice and Peace in International Affairs” from Uppsala (1968) clearly reflected the new orientation. The central concerns were no longer freedom and order in the framework of a responsible world society but, rather, social justice and human dignity.

The period beginning in 1969 brought a next phase, that of liberation ecumenism, of impatience with the approach to social ethics of the first three periods, of “increasing pressure to make a more absolute and a more definitive commitment to radical political action for justice and freedom” (Abrecht). Under the growing influence of voices from the third world, the emphasis shifted to issues of justice in society and to participation in struggles for liberation. Instead of abstract ideals of human freedom(s), the diverse, very specific, historical realities of present-day contexts became important, and therefore very concrete demands for freedom arose in the face of the very real absence of specific freedoms, e.g. affirming people’s rights against the dominating and oppressive influence of transnational capital, people’s dignity against authoritarian and national security systems, self-reliance in the use of raw materials, as well as seeking solutions to structural unemployment and defending social rights to corporate identity, culturally and spiritually. Action, not merely study, became the new initiative.

During the Nairobi assembly (1975), with its theme “Jesus Christ Frees and Unites”, many of these emphases came together. Two sections discussed structures of injustice and struggles for liberation, and education for liberation and community.

In the programme for a Just, Participatory and Sustainable Society* (JPSS), begun in 1977, the accent on participation* represented this insight that the involvement of all constitutes a necessary condition for the full realization of social justice. Participation called for a recognition of each person's right to be consulted, heard and understood, whatever his or her political, economic and societal status may be. Justice will be achieved in a society only where people are regarded as subjects able to transform by their own resources their political, social and natural environment and to establish and maintain relationships of equality with one another. Respect for the civil and social rights of all was seen as an essential condition for justice. In this way, JPSS tried to avoid the dilemma often alleged between social equality and human liberties.

UNRESOLVED TENSIONS: FREEDOM AND LIBERATION

During these years, however, conflicts between diverse theological and ethical perspectives in ecumenical social thought became more apparent and difficult to resolve. Especially important was the influence of liberation theology,* challenging the Oxford-Amsterdam understanding of social responsibility as favouring the ideology of liberal capitalist democracy, and propagating a liberation socialist perspective to replace the older liberal capitalist approach, thereby also giving radical new content to the ideal of freedom. Many insiders experienced this period as one of deep divisions and unresolved tensions in ecumenical social thought. Meanwhile, the JPSS programme was replaced by Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation.* The matter of participation, however, has remained an enduring issue.

In the Roman Catholic Church, issues of liberation, liberty and freedom have been important over several decades. The social teaching of the church has been reflected in various documents over these years, also showing the developments and ambiguities seen in the ecumenical movement. Well-known documents on the thinking of liberation theology in the Catholic church are those of Medellín (1968) and Puebla (1979), from Latin America, as well as the critical and controversial instructions "Certain Aspects of the Theology of Liberation" (1984) and "Christian Freedom and Liberation" (1986), from the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The Protestant approach is represented by ISAL (Church and Society in Latin America) and its journals such as Cristianismo y Sociedad. In Latin America there was close cooperation and common reflection between Catholic and Protestant theologians committed to the struggle for liberation.

Since its inception in 1976, the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians* has concentrated on issues of liberation from different forms of oppression. Its regular conferences and publications reflect this emphasis in many ways and in diverse contexts. In its consultation on religion and liberation in New Delhi (1987), it focused on the liberative potential of religions.

D.J. SMIT

- A.J. van der Bent, Christian Response in a World of Crisis, WCC, 1986
- "Church and Society: Ecumenical Perspectives. Essays in Honour of Paul Abrecht" (=ER, 37, 1, 1985)
- ER, 40, 2 and 3-4, 1988
- J. Míguez Bonino, Towards Christian Political Ethics, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1983
- T. Noble, M.A. Oduyoye, P.-J. Pearson eds, The God of Freedom: Reflections on the Scripture Readings, London, Darton, Longman & Todd, 1999.

LIFE AND DEATH

LIFE AND DEATH, unlike such controversial issues as the ordination of women and sacramental doctrine, does not appear on the ecumenical agenda as a discrete item seeking resolution. But the subject is so fundamental to the Christian faith and potentially so all-inclusive that virtually every ecumenical discussion bears upon it in some way. The centrality of life and death was underscored by the theme of the sixth assembly of WCC (Vancouver 1983): "Jesus Christ – the Life of the World" (John 6:51, 10:10). Studies and reports related to this assembly, as well as other documents, suggest four prominent ways in which the subject enters ecumenical discourse.

CREATION, FALL AND REDEMPTION

God has created the world, the assembly proclaims, to share in God's own life, in the loving and eternal communion of Father, Son and Holy Spirit (see Trinity). "The glory of God is humanity fully alive," wrote Irenaeus. However, humankind's sinful rejection of God's design for life has brought destruction and death (see sin).

Eastern and Western Christianity have viewed the human predicament with different emphases. The East alleges that the West so concentrates on sin, atonement and justification* by faith* that the catastrophe and tyranny of death are not sufficiently confronted by Christ's resurrection* and his bestowal of eternal life through the Spirit (see Holy Spirit). The West, in turn, has charged the East with minimizing the gravity of human godlessness and sin by focusing, at the expense of the cross, on incarnation,* resurrection and our theosis, or "divinization" (human life made God-like in Christ). Ecumenical discussions have rejected any opposition between a "theology of the cross" and a "theology of the resurrection"; it is not an either-or decision. Both theologies are found in each tradition. Redemption* from sin is placed by the East in the primary context of Christ's victory over death. Anselm, who is often blamed for the West's fixation on atonement, speaks also in Cur Deus Homo? of our perfect restoration through the resurrection of the dead. Each charge, when pressed too far, is a distortion. However, the tension between the respective emphases of East and West remains to be faced squarely, both as an ecumenical problem and as a potential source of ecumenical growth.

Christ redeems us from both sin and death; he has come to heal the whole of life, as the theme of Vancouver expresses. In the gospels, Jesus forgives sin, feeds the hungry, raises the dead, releases the captives, befriends the outcast and preaches good news to the poor (Luke 4:18; Acts 10:38). He offers the very life of God to a distressed and dying world (John 5:19-36).

CHRISTIAN DISCIPLESHIP

Christ's ministry to the world continues through his church.* Baptism* means death to the sinful self and new life in Christ (Rom. 6:3-11; cf. Gal. 2:20; Phil. 1:21). Believers are made members of the one Body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:13). Feeding on the risen Christ in the eucharist,* Christians are to give themselves in loving service to the world, just as Christ gave himself, even to the point of death. In Christ, suffering can be redemptive (Phil. 3:10). The martyr's willingness to die for Christ and neighbour testifies that this life is not an absolute good but is oriented towards and fulfilled in God's kingdom* (1 Pet. 4:13; Rev. 2:10). "The recognition of martyrs already transcends confessional boundaries and brings us all back to the centre of the faith, the source of hope, and the example of love for God and fellow human beings" ("Witness unto Death", in Sharing the One Hope, WCC, 1978). Yet the memory of those martyred because of confessional disputes convicts the churches of the seriousness of their division (see martyrdom).

As reflected in reports to the Vancouver assembly, the most vigorous ecumenical discussions of life and death today are evoked by the need for a common Christian witness against "the politics of death" practised globally – injustice, poverty,* racism,* sexism,* war and the threat of nuclear annihilation. True life is found in Christ, not in military, cultural or economic dominance. However, the assembly warns, this claim for Christ does not justify Christian intolerance and persecution of non-Christians, but it should foster honest dialogue (see dialogue, intrafaith) with other religions and beliefs. Vancouver was also concerned with the questions posed for Christian discipleship by issues such as abortion,* euthanasia* and the humane use of technology.* Pope John Paul II addressed these issues in his encyclical Evangelium Vitae (1995).

LIFE EVERLASTING

For a variety of theological and cultural reasons, ecumenical discussion in recent decades has focused more on redeeming the present order than on the life to come, though there are exceptions to this trend (see eschatology). Both, however, rightfully belong to the fullness of Christian faith sought by the ecumenical movement and cannot be separated (1 Cor. 15:19). Christ's resurrection has broken the barrier of death. He unites all who belong to him – the living and the dead – in the communion of saints* (Rom. 8:28; Col. 1:12). In their eucharistic celebrations, the Orthodox and the Roman Catholics invoke the saints and pray for the dead. Anglican liturgies vary on these matters. The abusive practice by the medieval Western church of selling indulgences for the dead in purgatory was a focus of Protestant attacks from the beginning of the Reformation. In the 1978 report of the Joint Roman Catholic-Lutheran Commission on "The Eucharist", there was agreement that Christ's gift of himself in the eucharist must be appropriated through active, believing participation and cannot be transferred from one person to another. Yet Christians may hope that the Lord allows them to share in his saving assistance. All intercessions – for the living and the dead, whether from the saints on earth or in heaven – are completely dependent upon the sovereign love of Christ, and none restricts his freedom (similarly, "The Communion of Saints and the Departed", in the 1984 Dublin statement of the Anglican-Orthodox dialogue*). Still, Protestants are constrained from praying for the dead by doctrinal reticence concerning their state and, in keeping with the Reformation, reject the invocation of the saints as a denial of the sole mediation of Christ (though the Reformation did not deny their heavenly intercession).

In modern times, individual Protestant theologians have expressed openness to belief in purgatory, and some have even sought to extend it beyond its traditional definition in Catholicism (i.e. a purification of those who died in Christ) to include a "second chance" of salvation* for those who in this life rejected Christ. These efforts, however, have never been officially accepted by Protestantism. Historically, the churches have all rejected programmatic universalism* – the notion that God must save all – as an infringement upon both divine and human freedom. Yet many Christians, across the entire confessional spectrum, maintain the hope of universal salvation and witness accordingly. In their dialogue report "Together in God's Grace" (1987), theologians from the Reformed and Methodist traditions think their historic conflict over predestination should no longer divide them. Their respective emphases – God's sovereignty in election and the freedom of human response, in unresolvable tension with each other – together constitute the fundamental mystery of salvation, which for both traditions depends upon God's grace* at every point.

Ecumenical discourse has typically stressed that God's wrath and judgment cannot be separated from God's saving deed in Christ (2 Cor. 5:10; John 5:22; Rev. 1:17-18). "[The] Judge is indeed our Deliverer, Jesus, who has already shown in his cross and resurrection that what he desires is our life, not our death" (cf. Ezek. 33:11), writes a group of Protestant, Orthodox and Roman Catholic theologians in The Report of the Third European Ecumenical Encounter (WCC, 1985). Final judgment, the report continues, belongs not to humanity but to Christ, friend of sinners and partisan for the dispossessed, when he returns in final glory. The consummation of history can thus be anticipated with joy, trust and good works. The meaning of every human life will be disclosed by the Lord (1 Cor. 4:5), though Christians cannot know now what precise form eternal life will take.

CHRISTIAN UNITY

"God's purpose", the Vancouver assembly stated, "is to restore all things into unity in Christ" (see Col. 1:17-20). Through the Holy Spirit, God has called and empowered the church to be the divine instrument of healing and reconciliation.* Yet Christians, in their multifarious divisions, evidence and indeed contribute to the fragmentation of the world. The ecumenical movement, at heart, is a witness to the unifying power of Christ against the divisive forces of sin and death, both in the churches and the world.

This basic purpose is sometimes obscured by the complexity of ecumenical discussions, which by necessity range far and wide. But they all have as their ultimate goal a united offering to the world of new life in Christ, through common doctrine, worship and ministry. The world should be able to see in the church a concrete sign of its own unity restored in God. Commitment to the unity* of the church and concern for its redemptive outreach to humanity are thus inseparable; when one weakens, the other falters. For Christians to acquiesce in disunity would be a denial of Christ's power over sin and death and consequently a legitimation, rather than challenge, of creation's brokenness. Christian unity is essential, not secondary, to the gospel message of life and death.

See also bio-ethics, creation.

ROWAN D. CREWS, Jr

■ Bilaterale Arbeitsgruppe der Deutschen Bischofskonferenz und der Kirchenleitung der VELKD, Communio Sanctorum: Die Kirche als Gemeinschaft der Heiligen, Paderborn, Bonifatius, 2000, esp. paras 201-52 ■ I. Bria ed., Jesus Christ – the Life of the World: An Orthodox Contribution to the Vancouver Theme, WCC, 1982 ■ N. Greinacher, “The Experience of Dying”, Concilium, 94, 1974 ■ G. Griffin, Death and the Church, East Malvern, UK, Dove, 1978 ■ B. Hebblethwaite, The Christian Hope, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1985 ■ O. Kaiser & E. Lohse, Death and Life, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1981 ■ H. Küng & W. Jens, A Dignified Dying: A Plea for Personal Responsibility, London, SCM Press, 1995 ■ W. Lazareth ed., The Lord of Life, WCC, 1983 ■ K. Rahner, Zur Theologie des Todes (ET On the Theology of Death, London, Burns & Oates, 1965) ■ H. Thielicke, Leben mit dem Tod (ET Living with Death, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1983).

LIFE AND WORK

THE IDEA of forming a worldwide movement of churches to work for peace* and justice* between the nations had been often discussed in Christian peace movements before the first world war, and during the war the need became far more urgent. Many church leaders began to see that that conflict was an immense human and social catastrophe which their national churches had done little to prevent and in which they had too readily participated. Though church leaders from neutral countries instigated attempts to stop the fighting, few churches from the warring powers were prepared to cope with the political and moral problems which this same bold stand would have involved.

At the end of the fighting the churches started plans for a conference which would help work for a just and lasting peace and formulate a Christian response to the economic, social and moral issues in the post-war world. In August 1920 some 90 church leaders, representing Protestant churches in 15 countries, met in Geneva to make plans for such a world Christian meeting. The leading figure was Nathan Söderblom, archbishop of the Lutheran Church of Sweden, a churchman with a deep social concern, a passion for Christian unity* and remarkable talents as an ecclesiastical statesman and diplomat. Söderblom was determined that this world meeting of churches on social issues should support the idea of an ecumenical council of churches. Thus all churches, including the Roman Catholic and the Orthodox, were invited to take part. As chairman of the committee on arrangements, Söderblom instilled his ecumenical vision into this pioneer event – the universal Christian conference on life and work, in Stockholm, August 1925.

The words “life and work” expressed the organizers’ determination to set forth “the Christian way of life” as the “the world’s greatest need”. The aim was “to formulate programmes and devise means... whereby the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of all peoples will become more completely realized through the church of Christ”. This idealistic goal was unfortunately not matched by a realistic estimation of the immense and complex problems facing society in the post-war years. Not surprisingly, the results of the Stockholm conference failed to measure up to expectations.

The spiritual strength of Stockholm was in its insight that “the world is too strong for a divided church”; its weakness was its deliberate avoidance of theological issues, justified in the phrase “doctrine divides while service unites”. In fact, the conference became deeply divided on how to relate the Christian hope* for the kingdom of God* to the church’s responsibility for the world. The result was vague, with too general statements about “applying the gospel in all realms of life”.

The harsh realities of increasing political and economic disorder in the years 1929-33 and the rise of Hitlerism and other totalitarian systems frustrated the optimistic and idealistic hopes of Stockholm, forcing the movement to engage in deeper analysis and study of the world social and spiritual situation.

Fortunately in these years, new developments in theology at this critical juncture gave fresh spiritual vitality to the Life and Work movement: Barthian theology in Europe, dynamic forms of neo-orthodox theology in North America (esp. in the thought of Reinhold Niebuhr), and a revitalized Orthodox theology in the writing of Russians, such as Sergius Bulgakov and Nicolas Berdyaev. As preparations began in 1934 for the second Life and Work conference (Oxford 1937), the new leaders were determined to find more solid theological-ethical foundations for this work. Prominent among them were two English churchmen: William Temple, then archbishop of York, and J.H. Oldham, secretary of the International Missionary Council.* In a determined attack on the theological-ethical problem, seven major theological-ethical studies were published: The Christian Understanding of Man; The Kingdom of God and History; The Christian Faith and the Common Life; Church and Community; Church, Community and State in Relation to Education; The Universal Church and the World of Nations; and The Church and Its Function in Society. These volumes were pioneering theological statements, on the basis of which the Life and Work movement re-formulated its view of the church's role in society.

The central theme of the new theological-ethical approach is summed up in a line from Niebuhr in one of these volumes: "It is a dangerous theology... which does not recognize how dialectically the kingdom of God is related to the sinful world in every moment of existence, offering both judgment and a more excellent way in considering every problem of justice."

This preparatory study for the Oxford conference was a remarkable ecumenical and intellectual achievement for the Life and Work movement. It involved contributions of several hundred leading theological and lay thinkers of that period, including representatives of all the major denominational and confessional communities. It established Life and Work as a movement which could truly help the churches and the secular world in addressing political and social problems. The conference report on its central theme, Church, Community and State, thus represents the first theologically formulated statement on the Christian task in the modern world. Its influence on Protestant and Orthodox thought may be compared with such historic Roman Catholic social encyclicals* as Pope Leo XIII's Rerum Novarum (1891) and Pius XI's Quadragesimo Anno (1931).

The rapid progress of Life and Work in 1934-37 made it the leading force in 1938 in the formation of the WCC (then "in process of formation"). In his memoirs W.A. Visser 't Hooft makes clear that in the merger of two movements to form the WCC, Faith and Order* was a hesitant and uncertain partner, whereas Life and Work was the motor of advance, seeing in the dangerous and tumultuous social situation of the world the compelling reason for moving decisively towards a dynamic and informed ecumenical council of churches. Only in this way could the churches be helped to do everything within their power to bring the spirit of the living God to a world in great spiritual and social turmoil. And by its emphasis on the contribution of the laity, the Life and Work movement vastly enlarged the field of ecumenical support and endeavour, reaching into the worlds of the university, government and social life for new talent and new fields of ecumenical advance. In this sense it is fair to say that Life and Work carried the ecumenical movement far beyond the confines which Faith and Order or the International Missionary Council* had initially set.

From this pioneering movement flows the contemporary ecumenical concern with such issues as international relations, racism,* economic justice* and order,* democracy, human rights* and religious liberty.*

See also church and world.

PAUL ABRECHT

- J. Bennett, "Breakthrough in Ecumenical Social Ethics", ER, 40, 2, 1988
- N. Karlström & N. Ehrenström, "Movements for International Friendship and Life and Work: 1910-1925, and 1925-1948", in HI-II
- J.H. Oldham & W.A. Visser 't Hooft eds, The Churches Survey Their Task: The Report of the Conference at Oxford, July 1937, on Church, Community and State, London, Allen & Unwin, 1937
- M. Reeves ed., Christian Thinking and Social Order: Conviction Politics from the 1930s to the Present Day, London, Cassell, 1999
- B. Sundkler, Nathan Söderblom, His Life and Work, Lund, Gleerups, 1968
- A. Tergel, Church and Society in the Modern Age, Uppsala, Uppsala Univ., 1995
- W.A. Visser 't Hooft, The Genesis and Formation of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1982
- W.A. Visser 't Hooft, Memoirs, London, SCM Press, 1973.

LIFE-STYLE

A BRITISH Council of Churches conference in Birmingham in September 1972 urged

Christians "to pledge themselves to a simplicity of life which is generous to others and content with enough rather than excess". About a dozen participants did so pledge, and the Life-Style movement was born. A written commitment was formulated, revised several times since, which about a thousand people have now signed. This "Commitment to Personal Change" contains the following statement: "The Life-Style movement offers a voluntary common discipline to those who are committed to a more equitable distribution of the earth's resources and to the conservation and development of those resources for our own and future generations." The commitment embodies six points: "live simply that all may simply live; give freely that all may be free to give; avoid wasteful use of resources and show care for the environment; work with others for social justice through appropriate action; enjoy such good things as are compatible with this commitment; share my commitment with others".

Thus the movement seeks to hold together issues of justice* and peace,* of human development and ecological conservation, of political action and personal moderation, of enjoyment of God's gifts and a measure of self-denial. Although its origins are Christian and a survey has shown that some 80% of members profess the Christian faith, the movement is open to people of all faiths or none. To facilitate this openness, care has been taken to exclude from the commitment any reference to religion.

Most members live in the United Kingdom, but they form part of a worldwide trend of some complexity. As long ago as 1978 the Los Angeles Times reported that "an estimated 45 million Americans are living lives fully committed to the concept of voluntary simplicity, while perhaps twice that many are partial adherents". In Scandinavia Erik Dammann and others founded "The Future in Our Hands" in 1974, with aims very similar to those of the Life-Style movement. This group has attracted far more support than Life-Style.

Global ecumenical reflection on life-style has been rather general, for reasons already apparent in the WCC's first and only major treatment of the subject - at the fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968).

The section "Towards New Styles of Living" declared that "Christian life requires a willingness to be changed and to change the world... Even though we are unable to establish any perfect order for human life in this world, we are convinced that things can be bettered while we wait for the renewal of all things which God himself will accomplish." However, "there is no single style of Christian life"; and the Uppsala report, which limits itself to "proposing some contours of Christian styles of living", also makes apparent several obstacles to going beyond generalities in the global ecumenical discussion.

As political, social, economic and cultural contexts differ from place to place, so do questions of life-style for Christians. Moreover, discussion of life-style invariably elicits tensions between those who emphasize the need to be disciplined by "human rules" and those who emphasize the need to be able to discern through the Spirit the "signs of the times". The report insists that "the problem of rules and of personal responsibility in each situation can only be solved within the framework of community", suggesting that "the moral conduct of each person can benefit from mutual advice and criticism". Churches, too, can learn from one another. More controversial was Uppsala's acknowledgment that "middle-class people" dominate global church assemblies. What such bodies say about life-style is thus likely to reflect a preference for gradual reform of the existing order and to stress the importance of human relations, family life, material success, efficiency and "interiorized moral standards".

In the late 1970s an "action/reflection" process on "new life-styles" within the WCC's Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development was rooted in growing concern about the quality of life in view of the ecological crisis and the perceived discrepancy between the life-style of many churches and the gospel message of "judgment to the rich and hope to the poor".

Several reports adopted by the WCC's sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983) mentioned life-style without elaborating on it. One said that "a more simple life-style and even a life of poverty is laid on the church and Christians as a witness to the poverty of Christ", but it added the same qualification made in Uppsala: "Christians and churches, of course, find themselves in very different circumstances." Another report acknowledged that "we have much to learn from one another's spirituality, in prayer, life-style, suffering and struggle".

See also renewal.

ALFRED HOUNSELL DAMMERS and
MARLIN VANELDEREN

■ A.H. Dammers, A Christian Life Style, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1986 ■ A.H. Dammers, Life Style: Parable of Sharing, London, Turnstone, 1982 ■ P. Ester, L. Halman & R. de Moor eds, The Individualizing Society: Value Change in Europe and North America, Le Tilburg, Tilburg UP, 1993 ■ H. Fey, Life: New Style, Cincinnati OH, Forward Movement, 1968 ■ R. Sider, Rich Christians in an Age of Hunger, Downers Grove IL, InterVarsity, 1977 ■ J.V. Taylor, Enough Is Enough, London, SCM Press, 1975 ■ R. Traitler ed., In Search of the New, III: Documents of an Ecumenical Action-Reflection Process on New Life Styles, WCC-CCPD, 1981.

LILJE, HANNS

B. 20 Aug. 1899, Hanover, Germany; d. 6 Jan. 1977, Hanover. One of the pioneers of the ecumenical movement, who helped pave the way for reconciliation between the churches of Germany and those of other countries, Lilje was general secretary of the German Student Christian Movement, 1924-34, and involved in the German church struggle from 1933 onwards. Bishop of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Hanover from 1947 until his retirement in 1971, he was presiding bishop of the United Evangelical Lutheran Church in Germany, 1955-69, president of the Lutheran World Federation, 1952-57, member of the LWF's executive committee, 1947-70, and a president of the WCC, 1968-75. Under the title of Johannes XI, he was the life-time abbot of the monastery of Loccum near Hanover. Condemned by a people's court in 1944 for preaching "inner resistance" and related to the group which attempted to assassinate Hitler, Lilje was liberated from a prison in Nuremberg by the Allied army.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ H. Lilje, The Last Book of the Bible, Philadelphia, Muhlenberg, 1957 ■ Memorabilia, Stein, Laetare, 1973.

LIMA LITURGY

THE EUCHARISTIC liturgy which has come to be known as the Lima liturgy was drawn up by Max Thurian in preparation for the plenary session of the Faith and Order* commission held in Lima in 1982. At the session itself the text of the liturgy was slightly revised and then used for the first time on 15 January 1982. The presiding celebrant was Robert Wright, an Episcopalian priest. The Orthodox and Roman Catholic members of the commission participated in the service but did not receive communion. The liturgy was used again (with Philip Potter presiding) in Geneva during the meeting of the central committee of the WCC in July 1982. A year later, the celebration of the Lima liturgy was one of the high points of the sixth assembly of the WCC in Vancouver.

The ensuing (and largely unexpected) wide-ranging use of the Lima liturgy is due in part to its having been celebrated at these important points within the recent life of the ecumenical movement. The reception is also due to this liturgy's being an expression of the convergence reached in *Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry** (BEM) and becoming part of the reception* of this document as a whole. At the assembly of the WCC in Canberra (1991) the eucharistic service used a version of the Lima liturgy prepared in light of the responses to BEM.

The Lima liturgy is one possible expression of the eucharistic theology embodied in BEM and, in particular, of a eucharistic liturgy based on the elements outlined in E27. Overall, the Lima liturgy follows a Western pattern of eucharistic celebration, although important inspirations from the Eastern tradition should not be overlooked.

The liturgy of entrance consists of an entrance psalm, a greeting (2 Cor. 13:13), a confession and absolution (taken from the Lutheran Book of Worship, USA, 1978), a Kyrie litaney (in analogy of the Byzantine liturgy, but taking up the themes of baptism, eucharist and ministry) and the gloria. The liturgy of the word begins with an opening prayer and makes provision for three scripture readings. These are followed by a sermon and a time of silent meditation. The confession of the Nicene Creed* uses the text of 381. Intercessions follow, modelled on early Roman usage. The liturgy of the meal opens with preparatory prayers (two berakoth from the Jewish liturgy and a prayer inspired by the Didache). The eucharistic prayer has a fixed preface, followed – after the sanctus – by a first epiclesis, to which there is a congregational response (as is the case at other points in the eucharistic prayer); the institution narrative, the anamnesis and a second epiclesis follow; before the Trinitarian conclusion there is a set of commemorations. The Lord's prayer, the peace, the breaking of the bread and the Agnus Dei immediately precede communion. The liturgy ends with a thanksgiving prayer, a final hymn and a sending with blessing.

The liturgical reception of this rather full liturgy has hardly ever left its texts and structure unchanged but adapted them to a great variety of different situations. This is to be expected, since the Lima liturgy provides only a text (not even rubrics are given) and as such is only the manuscript guiding a specific eucharistic celebration of a specific community of faith.

In the reception of the Lima liturgy, which has been both critical and enthusiastic, one thing has become clear: there is an obvious desire among the people of God* to see emerging doctrinal convergences become embodied and rooted in the liturgical life of the church. The final locus for doctrinal convergence is not the discussion table but the table of the word and the table of bread and wine. The Lima liturgy has drawn ecumenical attention to this fact.

See also worship in the ecumenical movement.

TERESA BERGER

- T.F. Best and D. Heller eds, Eucharistic Worship in Ecumenical Contexts: The Lima Liturgy and Beyond, WCC, 1998
- "The Eucharistic Liturgy of Lima", in Baptism and Eucharist: Ecumenical Convergence in Celebration, M. Thurian & G. Wainwright eds, WCC, 1983
- G. Lathrop, "The Lima Liturgy and Beyond: Moving Forward Ecumenically", in ER, 48, 1, 1996.

LITURGICAL MOVEMENT

THE TERM "liturgical movement" denotes the phenomenon of recovering the centrality of worship in the life of the 20th-century church. This movement had antecedents in attempts at liturgical reform* and renewal during the Enlightenment and, particularly, in the 19th century. To name but two: the Anglo-Catholic revival brought a renewed interest in liturgical sources as well as liturgical theology and led to a renewal of liturgical life in many Anglo-Catholic communities. Within the Roman Catholic Church (RCC), Prosper Guéranger (1805-75) overshadows other forerunners of the liturgical movement in the 19th century (such as the Benedictines at the abbeys of Beuron in Bavaria and Maredsous in Belgium). Guéranger, himself a Benedictine, in 1832 re-founded the abbey of Solesmes in France, which quickly became an advocate for the liturgical tradition of the Roman church and in particular for its Gregorian chant.

In the 20th century the liturgical movement first gained momentum in the RCC. Although this movement can be seen as consisting of different strands of interdependent "liturgical movements", its beginnings are traditionally dated to one event: the address of Lambert Beauduin (1873-1960) at a pastoral congress at Malines, Belgium, in 1909. Beauduin, a Benedictine monk (who in 1925 founded a monastery particularly dedicated to Christian unity, now Chevetogne*), gave the nascent liturgical movement its pastoral orientation. This orientation was shared by a number of other developing centres of the liturgical movement, such as Klosterneuburg in Austria, where Pius Parsch (1884-1954), an Augustinian canon, developed a strong biblical perspective for the liturgical renewal. A pastoral orientation also lay at the heart of the beginning liturgical movement in the USA, where the Benedictine Virgil Michel (1890-1938) of St John's Abbey, Collegeville, MN, in 1926 began to publish a journal with the title Orate Fratres (now Worship). In France the Centre de pastorale liturgique was established in 1941 and soon began issuing its journal, La Maison-Dieu.

Other emphases were championed by other centres of the liturgical movement. The German Benedictine abbey of Maria Laach, particularly through Ildefons Herwegen (1874-1946) and Odo Casel (1886-1948), gave to the movement a solid foundation of historical and theological research and reflection (see its series Ecclesia Orans and journal Jahrbuch der Liturgiewissenschaft). A strong historical and pastoral orientation also characterized the work of the Austrian Jesuit Joseph Andreas Jungmann (1889-1975). Romano Guardini (1885-1968) worked particularly with groups of intellectuals and with the youth movement. The concerns of the liturgical movement also fell on fruitful ground in many non-Western countries, where the churches had long suffered under the alienation between traditional Roman liturgical life and the local worshipping community.

After a time of heightened tensions, Rome gave its stamp of approval to the liturgical movement with Pius XII's encyclical Mediator Dei in 1947, although the dawn of official support for the renewal of liturgical life can already be seen in Pius X's motu proprio Tra le Sollecitudini of 1903, which introduces "active participation", one of the key themes of the liturgical movement. Liturgical congresses, journals and centres now flourished and opened the way for systematic liturgical reform.

The different strands of liturgical renewal within the RCC find their ecumenically significant parallels within communities of faith stemming from the Reformation. The Lutheran church in Germany, for example, saw a high-church movement form in the 20th century with a keen interest in liturgical life. The Alpertsbacher circle, the Berneuchener circle and the Michaelsbruderschaft re-discovered Gregorian chant and the liturgy of the hours and nourished a revival of eucharistic celebrations and of private confession. The Reformed churches also had their liturgical pioneers both in theology and praxis: Eugène Bersier, Wilfred Monod and then the Taizé* community in France, Richard Paquier and Jean-Jacques von Allmen in Switzerland, the Mercersburg movement in the US, William D. Maxwell and the Iona community in Scotland. The Anglican communion contributed fine historical scholars to the nascent liturgical movement, among them Walter Howard Frere (1863-1938), who was also involved in the beginning of the ecumenical movement, and Gregory Dix (1901-52). The beginnings of the liturgical movement within the Church of England, however, are often dated more specifically by reference to a book by Gabriel Hebert, Liturgy and Society, which was published in 1935. The Methodist churches saw a number of liturgical societies grow up in their midst, such as the Methodist Sacramental Fellowship in Britain and the Order of St Luke in the USA.

It is usually maintained that the Orthodox churches have not known a liturgical movement in the 20th century, since they have not seen the same fundamental liturgical reforms which other churches have witnessed. However, there has certainly been a renewal of liturgical theology (Nikolai Afanas'ev, Alexander Schmemmann and others), as well as small steps at liturgical reform which parallel the reforms the liturgical movement initiated in other churches. In some Orthodox churches the 20th century has seen a move to an audible recitation of the eucharistic prayer and a move away from "private baptisms".

The liturgical renewal sweeping through the churches in the 20th century obviously had a strong ecumenical impetus. Liturgical conferences, for example, were soon attended by liturgists from different ecclesial traditions. This implicit ecumenical impetus became an explicit ecumenical programme with the formation of Societas Liturgica, an ecumenical society for the study and renewal of the liturgy.* Founded in 1965 by the Netherlands Reformed pastor Wiebe Vos, Societas Liturgica now has over 300 members from all over the world and every major ecclesial communion. The number of members from the so-called two-thirds world and of women – the latter very active already in the traditional liturgical movement – has steadily increased.

One can ask whether the liturgical movement as a historical phenomenon has come to an end with, say, its fruition in the Vatican II Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963) and the ensuing liturgical reforms in the churches. Wherever one decides to place the end of the historical phenomenon known as the liturgical movement, its primary concern – the recovery of the centrality of the worshipping community – is and will remain a central task of the church of every age and place.

See also Lima liturgy; liturgical texts, common; worship in the ecumenical movement.

TERESA BERGER

- T. Berger, Liturgie und Frauenseele: Die Liturgische Bewegung aus der Sicht der Frauenforschung, Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1993
- B. Botte, Le mouvement liturgique: Témoignage et souvenir, Paris, Desclée, 1973
- P. Bradshaw & B. Spinks, Liturgy in Dialogue: Essays in Memory of Ronald Jasper, London, SPCK, 1993
- J. Crawford, "The WCC as a Fellowship of Worship and Prayer", ER, 50, 1989
- J.D. Crichton, Lights in Darkness: Forerunners of the Liturgical Movement, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1996
- J. Fenwick & B. Spinks, Worship in Transition: The Twentieth Century Liturgical Movement, Edinburgh, Clark, 1995
- A. Haquin, Dom Lambert Beauduin et le renouveau liturgique, Gembloux, Duculot, 1970
- J. Hofinger ed., Liturgy and the Missions: The Nijmegen Papers, New York, Kennedy, 1960
- L. Katsuno-Ishii & E.J. Orteza, Of Rolling Waters and Roaring Wind: A Celebration of the Woman Song, WCC, 2000
- K.F. Pecklers, The Unread Vision: The Liturgical Movement in the USA, 1926-1955, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1998
- R.K. Seasoltz, The New Liturgy: A Documentation, 1903-1965, New York, Herder, 1966.

LITURGICAL REFORMS

THE LITURGICAL reforms which have in varying degrees changed the face of worship in Western Christian churches in recent decades are the fruit of the liturgical movement,* which may be described as one of the great spiritual movements of church history. (The Byzantine East knows no liturgical movement, and only occasional, timid attempts at liturgical reform have been made there.)

Following a predominantly cerebral era in which worship tended to be seen as a marginal aspect of Christian life, members of Western Christian churches began to recover the central importance of the liturgical celebration of the faith* and to initiate reforms to purge it of accretions from various sources. Decisively, an intense new interest in liturgical history focused greater attention on the original intention of the liturgy – on what Vatican II* in its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (Sacrosanctum Concilium, 1963, hereafter SC) called the norma Patrum (SC 50). This made it easier to differentiate between organic development and accretions distorting the basic norm. For the Reformation churches there was the added bonus that research revealed the liturgical intentions of the Reformation's own "fathers".

In the Roman Catholic Church the liturgical movement, building on tentative efforts during the Enlightenment, arose anew in Belgium in 1909 and spread rapidly to France and Germany. One of its basic insights, and thus a basic impetus to reform, was the re-discovery of the active role in worship of the (hierarchically led) congregation of the faithful. The assembled holy people of God*, led by the presiding priest (see priesthood), was seen as the subject of the liturgical and especially the eucharistic celebration (see eucharist), contrary to the widely held idea that the priest alone was subject and the faithful "assisted" in his sacred action. The reforming aims resulting from this insight, i.e. towards a "democratization" of the RC liturgy (thus Lambert Beauduin, who inaugurated the movement in Belgium), included the use of the vernacular, tentative at first but then increasingly and universally permitted, even if never with a deliberate exclusiveness. The desired reforms were achieved to a surprisingly generous degree in SC and in the revised liturgical books which the Consilium, the group mandated to implement the constitution, prepared between 1965 and 1970.

These post-conciliar liturgical texts ensured that believers were no longer the “silent spectators” that Pius XI complained (1928) they had become, but once again “fellow actors”, responsibly resuming the role originally intended for them in the mass. They are at last seen once again as co-offerers of the sacred gifts on the altar in the mass (SC 48). Again they utter the acclamations which in the course of the centuries had come to be assigned to the servers at the altar, i.e. the responses of the people to the celebrant’s invitations. Once again, too, they join in the recitation of the Lord’s prayer and (where the proposal for its introduction is accepted) in the greeting of peace. In the eucharistic communion, in accordance with ancient church custom, each communicant answers the words of administration with an “Amen!” Here, too, the Council pushed open a little the long-closed door excluding the laity from the chalice (SC 55), and this door has since been opened wide. The turning of the eucharistic celebrant to face the people, recommended and soon generally practised even if never officially prescribed, did more than any other measure of reform to cut the ground from beneath the idea of the mass as an act of the priest at which the faithful piously assisted.

In the daily office, so long mistakenly regarded as a clerical prerogative (“breviary”), the faithful recognize again their ancient rights in a realm of prayer which from time immemorial had been intended and fashioned as a “prayer of the church”. In the celebration of the sacraments* they again join with their acclamations in the invocation of the Spirit on the elements and the congregation. The participation of the catechists and sponsors in the rite of admission into church membership (which once again takes place via the three initiatory sacraments of baptism*, confirmation* and eucharist) has recovered its ancient status – wherever the new Order for the Christian Initiation of Adults (1972) is given its chance. That has happened to a very large extent in the USA (in contrast to the German-speaking countries), where, faithful to the intention of this rite, the learning process under the guidance of the clergy has become the life-long process of growing into the church* (a process of which the indispensable element of “learning” is an organic part).

An outstanding feature of the RC liturgical reform and its popular democratic thrust is the clean break with the anti-Reformation devaluation of the role of the word of God* in RC worship. Of decisive importance here is the statement of the liturgy constitution that Christ is also present when the holy scriptures are read in church (SC 7); and this truth may be extended to the preached word of God in the sermon. Along the same line, the Council directed that sermons should, contrary to previous custom, be preached ex textu sacro (SC 52) – a measure which has produced lasting changes in post-conciliar RC worship. Finally, the Council spoke of “opening up the treasures of the Bible more lavishly” (SC 51) by the transition from a one-year cycle of biblical passages to a three-year cycle for Sundays and feast days, together with a two-year cycle for working days.

While the calendrical reforms cannot be listed here in detail, mention should be made of the radical reform of the paschal vigil (now restored to the night between Holy Saturday and Easter Day), a reform already completed in the decade prior to the opening of the Council (see Easter, resurrection).

Further sacramental reforms in the RCC include the return to the original idea of the anointing of the sick* as a sacrament for the seriously ill (not just for the dying) and the decision in the case of infant baptism to take seriously the condition of infancy (parents and sponsors confess their own faith, not that of the child).

The 20th century also witnessed liturgical reform in the Western churches of the Reformation tradition. Its basis was a similar reconsideration of the importance of worship, but the Protestant churches also noticed the astonishing reform occurring in their once so traditionalistic Roman Catholic sister church, and they were able to appreciate this change all the more in the light of the new ecumenical climate which increasingly prevailed after the Council.

The thrust here could not be (and did not need to be) democratization or the upgrading of the word of God. In the heat of the Reformation controversy, the sometimes exaggerated emphasis placed on the preached and expounded word of God had in places led to a corresponding devaluation of the sacramental dimension, particularly in the Sunday service. Most Protestant churches had also displaced the words of institution from their context in a eucharistic prayer in the style of the berakah (as must certainly be presupposed for the Last Supper of Jesus). Contrary to the intentions of most of the reformers, the Lord's supper had largely become an appendix to the Sunday act of worship and was only infrequently celebrated. The anomaly of this situation became clear in the light of the new reflection on the liturgy and prompted liturgical leaders in the Protestant churches to seek a remedy.

The appearance in 1955 of the first volume of the new service book (Agende I) for the Lutheran churches and congregations of Germany was a landmark in the history of the recovery of the eucharistic prayer and the regular (i.e. weekly) celebration of the Lord's supper. This included for the first time, alongside Form A of the Lord's supper, which followed the sequence in Luther's German mass of the Lord's prayer, words of institution (consecration) and distribution, an optional Form B with a broad-ranging eucharistic prayer with an anamnesis and epiclesis such as had been part of the Sunday eucharistic celebration since the beginning of the 3rd century. Alfred Niebergall called this "a novum in the history of recent Protestant service books". It was only an option, to be sure, and even as such still had to clear the hurdle of a regional church decision in each case, which it failed to do in some instances. This modest step in the direction of liturgical reform was nevertheless something of a breakthrough. Niebergall's reference to "increasing agreement and general diffusion" has been confirmed to an astonishing degree in the subsequent decades. One has only to think of the Lima liturgy* of 1982 or of the revised service book of the German Lutheran, Reformed and United churches intended as a continuation of the book of 1955 (draft Erneuerte Agende, 1990; definitive Evangelisches Gottesdienstbuch, 1999). Equally if not more important was the decision made in Agende I, ten years before the Second Vatican Council, to "combine the celebration of the Lord's supper with the preaching service to constitute the evangelical mass".

A similar development took place in the Anglican communion,* here too in the shape of an option. Since 1928 the revised English Book of Common Prayer in its service of holy communion has offered a richer alternative order including an epiclesis. The Alternative Service Book of 1980 contained, besides a prayer like that of the Lord's supper of 1662, six other forms of a full eucharistic prayer. Similar principles were followed in the successor book, Common Worship: Services and Prayers for the Church of England (2000).

Characteristic of the recent trend in the North American churches in the Reformation tradition is the production by an ecumenical commission of a eucharistic prayer closely related to the fourth eucharistic prayer of the revised Roman missal. Versions of this prayer are found in the Book of Common Prayer of the Episcopal Church in the USA (1979, prayer II D), the Book of Common Worship of the Presbyterian Church in the USA (1993, prayer F), the Book of Alternative Services of the Anglican Church of Canada (1986, prayer 6) and the Uniting Church in Australia's Uniting in Worship (1988, prayer H). The re-discovery of the great eucharistic prayer in the churches of the Reformation (which does not necessarily always mean its re-introduction) is therefore not limited to the European scene but is a reality too on the North American continent. (There, as in Britain, the liturgy of the Church of South India of 1963 helped to ease the way.)

This increasingly worldwide trend became spectacularly clear in the Lima liturgy, a classic formulation of the eucharistic prayer including anamnesis and two epicleses (before and after the words of institution), which was produced at the WCC's Faith and Order meeting in Lima, Peru, in 1982. It was intended not as a standard form for the future, to replace the existing liturgies, but as a model. It is highly significant that, whenever it has been used at transconfessional church conferences – in Lima (15 January 1982), Geneva (27 July 1982) and, above all, Vancouver (31 July 1983) – it has met with an enthusiastic reception on the part of those participating, in spite of all individual reservations; even Catholic and Orthodox delegates, who were unable to receive communion, accepted roles in the liturgy of the word. For the churches deriving from the Reformation, we have evidence here of a clearly irreversible reform movement in the celebration of the Lord's supper.

Analogously to the RC development, the reforms in the Reformation churches also extend well beyond the central area of the celebration of the Lord's supper, or eucharist. They can only be hinted at here. The order of infant baptism (where it is practised) and the admission of adults to church membership have everywhere been revised. Interestingly enough, in the reform of infant baptism a "countermove" to the corresponding RC reform is observable. While the latter, for the first time in the history of infant baptism, produced an order tailored to the conditio infantis, in both the Book of Common Prayer of the American Episcopalians and other Protestant service books the baptismal order is made the same for infants and adults.

Another universal feature is the reform of the lectionaries: in many places in Protestantism, particularly in the English-speaking countries, an adapted version of the three-year Sunday cycle of the post-conciliar Roman Ordo Lectionum Missae (1969) has been introduced (see liturgical texts, common). Movement is also observable in the re-introduction of an optional anointing of the sick (though not as a sacrament) in the German North Elbian church; the admission of unconfirmed children (sometimes even infants) to the Lord's supper; and a partial return to the use of liturgical vestments where this had fallen out of use.

An era of liturgical reforms – which the 20th century certainly was for Christian churches across the board – is the appropriate matrix for what has recently come to be called inculturation.* There is a growing realization everywhere that no one should be made to celebrate the liturgy* in forms which contradict one's traditional cultural inheritance. The example set in this area at the Second Vatican Council by the RCC, which has always had a reputation for immobility, will in the long run prove fruitful (SC 39-40). A quarter of a century after the appearance of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, we find the initial results of an inculturated celebration of the mass in the Zairian mass, to which Rome agreed on 30 April 1988. This mass includes an invocation of the ancestors, a dance around the altar during the gloria, rhythmic movements on the part of the faithful and the use of drums (Evenou). Earlier, an experimental order of mass for India, prepared by the National Biblical, Catechetical and Liturgical Centre at Bangalore and containing a good deal of the language from the ancient Indian scriptures, had been vetoed by the Vatican (Pulsfort).

The hopeful situation of a growing "koinonia in worship", which appeared in the Faith and Order consultation on the role of worship within the search for unity at Ditchingham, England (1994), was at least partially due to the liturgical reforms meanwhile introduced almost everywhere in the oikumene.

See also worship in the ecumenical movement.

BALTHASAR FISCHER

- L. Bertsch ed., Der neue Messritus im Zaire: Ein Beispiel kontextueller Liturgie, Freiburg, Herder 1993
- T.F. Best & D. Heller eds, So We Believe, So We Pray: Towards Koinonia in Worship, WCC, Geneva, 1995
- A. Bugnini, La riforma liturgica (1948-1975) (ET The Reform of the Liturgy [1948-1975]), Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1990
- A.J. Chupungco, Liturgies of the Future: The Process and Methods of Inculturation, Mahwah NJ, Paulist, 1989
- C. Nwaka Egbulem, "The 'Rite Zairois' in the Context of Liturgical Inculturation in Middle-Belt Africa since the Second Vatican Council", PhD diss., Washington, DC, Catholic Univ. of America, 1989
- J. Evenou, "Le missel romain pour les diocèses de Zaire", Notitiae, 264, 1988
- A. Häussling, "Liturgiereform: Materialien zu einem neuen Thema der Liturgiewissenschaft", Archiv für Liturgiewissenschaft, 31, 1989
- International Commission on English in the Liturgy, Documents on the Liturgy, 1963-1979: Conciliar, Papal, and Curial Texts, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1982
- C. Jones, G. Wainwright & E. Yarnold, The Study of Liturgy, rev. ed., London, SPCK, 1992
- E. Pulsfort, "Die liturgische Inkulturation in Indien seit Vat. II", Zeitschrift für Missionswissenschaft und Religionsgeschichte, 75, 1991
- F.C. Senn ed., New Eucharistic Prayers: An Ecumenical Study of Their Development and Structure, Mahwah NJ, Paulist, 1987
- M. Thurian & G. Wainwright, Baptism and Eu- charist: Ecumenical Convergence in Celebration, WCC, 1983 ■ J.-M.R. Tillard, "Liturgical Reform and Christian Unity", OC, 19, 1983 ■ G. Wainwright, Worship with One Accord, New York, Oxford UP, 1997, ch. 9.

LITURGICAL TEXTS, COMMON

THE SECOND Vatican Council* of the Roman Catholic Church, with its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy (1963), stimulated an extraordinary reform and renewal of liturgical orders and texts throughout the churches of the Western rites, Catholic and Protestant. Liturgical movements in many of these churches going back a full century had helped prepare for this dramatic development (see liturgical movement). Ecumenical contacts, especially in the English-speaking world, facilitated widespread cooperation during and following the Council. Beginning in 1964, an informal sequence of annual meetings of Protestant and Catholic liturgists in the US took place which resulted in the formation of the (North American) Consultation on Common Texts (CCT). At the same time, Roman Catholic bishops in English-speaking lands formed the International Commission on English in the Liturgy (ICEL), with a secretariat in Washington, DC.

The ICEL set about preparing English translations of the new liturgical books of the Roman rite, beginning with the Roman missal in 1969 and finishing with the rite for funerals in 1989. The CCT took upon itself the task of producing English translations of certain important liturgical texts which could be used by a wide variety of churches, such as the Lord's prayer, the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds, the ordinary of mass, and office canticles. This effort resulted in the formation of an international ecumenical body corresponding to ICEL known as the International Consultation on English Texts (ICET). Its revision of these texts was published as Prayers We Have in Common (1970, 1971 and 1975). During the same decade quite a number of Protestant and Anglican churches produced new service books incorporating these texts as part of rites in modern English.

In addition to this remarkable accommodation in the matter of texts, many of these books included, with some editing, the table of scripture readings for the Sunday mass of the Roman rite, Ordo Lectionum Missae (1969). In the US the Consultation on Church Union* produced in 1974 a consensus version of these denominational adaptations of the Roman Ordo. And in 1978 the CCT convened a consultation in Washington, DC, to survey the ecumenical use and acceptability of these adaptations. As a result of this meeting there was prepared a harmonization of these versions of the Roman lectionary table for submission to churches which were using it in one way or another. This was published in 1983 as Common Lectionary: The Lectionary Proposed by the Consultation on Common Texts.

This proposal differs from the Roman table only in that for the Sundays after Pentecost ("Ordinary Time") the Old Testament lection is no longer chosen for its "typological" relation to the gospel for the day but on the basis of a broader typology wherein for year A, the year of Matthew, the patriarchal and Mosaic narratives are read on a semi-continuous basis; for year B, the year of Mark, the Davidic narrative is read semi-continuously; and for year C, the year of Luke, the Elijah-Elisha narrative is read, together with selections from the minor prophets.

After trial use by many churches throughout the English-speaking world for a period of nine years (ie., three full three-year cycles), the CCT prepared a revision, published in 1992 as Revised Common Lectionary (RCL). This table of readings for the principal service for the Lord's day, as well as certain other Christological feasts, has found widespread use, not only in the English-speaking world but also by other language groups throughout Europe and Scandinavia and in the third world. The work of disseminating and interpreting this document has been undertaken by an international group known as the English Language Liturgical Consultation (ELLC), which was formed at Boston University in 1985 and which meets biennially. It was formed by CCT, the Joint Liturgical Group of Great Britain, ICEL, the Australian Consultation on Liturgy, the Joint Liturgical Consultation within New Zealand, and the Canadian

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

Churches Coordinating Group on Worship. In 1994 it made overtures to the holy see of the Roman Catholic Church concerning the possibility of the use of RCL in that church. Thus far no further progress has been made. The ELLC continues to work on the production of ecumenically acceptable eucharistic prayers. In North America the CCT is working on a three-year set of opening prayers for the Sunday service, which will be thematically related to the lections for the day, as in RCL.

Such impressive convergences in textual and scriptural use are probably furthest advanced in the English-speaking world. But besides a common Lord's prayer in German, the Arbeitsgemeinschaft für liturgische Texte produced texts of the Apostles' and Nicene creeds, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Sanctus, the Agnus Dei, and the Gloria Patri, which were accepted by both Catholic and Protestant churches; the Arbeitsgemeinschaft für Ökumenisches Liedgut produced common versions of over 100 hymns; and there are orders for "ecumenical weddings". The German Bible exists in an "Einheitsübersetzung", but as yet the German-speaking churches are not agreed on a common lectionary or choice of texts. The French speakers have a common Lord's prayer and the Traduction oecuménique de la Bible, as well as a common liturgical psalter (see La Maison-Dieu, no. 105, 1971, pp.46-65).

HORACE T. ALLEN, Jr

- H.T. Allen & J. Russell, On Common Ground: The Story of the Revised Common Lectionary, Norwich, UK, Canterbury, 1998
- Consultation on Common Texts, The Revised Common Lectionary, Norwich, UK, Canterbury, 1992
- English Language Liturgical Consultation, Praying Together, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1989
- D. Gray ed., The Word in Season, Norwich, UK, Canterbury, 1988
- T.J. Talley, The Origins of the Liturgical Year, New York, Pueblo, 1986.

LITURGY

LITURGY, or worship (and the forms it takes), is the public, common action of a Christian community in which the church* is both manifested and realized. From apostolic times, Christians would gather at appointed times for prayer and for the "breaking of bread" (e.g. Acts 2:42,46, 20:7). Numerous references in the New Testament and in early Christian writings amply witness to the importance of these liturgical assemblies. It was precisely such gatherings – criminal in the eyes of the Roman authorities – which led to persecutions. Citizens of the empire could believe whatever they wished, as long as they did not challenge the official state cult. Yet, despite these dangers, Christians continued to assemble, by their actions rejecting the state religion. Nearly 2000 years later, Christians throughout the world continue to gather at least as frequently as every Lord's day, each time affirming their identity as the people of God.*

Not surprisingly, the vast majority of early Christian literature is liturgical in nature: commentaries on the scripture which was read aloud at the liturgy; instructions on the ordering of the assembly, such as the various church orders; and later, liturgical prayers and hymnography. Even credal formulas were originally used in the context of baptismal celebrations. It was in the liturgy that Christians assembled to become the church, that they came to know the incarnate God and to participate in his very being by sharing in his body and blood. It was also in the liturgy that they learned about the Christian faith,* for it was only much later that theological schools, academic learning or even Sunday schools became widespread. Even today, the vast majority of Christians in the world have contact with church teaching almost exclusively in the liturgical gathering of the local community.

Liturgy, therefore, embodied the faith of the church. This is the implication of the statement by Prosper of Aquitaine in the 5th century: ut legem credendi lex statuat supplicandi – better known in its shorter form, lex orandi, lex credendi.* As people worship, so they believe. Not surprisingly, the liturgical assembly itself eventually became a source of theology, particularly from the 4th century, when the Christian faith had to be explained to the masses of new converts who flocked to the church after the peace of Constantine. The mystagogical writings of important figures such as Cyril of Jerusalem, Theodore of Mopsuestia, John Chrysostom and Ambrose of Milan are important sources for both liturgy and theology. These and many other sources also reveal the variety which characterized liturgical practice from the very beginning.

In the early centuries, each locality followed its own practices, although there was a remarkable uniformity in the overall structure of worship, as we see already in the "classic shape" of the eucharist described by Justin Martyr in his First Apology (c.150). But by the 3rd and 4th centuries, there was in each region a process of unification, a consolidation where local patterns were absorbed into regional patterns. One can by this time speak of the Egyptian, Roman, West Syrian and East Syrian liturgical families, ancestors of our modern rites. Each of these families continued to develop, sometimes in isolation from the others, sometimes strongly influenced by them. At first the families were distinguished geographically, so that each area or province had its own characteristic practices. But eventually, as the unity of the church was broken by various schisms,* liturgical families increasingly came to be identified with confessional bodies. Each splinter group would develop its inherited liturgical tradition along its own lines, consistent with its own theological, social and political realities. Various political, social and theological factors also played a great role in the growing predominance of certain families, particularly the Roman in the West and the Byzantine in the East. This is the context in which we understand the term "rite" today: it characterizes the total ecclesial tradition, the life, of a particular church or communion. Thus the various rites are invaluable sources for an understanding of the different streams within world Christianity.

EASTERN CHURCHES

Although there are several different liturgical and theological traditions among the Eastern churches, as enumerated below, it is quite proper to speak of a particular Eastern style, distinct from that of the West. The Eastern approach to reality is more Platonic, not bound by the Aristotelian categories prevalent in the West. For the Easterner, earthly reality is reflective of a higher, heavenly reality which can be communicated. The theology of icons* is a typical example of this approach. The church is perceived not so much as a militant society but as a theophany, the coming of the eternal into time. Spirituality is defined in terms of theosis, divinization: grace* is seen as the transforming action of God, not as a means of living in this world. All these differences are reflected in Eastern liturgies. Western worship is generally more austere and simple; its symbols are more direct; there is emphasis on action and involvement. In the East, the liturgy is perceived as an ascent to a higher world, beyond the cares and suffering of this world. This orientation is reflected in the church building – the church is "heaven on earth, where God dwells and moves", says Germanos of Constantinople in his 8th-century commentary on the liturgy. In the liturgy, as in architecture, the emphasis is vertical, transcendental and eschatological. Prayer, particularly liturgical prayer, is seen as the way to be close to God, as true theology. The following are the most significant extant Eastern rites.

Byzantine rite. This rite is used today by all the Eastern Orthodox, who compose the vast majority of Eastern Christians. It is also used, in a somewhat Latinized form, by a significant number of Eastern Catholics, former Orthodox who were absorbed by the Roman church from the end of the 16th century. The Byzantine rite originated in 4th-century Antioch but was later substantially re-worked under the influence of Jerusalem, as well as through monasticism. It reached its present form by the 15th century, after which the fixity brought by the printing of books effectively halted its further development. Because it was the rite of Constantinople, the capital of the Eastern empire, it eventually supplanted all other rites among the Orthodox. This rite is perhaps best known for its eucharistic liturgy, ascribed to John Chrysostom. Closely related to the Byzantine is the Armenian rite, in use by the non-Chalcedonian church of Armenia.

Syrian rites. The East Syrian rite is in use today by the so-called Church of the East, sometimes still called the Nestorian or Chaldean church, as well as by the larger Malabar church in India. This rite derives from the usage of Edessa. The West Syrian rite is used primarily by the non-Chalcedonian Jacobite church in Palestine and Syria, as well as by the Malankara church in India.

This rite derives from Antiochian and Jerusalem practices, but with Greek (euchologic) and East Syrian (poetic) elements. Also derivative of this tradition is the Maronite rite, used by the Maronite Christians, chiefly in Lebanon. This is the only Eastern church totally in communion with Rome. Like the Jacobite rite, this is an Antiochian tradition with significant influence from the usages of Edessa.

Alexandrian rites. The Coptic rite of Egypt and the Ethiopian rite are the two descendants of the ancient Alexandrian tradition. The respective churches are both non-Chalcedonian, or "monophysite".

WESTERN CHURCHES

In the early period the Western liturgical tradition was quite as rich and varied as the Eastern. The Roman rite existed side by side with its close relative, the Ambrosian rite in Milan, as well as the more independent Mozarabic rite in Spain, the Gallican in Gaul, and the Celtic in Ireland and Scotland. Gradually, the Roman rite came to predominate, though it absorbed numerous elements from the rites which it supplanted. With the council of Trent, the Roman rite reigned supreme throughout the Latin West, with the major exceptions of only the local Ambrosian rite of Milan and the newly emerging rites of the Protestant Reformation, which derived from Roman practice.

Roman rite. The Roman rite, as indeed all extant Western rites, can be characterized by its brevity and simplicity of expression. Movements, gestures and words are all kept to a minimum. It seems quite austere in comparison to the Eastern liturgies, despite an infusion of more ceremonial and poetic elements from the Gallican and Mozarabic rites during the medieval period. It was to some of these accretions, as well as to excesses in popular piety, that the reformers objected in the 16th century. From the time of the council of Trent, Roman practice has been rigidly controlled by the Congregation for Sacred Rites in Rome, which has tended to suppress all local variation. The new rite promulgated after Vatican II* allows for greater flexibility and the use of the vernacular and even contains elements borrowed from Eastern liturgies. Significantly, the new Roman rite can hardly be distinguished from that of the more conservative churches of the Reformation, particularly the Lutheran and Anglican.

Protestant rites. The various Protestant rites can be categorized by the degree to which each body "reformed" the worship tradition it inherited from a medieval West strongly marked by Rome. Thus the Lutheran tradition preserved as much of the Roman rite as it felt was consistent with its theology. Lutheran worship stresses preaching, music, ritual and even the eucharistic sacrament, though the latter until recently played a lesser role due to the influences of pietism and the Enlightenment. The Reformed tradition is far less ceremonial and stresses the preaching of the word and the singing of psalms. It has a strongly didactic and penitential bent.

The Anglican communion's Book of Common Prayer has in many ways provided a kind of liturgical via media among the Western churches. Closely related to the Anglican rite is the Methodist, which has also been influential through its rich hymn tradition.

Another strain is the so-called Free church tradition, which bases worship more exclusively on scripture and emphasizes congregational autonomy in the ordering of its liturgy. Tradition is perceived as merely human invention. The Quakers abolished all external forms of worship except the act of gathering in assembly for silent meditation. Yet another form of Free church worship emerged in 19th-century America, which can be categorized as pragmatic. Not tied down to any predetermined order or tradition, each congregation employs whatever forms work, chiefly in attracting converts – much American Protestantism falls into this pattern. The most recent development arising within Protestant worship is the Pentecostal tradition, which originated in the US in the early 20th century but has since spread throughout the world. Speaking in tongues is the most visible manifestation of this form of worship, and it is characterized by great spontaneity and the avoidance of any formal order. But even spontaneous forms of worship quickly develop definite patterns which are familiar to regular participants.

CONCLUSION

Modern Protestantism contains by far the greatest variety of liturgical practice, from “high church” Anglicanism, with forms of worship hardly distinguishable from those of medieval Roman Catholicism, to the silent “waiting on God” of Quakers and the ecstatic glossolalia of Pentecostals. By contrast, Eastern rites are remarkably consistent in style and approach: differences are due more to cultural and historical than to theological or spiritual factors. The Eastern churches have never undergone the trauma of a reformation, and their worship derives from an unbroken, if constantly evolving, tradition (see Tradition and traditions). Liturgical change in the East is not the task of any individual local congregation or even any official liturgical commission; change occurs gradually, almost imperceptibly.

But Eastern worship, just as Western, expresses the faith, culture and spirituality of a given ecclesial body, its understanding of orders, its approach to tradition. Thus a deeper understanding of the various churches’ liturgical traditions is a sine qua non for future ecumenical progress.

See also liturgical reforms, worship in the ecumenical movement.

PAUL MEYENDORFF

- J.J. von Allmen, Célébrer le salut, Geneva, Labor & Fides, 1984 ■ P. Edwall et al. eds, Ways of Worship, New York, Harper, 1951 ■ C. Jones et al. eds, The Study of Liturgy, 2nd ed., London, SPCK, 1992 ■ G.W. Lathrop, Holy Things: A Liturgical Theology, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1993 ■ A. Schmemmann, Introduction to Liturgical Theology, London, Faith, 1966 ■ H.C. Schmid-Lauber & K.H. Bieritz eds, Handbuch der Liturgik: Liturgiewissenschaft in Theologie und Praxis der Kirche, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1995 ■ F.C. Senn, Christian Worship and Its Cultural Setting, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1997 ■ R. Taft, Beyond East and West: Problems in Liturgical Understanding, Washington DC, Pastoral, 1984 ■ M. Thurian & G. Wainwright eds, Baptism and Eucharist: Ecumenical Convergence in Celebration, WCC, 1983 ■ J.F. White, Protestant Worship: Traditions in Transition, Louisville KY, Westminster/John Knox, 1989.

LITURGY AFTER THE LITURGY

THE CONCEPT of mission* as “liturgy after the Liturgy”, which emerged as an Orthodox contribution to the ecumenical debate on mission in the early 1970s, centres on the double liturgical rhythm of the local Christian community: gathered for worship* and eucharist* on Sunday, then dispersed for everyday life, mission, sacrifice and witness* in the world. It draws on the insight of St John Chrysostom that outside the temple, in the public market place, compassion for the poor* is a sacred liturgy in which the faithful are the priests.

In the eucharistic celebration the worshipping community is prepared to become an evangelizing community, and vice versa. Within this liturgical venue the faithful are both recipients of God’s gifts and agents who share these gifts with others. Eucharist is the “pilgrim bread” (Melbourne 1980), “food for missionaries”. The words “let us go forth in peace” at the end of the liturgy signify the sending of the people on an apostolic journey into the oikoumene, to become “martyrs” (witnesses; see martyrdom) of the resurrection of the crucified Christ.

There is a variety of extensions and communications of the eucharistic liturgy in the world in diverse ministries and forms, which touch mission, ethics,* culture* and society.* Evangelism* means not only oral proclamation of the gospel but also public celebration of faith, sanctification of creation, glorification of the name of God among nations. It is linked to moral and religious experience, diakonia,* spirituality* and renewal.

The dynamics of liturgy in mission include the mutual recognition of various missiologies in the ecumenical movement, in which the tendency to intellectualism in the sola scriptura (preaching) tradition and the tendency to ritualism in the sacramental (ex opere operato) tradition can be corrected.

The resistance of liturgical communities in the face of restrictions and persecution under atheistic regimes constitutes a solid basis and hope for pursuing mission in this way. The liturgical-sacramental model is not absolute, but within this context the church creates a new culture, ethos, and spirituality of receiving and sharing the gospel.

The question of how the life of the eucharistic community contributes to the life of the world, of how churches mediate the eucharistic bread of life so that it can reach and nourish the whole world is one for the whole ecumenical community. Certainly it involves the community's life-style: the quality of life of the "communion of saints"* is essential for mission. As an early Christian apologist declared, "See how these Christians love one another!" But the potentialities of eucharistic and non-eucharistic worship need to be unfolded and their implications for wider moral, social and cultural issues cultivated.

ION BRIA

■ I. Bria, The Liturgy after the Liturgy, Geneva, 1996 ■ E. Clapsis, "The Eucharist as Missionary Event", in Orthodoxy in Mission, G. Lemopoulos ed., WCC, 1988 ■ G. Limouris ed., Orthodox Visions of Ecumenism, Geneva, 1994 ■ I. Sauca ed., Orthodoxy and Cultures, Geneva, 1996 ■ P. Vassiliades & I. Bria, Orthodox Christian Martyria, Thessaloniki, 1989.

LOCAL CHURCH

THE VARIOUS statements on unity* which were approved by the assemblies of the WCC since New Delhi (1961) focus on the local church as the basic unit of unity. New Delhi speaks of a unity which "is being made visible as all in each place who are baptized... and confess... are brought... into one fully committed fellowship... [and] are united with the whole Christian fellowship in all places and all ages". Uppsala (1968) places additional emphasis on "all Christians in all places". Nairobi (1975) sees the one church "as a conciliar fellowship of local churches which are themselves truly united", stressing that "each local church possesses, in communion with the others, the fullness of catholicity". These statements seek to recover the biblical dynamic of "local" and "universal" church as the common origin and background of the various ecclesial structures which have developed throughout history. In the New Testament, ekklesia means both the universal Christian fellowship (Eph. 1:22; 1 Tim. 3:5) and the visible congregation connected to a particular house, city or province (Rom. 16:3-5; 1 Cor. 1:2; 2 Cor. 8:1). The universal church, according to the NT, exists in local churches and in the communion* between them.

As the organization of the church and its various ministries grew more complex, however, the term "local church" lost its unequivocal reference (see church order). In early church history, the presence of a bishop and the celebration of the eucharist* clearly marked the identity of a local church. Later, both larger and smaller church structures developed which were also called local. In Orthodoxy, this was the case with the autocephalous church. In Western Christianity, it was the parish which caused complications. For some time, the terms "diocese" and "parish" were largely synonymous. Gradually, however, the term "parish" began to refer to pastoral units, supervised by a priest (presbyter), smaller than the diocese and subordinate to it. This distinction contributed to the emergence of a Rome-centred, pyramidal view of the structure of the church.

In opposition to this view, the churches of the Reformation took their point of departure in the parish: the place where the assembly of the faithful under the preaching of the word and the celebration of the sacraments was realized without subordination to supra-local episcopal authority. This territorial point of departure led to the organization of supra-local structures proportionate to political units (nations). Besides this presbyterial approach, an understanding of "local church" emerged in the wake of the Reformation which made it exclusively dependent on the covenant of the faithful.

As a result of all these developments, the term "local church" can refer to dioceses, archdioceses, parishes, national churches and other territorial-ecclesial units, and it can have episcopal, presbyterial and community-centred connotations. In this confusion, the original meaning of both "universal" ("catholic") and "local", as well as the essential significance of the inter-relation between these two, is easily obscured.

In the 20th century various factors contributed to a re-discovery of more fundamental dimensions. Due to common problems and challenges, Protestant churches experienced the limitation of their national-territorial structures and need for broader communion and cooperation. At the same time, developments in modern industrial societies relativized the significance of mere territorial givenness of local churches and led to a new emphasis on the missionary quality of church structures (see Uppsala assembly, sec. 2) and to a proliferation of small groups intent upon a creative interaction between church and context. The Roman Catholic Church re-discovered the specific place and function of the laity* and experienced a “re-invention of the church” (Leonardo Boff) in the form of base communities (see church base communities). The ecclesiology of the documents of the Second Vatican Council* reflects the implications of this revitalization of the local church and of the growth of “universal” networks of communion and communication. The notions of the “particular church” (ecclesia particularis) and of the communion between these churches (collegialis unio), in which the universal church exists (see Lumen Gentium 23, Christus Dominus 11), revive the insight that episcopal ministry and eucharistic celebration determine the core-unit of the church, rather than specific “local” characteristics. (Similarly, the Lima text on the eucharist underlines that “eucharistic celebrations always have to do with the whole church, and the whole church is involved in each local eucharistic celebration” [Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry,* E19]). A 1992 Vatican statement on the church as communion gave rise to further discussion on the relation between visible forms of the worldwide nature of the church, on the one hand, and the local churches, on the other: which of these comes first in historical and theological perspective? The question appears to be of vital ecclesiological significance, not only for Roman Catholic ecclesiology.

Although ecumenical consensus on the precise meaning of the term “local church” is still lacking, this brief sketch shows a common direction of thought and the possibilities for a re-conception of the local-universal relation. Supra-local church structures are relativized in favour of a dynamic vision of local churches in networks of universal (worldwide) communication. The ecumenical movement provides these networks; it is there that the full implications of the problems of global society become visible, and that the search for common memory and common life in the promise of the unity of humankind takes shape. At the local level this search is translated into the daily life of obedience and witness. The church in its national and regional organization of boards, colleges and synods has the function of keeping alive this interaction between local and global and of making it fruitful in both directions.

See also church, unity of “all in each place”.

LIBERTUS A. HOEDEMAKER

- L. Boff, EcclesioGenesis: The Base Communities Reinvent the Church, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1968
- The Church for Others, WCC, 1967
- “The Church: Local and Universal”, Sixth Report of the Joint Working Group between the RCC and the WCC, WCC, 1990, app. A
- In Each Place: Towards a Fellowship of Local Churches Truly United, WCC, 1977
- H. De Lubac, Les Eglises particulières dans l'Eglise universelle, Paris, Aubier Montaigne, 1971
- The Nature and Purpose of the Church, WCC, 1999
- E. Schillebeeckx, Pledooi voor Mensen in de kerk (ET The Church with a Human Face, London, SCM Press, 1985)
- Some Aspects of the Church as Communion, Rome, Editrice Vaticana, 1992
- J.-M.R. Tillard, L'Eglise locale: Ecclésiologie de communion et catholicité, Paris, Cerf, 1995.

LOCAL ECUMENICAL OBEDIENCE

“THE ECUMENICAL movement is not alive unless it is local,” said the Faith and Order conference at Lund in 1952, and the New Delhi assembly of the WCC (1961) built this idea into the classic definition of the goal of Christian unity:* “We believe that the unity which is both God’s will and his gift to his church is being made visible as all in each place who are baptized into Jesus Christ and confess him as Lord and Saviour are brought by the Holy Spirit into one fully committed fellowship... in such wise that ministry and members are accepted by all and that all can act and speak together as occasion requires for the tasks to which God calls his people.”

There is a limitless variety to local situations, to the priorities in the “tasks to which God calls his people” in any one place, to the obstacles to Christian unity, to the social conditions within and for which it is to be sought and to the potential partners for any one group of Christians. There is, moreover, a wide divergence between the ways different churches envisage the “local unity of the church” and the decision making proper to that goal. No less important are the particular ways in which churches psychologically understand themselves (e.g. as “majority” or “minority”, as “of the people” or “international”) and their proper relations with other Christian groups in the area.

This variety should not be seen as a problem. Christian unity does not mean uniformity: it is natural and proper that different things should happen in different places, although the people in any one place will have a lot to learn from others. Still more, the chief actor in the striving towards Christian unity, at the local level, as on the wider scene, is the Holy Spirit,* who inspires, encourages, cajoles and nudges Christians in divided churches to take the next steps towards and with one another in love for the surrounding world, within an ecumenical movement, a pilgrimage into the fullness and wholeness of what God wants for his people, which has no necessary starting point and which will be completed only in the kingdom of God.*

This article is written chiefly out of experience in Britain, especially England, one of the areas where successive divisions have torn the one church into fragments (each tending to involve people of different social standing, ethnic origin, cultural background, etc.) and yet where Christians have been able to take steps towards reconciliation* and united witness* at the local level.

MILESTONES ON THE ECUMENICAL WAY

By the end of the 18th century and throughout the 19th, when the bitter hatreds of reformation and civil war had been tamed by tolerance and a measure of social stability, Christians in Britain from both the established churches (Anglican in England and Wales, Presbyterian in Scotland) and the various Free or Nonconformist churches began to come together to promote and undertake certain “good works”. There were, for example, foreign missions through the London Missionary Society, the distribution and translation of Bibles through the British and Foreign Bible Society, Sunday schools and other open educational ventures, and youth work through the Young Men’s and Young Women’s Christian Associations. These specific causes, and so the organizations that served them, were seen as Christian yet not necessarily tied to any one church. Leadership was often given by lay Christians. Friendship, trust and a sense of common purpose could be built up in an open-minded, generally “evangelical” spirit that saw this kind of obedience as “non-denominational”, i.e. free from the particular doctrines and requirements that served to divide these church institutions.

Later in the 19th century the formation of the Evangelical Alliance encouraged Christians to meet locally, especially for united prayer. So also in the 1890s local Free church councils began to be formed in which the general witness of the Free churches could be jointly promoted and a certain sharing of tasks agreed (e.g. hospital chaplaincies). At this same time, the newly formed Christian unions in the universities were open to students from any church background or none for the sake of evangelism in the university and throughout the world. They were thus an “interdenominational” movement, a central part of whose aims was to help the churches overcome division and move towards unity. The resulting Student Christian Movement, whose leaders were instrumental in convening the world mission conference in Edinburgh 1910, was thus foreshadowing the request of the 1952 Faith and Order Lund gathering: “Should not our churches ask themselves whether they are showing sufficient eagerness to enter into conversation with other churches, and whether they should not act together in all matters except those in which deep differences of conviction compel them to act separately? Should they not acknowledge the fact that they often allow themselves to be separated from each other by secular forces and influences instead of witnessing together to the sole lordship of Christ who gathers his people out of all nations, races and tongues?” (see Lund principle).

The first local councils of churches* in Britain, bringing churches officially into a common framework for joint action and the eventual achievement of full unity, sprang up in Bolton, Manchester and St Albans in 1918-19, under the inspiration of the Edinburgh 1910 conference and in revulsion at the horror of the first world war. They rapidly created a wide range of sub-committees and joint projects, the majority handling ma-major social needs and problems of the time but also involving pulpit exchanges and occasions of common prayer. The great international church conferences of the 1920s and 1930s gave much inspiration to the local level, as did the Religion and Life weeks held in many towns and cities during the second world war, with the active involvement of the Roman Catholic Sword of the Spirit movement. By 1946, two years before the formation of the WCC, there were 126 local councils in association with the British Council of Churches (BCC), itself formed in 1942.

A new boost in local ecumenical activity occurred after the war. In Britain in 1957 Christian Aid weeks started (a week when church members try to visit every house in their area to collect for the poor and hungry throughout the world); the first British F&O conference was held in 1964; the new openness and enthusiasm of Roman Catholics in many places as a result of Vatican II* led to a particular boost for the January Week of Prayer for Christian Unity;* and the People Next Door campaign of 1967 brought together denominationally mixed small groups in hundreds of neighbourhoods meeting without their clergy and going out to meet and interact with people of other convictions and backgrounds in their area.

Meanwhile the 1964 F&O conference, while issuing a startling appeal for church unity in Britain by Easter day 1980, also recommended that the churches establish “areas of ecumenical experiment” where denominational disciplines could be suspended. Progress was slow, but in a number of new housing estates joint churches were built by two or more denominations and jointly staffed, providing a single new congregation, as if the churches concerned were already united. Since 1964 over 800 such local “experiments” have sprung up and earned the formal approval of their regional denominational authorities, each one – as always in examples of local ecumenical advance – being distinctive in its particular spirituality and forms of response to the opportunities the Holy Spirit is holding out to Christ’s people in that distinctive place.

Where these efforts take the form of two or more congregations jointly deciding to “move from cooperation to commitment” (a key phrase in the moves to create the new national ecumenical instruments in 1990), openings for mission and evangelism in the overall local community are playing a central part. Those responsible for the life of the churches discover that ecumenical obedience is not a matter of doing some specifically ecumenical things together from time to time, but rather of doing whatever the church is called to do in the ecumenical partnerships the Holy Spirit provides.

Very important in the growth of this network of local ecumenical partnerships (LEPs) has been the bringing into existence of “sponsoring bodies”, at the level of wider church leadership, to approve, accompany and, where necessary, warn and correct the local projects. These are sometimes formed to guide a single project; more typically they bring together bishops and denominational leaders at the level of a county or city. In the 1980s these groupings often pioneered the formation of county/city ecumenical bodies, typically entitled “Churches Together in ...”, which take on wider responsibilities for the common leadership and witness of the entire Christian community there. In some counties, consultation over the appropriate deployment by the separate churches of their resources of personnel, finance and buildings for mission in the area is actively on their agenda.

By 2000 the UK council of churches, now called Churches Together in Britain and Ireland, through the associated national and regional ecumenical bodies, was in touch with well over 1000 local groupings, the majority of which called themselves similarly “Churches Together in ...”.

Many other challenges and inspirations have helped towards significant local initiatives. Two that have been important in Britain in recent years have been the movement of charismatic renewal, releasing many Christians into a spontaneity of prayer and fellowship that has broken down many previous social and denominational barriers, and the many new possibilities in common action and in growing together spiritually between local Roman Catholic congregations and their neighbours of other churches. These opportunities have often been eagerly seized on since 1990, when the Roman Catholic Church entered into the “new ecumenical instruments” in England, Scotland and Wales. Paradoxically, the “top-level” difficulties between the Vatican and the Anglican communion over the ordination of women to the priesthood appear to have positively strengthened the rapidly growing sympathy between local Christians, alike at the level of bishops consulting personally about priests wishing to move into another church and at that of lay leaders yearning to pursue reconciliation in practice. Within this second “movement” a key pioneering role is being played by the Association of Inter-church Families,* in which married couples – one partner a loyal Roman Catholic, the other from another church – and their children have learned to live out a critical solidarity with both churches and to explore the demands and the joys of the unity they can already anticipate in their “domestic church” (see marriage, mixed).

Beyond Britain, New Zealand is one country where local initiatives have in many places forged ahead of denominational leaders in bringing into existence formal anticipations of the united church of tomorrow. More and more countries are experimenting with local councils of churches, the Netherlands and the USA perhaps pre-eminent. Still more important in the long run may well prove the church base communities* of Brazil and other majority Roman Catholic countries. There a new flexibility in the structures of church life in response to the huge challenges of poverty and oppression often includes a new openness to partnership with fellow Christians of other denominations.

LESSONS WORTH LEARNING

This developing pilgrimage at the local level is helpfully seen as moving through five stages: (1) competition, where each church sees itself as entirely adequate and the others as wrong or in rivalry; (2) coexistence, where acknowledgment is made, more or less explicitly, that Christ is known in other churches, yet where there is little readiness to take positive initiative towards the others; (3) cooperation, where relationships have warmed up enough for churches to be ready to do certain specific projects together, in a real if limited partnership, such as a council of churches; (4) commitment, where mutual recognition as partners within Christ’s will for his church has grown to the point that a lasting and deliberately open-ended agreement can be made to do as much as possible within a united framework; and (5) communion,* where it no longer makes sense to speak of divided churches, but earlier quarrels and splits are reconciled and mutually agreeable patterns found for the appropriate wholeness and oneness of the Body of Christ in that place.

The goal of the pilgrimage remains that “all in each place who confess Christ as Lord and Saviour are brought into one fully committed fellowship” (New Delhi assembly), or as refined in the 1975 Nairobi assembly: “The one church is to be envisioned as a conciliar fellowship of local churches which are themselves truly united.” The spelling out of those compressed phrases always involves seeing the unity of Christians within and for the wider reconciliation, harmony and love of all human beings; the striving for Christian unity belongs with the age-old striving for truth, obedience and the sharing of the good news and is in no sense a counter or rival movement.

For the actual practice the vital starting point is mutual respect, growing into deeper trust and friendship among those who give leadership, so that whatever the previous experience, relative size or social standing of the churches concerned, there can be a sense that each is taken seriously and on an equal footing. As the movement develops, there must remain a concern both for respecting the actual churches and people as they presently are and for encouraging and enabling those pioneers who are “constrained by the love of God to exert pressure on the limits of our own inherited traditions, recognizing the theological necessity of what we may call ‘responsible risks’” (New Delhi). There are many traps and dangers to be avoided on the way, not least those surrounding the role of clergy (see laity/clergy) and other “religious professionals”. Almost all the dangers can be traced to half-heartedness and insensitivity in too many of the people, whose commitment and awareness are needed if the congregation as a whole is to be able to move ahead.

The relationships between local groups and church authorities (district synod, diocsan bishop, national conference, etc.) are also crucial. High-level initiatives and advances with no thought given to follow-through at the local level are hardly less disillusioning than local efforts and ideas that are blocked by people higher up. For this reason the sponsoring bodies that accompany LEPs in England have proved such a helpful feature.

The details of any specific place and time are destined to change. What matters in the striving for true Christian unity-in-mission is not the form but the particular next step, since any form or action is best designed precisely for that next step and will give way to what is appropriate for the one after. Ministers' fraternal properly give way to adequately representative local councils of churches, which in turn give way to the fuller commitment of a local covenant approved by higher church leaders, itself designed to evolve into the local embodiment of "one church renewed for mission" (1964 British F&O conference). What matters is that as those who seek to follow Jesus Christ in one specific time and place, we can do so in obedience not primarily to the traditions we inherit from earlier quarrels but to the Holy Spirit, who is preparing the coming of God's kingdom.

See also covenanting; local church; local ecumenical partnerships; unity of "all in each place"; unity, models of; unity, ways to.

MARTIN CONWAY

■ A. Birmelé ed., Local Ecumenism: How Church Unity Is Seen and Practised by Congregations, WCC, 1984 ■ M.C. Boulding, Churches Together in the Parish, London, Catholic Truth Society, 1995 ■ J. Carpenter, Together Locally: A Handbook for Local Churches Seeking to Work Together, London, CTE, 1998 ■ Ecumenical Collaboration at the Regional, National and Local Levels, London, Catholic Truth Society, 1975 ■ L.J. Francis & K. Williams, Churches in Fellowship: Local Councils of Churches Today, London, BCC/CCBI, 1990 ■ In Each Place: Towards a Fellowship of Local Churches Truly United, WCC, 1977 ■ R. Nunn, This Growing Unity: A Handbook on Ecumenical Development in the Counties, Large Cities and New Towns of England, London, CTE, 1998 ■ D. Palmer, Strangers No Longer, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1990 ■ R. Reardon & M. Finch eds, Sharing Communion: An Appeal to the Churches by Interchurch Families, London, Collins Liturgical, 1983 ■ E. Welch & F. Winfield, Travelling Together: A Handbook on Local Ecumenical Partnerships, London, CTE, 1995.

LOCAL ECUMENICAL PARTNERSHIPS

A LOCAL ecumenical partnership (LEP) is the sharing by congregations from different denominations, acting under the supervision of a local, ecumenical body and with the agreement of their respective church structures, of specific aspects of their worship, congregational life, mission and service. The term refers to an ecumenical form developed primarily in England and in Aotearoa New Zealand (where they are known as cooperative ventures).

LEPs in England seek to be "a local sign, symbol and foretaste of the full visible unity of the church". They have been a creative and challenging aspect of the English ecumenical scene since 1964, when the British Council of Churches (BCC) Faith and Order conference called for "areas of ecumenical experiments" to be established "at the request of local congregations, or in new towns and housing areas" to develop ecumenical group ministries, mission, and the sharing of church buildings. A second basic step was the suggestion, in a 1967 county report on "Planning an Ecumenical Parish", that "sponsoring bodies" be developed to oversee both theological and practical aspects of such ventures. The term "experiment" proved difficult, and the phrase "local ecumenical project" was introduced in 1973, the year their national coordinating body, the Consultative Committee for Local Ecumenical Projects in England (CCLEPE), was established. The term "local ecumenical projects" has now been replaced by the phrase "local ecumenical partnerships" (LEPs). They are now coordinated by the Churches Group for Local Unity (CGLU), a group of Churches Together in England (CTE). Staff support for LEPs through CGLU is given by the two field officers of Churches Together in England, with county bodies acting as sponsor bodies for the LEPs in their area.

With the failure of the Church of England-Methodist union conversations in 1972, and the covenant proposals in 1982, many felt that the initiative towards church union had passed to the local level. LEPs developed rapidly throughout the 1970s and 1980s (with 320 recorded in 1978 and 410 in 1985) and were widely regarded as the decisive point of ecumenical growth in England. As of 1990 some 550 had been registered, and in 2001 the figure had risen to 750, although the rate of increase has now slowed.

An LEP involves congregations from at least two and as many as five or more denominations. As of the last official register, the churches most active in LEPs have been Methodist (involved in 708), Church of England (in some 632), United Reformed Church (in 507), Roman Catholic (in 263) and Baptist (in about 242). LEP constituents have also included Salvation Army, Society of Friends, Independent or Community church, Shiloh, Afro-Caribbean, and Moravian congregations, as well as Friends meetings.

While LEPs vary greatly, depending on their make-up and the local situation, they are officially registered in one or more of six categories: single congregation partnerships (marked usually by shared ministry and a common purse, and seeking to integrate every aspect of their life and work); congregations in covenanted partnership (retaining distinct denominational identities, but with a commitment to joint action, expressed in a local covenant); shared building partnerships (under the sharing of church buildings act, 1969); chaplaincy partnerships (in prisons, hospitals, and universities or colleges of further, or higher, education); mission partnerships (in industrial or rural mission, or religious broadcasting); and education partnerships (in lay training, ministerial training and joint schools).

Fundamental to LEPs is their accountability both to their "parent" denominations and to the ecumenical community and vision. Internally, each LEP must be based upon a formal written agreement among its constituent congregations; these vary, depending on the extent and level of commitment, from a "sharing agreement" regulating the joint use of property; to a "declaration of intent" expressing the "essential spirit" of the project and its theological basis; to a written constitution, defining the nature and aims of the project, those involved and the specific commitments which they have made, and procedures for monitoring, evaluation, revision and termination of the project.

Externally, each LEP is responsible to its local sponsoring body, an ecumenical group charged with giving oversight, encouragement, pastoral care and practical advice to existing (and potential) LEPs in its area and serving as both "a buffer and a bridge" between LEPs and their parent denominations. As LEPs have grown, their sponsoring bodies have also grown in extent (as of 2001 there were about 55 in England) and ecumenical significance; typically the sponsoring body for a county will include the Anglican and Roman Catholic bishops, the provincial moderator of the United Reformed Church, and the Methodist district chairman; most have developed into area-wide "ecumenical councils" promoting a range of cooperative activities of ministry and witness. Each LEP is also responsible for complying with the ecumenical canons, or other relevant codes of practice, of each of its constituent denominations.

In facing a wide range of theological and practical problems LEPs have been of creative significance to the whole ecumenical movement. Much creative liturgical reflection and practice has come as LEPs have sought to honour the distinctive gifts and convictions of their various members in their common worship. This has perhaps been most significant in the field of eucharistic sharing (see communion, intercommunion); also important has been the development of joint confirmation* services fulfilling the requirements of a wide range of ecclesiological positions. The questions of membership and ministry are perhaps the most enduringly difficult. "Multiple membership" (in the several constituent denominations) is now possible for those who come to the Christian faith within the context of an LEP. "Extended membership" is now being proposed, by which those who were founder members of an LEP, coming from one tradition, or those who join it by transfer, may be regarded as members of all the constituent denominations. There is increasing openness to a "representative" ministry, with clergy from one denomination serving an LEP on behalf of all its constituents. But this often results in the pastor having to fulfill the institutional demands of several denominations at once; and the discipline of some churches, of course, precludes the sharing of certain sacramental functions (see church discipline, church order). Notably the experience of LEPs was instrumental in the establishment in Milton Keynes in 1991 of an “ecumenical moderator”, a figure serving as a focus for Christian unity in the city, without formal authority but representing, sharing pastoral oversight with, and presiding at meetings of, the heads of various denominations.

Despite practical difficulties, members of LEPs have strongly affirmed their value, finding through the experience of common worship, life and witness a sense of belonging to the whole Christian church rather than to one of its separated denominational parts.

The genius of LEPs has been their combining of a deep commitment to unity; an insistence upon forging new areas of common Christian experience, confession, witness and mission at the local level; a willingness to experiment; and a readiness to be accountable both to denominational and to ecumenical structures. They have, in turn, forced the denominations to face the theoretical and practical problems which the divided structures of the churches pose to Christians who seek to confess and witness to their faith together. However, the slowness of the churches to move towards greater visible unity at the national level is now causing some frustration, and some see a loss of vision in the LEPs.

The cooperative ventures in Aotearoa New Zealand arose as a complementary but independent effort to give local expression to the quest for church union which had been pursued, at national level, since 1967 through the Negotiating Churches Unity Council (NCUC, including Churches of Christ, Anglican, Congregational Union, Methodist and Presbyterian churches). By the end of the 1980s there were about 160 cooperative parishes, a number which remained constant right through the 1990s. Some 80% operate under a “common provisions agreement” whereby two or more local churches (almost always from the five named above) form one parish (in one case, no fewer than 11 existing congregations have merged into one cooperative venture); in the remaining 20%, churches cooperate locally in specific areas of their life, mission and service according to local needs. In some places they have included a significant proportion of the membership of some denominations; strikingly, at the end of the 1980s more than 50% of Methodists in New Zealand were said to be in such ecumenical parishes.

The cooperative ventures have been shaped by their engagement with issues of white settler and Maori bi-culturalism, but more especially by the frustration of hopes for church union at the national level following the breakdown of the NCUC process from 1989 through the 1990s. In a context of declining energy for union efforts nationally, the cooperative ventures increasingly understood themselves as the bearers of the vision of church union. At times they have – and far more sharply than their English counterparts – questioned the very relevance of the traditional denominations, with their continuing divisions, for church life at the parish level. At other times, and more typically, they have emphasized their role as an example, inspiration and resource for the churches nationally, calling them to renew their earlier quest for unity.

A series of conferences, for the most part encouraged by the five NCUC churches, culminated in the inauguration in 1995 of the Forum of Cooperative Ventures (FCV), an independent body which has served to focus and coordinate the reflection and action of cooperative ventures at local and national levels. The forum has recently emphasized its commitment to work with the denominations. Its third and fourth biennial meetings, in 1999 and 2001 respectively, marked its emergence as a full-fledged partner of the NCUC churches, and a recognized and valuable expression of the search for visible unity in Aotearoa New Zealand.

The FCV seeks now to “bring the churches closer in mission and ministry, while still honouring their independence and traditions”. Through the FCV, the cooperative ventures are engaged with ecumenical bodies both nationally and internationally. Locally they are seeking first to demonstrate a united mission in their own community while celebrating the diversity of traditions, ethos and ministry of the churches, seeing this as “a strong model for the post-modern society in New Zealand”. Thus the cooperative ventures continue to offer significant possibilities – and pose important questions – to the churches and the ecumenical movement in their country.

See also covenanting, denominationalism, local church, local ecumenical obedience, unity of “all in each place”.

THOMAS F. BEST and ROGER NUNN

■ J. Carpenter, Together Locally: A Handbook for Local Churches Seeking to Work Together, London, CTE, 1998 ■ LEPs: Register of Local Ecumenical Partnerships and Sponsoring Bodies, London, CTE, 1998 ■ R. Nunn, This Growing Unity: A Handbook on Ecumenical Development in the Counties, Large Cities and New Towns of England, London, CTE, 1998 ■ P. Tovey & J. Waller, Worship in Local Ecumenical Partnerships, Cambridge, Grove, 1998 ■ “Venturing Forward: Conference Statement”, Wellington, National Review Consultation of Cooperative Ventures, 1989 ■ E. Welch & F. Winfield, Travelling Together: A Handbook on Local Ecumenical Partnerships, London, CTE, 1995. See also “Survey of Church Union Negotiations”, ER: for 1988-91, 44, 1, 1992 (Morrison); for 1992-94, 47, 1, 1995 (Robertson); for 1994-96, 49, 2, 1997 (McKenzie); for 1996-99, 52, 1, 2000 (Robertson & Ross); for 2000-02, 54, 3, 2002 (Ross).

LOSSKY, VLADIMIR

B.8 June 1903, Göttingen, Germany; d. 7 Feb. 1958, Paris, France. Lossky’s particular contribution to the ecumenical movement was a renewed patristic presentation of Eastern Orthodoxy* to the Western world. His message was an invitation not to repeat or systematize the fathers but to practise their approach to theology for the present day, a theology which is not a speculative intellectual exercise but the expression of the ecclesial experience of God, with the help of the Holy Spirit, who dwells in the heart of the theologian. Expelled from Russia in 1922, he settled in Prague, where he took part in N. Kondakov’s seminars and began to read the fathers. In 1924, he started his studies at the Sorbonne in Paris, where he became a disciple of Etienne Gilson and came in close contact with Jean Daniélou, Henri de Lubac, Yves Congar, Louis Bouyer and others. It was in response to this ecumenical challenge that he wrote most of his works, by which he became known as one of the prominent Orthodox theologians of this century. After the war he taught dogmatic theology at the Institut de théologie orthodoxe Saint Denys in Paris. He also played a prominent part in the Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius* in England. Together with Georges Florovsky he became one of the main speakers at annual summer conferences.

NICHOLAS LOSSKY

■ V. Lossky, Essai sur la théologie mystique de l'Eglise d'Orient (ET The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church, London, Clarke, 1957) ■ A l'image et à la ressemblance de Dieu (ET In the Image and Likeness of God, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1974) ■ V. Lossky & L. Ouspensky, Der Sinn der Ikonen (ET The Meaning of Icons, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1952) ■ V. Lossky & L. Ouspensky, Théologie négative et connaissance de Dieu chez Maître Eckhart, Paris, Vrin, 1960 ■ V. Lossky & L. Ouspensky, Vision de Dieu (ET The Vision of God, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1983).

LUND PRINCIPLE

ON 27 AUGUST 1952 the third world conference on Faith and Order,* meeting at Lund, Sweden, agreed on the text of "A Word to the Churches". It was immediately released to the press for worldwide publication. One sentence asked: "Should not our churches ask themselves whether they are showing sufficient eagerness to enter into conversation with other churches, and whether they should not act together in all matters except those in which deep differences of conviction compel them to act separately?" (italics added). The italicized final section of that sentence became known subsequently as the Lund principle. Probably this is the most quoted (and sometimes misquoted!) sentence from any F&O document. It has often been misunderstood by being taken as an exhortation rather than, as in its original context, a question to be answered. The original intention was to challenge the churches to talk together so that they could come to act together. Lund was held in the aftermath of the South India union (1947), and hopes were rising for other similar union projects.

Two interpretations of the Lund principle quickly arose which weakened its impact. It became a favourite quotation for ecumenical orators, who used it rhetorically, somewhat as a general principle to be stated. Many churches – particularly locally – took it as encouragement simply for limited spasmodic relationships and escaped the full force of the question by thinking in terms of annual celebrations connected with the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.* The Lund drafters intended quite otherwise. It was a principle to be applied to the ongoing, day-to-day life of the churches. Answered affirmatively, the question was intended to face the churches – whether nationally or locally – with issues of permanent change. There are signs that this is, at last, beginning to happen on a significant scale, particularly in local situations with developing covenant relationships which include a determination to act on the Lund principle. It would appear, therefore, that the Lund question still remains well worth asking.

See also covenanting; unity, ways to.

MORRIS WEST

■ O.S. Tomkins ed., The Third World Conference on Faith and Order, London, SCM Press, 1953.

LUTHERAN-METHODIST DIALOGUE

THE LUTHERAN World Federation* and the World Methodist Council* conducted bilateral conversations from 1977 until 1984. They concluded with the substantive proposal "that our churches take steps to declare and establish full fellowship of word and sacrament". The process which led to this conclusion was difficult, and at the same time renewing and encouraging. Participants came from every continent, and the internal differences among Lutherans and Methodists were sometimes as striking as the differences between them.

The planning session held in 1977 at St Simons Island, Georgia, USA, led to the choice of the theme "The Church: A Community of Grace". Sub-topics of special importance for discussion were biblical authority and the authenticity of the church, the gospel of grace, the Holy Spirit in the church, the sacraments of the gospel and the mission of the church in today's world.

The first regular meeting (Dresden 1979) concentrated on "The Authority of the Bible and the Authenticity of the Church", especially as this issue related to the auxiliary keys of creeds,* confessions and historical criticism. Representatives exchanged visits in churches in the area. The first service in which bishops of the two denominations officiated together took place in the Kreuzkirche on 23 January.

At the second meeting (Bristol, England, 1980) the desired goals of mutual understanding, recognition of oneness in the Body of Christ, and providing theological support for church cooperation and unity according to local needs were all served through the discussion of Christian experience. The difficulties of denoting the meaning(s) of Christian experience and the diverse emphases found under this theme served to enrich the discussion and the inter-relationships of the two traditions. Justification* and sanctification* were the foci of this discussion, with agreement both that "Christians throughout their whole life are in need of God's forgiving grace" and that "Christian faith is faith that is active in love".

At the third meeting (Oslo 1981) a tentative outline for a common statement was drawn as the discussion focused on the Holy Spirit* and the church* – with special reference to how particular denominational histories have shaped ecclesiology and the understanding of ministry.

The means of grace,* the sacraments* of baptism* and eucharist,* and church order* were the main topics of discussion at the fourth meeting (Lake Junaluska, NC, USA, 1983). The hope was explicitly expressed that the final report would contribute to increased Lutheran-Methodist encounter and cooperation as well as provide theological grounds for official steps towards eucharistic sharing. The final draft constituted the centre of attention along with papers on the Lord's supper and church order.

At Bossey, Switzerland, 1984, the final meeting of the commission was held, with the express purpose of finalizing the report to the sponsoring bodies. The report witnesses to "important agreements and convergences and indicates the ways in which we express our common faith differently". While there is need for further study of certain doctrinal topics (providence, the two kingdoms, aspects of anthropology) as well as of "forms of unity", the report concludes that there is already sufficient agreement for several recommendations to be made: full fellowship of word and sacrament, common work in every place to manifest unity in witness and service, and use of the results of this theological dialogue in seeking the visible unity* of all Christians.

The first concrete result of these consultations was the historic, joint celebration of holy communion in the Lutheran St Lorenz Church at Nuremberg on 29 September 1987 between the Evangelical Methodist Church in the Federal Republic of Germany and the Lutheran, Reformed and United churches of Germany. The text from the bilateral consultation was studied by these churches, and their own decision was to establish an official fellowship of pulpit and sacraments. After the inaugural service in Nuremberg, other services were then held throughout West Germany. In 1990 a similar relationship was established in the German Democratic Republic. Methodists and Lutherans in Austria, Sweden and Norway followed suit in 1991, 1993 and 1997 respectively.

THOMAS A. LANGFORD

■ The Church: A Community of Grace, final report of the LWF/WMC joint commission, 1979-84, Geneva and Lake Junaluska NC, 1984 ■ Lutherisches Kirchenamt, Kirchenkanzlei der Evangelisch-methodistischen Kirche, Vom Dialog zur Kanzel- und Abendmahlsgemeinschaft, Hanover & Stuttgart, 1987.

LUTHERAN-ORTHODOX DIALOGUE

ALTHOUGH Martin Luther expressed an interest in the Orthodox church, it fell to his colleague Philipp Melancthon to seek the first contacts between Lutherans and the Eastern church. In 1559 Melancthon attempted to send a letter and a Greek copy of the Augsburg confession to the ecumenical patriarch in Constantinople. His attempt failed, and contacts ceased for 15 years. Between 1574 and 1581 Patriarch Jeremiah II and theologians at Tübingen exchanged letters, the correspondence ending when the patriarch asserted that the Germans should submit themselves to the teachings of Orthodoxy. Official contacts between the Scandinavian churches and the Russian Orthodox Church started as early as 1557. The ecclesiastical reforms of Peter the Great (1672-1725) brought with them a significant Lutheran presence in Russia. From that time until the early 20th century, however, communication between Lutheranism and Orthodoxy tended to be more personal than official.

Shortly after his consecration in 1914, Archbishop Söderblom of Sweden made direct contact with the ecumenical patriarch. Söderblom, the patriarch and other ecumenical leaders envisaged the creation of something like the present-day WCC. The archbishop played a pivotal role in the 1925 conference on Life and Work* held in Stockholm – a meeting which brought a significant number of Orthodox to Sweden, including the patriarch of Alexandria. These early 20th-century events laid the foundation for the Lutheran-Orthodox bilateral dialogue after the second world war.

Regional dialogue. Reciprocal visitations between the Russian Orthodox Church and the Evangelical Church of the Federal Republic of Germany began in the 1950s. These visitations set the stage for the Arnoldshain conversations, which have run from 1959 to the present day. Talks have focused on a wide range of topics, including Tradition,* justification,* the Holy Spirit,* reconciliation,* the Bible, peace,* baptism,* the eucharist,* and the Holy Spirit in the life of the church.

The Russian Orthodox Church and the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland have been in dialogue since 1970. The conversations have dealt with the eucharist, salvation,* justification and theosis (see sanctification). Since 1989 the dialogue has accented new hopes for the future, peace and social ethics.

After the second world war, Lutherans from the German Democratic Republic met with Russian Orthodox Church officials. From these initial exchanges emerged the Zagorsk conversations, which began in 1974. The work centred on questions relating to the kingdom of God,* the sanctifying actions of God's grace* and the life of the church* in a socialist society. In 1979 dialogue commenced between the Lutheran churches in the GDR and the Orthodox church of Bulgaria.

In 1969 the Ecumenical Patriarchate began bilateral dialogue (see dialogue, bilateral) with the Evangelical Church of the FRG. They considered topics such as the Holy Spirit, salvation of the world, anthropology* and the eucharist. The Evangelical Church of Germany and the Romanian Orthodox Church initiated a dialogue in 1979, addressing scripture and Tradition, sacramental theology, justification, theosis and synergeia.

National dialogue. Numerous discussions have taken place between the Lutheran and Reformed churches in Romania and the Romanian Orthodox Church. Unlike regional bilaterals, these conversations are not conducted by official church-appointed commissions, but are organized by the Orthodox theological institutes in Bucharest and Sibiu and by the United Protestant Institute, located in Sibiu (Lutheran) and Cluj (Reformed). Focuses of the dialogue have included ecumenism, church and society, the active meaning of hope,* the ethics of solidarity, the social aspects of salvation, communion* and intercommunion.*

From 1967 to 1969 a first series of conversations took place between the various Orthodox churches in North America and the Lutheran member churches of the Lutheran Council in the USA, with scripture and Tradition as topics. Lutherans were joined by the Reformed in 1973 for a three-year trilateral conversation with the Orthodox on "Christian Gospel and Social Responsibility: Biblical and Historical Aspects". A second series of Lutheran-Orthodox dialogues ran from 1984 to 1989. After considering a series of topics (ecumenical councils,* creeds* and confession, imago Dei and deification, and election and predestination), the commission produced a final report on "Christ 'in us' and Christ 'for us' in Lutheran and Orthodox Theology".

The most recent round of dialogue issued two statements, "Faith and the Holy Trinity", concerning the filioque clause of the Nicene Creed, and an endorsement of the World Council's proposal to establish a common date for the celebration of Easter*/Pascha.

World level. At the first pan-Orthodox conference (Rhodes 1961), the Orthodox churches decided that dialogue with the Lutherans should be on the agenda of the Holy and Great Council of the Orthodox. At a similar gathering in 1976 the participants agreed that an invitation should be extended by the ecumenical patriarch on behalf of all autocephalous Orthodox churches, requesting Lutheran churches to engage in global-level dialogue through the Lutheran World Federation.* The Lutherans accepted the invitation in 1977 and appointed Lutheran members to the commission in 1978. The two individual dialogue teams worked separately but on a common agenda from 1978 until 1981, when the first meeting of the joint commission met in Helsinki. The common agenda those years included three major topics: contacts in the 16th and 17th centuries, the regional dialogues, and the theme for the dialogue, which was agreed as "Participation in the Mystery of the Church". The goal of the dialogue was "full communion as full mutual recognition".

After the first five meetings, joint statements reflecting significant convergences of thinking on divine revelation*, scripture and Tradition,* and inspiration* and canon* were prepared for publication in 1991. A new round of work, on "Authority in and of the Church", began in Moscow in 1991 with a discussion of conciliarity. In 1998 the joint commission approved an agreed statement on "Salvation: Grace, Justification and Synergy". Dialogue continues on the general theme of "The Mystery of the Church".

DANIEL F. MARTENSEN

■ E. Benz & L.A. Zander eds, Evangelisches und Orthodoxes Christentum in Begegnung und Auseinandersetzung, Hamburg, Agentur des Rauthern Hauses, 1952 ■ G. Mastrantonis, Augsburg and Constantinople: The Correspondence between the Tübingen Theologians and Patriarch Jeremiah II, Brookline MA, Holy Cross, 1982 ■ The Orthodox Church and the Churches of the Reformation: A Survey of Orthodox-Protestant Dialogues, WCC, 1975 ■ Report of the Consultation of Lutheran/Orthodox Dialogues, Geneva, Lutheran World Federation, 1975 ■ R. Saarinen, Faith and Holiness: Lutheran-Orthodox Dialogue, 1959-1994, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1997 ■ R. Tobias, Heaven on Earth: A Lutheran-Orthodox Odyssey, Dehli, American Lutheran Publ. Bureau, 1996.

LUTHERAN-REFORMED DIALOGUE

EFFORTS to bring together the Lutheran and Reformed traditions began early in the Reformation period and continued through the centuries. While these attempts often have been frustrated, notable achievements have been recorded, especially in the 20th century.

The Marburg colloquy (1529), which included Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli and Oecolampadius, achieved agreement on a number of points, but not on the presence of Christ in the Lord's supper (see eucharist). Zwingli's formulation came to define the Reformed view for Lutherans, although Luther later expressed appreciation for Calvin's position; and Calvin, who was not at Marburg, stated that he favoured Luther over Zwingli. Colloquies at Maulbronn (1564) and Montbéliard (1586) failed to reconcile differences. The scholastic theology of the 17th and 18th centuries, with important exceptions, widened the gap between the two traditions.

The 19th century produced several instances of convergence. In Prussia, Lutheran and Reformed churches were joined in 1817 by the royal decree of Frederick William III. This controversial "forced marriage" created the Prussian Union, which was largely administrative except in the Rhine provinces and Westphalia, where, in 1835, the two churches were consolidated, the new church retaining both Lutheran and Reformed confessions. In the US, Lutheran and Reformed immigrants from Germany formed a "Kirchenverein" in 1841 which almost 100 years later combined with the German Reformed church to form the Evangelical and Reformed Church, now part of the United Church of Christ (UCC). In Hungary a regional agreement between Lutherans and Reformed established pulpit and table fellowship in 1835: while the two churches remained separate, the mutual recognition of ministry,* church* and sacraments* became widespread in the 19th century. In 1891 the small Lutheran and Reformed churches of Austria formed an administrative union.

The 20th century, however, has seen the greatest achievements, perhaps none more impressive than the European Leuenberg* agreement of 1973. The way to Leuenberg was paved by a number of post-war national dialogues, each concluding that continued division is confessionally unwarranted. Reports were issued in the Netherlands (1956), the Federal Republic of Germany (1959) and France (1964), but perhaps the most significant document was the Arnoldshain theses (1957), which express the judgment of some of the most eminent exegetes of the century that the New Testament provides no justification for the eucharistic division of the traditions. Leuenberg was also preceded by European dialogues treating scripture (1957), the presence of Christ (1958), baptism (1959), the Lord's supper (1960), and the important Schauenberg talks (1964-67). The Leuenberg process began in 1969.

Article 7 of the Lutheran Augsburg confession became the critical text for Leuenberg. It states that for "the true unity of the church it is enough to agree concerning the teaching of the gospel and the administration of the sacraments". In the first of four sections, the Leuenberg document recalls the common heritage of the Reformation and notes the divisions of the 16th century. The second section articulates the common faith* of the Reformation churches: the centrality of justification* by faith for the preaching, teaching and sacramental life of the church. The third section addresses the difficult issue of the 16th-century condemnations, identifying specifically those raised in article 10 of the Augsburg confession concerning the Lord's supper, Christology and predestination (see anathemas). The modern thought-world differs from that of our forebears; the condemnations should be lifted. The Leuenberg agreement concludes by offering itself as an instrument of unity.* Churches signing it thereby declare themselves to be in full communion,* i.e. in table and pulpit fellowship. By 2002, some 103 churches had joined the Leuenberg Church Fellowship, including some in South America and some Methodist churches.

In the US the first bilateral conversation began in 1962. Its report, Marburg Revisited (1966), included studies by a number of prominent Lutheran and Reformed scholars. The conferees could "find no insuperable obstacles to pulpit and altar fellowship" and recommended that the constituent churches "enter into discussions looking forward to intercommunion and the fuller recognition of one another's ministries". No action was taken by any of the sponsoring churches, and a second bilateral met 1972-74. This dialogue produced a short report which concluded that the Leuenberg agreement was not suitable for use in the US, but recommended continuing discussion.

Almost 20 years after the first Lutheran-Reformed dialogue convened, the third and most controversial began its deliberations (1981). Its report, An Invitation to Action (1983), built on the Leuenberg agreement and Marburg Revisited. Brief statements on justification, the Lord's supper and ministry were provided, along with two essays on ministry, a topic of growing ecumenical concern. The report urgently called Lutheran and Reformed churches to recognize one another's doctrines of church, ministry and the Lord's supper, establish pulpit and table fellowship, and begin a process of reception.*

An Invitation to Action stirred heated controversy within the Lutheran ranks. Published shortly before three major Lutheran bodies combined in 1988 to form the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA), it sparked debate on the ecumenical commitments of the new church. Strong voices in the Lutheran Church in America (LCA) questioned the Reformed understanding of the Lord's supper and ministry, fearing that Lutheran-Reformed fellowship would hinder Roman Catholic-Lutheran convergence. The synods of the American Lutheran Church, the Association of Evangelical Lutheran Churches, the Reformed Church in America (RCA) and the Presbyterian Church USA (PCUSA) adopted the report's main recommendations and thus were in fellowship until the formation of the ELCA. The LCA, however, declined fellowship, requesting that the new church initiate conversations with the Reformed.

ELCA conversations with the PCUSA, the RCA and the United Church of Christ began in 1988. Concluding in 1992, the report of the committee, A Common Calling: The Witness of Our Reformation Churches in North America Today, recommended that the participating churches enter into an agreement of full communion. Acknowledging the achievements of Marburg Revisited, An Invitation to Action and the Leuenberg agreement, the "if... then" logic of previous reports was replaced with a "because... therefore" rationale, i.e., because of agreement achieved on critical church-dividing issues, therefore certain consequences can be drawn. The report also offered an innovative modus operandi for churches entering full communion when it called for "mutual affirmation and admonition". On the basis of the report and its recommendations, a formula of agreement was developed which called the four churches to take actions at the highest level to establish full communion. The recommendations of the formula were adopted by the national assemblies of the participating churches in 1997.

Significant progress towards unity has been made in other parts of the world. The Evangelical Lutheran Church in the Netherlands anticipates moving beyond pulpit and table fellowship to formal union with the nation's two principal Reformed churches. A union has already been achieved in Ethiopia, where in 1975 the Bethel Church (Presbyterian) became a synod in the Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus. In Indonesia the re-organization of the Communion of Churches in 1984 provided a framework for Lutheran and Reformed churches there to come into full mutual recognition of church, sacraments and ministry.

The first world-level Lutheran-Reformed dialogue was not convened until 1985. Its report, Toward Church Fellowship (1989), finds the condemnations of the past no longer applicable, affirms the unity and diversity of the two traditions, and recommends pulpit and table fellowship and growth together in mission.

PAUL R. FRIES

■ J.E. Andrews & J.A. Burgess eds, An Invitation to Action, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1984 ■ P.C. Empie & J.I. McCord eds, Marburg Revisited, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1966 ■ W. Hüffmeier & C. Podmore, Leuenberg, Meissen and Porvoo: Consultation..., Frankfurt, Lembeck, 1996 ■ W.G. Rusch & D.F. Martensen eds, The Leuenberg Agreement and Lutheran-Reformed Relationships, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1989 ■ E. Schieffer, Von Schauenburg nach Leuenberg: Entstehung und Bedeutung der Konkordie reformatorischer Kirchen in Europa, Paderborn, Bonifatius, 1982.

LUTHERAN-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

THREE HEADINGS best explain the situation of Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue.

INTERNATIONAL DIALOGUES

After two years of discussions between the Vatican Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity* and the Lutheran World Federation,* a Joint Lutheran-Roman Catholic study commission first met in 1967 with the mandate to discuss “the gospel and the church”. Its statement (1972), commonly called the Malta report, covered a wide range of topics: Tradition* and scripture, justification,* gospel and world, ordained ministry, papacy. The commission noted both “the progressive overcoming of doctrinal disputes” and “structural problems which are largely responsible for continuing to keep our churches divided” (para. 46). Despite lack of full agreement on the doctrine of ordained ministry, the commission called for mutual recognition of ministerial office and for official actions making possible “occasional acts of intercommunion as, for example, during ecumenical events or in the pastoral care of those involved in mixed marriages” (para. 73). Of the seven Catholic participants, however, four dissented from the call for occasional intercommunion.*

The achievements and the limitations of the Malta report led to the creation of a second dialogue group, which produced three pairs of documents. First, two documents were occasioned by anniversaries: “All under One Christ” (1980), on the 450th anniversary of the Augsburg confession, and “Martin Luther – Witness to Jesus Christ” (1983), on the 500th anniversary of Luther’s birth. Second, two documents examined particular doctrinal problems. “The Eucharist” (1978) opened with an extensive joint witness, structured by elements common to the liturgies of the two traditions (see eucharist). A following section on common tasks described extensive convergence on the presence of Christ in the supper, the latter’s relation to the sacrifice of Christ, its communal nature, eucharistic ministry and eucharistic fellowship. Certain remaining differences over presence and sacrifice were explicitly said to be no longer church-dividing. Nevertheless, agreement could not be reached on a proposed statement on “Reciprocal Admission to the Eucharist”.

In “The Ministry in the Church” (1981), the commission agreed that a special ministry is “abidingly constitutive” of the church (para. 18) and has “the essential and specific function... to assemble and build up the Christian community by proclaiming the word of God, celebrating the sacraments and presiding over the liturgical, missionary and diaconal life of the community” (para. 31). While the dialogue reached extensive agreement on the tasks of episcopal ministry, agreement on the necessity of a distinct episcopal ministry was stated in a conditional, qualified statement: “If both churches acknowledge that for faith this historical development of the one apostolic ministry into a more local and a more regional ministry has taken place with the help of the Holy Spirit and to this degree constitutes something essential for the church, then a high degree of agreement has been reached” (para. 49, emphasis in original). The possibility of mutual recognition of ministries again surfaced but in more modest form. The commission concluded that “it seems possible” that the defectus Catholics find in the sacrament of orders in Lutheran churches “refers to a partial lack rather than a complete absence” (paras 76-77). On this basis, there could be “a mutual recognition that the ministry in the other church exercises essential functions of the ministry that Jesus Christ instituted in his church" (para. 85). Any such recognition, however, must not be "an isolated act" but part of "a process in which the churches reciprocally accept each other" (para. 82).

A third pair of documents outlined what such a process would look like. "Ways to Community" (1980) described the ecumenical goal and steps leading towards it. Both goal and path are developed in terms of communion* (Gemeinschaft). Unity* implies "a full spiritual and ecclesial fellowship" (para. 53), "an outward, visible unity which is becoming historically manifest in the life of the churches" (para. 33). "Facing Unity" (1985) described various models of unity (see unity, models of) advocated in ecumenical discussions and then outlined a possible process by which Lutheran and Catholic churches could grow together at the diocesan/synodical level. Central to the proposal was the collegial exercise of oversight, based on a mutual recognition that "in the other church the church of Jesus Christ is actualized" (para. 124). Through joint ordinations, a common ministry would be created. Responses to "Facing Unity" from Lutheran churches have been highly cautious. No response has been made by Catholic bishops conferences or the Vatican.

A third series of international dialogues, from 1986 to 1993, produced the longest document yet, a 145-page text on "Church and Justification" (1993). In it the dialogue seeks to test the widely perceived consensus on justification by analyzing its implications for ecclesiology. Working from the shared belief that all that is taught about the church "must be founded in the salvation-event itself and marked by justification-faith" and that all that is taught about justification "must be understood in the overall total context of statements about the church, the means of salvation and the church's ministry" (para. 2), the dialogue develops an extensive common ecclesiology but also identifies a series of detailed but not insignificant differences which centre on the church's active role in the mediation of salvation (chap. 4). While Catholics perceive a Spirit-led role for the church as, in an analogous sense, a "sacrament" of salvation (para. 122), Lutherans worry that what can only be ascribed to the gospel is being ascribed to human actions and institutions (para. 212). Even this difference, however, is prefaced by an extensive agreement on the inter-relation of salvation and church.

A fourth series of dialogues began in 1995 on apostolicity, eucharist and ethics.

NATIONAL DIALOGUES

The most extensive national dialogues have been in the US. After discussions of the status of the Nicene Creed* as dogma* of the church (1965) and one baptism for the remission of sins (1966), the dialogue addressed more controversial matters. In "The Eucharist as Sacrifice" (1967), "growing harmony" was reported on the sacrificial character of the supper. In addition, agreement was reached on "the full reality of Christ's presence" in the eucharist, even if that presence is understood in different terms.

Although the following statement on "Eucharist and Ministry" (1970) did not claim full agreement, the Catholic participants saw "no persuasive reason to deny the possibility of the Roman Catholic Church recognizing the validity of (Lutheran) ministry... and, correspondingly, the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the eucharistic celebrations of the Lutheran churches" (para. 54). This recommendation was widely criticized in Catholic circles.

The common statement on "Papal Primacy and the Universal Church" (1973) focused on the "Petrine function", i.e. "a particular form of ministry exercised by a person, office-holder, or local church with reference to the church as a whole" (para. 4). While such a function can be exercised by various persons and institutions, its "single most notable representative... has been the bishop of Rome" (see primacy). Lutheran churches were asked "if they are able to acknowledge... the possibility and desirability of the papal ministry, renewed under the gospel and committed to Christian freedom, in a larger communion which would include the Lutheran churches" (para. 32). While the Catholic participants noted that the common statement "does not fully reflect everything that we believe concerning the papacy" (para. 34), they nevertheless asked whether "a distinct canonical status may be worked out by which Lutherans could be in official communion with the church of Rome" (para. 38).

The statement on papal primacy did not address questions about infallibility,* which was the topic of "Teaching Authority and Infallibility in the Church" (1978). Significant convergence was reported (Catholic Reflections, para. 1; Lutheran Reflections, para. 18), aided particularly by consideration of the role of reception.*

A greater breakthrough occurred in "Justification by Faith" (1983). Both sides judged the common statement sufficient, without accompanying Lutheran and Catholic reflections. A thematic statement summarized the central agreement: "Our entire hope of justification and salvation rests on Christ Jesus and on the gospel whereby the good news of God's merciful action in Christ is made known; we do not place our ultimate trust in anything other than God's promise and saving work in Christ" (paras 44,157). The dialogue reported "convergence (though not uniformity) on justification by faith considered in and of itself, and a significant though lesser convergence on the applications of the doctrine as a criterion of authenticity for the church's proclamation and practice" (para. 152).

The following text, "The One Mediator, the Saints, and Mary" (1990), was explicitly designed to test the agreement on justification. The dialogue repeated the earlier affirmation on justification and added that "Jesus Christ is the sole Mediator in God's plan of salvation" (para. 103). While important differences on the mediation of the saints and Mary were revealed, the dialogue outlined conditions under which these differences need not be church-dividing (paras 90ff.). After a short text on "Scripture and Tradition" (1992) was produced, a pause was made to reconsider the shape and future tasks of the dialogue. A new round began in 1998, studying the theme "The Church as Koinonia of Salvation: Its Structure and Ministries".

The US dialogue also commissioned joint Catholic-Lutheran studies on "Peter in the New Testament" (1973), "Mary in the New Testament" (1978), and "Righteousness in the New Testament" (1982).

Catholic-Lutheran dialogues have also taken place on the national level in other countries, most notably in Europe. Two statements have been produced in Norway ("Communion, the Lord's Supper", 1982; "The Ministry of the Church", 1986) and three in Sweden ("Marriage and Family in the Christian Viewpoint", 1974; "Ecumenical Convergence on Baptism and Church Membership", 1978; and "The Office of the Bishop", 1988). The last Swedish statement, published also in English, is the most far-reaching Catholic-Lutheran agreement on episcopacy.

The Lutheran-Catholic dialogue in Germany has produced two lengthy statements: "Kirchengemeinschaft in Wort und Sakrament" (1984) and "Communio Sanctorum: Die Kirche als Gemeinschaft der Heiligen" (2000). Both are developed within the framework of an ecclesiology of communion. The former focuses particularly on confession of faith, sacraments and worship, and ministerial office, while the latter takes up the church as the community of the justified, the papacy, and the saints and Mary.

ACTION AT WORLD LEVEL

In 1993 the Lutheran World Federation and the Roman Catholic Church decided to move towards an official endorsement of the results of the dialogues between them on justification. On the basis of the international and US Lutheran-Catholic dialogues and the discussion between the Roman Catholic Church and the Evangelical Church in Germany (Lutheran-United-Reformed), a "Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification" was produced that affirmed a "consensus in basic truths of the doctrine of justification" and declared that the relevant condemnations from each church did not apply to their present understandings of justification. The declaration was ratified by the highest authorities of both communions and solemnly signed at Augsburg, Germany, on 31 October 1999, the 482nd anniversary of Luther's posting of his 95 theses.

MICHAEL ROOT

■ Committees of US National Council of Catholic Bishops, "Lutheran-Roman Catholic Dialogue: Critique", Lutheran Quarterly, 2, 1987 ■ G. Gassmann, "Lutheran-Catholic Agreement on Justification", Ecumenical Trends, 25, 1996 ■ J. Gros, H. Meyer & W.G.

Rusch eds, Growth in Agreement II: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, 1982-1998, WCC, 2000 ■ B.J. Hilberath & W. Pannenberg eds, Zur Zukunft der Ökumene: Die "gemeinsame Erklärung zur Rechtfertigungslehre", Regensburg, Pustet, 1999 ■ W. Kasper, "Basic Consensus and Church Fellowship: The Status of the Ecumenical Dialogue between the Roman Catholic and Evangelical Lutheran Churches", in In Search of Christian Unity: Basic Consensus/Basic Differences, J.A. Burgess ed., Minneapolis, Fortress, 1991 ■ H. Meyer, "Roman Catholic/ Lutheran Dialogue", OC, 22, 1986 ■ H. Meyer & L. Vischer eds, Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, WCC, 1984 ■ P. Norgaard-Højen, "A Point of No Return?: The Joint Declaration and the Future of Lutheran-Catholic Dialogue", ER, 52, 2, 2000 ■ J. Wicks, "Ecclesiological Issues in the Lutheran-Catholic Dialogue (1965-1985)", in Vatican II: Assessment and Perspectives: Twenty-five Years after (1962-1987), R. La-tourelle ed., vol. 2, New York, Paulist, 1989.

LUTHERAN WORLD FEDERATION

ESTABLISHED in 1947 by representatives of Lutheran churches in 23 countries, in 2002 the Lutheran World Federation (LWF) numbered 133 member churches, including three associate members, in 73 countries. It represents approximately 60 million of the estimated 64 million baptized Lutherans in the world. Some churches, though not all, which are associated with the American-based Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod remain outside the LWF.

Antecedent organizations include the general council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in North America (1867), the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference in Germany (1868), and the Lutheran World Convention (1923). The formation of the LWF after the second world war was the extension of such movements as well as a response to post-war needs for reconciliation, relief and service.

The LWF initially regarded itself as a "free association of Lutheran churches" organized to foster united witness in the world, common theological research, the ecumenical involvement of Lutheran churches, and common response to issues of human need and social justice. In 1990 it adopted a new constitution based on a different self-understanding, one with strong ecclesial overtones: "... a communion of churches which confess the Triune God, agree in the proclamation of the word of God and are united in pulpit and altar fellowship". This self-understanding builds around a theology of communion* (koinonia*), with increased concern for confessional unity, joint mission and service, theological reflection and strong ecumenical involvement.

LWF assemblies have been held in Lund, Sweden (1947), Hanover, Germany (1952), Minneapolis, USA (1957), Helsinki, Finland (1963), Evian-les-Bains, France (1970), Dar es Salaam, Tanzania (1977), Budapest, Hungary (1984), Curitiba, Brazil (1990), and Hong Kong, People's Republic of China (1997). In 2003 the tenth assembly is to be held in Winnipeg, Canada.

The 1990 assembly adopted the present organizational structure of the LWF. The assembly, which normally meets every six years, is the highest legislative authority. The council, which meets annually, serves as the governing body: it has 48 assembly-elected members of whom 50% are from the so-called Northern churches and 50% from churches of the two-thirds world. The LWF secretariat headquarters are in the Ecumenical Centre, Geneva. The structure calls for three departments in addition to a general secretariat, with nearly 100 staff members: a general secretariat and departments on theology and studies, mission and development, and world service whose projects throughout the world employ approximately 4000 persons.

The ecumenical orientation of the LWF is best seen in its close cooperation with the WCC, of which most LWF churches are members. The LWF office for ecumenical affairs develops and maintains bilateral ecumenical relations with other Christian world communions,* and seeks to find ways of coordinating and furthering national and regional bilateral relations. The office is responsible for the international bilateral dialogues with official representatives of the Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican, Reformed, Methodist, Baptist and Adventist traditions.

On 31 October 1999, in Augsburg, Germany, representatives of the LWF and the Roman Catholic Church signed a joint declaration of the doctrine of justification. The agreement affirms that 16th century condemnations by each tradition of the other concerning justification by grace through faith do not strike the current teachings as represented in the document, and so they are no longer in themselves church-dividing (see esp. paras 1-7, 40-42). This ecumenical breakthrough is prompting the LWF and the Pontifical Council for Christian Unity* to pursue conversations with representatives of various Protestant traditions, in the hope of widening the declaration's applicability.

NORMAN A. HJELM

- W. Greive, Between Vision and Reality: Lutheran Churches in Transition, Geneva, LWF, 2001
- H. Holze ed., The Church as Communion: Lutheran Contributions to Ecclesiology, Geneva, LWF, 1997
- J.H. Schjørring, N.A. Hjelm & P. Kumari eds, From Federation to Communion: The History of the Lutheran World Federation, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1997
- K. Schmidt-Clausen, Vom Lutherischen Weltkonvent zum Lutherischen Weltbund, Gutersloh, Mohn, 1976. Annual detailed reports of LWF activities and the council meetings.

LUTHERANISM

THE CHURCH reform initiated by Martin Luther in 1517 at Wittenberg, Germany, developed into a movement, became established under political rulers chiefly in Central and Northern Europe, survived in Eastern Europe and elsewhere until granted civic toleration, and spread by massive emigration especially to North America but also to Australia, South Africa and Latin America. It also grew by missionary activity in Asia, Africa and Latin America. In the early 1900s Lutherans numbered about 80 million baptized persons. But at the start of the 21st century, the ravages of two world wars and the omission of the large number estimated within the membership of Germany's united churches has reduced the Lutheran total worldwide to an estimated 64 million.

Lutherans always considered themselves as part of the church* catholic and evangelical, bound to the scriptures, and confessing the faith* set forth in the three ecumenical creeds.* Although Lutherans vary among themselves in ways of worship – wherein the Lord's supper is central – and although they differ among themselves in forms of church organization – whether as national churches as in Scandinavia, or as Free churches as in most other parts of the world – Lutherans are doctrinally and legally identified by the same confession of faith which their political protectors had presented to the imperial diet at Augsburg in 1530. To whatever degree professed, the Augsburg confession (Confessio Augustana) and Luther's small catechism of 1529 ("the Bible of the laity") have been the chief symbols of mutual recognition among Lutherans for more than 470 years.

Yet this basic concord has been no guarantee against disunity, whether born of doctrinal debates or ethnic, linguistic, cultural or other factors. Twin developments during the 20th century, however, have fostered Lutheran unity in new ways. One has been the creation of a global confessional fellowship, first through the Lutheran World Convention (LWC, founded in 1923) and then, since 1947, through the Lutheran World Federation* (LWF) – based in Geneva and now involving 133 member churches with approximately 60 million members in 73 countries. The other development has been Lutheran participation in the ecumenical movement, both in the World Council of Churches and in a broad range of bilateral dialogues (see dialogue, bilateral), especially with the Roman Catholic Church since the Second Vatican Council.*

Lutheran teaching presupposes not only "that one holy church will remain forever" but also that "it is enough for the true unity of the church to agree concerning the teaching of the gospel and the administration of the sacraments" (Augustana 7) – baptism* and the eucharist.* Guideposts to such agreements have been four: faith alone (justification*), grace* alone (forgiveness), scripture alone (authority), and Christ alone (Saviour). Tradition and traditions* which are not contrary to scripture have their place in the historical church. The life of the Christian – as forgiven sinner – embodies precepts of the law and promises of the gospel. The interplay of church and society (or state) generally follows Luther's teaching on the two realms – the realm on God's right, the church; and the realm on God's left, the state – both of which are accountable to God (see church and state).

Despite Luther's objection, the organized church of his heirs was called Lutheran and not, as he had preferred, "evangelical". By terms of the peace of Augsburg of 1555 Lutherans were tolerated alongside Roman Catholics on a territorial basis: the religion of the ruler determined the religion of his subjects, cuius regio eius religio. Outside Germany, in Denmark (including Norway) and Sweden (including Finland) the change to Lutheranism did not alter the churches' majority status. However, in parts of Eastern Europe, as in Poland, initial gains shrank and a Lutheran minority survived by toleration. Germany's many territories presented a patchwork of Lutheran and Roman Catholic lands. The entry of Calvinism and the appeal of the Reformed faith to ruling families and territorial princes only complicated the confessional situation (see Reformed/Presbyterian churches). Although the principle was that the religion of the ruler determined the religion of his subjects, when the Hohenzollern turned Reformed in 1613 the vast majority of his subjects remained Lutheran. When in 1697 the king of Saxony became a Roman Catholic in order to qualify for the Polish crown, his people continued Lutheran. When Franconia became part of Catholic Bavaria in 1803, the Franconians nevertheless remained Lutheran.

While Scandinavia and Finland remained homogeneously Lutheran, Germany's religious map of Roman Catholic, Lutheran, and Reformed territorial churches became more complicated with the addition in 1817 of united churches. In that year the administrative – but not confessional – consolidation of a large Lutheran majority and a small Reformed minority led to the formation of the Evangelical Church of the Old Prussian Union. A common liturgy* and other hallmarks reflected a mainly Lutheran tradition. Other United churches, as in Hesse or the Palatinate, were unions of consensus* which minimized confessional derivation. In Germany as a whole Lutherans and United were about equal in number. Yet, to safeguard their identity, the confessionally intact churches (Hanover, Saxony, Bavaria, et al.) in 1868 formed the General Evangelical Lutheran Conference (GELC) which aimed to stem an advance of the Prussian Union.

In North America the GELC counterpart, the General Evangelical Lutheran Council (1868), gathered the confessionally moderate synods of German and Swedish origin. With the older general synod (1820), the Council made confessional Lutheranism increasingly viable in the English-speaking world. What began in 1868 as a loose international linkage of confessional kin intensified, particularly in the wake of the 20th century's world wars. Continental Europe, the Nordic countries and North America provided the leaders who formed the LWC and its far stronger successor, the LWF.

The North American Lutheran scene, meanwhile, had come to reflect not only European diversity but also one created by successive stages of Americanization. On the confessional right stood the Missouri synod (now the Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod) and its satellites. On the relative left stood the general synod which was deliberately open towards other Protestants – before the World's Evangelical Alliance* (1846) and through the early years of the Federal Council of Churches (1908). As to European connections, the Missouri Lutherans treated Evangelicals of the Prussian Union, the United, as their traditional enemy; but the general synod regarded that same body as a friend – thus being charged with unionism by the Missourians. General synod representatives became active in the Faith and Order* and Life and Work* movements soon after the Edinburgh world missionary conference in 1910. Other Lutherans followed.

The United Lutheran Church in America (ULCA) – a merger in 1918 of the general council, general synod, and the united synod, south – continued the Faith and Order connection. With an eye towards other Lutherans, the ULCA preferred the ecclesial concerns of Faith and Order over the more social concerns of the Life and Work movement as led by Lutheran Archbishop Nathan Söderblom of Uppsala. In Germany Lutheran and United churches, however, favoured the latter; they trusted Swedish more than Anglo-Saxon leadership in matters ecumenical. Paradoxically, the Nazi authorities, who resented Life and Work's decision of 1934 to side with the Confessing Church,* forbade German participation at both the 1937 meetings of Life and Work at Oxford and Faith and Order at Edinburgh. In that way, Swedish theologians became the leading Lutheran ecumenical voices – Gustaf Aulén, Anders Nygren, Yngve Brilioth. At Utrecht in 1938, ULCA president Frederick Knubel proposed to the WCC planning committee, “the Committee of Fourteen”, that the new WCC provide for proportional “confessional representation” of churches collectively in the WCC’s assembly and central committee, a proposal in part acted upon favourably at the first assembly in Amsterdam (1948).

In the wake of the second world war, such confessional representation achieved a dual purpose: it helped to foster Lutheran unity internationally, and it opened the way for most Lutheran churches to join the WCC and together to become ecumenically active. The new ULCA president, Franklin Clark Fry, vice-chair of the WCC central committee, under the bishop of Chichester, G.K.A. Bell (1948-54), subsequently served as its influential chair for two terms (1954-68). Simultaneously, Fry’s leading role in the LWF – its president after Anders Nygren, bishop of Lund, and Hanns Lilje, bishop of Hanover – epitomized the creative interlinking of confessional and ecumenical realities in the movement for Christian unity.*

In more recent years Lutherans have extended the movement for Christian unity by concrete actions resulting from intensive bilateral dialogues. Ecumenical agreements – in Europe, the Leuenberg agreement between Lutheran and Reformed; in North America, agreements for “full communion” between Lutherans and Episcopalians/Anglicans, Lutherans and Reformed, Lutherans and the Moravian church; and the joint declaration on the doctrine of justification between the churches of the LWF and the Roman Catholic Church – are solid indications of the Lutheran commitment to the quest for the visible unity of the church.

In Asia, Africa and Latin America, as earlier in Australia, Lutheran church bodies had been slowly forming since the 1920s. Some, as in Brazil, South Africa and Australia, were mainly gatherings of European immigrants, much as had occurred in the USA and Canada. Other church bodies were the result of mission efforts from Europe and North America and directed towards peoples of other religions. For Lutherans, the kind of ecclesial autonomy that first had developed in the British colonies of North America much later applied in India, Japan, China, South Africa and elsewhere.

After 1947, LWF policy was to consolidate diverse enterprises and to achieve one Lutheran church in a given country, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Tanzania remaining the best such example. To be sure, the confessional-ecumenical motif has found various expressions among third-world Lutherans, and instructively so: the pressures to be ecumenical are strong, the need to share from the riches of a confessional heritage is demanding, and the fact of usually being a Christian minority amid peoples of other religions has a message for Lutherans in Europe and America. The reality of the ecumenical quest is vividly shown in the growing communion between Lutherans and Anglicans throughout Africa.

Of the perhaps 5 million immigrants who had arrived in North America as Lutherans from the Old World, an estimated 25% remained in Lutheran churches. Many, upwardly mobile, were gathered into other communions, or were lost to the church altogether. The experience of being regarded as fair game for mission from the side of English-speaking Protestants put most Lutheran church bodies on the defensive. Instances of Lutherans and non-Lutherans in occasional pulpit and altar fellowship were denounced by many conservative Lutherans as “unionism” – mainly on theological grounds, but with also sociological implications.

Doctrinal agreement, on the basis of the historic confessions (Augustana, etc.), was the prerequisite to fellowship. For some, like the “Missourians”, it remains so. Throughout their history, Lutheran churches have given prominence to theology, have regarded agreement in doctrine as basic, have emphasized Christology, and have fostered Christian education – also in missionary outreach. The self-understanding of the LWF, formalized in 1990, as “a communion of churches” has given new depth both to Lutheran unity and global ecumenical strength.

The gradual indigenization of the Lutheran church in the English-speaking world is a major development in ecclesial history. This as well as other aspects of the Lutheran legacy have contributed historical depth to the timeliness of ecumenical dialogue in recent years. An early sign in this direction was the formation of the Lutheran Foundation for Ecumenical Research in Strasbourg in 1963; this institution, perhaps more than any other, has fostered the ecumenical goal of “reconciled diversity”. Increasingly, Lutherans are being drawn towards an “evangelical catholicity” which sees Lutheranism as a movement which is called to offer a concrete proposal concerning the gospel to the church catholic. In the ecumenical movement Lutherans, as others committed to Christian unity, act upon the faith “that one holy church will remain forever”.

E. THEODORE BACHMANN

■ E.T. Bachmann & M.B. Bachmann, Lutheran Churches in the World, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1989 ■ Between Vision and Reality: Lutheran Churches in Transition, Geneva, LWF, 2001 ■ G. Gassmann & S. Hendrix, Fortress Introduction to the Lutheran Confessions, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1996 ■ E.W. Gritsch, Introduction to Lutheranism, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1994 ■ E.W. Gritsch & R.W. Jenson, Lutheranism: The Theological Movement and Its Confessional Writings, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1976 ■ B. Lohse, Luthers Theologie in ihrer historischen Entwicklung und in ihrem systematischen Zusammenhang (ET Martin Luther's Theology: Its Historical and Systematic Development, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1999) ■ J.H. Schjørring, N.A. Hjelm & P. Kumari eds, From Federation to Communion: The History of the Lutheran World Federation, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1997.

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

M

MACKAY, JOHN ALEXANDER

B. 7 May 1889, Inverness, Scotland; d. 9 June 1983, Princeton, NJ, USA. Chairman of commission 5 on “The Universal Church and the World of Nations” of the Oxford conference, 1937, Mackay was a member of the provisional committee of the WCC, 1946-48. At the WCC’s founding assembly in Amsterdam (1948), he chaired commission 2 on “The Church’s Witness to God’s Design”, and was elected member of the WCC central committee for the period 1948-54. Chairman of the International Missionary Council, 1947-57, he headed the joint IMC/WCC committee, 1948-54, and was president of the World Presbyterian Alliance, 1954-59. He studied at Aberdeen, Princeton and Madrid, and was for a period a missionary of the Presbyterian Church

(USA) in Peru. As religious work secretary for the South American Federation of the YMCAs, he was based first in Montevideo, later in Mexico City, 1926-32. He was secretary for Latin America and Africa, Board of Foreign Missions, Presbyterian Church in the USA, 1932-36, and then president and professor of ecumenics at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1936-59. Mackay was founder and editor of Theology Today, an editor of The Westminster Study Edition of the Holy Bible, and contributing editor to Christianity and Crisis.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ J.A. Mackay, Ecumenics: The Science of the Church Universal, Englewood Cliffs NJ, Prentice ■ The Other Spanish Christ, London, SCM Press, 1932 ■ E.J. Jurji ed., The Ecumenical Era in Church and Society: A Symposium in Honor of John A. Mackay, New York, Macmillan, 1959.

MAGISTERIUM

“MAGISTERIUM” is the term used for the teaching authority* in Roman Catholicism. In the RC church, teaching authority is exercised by the bishops (see episcopacy) and by other appointed teachers. Personal and functional tensions may occur between the “hierarchical” magisterium and the “scholarly” magisterium. In extraordinary cases the episcopal or pastoral magisterium can be exercised by an ecumenical council,* or even by the pope alone.

See infallibility, primacy, teaching authority.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

■ A. Dulles, A Church to Believe In, New York, Crossroad, 1982, chs 7-8 ■ R.R. Gaillardetz, Teaching with Authority: A Theology of the Magisterium in the Church, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1997.

MAGNIFICAT

THE MAGNIFICAT, the song of Mary, the mother of Jesus Christ, was highly acclaimed by Luther. Today it serves as a fundamental text in the renovation of Catholic Marian theology (Paul VI, Marialis Cultus, n.37; John Paul II, Redemptoris Mater, nn.35-37) and as a privileged point of focus among Christians, above all in the third world, and especially in Latin America, where the influence of Mary has always been very strong. This “new woman”, servant of God resembling the suffering servant (Isa. 42-53; Phil. 2:7), expresses the spirituality of liberation.

The Magnificat forms a literary unit with the annunciation and visitation (Luke 1:26-56), and its texture is woven with reminiscences of psalms and prophets. The song of Mary, in the mystery of the incarnation* of the Word, is also the song of all the children of God. It is made up of (1) praise and acclamation, at the beginning and end (vv.46-50,54-55); and (2) prophetic announcement, in the central part (vv.51-53).

Current exegesis* views Mary as a disciple of Jesus, a prophetess through the power of the Spirit (Luke 1:35) whose message condemns relationships of domination and oppression and announces a new order of justice* and peace,* a new creation. Mary, daughter of Zion, symbolizing the poor* among the children of Israel, sets in motion a “revolution” which will bring about a change of heart (v.51).

Luke, ever insistent on the mercy of God, points out that it is God, Lord and Saviour, all-powerful and holy (vv.46-49), who manifests divine pity by exalting the poor, the weak and the humble and by emptying (and thus disposing them to accept grace*) the rich, the powerful and the arrogant, thus fulfilling the promise made to Abraham.

See also Mary in the ecumenical movement.

MARIA TERESA PORCILE SANTISO

MAR THOMA CHURCH

THE MAR THOMA Syrian Church of Malabar, with a membership of around 875,000, is an independent reformed Eastern church. (“Mar Thoma” means St Thomas. Much of what is today the Kerala state in India used to be known as Malabar. Christians there were for centuries under the rule of bishops from Syria, and the liturgical language was Syriac; hence the rather misleading epithet “Syrian”.) The two other major Syrian churches in India are the Malankara Jacobite Syrian Church, which is under the Syrian Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch, and the autocephalous Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church. A large section of the old St Thomas Church is today part of the Roman Catholic Church, and a much smaller number who joined the Anglican Church are now in the Church of South India (CSI). Up to the 16th century all of them belonged to a single church with one common tradition that traced its origins to the work of the apostle Thomas.

According to that tradition, Thomas landed at the port of Cranganur on the Malabar coast in A.D. 52, established churches in seven places in Kerala, and in 72 died a martyr's death near Madras. No unambiguous historical evidence either supports or refutes this tradition, which is an integral part of the self-understanding of the Syrian Christian community. The evidence clearly supports the presence of a thriving Christian community in this part of India from the 4th century onwards. Of how the church was organized and how it lived and witnessed within the Hindu milieu, little is known.

When the Portuguese arrived in India early in the 17th century, they were welcomed by the Christian community. Largely unaware of the divisions that had crept into the Christian church outside Kerala, the St Thomas Christians allowed themselves to be brought under Roman rule by the end of the century. But disaffection soon set in, both with the Portuguese and with the Roman Catholicism they represented. In 1653 a large number broke away from Rome, reaffirming their centuries-old heritage. The church, however, was now divided and would be further divided in the years to come.

The Mar Thoma Church (MTC) traces its immediate history to a reform movement within the old St Thomas Church. The impetus for reform came from the work of British missionaries representing Anglican evangelicalism. That work, begun in the early years of the 18th century, had led to the translation of the Bible into the local language, Malayalam. Chief among the architects of reform was Abraham Malpan, a parish priest who translated the liturgy into Malayalam, making changes in it to remove what were perceived as Roman accretions. The reformers were "inspired by the vision of an Eastern evangelical church seeking to comprehend the evangelical faith and experience within the framework of the corporate life and liturgical devotion" of the Eastern tradition. They affirmed the central place of the Bible and encouraged its "open use" in family worship and church services, and they stressed the importance of the sermon in Sunday worship. All this resulted in a search for new standards of conduct and a lived piety and, in course of time, in a recognition of the church's missionary vocation. The Mar Thoma Evangelistic Association was formed in 1889, and it has been active in evangelistic work in and outside Kerala. The week-long annual convention it holds at a place called Maramon attracts over 100,000 people, including preachers belonging to a wide variety of church traditions from many parts of the world.

The ecumenical character of the Maramon convention reflects the ecumenical openness of the MTC. The preamble to its constitution affirms that the church, "believed to be founded by St Thomas, one of the apostles of Christ, and called by that name, is part of the one apostolic and catholic church". For decades it has been in communion* with the Anglican church. It maintains special relations with the Episcopal Church. It is a member of the national council of churches in India and the Christian Conference of Asia. It has been a member of the WCC from the beginning: Metropolitan Juhanon Mar Thoma was a WCC president from 1954 to 1961; M.M. Thomas, a Mar Thoma layman, was moderator of the WCC central committee between 1968 and 1975.

Formed in 1978, the joint council of the Church of North India, the CSI and the MTC is "the visible organ of the common action by the three churches, which recognize themselves as belonging to the one church of Jesus Christ in India even while remaining as autonomous churches, each having its own identity of traditions and organizational structures". The joint council has two objectives: to "serve as the common organ of the three churches for working towards a visible manifestation of the unity of these churches and of the whole church of Jesus Christ in India", and to "help the churches to fulfill the mission of evangelization of the people of India and of witnessing

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

to the righteousness of God revealed in the gospel of Jesus Christ by striving for a just society”.

Often described as a bridge church, the MTC is ecumenically significant. In its liturgy and in the social life of its community, it retains much of the Eastern tradition, while its theology has clear affinities with the Western churches of the Reformation. The intrachurch ecumenical dialogue the church embodies displays certain tensions and conflicts, but that dialogue is part of the day-to-day life of its members and obtains within a passionate loyalty to the church. In the main the dialogue within the church is about two questions: Did the reform go too far? Did it go far enough? The questions represent distinct ecclesiological and theological stances, but the dialogue itself involves a range of positions between the “high” and “low” emphases. In so far as that ongoing dialogue demonstrates the creative possibilities of ecumenism – such as a new social consciousness, a search for democratic structures for the church, and a new interest in relating issues of faith to questions of life and work – and in so far as the life of the church demonstrates the risks and perils such dialogue entails, the Mar Thoma Church is of importance for the wider interchurch ecumenism.

T.K. THOMAS

■ Alexander Mar Thoma, The Mar Thoma Church: Heritage and Mission, 2nd ed., Manganam, Ashram, 1986 ■ C.P. Mathew & M.M. Thomas, The Indian Churches of St Thomas, Delhi, ISPCCK, 1967 ■ K.V. Mathew, The Faith and Practice of the Mar Thoma Church, Kottayam, Mar Thoma Theological Seminary, 1985 ■ A.T. Philip, The Mar Thoma Church and Kerala Society, Mannanthala, Juhanon Mar Thoma Study Centre, 1991.

MARRIAGE

LOVE BETWEEN man and woman is the only real marriage, which takes place when they discover each other, delight in each other and cleave to each other, as we read in Gen. 2:23-25 and as Jesus confirms in the gospel (Mark 10:6-9 and par.). Love is what makes marriage, and not the other way round. Love is not legitimized and made to last through formal religious marriage.

The churches eventually became increasingly concerned with preserving marriage, maintaining the civil status of married couples and, through marriage, keeping a hold over private life, emotions and the confession, to which the children would later belong. Ecumenism exists because of the relations between the various historic churches with their individual theologies and liturgies. Very often it is precisely when a marriage takes place that a genuine, loyal and respectful ecumenism turns out to be most difficult to put into practice – hence the significance of both the marvel of human love and the hindrances the various churches can create when it is made official.

While the Bible includes a great many prescriptions for worshipping God and running one's life, neither the Old Testament nor the New contains any rules for the marriage ceremony. In the remote age of the patriarchs, for example, marriage included polygamy. In a similar way the NT also accepts the manners of its day, when women were subordinate to men and men were responsible for women's honour and happiness. Christians had civil marriages in line with the customs of the civilization and city to which they belonged; there was no specifically Christian marriage during the first three centuries.

The great novelty, however, was that believers practised different customs in the Lord. The God of the people of Israel and of the church of Jesus Christ is in fact a God who joins with humanity in a fervent, patient, strong and elective divine covenant* of love. And it is indeed in human love in marriage that the prophets and apostles of God found the most striking and enduring parable to illustrate the bond God has with us, which is neither a yoke nor a link that lacks warmth but a live exchange. Now at last human marriage for its part stops being an arrangement or a custom and becomes a sharing of everything between two beings who, however, remain quite distinct individuals. They are covenanted in love, one for the other.

MARRIAGE AS A CHURCH SACRAMENT

By “sacrament”* here we must understand the loving covenant of God with human beings and the church ceremony which alone validates and binds and is therefore as indissoluble as, for example, God's link with us in Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Jesus Christ. Through the sacrament marriage establishes an unchangeable state which is strong enough to combat our estrangements, instabilities and infidelities. But marriage as a sacrament also runs the risk of looking like a prison with the church holding the key.

Much interest was devoted to the initial conditions for a valid marriage (the free consent of the partners, the fulfilment of the due conjugal obligations of sex) – more than in the development of the partners' lives, whereas the whole Bible is simply the story of the high points in the covenant between God and his people. The sacrament becomes the central act, with its conditions and the possibilities for its annulment by a court of the church.

For Roman Catholicism, marriage, clearly defined by the council of Trent,* is one of seven sacraments provided by the church for the salvation of souls, which was evolved in the 13th century in the period of the great cathedrals and scholastic theology. It sanctifies and provides a framework for the subsequent periods of one's life. Marriage is undoubtedly a sacrament in a category of its own. Its biblical roots lie in the Latin translation of the Greek words behind Eph. 5:32 (a profound "mystery"). But does this phrase apply to marriage or to the incarnation of Jesus Christ, who leaves his Father in heaven to cleave to his bride on earth, the church?

It is the married partners who give each other the sacrament. But since Trent the sacrament has to be presided over by a priest, and most frequently the nuptial mass is referred to and the eucharist is celebrated.

"Sacrament" is a strong word. Like baptism, it is not something renewable. But is this word really appropriate theologically, since it is not related here directly to the cross and resurrection of Jesus Christ as in baptism and the eucharist? When situations of spiritual and psychological difficulty and distress subsequently arise, should people remain sacramentally married, even if they have separated and have no common life? And why should divorce* – the failure of marriage – remain the only unforgivable sin?

Anglicans have kept the word "sacrament" for marriage but do not have the seven medieval sacraments. The Protestant churches speak of a "ceremony of blessing" when two partners declare before the whole congregation that they have decided to be joined together in the presence of God and when they make their gratitude public and pray the God of the covenant to go with them and bless them in their future commitments. The word "ceremony" seems more correct theologically than "sacrament" – more firmly rooted in the biblical vocabulary and in the practice of the ancient church. It also makes it possible to invoke again God's blessing on those who, having failed, contract a new union. Nevertheless, a strong word is needed here too, involving complete commitment, as God entered into a commitment with his people and Jesus Christ did with his church.

HESITATION ABOUT MARRIAGE: THE DECISION TO LOVE

All the churches are faced today with a crisis in marriage. Frequently people are hesitant about marrying, for there are so many divorces. Life in partnership has become considerably longer. Can there be a certainty of getting along well together for so long with truly felt happiness, and not simply because of a vow to be faithful? Also, civil society has come to terms with the fact of unmarried couples and their children, who are by no means looked down on. So whether marriage is called a sacrament or a blessing, what does the part played by the churches add or guarantee here?

The ecumenical movement, with its diminishing differences and developing convergences, is in contrast with the past history of our churches. It is the most united possible proclamation of the active goodness of God today. Likewise, marriage means deciding to live for each other as God decided to live for us in Abraham, David and Jesus Christ, and we in turn decide to live for him. An irrevocable love which is always hesitant inevitably becomes weak and gradually disappears. Marriage is the opportunity to decide in love and also to say so in front of witnesses, to make them happy and strengthen us.

For this reason the churches certainly do not compel people to marry but rejoice with those who have decided to marry. The happiness of human love on earth makes God happy in heaven. That is what the churches have to say on marriage – and it is a word rather more spiritual than moral, psychological or sociological in these days when many are hesitant about making up their minds.

ANDRÉ DUMAS

In most parts of the world today, marriage is a voluntary joining of two lives intended to last for the life-time of the couple. The understanding of marriage has changed dramatically over the centuries from patterns of relationship based on control and subordination to those characterized by mutuality and equality. The transition towards a more personal approach to marriage has not been easy throughout the centuries, but over the last decades the pace of change has tended to increase dramatically.

In every culture there are laws which clearly mark the beginning (and the end) of marriage, rituals that involve the community (to assure the adequate social transition), and customs (norms and rules) for support and encouragement. Thus, the voluntary relationship established between husband and wife is unique to them and to those around them, and it is clearly differentiated from the relationship to other relatives, the community and the society at large. In most societies marriages are one of the most important public events in common life.

Marriage has been defined in various ways: as a mystery, a sacrament, a contract, a vocation, a communion, an institution, etc. Each definition corresponds to a specific historical moment and cultural context.

In the West until recently, couples, families and households were part of a whole; to deal with one of them was to deal with them all. In many parts of the world this is still the custom. W.J. Everett affirms: “When a prelate blessed a marriage he also was blessing a family (matrimonium) and a household (patrimonium). He was also legitimizing the formation of an enterprise central to the economic, social and governmental welfare of the people as a whole... It is little wonder that today we have such trouble sorting out what the church’s concern really was when it got involved with marriage.”

The shift from agricultural to industrial economies has had a profound effect on marriage, the family and households all over the world. Economic, cultural and scientific changes deeply affect the understanding of marriage, its nature and goals. Women and men today tend to feel less hesitant about remaining single, and those who choose to marry expect happiness, self-fulfilment, “instant therapy” from the marriage relationship. Procreation is considered an option rather than the inevitable outcome of the marriage union. Married couples share a greater commitment to interpersonal intimacy and are increasingly aware of the equal rights of both sexes. Longevity and birth control* have provided couples with the possibility of looking forward to the time when the marriage will develop into a long-term friendship, independent of procreation and raising children.

Commissions have been appointed in almost every mainline Protestant church to reflect on marriage and to reformulate a Christian approach to it. The Orthodox church is looking afresh into its liturgies of marriage to find theological and pastoral elements to meet new demands. Vatican II developed a new paradigm to describe Roman Catholic marriages, described by David Thomas as a shift “from viewing marriage primarily as a biological and juridical union to one which is more interpersonal, spiritual and existential”.

MARRIAGE IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

The Bible nowhere records the requirement of a religious ceremony, and in the early church marriage was not a religious matter. Most weddings during the first four centuries were presided over by the father, who joined the hands of the couple. Occasionally bishops were invited to officiate. Late in the 4th century Christian wedding ceremonies acquired sacred character by having a priest or bishop bless the couple or, more commonly, the bride (for fertility). In the 9th century Charlemagne in the Western church (802) and Emperor Leo the Wise in the Eastern church (895) tried to impose the rule that a priest must officiate at weddings and the church accord its blessings.

In southern Europe the Roman tradition had long held that the consent (consensus) of either the couple or their parents was required, since arranged marriages were universally practised among all social strata. The Germanic and Frankish traditions of northern Europe, however, insisted that the key element was consummation (copula) after the marriage consent. Since then, these two positions have been part of the church's discussion of marriage, divorce and annulment.

In the 9th century marriages began to be held in the church. This practice was gradually given liturgical form, and by the 12th century, marriage was validly and legitimately contracted in a marriage liturgy, into which the "civil" ceremonies had been assimilated. At the same time, theologians began to discuss the sacramental nature of marriage, though it was not until the council of Trent (1545-63) that official status was given to marriage as a sacrament.

Facing the proliferation of clandestine marriages, the church used the theology of the sacramentum, a sacral sign, to defend the Christian marriage, though no saving power was explicitly accorded to marriage. Edward Schillebeeckx asserts: "The idea that sacraments in the strict sense were those of importance for Christian life contributed directly to the inclusion of marriage among the seven, despite the fact that marriage was not regarded at this time as having a power of grace, but only as being a sign of more sublime mystery."

With the Protestant Reformation, sacraments* were questioned. The Reformed churches agreed that marriage as a sacrament and obligatory celibacy were not in accordance with scripture or with the original Christian tradition. Marriage was seen by the reformers as a purely ethical matter to be controlled by the government, rather than a symbolic matter under church jurisdiction. Other concepts were used to characterize marriage, such as "vocation", "covenant" and "communion". In modern Protestantism the covenant* model is very widespread as a protest against the individualistic connotations of contract or the overly naturalistic approaches in hierarchical sacrament models. However, says Georges Crespy, "there is no, in the strict sense of the term, Reformed doctrine of marriage which has been expressed and proposed to Protestant people as a demand or requisite of faith". This does not mean that there is no Protestant theological reflection on the subject or that marriage has necessarily been secularized. In the Protestant countries marriage still remains within the province of the Christian communities.

Besides re-affirming the sacramental nature of marriage and the church's right to regulate, annul or dissolve it, the council of Trent resolved that the only valid contract of marriage for baptized Christians was one made in the presence of a priest and two witnesses (though not necessarily liturgically or in church). Marriage, which had always been a secular reality experienced "in the Lord", now seemed to have become an exclusively ecclesiastical affair. Today, despite the above-mentioned new emphasis of Vatican II, the Roman Catholic doctrine and practice of marriage seems frozen in the 16th century.

POINTS OF CONVERGENCE AND DIVERGENCE

A controversial issue in the Christian understanding of marriage is its ends or purposes. The Roman Catholic point of view has focused primarily on procreation and rearing children and secondarily, as The Catholic Encyclopedia (1976) says, "the mutual aid, both material and spiritual, and the overcoming of sexual concupiscence in a legitimate manner".

Most Protestant churches tend to start the list of the purposes of marriage with companionship, without denying the natural effect of sexual intercourse: procreation. Relationship is explained as required for the sake of offspring. The fecundity resulting from the marriage union is a byproduct of the union between man and woman, which is valuable for its own sake. "To give relationship priority in importance is not 20th century perversity," says Helen Oppenheimer. "It picks out a strand in our tradition that has always been there (cf. 1 Sam.1:8), though no doubt reliable contraception makes the strand easier to find."

Another point of controversy is related to divorce.* The Roman Catholic Church does not accept divorce, while Protestant and Orthodox churches generally do. Rome, however, holds the "right of the key" to annul a marriage, but it excommunicates those who divorce (see excommunication). The Orthodox church does not exclude the divorced from communion and in certain cases determines that marriage does not exist, going so far as to bless subsequent marriages when they are entered into with a spirit of repentance. Olivier Clément comments: "The indissolubility of the bond does not promote love. The question of divorce arises when nothing is left to save; the bond declared indissoluble at the beginning is already broken, and the law has nothing that can replace grace. The law can neither heal nor restore to life, nor can it say 'Arise, and walk.'"

Most Christians, however, agree on certain characteristics of marriage that claim to be Christian: it is monogamous, holy, based on fidelity and companionship, and intended to last until death. All hold high views of its importance as a divine space, established by God at creation* as a foundation of human society and a blessing for humankind.

Among Eastern churches, the Pauline idea of the church as the bride of Christ exerted an earlier and greater influence. Their liturgies of marriage were inspired in the communion of Christ with the church. More emphasis also has been placed on the mystical meaning of marriage and its spirituality. Furthermore, theologians of the Eastern churches had a less pessimistic view of sex and sexuality than the Western church, church fathers and scholars. Marriage, then, is regarded by the church as a miniature where unity (uniqueness, monogamous character, fidelity), sanctity, catholicity and apostolicity (moving towards others) are present.

CONCLUSION

Theological reflection on marriage, forged throughout centuries to transform a civil contract into a liturgical event, has helped canonists and church jurists to define their field in juridical abstractions, but it has been of scarcely any help in pastoral matters or in the treatment of marriage as an anthropological fact.

A great deal of effort has been invested in defining marriage in its initial stage, the wedding ceremony: how to enter in it, who presides and legitimates, which liturgy is the most appropriate, etc. Proportionately less attention has been accorded the study of marriage as a life-spanning process, comprising stages of growth, dilemmas and pains, crises and challenges. Oppenheimer declares: "In the very ordinairiness of the immense claims they make upon each other – the give-and-take of everyday life – married people have a humanly valid mystery which is able to be a model of the grace of God." Never before in the history of humankind has married life been led back in such a remarkable way to its original, authentic shape and form as it has today. It is time to look afresh at marriage from this perspective after crossing the threshold of a new millennium. In doing so, new and creative pastoral understandings and tools may become available to the church, couples and families of today.

See also ethics, sexual; family; marriage, interfaith; marriage, mixed.

JORGE E. MALDONADO

- P. Evdokimov, Le sacrement de l'amour (ET The Sacrament of Love: The Nuptial Mystery in the Light of the Orthodox Tradition, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1985) ■ W.J. Everett, Blessed Be the Bond: Christian Perspectives on Marriage and the Family, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1985 ■ A. Hastings, Christian Marriage in Africa, London, SPCK, 1973 ■ D. Mace & V. Mace, The Sacred Fire: Christian Marriage through the Ages, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1986 ■ H. Oppenheimer, in New Dictionary of Christian Ethics, London, SCM Press, 1986 ■ E. Schillebeeckx, Marriage: Human Reality and Saving Mystery, London, Sheed & Ward, 1978.

MARRIAGE, INTERFAITH

WE CONFRONT the issue of interfaith or mixed-faith marriage in both the Old and the New Testaments. Joseph, Moses, David and Solomon, for example, married non-Israelite women, and the Bible celebrates the marriage of Ruth the Moabite to Boaz. On the whole, however, mixed-faith marriages are not favoured in the OT, for fear that faith in the God of Israel would be compromised by the foreign practices introduced by the partner of another faith (Ezra 9-10; Neh. 13:23-29; Mal. 2:11). The clear prohibition and the reason for it are given in Deut. 7:3-4: "Do not intermarry with them, giving your daughters to their sons or taking their daughters for your sons, for that would turn away your children from following me, to serve other gods.”

In the NT Paul was confronted with the issue in Corinth. Writing on the question of re-marriage where one of the partners had died, Paul allows re-marriage, but “only in the Lord” (1 Cor. 7:39), which is traditionally understood to mean that Paul advocated marriage only among Christians. In the case of a convert whose partner remained in another faith, Paul advised against divorce, unless the partner desired it (vv.12-16).

In the early history of the church there were no uniform practices, although marriage between persons of the same faith was favoured. The first piece of legislation about interfaith marriages came from the synod of Elvira in Spain at the beginning of the 4th century. It rejected marriage to a person of another faith as “spiritual adultery”. In A.D. 314 the synod of Arles repeated the prohibition, adding for the first time the penalty of deprivation of communion for a period.

The ecumenical council of Chalcedon* in 451 first issued the injunction that Christians will be permitted to marry a person of another faith, provided the person converted to Christianity and the children are baptized. These stipulations were eventually integrated into the 1918 code of canon law of the Roman Catholic Church, which delineated the basic policy of marriage to a person of another faith. Where dispensation is given, it is done on the condition that the Catholic partner would continue his or her Catholic practice and would have the children baptized and brought up as Catholics. The marriage had to be celebrated by a Catholic priest according to Catholic rites. Any other religious celebration was forbidden.

Such strict regulations produced insurmountable difficulties for interfaith marriages, particularly where the church was in a minority. Often the non-Catholic party in marriage, although willing to be married in church and to allow the Catholic partner to maintain his or her faith, refused to give the written assurance with regard to the upbringing of the children. In other cases, after the marriage was entered into, the promise was not kept, or considerable strain in the marriage occurred because of this requirement. Other religious traditions also questioned the unequal treatment of the religious tradition involved and challenged the right of the Catholic side to set the terms.

The Second Vatican Council* took up the question and made a thorough evaluation of the situation in different parts of the world. As a result, a number of changes were made in the new legislation on interfaith marriages. In the first instance, the intention, as far as possible, to baptize and bring up children in the Catholic faith was required only of the Catholic partner. Even though the marriage would take the Catholic form, local bishops were given the authority to allow another suitable form where appropriate and necessary. The penalty of excommunication would no longer be imposed.

The Orthodox tradition, which also holds marriage as a sacrament, insists that it can be undertaken only by two baptized persons.

Protestant churches have also generally rejected interfaith marriages as contrary to the churches’ theology and practice. Often the churches would have nothing to do with interfaith marriages, thus forcing the partners to have a civil ceremony or a ceremony according to the other faith tradition involved. It has also been the practice among some Protestant churches to take disciplinary action against persons who enter such marriages. Often the Protestant churches have demanded that the other party be baptized before a church wedding would be permitted.

In more recent years church discipline* has been tempered with pastoral considerations. Some churches provide for a service of blessing in the home if the other partner intends to continue in his or her religion but is willing to go through with a Christian ceremony. In a number of Western countries a church wedding is conducted where one partner is a Christian and the other has no objection to the Christian religious rite after a period of instruction on the meaning of marriage.

The question of interfaith marriages has also been an issue in other faith traditions. Within the Jewish community, especially in countries such as the USA and Britain, anxiety over interfaith marriages has to do primarily with the depletion of the community. In Britain, 30% of Jews are believed to marry outside their faith tradition. Even though Jewish identity is considered to be transmitted through the Jewish mother, most Jews feel that interfaith marriages in minority situations lead to the loss of the member to the community. The same fear is shared also by the church leadership in Asian countries, where interfaith marriages of Christians with persons of other faiths would eventually lead to the absorption of the church into the larger community.

Traditionally, Islam has permitted the marriage of a Muslim male to a woman of Jewish or Christian faith. There is no obligation for the woman partner from the other faith to embrace Islam, but in actual practice social pressures result in most such women becoming Muslim. It is forbidden for Muslim women to marry outside the faith. In some Islamic countries such marriages are invalid in law, and where a Muslim partner converted to another faith, the marriage could be automatically dissolved.

Hindus and Buddhists have been more open to interfaith marriages, but there is considerable resistance to the Christian and Muslim insistence on conversion,* the use of the Christian or Muslim religious rites for the ceremony, and the insistence on bringing up children in the Christian or Islamic faith. Buddhists and Hindus have criticized this requirement as a mark of disrespect for other faiths and as an instance of Christian and Muslim intolerance.

With interfaith marriages becoming more and more common, churches in a number of countries have begun to study the issues involved. One of the most significant studies was done in Sri Lanka, where an ecumenical consultation was held on Christian-Buddhist marriages. The official teachings and proposals were considered in the presence of interfaith-marriage couples, who shared their own experiences. The discussions were published in the periodical Dialogue, issued from Colombo. Guidelines have also been suggested in Britain, France, the USA, Canada and elsewhere, but so far the theological questions remain largely unresolved.

In 1997 the Office on Inter-religious Relations of the WCC and the Pontifical Council for Inter-religious Dialogue produced Re- flections on Inter-religious Marriage: A Joint Study Document. The study was based on an extensive survey among those who had worked on this question, the teachings of the churches and the experience of interfaith-marriage couples. The guidelines developed, which would have been shared with the parishes of the Roman Catholic Church and the constituency of the WCC, identify some of the major issues that need to be addressed in all pastoral concerns.

The first cluster of issues deals with the understanding of marriage itself in the different religious traditions. A related matter is the use of religious rites in weddings and the question of whether marriage should be regarded as a sacrament, which would make it impossible for persons outside of the faith perspective to participate. Significantly, although religious rites are employed, both Judaism and Buddhism tend to treat marriage as a secular institution.

The second area involves sociological issues, especially the question of polygamy. Interfaith marriages where one partner comes from a society or religion that insists on monogamy and the other from societies or religions that accept polygamy have presented problems. The whole issue of monogamy, polygamy, divorce and re-marriage calls for in-depth multifaith, multicultural discussion. Laws of inheritance and the legal rights of partners in marriage and in divorce, which vary a great deal between communities, is yet another area for study.

The religious education and upbringing of children has always been a difficult issue in interfaith marriages. In some cases, some of the children are brought up in the faith of the mother, while the others follow that of the father. Where one of the partners is indifferent and the other committed, children grow up in the faith of the believing partner. In some situations children are exposed to both traditions in the hope that they will be able to choose a faith when they are adults. In many cases the children grow up without any specific religious commitment. Very often the biggest strain in interfaith marriages relates to the bringing up of the children, often not fully anticipated at the time of marriage. Faith differences are often compounded by cultural differences.

Yet another area of concern is the often-heard accusation that some traditions use marriage as a method of conversion. Since Islam officially allows Muslim men to marry women of other faiths on the understanding that the wives would embrace Islam, and since it also tolerates polygamy, both in Africa and in Asia the criticism has arisen, not always with justification, that Islam uses marriage as an instrument of conversion. The Christian insistence that the partner should convert and that children should be brought up in the Christian faith has also come under similar criticism.

Increasingly, however, the churches have begun to concentrate on the pastoral dimensions of interfaith marriages. With greater population movements and increasing urbanization, young people from different religious traditions will be brought together more and more, doubtless leading to more interfaith marriages. There is greater need than ever to explore more fully the pastoral dimensions of the issue. Since this concern touches all religious traditions, there is an urgent need for dialogue on the issues involved and on the impact of each religion's attitudes and practices on interfaith couples. Such dialogue and the removal of mutual suspicion are beginning to help partners in interfaith marriages to deal with the guilt complex that often underlies crises that arise in these marriages.

See also marriage, mixed.

S. WESLEY ARIARAJAH

- Dialogue, 5, 2 & 3, Dec. 1978; 6, 3, Dec. 1979
- C. Lamb, Mixed-Faith Marriage: A Case for Care, London, BCC, 1982
- Marriage and the Family in Today's World, Vatican, Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, 1995
- Pro Dialogo, 96, 1997 (Vatican).

MARRIAGE, MIXED

THE TERM "mixed marriage" refers to marriages between Christians who belong to different denominations, confessions or churches. In English this term is widely employed, while "ecumenical marriage" or, better still, "interchurch marriage" is used where both partners are committed Christians who are fully aware of their differences and who wish to maintain links with their churches. In German, konfessionsver- bindende Ehe (marriage uniting [two] confessions) is current, as well as similar formulas which are in themselves already an interpretation. In French, mariage œcuménique is little used, still less mariage interconfessionnel. The term commonly used for any such marriage,* regardless of the level of ecclesial and ecumenical awareness of the partners, is mariage mixte – mixed marriage.

The 1983 code of canon law* of the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) retains "mixed marriage" for "two baptized persons, one of whom was baptized in the Catholic church or received into it after baptism and has not defected from it by a formal act, the other of whom belongs to a church or ecclesial community not in full communion with the Catholic church" (canon 1124).

Besides "mixed marriage", English uses "interfaith marriage"* for marriages between Christians and people of other faiths. The RC code calls them technically "disparity of cult" marriages.

HISTORY

The position of confessionally mixed households has gradually changed since the middle of the 20th century. Until then, those who contracted a mixed marriage usually brought on themselves the disapproval of their families and almost always of their churches. As a result, one or both the partners would typically break off links with the church.

The progress made in ecumenism has altered the situation – to a greater or lesser degree, depending on the countries. The discipline of the Reformation churches became more flexible, followed after Vatican II* by that of the RCC (governed by canons 1124-29) and the pastoral aspects in the 1993 Directory.* Pending the holding of a pan-Orthodox council, the Orthodox churches have not modified their rules, but practice has become more flexible because of what the Orthodox call the principle of economy.*

A mixed marriage is no longer considered shameful. It has become quite common – even very common in some regions, such as Switzerland, where the confessional groups are numerically equal, or in southeastern USA, where RCs are a small minority, over 85% of whom are married to other Christians. A mixed marriage exists only where the couple and the churches are determined to respect the confessional allegiance of both partners – precluding any kind of disingenuous proselytism* and any attempts to convert one partner to the other confession.

PROGRESS

Genuine cooperation between the two communities and the two ministers in the pastoral preparation of the couple for a mixed marriage is recommended in church documents (at worldwide, regional and local levels) and is fairly widely practised. The details concerning the celebration of the ceremony are set out in these documents, in particular the respective roles of the two ministers. Local difficulties are ironed out with the help of specialists – the people responsible for ecumenical relations or ecumenical centres. The RCC recognizes mixed marriages celebrated in the Orthodox church and, provided dispensation from the canonical form has been obtained, those celebrated in a Protestant church. In most cases the Orthodox recognize the validity of marriages celebrated outside their church. Nevertheless, the Orthodox church's insistence that the marriage should be celebrated according to its discipline and liturgy tends to draw the couple and their children towards that church. Couples who are Roman Catholic and Protestant or Anglican are freer to decide which direction they follow.

There are groups which provide spiritual support and sometimes a “church home” for couples who are isolated or who feel ill at ease in their parishes. These groups, generally comprising six to ten couples, are run by the couples themselves with the help of ministers of both churches. They organize monthly meetings, weekends and conferences. In the French-speaking countries these groups are linked by the review Foyers mixtes (Mixed households, published in France since 1968); in Britain, the US and elsewhere they have formed associations of interchurch families (see Association of Interchurch Families).

Publications in various languages exist for engaged couples, married couples and ministers. These range from one-page pamphlets to whole volumes. There are also various periodicals, of which Foyers mixtes and Interchurch Families are typical.

DIFFICULTIES

According to the 1983 code of canon law, the RC partner must “do all in his or her power in order that all the children be baptized and brought up in the Catholic church” (1125.1). Such a pledge is often a difficulty, regardless of whether the promise is made orally or in writing. It requires less than the previous formulation of 1917, which obliged a RC parent to “promise to have the children baptized”, although this important change is very often neglected. Some episcopates have tried to explain that the fulfilment of this promise means taking account of the actual situation, respect for the partner's conscience, no one-sided demands, concern for the harmony of the couple. There is a widely expressed desire that this promise should be suppressed and perhaps replaced by the RC minister's certifying that he has reminded the RC partner of his or her obligations (a suggestion made by the 1975 report of the Anglican-Roman Catholic Commission on the Theology of Marriage, no. 71).

Many Protestants want a marriage celebrated in a Protestant church to be automatically recognized by the RCC. The latter maintains the requirement of the canonical form for purposes of pastoral control, given its doubts about the doctrine of marriage in some Protestant churches.

Many mixed couples wish the baptism* of their children to demonstrate their ecumenical commitment, with the two churches taking an active part. Ecumenical celebrations of baptism, in line with ecumenical celebrations of marriage, have been taking place since the 1970s. In France in 1975, a Catholic-Lutheran-Reformed committee drew up a framework for the preparation and celebration of such baptisms (with the possibility for the child to be registered on the baptismal roll of both churches, as in the case of a mixed marriage). This advance is based on the mutual recognition of baptism, and its ecumenical dimension does not mean some mythical “third church” or a kind of ecclesial no-man's-land, although it does leave open the question of the ultimate church affiliation of the baptized. The proposal has only the authority of this committee. In practice the proposal is more often simply ignored than questioned. Outside of France and parts of Switzerland, there has been no move in this direction, and more often than not the question does not arise.

Ecumenical celebrations of baptism have led to some experiments with common catechesis.* This form of religious instruction may also be imposed by the state, as in certain African countries. Any catechesis, even that of a single confession, should be ecumenical in spirit and include a fair presentation of the other churches, a description of the ecumenical movement, an awakening of the desire for unity.* A further step is taken when common instructional material is used or the catechumens work together or the children affiliated with different churches receive common instruction.

Experiments – whether in parishes or outside, in schools or ad hoc groups, but always in relation with church authorities – have so far been confined to a small number of Catholic and Protestant (but not Orthodox) children and young adolescents, not all of them children of a mixed marriage. Generally this teaching involves an introduction to the Bible (for children under 12). In rare cases, older adolescents have received some more doctrinal instruction with, e.g., an explanation of the Apostles' Creed,* and have even progressed to common celebration of confirmations* or professions of faith (renewal of the promises of baptism).

At the RC bishops synod of 1977, Cardinal Willebrands said that common catechesis was “possible, sometimes inevitable, and limited”. In his 1979 Catechesi Tradendae, John Paul II echoed Cardinal Willebrands's thinking and stressed the need for a RC catechesis in addition to the common one (n.33).

Interconfessional catechetical groups are rare. More common is for the children of mixed households to receive dual instruction, either in parallel or, more often, consecutively. The frequently expressed fear that this experience could be unsettling for the children or cause confusion has proved in practice to be generally unfounded.

Ecumenical celebrations of baptism and common catechesis are an indication that the children of mixed couples experience a situation very similar to that of their parents: what is often incorrectly called dual membership (of two churches) and which would be better described as dual participation in the life of two churches. The second term does nothing to solve the doctrinal and canonical problems that persist, especially the difficulty concerning the two partners' participation in the eucharist.*

Common participation in the eucharist remains the most serious difficulty for mixed couples and their children. It is not possible when one of the partners is Orthodox. RC doctrine leads to a restrictive discipline, even though, in certain places, the extending of “eucharistic hospitality” in some cases is tolerated rather than fully accepted (see intercommunion). In France a memorandum from the episcopal commission on unity (1983) defines and governs these exceptions. The Swiss bishops conference published a considerably more restrictive memorandum (1986). Although practice is sometimes more generous than the legislation, many mixed couples find this situation frustrating and hard to bear. For them it is at the very least a painful trial of conscience.*

PROSPECTS

Despite these difficulties, some mixed couples do continue to follow their own path within the churches. Having acquired a spiritual place thanks to the relaxing of disciplines and the pastoral effort made on their behalf, they are aware of the ecumenical requirement at the very heart of their situation. In their eyes God has turned their necessity into a vocation: being themselves under the spiritual obligation to practise Christian reconciliation* in their lives as a couple and with their children, they want to share their convictions and discoveries with the other members of the communities in which they want to be actively involved.

The majority of mixed couples, at least in the northern hemisphere, are indifferent to religion, but no more so than couples of the same confession. However, the minority of mixed couples who are believers often demonstrate a particularly lively faith and a very active Christian practice as a result of the reflection required in preparation for marriage and the “spiritual emulation” in the couple's life together and with their children. They do not simply practise their faith in a routine manner but seek to anchor it in the essential, which ecumenical dialogue enables them to distinguish from the merely peripheral. Far from falling back on a lowest common Christian denominator, the most thoughtful couples dig down to the very roots and, in so doing, spontaneously practise Vatican II's "hierarchy of truths".*

Etymology says it all: far from being fratres sejuncti (disjoined, or "separated brethren"), they are conjuncti (conjoined, conjugal partners). In them and through them, what is elsewhere disjoined is once again joined together. They conjoin the values of two Christian traditions and are able to assimilate the best of each. For this reason they have a vocation to bring the Christian communities closer together, to be the bridge over-arching the divisions, the connective tissue drawing together the wound.

Unfortunately this vocation is not sufficiently recognized. Local parishes often do not know how to treat these couples. Churches rarely dare to entrust them with responsibilities in line with their enthusiasm and competence. Sometimes they may be members of interconfessional committees, or in rare cases they may participate as a couple in parish or diocesan councils. Nevertheless, in many places, mixed couples or, more often, groups of mixed couples are the driving force of ecumenism. They organize the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity,* help bring together two communities and launch and support interconfessional social and charitable work, ecumenical publications, etc.

RENÉ BEAUPÈRE

■ R. Beaupère, "Double Belonging: Some Reflections", OC, 18, 1982 ■ R. Beaupère, "L'œcuménisme dans le mariage: Une espérance pour l'Eglise", Etudes, 361, 1984 ■ A. Heron, Two Churches - One Love, Dublin, APCK, 1997 ■ "Interchurch Couples in France and Switzerland", Ecumenism, 109, 1993 ■ G. Kilcourse, Double Belonging: Interchurch Families and Christian Unity, New York, Paulist, 1992 ■ M. Lawler, Ecumenical Marriage and Remarriage: Gifts and Challenges to the Churches, Mystic CT, Twenty-third, 1990 ■ M.H.A. Rosenbaum & S.N. Rosenbaum eds, Celebrating Our Differences: Living Two Faiths in One Marriage, Boston KY, Ragged Edge, 1999 ■ A.C. Vrame, Intermarriage: Orthodox Perspectives, Brookline MA, Holy Cross, 1997.

MARTYRDOM

ANY DISCUSSION of the ecumenical significance of martyrdom must begin with Jesus Christ.* The root meaning of "martyr" in the New Testament is "witness" or "one who gives testimony" (Matt. 18:16; 2 Cor. 13:1). Consecrated by God* and empowered by the Holy Spirit,* Jesus is the ultimate witness to the Father; at his trial before Pilate (see 1 Tim. 6:13), he confesses that he has come into the world to bear testimony to the truth of his Father's kingdom (John 18:37). Jesus' witness to God is liberating for all creation. He heals the sick, forgives sinners and raises the dead. In his ministry, Jesus testifies to the power of his Father to unite the world in love, the same love that he and his Father share in unity with the Holy Spirit (John 17:11).

It was inevitable that Jesus' mission would bring him into conflict with the powers of sin* and evil that enslave and divide humanity. Jesus' witness to the Father took him to the cross, the supreme sacrifice of a life completely dedicated to God and to humanity. Yet, the outcome of Jesus' death was new life for the world (Rom. 5:12-21). For Jesus Christ, "the faithful witness", is also "the first-born of the dead" (Rev. 1:5). In his death and resurrection* Christ has triumphed over the powers that separate humanity from God and divide God's people (Eph. 2:11-22). His martyrdom is thus ecumenical in the profoundest sense: he dies for the whole of humanity so that all humanity may be united with God (Eph. 1:9-10; Col. 1:19-20). He suffers death from the divisive forces of the world so that God's creation may be one.

Having ascended to the glory of his Father, Christ draws all people to himself (see John 12:32). He sends the Holy Spirit to his disciples, who are to be his witnesses to the ends of the earth (Acts 1:8). Christ is present through the Holy Spirit in the church* to transform its members into witnesses like him of his Father's reconciling love. In baptism,* believers are united with Christ in his death and resurrection; they share sacramentally in his martyrdom (Rom. 6:3-8). In the eucharist,* the church proclaims the Lord's martyrdom until his final advent in victory (1 Cor. 11:26) and feeds on his spiritual presence here and now. Christ himself is the pattern (Mark 8:34-35) and the power (John 15:5) of all Christian witness.

Christ warned his disciples that their witness to him would evoke fierce and violent opposition, yet he also promised them that the Holy Spirit would inspire their testimony before hostile authorities (Mark 13:9-13). Under the providence* of God, circumstances will sometimes demand that the Christian witness to God take the strongest possible form and become a witness unto death, as was Christ's own witness. The martyrs are those who have resisted sin "to the point of shedding [their] blood" (Heb. 12:4). Only in the period after the NT did the term "martyr" come to refer exclusively to those who had died for the faith, with the title "confessor" honouring those who had been persecuted for their witness but who had survived. Yet, already in the NT there is a close association between witnessing for Christ and sealing this witness with one's death (Acts 22:20; Rev. 2:13, 17:6).

In martyrdom, conformity to Christ is complete. The martyrs are said to have joined Christ in a baptism like his, a "baptism of blood" (cf. Mark 10:38). Ignatius of Antioch anticipates that his martyrdom will "grind" him into one bread with Christ. United to Christ, the martyr becomes transparent to him. "In the martyr, the church discerns Christ himself, the very heart of its faith, beyond all interpretation and division," declares the WCC Faith and Order text "Witness unto Death" (Bangalore 1978), one of the most substantial statements in recent years on the ecumenical significance of martyrdom. The martyr's act of total obedience points the divided churches to Christ their common Lord, in whom alone their unity* lies. Claiming the martyrs of the early church and certain great Christian witnesses of later history as "the common property of all Christians", the statement notes that many churches are already involved in the process of a mutual recognition of the martyrs and calls for an ecumenical anthology of both early and modern accounts of martyrdom. At a regional level, Theo Aerts chronicled in The Martyrs of Papua New Guinea the lives and deaths of 333 missionaries and locals, from seven different churches, killed during the second world war.

While the martyr is a most potent witness to Christian unity, there is no more vivid and painful reminder of the seriousness of Christian disunity than the "confessional martyr", Eberhard Bethge's apt term for the victims of the bloody disputes of the Reformation and its aftermath, when Protestants and Catholics killed each other (and Protestants killed Protestants), in contrast to the so-called classic martyrdom of the early Christians, who died at the hands of non-Christians in imperial Rome. Those killed in the course of confessional disputes are a source of both judgment and grace, and a mutual remembrance of them can play a major role in reconciling the churches, argues the Anglican theologian Rowan Williams. "The whole church needs for its wholeness the memory both of its capacity for violence and of the great witnesses to the risen Christ who have appeared in the midst of it." If the memory of the confessional martyr is not to fuel further hostility and division between Christians, two things are required, says Williams: "that the martyr's community celebrate the martyr's memory in such a way that he or she offers grace and hope to those outside; and that the persecuting body remember the martyr in penitence and thanksgiving".

The Anglican and Catholic martyrs of the English Reformation in the 16th century illustrate well how martyrdom becomes an ecumenical issue. At the canonization of the Forty (Catholic) Martyrs of England and Wales in 1970, aware that some had feared this act would create ill-feeling between the two churches, Pope Paul VI prayed that the memory of these martyrs might rather restore unity between them: "Is it not one – these martyrs say to us – the church founded by Christ?" In a reconciling move, the Anglican church now includes the Catholic martyr Thomas More in its liturgical calendar. One might recall here the forgiveness Christian martyrs through the centuries have extended to their persecutors, following the example of Christ on the cross (Luke 23:34) and of Stephen, the first martyr (Acts 7:60).

Ecumenical recognition of the martyrs does not mean re-writing history or disavowing the disagreements. Quite the contrary: that many martyrs have died for an article of faith restricted more or less to their own ecclesial community shows the gravity of specifically doctrinal disputes between the churches and the necessity of resolving them; there can be no doctrinal indifferentism in ecumenical work. The confessional martyr (indeed, any Christian martyr) points to the truth of Christianity as a whole, though his or her witness was bound by certain historical, cultural and ecclesiological factors. Beyond these particularities, says the F&O statement on martyrdom, it is possible to recognize “the absoluteness of the Christ to whom [the martyrs] desired to bear witness”. Indeed, the Christian witness of non-Catholic martyrs was one of the factors which moved the Roman Catholic Church, in the historic ecumenical overtures of Vatican II, to recognize the sanctifying power of the Holy Spirit in non-Catholic communities of faith and to affirm, despite serious differences, a genuine bond between them and itself (Lumen Gentium 15).

Precisely how to recognize the martyrs and saints* has itself been disputed by the churches and remains a major theological issue on the ecumenical agenda. As early as the 2nd century, the martyrs began to receive veneration. Places of worship were built over their graves, and their relics were used to sanctify altars. Intercessory prayers were made to them. The cult of the martyrs and saints grew to excess and abuse in the middle ages and became a main target of the Protestant Reformation (though there had been criticism of it all along). Prayer to the saints was judged by the reformers to be a denial of Christ as the sole mediator between God and humanity. Feast days for the saints were virtually eliminated (though the Anglican church retained biblical figures in its calendar), and emphasis was placed on observing the salvation events of scripture. Protestants thus rejected much of the cultic apparatus associated with the martyrs but did not completely disavow the traditional admiration of them.

According to the Augsburg confession (1530), the most influential of all Lutheran confessional writings, saints “should be kept in remembrance so that our faith may be strengthened when we see what grace they received and how they were sustained by faith” (art. 21). The Second Helvetic confession (1566), a widely accepted Reformed text, calls for the saints to be remembered in sermons. Protestant hymns also extol martyrdom. Ecumenical convergence in worship has encouraged some Protestant eucharistic liturgies to renew the ancient practice of commemorating the saints and martyrs as members of the heavenly congregation, whom we join in praise to God, and to pray that we be made like them (see the ecumenical Lima liturgy). However, most Protestants still reject prayer to the saints, even though the Orthodox and Roman Catholics have maintained in ecumenical discussions that such prayer is entirely dependent upon Jesus Christ alone and is a proper expression of the communion of saints.*

Some have argued that the classic concept of martyrdom (death as a direct result of an explicit confession of Christ) needs to be expanded to include those killed as the consequence of taking a prophetic Christian stance against oppression for the sake of peace and justice. Martyrdom as a model of non-violent resistance to social evil was affirmed by a 1978 world conference of Mennonites (Wichita, KS), who remembered that many of their predecessors were martyred during the radical Reformation. The contemporary martyr, humbly identifying with and dying for the poor,* may well be anonymous. Such a witness now crosses denominational lines to form a truly ecumenical partnership in martyrdom. Visible evidence of such partnership is the martyrs’ chapel in Canterbury cathedral, England, which commemorates 12 modern martyrs – Anglican, Catholic, Orthodox and Protestant – including Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Martin Luther King, Jr and Oscar Romero.

The massive suffering of the Orthodox in the East – 1 million Armenians alone were killed or exiled by the Turks during the first world war – led Bishop Stefan of the Serbian Orthodox Church to speak of the Orthodox martyrs as “a precious gift that the church contributes to the universal Christian treasury” (Eastern European consultation on ecumenical sharing of resources, Sofia, 1982). Like the Orthodox, many of the churches have suffered “collective martyrdom” in this century of mass murder. The churches’ complicity in such destruction, as in the Jewish holocaust, and their role in fostering and perpetuating repression must also be considered in any account of martyrdom today. The contemporary martyr may well witness against the failure of the churches, yet for the sake of their greater faithfulness. In the words of the F&O statement, the martyrs “bring us all back to the centre of faith, the source of hope, and example of love for God and fellow human beings”.

The phrase ecclesia martyrum (church of the martyrs) expresses the true nature of the church. The martyr’s self-emptying love reminds the church that its mission* in the world is to offer God’s reconciling love in Jesus Christ (see reconciliation). The witness of the church and the unity of the church are inseparable; together they arise from and point to the Lord’s own witness, his own martyrdom, which united God and humanity. Torn asunder by hatred and destruction, the world should be able to see in the unity of the church a sign of its own unity restored in Jesus Christ. This is the testimony of the martyrs. As Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras I of Constantinople said to Pope Paul VI, when the two met in Rome in 1967 to discuss reconciliation between the Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches: “We hear... the cry of the blood of the apostles Peter and Paul, and the voice of the church of the catacombs and of the martyrs of the Coliseum, inviting us to use every possible means to bring to completion the work we have begun – that of the perfect healing of Christ’s divided church – not only that the will of the Lord should be accomplished, but that the world may see shining forth what is, according to our creed, the primary property of the church – its unity.”

In his apostolic letter Tertio Millennio Adveniente (1994), Pope John Paul II recognized that “at the end of the second millennium, the church has once again become a church of martyrs”, and that “the witness to Christ borne even to the shedding of blood has become a common inheritance of Catholics, Orthodox, Anglicans and Protestants” (sec. 37). As part of the celebrations of the year 2000 the pope recommended that “the local churches should do everything possible to ensure that the memory of those who have suffered martyrdom should be safeguarded” – such a “gesture cannot fail to have an ecumenical character and expression” (ibid.). John Paul himself presided at such an ecumenical celebration in the Roman Coliseum in May 2000.

See also common confession, common witness, witness.

ROWAN D. CREWS, Jr

- E. Bethge, Bonhoeffer: Exile and Martyr, London, Collins, 1975
- The Canonization of the Forty English and Welsh Martyrs: A Commemoration Presented by the Postulators of the Cause, London, Office of the Vice-Postulation, 1970
- B. Chenu et al., Le livre des martyrs chrétiens (ET The Book of Christian Martyrs, London, SCM Press, 1990)
- O. Clément, “Martyrs and Confessors”, ER, 52, 3, 2000
- M. Craig, Six Modern Martyrs, New York, Crossroad, 1985
- M. Lods, Confesseurs et martyrs, Neuchâtel, Delachaux & Niestlé, 1958
- J.B. Metz & E. Schillebeeckx eds, Martyrdom Today (= Concilium, 163, 1983)
- R. Williams, Resurrection, London, Darton, Longman & Todd, 1984
- “Witness unto Death”, in Sharing in One Hope, WCC, 1978.

MARXIST-CHRISTIAN DIALOGUE

DIALOGUE between Christians and Marxists, which began in the 1950s and flourished in the 1960s, resulted from a relaxation in the East-West tensions of the cold war. The de-Stalinization campaign in the Soviet Union, the changes in the Roman Catholic Church following the Second Vatican Council,* and the growth of the ecumenical movement all contributed to bringing Marxists and Christians together for serious conversations about critical issues. A large output of literature on the subject appeared in English, French, German, Italian and Spanish. Prominent participants from the Marxist side included R. Garaudy, V. Gardavsky, M. Machovec and E. Bloch; and such Christian theologians as J. Hromádka, A. Dumas, G. Girardi, K. Rahner and J.M. González-Ruiz were involved at one time or another. The Paulus-Gesellschaft, under the leadership of Erich Kellner, sponsored a number of international symposia during the 1960s in the Federal Republic of Germany and Austria, bringing together Marxist and Christian thinkers.

After the Warsaw Pact forces moved into Czechoslovakia in 1968 to suppress the liberation movement led by Alexander Dubcek, the Marxist-Christian dialogue declined swiftly. Although it did not disappear entirely, encounters during the 1970s were less publicized and more widely diffused than earlier ones. In the US, H. Cox, C. West, P. Lehmann, T. Ogletree, J.L. Adams and others took interest in the dialogue. P. Mojzes chaired a task force on the Christian-Marxist Encounter of Christians Associated for Relationships with Eastern Europe, which sponsored annual dialogues on the continent.

From the beginning a variety of issues were on the agenda of many encounters – atheism,* transcendence, death, alienation, the individual and the community, Marxist and Christian eschatology,* the search for the meaning of life, standards of morality. The conversations succeeded in eliminating a considerable number of prejudices, misunderstandings and false interpretations of each other's positions.

Marxists openly admitted that religion* was not always the "opiate of the people" and that Christianity in particular had sometimes been and could still be a protest against injustice, oppression and exploitation. Christians pointed out that Marx and Ludwig Feuerbach, in stressing that God* is an erroneous idea of humanity, ignored the fact that God is a necessary idea, deeply rooted in all human beings. They expressed their conviction that human efforts at social improvement can never make the gospel superfluous, and even in the most advanced and ideal communist society there would be fundamental questions that would not find answers from within the system. The Christian faith provides elements to produce meaning in the context of such disillusionments and perplexities.

Although the results of the dialogue should not be underestimated, the fact remains that the fundamental Marxist attitude towards Christianity prevailed up to the beginning of the 1990s. Faith in a personal God who reveals himself has been rejected as an atavism that undermines human autonomy.

Clearly the primary interest of Christians in any continuing dialogue with Marxists should be not the mere fact of talking to each other but the higher goal of enhancing human dignity, freedom, creativity and wholeness. For example, in Latin America and other areas of the third world, the concerns for social change in the criticism and overcoming of oppressive governments and unjust social structures have provided a platform for common action and reflection between many Christians and Marxists. A deeper dialogue developed on the basis of the questions emerging from the common praxis that has led some Marxist intellectuals to re-open the interpretation of religion and to question some dogmatic Marxist theses concerning the intrinsically reactionary character of the Christian faith. A conversation between Fidel Castro and Frei Betto witnessed to the fact that, while fundamental philosophical differences remained, there was basis for common action and serious dialogue.

The collapse since the end of the 1980s of states governed by communist regimes created a new situation. The contradiction between liberal capitalism and communism lost strength, and the relation between Christians and Marxists became also less tense. Marxism started to be freed from its tendency to be dogmatic, and Christians did not continue to see in Marxism a major ideological threat. In the new context it has therefore become possible to develop the dialogue on a new basis. Marxists continue to challenge Christians to be faithful to the spirit of social renewal found in the gospel of Jesus of Nazareth, and Christians call Marxists to liberate themselves from the burden of many concepts of modernity (e.g., the absolute character of human freedom, the belief in infinite progress, the inexorable destiny of human history, etc.) which have limited the Marxist interpretation of social reality.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- A.J. van der Bent, The Christian-Marxist Dialogue, WCC, 1992
- F. Betto, Fidel Castro and Religion, New York, Simon & Schuster, 1987
- R. Garaudy, De l'anathème au dialogue (ET From Anathema to Dialogue, New York, Herder, 1966)
- JES, winter 1978
- J.M. Lochman, Christ and Prometheus? A Quest for Theological Identity, WCC, 1988
- J. Míguez Bonino, Christians and Marxists: The Mutual Challenge to Revolution, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1976
- P. Mojzes, Christian-Marxist Dialogue in Eastern Europe, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1981.

MARY IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

MARY THE MOTHER of Jesus Christ is mentioned in all four gospels and Acts and is alluded to by Paul (Gal. 4:4). She is uniquely involved in the life of the Lord. Present at important times in his private and public life, she is with the apostles at the coming of the Holy Spirit.* The New Testament tells the story of Jesus and the good news of salvation,* but there is very little about Mary. She was the Saviour's mother, she was filled with grace and faith, she witnessed her Son's work. This is the foundation of all thought about Mary.

The complex Mariology of the Roman Catholic Church contrasts sharply with the virtual absence of Mary in Protestant evangelical thought. The gulf seemed so wide that Karl Barth wrote: "In the doctrine and worship of Mary there is disclosed the one heresy of the Roman Catholic Church which explains all the rest."

What, then, is the place of Mary in the ecumenical movement today? Ecumenical discussion is necessary precisely because of the bitterness of past arguments, if unity* is to be a real prospect. Rarely the main topic in interchurch discussion, mention of Mary nevertheless brings to the surface a number of controversial issues.

The early church honoured Mary as mother of Jesus Christ. In the patristic period theologians pondered the questions of Mary's freedom from sin* (her own immaculate conception) and the virgin birth in relation to the true nature of her Son. The council of Ephesus (431) declared Mary theotokos – God-bearer, more usually translated "Mother of God". This declaration affirmed the nature of Jesus as true God and true Man. The doctrine of the divine motherhood is entirely Christocentric. John of Damascus wrote: "This name – theotokos – contains the whole mystery of the incarnation."

Wonder led to devotion and to the celebration of Marian feasts in all branches of the church. Liturgy celebrated Mary's relation to God, to her Son and to the children of God in the church. Mary was the subject of art and popular devotion. The second council of Nicea (787) approved the veneration of images of Mary. The middle ages saw an increase in belief in Mary's maternal influence and powers of intercession with her divine Son on behalf of sinners. Theological controversy continued with varied contributions from Bernard, Anselm, Thomas Aquinas, Duns Scotus and others. But extravagant devotional practices and disturtions led to scandal and revulsion, culminating in the need for reform. Late medieval abuses appeared to the Protestant reformers to concentrate too much on Mary, thus detracting from the Saviour's redemption of humanity. Protestantism rejected development of the Marian doctrine beyond theotokos as unscriptural and unnecessary. Luther wrote: "Without doubt Mary is the mother of God... and in this word is contained every honour which can be given to her." Further elaboration was deemed unnecessary, and expression of Marian devotion became unusual in Reformed and Evangelical churches. Partly in reaction to this reaction, but also continuing the work of the fathers, Counter-Reformation theologians and Catholic and Orthodox tradition continued to develop Marian theology, spirituality and devotion. Doctrines of the immaculate conception (1854) and the assumption (1950) were defined for Roman Catholics in papal statements.

The Second Vatican Council, in Lumen Gentium (1964), restated the Christocentric nature of Marian devotion and its scriptural foundation. It also drew attention to the need to avoid exaggeration and misunderstanding. Mary was placed firmly in the mainstream of theology and recognized as a proper subject for ecumenical consideration. The movement to find what is common to all in the scriptures and in the patristic period has brought increasing trust and willingness among Christians to examine together problems which had long seemed insoluble.

Emphasis in Catholic, Orthodox and Protestant traditions on the meaning of theotokos and its centrality to the mystery of the incarnation* has enabled historical suspicions of mariolatry to be dispelled. Many of the visible indications of Marian devotion – like statues, icons, processions and shrines – have been perceived as obscuring its essentially Christocentric direction. The use of language – notably in the titles given to Mary – has too often provoked dissent rather than understanding. Yet, since Vatican II, there is readiness to examine Mary in the context of ecumenism. Christians whose traditions have paid little attention to Mary recognize the antiquity and richness of Catholic and Orthodox liturgies and meditations. At the same time, there is growing realization that some of the disagreements are more than disputes over images, poetry and pious practices. There are significantly different religious perceptions involved.

The underlying theological problems have been the substance of Marian thought since the patristic period, through the Reformation, right up to the definitions of 1854 and 1950. They concern the nature and action of grace* and the nature of revelation* in the church.

Scripture says that Mary had found favour with God and was chosen to be the mother of his Son (Luke 1:30-31). The annunciation scene stresses both her acceptability to God and her consent to her role in incarnation. Mary is "a model... in the matter of faith, charity and perfect union with Christ" (LG 63). The problem is, how can a human being be worthy of God if all humanity is marred by sin? What is the meaning of "full of grace"? Humankind was redeemed only by Christ's sacrifice; Mary could not have achieved a state of grace by her own human action. In Protestant eyes, to call Mary free from sin is to exempt her from the need for salvation, which not only exalts her above other creatures but also belittles Christ's universal saving action. The doctrine of the immaculate conception – the Roman Catholic solution to this problem – teaches that "the most Blessed Virgin Mary in the first moment of her conception was, by the unique grace and privilege of God, in view of the merits of Jesus Christ the Saviour of the human race, preserved intact from all stain of original sin" (Ineffabilis Deus, 1854).

In Mary, the Christian recognizes a human person who offers no resistance to the power of God. The use of the word "cooperate" in connection with Mary has led to accusations of elevation of a creature to equality with the Creator. Cooperate can only mean work with, not originate. Grace is God's free gift, but the individual can choose to resist or reject it or, like Mary, choose to be open to it. Since the consequence of Mary's personal acceptance of God's grace was to bring the Saviour into the world, where he would free all humankind from sin, she can be considered the channel of grace for all. Some Christians believe that faith alone justifies; others that faith increases as believers struggle to express the action of grace in their lives. In Mary, faith and work were one. She is the human perfected by the Spirit, which is the meaning of both Marian declarations. The assumption maintains that, by the action of God, Mary did not suffer corruption but was united body and soul with God. She was the first to be saved by the Redeemer and has gone before us. Prayers are addressed to her, not in worship, but in celebration of the efficacy of grace in one of us. The supplicant prays for encouragement to follow Mary's example. But even when understanding can be reached that Mariology does not contradict other Christian beliefs, many Christians doubt the necessity of this doctrine.

Discussion between Christians can lead to shared insights. Mary is a useful catalyst in ecumenical encounter. Mutual fears have been calmed and common ground identified. But alongside sympathy and toleration, there is refusal to accept dogmatic definitions as essential to faith.

Neither the immaculate conception nor the assumption is mentioned in the NT. Objections can be summed up in Adolf von Harnack's questions "Wann? Wem?" When were these truths revealed, and to whom? This approach provokes arguments about revelation and authority. Some hold that only what is written in the Bible is authentic revelation; others believe that revelation is continued by the Holy Spirit in tradition, in explication and even in each individual's experience of the Spirit.

There is evidence of patristic development of Marian doctrine. Saving grace and the resurrection* of the body are articles of faith and are in the creeds.* But only the RCC has claimed the authority and seen the need to make declarations and definitions in Marian matters which are binding on the faithful. The Orthodox church, with its strong Marian tradition but having been unaffected by Western disputes provoked by the Reformation, stops short of dogmatic statement. The difficulties these late definitions present to modern ecumenism are therefore wider than their Marian content because they call into question authentic revelation and papal authority. The RCC does not doubt them and cannot retract formal definitions; non-Catholic Christians cannot accept that belief in them is necessary for salvation. Thus Mary becomes a crucial test of how far unity can be achieved in the ecumenical movement.

Mary also surfaces in new areas which increasingly come into ecumenical discussion – liberation theology* and feminist theology.* Devotion to Mary is noticeably strong among poorer or oppressed peoples all over the world. The story of the mother rejected by innkeepers, fleeing from violence, quietly raising her Son to manhood, then witnessing his persecution and suffering, yet seeing and sharing in his triumph, offers hope to many. Her song, the Magnificat,* was recognized by Martin Luther for its reversal of the world's values. It is increasingly providing inspiration for Christians. Feminism, too, finds encouragement in Mary as representative of the powerless and as a model of human behaviour.

Yet a new criticism of the Marian tradition has begun to emerge. Some see a contradiction between the role of Mary in the incarnation, with honour given to her because of it, and the exclusion of women from certain ministries in the church. Reflection on Mary again widens out into discussion about the feminine in the divine and about women in the community. While Mary has always been understood by many to affirm both of these issues, new accusations have been made that honour of the Virgin Mary and insistence on her perpetual virginity damage the sexuality of all other women (and perhaps men too). Mary invites thought about mothering, about our relations with each other as children of God, and about Mary, mother of the church.

So is Mary a cause for division or an opportunity for reconciliation? She was certainly the mother of the Saviour and is therefore, at least physically, at the centre of Christianity. Thought about this relationship raises important questions. The Groupe des Dombes* has completed a study precisely devoted to Mariology, one of the most difficult issues between Roman Catholics and Protestants. The first volume of its report has thrown much light on the Christological character of the theotokos, overcoming much misunderstanding. Mary was the point at which God and the human were united. Her advice to the servants at Cana was to do as her Son told them. John Paul II has written: "Christians know that their unity will be truly rediscovered only if it is based on the unity of their faith" (Redemptoris Mater, 1987). Mary, example of faith and unity, can be the hope of all Christians.

RITA CROWLEY TURNER

- H. Anderson, J.F. Stafford & J. Burgess, The One Mediator, the Saints, and Mary: Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue VIII, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1992
- E. Brown, K.P. Donfried, J.A. Fitzmyer & J. Reumann eds, Mary in the New Testament: A Collaborative Assessment by Protestant and Roman Catholic Scholars, London, Chapman, 1978
- A. Dietrich, Protestantische Mariologie-Kritik, Regensburg, Pustet, 1998
- Groupe des Dombes, Marie dans le dessein de Dieu et la communion des saints: 1. dans l'histoire et l'Écriture; 2. controverse et conversion, Paris, Bayard/Le Centurion, 1999
- M. Leplay, Le protestantisme et Marie: Une belle éclaircie, Geneva, Labor & Fides, 2000
- J. Pelikan, Mary through the Centuries: Her Place in the History of Culture, New Haven, Yale UP, 1996
- A. Stacpole ed., Mary's Place in Christian Dialogue – Occasional Papers of the Ecumenical Society of the Blessed Virgin Mary, London, St Paul, 1982
- R.C. Turner, The Mary Dimension, London, Sheed & Ward, 1985.

MATTHEWS, ZACHARIAH KEODIRELANG

B. 20 Oct. 1901, Cape Colony, South Africa; d. May 1968, Washington DC, USA. "Z.K." was Africa secretary of WCC's Division of Inter-Church Aid, Refugee and World Service in the early 1960s, in which capacity he tackled refugee situations created by Christian-Muslim conflict in the Sudan, and the Congo crisis of 1962-63. His report Africa Survey opened the eyes of the United Nations to the extent and gravity of the refugee situation. During this period he was associated with the All Africa Conference of Churches, and was chairperson of the constitutional committee at its founding in 1963.

Z.K. was educated at Lovedale Missionary Institute (the only high school open to Africans at that time) and University College of Fort Hare (1918-24). He studied law by correspondence, and later anthropology, first at Yale, then at the London School of Economics under Bronislaw Malinowski. He taught at Adams High School in Natal, and for 24 years at Fort Hare, acting twice as principal. A respected educationist, he served on several committees, including the royal commission to investigate higher education for Africans in the territories of Uganda, Kenya, Tanganyika and Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, a signal honour then for an African.

Z.K. was involved with the council of Europeans and Africans for inter-racial harmony in Durban and with the native Bantu teachers' union, and he developed close contacts with future African political leaders such as Albert Luthuli and Alphaeus Zulu. He joined the African National Congress (ANC) in 1940. As president and treasurer of the ANC in the Cape, he addressed the Craddock Congress of the ANC in 1953, at which he proposed "a national convention (of all races), a congress of the people, representing all the people of this country, irrespective of race or colour, to draw up a freedom charter for the democratic South Africa of the future". He followed this with a memorandum on the congress of the people and a draft of the freedom charter, which was adopted in part by the congress of the people in 1955 and also by the ANC as part of its policy from 1956. For this activity he was charged with high treason, but finally acquitted. He participated in the Cottesloe* consultation of 1960.

In 1953 while he was Henry Luce visiting professor at Union Theological Seminary, New York, he was invited to serve on the programme planning committee for the WCC's Evanston assembly (1954). Resigning from the WCC in 1966, he became Botswana's ambassador to Washington and permanent representative at the UN.

JOHN S. POBEE

MEDELLÍN

THE FIRST general conference of Latin American bishops, meeting in Rio de Janeiro in 1955, created a permanent body, the Latin American Council of Bishops (CELAM), mainly with a consultative function, for the purpose of "studying the problems of the church in Latin America, coordinating its activities and preparing assemblies of the episcopate". The next conference took place in Medellín, Colombia, in August 1968. In the interim, several important things had happened.

First, CELAM held yearly meetings (with the exception of the years of the Second Vatican Council*), organized commissions to deal with central aspects of the life and mission of the church (catechesis, education, family, social issues), and set up a programme of research on social, economic and religious conditions in the sub-continent with a view to reaching a coordinated "pastoral de conjunto" (an integrated approach to the task of the church). Second, through these activities the Catholic church became more clearly aware of the social conditions (extreme poverty, economic oppression and lack of political participation) of large sectors of the Latin American people as well as of the general inadequacy of the religious instruction and pastoral care it was able to provide. Latin America began to be seen by the Catholic church as a field for mission. Third, by different roads Latin American Catholicism came into contact with the renewal movement in European Catholicism, including the biblical and liturgical renewal, the new theological trends and various forms of social action and concern. Finally, and perhaps most important, Vatican II was a decisive experience for most Latin American bishops. There they had a unique chance to meet frequently, gathering in groups formally and informally and discussing their common concerns over a prolonged period of time; they came in contact with the universal episcopate and profited from the experience of the church in other areas of the third world. At the doctrinal and canonical level, the Council gave a strong impulse to the "regional church" and an organic place to "episcopal conferences". The collegial exercise of the episcopal function served as a corrective to the individualist approach and an exclusive relation to the Vatican.

The careful preparation of the Medellín conference revealed that it could not merely adapt the Council's documents but had to start from a consideration of the Latin American situation; the purpose of the meeting was thus defined as that of considering "the church in the present transformation of Latin America in the light of the Council". The method therefore had to follow the well-known (Jesuit) pattern: to see, to judge, to act. All the documents produced at Medellín followed this pattern, giving an assessment of the facts, doctrinal reflection on the Christian understanding of and response to these facts, and a pastoral direction and specific proposals. There was no unanimity on these issues, and a minority clung to the purely conservative position that nothing should be changed. The direction, scope and depth of the transformation which most desired for church and society were at the heart of the debate. A close study of the documents discloses different and at times divergent directions.

In spite of such differences, the main thrust of the conference as a whole and of the impact it had on Latin American Christianity – within and outside the Roman Catholic Church – can be characterized by some key expressions of the "Message to the Peoples of Latin America" issued at the end of the conference. First, the church understands itself as an integral part of the people and commits itself to it: "As Latin Americans, we share the history of our people." Such commitment demands "conversion", "to purify ourselves in the spirit of the gospel, all the persons and institutions of the Catholic church", "to live a biblical poverty that finds expression in authentic manifestations, clear signs for our people". Second, Latin America, in spite of its plurality, must be seen in the unity of "a geographic reality", a common history and "similar problems". The main problem is the continent's intolerable state of underdevelopment, which prevents any possibility of human realization for the large majority of people. Such conditions – which the documents analyze in detail – are called "a situation of sin".

Finally, the church's response is an effort to "discern the signs of the times", to "discover God's plan" and to offer the church that "which is our most peculiar contribution: a global vision of man and humanity and an integral vision of the Latin American man in development". Later in the documents some concrete objectives are mentioned: "to inspire, stimulate and urge a new order of justice", to "dynamize education", "to promote professional organizations of workers" which are "decisive elements for socio-economic transformation", to "encourage a new evangelization and an intensive catechesis", "to renew and to create new structures in the church" in order to promote dialogue, participation and cooperation, and "to cooperate with other Christian confessions and with all men of good will committed to authentic peace, rooted in justice and love". The 16 documents of the conference elaborate these affirmations and purposes.

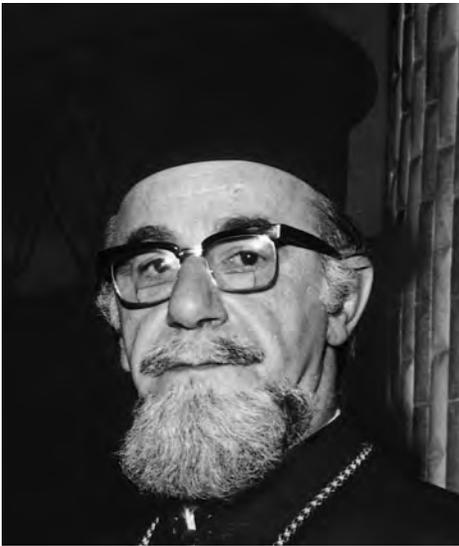

From an ecumenical and Latin American point of view, Medellín occupies a decisive place in our recent history. Although there is no specific document on ecumenism, the conference had a clearly ecumenical attitude: observers from different churches had full access and were invited to participate, and were even offered eucharistic hospitality. There was a clear "preferential option for the poor", which became the heart of the self-understanding, task and reflection of the church for many Latin American Christians. Medellín has stimulated intense pastoral action and theological reflection and, above all, the extraordinary growth of church base communities* across the continent. Although the two following conferences (Puebla 1978 and Santo Domingo 1989) nuanced and at points qualified certain ecclesiological and social formulations of Medellín, they have confirmed the basic concerns for social justice, ecclesial participation and the preferential option for the poor.

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO

■ The Church at the Crossroads: Christians in Latin America from Medellín to Puebla, 1968-1978, Rome, IDOC, 1978 ■ Second General Conference of Latin American Bishops, The Church in the Present-Day Transformation of Latin America in the Light of the Council, Washington DC, US Catholic Council, 1970.

MELITON (Hacis)

B. 24 Sept. 1913, Constantinople; d. 27 Dec. 1989, Istanbul. Meliton, metropolitan of Chalcedon, was a member of the WCC central committee, 1961-68, its vice-president, 1968-75, and a member of the committee on

Church and Society. As representative of the Ecumenical Patriarchate at the WCC assemblies and the principal collaborator of Athenagoras I and Dimitrios I, he promoted the activities of the Council, was deeply engaged in the pan-Orthodox conferences of Rhodes and Chambésy, and helped with the rapprochement between the WCC and the Roman Catholic Church. He was instrumental in lifting the anathema between Rome and Constantinople in 1965. Meliton studied theology at Halki; in 1938 he was under-secretary of the holy synod, and in 1943 in charge of the Greek parishes in Manchester and Liverpool, England, afterwards continuing his studies in Scotland. On the islands of Imbros and Tenedos he promoted religious, cultural and social education and established several schools, a hospital and other institutions of public service.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

MENNONITE WORLD CONFERENCE

MENNONITE, Brethren in Christ, and related churches form the MWC. More than 90 conferences in 52 nations are members. They appoint delegates to the general council, which meets triennially and elects the executive committee. A global assembly convenes regularly; the 13th met in Calcutta (1997). The MWC permanent secretariat is in Strasbourg, France. The Conference promotes unity and Christian discipleship among member churches by providing fellowship, communication, cooperation and interchurch dialogue. Formal conversations have been held with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches,* the Baptist World Alliance* and, annually since 1998, the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

LARRY MILLER

MENNONITES

THE MENNONITES are the closest descendants of 16th-century Anabaptists who espoused non-violence. They take their name from the Netherlands reformer and early influential leader Menno Simons (c.1496-1561).

The Anabaptist-Mennonite movement began in the first half of the 16th century in the southern and northern regions of Germanic Europe. One focal point was Switzerland, where Konrad Grebel and others, who initially followed the Swiss reformer Zwingli, began to practise believer's baptism* in 1525. Another was Holland, where Menno Simons left the priesthood in 1536 and where the Anabaptists became the first organized Reformation movement. Persecution and death followed for many Anabaptists, but dozens of small congregations soon came into existence throughout Germanic Europe.

Migration, due initially to persecution, and mission spread the movement. Migrations of Swiss and South German Mennonites within Europe continued into the 18th century, while those to North America began in the late 17th century. Dispersion of Dutch and North German Mennonites along the Baltic coast began in 1530 and continued from Prussia to Russia between 1789 and 1870. Other migrations followed, notably within the USSR, and from there to the Americas and, since 1970, to the Federal Republic of Germany. European Mennonites sent missionaries to Asia (1851) and later to Africa (1901). North American Mennonite-related mission, beginning in Asia and Africa at the end of the 19th century, now reaches every continent. Churches in Africa, Asia and South America began to send out missionaries about 1970.

Although Mennonites are non-credal, they have written numerous confessions throughout their history. In spite of significant and perhaps growing diversity, Mennonite confessions continue to reflect a common theological core. At the centre of Anabaptist-Mennonite faith stands Jesus Christ* as Saviour, Lord, and model of life. The church as the Body of Christ continues Christ's life and ministry in the world.

At least three features define the church* in Anabaptist-Mennonite tradition. The church is a community of believers who together seek to follow in daily life the teaching and example of Jesus Christ. Believers who voluntarily confess the lordship of Christ receive baptism as the sign of the new covenant* and of their commitment to a life of discipleship. Believer's baptism means also membership in the local community and responsibility for its welfare. The Lord's supper – a memorial to the death and resurrection* of Christ as well as a foretaste of the great messianic banquet – represents solidarity within the community and readiness to live the way of the cross in the world.

Autonomous from the state, the church lives under the *authority of the word of God** as set forth in the Bible, written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit.* The Old Testament is promise, the New Testament fulfilment. Where the NT gives a new commandment, the old is superseded. Furthermore, the text is best understood in the context of the community of disciples inspired by the Spirit (see hermeneutics).

In the Mennonite perspective, both social and personal ethics in a life of discipleship is part of the gospel. The disciple of Jesus Christ lives in the world in order to serve humankind through action and proclamation. This goal involves a readiness to suffer wrong and injustice rather than to bring harm to others. Love of enemies and rejection of violence are understood as NT absolutes, and they may be the most distinctive ethical emphases of the Anabaptist-Mennonite tradition. Rejection of seeking wealth in favour of economic sharing is frequently emphasized.

By the end of 1996, world membership for Mennonite and related churches surpassed 1 million in 60 countries. During the last two decades the most rapid church growth has occurred in Africa, Central and South America, and Asia.

Although Mennonites profess and live a radical congregationalism, most feel unity with all believers who confess Jesus Christ and who seek to live the way of discipleship. Many are open to cooperation with other Christian groups, especially in witness to peace and non-violence or in mission. Occasionally, cooperation is more general, as in the theological conversations with the Baptist and Reformed in the Netherlands (1975-78) or with the Lutherans in France (1981-84). The Mennonite World Conference* has held formal dialogue with the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* and the Baptist World Alliance.* A few Mennonite churches are members of national or world communions of churches. Two North American Mennonite conferences have joined the National Association of Evangelicals. The Dutch and North German conferences, as well as the Church of Christ in Congo – Mennonite Community, are members of the WCC.

See also historic peace churches.

LARRY MILLER

- Confession of Faith in a Mennonite Perspective, Scottsdale PA, Herald, 1995
- C.J. Dyck ed., Introduction to Mennonite History, Scottsdale PA, Herald, 1967
- D.G. Lichdi ed., Mennonite World Handbook, Carol Stream IL, Mennonite World Conference, 1990
- H. Loewen ed., One Lord, One Church, One Hope, and One God: Mennonite Confessions of Faith, Elkhart IN, Institute of Mennonite Studies, 1985
- Mennonite Encyclopedia, 5 vols, Scottsdale PA, Herald, 1955-90.

METHODISM

"METHODIST" originated as a pejorative designation by critics of the members of the Holy Club in Oxford, but John Wesley (1703-91), its Anglican leader from 1729 and himself converted to serious Christian living in 1725, used it to mean a methodical pursuit of biblical holiness.*

Methodism, one of Protestantism's most influential evangelistic renewal movements, has become a worldwide communion. The current (2000) edition of the World Methodist Council Handbook states that worldwide Methodist membership now numbers about 38 million persons, whilst the Methodist world community, comprising both members and all those who come within the sphere of influence of the Methodist churches, now stands at over 75 million. Although the national churches have their own statements on doctrinal standards and church order, Methodism possesses a real unity* derived from the spiritual heritage which its principal founder, John Wesley, by his missionary preaching, and his brother Charles (1707-88), by his colossal output of hymns and religious poetry, bequeathed to it.

John Wesley's missionary experience in the English colony of Georgia (1736-37) was in many ways a failure, but it did provide him with the setting for shaping his concept of the small class under an appointed leader as the basic grouping for Bible-centred Christian nurture, vital to the harmonious growth of the Methodist movement. With an increase of dependable collaborators, Wesley later constituted the itinerant pastorate in correlation with local Methodist societies, each composed of several classes. The itinerant pastorate bound these societies together in a form of living communion which avoided both the danger of fragmentation inherent in congregational church polity and the tendency towards static centralization in the Presbyterian churches (see church order).

Returning to England from Georgia, Wesley experienced a second conversion on 24 May 1738. He received the grace to forsake reliance on his own efforts to attain perfection and to surrender himself totally, in loving trust, to the work of God's grace within him. Wesley thus became the instrument of divine power, which alone accounts for the stupendous missionary and pastoral achievement of his remaining 50 years as undisputed head of Methodism.

The priority Wesley resolutely gave, in the face of bitter opposition from the Church of England's establishment, to the materially and socially underprivileged coincided with the beginning of the industrial revolution and the springing up, in England, of huge industrial cities (still major centres of Methodism). A century before Karl Marx became a public name, Wesley had brought the gospel and concomitant social and cultural betterment to the first working class in the world.

Against Anglican-Calvinists who believed in predestination, Wesley taught that the redemptive love of Jesus excludes no person; God calls each freely to respond to that love. Against Protestants who held a narrow understanding of "faith alone", he insisted that free response entails not only an initial conversion but also continued cooperation with the Holy Spirit, who sanctifies and leads one ultimately to the perfection of love – the ability to triumph over sinful desires and selfish motives (see sanctification). Moreover, the trusting, loving self-surrender to the Father brought about by God's Spirit gives one the assurance that the blood of Jesus is victorious over personal sin (Rom. 8:14-16, 38-39). The only requirement for admission into a Methodist class (10-12 members) was a desire to seek inner holiness and to live a life of prayer and discipline in the fellowship of the Spirit. In thus focusing all his teaching on the doctrine of grace, Wesley made Anglican credal orthodoxy incandescent with the love of Jesus in the Spirit. Herein lies the heart of the Wesleyan spiritual heritage.

By inheriting, too, the Wesleyan insistence on the unity between worship and service, Methodism improved social relationships wherever it took root. The Wesleyan vision of Christian personhood has enabled modern Methodist missionaries in recent contact with Latin American liberation theology* to embrace its rightful aspirations, while avoiding theological deviations.

Wesley never intended his renewal movement to separate from the Church of England, yet a separation was inevitable. Entering the movement were large numbers of unchurched people who had no contact with the state-established church and wanted none. For such people Wesley created ministerial structures for their pastoral care, and they could not but exercise an authority parallel with legitimate Anglican authority, rather than be subordinate to it.

Since the American Methodists had been deprived of episcopally ordained preachers by the war of independence (1775-83), pastoral necessity drove Wesley to ordain his fellow presbyter Thomas Coke (1747-1814) as “superintendent” over “the brethren in America”. Wesley sent Coke to the new United States in 1784 with the authority to establish an independent church, which took the name “Methodist Episcopal Church”. The title “superintendent” was changed to “bishop” in 1787.

Wesley’s Anglican loyalties made him more circumspect in his dealings with British Methodists. No formal acts of separation from the Church of England were made during his life-time, but the company of 100 preachers, whom he had made his legal successors by a deed of declaration (1784), inevitably became the governing body of an autonomous church after his death seven years later. British Methodism remains non-episcopal in church order.

The seeds of future dissension were already sown. The plan of pacification (1795) reversed Wesley’s conscientious refusal to allow itinerant preachers who were not episcopally ordained to administer communion, but the plan retained his policy of concentrating pastoral initiative in the preachers’ hands, to the eventual detriment of lay participation. Resulting protests gave rise to new denominations in the first half of the 19th century, either by secession or by separate foundation. More significant for Methodism’s present ecumenical role, bitter controversy with the Anglican Tractarian movement hastened the decline of British Methodism from the high theology and practice of the Lord’s supper shared by the Wesley brothers, hardened its non-sacramental understanding of the ordained ministry and pushed it definitively into the non-conformist camp.

Several schisms* also racked American Methodism – over church polity, required “unworldly” discipline and public social issues, especially racism and slavery. Already in 1816 and 1820 two black churches were founded – the African Methodist Episcopal and the African Methodist Episcopal Zion. In 2001 these two, along with the black Christian Methodist Episcopal (1870), numbered 5.3 million members in over 15,000 congregations. In 1844 the Methodist Episcopal Church itself divided over the slavery question into two separate churches.

These alarming divisions, however, did not prevent either the growth of the family of Methodist churches or their missionary outreach. In Great Britain the “connexions” totalled 800,000 members by 1900. In 1813 the Wesleyan Missionary Society was founded, and in the wake of British colonial expansion, large Methodist churches grew up in Canada, Australia and South Africa, where the church had a large black following, and in other parts of Africa and in Asia. In the USA the largely white Methodist denominations grew from 2 million in 1900 to 10 million in 1960. Fully integrated into American society, they poured personnel and money into the evangelization of India and China and had a pervasive influence on American Protestantism as a whole.

The Ecumenical Methodist Conference of 1881 brought to London delegates from 30 Methodist bodies in 20 countries. It was a turning point in the healing of Methodist divisions at national levels. In Great Britain, by a series of mergers beginning in 1907, the various Methodist bodies united, until by 1932 almost all had become the one British Methodist Church. In the US the northern and southern branches of the Methodist Episcopal Church re-united in 1939, a union joined also by the Methodist Protestant Church, created by secession in 1828. In 1968 a merger of this largely white, unified Methodist church with the Evangelical United Brethren formed the United Methodist Church, with over 11 million members. The successful outcome of Churches Uniting in Christ (see Consultation on Church Union, covenanting) in which United Methodism, along with other denominations, is in dialogue with the three large black Methodist churches, would help to heal the most serious rift in the family.

This earnest seeking for a form of unity which is the necessary visible expression of invisible communion in love has taken the Methodist family beyond intraconfessional dialogue. For more than half a century

Methodist churches have participated in church unions which transcend confessional barriers. In some of these, Anglican participation has made it possible to overcome the fundamental divide between episcopal and non-episcopal church order (notably in the Church of South India and the Church of North India). But some negotiations involving Methodists have failed. In 1969 and in 1972 a plan for organic union* between the Church of England and the British Methodist Church was defeated. The chief problem lay in how Methodism was to acquire the historic episcopacy.* The rejection has been detrimental to Methodism's ecumenical endeavours. Those efforts, however, have found concrete expression, at the world level, in bilateral dialogue with Lutherans, Reformed, Roman Catholics and (finally) Anglicans, made possible by the World Methodist Council* (WMC), formerly the Ecumenical Methodist Council.

Through the WMC's participation in the conference of secretaries of Christian World Communions,* world Methodism was able to play its part in ecumenical initiatives for the new millennium. The book 2000 Years since Bethlehem, published by Methodism's Upper Room Movement, brought together brief passages from the spiritual writings of all Christian traditions throughout the centuries.

In the ecumenical movement, Methodists such as John R. Mott (1865-1955) and G. Bromley Oxnam (1891-1963) played key roles in the founding of the WCC at its first assembly in 1948. In 2001 there were 37 national Methodist churches in the WCC. Of the five WCC general secretaries, two have been Methodists – Philip Potter (1972-84) and Emilio Castro (1985-92).

The first WMC conference (1951) echoed Wesley's original intention not to found a church but to inspire and organize a movement for church renewal. The WMC rejoiced to see Methodist churches give up separate confessional existence to find new life in the wider community of transconfessional unions. As recent experience shows, however, such unions can remain imprisoned within cultural and national boundaries. Could the WMC, therefore, enable Methodism, without becoming entrenched in a confessional exclusiveness Wesley never intended, to witness to a love which, by being rooted in self-forgetfulness, transcends all human-devised barriers?

FRANCIS FROST

- R. Davies, Methodism, London, Epworth, 1976
- R. Davies, A.R. George & G. Rupp, A History of the Methodist Church in Great Britain, 4 vols, London, Epworth, 1965-88
- N.B. Hamon ed., Encyclopedia of World Methodism, Nashville TN, United Methodist, 1974
- R.P. Heitzenrater, Wesley and the People Called Methodists, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1995
- T.A. Langford, Methodist Theology, Peterborough, UK, Epworth, 1998
- F. Norwood, The Story of American Methodism, 7th ed., Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1989
- T. Runyon ed., Wesleyan Theology Today, Nashville TN, United Methodist Publ., 1985
- G. Wainwright, The Ecumenical Moment, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1983, ch. 11
- G. Wainwright, Methodists in Dialogue, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1995.

METHODIST-ORTHODOX RELATIONS

AT DUBLIN in 1976 and at Nairobi in 1986, the World Methodist Council* expressed the desire to explore bilateral relationships between Methodism and Orthodoxy, and in 1990 the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople agreed to set up a small joint group of theologians to explore themes for an eventual dialogue. One promising factor in the situation is the historical influence on Methodism of the theological and spiritual insights which the Wesleys drew from the patristic church, particularly that of the East. At the pastoral level, there exist Orthodox and Methodist diaspora communities in regions where the other body is stronger.

In 1995 the preparatory commission published Orthodox and Methodists, a booklet to help the faithful of each community gain a basic acquaintance with the other. The commission proposed to its principals the "fundamental question" of "how salvation is understood in our two communions" as the topic of a more formal dialogue.

The charges of proselytism* which the Moscow patriarchate has levelled against Methodists entering Russian territory since the end of the Soviet empire underline the urgent need for dialogue.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

- B. Frost, Living in Tension between East and West, London, New World, 1984
- R.L. Maddox, "John Wesley and Eastern Orthodoxy", Asbury Theological Journal, 45, 1990 ■ G. Wainwright, Methodists in Dialogue, Nashville TN, Abingdon/Kingswood, 1995, chs 9-10.

METHODIST-REFORMED DIALOGUE

AFTER TWO intensive "international consultations" in 1985 and 1987, theologians appointed respectively by the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* and the World Methodist Council* composed a report, "Together in God's Grace", which was immediately welcomed by the executive committees of the sponsoring bodies and transmitted to their member churches for discussion and action. Concluding that "the classical doctrinal issues" on which there has historically been tension between the two traditions "ought not to be seen as obstacles to unity between Methodists and Reformed", the document recommended that Methodist and Reformed churches ask themselves and one another about possibilities for cooperation at local, national, regional and international levels in worship, study, doctrinal commissions, evangelistic outreach and social service; and whether indeed there are more places "in which Reformed-Methodist union negotiations might be initiated". Recognition of "a common gospel" and of "authentic forms of obedience and faithful discipleship" in the partner, such as the theologians believe to be the case, means that "in all places churches in our two traditions are already in a position mutually to recognize membership and ministry", which at the very least entails mutual sensitivity and respect in majority/minority situations and amid differences in relationships to the state and to society at large.

The two traditions have different origins and have never undergone an active separation. Both "regard the scriptures as the primary authority in faith and practice and confess the shared faith of the universal church expressed in ecumenical creeds and by witnesses to it through the centuries". Specifically, "both testify to the priority of God's grace, the sufficiency of faith, the call to holy living, and the imperative to mission". Yet different secondary authorities obtain in the two traditions; and as between the Reformed confessions of the 16th and 17th centuries and the Wesleyan "standards" of Methodism, there are undoubtedly "differing accounts of the appropriation of saving grace, emphasizing, on the one hand, God's sovereignty in election and, on the other, the freedom of human response".

Wesley stated in his own words his agreement with Calvin on several fundamental matters: "(1) in ascribing all good to the free grace of God; (2) in denying natural free will, and all power antecedent to grace; (3) in excluding all merit from man, even for what he has or does by the grace of God". The 1987 report notes that it is only on this common basis that "the conflicting stances identified as Calvinist and Wesleyan were adopted". Wesley saw as the universal inheritance of Christ's atoning work a prevenient grace* which restores to humankind the lost freedom of choice, while not guaranteeing salvation* to all; Calvinists object that this impugns the divine sovereignty, since it claims that human freedom to deny is greater than God's will to save. When Methodists ask how a predestinarian approach avoids understanding God's freedom as anything more than arbitrariness, and human freedom as anything other than illusion, the Calvinist answer is that since God as Creator is the author of justice* and since God's ways are not our ways, it is a fundamental category mistake to judge God at the bar of human and limited reason. The present report judges that each stance can find scriptural support, but that "both traditions have gone wrong when they have claimed to know too much about [the underlying] mystery of God's electing grace and of human freedom", instead of simply recognizing, receiving and celebrating the mystery.

On the consequent matter of sanctification,* the report again recognizes what Methodists and Reformed hold in common: both "affirm the real change which God by the Spirit works in the minds and hearts and lives of believers. By the sanctifying grace of God, penitent believers are being restored to God's image and renewed in God's likeness... In the two traditions we are taught to strive and pray for entire sanctification." The differences in emphasis are expressed thus: "The Reformed stress on election and perseverance gives believers the confidence that God will keep them to the end. The

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

Methodist preaching of perfection affirms that we may set no limit to the present power of God to make sinners into saints."

In many places, Methodists and Reformed have already entered into close relationships, including both federal and organic unions (see union, organic). Examples of unions according to varying models, sometimes including other traditions also, would be Canada (1925), Church of South India (1947), Zambia (1965), Belgium (1969), Church of North India (1970), Zaire (1970), Australia (1977), and Italy (1979). Recognizing that such unions were enacted only "after due doctrinal discussions", the 1987 report "affirms that there is sufficient agreement in doctrine and practice between our two positions to justify such answers to the Lord's call to unity for the sake of mission and our common praise of God". Further rapprochements may therefore responsibly be encouraged: "Our complementary ways of Christian thought and life are built upon a foundation in God's grace, in covenant existence, and in the goal of perfect salvation."

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

- I.H. Marshall, Kept by the Power of God: A Study of Perseverance and Falling Away, London, Epworth, 1969
- A. Sell, The Great Debate: Calvinism, Arminianism and Salvation, Grand Rapids MI, Baker, 1983
- "Together in God's Grace", Reformed World, Dec. 1987, and GinA-II
- G. Wainwright, On Wesley and Calvin: Sources for Theology, Liturgy and Spirituality, Melbourne, Uniting Church, 1987
- G. Wainwright, "Perfect Salvation in the Teaching of Wesley and Calvin", Reformed World, June 1988.

METHODIST-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

FOLLOWING the presence of Methodist observers at Vatican II,* the Vatican Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity* and the World Methodist Council* (WMC) made provision for an international dialogue to start in 1967. The joint commission between the WMC and the Roman Catholic Church has arranged its work in five-year periods so that its successive reports could be presented to its Methodist principals at the quinquennial gatherings of the WMC. While being simultaneously presented to the Vatican, they have informally become known by the place and date of the Methodist assembly: Denver 1971, Dublin 1976, Honolulu 1981, Nairobi 1986, Singapore 1991, Rio de Janeiro 1996, Brighton 2001.

Aimed at "growth in understanding", the first two reports ranged rather widely over the areas of mission* and evangelism,* social concern, moral and ecclesiastical discipline, and (particularly characteristic of this bilateral dialogue*) spirituality: Denver 1971 notes "the central place held in both traditions by the ideal of personal sanctification, growth in holiness through daily life in Christ". The most precisely treated topics were the eucharist* and ministry,* which were contemporaneously occupying also the Anglican-RC and Lutheran-RC dialogues as well as Faith and Order* in the approach to "Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry".* Catholics and Methodists agree that "a distinctive mode of the presence of Christ is mediated through the sacred elements of bread and wine, which within the eucharist are efficacious signs of the body and blood of Christ"; and yet a chief point of difference remains over the "change" which Catholics designate transubstantiation. Each party accepts an apostolic ministry of the ordained within the ministry of the whole church, yet "we differ in the account we give of apostolic succession": "Methodists are not in principle opposed to the ministry's being in the threefold form or in the historical succession; but they do not consider either of these to be necessary for the church or for the ministry."

A more concentrated thematization occurred with the third and fourth reports. Honolulu 1981 was entitled "Towards an Agreed Statement on the Holy Spirit". The commission was able to agree on the Trinitarian place of the Holy Spirit* and on the work of the Spirit in justification,* regeneration and sanctification,* recognizing "the Spirit's special office to maintain the divine initiative that precedes all human action and reaction". Perceiving that "the doctrine of the Holy Spirit underlies much of the ecumenical agenda", the commission developed the ecclesiological dimensions of the doctrine. In particular, it was here that the recurrent question of authority* was located: "The papal authority, no less than any other within the church, is a manifestation of the continuing presence of the Spirit of love in the church or it is nothing.”

Nairobi 1986 was entitled “Towards a Statement on the Church”. The notion of koinonia* (both communion and community) governs: “Because God so loved the world, he sent his Son and the Holy Spirit to draw us into communion with himself. This sharing in God’s life, which resulted from the mission of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, found expression in a visible koinonia of Christ’s disciples, the church.” Catholics and Methodists “are committed to a vision that includes the goal of full communion in faith, mission and sacramental life”. Recognizing that “an ecclesiology shaped in a time of division” cannot be entirely satisfactory, the report draws eclectically on various possible “ways of being one church” in the search for “a model of organic unity”. Differences remain over “structures of ministry”, particularly over whether a threefold form and a historic succession is necessary – and most particularly of all over a “Petrine office” of primacy,* jurisdiction and authoritative teaching as claimed by Rome. But “Catholics and Methodists are agreed on the need for an authoritative way of being sure, beyond doubt, concerning God’s action in so far as it is crucial for our salvation”.

Approaches to the ecclesiological questions of pastoral and doctrinal authority varied, it was realized, according to the more general theological framework in which they were set; and so the next two rounds in the dialogue were devoted to seeking common perspectives on “The Apostolic Tradition” (Singapore 1991) and, more basically yet, revelation and faith (Rio de Janeiro 1996, under the title “The Word of Life”). In these serene and comprehensive statements, the self-communication of God, its fruitful human reception, and its ecclesial transmission are all viewed according to a strongly Trinitarian pattern. Scripture is affirmed as the “permanent norm” of “the living Tradition” in which the Lord continues to visit his people through word and action (Singapore, 7-21). Special pastoral and prophetic functions are recognized within the community of “all those who, by their response to revelation and their inspiration through the creative love of God, participate in the active tradition of the gospel and compassionate discernment of the will of God for his church and the world” (Rio, 53-72). The Rio report concludes by suggesting that the directions have thereby been set for revisiting the themes of “the offices of oversight in the church and succession in them, and the offer made by Rome of a Petrine ministry in the service of unity and communion” (132).

During the next quinquennium the joint commission in fact concentrated on the theme of teaching authority.* For its report “Speaking the Truth in Love” (2001), the commission found in Ephesians 4 not only a title which “captures both the spirit in which the dialogue has proceeded and the result that is hoped for from it” but also the lineaments of a living organism of beliefs (vv.4-6), an indication of the diversity of compatible gifts and functions within the common vocation of the church (vv.7-11), a statement of the purpose of the teaching offices as the promotion of certainty and stability with respect to matters of belief (vv.12-14), and a hint (v.3) towards resumption of the pneumatological emphasis of the 1981 report. The 2001 report registered a wide measure of agreement in the substance of doctrine and even detected certain analogies between the procedures of each party for recognizing, discerning and responding to the truth of the gospel. Nevertheless, there were questions each side wished to put to the other for further exploration. Thus “Methodists ask Catholics why laypeople could not be more formally involved in decision-making bodies, even when authoritative discernment and teaching is concerned, sharing responsibility in some way with the bishops who nevertheless retain their special ministry of authoritative teaching” (79), and “Catholics ask Methodists why, in their understanding and practice of the conference, they do not more formally distinguish the role of ordained ministers, especially bishops and superintendents, particularly where authoritative discernment and teaching are concerned” (80).

When Methodists and Roman Catholics try to characterize their mutual discovery in this international dialogue as well as in national and local dialogues that are taking place at least in Britain (e.g., “Mary, Mother of the Lord, Sign of Grace, Faith and Holiness: Towards a Shared Understanding”,

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

1995), the USA and New Zealand, they often point to the fact that while they find themselves apart, they have never known the bitterness of a direct schism.* Catholics testify to a distinct Methodist “identity”. It seems that the two parties come closest when the Wesleyan character of Methodism is sharply profiled, for it is there that a scriptural and credal faith* comes to expression in sacramental life, in the search for personal and social holiness, and in an evangelistic and charitable concern for all humankind. The increased knowledge that each party has acquired of the other over recent decades will lead, it is hoped, to an increasingly satisfactory outcome concerning “the understanding that we both have of ourselves and of our partners in respect to the one church of Jesus Christ and the communion which belongs to the body of Christ” (Rio, 132; cf. Singapore, 99-101).

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

- M. Hurley ed., John Wesley's Letter to a Roman Catholic, London, Chapman, 1968
- M.S. Massa, “The Catholic Wesley: A Revisionist Prolegomenon”, Methodist History, 22, 1983-84
- H. Meyer & L. Vischer eds, Growth in Agreement, WCC, 1984 (for Denver, Dublin and Honolulu reports)
- OC, 22, 1986 (for the Nairobi report); 28, 1992 (for the Singapore report); 32, 1996 (for the Rio de Janeiro report), 37, 2002 (for the Brighton report)
- UMC, United States Catholic Conference Methodist-Catholic Dialogues: Thirty Years of Mission and Witness, Washington DC, US Catholic Conference, 2001
- G. Wainwright, Methodists in Dialogue, Nashville, Abingdon/Kingswood, 1995, chs 1-4.

MEYENDORFF, JOHN B.

B. 17. Feb. 1926, Neuilly-sur-Seine, France; d. 22 July 1992, Montreal, Canada. An outstanding Russian Orthodox theologian, church historian, patristic and Byzantine scholar, Meyendorff made a significant contribution to the ecumenical movement. He studied at St Sergius Orthodox Institute and the Sorbonne in Paris, where he defended his doctoral thesis on Gregory Palamas in 1958. Ordained in 1959, he left Europe for New York to teach patristics* and church history in the faculty of St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary. He became a member of the senior fellows' committee of Dumbarton Oaks (Harvard's Byzantine research centre) and taught Byzantine history at Fordham University, and in 1984 took up the post of dean of St Vladimir's, following two other prominent figures from St Sergius in that capacity: Georges Florovsky and Alexander Schmemmann. He retired only three weeks before his untimely death.

His ecumenical activity was exercised both within the Orthodox church and in the Christian world at large, thanks to his international reputation as a scholar and writer and his tireless commitment, engaging personality and exceptional intellectual honesty. He devoted much time and energy to the task of reconciling the Orthodox and, together with Florovsky and Schmemmann, took a prominent part in achieving the establishment of the autocephalous Orthodox Church in America in 1970. However, he never ceased to work for pan-Orthodox unity, travelling to Constantinople as well as to Russia (when that became possible in the last years of his life). He became a trusted friend of Patriarch Alexis II.

After retirement he intended to adapt his many books and his teaching to the dire needs of the Russian Orthodox Church. He was also active on the ecumenical scene, and received honorary doctorates from Notre Dame University, the General Theological Seminary in New York, and the Theological Academy of St Petersburg. He was moderator of the WCC's commission on Faith and Order* (1971-75) and a member of the WCC's central committee. His most important contribution to the ecumenical movement was to be found in the open manner in which, in his countless books, lectures and articles and in his personal contacts, he witnessed to an Orthodoxy* at once traditional, in the noblest sense of the word, and attentive to the needs of today, understood as a constant distinction between what is fundamental and what is secondary under the guidance of the Holy Spirit.*

NICHOLAS LOSSKY

■ D. Obolensky, "John Meyendorff (1926-92)", Sobornost incorporating Eastern Churches Review, 15, 2, 1993.

MIDDLE AXIOMS

THE EXPRESSION "middle axioms" was introduced by J.H. Oldham in the preparatory material for the 1937 Oxford conference of Life and Work,* as "an attempt to define the directions in which, in a particular state or society, Christian faith must express itself". The effort was to provide Christians and churches with an orientation for their participation in the life of society, concrete enough to give direction in specific situations without becoming a rigid law or ecclesiastical casuistry.

Theologically, the quest for such criteria originates, on the one hand, in the crisis of both the natural law* and the "creation orders" foundations for social ethics and, on the other hand, in the crisis of the idealism of the social gospel and the kingdom of God. Oldham locates this criterion in his distinction between an ethics of "ends" and an ethics of "inspiration" which struggles to discern God's marching orders for God's people at particular points in history. Siding with this second line, he tries to combine a strong Christological orientation to the lordship of Christ – closely bound to the biblical revelation* – and an understanding of the present conditions of society. In this double context he speaks of the church's "discerning the signs of the time and in each crisis of history fulfilling its appointed task". The Oxford conference received these criteria as "intermediate between the ultimate basis of Christian action in community [the law of love] which is too general to give much concrete guidance for action – and the unguided intuition of the individual conscience". Oxford did not elaborate or extensively exemplify this notion. It seems to be used implicitly in the critical assessment of the conditions of the time in relation to the state and the political realm (and to a lesser degree the economic and racial question). Some fundamental dialectics of freedom*/order* or freedom*/justice* seem to serve as guide for the discernment of these middle axioms.

Middle axioms (or "concrete utopia", as others preferred to characterize such criteria) found more definite formulations in the context of the responsible society,* developed after Amsterdam 1948. In a significant analogy, they have been compared with anchors and compasses "required for successful navigation. Compasses help those at sea to get their bearings and anchors help to minimize drift in troubled waters." Although there is little reference to these axioms in recent ecumenical discussions, the question which this category addresses is still present, and the distinction and relation which liberation theology establishes between the terms "utopia", "historical project" and "political programme" point, in a different theological context, to an analogous question.

See also ethics, society.

JOSE MÍGUEZ BONINO

■ C.-H. Grenholm, Christian Social Ethics in a Revolutionary Age, Uppsala, Verbum, 1973 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft & J.H. Oldham eds, The Church and Its Function in Society, vol. 1, London, Allen & Unwin, 1937.

MIDDLE EAST

IN A DESIGNATION derived from the modern geopolitical language, Christians of the Arab world, Cyprus, Iran and Turkey are referred to as Middle Eastern. Only a few among the 10 million who continue to live in the region call themselves as they are often called in the Western world. They prefer their historical names, whether reflecting a salient ethnic and cultural particularity (Armenian, Assyrian etc.) or meant to specify primarily a linguistic, liturgical and ecclesial tradition (Copts, Syrians etc.). They are Orthodox, not always disclosing whether they are Chalcedonian, non-Chalcedonian or Catholic but, with the exception of the “Latins”, making clear that they are not “Roman” or Protestant.

Most Christians in the region ally their ecclesial affiliation with their nationality. But this association is not entirely free from ambiguity, except in the cases of the Copts in Egypt and the Maronites in Lebanon. Unlike the others, their historical territory coincides largely with that of their modern nations.

Christians in the Arab world often present themselves, and are portrayed, as “Arab Christians”. Notwithstanding its ambiguity, this inclusive name has fewer disadvantages than “Christian Arabs” or “Christians of the East”. Depicting oneself as a Christian Arab highlights an identity shared with Muslims but antecedent to Islam. This appellation proposes to transcend religious differences through a return to the origins but risks falling into a narrow and exclusive nationalism. For all the Christians are not the descendants of Arab tribes Christianized before Islam. A large number of Christians of diverse origins went, until the 13th century, through a process of arabization.

The “Christians of the East” denomination is claimed by many as a sign of authenticity and specificity in relation to Western Christianity. But this general label fails to avoid the inevitable problem of delineating the frontiers, whether geographical, cultural or political. Moreover, the reference to the “Christian East” (in a way similar to the “East” of the Orientalists) could be an invitation to visit the past, ignoring the present. Dead Christians sometimes seem to have a more interesting story to tell than that of the living, who may be seen as vestiges, archaic witnesses or symbols, unworthy descendants of their illustrious ancestors.

The history of Christianity in the Middle East is, since the 1st century, a history of diversity manifested in the course of evangelization originating in Jerusalem, the spiritual pole of three continents: Asia, Africa and Europe. Christian Arabs, Arameans, Copts, Hellenes or Hellenized were split, as of the 5th century and through the interplay of doctrinal divergences, cultural particularisms and political conflicts, into three distinct confessions. The Arab Christian tradition, as well as Islamic historiography, refers to Nestorians, Melkites and Jacobites. While cultural and religious identities of the three communities shaped by rivalries and opposition drove them apart, their progressive cultural arabization favoured exchange and interaction. In spite of their theological differences, the common language of their elites, beyond being a medium of communication, played a role of unification comparable, mutatis mutandis, to Greek in earlier Christianity and Latin in later Western Christianity.

CHRISTIAN COMMUNITIES

In the eyes of the Muslims, Christianity in the “Abode of Islam” was one community, yet this perception was often overshadowed by an image of competing and conflicting sects. Christians saw, and still see, themselves torn between their confessional self-understanding, rooted in pre-Islamic history, and a Christian identity largely conditioned by the encounter with Islam.

The Nestorians, as they were called, or more properly the Assyrian Church of the East, were absent at the council of Ephesus (431). A Christian community of Persia caught in the conflict between the Byzantines and the Sassanides, they chose to project a “national” image. Their cultural identity largely favoured their adhesion in 484 to Nestorianism. Not being suspected of sympathy towards Byzantium, they were also perceived by the Islamic Abbasid state, more than two centuries later, as bearers of a Christology closer to Islam than that of other Christians. They played a remarkable role in the formative period of Arab-Islamic civilization. Having also known a formidable missionary expansion in central Asia and the Indian sub-continent in the 8th and 9th centuries, they suffered losses, after a short-lived favourable situation, following the Mongol invasion. Because the Nestorians were weakened by internal dissensions, the Catholic missionaries succeeded in establishing a Chaldean church united with Rome (1553). They were weakened further by the Protestant missions since 1831. Most cruel, however, was the 20th century, when they lost almost two-thirds of their faithful in a series of massacres. Many of them were condemned to dispersion and exile following unkept Russian and British promises of a national homeland and accumulated hatred against them by their Arab-Muslim neighbours, who saw them as local instruments of foreign powers.

The Rum-Orthodox or Greek Orthodox, identified in ecumenical circles as Eastern Orthodox, did not retain the name "Melkite". Only the Greek-Catholic (Uniate) church continues to use the attribute, whose original meaning in Syriac is "royalist", given to those who were faithful to the emperor (melek), who convened the council of Chalcedon (451). Grouped in three patriarchates – Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem – they corresponded, in the 5th century, to the relatively more Hellenized faction of Christianity. But in Syria and Palestine they were equally anchored in the Arab ethnicity. In spite of their religious and cultural links with Byzantium, they were able to adapt to the new Arab-Islamic order and made a significant contribution to the nascent state. Their arabization was subsequently accelerated at the expense of Greek and Syriac. The Ottoman conquest associated them intimately with other Orthodox churches. They became part of the Rum millet (i.e. nation), whose head is the patriarch of Constantinople. Latin missionaries were able to divide them, creating a Greek-Catholic patriarchate in 1724. In their attempt to resist Catholic, and subsequently Protestant, pressures, they counted on Greek and, later, Russian support. They regained their full independence and engaged actively in the modern movement of Arab revival (Nahda).

The Oriental Orthodox, or non-Chalcedonian Orthodox churches, constitute one ecclesial family, although each member has its own personality and liturgical language.

After a period of Byzantine persecutions, the Syrians, formerly labelled as Jacobites by their Chalcedonian opponents, experienced a remarkable development in the early 7th century following the Sassanide conquest of eastern Byzantine provinces. They were able, later and under Islamic rule, to contribute significantly to a cultural growth crucial to Arab-Islamic civilization. The decline of their influence started, however, during the second half of the 9th century. With the exception of an improvement during the aftermath of the Mongol invasion, the deterioration of their conditions continued. Under the Ottomans, they did not constitute a millet of their own but had to relate to the state through the Armenian patriarch of Constantinople. Throughout the 16th and 17th centuries, they were weakened by internal dissensions, provoked and exploited by Ottoman interventions and Western missionary activity. In 1656 a Syrian-Catholic church was constituted. In the 19th century they suffered from the backlash of the Russian advance into Ottoman territory and the emancipation movements in the Balkans. The treaty of Lausanne (1923) establishing the frontiers of today's Turkey did not count the Syrian community among recognized minorities. A number of Syrian Orthodox of Turkey joined their co-religionists in Syria and Lebanon. But a movement of emigration to Australia, the USA and Scandinavia reduced more substantially their numbers in Turkey and, to a lesser extent, in Syria and Lebanon.

The Copts are by far the largest Christian community in the Arab world. The links between their culture and that of ancient Egypt go beyond mere ethnic continuity. Egyptian Christianity, whose history goes back to Mark the evangelist, flourished in the 3rd century. Towards the end of the century, Copts suffered strong persecution, with monasticism developing soon after. Both martyrdom and desert spirituality shaped the Coptic religious consciousness. After 451 the non-Chalcedonian faith manifested itself as a sort of national religion. A Coptic particularism, nurtured by anti-Byzantine feelings, explains an attitude towards the Islamic conquest varying from passivity to welcome. The conditions of the Copts deteriorated, and their numbers decreased from the second half of the 9th century until the early 19th century. With the modernizing policy of Muhammad Ali (viceroy of Egypt, 1805-48), they regained a significant role in the life of the Egyptian nation. But the 19th century also witnessed the expansion of Catholic and Protestant missions. A Coptic Catholic church was created in 1899, and in 1926 a Coptic Protestant church achieved independence from Presbyterian missions. Following the British occupation of Egypt in 1882, the Coptic involvement in what became the national movement gained great momentum.

The Armenians have been in the Arab world since the massacres of 1915 that drove them away from their ancestral lands in Cilicia. Although partially arabized, they integrated fully into the life of the various countries in the region. An Armenian Catholic Church, constituted in 1740, and an Armenian Evangelical Union, established in 1846, grew out of missionary activity both in historical Armenia and in the diaspora.

The Catholic communities, whose history goes back to the early phases of missionary activity in the Ottoman empire, are often pejoratively called Uniates. With the exception of the Chaldean church, they are less important numerically than their "mother churches", although their influence outweighs their numbers. They strive to see themselves, and be seen, as deeply rooted in the East and firmly united with Rome. Having been held up as a model for unity between East and West, they see their legitimacy under serious question in the Catholic church itself, let alone in its dialogue with Orthodoxy. Often perceived by the Orthodox as an obstacle towards rapprochement, many among them affirm, but without much success so far, a role as bridge-builders.

In addition to the five united communities (Chaldean, Syrian-Catholic, Greek-Catholic, Armenian-Catholic and Coptic-Catholic), there are two Catholic communities whose history diverts from the above described pattern.

The Maronites trace their history to the figure of the great monk Maro (d. 407), and their nuclear group to a monastic community in the patriarchate of Antioch. Although Syriac-speaking, they chose the camp of Chalcedon but subsequently followed Emperor Heracles in his attempt to reunify Chalcedonians and non-Chalcedonians through the monothelite compromise. Having thus become a distinct community, they elected their own patriarch of Antioch in the early 8th century. Their contact with the crusaders is decisive in their history. In 1182 they came under the jurisdiction of Rome. They played a major role in the formation of modern Lebanon.

The Latin community comprises primarily Palestinian Arabs. Its history goes back to the crusades,* when the Franks appointed a Latin patriarch to replace the Byzantine. In 1291 the last Latin patriarch was drowned when Acre was retaken from the crusaders. But the Latin presence was maintained through the Franciscan custody of the holy land, and in 1847 the Latin patriarchate was re-established to safeguard the Catholic rights in the holy land. Its main objective was not to constitute a community of faithful, but such a community was formed through the patriarchate and its institutions.

The influence of the various Protestant churches, established in the 19th century by American and European missionaries, cannot be measured only by their (small) numerical size. Their numerous social and educational institutions played, and continue to play, a role beyond the borders of their communities. Their denominational distinctives, often unrecognized in the eyes of other Christians, were increasingly relativized in favour of a more inclusive Protestant ("Evangelical") identity. But many Middle East Protestants are aware that their self-assertion as Protestants perpetuates their alienation from the original communities to which they belonged. Encouraged by their partner churches in the West, they have contributed significantly to the genesis and development of ecumenism.

THE ECUMENICAL SITUATION

The emergence and growth of the ecumenical movement in the 20th century and the dilemmas it faces at the beginning of the new century invite a critical examination in the light of three changing realities.

The first concerns the increasing interactions and exchanges between Christians. Borderlines between Christian communities are not always clearly delineated. A greater social intercourse, leading in some countries to a significant rise in mixed marriages (esp. in Lebanon), favours a popular and impatient ecumenism. Seen by a significant number of laypeople as primarily an encounter between persons and local communities or groups, such ecumenism de-emphasizes doctrine and ecclesiology while advocating unrestricted cooperation as well as intercommunion. Concomitantly, however, the confessional and ecclesial identities continue to shape global community relations. In many instances, a re-awakened self-consciousness, religious or cultural-social-political, vies with the enthusiastic pursuit of Christian solidarity and the search for a common witness. Ecumenical thinking, initiative-taking and activities are thus torn between a practical, non-doctrinal imperative and that of a heightened ecclesial consciousness.

The second reality pertains to the effects of worldwide ecumenical relations on the regional or national scene. Since its inception, the ecumenical movement has been at the convergence of an internal dynamic of renewal in the churches and an external stimulation. Renewal movements within the various churches were the primary ecumenical forces, but the churches as a whole would not have engaged in the pursuit of ecumenism had they not been encouraged by the spirit and policies of rapprochement between Christians which prevailed throughout the world in the 1960s and the 1970s, which provided the institutional support they needed to set in place the instruments for ecumenical work. Such external impetuses may be ending, in so far as international tensions set limits to what can be achieved ecumenically between local churches in the nations or regions of the Middle East. These churches take seriously their communion with their mother and sister churches.

The third reality touches on the relations of Christians to their Muslim fellow citizens and neighbours. The ecumenical commitment, in its early phase, was marked by a concern for Christian witness in society. Christians affirmed their loyalty to their nations and upheld their great causes. They strove to express their solidarity with the victims of injustice beyond the confines of the Christian community and sought to strengthen the bonds that united them, in a dialogue of life, with their Muslim neighbours. This commitment, however, could not by itself totally remove the historically determined attitudes of fear, self-isolation and concern for survival felt in some Muslim communities. Subsequent political developments have seemed to reverse the situation. No one can ignore the present disquiet of many Christians caused by the multiplying effect of an increasingly unfavourable demography, the political and economic failures of national states and movements, and the fear of intolerance and fanaticism associated with the mounting Islamic radicalism.

In this context, ecumenism could be overcome by a preoccupation with Christian survival. An alarmist and exaggerated self-centred preoccupation, far from dissipating unease, might accelerate the realization of what Christians fear, leading to the disastrous alternatives of ghetto or emigration.

While the ecumenical movement cannot ignore its obligation to preserve and strengthen a visible Christian presence in the Middle East, it equally must not lose sight of the meaning of a church presence. Such a presence, to paraphrase Antiochian Orthodox Patriarch Ignatius IV, implies patience but also courage, not in reacting or asserting ethnic and linguistic particularism in a conservatism of survival, but searching for the Christian identity in rediscovering the church's vocation.

See also Middle East Council of Churches.

TAREK MITRI

- R.B. Betts, Christians in the Arab East, London, SPCK, 1979
- J. Corbon, L'Église des Arabes, Paris, Cerf, 1977
- K. Cragg, The Arab Christian: A History in the Middle East, London, Mowbray, 1992
- R. Haddad, Syrian Christians in Muslim Society, Princeton NJ, Princeton UP, 1970
- J. Hajjar, Les chrétiens uniates du Proche-Orient, Paris, Seuil, 1962
- J. Joseph, The Nestorians and Their Muslim Neighbors, Princeton NJ, Princeton UP, 1961
- T. Mitri, "Who Are the Christians of the Arab World", IRM, 89, 352, 2000
- A. Pacini ed., Christian Communities in the Arab Middle East: The Challenge of the Future, Oxford, Clarendon, 1998
- J.-P. Valognes, Vie et mort des chrétiens d'Orient, Paris, Fayard, 1994
- A. Wessels, Arab and Christian?, Kampen, Kok Pharos, 1995.

MIDDLE EAST COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

THE ECUMENICAL movement was a reality among the churches of the Middle East* long before the emergence of the word "ecumenism" in this century. This was because of the attempts they made to recover their unity that had been damaged by the divisions in the Middle East during the first centuries of Christianity. Some 12 million Christians live in the region, despite divisions and external challenges, and witness on behalf of world Christianity, linking it historically with its origin.

An important milestone in the history of the ecumenical movement in the Middle East was the establishment of the Middle East Council of Churches (MECC) in 1974 as the successor to the largely Protestant and Episcopal Near East Council of Churches, formed ten years earlier. In 1990, the seven Roman Catholic churches of the region became the fourth church family to join the membership of MECC, thus making it the ecumenical representative of the great majority of Christians of the region.

The continuity of Christian presence in the Middle East is secured by Middle East Christians in the land where our Lord was born and lived, a land that was sanctified by the blood of apostles, saints and martyrs (see martyrdom). For this reason, the MECC is committed to promoting spiritual renewal and dialogue between the churches of the region, and aims at helping them strengthen their unity and common witness. It also calls upon churches all over the world to support and enable Middle East Christians and churches to live in their lands in freedom and actively to participate with other religious communities in developing their nations and societies towards a just peace.

The MECC is organized along the lines of “families” of churches rather than on the basis of individual church membership. Three families – Oriental Orthodox, Eastern Orthodox and Protestant/Episcopal – were founding members. In 1988, the seven Catholic churches of the region (from different ethnic and cultural origins) decided to join and in 1990 they were unanimously received into the MECC membership as the fourth family of churches. Virtually all Middle Eastern Christians are now represented in the MECC. The membership now includes the following “families” of churches: (a) the Oriental Orthodox: the Coptic, Armenian of Cilicia and Syrian of Antioch, (b) the Eastern (Greek) Orthodox: the patriarchates of Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem and the archbishopric of Cyprus, (c) the Catholic: the Maronite of Antioch, the Syrian of Antioch, the Coptic, the Armenian of Cilicia, the Latin of Jerusalem, the Chaldean of Babylon, the Greek Catholic of Antioch (Melchite), and (d) the Evangelical (Protestant) and Episcopal: the National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon, the National Evangelical Church of Beirut, the Coptic Evangelical Church Synod of the Nile, the Evangelical Presbyterian Church of Iran, the Union of the Armenian Evangelical Churches in the Near East, the Evangelical Church in Sudan, the Presbyterian Church in Sudan, the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Jordan, the Episcopal Church of Jerusalem and the Middle East, the Episcopal Church in Sudan

The overarching goal of the MECC is Christian unity – unity in diversity. The programme priorities of the MECC reflect the collective concerns of Middle Eastern churches as well as a conscious response to the challenges of the region.

Christian presence in the Middle East is the historical and geographical continuation of the saving work of the Lord Jesus Christ as that is incarnated in this region. It provides the region’s people and people throughout the world with a model for how to live a life of dialogue in an environment which is highly pluralistic. This model is built upon the example and testimony of those who first preached the Christian gospel and bore their unique witness in the world. Christians in the Middle East are heirs to a unique Christian heritage that has been shaped through long experience of interacting with many significant ancient cultures – Aramaean, Hebraic, Egyptian, Hellenic, Roman, Persian, Armenian, Turkish and Arabic. As we enter the third millennium, Middle Eastern Christians continue to contribute cultural and spiritual richness to their region. By focusing on ecumenical formation and spirituality, and providing alternatives to emigration, the MECC is committed to a Christian presence that is qualitatively valuable, meaningful and necessary.

When the church addresses issues of human worth, human dignity, meaning and value it begins with the human being as a spiritual being with spiritual aspirations and needs. These directly relate to all areas of human existence – economic, political, technological, educational, social, aesthetic and vocational. Justice, peace and human rights are key concerns of the Council. On the basis of the Christian faithfulness to the gospel, the MECC has always tried to avoid passiveness on issues where justice and truth must be expressed. It has always been guided by its concern for human beings and the defence of their rights and obligations. Member churches have diligently voiced their position that “justice presupposes dignity for all and is itself contingent on the eradication of violence, extremism, fanaticism and intellectual or physical terrorism. We call on and seek to strengthen the spirit of understanding, mutual respect and trust for peace among or between all communities, people or nations.”

Faith motivates the MECC and the churches of the Middle East to participate in cultivating an open civil society. The MECC itself mirrors civil society* in that it is the product of a dialogue among the churches in the Middle East, a dialogue that does not exclude their friends in the West. Faced with the choice of limiting their activity only to a sacramental ministry that shapes an inward-turning, isolationist frame of mind, or of engaging in the wider dimensions of civil society, the churches have chosen the latter. Churches and church-related organizations in the Middle East have a worthy and sustained record of service to the whole community. This has led to a healthy engagement with other religious communities, with NGOs and with the society at large. In the process of this engagement, many church-related organizations are becoming more open, accepting input from people outside the specific community that initially launched the group. The Council helps different groups to network and pool resources, and will continue its work on dialogue, citizenship, equality and freedom particularly through its charter membership in the Arab working group on Muslim-Christian dialogue embodied in “Christian and Muslims Together – a Charter for a Dialogue of Life and Common Action”, adopted in 2001.

The Council is sharply aware of the globalization of economy and its dramatic effects on the labour market. Whole networks – from labour procurers to local placement agencies – are now fully developed, and are all too often tied in with the same networks that handle the “flesh trade” in illegal asylum-seekers and refugees. Migrant workers and labourers are now a standard feature in virtually all Middle Eastern countries, even some of the poorest. Globalization is also manifested in political violence and wars exceeding the bounds of governments and local societies. The global war on terrorism has blurred the lines between legitimate resistance to occupation and gratuitous violence – a glaring example of which is the situation in Palestine. Within its units and programmes, the Council gives priority to and lays greater stress upon understanding and challenging globalization in its various aspects. Serious concern has been expressed for how to sustain the integrity of indigenous culture and the heritage of the churches at a time when cultures are undergoing creative (or disruptive) change. In the spirit of diakonia, the MECC is committed to serving the poor, the oppressed, the marginalized, the refugee, the displaced and the migrant, regardless of identity, colour, creed or ideological orientation.

Of particular concern to the MECC in recent years has been the increased activity in the region of Western Evangelical and fundamentalist Christians. The MECC undertook a number of initiatives seeking to explain the misunderstandings caused by the actions of these groups, and in doing so it has received significant response from Western Christians collectively and cooperatively to address these issues.

In order for spiritual renewal and ecumenical understanding and cooperation to reach churches, both the leadership and the parish members, the MECC lends great importance to communication. It publishes and distributes a number of bulletins and magazines (in Arabic, English and French) that promote understanding of the image and role of the Council among the public, in the region and globally. Furthermore, the MECC has set up a website with detailed information, reports and contact details for the Council.

The general assembly, executive committee and programme commissions/committees are composed of the same number of delegates from the four families of member churches. The general secretary and associates from the families of churches often act as directors of programme units and coordinate them. Four heads of churches from the four member church families are presidents of the MECC. The head office is in Beirut, Lebanon. Liaison offices are located in Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Jerusalem and Cyprus. Seven general

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

assemblies have been held since its founding.

LEOPOLDO NILIUS and RIAD JARJOUR

■ The Middle East Council of Churches: An Introduction, Limassol, MECC, 1995

MIGRANT CHURCHES

THE MULTIPLICATION of migrant churches is a new development in the history of European Christianity and deeply changes its constituency. Whereas the first waves of immigrants after the second world war were mostly adherents of well-known world religions such as Islam and Hinduism, today the majority of immigrants from the Caribbean, Africa and Asia to Europe are Christians. There is a growing "black Christianity" affirmed as such on a previously "white" continent. This new balance of immigrants reflects exponential church growth in the countries of origin during the past decades, whereas the urge to emigrate in general arises from the collapse of social, economic and political systems. It is strengthened by the hope of finding better living conditions in Europe.

Integration of Christian immigrants from the South in European historical churches occurs in many ways, but there is a general preference for the creation of independent prayer cells and local congregations, for several reasons: the initiative of migrant leaders who cannot meet the Western canons of church ministry or who simply claim to have received a special calling; ethnic and linguistic affinities; loyalty to a modern Christian denomination (mainly with Pentecostal or Evangelical leanings); and, most significantly, love for a specific inculturation of Christianity dearly obtained in the original African, Caribbean or Asian context. Another incentive is the example of and competition with non-Christian networks and organizations of immigrants accepted by the civil society and sometimes recognized by the state. Christian immigrants do not want to be left behind.

Some observers explain the creation of migrant churches as a reaction to white European racism. As a matter of fact, black Christian foreigners are not always welcome in European congregations, despite official exhortations or motions by synods against racism (Netherlands Reformed Church, general synod 1992: "Racism Is Sin"; Reformed Church of France, national synod 1998: "Welcoming Foreigners"). However, the frustrating experience of racism does not in itself provide believers with strong enough institutional incentives. To found a church requires a definite church model, for instance congregationalism, which is sustained by a high cultural self-consciousness.

Many ecumenical problems arise from the multiplication of migrant churches in Europe. Mainline churches accustomed to ecumenical dialogue with well-known partners will be forced to open new consultations with unknown church bodies belonging to other Christian traditions, often imbued with high missionary principles. The Roman Catholic episcopates have set up a pastoral network for migrants, whereas Protestant churches tend to accept migrant churches as new organizations in their own right (Evangelical Church in Germany, pastoral note on ecumenical cooperation with congregations of foreign origin or language, 1996; Federation of Evangelical Churches in Italy, Being the Church Together project, 1990-98). On their part, migrant churches have created national and international networks in order to foster cooperation, organize ministerial formation, and strengthen their identity (SKIN in the Netherlands; European meetings of the African Christian diaspora*).

MARC SPINDLER

■ Ethnicity, Migration and the Unity of the Church: Reformed Experience and Perspective, Geneva, John Knox, 1995 ■ R. Gerloff ed., "Open Space: The African Christian Diaspora in Europe and the Quest for Human Community" (= IRM, 89, 354, 2000) ■ M. Spindler & A. Lenoble-Bart eds, Chrétiens d'outre-mer en Europe: Un autre visage de l'immigration, Paris, Karthala, 2000 ■ G. ter Haar, Halfway to Paradise: African Christians in Europe, Cardiff, Cardiff Academic Press, 1998.

MIGRATION

WHETHER they leave their country for reasons of economic survival or to escape persecution, migrants are "uprooted" people. After the wrench of parting from their country, they experience the pain of its loss. In most cases they try, singly or in groups, to maintain their identity – so indispensable for facing the future, whether adapting themselves to the new society, becoming integrated in it, or perhaps preparing for an eventual return. In 2000 the number of migrants worldwide was estimated at 150 million, of whom 15 million were recognized as refugees.*

Migration affects all continents, with a particular concentration in certain regions, such as Brazil, Central America/USA, Haiti, Mozambique, the Middle East, Philippines and the Mediterranean basin. The main routes for migrant workers, however, run from South to North, from the poor countries to the industrialized countries.

A differentiation must be made between refugees and migrants. Refugees are migrants who, for security reasons, cannot return home. They are thus entitled to an appropriate legal status. Migrants are those who have left their countries in search of economic survival and a viable future for themselves and their children. The purpose of migration is no longer to people "empty" territories, as during the first half of the 20th century. Both refugees and migrants, however, always experience a deterioration of rights, civil and political, economic and social, or even national (e.g. of minorities*).

In theory, economic migrants are moved to migrate for personal reasons. Their departure is said to be a voluntary choice. In reality, most economic migration is due to two main factors: (1) the need for a labour force, a demand and sometimes even a search organized more or less clandestinely by the industrial or the industrializing countries; (2) under-development in countries which are "pools of labour" but which do not offer survival or prospects, or the decent and full life to which every human being can aspire. The contrast between wealth and poverty and the combination of the "push-pull" effect naturally results in the creation of migratory currents. It is difficult, therefore, to argue that migrant workers are acting freely. Rather, they are often forced by economic conditions to leave their countries.

The economic crises of the 1970s and 1990s, the effects of the subsequent restructuring of enterprises and the use of new technologies have led governments to impose severe restrictions on immigration. Yet the need for a compliant, flexible and cheap labour force remains; it engenders an "irregular" or "illegal" migration and the existence of masses of workers without rights who are often exploited. As governments make it more difficult for people to enter their territories legally, migrants are increasingly forced to turn to traffickers to smuggle them across borders. Trafficking in human beings – and particularly trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation – has become big business, now surpassing even the illicit trade in narcotic drugs. For the migrant, using the services of traffickers is often seen as the only way to escape poverty and move to a country where it is possible to find employment. But stories abound of the abuse of migrants at the hands of traffickers. In addition, the presence and inevitable integration of migrants who have put down roots provokes xenophobic and racist reactions in many places. Racial and xenophobic violence directed at foreigners is increasing dramatically, not only in Europe but also in countries such as Indonesia, Lebanon and South Africa. The deliberate achievement of multi-cultural societies is still difficult.

Whether we like it or not, foreigners constitute a mirror in which societies and churches can see their own reflections. Our behaviour towards them, individually and collectively, shows clearly how we measure up to principles of equality, justice* and respect for the human person in practice and not simply in theory. Their presence constitutes a call to solidarity, justice and respect for human rights within a profoundly unjust world. They are a challenge to civilization and culture.*

Diakonia* is thus called to recognize a new dimension of service. If it is to be more than mere rhetoric, it must tackle the causes of injustice and exploitation, demanding the universal application of legal and social protection to all people without exception. These dimensions affect the economy, collective behaviour and even the political field, for which many Christian communities find themselves poorly prepared.

Some churches and movements, however, have not remained indifferent. The Christian Conference of Asia has called in particular for a struggle against the exploitation of women and support for migrant organizations; the National Christian Council of Japan has supported the defence of Kore-ans against racial discrimination; in Lesotho the churches have made concerted efforts in favour of the defence and education of exploited mine workers in South Africa; in the USA, the “undocumented” workers who have crossed the Mexican border are given special legal and social support by certain churches. In Europe there is a fairly developed conscience within the churches, and efforts are concentrated on three main fronts: legal protection, the struggle against discrimination and pastoral care. A particular emphasis from 2000 onwards has been to put demands for migrants’ rights in the context of the broader struggle against racism.

The study of the WCC’s responsibility in the area of migration was recommended by the central committee in 1956. The third assembly (New Delhi 1961) and the Church and Society conference (Geneva 1966) each called for special campaigns. This call led to the creation of the secretariat for migration within the WCC’s Commission on Inter-Church Aid, Refugee and World Service, which, among other activities, published Migration Today. In 1999, as a result of WCC re-structuring, the work of the migration secretariat was incorporated into the International Relations team. In Europe the Churches Commission on Migrants in Europe (CCME) was created to encourage greater church engagement with migrants and to advocate on their behalf. In recent years CCME’s mandate has expanded to include refugees and displaced people as well as those uprooted in Central and Eastern Europe.

In 1995 the central committee “challenged member churches to protect and promote respect for all uprooted people: refugees, internally displaced persons and migrants... to take action to address the root causes of forced displacement... and to accompany uprooted people, by providing diaconal services, support and solidarity without discrimination”. The churches were also called to mark 1997 as a year of churches in solidarity with uprooted people; many churches throughout the world responded with special initiatives to raise awareness about the needs of migrants, refugees and displaced persons.

See migrant churches.

ANDRÉ JACQUES and ELIZABETH G. FERRIS

MILITARISM/MILITARIZATION

THE TERM “militarism” usually refers to a stockpiling of armaments, a growing role of the military in national and international affairs, the use of force as an instrument of political power, and a dominant influence of the military in civilian affairs. International relations (see international order) are increasingly viewed as power relations to be determined militarily, and the influence of the military and the use of force have become more common internally. “Militarism” is used with different connotations in different parts of the world and is too often applied in political and ideological discourse without precise definition. Historically the term has been used to describe well-known phenomena such as Bonapartism, the rise of German imperial strength, the ascendancy of Japan or some fascist variants of expansionist regimes. These models are inadequate for a deeper understanding and analysis of contemporary militarism, both in the third world and in the developed countries, capitalist and socialist.

The fifth assembly of the WCC (Nairobi 1975) called upon the churches and the WCC to “raise consciousness about the dangers of militarism and search for creative ways of educating for peace”. The consultation on militarism organized by the WCC’s Commission of the Churches on International Affairs (Glion, Switzerland, 1977), the first ecumenical consultation specifically on the theme, said: “Militarization should be understood as the process whereby military values, ideology and patterns of behaviour achieve a dominating influence on the political, social and economic affairs of the state and as a consequence the structural, ideological and behavioural patterns of both the society and government are militarized. Militarism should be seen as one of the more perturbing results of this process.”

While militarism is in no way confined to the third world, the major ecumenical concerns have centred on the spread of militarism there. A number of third-world countries are ruled by military regimes; many others display a process of militarization. Contributing factors to militarism in third-world countries have included super-power competition, the creation and maintenance of spheres of influence, the use of the army as the primary agent for modernization, and the failure of democratic governments to provide order* and justice.* A disquieting trend of militarism in many third-world countries has been para-militarization, which is an intensive and systematic use of civilians for repression.

The statement on "Peace and Justice" by the sixth assembly of the WCC (Vancouver 1983) said: "Through the Council's work on militarism since the fifth assembly we have come to understand more fully the dire consequences for justice of the increasing reliance of the nations on armed forces as the cornerstone of their foreign – and often domestic – policies. Justice is often sacrificed on the altar of narrowly perceived national security interests."

On the national level, militarization leads to the concentration of power, the weakening of democratic governments, the violation of human rights and the institution of authoritarian rule. Militarily it promotes armaments, including the development, acquisition and deployment of new weapon systems. Economically it tends to give preference to military expenditures, thus impeding efforts for development.

In countries where military leaders hold the reins of political power, their control is routinely associated with violations of basic human and political rights, including torture, brutality, disappearances and political killing.

In countries where the armed forces once enjoyed a dominant and organized political position, true demilitarization is often difficult, for the armed forces frequently attempt to influence the successor government. And the possibility of re-intervention is always present. However, in some Latin American countries the failure of the military regimes, the constraints of the adjustment programmes and the armies' experience of their own internal corruption in the exercise of government have reduced the danger of military intervention and led to a search for a new role for the armies. A new danger of corruption and intervention exists, however, in the attempt, stimulated by the USA, to give a role to the armies in the so-called war against drugs.

There are several problems in the transition from military regimes to civilian governments. Constitutional guarantees and civil rights may be re-established in an effort to maintain the new, fragile government, yet repressive laws of the former regime have often been retained. Human rights* advocates, including the churches, often find themselves in a dilemma because too much pressure on the government may bring back the military. This possibility exists because of uncertainty about the role of the military in the new context, as well as the desire of the military not to be punished for its misdeeds during the previous regime.

An important factor to be taken into account is a new self-understanding of the role of the military. Even in countries where democratic transformation has taken place, the influence of the military is considerable and often a continuing threat. Military involvement in civilian areas of life is often not easy to reverse.

Advances in military technology and violent ethno-nationalist conflicts (see ethnic conflicts), some of them leading to genocide and so-called ethnic cleansing, have added new dimensions to militarism. Perhaps more significant are the implications of the Gulf war. The tendency to absolutize the enemy with the insistence on total victory as the only acceptable outcome, the susceptibility of the UN to militarist diplomacy and the legitimization of war as a means of politics – all have given new meaning to militarism.

NINAN KOSHY

- A. Eide & M. Thee eds, Problems of Contemporary Militarism, London, Croom Helm, 1988
- R. Falk, "The Gulf War and the Death of Democracy", in The Multiverse of Democracy, D.L. Sheth & A. Nandy eds, New Delhi, Sage, 1996
- Report of the CCIA Consultation on Militarism and Disarmament, WCC, 1989
- "Report of the Consultation on Militarism, 1977", CCIA Background Information, 1977
- A. Toffler & H. Toffler, War and Anti-War: Survival at the Dawn of the Twenty-first Century, London, Warner, 1994
- J.-A. Viera Gallo ed., The Security Trap, Rome, IDOC, 1979.

MILLENNIALISM

IN CHRISTIAN eschatology* "millennialism" refers to belief in a millennium (Latin), a thousand years of "the last days" on earth before the final judgment. The conviction is based on biblical prophecies interpreted as predictions, e.g. Dan. 2 and, with the only explicit mention of the number 1000, Rev. 20:1-6.

TERMS

The questions are perennial, but today virtually only Protestant Evangelicals* and Pentecostals,* especially fundamentalists,* highlight them and dispute over the answers: In the relation between historical time and God's eternal realm, how does a Christian read God's plan according to God's calendar? When and where will be Christ's second coming, the parousia? What will be the condition then of the world and the human community? What is the nature of "the thousand years" and the reign of Christ with his saints?

The prefixes to the word "millennium" indicate general responses in church history. In the post-millennial view, Christ returns after the historical thousand years; for pre-millennialists, Christ returns before, to introduce the earthly millennium. Advocates study world events and trends, reacting either in benevolent optimism (post-millennialists) or in dire pessimism (pre-millennialists) to the fulfilments each sees of biblical predictions. A third position is "inaugurated eschatology", non- or, most used, a-millennialism. It disclaims the earthly thousand years, and believes the reign of God is here in an already/not yet tension until the Son's second coming. When? Nobody knows except the Father (Mark 13:32). God reveals no clues.

HISTORY

With strong roots in Jewish apocalyptic ideas, images and movements, the early church, according to many scholars, "derived its initial élan from radical millennialism" (Y. Talmon). The second and third generations of Christians had to face the non-appearance of the parousia, a crisis already faced by Paul (1 Thess. 4:13-5:11) and by Peter (2 Pet. 3:3-4). Keeping alive millennial hopes of earthly crisis or judgment or vindication were writers such as Samaria-born Justin Martyr (d.165), Irenaeus of Lyons (d.202), Hippolytus of Rome (d.235), Tertullian of Carthage (d.230) and Lactantius (d.320?). Pre-millennialism in extreme practice and piety first appeared in Asia Minor.

In the 170s the Montanist "New Prophecy" group believed Christ's return so imminent that they structured their personal and communal life in bizarre, ecstatic ways. Although local Eastern synods and Pope Zephyrinus (199-217) condemned the movement, Montanism continued to move across the East and in North Africa, until severe legislation by Emperor Justinian (ruled 527-67) all but destroyed it.

Influenced by the favoured status of the church in the Roman empire, the a-millennialist position then became prevalent. Augustine of Hippo (d. 430) was its leading authority. In his City of God, he gives only allegorical or spiritual interpretations to the relevant biblical texts. The thousand years symbolize the entire finite period between Christ's birth and his return – the age of the church.

Augustine's prevailing position could not quiet sporadic millennialistic expectations. Many local gatherings expected the millennium in 1000 (looking back at the incarnation) and then in 1033 (looking at the passion). In the middle ages persistent demands arose for church reforms, especially of the papacy. Abbot Joachim of Fiore (d.1202) introduced the attractive theme of consecutive Trinitarian eras of history. In the third era, that of the Spirit, God intervenes through the Angelic Pope, who thoroughly reforms the church, and transfers the holy see to Jerusalem, where he holds several councils for the conversion of the world. The church witnesses a Pentecost-like outpouring of the Spirit, who spiritually illumines the believers everywhere.

In a Europe troubled by locals wars and plagues and by Muslim Turk encroachments, apocalyptic prophets were rife. Girolamo Savonarola (d.1498) tapped the gloom and hope in Florence with his accusatory prophecies, as did the Taborites, a group of Hussites in Bohemia. With Bible in hand, they had become militant revolutionaries against the established church and Catholic imperial armies, before they gathered in five divinely chosen cities to await the day of wrath and the coming of Christ during February 1420.

The magisterial Reformers opted for a-millennialism, as evidenced in the Lutheran Augsburg confession of 1530 (art. 17), the Church of England's Thirty-nine Articles of 1571 (art. 4), the Calvinist Belgic Confession of 1619 (art. 37) and the Westminster confession of 1647 (chs 32-33). Nevertheless, the Reformation did introduce shifts which would condition the revivals of post- and pre-millennialism: a dominant literal reading of biblical texts, the viability of schisms within the church of the West and designations of the antichrist,* e.g. the popes or any religious or political leader(s) of territorial Protestantism who tried to suppress more radical reforming impulses.

Post-millennialism became articulate in the 1800s, in pietistic awakenings, which gave rise to European and American Protestant mission activities at home and in foreign lands (see missionary societies). The optimistic signs of the times indicated that the papacy was at its last gasp, and other peoples were more open than ever to receive the good news of their salvation. God's kingdom would reach fruition by preaching that good news to everyone everywhere, through the consequent global expansion of the true church of true believers, and by civilizing all peoples based on gospel principles enfolded in societies and personal behaviour. For Alexander Campbell, a founder of the American Disciples of Christ (1832), Christians coming together in unity is indispensable to the millennial dawning. With sin and evil brought to a minimum, the church will triumph for a thousand years (some use the number symbolically). This preparation closes with Christ's return, the resurrection of the dead and the final judgment.

This vision fuelled the manifest destiny of nations with global intents, namely, Britain, Protestant Europe and the USA. For example, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1819) judged America "the new Eden", "God's agent to usher in the last days".

Pre-millennialism would have its comeback, with differences in the sub-plots, today propagated by articulate evangelists who skilfully use radio and television. These proponents highlight biblically identified signs of the times which forewarn of Christ's return. These signs include the great apostasy of secularists and the resurgence of Islam, the increase of local wars, famines, earthquakes, floods and global warming. Some see on the near horizon the nuclear holocaust. Hal Lindsey, in his Late Great Planet Earth (1973) and later updated books (which have sold over 30 million copies), designates in his life-time over 500 fulfilled prophecies which "begin the countdown". Soon the antichrist will appear, deceive the nations and persecute the saints. Finally, when the nations gather for the great battle of Armageddon, Christ returns to rescue his saints, crush his enemies and bind Satan. Then with his living and resurrected saints, Christ reigns in Jerusalem for a thousand years of righteousness and prosperity on earth, freed from the prior curse upon it. At the close, Christ briefly unleashes Satan and destroys him, before all will be judged and the eternal states of heaven and hell established.

A species of this apocalyptic pre-millennialism is dispensationalism. It was popularized by Plymouth Brethren John Nelson Darby (1800-92) and by the still best-selling Scofield Reference Bible (1909, rev. 1969), widely used in fundamentalist schools and seminaries. It argues that God has divided history into seven consecutive "dispensations". The sixth, the present "church age", will soon end, when Christ comes for his saints by the "rapture" or invisibly taking them from the earth, before the final tribulation, and with his saints after it. In Israel's Jerusalem, for a thousand years Christ reigns as the priest, law-giver and judge.

In such calendar-fixing, problems constantly arise as predictions of precise time and/or place turn out to be mistaken, and the sincere believers, who had been expecting Christ's imminent return and earthly rewards, return to day-to-day life. In 1534 militant Anabaptists flocked to their captured city of Münster, "the new Jerusalem", expelled or executed its Catholics and Lutherans, and waited for the rest of the world to perish in the upcoming parousia. In April 1689 the Huguenot Camisards gathered to experience Christ's coming in the Cévennes (Languedoc France). The "English prophets" expected the end on 25 March and their final resurrection on 25 May 1707. More recently, some prophets announced that the Y2K computer bug would devastate the world at midnight, 1 January 2000.

THE CHURCHES TODAY

Groups either fade or discover faults in their calculations, as did the adventist Millerites after the "great disappointment" of

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

1843 and 1844 (22 Oct.). Learning from that embarrassment, the now worldwide pre-millennialist Seventh-day Adventist Church* adjusted by extending the time of the final events.

The fundamentalist Jehovah Witnesses, founded in the 1870s, have a unique premillennial teaching. Christ returned “spiritually” in 1914 and is now overthrowing Satan’s projects. After the Armageddon battle he will set up a theocratic kingdom of resurrected true believers, with his more select 140,000 ruling with him in heaven.

Churches which continue the pre-millennial heritage of the European pietists and Anabaptists include the Church of the Brethren,* the Mennonites,* and the Hutterites. Baptist churches virtually ignore the subject in their confessions of faith. Individual Baptists may be pre-millennial, post-millennial or a-millennial, with the last probably the most common among the rank-and-file.

Pre-millennialist Pentecostals, one of the fastest-growing group, view the present outpouring of the Spirit as the “latter rain” from heaven, which profusely restores the spiritual gifts and the fruits of the Spirit (as in the Pauline lists). The outpouring is itself a fulfilment of end-time prophecy. But Pentecostal leaders repeatedly warn against setting dates for Christ’s return, a condition for which is the fulfilment of his prophetic command that the gospel be preached and new disciples ingathered to the end of the earth (Matt. 24:24, 28:19-20).

Such churches form but a visible crest on the wide wave of a current “millennial mood or sensibility” (H. Cox). Varieties are in almost every church whose members are uneasy about the assumptions and conduct of our times, as confirmed by secular commentators who foresee history ending in a spiral of ever-increasing suffering and violence, with environmental and starvation disasters. These Christians are attracted to a blue-printed hope which promises the earthly alternative of a future heaven-like city to replace the present one, too damaged and worn out to be repaired.

The Roman Catholic stance is clearly a-millennial. The official Catechism of the Catholic Church (1993) judges that “the antichrist’s deception” is the claim “to realize within history [a] messianic hope”; “the church has rejected even modified forms of this falsification of the kingdom to come under the name of millenarianism” (para. 676). Yet thousands of Catholics who pay serious attention to pre-millennialist media evangelists absorb their general contents into eclectic types of a vague Catholic apocalypticism which foresees the approaching chastisement of the entire world. Aberrations are severely condemned, especially when Mary becomes “the Vengeful Virgin” who, through a prophet-leader, imparts to her holy elites detailed messages of world catastrophe, punishment and damnation, and of excommunication of those church authorities who dare ignore them.

The early church experience of the anti-hierarchical Montanists who believed in the Spirit’s direct guidance in biblical prophecy helped to feed the Eastern bishops with questions about the apostolic authorship of Revelation; and longer than in the West, bishops excluded the book from canonical lists. Although the Greek Orthodox church accepts the book in the canon,* it continues to omit Revelation in liturgical lectionaries; pastorally, the “unveiling yet concealing and puzzling” book is too dangerous. Perhaps for the same reason, the Oriental Chaldean and Syrian churches never accepted Revelation (see Oriental Orthodox churches). This long tradition may explain the absence in the Eastern churches today of serious public pre-millennialist exponents or movements.

TOM STRANSKY

- R.G. Clouse ed., The Meaning of the Millennium: Four Views, Downers Grove IL, InterVarsity, 1979
- H. Cox, Fire from Heaven: The Rise of Pentecostal Spirituality and the Reshaping of Religion in the Twenty-first Century, Reading MA, Addison-Wesley, 1995
- M. Cuneo, The Smoke of Satan, New York, Oxford UP, 1997 (within the Catholic church)
- R.A. Landes ed., Encyclopedia of Millennialism and Millennial Movements, New York, Routledge, 2000
- R. Landes, “Millennialism”, in Encyclopedia of World Religions, Springfield MA, Merriam-Webster, 1999
- M. St Clair, Millenarian Movements in Historical Context, New York, Garland, 1992.

MINISTRY IN THE CHURCH

MINISTRY in the church has been a focal point of discussion since the origins of the ecumenical movement. The inability of some communions to recognize the ministerial orders of others has been a principal obstacle in the effort to achieve visible unity.* Dialogue has also raised questions about the structure and practice of ministry in a changing world. Prophetic initiatives and new charisms* have challenged the churches, as has a growing understanding of baptism* as entry into ministry for the whole people of God.* Inquiry concerning ministry, whether lay or ordained, cannot be separated from inquiry into the nature and mission of the church* as such.

Conversations within confessions or communions may be ecumenically relevant as they respond to new realities, clarify old positions, or set the stage for wider dialogue. Vatican II,* for example, brought about changes in the Roman Catholic conception of priestly ministry largely through symbolic, but very real, changes in the celebration of the mass. These changes enhance the people's role and thus act out an apparently new conception of the sources and exercise of ministerial authority. Ecumenically significant as well have been conversations on "calling" in the Reformed tradition, debates on Amt (office) in German-speaking Lutheranism, and discussions on "episcopacy" and "succession" in Anglicanism.

Ministry has been a central issue in at least eight bilateral dialogues* at the world level. The aspects considered naturally vary with the history of relationships between the bodies concerned. Texts relevant to the question of ministry may be consulted in Growth in Agreement I as follows: Anglican-Lutheran (24-27), Anglican-Orthodox (52-53), Anglican-Roman Catholic (78-87,93,102-05), Baptist-Reformed (147-49), Lutheran-Roman Catholic (179-84, 208-09, 248-74), Methodist-Roman Catholic (328-30,356-62; also Growth in Agreement II, 608-16), Old Catholic-Orthodox (417-18), Reformed-Roman Catholic (456- 61).

Multilateral dialogue* on ministry has centred in the Faith and Order* movement. A generation of collaborative work culminated in 1982 in the ministry part of Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.* Originally intended as a weaving together of the results of previous ecumenical conversations, this document became a substantially new work in which Roman Catholic and Orthodox participation was added to the original Protestant discussion. The historic threefold ministry* of bishop, presbyter and deacon is re-affirmed, in the context of a strong affirmation of "the calling of the whole people of God". Within the body's multiplicity of gifts, some people are "responsible for pointing to its fundamental dependence on Jesus Christ". Scarcely addressing the question of the validity of orders, the document acknowledges that the New Testament offers no single pattern of ordained ministry and shows that the development of the threefold pattern has been complex, marked by crises and the indispensable appearance of prophets and charismatic leaders. The threefold ordering is offered as "an expression of the unity we seek and also as a means for achieving it" (M22). Succession in ministry from the apostles onward is only one of the elements in the apostolicity* of the church but is not, as thought in some communions, the primary vehicle of apostolicity. Ordination* is a "sacramental sign", embodying many of the elements which have led some communions to interpret it as a sacrament* in the full sense. The apostolic reality is seen not only in the churches which have bishops but in all those which express apostolicity in different ways. The BEM ministry document may be read as picturing the whole liturgical assembly, with the presbyters gathered around the bishop as a "focus of unity", not in terms of higher or lower ranks but on a horizontal plane (M8,20-27,29-30; cf. Vatican II, Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, para. 41).

In union negotiations, the issue of ministry seems most seriously joined when churches of the "catholic" tradition are involved, raising the problem of mutual recognition and reconciliation of ministerial orders. Liturgical acts have been designed, with varying success, to bring about effective unifications of ministry, notwithstanding remaining and acknowledged differences of conception. Many of the more successful unions have been outside Europe and North America, e.g. the South India and North India plans and the negotiation bringing about the Uniting Church in Australia. Several negotiations have so far not borne fruit, notably in Africa and in Great Britain. The salient (but not the only) issue in church union negotiations has been to see to it that all ministers are received and recognized in a way satisfactory to the uniting bodies. Most often this recognition is achieved through a uniting service which includes a mutual laying on of hands seen not as re-ordination but as an act of reconciliation* and of the giving and receiving of a historic sign of apostolicity. A 1988 proposal by the Consultation on Church Union (COCU)* in the US would have reconciled ministries in “councils of oversight” composed of persons exercising episcopal functions, whether or not designated as bishops, within their own communions; but the proposal ran into trouble among Presbyterians and Episcopalians, and the member churches were instead challenged by COCU in 1999 to find other ways to achieve a mutual recognition of ministries by 2002 and a full reconciliation of ministries by 2007.

In these arenas of dialogue a range of issues has emerged which together constitute the current “state of the question”. First, what is the distinction, and the relationship, between the ministry of the ordained and other ministries of the church? In what way are the ordained over against the community, and in what way in the community? A gift to the community, or the community’s own choice of leadership? The Canterbury statement of 1973 (Anglican-Roman Catholic) says of the ordained ministry that although they share in the priesthood of the whole people of God and represent the whole church in fulfilment of priestly vocation,* “their ministry is not an extension of the common Christian priesthood but belongs to another realm of the gifts of the Spirit”.

The theological statement of COCU, speaking of the ordained, says: “Their ordination marks them as persons who represent to the church its own identity and mission in Jesus Christ.” The notion of representation appears to break through the classic alternative between seeing the ordained as different from others in kind or in degree. “Precisely as representatives of Christ and his church the ordained ministers are distinct, but what they represent is not other than the character and mission of the whole church” (G. Wainwright).

Second, what is the relation between episcopacy* and other ordained ministries? Is the distinction between the episcopate and the presbyterate* mainly one of jurisdiction among those holding the same order, or is the episcopal order a distinctive and essential one? What ecclesiastical memory predominates: that of the election of a bishop from among the presbyters, or the appointment of local episcopoi by the itinerating apostles?

Third, is “apostolic succession” the sole possession of those who receive it in a “tactile” chain of ordinations claiming to reach back to the earliest times, or does this notion embrace a wider stream of the church’s historic life? The Anglican-Lutheran bilateral stated in 1972: “In confessing the apostolic faith as a community, all baptized and believing Christians are the apostolic church and stand in the succession of apostolic faith” (Growth in Agreement I, 24). Is succession in ministry only one of the elements in the apostolic nature of the church, or is it the first and fundamental element?

Fourth, what is the status of the ordination of women? Many Protestant bodies, particularly in the North Atlantic world, now ordain women, but the Anglican communion is split, while Orthodox and Roman Catholic are firmly against it. In some cases, a decision permitting women’s ordination in principle has not been implemented on grounds of conscientious objection by the bishop with jurisdiction or for fear of schism* in the church. In bodies which have ordained women for some time, there is generally little controversy over the principle, with efforts to achieve greater justice for ordained women in placement and promotion claiming the centre of attention. In other churches, notably the Orthodox, the question of women’s ordination has only just begun to be faced (Rhodes consultation, 1988). Unrest on the subject exists in Roman Catholicism, but there are no signs of official reconsideration.

The Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue has sought to isolate the question from gains achieved on a broader front. Women’s ordination is a “grave obstacle to the reconciliation of our communions”, but the “principles upon which this doctrinal agreement rests are not affected by such ordinations; for it was concerned with the origin and nature of the ordained ministry, not with the question who can or cannot be ordained”.

Important ecumenical consultations on this subject have been held in Klingenthal (1979) and Sheffield (1981). A statement by F&O may be found in the 1975 document "Baptism, Eucharist and a Mutually Recognized Ministry" (Accra 1974, Nairobi 1975). The BEM document (Lima text, 1982) radically abbreviates this treatment. It recognizes differences among the churches, acknowledges that these differences create obstacles to mutual recognition of ministries, counsels mutual openness and encourages facing, rather than avoiding, the fundamental question.

Fifth, what is the relation between traditional orderings of ministry and the many new, contextually responsive ministries and forms of ministerial practice? This question appears in many guises, e.g. with reference to the Latin American church base communities.* In the face of a general shortage of priests, can the unordained persons who often lead these communities be made eligible to preside at the eucharist? Are these persons, as Leonardo Boff suggests, not unlike the community-chosen "protestant" pastors at the time of the Reformation? What of those who find ministerial callings in settings not involving sacramental and pastoral leadership of a traditional congregation? What of ministry which is essentially participatory enablement of the people of God in their prophetic tasks?

Finally, what should be the impact of new conceptions of church and ministry on theological education? The WCC Programme on Theological Education kept in touch with numerous attempts around the world to find fresh ways to prepare ministers for their callings. Many of these efforts involve departures from the traditional Western connection between seminary education and the culture of the university, turning instead to "theological education by extension", i.e. contextually based, inductive, experiential programmes conducted in the midst of the people and related to problems of faith and witness where they live.

Clear gains include general agreement that NT patterns in themselves do not settle today's issues, agreement that apostolic succession involves more than continuity of tactile ordination by bishops, awareness that the social context counts and that the meanings of words and practices depend on the culture and usage involved, agreement that actual practices are important and may not always correspond to traditional patterns, agreement that the whole people have a ministry based on their baptism, discovery of the importance of liturgical practice and convergence in the liturgical expression of ordination, movement towards more popular and less restrictive patterns of practice and governance.

One cannot foresee whether these trends will continue, or whether indeed they will prove to have been the important ones for the future of the church. It is difficult to discern, as well, whether local contextuality will triumph over universal convergence or the reverse, or whether possibly a new accommodation between these values will eventually emerge.

See also church order; diaconate; laity/clergy; priesthood.

LEWIS S. MUDGE

- B. Cooke, Ministry to Word and Sacraments: History and Theology, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1976
- J. Gros, H. Meyer & W. Rusch eds, Growth in Agreement II: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, 1982-1998, WCC, 2000
- Groupe des Dombes, Le ministère de la communion dans l'Eglise universelle, Paris, Centurion, 1986
- H. Meyer & L. Vischer eds, Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, WCC, 1984
- T.L. Nichols, That All May Be One: Hierarchy and Participation in the Church, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1997
- C.F. Parvey ed., Ordination of Women in Ecumenical Perspective, WCC, 1980
- D.N. Power, Gifts That Differ: Lay Ministries Established and Unestablished, New York, Pueblo, 1980
- E. Schillebeeckx, Pleidooi voor mensen in de kerk (ET The Church with a Human Face: A New and Expanded Theology of Ministry, New York, Crossroad, 1987)
- E. Sigurbjörnsson, Ministry within the People of God, Lund, Gleerup, 1974
- G.H. Vischer, Apostolischer Dienst: Fünfzig Jahre Diskussion über das kirchliche Amt in Glauben und Kirchengewissung, Frankfurt am Main, Lembeck, 1982
- G. Wainwright, "Reconciliation in Ministry", in Ecumenical Perspectives on BEM, M. Thurian ed., WCC, 1983.

MINISTRY, THREEFOLD

THE THREEFOLD ministerial pattern of bishops, presbyters and deacons has been and remains a central theme in ecumenical discussion on the nature of the church* and its ministry. Convictions about the necessity or optionality of such a pattern are bound up with different readings of Christian history and with different theologies of ministry and church.

The plurality of church orders in the New Testament communities means that few would now see the NT as warranting exclusively the threefold ministry, especially in its developed form. However, while it is easy in retrospect to over-emphasize the formality and coherence of early Christian institutional life, the threefold order emerges in the 2nd and 3rd centuries as the dominant pattern, largely as a means of securing the church's unity* and continuity. It is also important to bear in mind the influence of secular patterns of social organization on the church as it moves away from local, occasional patterns to more uniform structures.

The content of the threefold form varies considerably. Earlier accounts, as already in Ignatius of Antioch, see the bishop as the president of the local assembly, assisted by presbyters, with deacons as community servants; later, as bishops become regional authorities, deacons' duties are assumed by presbyters, who become the local presiding ministers. The picture is further complicated by the place of the minor orders (lectors, acolytes etc.) and of the sub-diaconate, sometimes regarded as a minor order and sometimes as the lowest of the major orders. While the Roman Catholic, Orthodox and Anglican traditions have retained the threefold ministry, the churches of the Reformation have generally adopted a single pastoral ministry of word and sacrament, though sometimes with a form of regional authority.

The centrality of the issue in ecumenical debate in the 20th century was in part ensured by heavy Anglican presence in the nascent ecumenical movement. Anglican conscience on the point derived partly from the 16th-century Anglican ordinals which enshrined the normative status of the threefold order, and partly from the fact that, historically, Anglican identity has frequently been bound up with claims about the validity of Anglican orders and their fidelity to what was construed as the threefold apostolic pattern. Thus the 1927 Lausanne Faith and Order conference recognized dialogue on "the nature of the ministry (whether consisting of one or several orders)" as central to ecumenical advance. The mature fruit of such dialogue is the document Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.* BEM affirms the threefold pattern as an instrument of continuity and order, making modest claims that this ministry "may serve today as an expression of the unity we seek and also as a means for achieving it" (M22). It further asserts that such an order has strong claims to be accepted by churches which have not retained the form, while acknowledging the need for reform of the pattern, especially in the areas of ministerial collegiality and of the profile of deacons.

Churches like the Roman Catholic Church, which regard the threefold order as of the essence of the church, are unlikely to find BEM a sufficiently strong affirmation of its normative status as a prime instrument of unity, catholicity* and apostolicity,* while churches in the Reformation tradition which have only one basic ministry of word and sacrament may fear that the validity of their patterns of ministry is being undermined if the threefold order is proposed as the generally accepted pattern. A number of other issues also need to be resolved. It remains unclear exactly what the threefold ministry consists of, given the great variety of descriptions of content both of each office and of their inter-relation. The relation of the episcopate (see episcopacy) to the presbyterate* has been a matter of debate since the early and medieval periods. Is the episcopate an extension of the presbyterate, or does the presbyterate exist by devolution from the episcopate? How is the distribution between these two orders of functions such as confirmation* or ordination* to be arranged? The recovery of the diaconate* as more than a stepping stone to the presbyterate is a further pressing issue to be worked on both theologically and practically if the threefold order is to be properly threefold.

The necessity of clarification and reform in these areas shows that a renewed threefold pattern will of necessity be very different from a re-affirmed medieval pattern of regional episcopate, vestigial diaconate, and presbyterate as the basic local expression of ministry. A further complication is the increasing need to find ways of affirming full-time ministries which have traditionally fallen outside the threefold pattern (teachers, evangelists, or men and women of prayer). As it stands at present, the threefold ministry offers little guidance as to how such ministries can be affirmed as genuinely apostolic, permanent characteristics of ministry in the assembly. Work on these issues is most fruitfully undertaken by setting questions of ecclesiastical office in the larger theological context of Christ, Spirit and the people of God,* a context which has so far proved to be immensely fruitful in ecumenical reconciliation.*

See also church order, ministry in the church.

JOHN B. WEBSTER

- B. Cooke, Ministry to Word and Sacrament, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1976 ■ H. Küng, Die Kirche (ET The Church, London, Burns & Oates, 1968) ■ J. Martos, Doors to the Sacred, Garden City NY, Doubleday, 1981 ■ E. Schillebeeckx, Pleidooi voor mensen in de kerk (ET The Church with a Human Face, London, SCM Press, 1985) ■ T.F. Torrance, Royal Priesthood: A Theology of Ordained Ministry, Edinburgh, Clark, 1993.

MINORITIES

WITH THE CREATION of nation states (see state) as political entities during the last two centuries, many natural ethnic borderlines have been disregarded. Power arrangements have led to the drawing of new boundaries, entailing forced division, forced unity, forced assimilation and marginalization of peoples and groups. Often prompted by political and economic motives, this contributed to the emergence of ethnic, national, racial, religious and linguistic minorities.

No definition of "minority" has been formally adopted, but the working definition developed by a special rapporteur of the United Nations sub-commission on prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities has been widely accepted: "a group numerically inferior to the rest of the population of a state, in a non-dominant position, whose members – being nationals of the state – possess ethnic, religious or linguistic characteristics differing from those of the rest of the population and show, if only implicitly, a sense of solidarity, directed towards preserving their culture, traditions, religion or language" (Capotorti).

While in the period between the two world wars a system of protection of minorities was established in the framework of the League of Nations, the members of the UN showed little willingness to continue that largely unsuccessful experiment. Many feared that recognition of minorities would constitute a serious threat to the unity and integrity of fragile state structures, and the assumption prevailed that the best solution to the problem of minorities would be to encourage respect for individual human rights. Consequently, efforts by Denmark, Yugoslavia and the USSR to have a provision on minority rights included in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) failed. However, at a later stage a provision on the rights of minorities, albeit very limited in scope, was accepted as article 27 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966), reading: "In those states in which ethnic, religious or linguistic minorities exist, persons belonging to such minorities shall not be denied the right, in community with the other members of their group, to enjoy their own culture, to profess and practise their own religion, or to use their own language."

It appears that the reluctance of the UN to recognize minority rights had a bearing on ecumenical thinking. The first three assemblies of the WCC were silent on this matter, and only the fourth assembly in Uppsala (1968) produced a substantive statement on majorities and minorities (paras 23-26). This statement underlines the need for protection of minorities and the special responsibility of the church but draws attention also to risks of over-stressing minority issues. The Uppsala statement reads in part: "Most nations have ethnic, cultural or religious minorities. These minorities have the right to choose for themselves their own way of life in so far as this choice does not deny the same choice to other groups. Majorities can be insensitive and tyrannical, and minorities may need protection. This is a special responsibility of the church of him who is the champion of the oppressed... But if pressed too far, the rights of minorities can destroy justice and threaten the stability or the existence of the nation. The frustration of a majority by a minority is as incompatible with justice as the persecution of a minority by a majority".

The tension between minority rights and their misuse which characterizes the Uppsala statement is touched upon in a statement on "Unity and Human Rights in Africa Today" adopted by the WCC central committee in January 1971. It notes, "Unity is not an end in itself. National unity must include a recognition of legitimate human rights which also safeguard the basic rights of ethnic minorities."

The ecumenical movement has been particularly supportive of the process which took shape to give concrete expression to the Helsinki Final Act (1975) and has referred in that context to the rights of cultural, linguistic, religious, ideological or ethnic minorities. Thus, Nairobi 1975 defended the rights of minorities in the context of the Helsinki process. Later ecumenical statements, notably also by the WCC central committee in 1989, expressed the same commitment. The Harare assembly (1998) strongly re-affirmed the rights of minorities, especially of indigenous peoples who are particularly threatened by the negative impact of globalization.

THEO VAN BOVEN

- F. Capotorti, Study of the Rights of Persons Belonging to Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities, New York, UN, 1979
- F. Erma-cora, The Protection of Minorities before the United Nations, Recueil des Cours, Hague Academy of International Law 182
- J. Fawcett, The International Protection of Minorities, Minority Rights Group Report no. 41, 1979
- P. Thornberry, Minorities and Human Rights Law, Minority Rights Group Report no. 73
- T. Tschuy, Ethnic Conflict and Religion: Challenge to the Churches, WCC, 1997
- B. Whitaker, Minorities – a Question of Human Rights?, New York, Pergamon, 1984.

MISSIO DEI

THE EXPRESSION missio Dei (mission of God), usually retained in its Latin form, appeared in the 1950s in the development of a theological basis for missionary activity, especially in Anglican-Protestant circles within the International Missionary Council* (IMC). The concept had been highly refined in Western medieval theology to describe the activities within the Trinity itself (ad in- tra) which are expressed in God's "outside" mission (ad extra): the Father sends the Son; the Father and the Son send the Spirit for the redemption of humanity. Already in the 2nd century Irenaeus wrote of the unfolding of God's inner life in the history of salvation,* and Tertullian refers to "God's own self-distribution" within the saving history, this "economy... which distributes the unity into trinity" – the first known use of the term trinitas (Against Praxeas, written after 213).

Ever since the Edinburgh world missionary conference of 1910, church* and mission* struggled to discover each other. And by the time of the IMC Tambaram conference (1938), largely because of the dominant presence of mission societies* and councils not directly related to a church or intentionally not a church, the question of Hendrik Kramer to the participants was critical: "The church and all Christians... are confronted with the question, what is the essential nature of the church, and what is its obligation to the world?" If Tambaram was the beginning of an emphasis on the unity and inseparability of church and mission, the theology to support it was not worked out, and it had to be developed in order to satisfy the variety of IMC constituents and to give them a new orientation to the missionary enterprise.

At the Whitby IMC conference (1947), mission representatives proclaimed that "we have entered as never before into the reality and the meaning of the worldwide church", and for the next conference in Willingen (1952), "the missionary obligation of the church" was chosen for the principal theme. The very foundations of the whole missionary movement were in need of re-examination; some even were hearing the death gasps of missions in the traditional sense. Mission and church had met, a new theological understanding of missions was urgent and it must involve a new understanding of the very nature of the church.

But several preparatory papers for Willingen, especially that of the Dutch missiologist J.C. Hoekendijk, as well as conference participants, vigorously criticized the church-centred orientation of the missionary enterprise, for missions could easily become narrow in horizon and scope, and the missionary would be defining "the whole surrounding world in ecclesiological categories... The world has almost ceased to be the world and is now conceived as a sort of ecclesiastical training-ground" (Hoekendijk).

The church is not the true centre of gravity towards which one should direct missionary thinking; rather, it should be the self-revelation of the Triune God (see Trinity) in Jesus Christ* – the missio Dei is indeed revealed in the mission of the church but not only in and through the church. The source of the missionary activity is ultimately the Triune God: "Out of the depths of his love for us, the Father has sent forth his own beloved Son to reconcile all things to himself, that we and all men might, through the Holy Spirit, be made one in him with the Father in that perfect love which is the very nature of God" (Willingen report).

Thus in missio Dei thinking, however closely mission and church go together, so that "the church lives by mission as a fire exists by burning" (Emil Brunner), still "God is, and remains until the last day, the One who alone carries on the missionary enterprise" (William Anderson). In the strict sense, the sending God alone, through the Sent-God, is the sending authority. No church – and even more so, no missionary society with a measure of independence from the church – dare claim "sending authority" for itself.

Roman Catholics and especially the Orthodox welcomed the missio Dei expression, in so far as the Trinitarian approach could offset what they judged to be almost Christomonism in much Protestant mission thinking and piety. But the RC and Orthodox understanding of church as sacrament precludes any sharp either-or of God-sending versus church-sending. Furthermore, while the term missio Dei should not be confined to missionary activity but refers to everything God does for the communication of salvation and, in a narrower sense, to everything the church itself is sent to be and do, the classic terms "missionary activity", "evangelism" and "witness" are becoming overloaded, beginning to burst and dissipate, so that by meaning too much they end up meaning too little and doing too little.

TOM STRANSKY

■ W. Andersen, Towards a Theology of Mission, IMC research pamphlet 2, London, SCM

Press, 1955 ■ C.E. Van Engen, D.S. Gilliland & P. Pierson eds, The Good News of the Kingdom: Mission Theology for the Third Millennium, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1993 ■ J.C. Hoekendijk, "The Church in Missionary Thinking", IRM, 43, 1952 ■ L. Newbigin, The Relevance of Trinitarian Doctrine for Today's Mission, London, Edinburgh House, 1963 ■ G. Vicedom, Missio Dei: Einführung in eine Theologie der Mission, Munich, Kaiser, 1958.

MISSIOLOGY

THE TERM "missiology" is used in two related senses: (1) for theological reflection on Christian mission (equivalent to theology of mission, theology of the apostolate or sometimes theory of mission); and (2) more broadly, for the systematic study of all aspects of mission (an English equivalent for the German Missionswissenschaft). There is a difference of opinion as to whether the term in this latter sense stands for a distinct academic discipline or whether it simply represents the application of the biblical, dogmatic, historical, sociological and other disciplines to a particular body of subject matter. Those who take the latter view often prefer the term "mission studies". The two senses frequently overlap; the comprehensive account by the Dutch missiologist Jan Jongeneel is divided into "science of mission" (Zendingswetenschap) and theology of mission.

Background and content. The development of the term is closely related to the developing significance of the term "mission".* This word took on a new dimension in the 16th century with its application to attempts by Christians from Western Europe to introduce peoples of Asia, the Americas and Africa to the Christian faith, and especially the establishment of bodies of "missionaries" for this task. The encounter of the missionaries with other faiths and other cultures involved considerable re-adjustment. Over several centuries Europe had emerged as the Christian territory par excellence, and Christianity had developed in a highly Europeanized form. Attempts to transmit the faith in settings where it was not already the profession of the community, and to people whose cultural assumptions were quite different, raised issues not covered in traditional theological discourse as well as urgent questions of method and practice. Systematic study of these issues developed during the 19th century. Initially its principal focus was the propagation of the Christian faith in the non-Western and non-Christian world, and the agencies of its transmission called, by both Catholics and Protestants, "missions". In the 20th century the increasing significance of the churches of Asia and Africa led missiology to consider also "ecumenical" questions, especially those related to the fullness of the church. By mid-century the theological focus had shifted from the mission of the church to the mission of God ("the source of the missionary movement is the Triune God himself", declared the Willingen meeting of the International Missionary Council in 1952). The new focus broadened the scope of missiology to the whole saving activity of God in the world. The acknowledgment of the Trinitarian character of that activity extended the scope of missiology still further, to issues of the environment, society and culture, and later of gender, as well as the long-standing issues of the spread of the gospel, the diversified fullness of the church and relations with other faiths. In a significant shift, the International Review of Missions, founded in 1911, changed the last word of its title to Mission in 1969.

History. The emergence of missiology as an academic discipline can be variously dated; the best claim for a designated post is Alexander Duff's chair at New College, Edinburgh, in 1867. The subject, however, never flourished in Britain, and European missiology owes much to Gustav Warneck, and especially to his professorship at Halle from 1896. Warneck established the first missiological journal in 1874, the Allgemeine Missions-Zeitschrift. Chairs of mission science followed in other German theological faculties (including the first in a Catholic faculty, that of J. Schmidlin at Münster in 1910) and in the Netherlands and Scandinavia. A separate development produced professorships of missions in the USA, where K.S. Latourette introduced a missiological dimension into church history with his teaching at Yale and his monumental History of the Expansion of Christianity (1937-45).

The world missionary conference of 1910 gave impetus to the development of missiology, including the initiation of journals such as the International Review of Missions, with its comprehensive bibliography, and the Moslem (later Muslim) World, and the increasing sophistication of worldwide surveys such as the Statistical Atlas of Christian Missions (1911). The relevance of scholarship to mission, represented in such figures as J.N. Farquhar, became more widely recognized. Bases for missiological scholarship appeared, such as the Pontifical Urban University in Rome and the Selly Oak Colleges in Birmingham. Specialist libraries developed: the Day Missions Library at Yale, the Missionary Research Library in New York. In the 1960s institutes for cooperative missiological study were established, including the Scottish Institute of Missionary Studies (1967), later related to the Centre for the Study of Christianity in the Non-Western World at Edinburgh University, and the Interuniversity Institute for Missiology and Ecumenics in the Netherlands (1969).

The oldest major learned society in the field is the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Missionswissenschaft. There are other national societies; among them the American Society for Missiology and the South African Missiological Society produce notable journals. In 1947 O.G. Myklebust of Norway published a plan for an international organization of missiological scholars. After a consultation of European missiologists (Birmingham 1968), the International Association for Mission Studies* came into being in Oslo in 1970, with Myklebust as secretary and H.W. Gensichen as president. It is now fully international in composition, sponsors major conferences, promotes cooperation in research and publishes the journal Mission Studies.

The development of Western missiology has been affected since the 1970s by the decline in overseas activity on the part of the mainline churches and by a general shrinking of horizons. In contrast, the movement of the Christian centre of gravity to the non-Western world has given the subject, in both shades of the meaning, of missiology, new impetus and life.

See also missio Dei, missionary societies.

ANDREW F. WALLS

■ R.C. Bassham, Mission Theology, 1948-1975, Pasadena CA, William Carey Library, 1979 ■ D. Bosch, Transforming Mission: Paradigm Shifts in the Theology of Mission, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1991 ■ J.A.B. Jongeneel, Missologie, The Hague, Boekencentrum, 1991 ■ O.G. Myklebust, The Study of Missions in Theological Education, 2 vols, Oslo, Forlaget Land & Kirke, 1955-57 ■ E.J. Verstraelen ed., Missiology: An Ecumenical Introduction, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1995 ■ A.F. Walls, The Missionary Movement in Christian History, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1996 ■ J.D. Woodberry ed., Missiological Education for the 21st Century, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1996.

MISSION

WE MAY consider the 20th century in four segments for the purposes of reviewing the understanding of mission in the modern ecumenical movement.

1900-21

In the 20th century, mission truly became an ecumenical priority. The century began with two significant events. The first was a meeting of the South India missionary conference at Madras, India, in January 1900. The topics discussed included the native church, its self-support, self-government and self-propagation; and comity of missions and cooperation in mission work. Two convictions about mission were taking shape. The church* is, by its very nature as the Body of Christ, called to propagate the gospel, which it believes and tries to live; and those coming from afar who attempt to propagate the gospel in any given place must act together, or at least they must not act against each other, for Christ is not divided (see 1 Cor. 1:13).

The second event was an ecumenical missionary conference held in New York four months later, with 2500 participants and an attendance of between 170,000 and 200,000. The conference used "ecumenical" in its title "because the plan of campaign which it proposes covers the whole area of the inhabited globe" – in conformity with the literal meaning of the Greek word "oikoumene". But some participants understood "ecumenical" in the sense of Matt. 24:14: "And this gospel of the kingdom will be preached throughout the whole world (oikoumene), as a testimony to all nations; and then the end will come." Mission was not just a campaign from Western Christendom to the rest of the world but the gospel of God's kingly rule over all nations, to be revealed in God's own time of final judgment. At this conference there was a detailed survey of the areas of mission both existing and to be occupied, and the deliberations expressed the need for some international body to coordinate and promote the mission to the world beyond Europe and North America.

Ten years later, this vision began to find concrete expression in the world missionary conference held at Edinburgh (June 1910), rightly regarded as the beginning of the modern ecumenical movement. The 1200 delegates placed at the centre of their work the obligation to make Christ known to the millions who had not heard the gospel. A sense of urgency was generated, expressed by its chairman, John R. Mott, as "the decisive hour of Christian mission" and "the evangelization of the world in this generation": everything must be done so that all who lived at that time should have an opportunity to hear the gospel and decide for or against Christ. The climax of the meeting was the agreement to appoint an international continuation committee which would, in Mott's words, be "looking steadily at the world as a whole, confronting the world as a unity by the Christian church as a unit".

The first joint effort was the launching in 1912 of the International Review of Missions, which quickly became an effective ecumenical forum for reflections on the continuing mission of God. The shattering experience of the 1914-18 world war severely tested the churches of Europe and North America, which had assumed the main burden of carrying out the world mission. It became even more evident that a permanent world body should be established for cooperative consultation and action, and the International Missionary Council* (IMC) was founded at Lake Mohonk, New York, in October 1921.

The formation of the IMC was above all the work and achievement of a dedicated international band of men and women who had their apprenticeship in the ecumenical youth and student lay movements – the World Alliance of YMCAs* (1855), the World YWCA* (1894) and the World Student Christian Federation* (1895). They learned to think, pray and study the Bible in an interdisciplinary way and to do so across national, denominational and racial barriers. Thus in their formative years they acquired an insight and conviction that mission was appropriate both at home and abroad and was concerned with the whole of human life and of the life of nations. The Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship* (1910) has also nurtured many soundly committed Christians who have played a significant role in an ecumenical understanding of mission.

1921-61

Two issues were immediately raised for the IMC. The first was clearly stated already in Edinburgh 1910 and now put in the IMC constitution: no statement should be made “on any matter involving an ecclesiastical or doctrinal question, on which members of the council or bodies constituting the council may differ among themselves”. In other words, divided churches were carrying out the mission. They were proclaiming the gospel in different and even competing ways and thereby transplanting their divisions in other lands. And yet, Christians fervently believed the prayer of Christ “that they may all be one, even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be in us, so that the world may believe that thou hast sent me” (John 17:21). Episcopalian bishop Charles Brent had been convinced since Edinburgh that Christians had to face this contradiction of the one gospel’s being proclaimed by the dismembered yet one Body of Christ. His efforts from 1911 were crowned with the formation of the Faith and Order* movement in 1927, concerned with the faith and order of the church and with working for the unity* of the church for a more credible mission to the world.

The other issue for IMC was stated in one of its functions: “to help unite the Christian forces of the world in seeking justice in international and inter-racial relations”. This drew attention to the character and scope of mission, which continues to be debated. The missionary movement from Europe and North America to other continents and islands has been carried out in a context of economic, political and military domination and racist attitudes, and some of these attitudes and behaviour were infecting missionary societies and personnel, in spite of the devoted work they were doing in education, and training in skills, medical and social work, and even advocacy for the rights of the people. The IMC therefore requested its secretary, J.H. Oldham, who had been secretary of the Edinburgh conference, to do a careful study of racism.* In 1924 Oldham produced a pioneering book, Christianity and the Race Problem, in which he stated: “As Christ was sent by the Father, so he sends his disciples to set up in the world the kingdom of God. His coming was a declaration of war – a war to the death against the powers of darkness. He was manifested to destroy the works of the devil. Hence when Christians find in the world a state of things that is not in accord with the truth which they have learned from Christ, their concern is not that it should be explained but that it should be ended. In that temper we must approach everything in the relations between races that cannot be reconciled with the Christian ideal.”

Mission was thus conceived in the spirit of Ps. 24:1: “The earth is the Lord’s and the fullness thereof, the world (oikoumene) and those who dwell therein.” Since all persons and all things in the oikoumene belong to the Lord, the task of mission is to manifest the fact that in Christ all peoples are called to be renewed in the image of God, to become what Oldham described, in the words of the American philosopher Josiah Royce, “the universal community of the loyal”.

Another ecumenical leader who had a similar vision of God’s mission in Christ to the whole oikoumene was the Lutheran bishop in Sweden, Nathan Söderblom. He had consulted Oldham during the early stages of his preparation for the 1925 launching of the universal Christian conference on Life and Work* (Stockholm), which focused on the issues of social and international justice in Europe and North America and beyond. The good news of Jesus Christ embraced the whole of life.

The first world conference of the IMC was held in Jerusalem around Easter 1928, ten years after the first world war. This representative gathering discussed as missiological concerns the Christian life and message in relation to non-Christian systems of life and thought, including secularism as a worldwide phenomenon; the ecclesiological question of the relation of “younger” and “older” churches; the Christian mission and race relations, industrialization and rural problems. The heart and centre of mission was expressed in the final message, which was itself influenced by the statements of the 1925 Life and Work conference and the 1927 Faith and Order conference: “Our message is Jesus Christ. He is the revelation of what God is and of what man through him may become. In him we come face to face with the ultimate reality of the universe; he makes known to us God our Father, perfect and infinite in love and in righteousness; for in him we find God incarnate, the final, yet ever unfolding revelation of the God in whom we live and move and have our being... Christ is our motive and Christ is our end. We must give nothing less, and we can give nothing more.”

The world was soon caught in turmoil, with economic and monetary depression in 1929; the spread of the monstrous ideologies of fascism* and communism, which made total claims on peoples in the 1920s and 1930s; the Japanese invasion of Manchuria in 1931 and of Shanghai in 1937; the Italian invasion of Ethiopia in 1934-35. In this context two world ecumenical conferences were held in 1937: “Church, Community and State” in Oxford, and Faith and Order in Edinburgh.

All these events affected the next world missionary conference, in Madras, India (1938), whose report is notably entitled The World Mission of the Church. In response to the world situation and the unfinished evangelistic task, the conference affirmed: “This is the task primarily of the whole church for the whole world... Nothing in the present world situation in any way invalidates the gospel... World peace will never be achieved without world evangelization.” The delegates therefore issued a call: “We summon the churches to unite in the supreme work of world evangelization until the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord.” The church (from kyriake, belonging to the Lord) is the sent of God in Christ through the Spirit. Its true existence is to be the bearer of God’s mission to the world in all the dimensions of the world’s life. While the Jerusalem conference put the centre of mission in Christ, the Madras conference took the logical step of calling on the whole church, as the Body of Christ, to be through all its members the bearer of the gospel in every place.

The darkness of the second world war, which was a more devastating continuation of the first world war, put a great strain on mission as the message of Christ, the Light and Peace of the world. But at the end of the war it was discovered that many churches in Asia and Africa had grown, without the benefit of foreign missionaries and resources. These churches had been responding to the call of the Madras conference. So the IMC meeting at Whitby, Canada (1947), summed up its deliberations in the phrase “One world, one Christ.” It defined the Christian witness in a revolutionary world: “Evangelism means the proclamation of the cross to a world which is baffled by the tragedy of apparently meaningless suffering; it means the proclamation of Christ’s risen life to a world which, athirst for life, seems to be sinking down into death without hope.” For this worldwide missionary task, “the first need is the renewal of the inner life of the church by a return to the message of the Bible and to the Lord of the Bible... Total evangelism demands the cooperation of every single Christian.” And this cooperation must be a “partnership in obedience” in united action and a sharing of resources in a spirit of “expectant evangelism”.

The following year, 1948, the WCC was inaugurated. While the Life and Work and Faith and Order movements combined to create the WCC, the IMC was able at that time only to be “in association with” it. However, the first assembly surveyed the situation of the world and of the churches and declared: “The evident demand of God in this situation is that the whole church should set itself to the total task of winning the whole world for Christ.” Three years later, the WCC central committee made a similar statement and posed a question: “It is clear in the New Testament that the church is called at the same time to proclaim the gospel to the whole world and to manifest in and to that world the fellowship and unity which is in Christ. These two aspects of the calling of the church are interdependent...”

Can we articulate clearly how these two are related to each other; and can we express in the life of our congregations, our churches, and our ecumenical movements this fundamental unity?"

The IMC continued to promote many aspects of the churches' mission to the world, especially in the development of national and regional councils, such as the East Asia Christian Conference in 1957. It also devoted much reflection on the nature and scope of the Christian mission in a rapidly changing world, and on the relation of mission and unity as constituting the nature and calling of the church. It was a question not of "Why mission?" but of "What is mission?" The 1952 IMC conference in Willingen, Federal Republic of Germany, wrestled with the missionary obligation of the church at a time of East-West and North-South conflicts. With its theme "Mission under the Cross", the conference pointed to the source of mission as the self-revelation of the Triune God (see Trinity): "Out of the depths of his love for us, the Father sent forth his own beloved Son to reconcile all things to himself, that we and all people might, through the Spirit, be made one in him with the Father in that perfect love which is the very nature of God."

At the next meeting of the IMC, in Ghana (Dec. 1957-Jan. 1958), the word that came through most powerfully was "the Christian world mission is Christ's, not ours". In that spirit the IMC decided to merge with the WCC, leading to the creation of its Division on World Mission and Evangelism (DWME). The integration took place appropriately at the 1961 New Delhi general assembly of the WCC, with its theme "Jesus Christ, the Light of the World". The assembly urged the churches "to seek together in each place the help of the Holy Spirit in order that they may receive power to be together Christ's obedient witnesses to their neighbours and to the nations".

1961-90

The new DWME brought much to the WCC as its contribution to the common calling of all the member churches to mission and unity in the name of the Triune God. Its Theological Education Fund, already set up in 1958, helped ecumenically to promote theological education for mission among the third-world churches. This later became the Programme on Theological Education, which served all the churches around the world. DWME had a programme on Christian literature and was involved in broadcasting (including television and sound radio) through the World Association of Christian Broadcasters. In 1958 the association united with another group of Christian broadcasters to form the World Association for Christian Communication.*

The DWME also initiated a process of joint action for mission, an effort by churches in any place who were willing together to survey the mission needs and opportunities and the total material and human resources available to meet them, leading to consultation aimed at securing real and effective deployment of the resources in the light of agreed goals. This concept of joint action for mission has focused the continuing difficult discussion between rich churches, with their traditional mission boards or societies, and the churches which emerged from their missionary activities. Attempts at promoting the ecumenical sharing of resources have so far produced meagre results. All this is complicated by the emergence of church-related funding service agencies which operate within restricted mandates, and also by the activities of certain world confessional bodies. The "implementation of partnership in obedience" is still hardly a reality.

The DWME further launched a series of studies on churches in mission around the world, which have produced valuable volumes for study and action. It was also involved in the studies and reflections on the missionary structure of the congregation,* which produced two books, Planning for Mission and The Church for Others.

These and other concerns were reviewed at the first meeting of the DWME in Mexico City (1963), with the theme "Mission in Six Continents". The mission is in each place and calls for persons to cross national and confessional frontiers in obedience to Christ and in fellowship with the churches concerned. Of great importance was the presence for the first time of Eastern Orthodox delegates and Roman Catholic observer-participants. This presence had been facilitated by the strong statement of the New Delhi assembly on religious liberty* and proselytism.* This was the period of the Second Vatican Council* of the Roman Catholic Church, which produced decrees on ecumenism, religious liberty, the apostolate of the laity, and the church's missionary activity.

The WCC fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968) was a watershed for the churches' understanding of the many-sided mission of the Triune God in a bustling, broken world. It declared that mobilizing the people of God* for mission today necessitated "a continuing re-examination of the structures of church life at all levels, i.e. the local parish, the denominational synods and conferences, and their agencies, the councils of churches at national, regional and world levels. All these must ask, not 'Have we the right structures for mission?', but 'Are we totally structured for mission?'" The assembly also proposed the following criteria in evaluating priorities for mission: (1) Do they place the church alongside the poor,* the defenceless, the abused, the forgotten, the bored? (2) Do they allow Christians to enter the concerns of others, to accept their issues and their structures as vehicles of involvement? (3) Are they the best situations for discerning with others the signs of the times, and for moving with history towards the coming of the new humanity? These criteria have guided ecumenical approaches to mission in these decades.

In 1968 the DWME created the Christian Medical Commission, which grew out of one of the major missionary activities over the centuries – healing and health as expressions of Christ's ministry of salvation. It promoted community health care, with emphasis on the church becoming a healing, caring community, and made a strong theological output on "Health, Healing and Wholeness".

The IMC concern about race discrimination and oppression had been taken up at the WCC second assembly in 1954 by a study on racial and ethnic tensions, culminating in 1969 in the Programme to Combat Racism* and its special fund, which received ready support by the DWME and its constituent members. Similar support was given by the DWME to enable the early functioning of the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development in 1970. Indeed, DWME itself had a vigorous programme on urban and industrial mission which later became urban and rural mission. In the 1971 re-structuring of the WCC, the DWME became a commission (CWME).

Of great significance in this period was the setting up of a secretariat on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths; in 1971 it became a separate sub-unit of the WCC (see dialogue, interfaith). This was a new beginning of a 60-year-old central ecumenical missionary concern. The motivation behind this new beginning was that witnessing the Christian faith can be authentic only when we recognize people of living faiths as made in God's image, for whom Christ died, and among whom the Spirit is at work. Our attitude must be one of mutual respect and openness, and the sharing of life with life in the depths of our different faiths. Such an approach calls for a life of constant renewal by the Spirit through the word of God and waiting, interceding prayer. Indeed, a deeper spirituality for witness and service has become today's watchword of the ecumenical movement. This is due, on the one hand, to the wider ecumenical fellowship of Roman Catholics, Orthodox, Anglicans, Protestants, Pentecostals, etc., as evidenced for example in the WCC-Roman Catholic Joint Working Group document on "Common Witness" (1980, following an earlier document in 1970), and, on the other hand, to Christians being renewed through mission to the poor and the oppressed, and in dialogue with people of other faiths.

The world mission conference at Bangkok (1973) is well-known for proposing a moratorium* on personnel and finance in mission relations, but its major contribution lay in its holistic understanding of salvation* and its call for contextual theologies. God's saving work in history was seen in the struggle for economic justice against exploitation, for human dignity against political oppression, for solidarity against alienation between persons, and for hope against anxiety and resignation. At Bangkok, the strong resistance of third-world Christians and churches to the dominant cultural influence of Western missionaries led to the affirmation of the right of Christians and churches to organize their lives on the basis of their own cultural identity rather than follow foreign models.

At the same time, the Paris Missionary Society ceased to exist and the Evangelical Community for Apostolic Action (CEVAA) was formed. Through pooling of resources and sharing of power, mission became a common endeavour between churches in the South and churches in the North, on an equal footing. A few years later, the London Missionary Society took a similar step when it became the Council for World Mission. Several other missionary societies followed, modifying the structures and rules of sharing of resources and thus pointing to an alternative life in an unjust world.

In 1974, the Billy Graham Evangelistic Association held a world congress in Lausanne, Switzerland, to mark its opposition to ecumenical missiology, and the Lausanne Covenant* became the reference document for most Evangelicals. While emphasizing their opposition to the WCC on several points, the participants also re-affirmed social action as an integral part of Christian witness. The congress marked the culmination of opposition between “evangelicals” and “ecumenicals” in mission, but also showed the first signs of a possible rapprochement.

The mid-1970s was a period of re-orientation in mission thinking for other churches also. In 1975, Pope Paul VI published the encyclical Evangelization in the Modern World, which defines mission holistically (the term used is “evangelization”) from a Roman Catholic point of view, and the WCC’s Nairobi assembly moved towards a more balanced ecumenical missiology by clearly affirming the importance of both witness and solidarity.

It was not until 1982 that the WCC produced a convergence and synthetic document on mission, adopted by the central committee. Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation (EA) still remains the official WCC text on mission. It combines insights from ecumenical experiences, in particular those of Latin American base communities, the Orthodox churches, Roman Catholic missionary orders and evangelical mission movements. There are two movements, says the text: the church shows forth the love of God to the world but, in its identification with those who suffer, it also presents to God their prayers, their cries, their hopes and their joys. Any imbalance between the two seriously hinders Christian witness.* More than other WCC texts, the EA has an evangelistic flavour in insisting on personal conversion to Christ, acceptance of his forgiveness, and the willingness to follow him in a life of service.

The inheritance of the Melbourne conference can be seen in the EA when it emphasizes God’s preferential option for the poor in mission. It is a tragic coincidence that most of the individuals and peoples who have never heard of Christ are also the poorest and the victims of the international social and economic system. Taking up the concept of missio Dei,* influential in ecumenical missiology since Willingen (1952), the Melbourne conference defined its theological entry-point into the world: God acts by and through the poor, the victims and the excluded, for their liberation and a change of relations in the world that would also free the rich and powerful. The poor and their fate thus have become the yardstick for judging all human activities.

Melbourne had criticized the use of power in missionary endeavours on the basis of Christ’s own vulnerability, and the EA coined the expression of “mission in Christ’s way”. The world mission conference seven years later in San Antonio, USA, developed this and other themes of the 1982 affirmation. The conference became famous because it was able to formulate a kind of consensus on the most controversial question in ecumenical missiology, the relation between Christianity and other religions: We cannot point to any other way of salvation than Jesus Christ. At the same time we cannot set limits to the saving power of God. Finally we acknowledge that there is a tension between these two statements which we are not in a position to resolve. Mission and dialogue are complementary and not mutually exclusive. This “consensus” has been re-affirmed on several occasions since 1989.

San Antonio opened up new ground also through its appreciation of popular religiosity. In search of a less cerebral and Westernized Christian spirituality, the conference commented positively on experiences of religious communities who have a strong communal identity, use symbolic religious language and attach importance to themes such as the earth and fertility, the body and sexuality, work and festive celebrations. Several of these insights were to bear on the future study process on gospel and cultures, and influence the increasingly necessary dialogue with Pentecostals.

Also in 1989 the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization* called its second world congress in Manila, Philippines. The Manila Manifesto re-affirms and develops the Lausanne Covenant. On questions such as good news to the poor, the role of the local church and cooperation in mission, the language approaches that used in WCC mission circles. However, Manila insists more than ecumenical missiologists on the priority of evangelism in mission and retains an exclusivist position on salvation. Manila was the first time such an evangelical meeting included major participation by Pentecostal and charismatic missionaries and theologians.

In 1990 Pope John Paul II issued the encyclical letter Redemptoris Missio on the permanent validity of the church's missionary mandate. Within a holistic interpretation of mission, the pope insisted on the specific task of bringing the gospel to those who do not know it (the mission ad gentes) as distinguished from witness in places where there are lively churches and where masses of people have lost a living sense of faith and are in need of "new evangelization". The document formulates a position on the relation to other religions, which has a certain similarity to the perspective which the WCC reached at San Antonio.

1991-

After the fall of the Berlin wall, the missionary movement found itself for the first time since Edinburgh 1910 again facing the challenge of one world under a single economic system. Since then, missiology has struggled to define Christian witness in the face of globalization, with its economic, political and cultural challenges. A year-long study process on the relation of gospel and cultures preceded the world mission conference in Salvador de Bahía, Brazil, in 1996. In the changed world context and increasing misuse of ethnicity and cultural identity to justify conflict and violence, Salvador revisited the results of the Bangkok conference. The principle of inculturation was strongly re-affirmed as a necessary basis for ecumenical missiology, as was the acknowledgment of the variety of cultures, a gift full of richness from the Creator. Each culture carries values and traditions that foster solidarity, peace and reconciliation, but also elements of violence, contempt and exclusion. In inculturation processes, some traditions may be affirmed, whereas others must be challenged. Churches linked to the WCC would in principle agree that there is no one position from which inculturation* can be judged. To do missiology in an ecumenical way is to offer space for dialogue following the principles of intercultural hermeneutics.

Three years after the Salvador conference, the World Evangelical Fellowship* called an international missiological conference in Iguazu, Brazil, which updated evangelical missiology in a remarkable way. The Iguazu declaration re-affirms basic evangelical principles, calls in a new way for a serious struggle with ecclesiology in mission, and does indeed question managerial approaches to mission.

Following Salvador and the WCC's Harare assembly (1998), the new Commission on World Mission and Evangelism adopted in 2000 a study document entitled Mission and Evangelism in Unity Today. It is based on the following use of terminology: "Mission" carries a holistic understanding: the proclamation and sharing of the good news of the gospel by word (kerygma), deed (diakonia), prayer and worship (leiturgia) and the everyday witness of the Christian life (martyria); teaching as building up and strengthening people in their relationship with God and each other; and healing as wholeness and reconciliation into koinonia – communion with God, communion with people, and communion with creation as a whole. "Evangelism", while not excluding the different dimensions of mission, focuses on explicit and intentional voicing of the gospel, including the invitation to personal conversion to a new life in Christ and to discipleship.

The next world mission conference will be held on the theme "Called in Christ To Be Reconciling and Healing Communities". It will need to address the new challenges of increasing violence and exclusion, the risk of ever more misuse of religion in conflicts, the important cultural changes brought about by secularization and post-modernity, and the questions raised by the HIV/AIDS pandemic. Ecumenical mission needs in particular to enter into serious dialogue with Pentecostals and must fully integrate the healing mandate in its understanding and practice of mission.

See also evangelism.

PHILIP A. POTTER and JACQUES MATTHEY

■ G.A. Anderson ed., Biographical Dictionary of Christian Missions, New York, Simon & Schuster Macmillan, 1998 ■ D.J. Bosch, Transforming Mission, Paradigm Shifts in Theology of Mission, New York, Orbis, 1991 ■ E. Castro: Freedom in Mission: The Perspectives of the Kingdom of God. An Ecumenical Enquiry, WCC, 1985 ■ K. Clements: Faith on the Frontier: A Life of J.H. Oldham, Edinburgh, Clark, 1999 ■ H.E. Fey ed., The Ecumenical Advance: A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 2: 1948-1968, London, SPCK, 1970 ■ J. Matthey, "Missiology in the WCC: Update. Presentation, History, Theological Background and Emphases of the Most Recent Mission Statement of the WCC", IRM, 90, 359, 2001 ■ K. Müller, Th. Sundermeier, St. B. Bevans and R.H. Bliese eds, Dictionary of Mission: Theology, History, Perspectives, New York, Orbis, 1997 ■ S. Neill, G.H. Anderson & J. Goodwin eds, Concise Dictionary of the Christian World Mission, London, Lutterworth, 1970 ■ L. Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society, WCC, 1989 ■ T.V. Philip: Edinburgh to Salvador: Twentieth Century Ecumenical Missiology. A Historical Study of the Ecumenical Discussions on Mission, Delhi, CSS & ISPCK, 1999 ■ R. Rouse & S.C. Neill eds, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 1: 1517-1948, London, SPCK, 1954 ■ J.A. Scherer & St. B. Bevans eds, New Directions in Mission and Evangelization. 1. Basic Statements, 1974-1991, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1992 ■ R.J. Schreiter ed., Mission in the Third Millennium, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 2001 ■ W.D. Taylor ed., Global Missiology for the 21st Century: The Ignessu Dialogue, Grand Rapids MI, WEF, Baker Academic, 2000.

MISSIONARY SOCIETIES

MOST CHURCH historians consider the 19th century "the Great Century" of Protestant and Catholic "foreign missions". In world history this period is also pre-eminently the European century, for Europe at that time was able to impose much of its will, ideas and power on a large portion of the inhabited world. The economic and imperial upsurge of Europe joined an unexpected Christian pietistic revival, which affected almost every denomination or church in every Western country.

Until that point, the USA itself had been a mission field rather than the source of overseas missionaries. But with its 19th-century religious revivals, or awakenings, the energy and optimism of a "Christian America", wedded to the nation's increasing international prestige, created a climate and image of America as world power and world saviour.

PROTESTANT ORIGINS

By 1914 this revival among Protestants in both Europe and North America had given rise to a proliferation of home and foreign missionary societies.

The motivation and understanding of mission* for the members and supporters of these societies were complex, even as they were being modified from decade to decade. No one prominent motif in theology was all-determinative except that all held that a person who did not believe explicitly in Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour of every person, everywhere, was in a position of eternal damnation, or at least was living very precariously with God. The pietist influence, in trying to recover the "first love" experiences of the early Christians (see Rev. 2:4-5), emphasized personal conversion,* purity of life and lay initiative. Dominant motives for foreign missions ranged from a strong eschatology* that viewed the evangelization of the peoples as a condition for the second and final return of Jesus the Messiah (see millennialism) to a simple, loving obedience to Jesus' command to disciple all the nations (see Matt. 28:19-20).

The societies had differing immediate aims: a specific area on the non-Christian map (e.g. India, China, interior Africa); a specific religious group (e.g. Hindus, Muslims, Jews, Roman Catholics, Orthodox; tribal religions were simply called pagan); a specific service (e.g. medical, agricultural development, education, Bible translation/distribution; or all of these).

The European Protestant churches, especially if legally tied to the state, were often unable or unwilling to initiate, administer or support foreign missions. So the new mission societies were largely voluntary ones, depending on the initiative of highly motivated individuals (far more laity than clergy, and during the last three decades half were women and half of them unmarried), and relying for financial support on the voluntary gifts of interested Christians. Some societies were explicitly denominational, others were interdenominational or non-denominational, usually agreeing to a fundamental credal statement.

Such societies included Baptist Missionary Society (London, 1792), London Missionary Society (1795), Church Missionary Society (1795), Dutch Mission (1799), British and Foreign Bible Society (1804), London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews (1809), American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1810), Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society (1814), American Baptist Missionary Board (1814), Basel Mission (1815), American Bible Society (1816) and Berlin Society (1824) – the list becomes very long, so that by 1914 every European country, the USA and Canada had such societies. The more successful their work, the more the churches themselves began to collect money for the independent societies; eventually many of the churches began their own, directly controlled mission agencies. By 1914 the total personnel of both Protestant types was around 45,000 overseas missionaries.

In the early 20th century the mission churches, after achieving a measure of stability and self-consciousness, also developed indigenous missionary societies, at first for their own regions. Examples are the National Missionary Society of India (1907) and the Anglican Society in China (1936).

Gradually there developed both “home-based” and “foreign” mission councils or federations of these societies, such as the committee of German Protestant Missions (1885); the Foreign Missions Conference of North America (1893); the Conference of Missionary Societies in Great Britain and Ireland (1913), and in the Netherlands (1915), Finland (1918), Sweden (1920), Norway (1920), Australia (1920), New Zealand (1926) and Switzerland (1944). After the second world war most of these councils became departments of overseas ministries within national councils of churches.

In the “mission fields” before the 1910 Edinburgh world missionary conference, there were a few national field organs, most concerned with comity (the mutual division of areas into spheres of work by mission societies, and non-interference in one another’s affairs; see common witness), e.g. in India (1902), Korea (1905), Japan (1910). The trend increased after Edinburgh, also in Africa, the Middle East and, with much more difficulty, Latin America.

In the 1920s and 1930s the development of indigenous leadership and a sense of independent church responsibility prompted these agencies and “younger churches” to form national Christian councils, e.g. in India (1922), China (1922), Japan (1923), Korea (1924), Congo (1924). The major councils became members of the International Missionary Council* (IMC, 1921), which originally was composed primarily of councils of missionaries, then increasingly also of local and national councils of churches.*

ROMAN CATHOLIC MISSIONS

Overseas mission work by European Roman Catholics, almost exclusively undertaken by religious communities,* had almost collapsed by the 1800s. Rome’s suppression of the Jesuits (1773), the paralysis caused by the French revolution, Napoleon’s forced removal of the pope from Rome, and the political secularization* and dissolution of religious communities in most of Europe combined to paint a most gloomy picture. In the mid-1810s the scene began to change, and a revival of missions eventually became a priority church concern and the focus of large-scale activity under Gregory XVI (pope 1831-46). The old communities re-organized themselves, such as the restored Jesuits (1814), the Benedictines, Dominicans, Franciscans, Capuchins, Holy Spirit Fathers, Paris Society for Foreign Missions, and Lazarists. And an unexpected number of over 50 new male and 200 female communities arose, specially for mission work, such as the Oblates (1816), Marists (1817), Salesians (1859), Franciscan Missionary Sisters (1859), Scheut (1862), White Fathers and Sisters (1868-69), Franciscan Missionaries of Mary (1896), the last named being the largest women's community in 1990, with over 9000 members.

Unlike the Protestant structures, these RC societies were composed of clergy, of religious brothers and sisters – all unmarried; assisting them was only a very small percentage of laypeople, married or unmarried. And unlike most Protestant societies, these RC mission groups were not independent of any direct church control. Although most were not dependent on any one diocese, almost all were directly under Rome's Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Rome had divided up the whole non-Christian world in mission districts and then assigned the groups to serve specific missionary communities, e.g. the Picpus Fathers to Oceania, the Sisters of St Joseph to the Middle East, the Italian Holy Ghost Fathers and Sisters to East Africa. Since several of the communities were international in membership, one community might have several nationalities serving a single district.

Protestant policies of comity did not involve RCs. In fact, often the motivation for sending a new group to an area was to offset the work of the other; e.g. the Church Missionary Society and the White Fathers in East Africa, the Sudan United Missions and Italian Comboni priests and sisters in Sudan, the Presbyterians and Jesuits in Lebanon and Syria, the Methodists and Sacred Heart Fathers in Oceania.

The USA, where Protestantism in the latter part of the 19th century produced hundreds of overseas missionaries, was regarded by the RCC as a primary mission field for European societies to labour in. These RC societies sent priests, nuns and other church workers and were generous with money, so that the young, unstable American RC church, bulging with the flood of immigrants, could survive. By 1900 there were fewer than 80 American Catholic foreign missionaries overseas, mostly in the Caribbean and Mexico. In 1907 Propaganda Fide removed most of the USA from the list of mission territories, and the number of US Catholic overseas missionaries, spurred by the first society founded in the US – the Maryknoll Fathers (1911) and Sisters (1912) – reached a peak of over 9300 in 1966.

ORTHODOX MISSIONS

In the Orthodox church organized missionary activity, understood as the extension of the church by the conversion of previously unreached peoples, was confined almost exclusively to Russian initiatives. The "great captivity" of the ancient churches of the Middle East under the Islamic rule of the Ottoman empire made evangelism* impossible. In Russia the tradition of evangelization by "colonist-monks" (Eugène Smirnov) was stifled by strict imperial control from Peter the Great (ruled 1682-1725) to Catherine II (ruled 1762-96). While not comparable to the Protestant and Catholic missions in the 19th century, the Orthodox saw the revivalistic beginnings of new missionary work, primarily through monastic communities of men and of women.

In 1828 the holy synod in Moscow called for missionaries to reverse the trend of apostasy to Islam among the eastern Russians. Macarius Gloukharev (1792-1847), somewhat marked by German pietism, introduced new mission methods in central Asia on the model of the London Missionary Society. John Veniaminov (1797-1879), after an extraordinary missionary life with fellow monks in the Aleutian Islands and mainland Alaska, later in Yakutsk and Siberia, became metropolitan in Moscow, and in 1870 he founded the Orthodox Missionary Society. The society collected funds for the support of the missionaries and the construction and maintenance of charitable and educational institutions (although it had no administrative functions, as do the Western mission societies). It was first led by Nicolai Kasatkin (1836-1912), who later returned to Japan to leave behind him a vigorous church with indigenous clergy. The 1917 Russian revolution ended the society's and the missionaries' work.

The world federation of Orthodox youth, Syndesmos,* founded in 1953, places foreign mission work high on its agenda. It has provided recruits for the international Orthodox Missionary Centre in Athens, founded by Anastasios Yannoulatos in 1971, with activity directed primarily to Uganda, Tanzania, Kenya and Sudan. In 1982 Yan-noulatos (who also served as moderator of the WCC’s Commission on World Mission and Evangelism, 1983-91) became metropolitan for the East Africa diocese.

ECUMENICAL PERSPECTIVES

By the 1960s the large number of Protestant boards and agencies, accustomed to independence and flexibility, hesitated in integrating the IMC into the WCC. Despite the positive fruits of integration, there is a vacuum left by the disappearance of the IMC, which had provided a wide forum for voluntary missionary associations, including conservative Evangelical, whether denominational or interdenominational, whether Western or based in the third world – all focused on direct evangelism, “cross-cultural outreach” at home and abroad.

In the last three decades the vacuum has become more noticeable, since the number of such missionaries of old and new societies or voluntary agencies has greatly increased, while the number of WCC-member church mission boards has decreased. The vacuum has become partially filled by a variety of Protestant Evangelical structures, such as the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization,* the Great Commission Roundtable (1999), non-WCC-related indigenous African and Asian societies (“third-world missionaries”) and ad hoc Christian leadership mission assemblies.

Since the mid-1960s, the RCC has seen a drastic reduction of male and female vocations to religious communities in Western Europe and North America, but in Africa, Asia and Latin America a steady increase of new members in older communities and new indigenous ones. For example, there are now very few German Benedictine nuns in Korea, but the communities they founded now have over 300 Koreans, and many of them are serving elsewhere (e.g. in Tanzanian hospitals and schools).

The sea change in ecumenical understandings in the RCC owing to Vatican Council II* has led to close cooperation and common witness between large segments of Christian missionaries, exemplified on the world level by the cooperation between Rome’s SEDOS* and the WCC’s commission on world mission and evangelism and by RC full membership in the CWME. And despite the anti-RCC stance of many within conservative Evangelical agencies, from 1977 to 1984 the Vatican Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity co-sponsored a series of meetings with Evangelicals on mission (see Evangelical-Roman Catholic relations).

See also Evangelical missions.

TOM STRANSKY

“MISSIONARY STRUCTURE OF THE CONGREGATION”

IN 1961 THE WCC assembly at New Delhi instructed the Department on Studies in Evangelism to carry out a study entitled “Missionary Structure of the Congregation” (see sec. on “Witness”, paras 28-37, also pp.189-90). The MSC was the most important WCC study in the theology of mission in the years between New Delhi and Uppsala (1968), and it is the most fundamental WCC study to date on the renewal of the local congregation (see local church).

The question to be raised was, What changes in the external structure and self-understanding of the local congregation are needed for it to be able to witness credibly to the message of the kingdom of God* in a secular world of rapid social change? From the outset the study embraced the expectation that only a departure from a church-centred view of mission could lead to the beginning of a new responsibility of the church for the world, as well as the conviction that the traditional forms of church life and the inherited principle of territorial parish organization of the church are a hindrance to its missionary presence in all spheres of life.

The context of the study included several elements: the external integration of the WCC and the International Missionary Council* (1961), along with the internal integration of church and mission* (see L. Newbigin, “The Missionary Dimension of the Ecumenical Movement”, ER, 1961); efforts to renew the theology of missionary evangelism, which were already beginning in the 1950s (Willingen 1952: “The Missionary Obligation of the Church”; central committee, Rhodes 1959: “A Theological Reflection on the Work of Evangelism”; Jo-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

hannes Blauw, The Missionary Nature of the Church, 1962; D.T. Niles, Upon the Earth, 1962); emphasis on the missionary responsibility of the laity (Evanston 1954, secs 2 and 6; Hendrik Kraemer, A Theology of the Laity, 1958; A.A. van Ruler, Theologie des Apostolats, 1954); and re-discovery of the significance of the local congregation ("the fully committed fellowship" in "each place") for ecumenical unity and missionary witness: "The place where the development of the common life in Christ is most clearly tested is in the local situation, where believers live and work. There the achievements and the frustrations are most deeply felt: but there too the challenge is most often avoided" (New Delhi 1961, sec. 3, p.122).

DEVELOPMENTS AND RESULTS

The MSC, begun under the leadership of Hans Jochen Margull in 1962, provoked an astonishingly wide interest, especially in North Atlantic countries. Task forces in Western Europe, North America and the German Democratic Republic published in 1966-67 independent final reports (in The Church for Others and the Church for the World). Individual groups also participated in the study of the context in Africa, Asia and Latin America.

The most important results of the MSC, documented also in the statement of the committee on studies in evangelism to the central committee in Enugu in 1965 ("Structures for Missionary Congregations") and in the collection of working documents (Margull, Mission als Strukturprinzip [Mission as a structural principle], 1965) are the following:

Mission originates in God, not the church. The church is not an end in itself but participates in God's missionary action (missio Dei*), which is valid for the whole world and embraces both church and society (see Willigen 1952, Karl Hartenstein, Georg Vicedom). Instead of the "God-church-world" perspective, we must have "God-world-church" (J.C. Hoekendijk). The church does not have a mission, it is itself mission. The structure and aim of its missions are legitimate only in so far as they serve God's mission.

The aim of mission is not primarily the quantitative growth of the church but shalom for the world. "Realization of the full potentialities of all creation and its ultimate reconciliation and unity in Christ" is the aim of missio Dei. As a witness and pointer to shalom and the messianic gifts of justice, truth, fellowship and peace, the church is essentially a "church for others" (Dietrich Bonhoeffer). The purpose of the church's missionary existence is a credible, symbolic and renewing presence in the world, which makes the presence of God among human beings visible.

The context of the missio Dei is not only the individual or the soul but history, the "world in transformation". The process of secularization* can be understood positively as a "fruit of the gospel" and can be distinguished from its elevation to an absolute value in secularism (Friedrich Gogarten). Mission is therefore not to be understood as winning back lost church territory or as the restoration of the corpus Christianum; it is not a counter-attack on secularization but participation in the process of liberation and humanization in society in the name of God, who is at work in the world.

The agents of mission are not first and foremost the ministers or missionaries but, rather, the laity* (as members of the laos, the people of God*). A missionary church is a church at the base. As a congregation from below, it requires training for the laity and for adults and participation on every level.

The structures of mission are not unchangeable but must be so "flexible, differentiated and coherent" that people in all the many spheres of life (family, profession, leisure, politics) can always be addressed afresh. Clinging to the parish system as a preferred structure of the church can lead to a "morphological fundamentalism". An effective presence in the various spheres of life calls for a variety of small serving groups, functional arrangements and church ministries which are related to "zonal structures" (i.e. a district in a town, a large-scale concern, a regional structure) – all are church structures with equal validity.

On the way to a "church for others", fundamental importance attaches to the serious interest in the "otherness" of the others, a precise (sociological, ecclesiastical and political) analysis of the context of the local congregation, involving congregational questionnaires, the creation of independent committees to review the congregational structures and a radically renewed practice of worship (ecumenical, with dialogue, fellowship and participation).

EFFECTS

The MSC study expressed the re-direction of missionary focus back to the traditional “missionary churches” in the North Atlantic area, a direct result of the slogan “mission in six continents” (Mexico City 1963). It contributed decisively to keeping the churches in the Western societies from isolating themselves and withdrawing from responsibility for diakonia* in a social context. It stimulated the emergence and development of adult education, urban industrial mission, urban training centres, pastoral work for leisure time and other special forms of church ministry. It substantially influenced the discussion of church reform in both East and West Germany in the 1960s. Through the medium of Uppsala the idea of the missio Dei and historical theology continued to have an effect in the contextual theologies of Asia and Latin America. The study “Life-style of the Congregation in Mission”, initiated in 1976 by the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME), extended the concerns of the MSC by calling for initiative groups such as those formed in the churches in the mid-1970s and 1980s for justice, peace and the integrity of creation.*

The MSC has faced criticism, for the stronger presence of the church in the world has frequently been seen as only a professionalizing of services or an expansion of the institutional churches. In the 1960s the optimistic view of the Western process of secularization temporarily made it difficult to see the profound ambivalences in modernism, with its consumer society, isolation and exploitation. The emphasis has been on structures, to the detriment of the meaning of worship and spirituality for the renewal of congregational life. The pressing problems of congregations in the non-Western context (poverty, relegation to minority status, inter-faith dialogue) have largely remained unaddressed. The lack of Orthodox and Roman Catholic participation has so far made it impossible to link up the dominant tradition which sees the church in terms of history* and eschatology* with that which views it sacramentally.

The MSC, however, is of lasting significance both because of the basic question it asks – What kind of connection is there between evangelism and modes of existence (mission and structure) for a local missionary congregation which seeks to be “the salt of the earth”? – and because of the fundamental conviction that even the external structure of a church is a factor in evangelism and must serve the missio Dei. The missionary renewal of the church begins where people locally do something about the “the world’s agenda” in the light of the missio Dei and try to be a sign of the kingdom of God in fellowship, service and worship. If the stimuli for renewal from the ecumenical movement are to have their full impact on the local congregation, the unanswered question as to the missionary structure of the congregation must also enjoy high priority in the work of the WCC in the future. The theme of the MSC was taken up again in, among other things, the joint study project of the Conference of European Churches* and the CWME on “Missionary Congregations in a Secularized Europe”, adopted in Stirling in 1986 and supported also in San Antonio in 1989. The task for the future is to deliver Christian congregations from consumerism, individualism and apathy, freeing them to exercise a prophetic non-conformity in their social context. In the 1990s this task was taken up by the project on ecumenical renewal of congregational life in the European churches.

DIETRICH WERNER

■ The Church for Others and the Church for the World: A Quest for Structures for Missionary Congregations, WCC, 1967 ■ Concept, vols 1-9, WCC, 1962-65 ■ “Education in Mission”, (= IRM, 81, 321, 1992) ■ W.J. Hollenweger, international bibliography on the “Church for Others”, A Monthly Letter about Evangelism, 7-8, 1971 ■ G. Linn ed., Hear What the Spirit says to the Churches: Towards Missionary Congregations in Europe, WCC, 1994 ■ G.W. Webber, The Congregation in Mission: Emerging Structures for the Church in an Urban Society, New York, Abingdon, 1964 ■ D. Werner, Mission für das Leben – Mission im Kontext, Rothenburg, Ernst-Lange-Institut, 1996 ■ T. Wieser ed., Planning for Mission: Working Papers on the New

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

Quest for Missionary Congregations, London, Epworth, 1966 ■ C. Williams, Where in the World?, New York, NCCUSA, 1963.

MOELLER, CHARLES

B. 18 Jan. 1912, Brussels, Belgium; d. 3 April 1986, Brussels. Ordained Catholic priest in 1937 and then pursuing doctoral studies in the Christological and Trinitarian controversies of the 5th and 6th centuries, Moeller taught poetry at the Institut Saint-Pierre in Jette, Belgium (1941-54), then became professor of literature and theology at the University of Louvain. His insatiable curiosity had no limits: from Russian poetry and Spanish novels to the ancient Syrian writers; from a theology of grace and ecumenism to Charlie Chaplin films; from Luther to Jean-Paul Sartre; from Buddhist statuary to Picasso. But bookish he was not; he enjoyed the company of others, all sorts, and was ever a gentle listener. He was secure enough in the Catholic faith to go easily with others to the edges of belief and unbelief, and the poet could rest in ambiguities: "One cannot keep hold of the truth without tension." Friend of Lambert Beauduin and the Russian monk Clement Lialin, he participated in the annual interconfessional theological conversations at Chevetogne.* As an "official expert" (peritus) at Vatican II* (1962-65), Moeller was one of the main drafters of the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, in particular its two chapters on the human person and on culture. After Vatican II, Paul VI tried to reform the critical Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, and he enlisted Moeller to be its under-secretary (1966-73). The post over-confined him. He welcomed the transfer to become secretary of the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity for his last active ten years (to 1983). He frequently left the desk for ecumenical travels. He did not complain when this involved several days a month in Jerusalem, where he was also the rector in the initial years of the Tantur Ecumenical Institute* for advanced theological research.

TOM STRANSKY

- C. Moeller, Littérature du XX siècle et christianisme, 5 vols, Tournai, Casterman, 1954-75
- The Theology of Grace and the Ecumenical Movement, Paterson NJ, St Anthony Guild, 1969
- Mentalité moderne et évangélisation, Brussels, Lumen Vitae, 1961
- J. Grootaers, "Charles Moeller", in Ecumenical Pilgrims, I. Bria & D. Heller eds, WCC, 1995.

MORAL REARMAMENT (INITIATIVES OF CHANGE)

THE MRA is a spiritual movement, originally the Oxford Group, initiated by American Lutheran Pastor Frank Buchman (1878-1961). Following the horrors of the first world war, Buchman called for a "first-century Christianity" that would focus on the application of absolute moral standards and the search for God's guidance. It offered a global vision and by the 1930s had become a large interdenominational Protestant movement in approximately 20 countries. In 1938 Alcoholics Anonymous spun off, and the Oxford Group began a campaign for moral and spiritual rearmament, leading to its new name.

By 1946 centres were established in the USA, London, and Caux, Switzerland, where, in the immediate post-war years, thousands came from France and Germany, leading to a significant contribution to post-war reconciliation. MRA expanded around the world as a lay renewal movement, focusing mainly on industrial and international reconciliation. It became more inclusive of other faiths, with centres opening in Japan and India in the 1960s. However, the movement also often expressed itself in anti-communist terms in this period, and the tensions this produced, along with Buchman's death in 1961, lead to schism and some decline.

The 1980s, however, saw the movement in a process of renewal and working more with other organizations. Recent partnerships in the US, for example, have included the Mennonite Central Committee and the International Centre for Religion and Diplomacy. Roman Catholics began participating in larger numbers, as did many Slavic peoples, often adherents of their respective Orthodox churches, following the collapse of communism. The growing interfaith nature continued and was formalized in 1993.

Challenges to decision-making in and coordination of this diverse movement have been met in the following ways, starting in the early 1990s: (1) annual global consultations; (2) the emergence of functional divisions; e.g. Hope in the Cities for inner city and race relations work; Foundations for Freedom training younger people in the moral and spiritual underpinnings of a free society; and Agenda for Reconciliation drawing together MRA's international reconciliation work around the world; (3) an international council of nine leaders, with term limits; (4) the creation in 2002 of an international association of national bodies, headquartered in Switzerland. Meanwhile, in 2001, MRA changed its name to Initiatives of Change.

BRYAN HAMLIN

■ For a Change, MRA magazine ■ D. Johnston & C. Sampson eds, Religion, the Missing Dimension of Statecraft, New York, Oxford UP, 1994 ■ G. Lean, Frank Buchman: A Life, London, Constable, 1985.

MORATORIUM

"MORATORIUM" was the name given in the ecumenical movement to a proposal in the early 1970s for a cessation of sending and receiving money and missionary personnel for a period, to allow time for review of the best use of persons and money in response to God's mission and the churches' search for selfhood (see missio Dei, mission).

John Gatu, then general secretary of the Presbyterian Church of East Africa, first issued the call for a moratorium in 1971. He argued "that the time has come for the withdrawal of foreign missionaries from many parts of the third world, that the churches of the third world must be allowed to find their own identity, and that the continuation of the present missionary movement is a hindrance to this selfhood of the church". Gatu proposed that the problems of third-world churches "can only be solved if all missionaries are withdrawn in order to allow a period of not less than five years for each side to re-think and formulate what is going to be their future relationship". Also in 1971 Emerito Nacpil of the United Methodist Church in the Philippines said: "The present structure of modern missions is dead. We ought to eulogize it and then bury it... The most missionary service a missionary under the present system can do today in Asia is to go home."

In 1972 the WCC committee on Ecumenical Sharing of Personnel (ESP) claimed in a working paper that behind the moratorium call lies "the conviction that in their attempt to respond to God's mission, both sending and receiving churches find themselves caught in a pattern which inhibits rather than serves mission". Later, in 1974 and 1975, ESP recommended principles and procedures for mutual responsibility and relations in sharing personnel and resources, while commending a moratorium "for serious consideration when and where it is appropriate", as "self-discipline, not rejection... for the selfhood and discipline of the churches".

The 1973 CWME conference (Bangkok) recognized that "'partnership in mission' remains an empty slogan" and called for "a mature relationship between churches". It described a moratorium as one of the "more radical solutions" that would "enable the receiving church to find its identity, set its own priorities and discover within its own fellowship the resources to carry out its authentic mission. It would also enable the sending church to re-discover its identity in the context of the contemporary situation." While not endorsing moratorium, Bangkok received the report of section 3 that said: "In some situations the moratorium proposal, painful though it may be for both sides, may be the best means of resolving a present dilemma and advancing the mission of Christ.”

In 1974 the third assembly of the All Africa Conference of Churches (AACC) called for “a moratorium on the receiving of money and personnel... coming from [the churches’] foreign relationships” as being “the most viable means of giving the African church the power to perform its mission in the African context, as well as lead our governments and peoples in finding solutions to economic and social dependency”. This assembly also rejected WCC-ESP proposals for ecumenical sharing of personnel and resources as inadequate.

Numerous African churches, however, soon disassociated themselves from the AACC resolution. Discussion of moratorium reached a high point at the WCC fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975). While allowing that “there may be situations of dependence between churches where, for the sake of the integrity of a church’s witness in its own culture, there should be a temporary moratorium on existing dependencies in order to prepare for a more mature independence”, the report of section 2 recommended steps “towards a greater degree of joint action and witness”.

The outcome of the moratorium debate was greater recognition that the sending and receiving of personnel and funds are joint responsibilities, and that traditional relationships, structures and attitudes which perpetuate dependency had to change for the sake of mission* and the selfhood of the churches.

GERALD H. ANDERSON

■ AACC, The Struggle Continues: Official Report, Third Assembly, Lusaka, Zambia, May 1974, Nairobi, 1975 ■ G.H. Anderson, “A Moratorium on Missionaries?”, in Mission Trends, 1, 1974 ■ In Search of Mission: The Future of the Missionary Enterprise, IDOC Dossier 9, 1974 ■ “Moratorium Issue” (= IRM, 254, 1975) ■ E.M. Uka, Missionaries Go Home? A Sociological Interpretation of an African Response to Christian Missions: A Study in Sociology of Knowledge, Bern, Lang, 1989.

MORAVIANS

THE HERITAGE of the Moravian Church is in the so-called first Reformation of the 15th century and in 18th-century German pietism. Its origin can be traced to the Unity of the Brethren (Unitas Fratrum), one of the several groups of followers of the Czech reformer Jan Hus (burned as a heretic in 1415). In 1467 they established their own ministry; a visiting Waldensian clergyman ordained the first priests. Although many of the Brethren were assimilated into Lutheran and Reformed churches in Germany, Switzerland, Bohemia and Poland in the course of the 16th and 17th centuries, clandestine groups remained in Bohemia and Moravia. In 1722 some of them, who were in contact with a German pietist convert from Catholicism, were introduced to the Saxon nobleman Count Nicholas von Zinzendorf. During the following years a large number of Brethren immigrated to his domain, where they formed the Herrnhut settlement. The count took an increasing interest in the group, and in 1727 he drafted a legal contract setting forth their relationship to him and binding them to “walk according to the apostolic rule”. This formal revival of the Unity was as an ecclesiola in ecclesia within the established Lutheran Church of Saxony. In 1745 the Moravian church re-instituted the ministry of presbyter and deacon alongside its ancient episcopacy.*

Zeal for evangelism* characterized the revived Brethren, and the church spread not only in Europe but also to Greenland, Africa, the Middle East, India, the Caribbean and North and South America. In 2000 the church had about 700,000 members in 19 autonomous provinces around the world. Four provinces in Tanzania account for about half of the denomination’s members. Some of the provinces, especially in Central America (Nicaragua) and Southern Africa, have lived in the context of ethnic and civil conflict, which has helped to break down the resistance to social and political engagement from the church’s pietistic tradition.

Deliberately avoiding the development of its own unique system of doctrine, the church understands itself as a fellowship within the universal church of Christ and accepts the historic creeds and various Reformation confessions as “the thankful acclaim of the Body of Christ”, helpful for Christians in formulating their thought but not binding on believers. Moravians thus have a firm ecumenical commitment, rooted in Zinzendorf's doctrine of the "ways" (Tropen) in which God teaches – which places the various Christian confessions on an equal footing in relation to each other. Scripture* is understood as the sole source and guide for faith, teaching and life. Ten provinces are members of the WCC; in 1988 the Moravian Unity Synod (which meets every seven years) urged provinces which are not members to consider joining, while encouraging all the provinces to promote WCC programmes.

MARLIN VANELDEREN

■ A.J. Lewis, Zinzendorf the Ecumenical Pioneer, London, SCM Press, 1962 ■ J.R. Weinlick & A.H. Frank, The Moravian Church through the Ages: The Story of a Worldwide, Pre-Reformation Protestant Church, rev. ed., Bethlehem PA/Winston-Salem NC, Moravian Church in America, 1996.

MOTT, JOHN R.

B. 25 May 1865, Purvis, NY, USA; d. 31 Jan. 1955, Evanston, IL. If any one individual could be said to personify the modern ecumenical movement, it would be John R. Mott. In him converged uniquely the varied strands of which the ecumenical movement is woven.

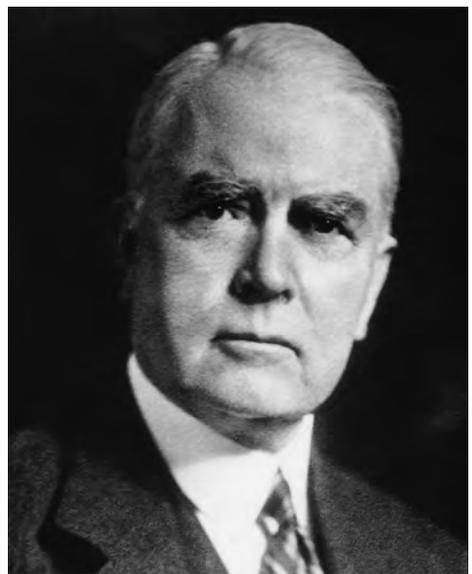

A plausible legend has it that when the young John Mott played with toy trains in the nursery, it was not just with single engines and tracks, but he laid out the toy lines to form a continental railroad system. As a student at Cornell University, Mott passed from agnosticism to faith* and went through the experience of evangelical conversion* after hearing an address by C.T. Studd, one of the famous "Cambridge Seven" – English undergraduate sportsmen who dedicated their lives to foreign missionary service. Shortly after, Mott signed the Student Volunteer Declaration, though his first job was as a travelling secretary of the student YMCA.* In 1895 he participated in the gathering at Vadstena, Sweden, out of which the World's Student Christian Federation* (WSCF) was born.

Students were the lever by which Mott sought to move the world towards God, and the WSCF was perhaps the area in which his most effective work for Christ's kingdom was done. He served it, as general secretary from 1895 and as chairman from 1920, for 33 years, and all his other achievements have their roots in the concerns which the WSCF fostered.

Mott's own missionary vocation found expression in the work leading up to the world missionary conference of 1910, of which he was the chairman. Edinburgh created a follow-up committee (which later became the International Missionary Council*) and Mott was closely associated with the IMC for the rest of his life.

In the cause of world evangelization, Mott was as tireless and as urgent as the apostle Paul – and as careful to follow up initial visits by continuing contact. He travelled repeatedly to Asia and Africa long before air travel made such journeying commonplace. Indeed, there were great advantages in the slower modes of ship and train, for Mott was highly disciplined in the use he made of travelling time. He prepared himself with detailed briefings about the area he was to visit and wrote voluminous notes on what he had seen and done before he plunged into the next encounter. He often travelled with a heavy trunk with iron bands, stuffed with history books, government reports, biographies and much else relating to his destination, and armed with introductions, carefully sought well in advance, to key people in church and state and other walks of life who could be harnessed, willingly or unwillingly, to the cause of Christ in their own land.

Mott was an exemplar of his own dictum about arranging a visit or a conference: "Plan as if there were no such thing as prayer. Pray as if there were no such thing as planning." Speaking easily no language but his own, he rehearsed with his interpreter (always chosen on careful advice) every important utterance until he was satisfied that every turn of phrase, every illustration, was fully grasped so that it could be accurately translated, while local guidance was sought to make sure there were no gaffes in sensitive political or theological areas. All this, of course, made great demands and grew beyond even his unaided resources.

Mott was not at first particularly a champion of Christian unity,* but his passion for evangelism* made him one. Like Charles Brent, he realized that Edinburgh 1910 implied more than cooperation. His most far-reaching decision arose from his encounter in the WSCF with the Eastern Orthodox churches. There he met Christian student movements which were solidly confessional in character, differing greatly from the often pietistic assumptions of many Western Protestant students. When, at a WSCF meeting at Nyborg in 1925, it was decided that confessional student movements could be corporate members of the federation, the vital distinction between interdenominational and denominational became part of ecumenism. Mott was fully at home, and played a large part, in the first two world conferences on Faith and Order (Lausanne 1927, Edinburgh 1937).

Equally inevitably, when his friend Nathan Söderblom, archbishop of Uppsala, took the lead in arranging the first world conference on Life and Work* (Stockholm 1925), Mott was among those who saw the value of international Christian witness in issues of peace and social justice. It was not surprising that he should have been awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1946, in recognition of his many contributions to the concord of nations.

At the 1937 Oxford conference of Life and Work (as at the Faith and Order conference in Edinburgh a few weeks later) he was among those who spoke forcefully in favour of the proposal to establish a world council of churches. He was, inevitably, a member of the committee charged with planning the structure of the emergent WCC.

Some ten years later, when the WCC held its inaugural assembly at Amsterdam, Mott, then in his 83rd year, preached at the opening service. "We have entered", he said, "the most exacting period in the history of the church. It will take all the statesmanship, all the churchmanship, all the self-forgetfulness of all of us. But to those who believe in the adequacy of Christ no doors are closed and boundless opportunities are open." At its close the assembly elected him to the unique office of honorary president – a token, at least, of the debt owed to him by the whole ecumenical movement.

OLIVER TOMKINS

- J.R. Mott, Addresses and Papers, 6 vols, New York, Association Press, 1946-47
- The Decisive Hour of Christian Missions, New York, Association Press, 1912
- Evangelism for the World Today, New York, Harper, 1938
- C.H. Hopkins, John R. Mott, 1865-1955: A Biography, WCC, 1979
- B. Matthews, John R. Mott: World Citizen, London, Harper, 1934.

MUSLIM-CHRISTIAN DIALOGUE

EVER SINCE the dawn of Islam there have been relations between Muslims and Christians, with roots springing from the deep soil of Abrahamic tradition. A group of early Muslim refugees found asylum in Christian Ethiopia, while numerous Qur'anic texts provided the bases for a range of attitudes which Muslims could assume with regard to their Christian neighbours. Some verses referred to non-Muslims generally, but others pointed specifically to the followers of Jesus. The latter include both warnings and commendations, leaving successive generations the duty of deciding their own policies and actions according to changing circumstances. In one passage, the Qur'an does refer to Christians as "nearest in affection" to Islam. The status of non-Muslims in the Islamic state included a blend of inferiority, freedom of religion and official protection. In its formative years, Arab-Islamic civilization was characterized by a remarkable ability to invite and integrate the various contributions that Christians were eager and able to offer.

Christians had no equivalent guidance from biblical texts and early Christian tradition. Thus they were free to see Islam in a kaleidoscope of impressions, from regarding it as a heresy* requiring suppression to seeing it as an estimable rival challenging them to compete with Muslims in good works, so that each faith might be judged by its fruit.

Mainly in the centuries before the crusades* and the Reconquista – which hardened the attitudes of both traditions – there was considerable co-existence and interpenetration. But Muslim-Christian contact can also be seen as a dreary series of military campaigns (some of which featured egregious acts of barbarity utterly inconsistent with submission to a merciful God or service to a loving Saviour) and an obstinate theological impasse exacerbated by the sublime triumphalism of both parties. Yet in the last few decades there has been real movement within the two communities towards constructive exchange on doctrinal questions as well as productive collaboration on common interests of a more practical character.

After a preliminary period of intramural reflection, the World Council of Churches, principally through its Sub-unit on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths, sponsored bilateral meetings between Muslims and Christians on a variety of themes. “Issues in Christian-Muslim Relations: Ecumenical Considerations” was received by the WCC central committee and sent to the churches in 1992, and “Striving Together in Dialogue: A Muslim-Christian Call to Reflection and Action”, drafted by a group comprised of Muslims and Christians, followed in 2001.

Roman Catholic institutions, particularly the Secretariat for Non-Christians (since 1988 called the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue), also developed dialogue programmes in the years following the Second Vatican Council.* There was, for instance, one major meeting of Christians and Muslims in Tripoli, Libya, in 1976, and a consultation involving Muslims and Christians from around the Mediterranean at Assisi in 1988. However, the Vatican has invested most of its efforts in establishing the principle of dialogue among its own faithful through workshops with local bishops conferences, academic teaching and research and, especially, topical addresses by Pope John Paul II; the most famous of these was his talk to several thousand young people at Casablanca in 1981. Religious orders like the Franciscans and the Missionaries of Africa (White Fathers) have fostered sustained intercommunal contacts in several parts of the world, as have a great many regional, national and local ecumenical organizations and several individual churches or confessional federations. The Muslim-Christian research group (GRIC), which has been working since 1977 with branches in half a dozen centres to develop serious theological reflection in a carefully balanced context, consists of Muslim and Christian theologians and other intellectuals from half a dozen branches of their faiths in six countries; they have developed a serious process of theological reflection on timely issues, some of which are thought to be quite divisive.

Dialogic initiatives have not been exclusively of Christian inspiration. In several instances, Muslim organizations have been the hosts of international dialogues, such as those held in Amman and elsewhere under the auspices of the (Jordanian) Royal Academy of Research on Islamic Affairs or those arranged by the Centre for Economic and Social Research at the University of Tunis. Representatives of the Muslim World Congress, the World Muslim League and the World Islamic Call Society have been meeting regularly with representatives from the Vatican and the WCC to exchange information, encouragement and advice.

The recent creation of Christian-Muslim fora for dialogue and cooperation is significant. An important case in point is the Arab Group on Christian-Muslim dialogue, founded in 1995 and supported by the Middle East Council of Churches* and the WCC.

In the early stages, most discussions elaborated the theme of dialogue itself, with a few pioneer spirits re-assuring one another that constructive interaction was the worthiest witness to each faith tradition and the surest means to the pluralistic harmony essential to enduring peace. The principal objective of any gathering was the very fact of meeting, although the ancillary benefits of a better awareness and understanding of each other’s beliefs, concerns and hopes made each conversation a new advance in the tentative search for trust. More substantive topics, like mission and da'wah (Chambésy 1976), or ethics and development (Beirut 1977), emerged as confidence matured. Also, the circle of enthusiasts gradually widened to embrace a fuller range of theological and social perspectives, affirming the importance of sound relations to both communities and bringing fresh spiritual insights to Muslims and Christians alike. The themes which recurred, for example, in the 1991-96 WCC-sponsored regional colloquia on religion, law and society led participants to a stronger commitment to common values and an enhanced respect for each other's particularities. Wider engagement has also spawned a proliferation of continuing associations in national and local settings, addressing specific questions of more direct focus; each of these contributes to the general impetus towards tolerance and exchange.

This tendency for more openness and the increasing numbers of participants in dialogue are not universally accepted among Christians and Muslims. In many places, communal suspicions are so ingrained that tension and armed conflict persist, in spite of the efforts of a valiant few. Many people still hold to narrow missiologies which view interfaith conversations simply as a means of changing the allegiance of their interlocutors, while others have adopted a spiritual isolationism of toleration without communication. Since a series of military actions and undeclared wars has been initiated by the leading Western power, considered by many as a Christian nation, and since leaders of this power have spoken of a "crusade" to defend Western values (whose Christian character can in any case be questioned), and since on the Muslim side violence has been introduced which is in contradiction with the Islamic tradition of legal self-defence, positions have again hardened.

Nevertheless, where dialogue was once a daring risk, it is now the preferred form of inter-religious discourse, and Muslims and Christians in every corner of the world are daily building mutual confidence even as they engage in more vital and varied agendas (e.g. ecology, theology and justice, trilateral talks with Jews). Whether we cite examples like the churches' support of the Project for Christian-Muslim Relations in Africa (Procure, Nairobi) or concerns once expressed by the Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs (Jidda), today's trend unquestionably is also towards wider involvement and deeper commitment.

As the experience of Christian-Muslim dialogue and cooperation grows and spreads, it begins to offer a prospect of counteracting processes which tend to globalize conflicts that involve Christians and Muslims. Enmities in one part of the world spill over to situations of tension in other regions. An act of violence in one place is used to confirm stereotypes of the "enemy" in another place or even provoke revenge attacks elsewhere in the world. There are many Muslims and Christians who refuse to be drawn into others' conflicts on the basis of uncritical responses to calls for confessional solidarity; instead, they uphold common principles of justice and reconciliation.

The recent work in Christian-Muslim dialogue has given priority to issues of identity, majority/minority relations and co-citizenship. In many countries, Muslim and Christian communities share the same language and often the same culture. Often, their members are said to be granted by law equal civil and political rights. But discriminatory practices exacerbate distrust and division. The intermingling of state policies and confessional identities rooted in communal traditions may lead communities to look at each other as a threat. This is particularly true in times of change and uncertainty.

In this context, the relevance of Muslim-Christian dialogue initiatives depends largely on their intentional and concentrated effort to dispel fears and suspicions between those who are seen to represent religious communities. Dialogue is seen as an opportunity for strengthening cross-confessional loyalties. Such dialogue is careful ever to uphold, in discussion and joint action, the centrality of the common good as well as inclusive political participation.

STUART E. BROWN

- M. Borrmans, Orientations pour un dialogue entre chrétiens et musulmans, Paris, Cerf, 1981 (ET = Guidelines for Dialogue Between Christians and Muslims, New York, Paulist, 1990) ■

S. Brown, The Nearest in Affection: Towards a Christian Understanding of Islam, WCC, 1994 ■ Christian Mission and Islamic Da'wah, Leicester, Islamic Foundation, 1982 ■ T. Mitri ed., Religion, Law and Society: A Christian-Muslim Discussion, WCC/Kampen, Kok Pharos, 1995 ■ J. Waardenburg ed., Muslim-Christian Perceptions of Dialogue Today: Experiences and Expectations, Leuven, Peeters, 2000 ■ WCC, Issues in Christian-Muslim Relations: Ecumenical Considerations, 1992 ■ WCC, Striving Together in Dialogue: A Christian-Muslim Call to Reflection and Action, 2001.

MYSTICISM

THE TERM “mysticism” is linked through its Greek root with the idea of the perception of what is kept secret and protected by silence, the invisible reality. For Paul “mystery” signifies the hidden wisdom and depths of God, the things that no eye has seen and no ear has heard, things beyond the human mind, which can be known only by the Spirit of God (see 1 Cor. 2:6-16). For him the incarnation* of the Word of God was “the mystery that has been hidden throughout the ages and generations but has now been revealed” (Col. 1:26).

In a real sense mysticism defies definition, partly because it refers to a very personal experience of God as the transcendent reality, which cannot be formulated in descriptive language or credal formulations. There are many mystical schools, most of them of monastic origin, with a variety of emphases. Mysticism is best described overall as the theory and practice of contemplative life. It is a second kind of faith – contemplation – which deepens the first faith. It has three stages: purification, illumination and perfection, which complement each other.

In the East, mysticism was introduced by Origen of Alexandria (c.185-c.254) in terms of the “mystical” interpretation of the biblical message, which goes far beyond the written text, words and symbols to the unveiled face of the Word of God as person. The most influential mystical writer was Dionysius the Areopagite (c.500), who wrote The Mystical Theology. His writings, translated by John Scotus Erigena and circulated in the West in the middle ages, stress the epistemological dimension of mysticism and speak about “apophatic theology”, the negative method of knowledge of the nameless God. For Symeon the New Theologian (949-1022), the only way to praise the ineffable grace of God is through The Hymns of Divine Love. Hesychasm, a spiritual stream that originated in Mount Athos (13th-14th centuries), concentrates on the continual invocation of the name of Christ (an echo of which we find in The Way of a Pilgrim, the story of a Russian pilgrim from the mid-19th century who practises the Jesus prayer: “Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me”).

In the West, the influence of Dionysius the Areopagite’s theory about “divine darkness” is seen in The Cloud of Unknowing, a mystical treatise of the 14th century. Meister Eckhart (c.1260-1327), a German mystical writer, developed the idea of the mystical direct vision of God, in a union like light to light. Another German mystical writer, Jacob Boehme (1575-1624), is the author of The Way to Christ. Julian of Norwich (c.1342-1413) and William Law (1686-1761) are among the best-known English mystical writers.

Western spirituality has been enriched by mystics such as St Thomas (“new state of grace”), Ignatius of Loyola (Spiritual Exercises), Francis of Assisi, Theresa of Avila and John of the Cross, Francis Xavier and Catherine of Siena. Cistercian and Cluniac reforms and the Franciscan movement, to take only two examples, owe a great deal to the impact of mysticism.

Two inter-related streams in the mystical tradition may be identified. The first emphasizes spirituality as a quality of life and aims at attaining purity of heart through a spiritual pilgrimage towards the fullness of Christ (Eph. 4:13), waging a perpetual “unseen war” against all destructive passions through a radical ascetic discipline (e.g. John Climacus, The Ladder of Divine Ascent). The second stream stresses the attainment of divine knowledge, or gnosis (Eva-grius of Pontus, 346-99). Here the goal is the illumination of the mind, expressed in an existential “negative” language which is beyond names and symbols. The gnosis experience takes the heart to a reality beyond faith, to God himself, to the depth of divine love changing the life of those who receive it: “All of us, with unveiled faces, seeing [or

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

reflecting] the glory of the Lord" (2 Cor. 3:18).

The various Christian mystical traditions display more similarities than differences. When it refers to the nature of the light we see and receive in mystical union, the Eastern Orthodox tradition speaks of the divine uncreated energies of God (e.g. Gregory Palamas of Salonika, 1296-1359), while the West uses the term "created grace". Deification, the transfiguration of persons (theosis), is thus given a different content and intensity. But the goal is the same – to reach out to the ultimate likeness of God: We "are being transformed into the same image" (2 Cor. 3:18). "All human beings are made in God's image; but to be in his likeness is granted only to those who through great love have brought their own freedom into subjection of God" (Diadochos of Photiki, 404-86, On Spiritual Knowledge).

Mysticism can have a great significance for the spirituality of our times, especially for personal spiritual growth and renewal movements. It can aid the process of contemplation, even of the created world around us. It can develop the human possibilities in our religious relationships with God (i.e. the anthropological and psychological dimensions of the image of God) and can rid us of illusions and speculations that so often cluster around human natural perfections.

Mysticism is by no means confined to Christianity, and in recent years Christians have been discovering the riches of the spiritualities of other faiths, often steeped in mysticism. A WCC meeting on "Spirituality in Interfaith Dialogue" (Kyoto 1987) explored some aspects of such spirituality and their significance for interfaith relations.

See also spirituality in the ecumenical movement.

ION BRIA

- P. Agaesse & M. Sales, "La vie mystique chrétienne", in Dictionnaire de spiritualité, vol. 10, Paris, Beauchesne, 1980
- T. Arai & W. Ariarajah eds, Spirituality in Interfaith Dialogue, WCC, 1989
- L. Bouyer, J. Leclercq, F. Vandembroucke & L. Coignet, Histoire de la spiritualité chrétienne (ET A History of Christian Spirituality, 4 vols, New York, Seabury, 1982)
- L. Dupré, "Mysticism", in The Encyclopedia of Religion, Mircea Eliade ed., vol. 10, New York, Macmillan, 1987
- C. Duquoc & G. Gutiérrez, Mysticism and the Institutional Crisis, London, SCM Press, 1994
- M. Fox ed., Western Spirituality: Historical Roots, Ecumenical Routes, Notre Dame IN, Fides/Claretian, 1979
- Paulos Mar Gregorios, Cosmic Man: The Divine Presence, New York, Paragon, 1988
- V. Lossky, The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church, New York, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1957
- J. Ryan ed., Christian Spiritual Theology: An Ecumenical Reflection, Melbourne, Dove Communications, 1986.

N

NATION

THE WORD “nation”, from which derive concepts such as nationalism and national security,* refers to a people with a consciousness of being a people* distinct from all others. A nation differs from groupings such as family or tribe in that the feeling of identification with others is rooted not simply in kinship or biology but also in geography, a shared history and a common material civilization.

One may speak of nations without reference to actual political units. For example, Eritreans, Hungarians and Macedonians identified themselves as nations even before the break-up of the Ethiopian, Hapsburg and Ottoman empires led to the creation of modern sovereign nation states. Long before the creation in 1948 of the state of Israel, Jews identified with other Jews as a people with a sense of solidarity and a well-defined attachment to the land of Israel. Even now, at a time when nationhood as a political structure is a common understanding, there are peoples who consider themselves as nations apart from the states which exercise authority over them. Thus, the Indian and Aboriginal peoples of Canada and Australia think of themselves as first nations of the sovereign states in which they live, while Palestinians living under Israeli rule regard themselves as a sovereign nation state in the making.

The nation, although originally viewed more generally, now universally is a political structure of the communal life of peoples. This more political concept of the nation emerged in modern history under the idea of nationalism. Today most peoples of the world are organized in nation states, political units claiming legitimacy through the self-determination of the people forming the unit, with the United Nations* an international body composed of representatives of nation states. The UN also grants special status to groups such as the Palestinians, who claim the right to call themselves nations.

Many scholars believe that "the rise of Protestantism coincided with the rise of modern nations" in Europe (Bennett, 93). Along with the Protestant Reformation, the Enlightenment and modern nationalism contributed to the break-up of European Christendom, which had been based on the Constantinian ideal of uniting church and empire. The result was the emergence of the sovereign nation state. Though the churches maintained confessional relations across national lines, they were organized nationally and, formally or informally, became subject to national governments. These European national churches were thus also inevitably involved in the expansion of national power in Asia and Africa, and eventually in the conflicts among European nations competing for imperial territories.

This imperialistic rivalry led to the first world war, which allowed the churches to see that nations had become a law unto themselves and that the supranational character of the church had been lost. The peace appeals addressed to the churches during and after the war by Swedish Archbishop Söderblom, the 1920 Lambeth (Anglican) appeal to Christian people and the actions of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches* all presupposed a close relation between international peace* and the unity* of the churches; this growing ecumenical movement thus posed the challenge of peace to modern sovereign nations. As Wilfred Monod argued, a spiritual league of churches must become the soul of a moral league of peoples and a political league of nations (A History of the Ecumenical Movement, I, 579).

By the 1930s a type of nationalism had emerged in Germany under Hitler which repudiated all spiritual connections with ecumenical Christianity or Christian values. The Oxford conference on "Church, Community and State" met in 1937 in the context of the struggle of the German Confessing Church* with Nazi paganism, a movement which deified the German Volk (nation) as rooted in blood and soil and the will-to-power over other peoples. The 1937 Oxford report on the universal church and the world of nations called upon the churches to maintain their supranational character and provided an ecumenical answer to totalitarian nationalism and its institutionalized idolatry.

During the second world war, the WCC in process of formation worked constantly on post-war peace aims and supported plans to establish the UN. In 1946 the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs was formed to aid the churches in assuming their responsibilities in working for peace and justice between nations.

In the International Missionary Council* (IMC) and later in the WCC study of "The Common Christian Responsibility towards Areas of Rapid Social Change", the ecumenical movement dealt with the growth of nationalism in Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Middle East. In these lands the nationalist movement had its roots in the revolt of the peoples against Western colonial domination and in their awakening to freedom, equality and other values to which Christian missions themselves had made a substantial contribution through their educational and religious work and their critique of traditional societies. The IMC was positively inclined to the demand of the younger churches for greater autonomy from mission control, for assuming primary responsibility for the evangelization of their nations, and for building indigenous national churches transcending Western denominationalism in order to make a united witness to awakening nations. Bishop V.S. Azariah of India had made this plea at the Tambaram meeting of the IMC in 1938, emphasizing that the churches of Asia and Africa were already organized in national Christian councils within the framework of the IMC. Generally speaking, it may be said that after Tambaram the idea of a united indigenous church for the nation-in-the-making was regarded as practically a theological principle in IMC circles.

In the period after the second world war the WCC's study of rapid social change made an attempt to understand and interpret theologically the politics of nationalism and of nation-building as they emerged in the third world. This became one of the principal points of discussion in the Salonika conference of 1958, which emphasized the danger involved in interpreting nationalism only on the basis of the Western experience. The meeting accepted the need to evaluate positively third-world nationalism, especially in the stage when it expressed the awakening of people to the dignity of their selfhood. Consequently, the report of Salonika called on the ecumenical movement to recognize the moral and spiritual justification of nation-building movements, which are means for the emancipation of dependent peoples: "Such emancipation is to be welcomed and encouraged by the Christian church. The concept of the 'responsible society' implies that people are called to accept responsibility to God and their fellowmen and women for the choices and decisions on which the life of their societies is based; and responsible participation in social and political life can only be achieved where each national group or unit can express itself in freedom. Therefore these nationalisms should not be equated with that aggressive nationalism which seeks to dominate other peoples or an isolationist nationalism which denies responsibility for other peoples. Nevertheless it is necessary to stress the fact that even a legitimate movement of nationalism expressing the urge for political freedom or for nation-making has in it the seeds of perversion" (Dilemmas, 57).

In a chapter entitled "The Church and the Conflict of Nationalism and Colonialism", in his book summarizing the rapid social change study, Paul Abrecht gives an overview of the theological debate on this issue. It is evident that many European Christians were not happy with the resurgence of nationalism in third-world countries. Though some, like the German theologian Heinz-Dietrich Wendland, wrote favourably about the "constructive nationalism" of the third world, the general trend was what Abrecht calls Christian anti-nationalism. Europeans considered it their duty to warn non-Europeans of the dangers of unreasonable outbursts of "exaggerated nationalism". They regretted that the newly formed governments in Asia and Africa "seemed to repeat the mistakes which Europe made in the past" (Abrecht, 97-98).

This warning was in fact absorbed into the Salonika report when it recognized the seeds of corruption in the emerging nationalism in Asia and Africa. In effect, Salonika emphasized only one phase of the historical phenomenon. But it was also convinced that no self-awakened people in today's world of nations could bypass the stage of nationalism and internationalism, with all their ambiguities, as they struggled towards other and higher expressions of community and selfhood.

Indeed in its assemblies in Bangkok (1968) and Singapore (1973), the East Asia Christian Conference (now the Christian Conference of Asia [CCA]) noted that "nationalism as an ethos" had become inadequate to bring social justice to the peoples of Asia. The Bangkok assembly said that nationalism had become confined to the elite sections of society, an ideology which justified their search for power and affluence. A positive nationalism should motivate the people to make sacrifices as they commit themselves to the development of their country. "But this nationalism can live only from the sense of equality and oneness created by an equal sharing of power by the people" (Thomas, 199-200). Furthermore, nationalism with its emphasis on national security, unity and stability was in many countries giving rise to "an ethos for preserving the existing structures against change and to justify the suppression of democratic rights and mass action for change" (204). In its later thinking on social action for justice, the CCA emphasized the ethos of the "people" rather than that of the "nation". In the 1970s in many third-world countries the emphasis shifted from national development to people's liberation, as the ideological dynamic among Christian people concerned with justice.

Theologically, contemporary Christians are dealing with at least three broad issues concerning the concept of nation. The first has to do with the continued struggle of peoples for self-determination. The process of decolonization, an achievement to which the WCC contributed through initiatives such as the Programme to Combat Racism,* is not complete. In October 1945 there were 51 member nations of the UN. At the end of 2000, that number had increased to 189 member nations. However, the struggle for national self-determination continues in Palestine, Tibet and elsewhere.

Second, the burden of debt in the poorer world, freer trade between nations and technological innovations in the flow of funds and ideas are factors which have raised questions about the role of powerful multinational corporations and trans-governmental bodies such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Structural adjustment programmes imposed by these institutions contribute to a widening gap between the world's poor and rich, with women and children bearing a disproportionate share of the burden. The ideology of the free market, now virtually unopposed, gave rise to an accelerated process of globalization of the world's economy, culture and means of communication. Its proponents argue that the nation state is an outmoded concept and that the idea of national sovereignty must inevitably give way to a single global market without borders.

Finally, the collapse of several federal states and empires in the 1980s, notably the break-up of the Soviet Union, Yugoslavia and Ethiopia and the end of military rule in many countries, has not yet resulted in the creation of civil society* in many of the new sovereign nations. The persistence of ancient national identities, rivalry for power, and competition for scarce resources have resulted in a number of regional conflicts. The colossal tragedy of war in Bosnia, Liberia, Rwanda and elsewhere has led Christians to exercise a role of mediating an end to these conflicts, encouraging steps towards reconciliation and healing the wounds of war. However, the violent character of many of these struggles raised the question of identification between some churches and other religious groups and the ethnic group or "nation" with which they have deep historical roots. The idea of the pluri-ethnic nation state is thus called into question through processes of "ethnic cleansing" sometimes related to religion.

At the start of the third millennium, we are witnesses to two counter tendencies: continuation of a process by which peoples equate national identity with sovereign nation states, and globalization. As people throughout the world struggle to move beyond the negative consequences of nationalism, the Christian church as a supranational worldwide reality has a role to serve as a counter-weight to the transnational institutions of exploitation and to be an agent of reconciliation, enhancing the human dignity and freedom of all.

See also international order, national security, responsible society.

M.M. THOMAS and PAUL DEKAR

- P. Abrecht, Churches and Rapid Social Change, London, SCM Press, 1961
- P. Abrecht & R.L. Shinn eds, Faith and Science in an Unjust World, vol. 2: Reports and Recommendations, WCC, 1980
- B. Ackermann, H.M. de Lange & J. Wiersma eds, Discernment and Commitment, Kampen, Kok Pharos, 1993
- J. Bennett, Christians and the State, New York, Scribner, 1958
- Dilemmas and Opportunities for Christian Action in Rapid Social Change, WCC, 1959
- J. Coleman & M. Tomka eds, Religion and Nationalism, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1995
- E. Hobsbawm, Nations and Nationalism since 1870, 2nd ed., Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1992
- H. Kohn, The Idea of Nationalism: A Study in Its Origins and Background, New York, Macmillan, 1944
- M.M. Thomas, Towards a Theology of Contemporary Ecumenism, WCC, 1978
- Towards the Sovereignty of the People. A Search for an Alternative Form of Democratic Politics in Asia: Christian Discussion, Singapore, CTC-CCA, 1983.

NATIONAL SECURITY

THE HOBBSIAN view that society* appears as a means of self-protection in the "war of all against all” is elevated by the doctrine of national security to a universal and all-embracing ideology* and a principle for the state and political life. For Hobbes, such conflict is the natural condition of humanity; the state is a contract through which human beings surrender their authority to a sovereign in return for protection from others.

The immediate origin of national security as a doctrine was the organization of national security by the USA after the second world war (e.g. through the US’s national security act, National Security Council, CIA and National War College created in 1947-48). But the idea goes back to romantic ideas of pan-Germanism, e.g. from Rudolf Kjellen, who held that “the state can survive only if it practises power politics” because “all civilized life finally rests on power”. Nazism made this ideology its own, and after the second world war several Latin American generals developed a geopolitical theory built on those assumptions (Golbery in Brazil, Villegas in Argentina, Pinochet in Chile). The amalgam of the “security” idea of the cold war* and the geopolitical dream inspired in a number of third-world countries the creation of national security totalitarian states.

The doctrine can be summarized in the three words “power”, “state”, “security”, and in three strategies – constant growth (expansion), permanent war (internal or external) and total control (totalitarianism). Power is “the ability of the state to make its own will reality”; strategy is the organization of domestic affairs and foreign relations so that power may operate most efficiently in achieving the interests of the state. Total war is a permanent condition on all levels: military, ideological, economic, political. A strong, committed elite must hold total power and be able to command all resources.

The total war in the period of the cold war, for example, was against international communism; the enemy was both external and internal (involving infiltration, ideological indoctrination, terrorism and revolution); the military were the only elite capable of facing this challenge. National security was built into an international issue, integrating national security states into the “security system of the West” led by the USA and into the world capitalist economy in its new “world market integration”.

In some countries (particularly in the Americas) this doctrine was given a religious formulation as a war against materialistic atheism* and for the sake of Christianity (witness the New Right in the USA). In Latin America it sometimes revived the old ultramontane ideology of writers like Joseph de Maistre, who said that “war is the normal state of humankind” and that the concentration of authority* was a necessary means for waging such war, since “when the human soul has lost its vigour due to laziness, unbelief... vices... it can only be tempered again by blood”. Such bizarre ideas have been used to justify arbitrary repression, human rights violations and genocide in many countries throughout the third world.

The doctrine of national security was denounced and condemned by church authorities in Europe, North America and the third world. The arguments can be summarized in a statement from the third conference of the Latin American Council of Bishops (Puebla 1979): “It places the individual at the unlimited service of the total war against the cultural, social, political and economic conflicts and, with them, against the threat of communism. Facing this real or possible permanent danger, all individual freedoms are, as in all emergency situations, limited, and the will of the state is substituted for the will of the people. Economic development and war potential take precedence over the needs of the abandoned masses... It even tries to justify itself... as a doctrine defending Western Christian civilization.” The WCC addressed the inherent dangers of this doctrine in its studies on militarism/militarization,* human rights,* political ethics and the conditions for genuine global security. “The only security worthy of the name”, said the general secretary in 1979, “lies in enabling people to participate fully in the life of their nation and to establish relations of trust between peoples of different nations.”

See also nation, civil society.

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO

■ J. Comblin, The Church and the National Security State, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1979 ■ Commission on Global Governance, Our Global Neighbourhood: The Report of the Commission on Global Governance, New York, Oxford UP, 1995 ■ J.-A. Viera Gallo ed., The Security Trap, Rome, IDOC, 1979.

NATURAL LAW

IN AN EARLY study entitled The Social Thought of the World Council of Churches (1956), Edward Duff pointed to two theological traditions: one he called catholic (mainly represented in the WCC by Anglicans), characterized as an ethic of ends and based on an optimistic anthropology (all human beings have the ability to distinguish good from evil by means of reason); the other he termed protestant, an ethic of inspiration, supported by a pessimistic anthropology (sin has darkened reason, which is now unable to see the good by itself) and therefore seeing a sharp discontinuity between reason and revelation*. For the first of these two streams the concept of natural law is essential. Several years later C.-H. Grenholm would still see these main trends but would also speak of a “mixed theological ethics” which would build bridges between the two. The question remains: How is the notion of natural law to be understood, and what place should it occupy in our approach to questions of ethics* (involving the individual and society) and of law* (involving rights and international law)?

NATURAL LAW IN HISTORY

The notion of natural law has a long and complex history. The early fathers, who received it mainly from the Stoic tradition (esp. from Seneca and Cicero), conceived it as the order of the universe, perceived by human reason, which participates in the logos that penetrates all of reality. It is objective and universal. In the effort to relate such law to concrete ethical questions, some were inclined to relate it to biological data, referring to animal life or to “the natural function proper to an organism”. Others, such as Irenaeus and, more systematically, Augustine, established a distinction between a primary and absolute right (preceding the fall) and a secondary and derived one (under the conditions of sin*).

Thomas Aquinas, drawing also from Aristotle and the Roman jurists of the empire, developed a more systematic and flexible concept of natural law, which has remained the basis of Roman Catholic ethics.

Simplifying, we can summarize Thomas’s view under three headings: (1) The human person is a psycho-physical unity directed towards a transcendent fulfilment; we thus exclude all crass objectivism and introduce a teleological dimension into all ethical questions. (2) One must distinguish between the primary precepts of natural law, which Thomas basically identifies in formal terms (“one should do good and avoid evil” or “one should act according to reason”), with some derivations which are attached to it (e.g. self-preservation, conjugal union as necessary for procreation, sociality and the recognition of God), and secondary precepts, which are derived from the primary but involve the mediation of circumstantial knowledge and reflection (e.g. things related to property or to political decisions). (3) Despite the classical metaphysical conception of human nature, the idea of natural law manifests a certain changeability and historicity because of the fallibility of instrumental human reason and the multiplicity and variety of relevant factors.

In spite of the criticisms of the Aquinas definition (e.g. by Ockham), it was not until the Reformation that his conception of natural law was seriously challenged. Although the reformers do recognize the value of human reason in discerning the good in everyday human life, they tend to undermine the whole edifice of natural law by their emphasis on the break introduced in human existence through sin and humanity’s consequent and absolute dependence on God’s self-revelation for knowing God’s will. Since such a break could not dispense with the question of how to make personal and social ethical decisions, Protestantism has sometimes re-introduced a variation of natural law in the notion of the orders, sometimes radically separated a spiritual and a secular realm, sometimes tried to apply biblical laws and sometimes looked for a more comprehensive Christological principle.

CRISIS AND THE VALIDITY OF THE CONCEPT OF NATURAL LAW

Since the last century the notion of natural law has undergone a shattering criticism from three quarters. Philosophically, positivism and existentialism have rejected the idea of an essential and immutable human nature, or even simply of human nature as such, thus undercutting the possibility of speaking of a universal law rooted in it. Second, anthropology and sociology have corroborated such criticisms by showing that nothing can be called universal in moral precepts, considering the laws and customs of human societies across time and cultures. If we would speak of a "universal moral principle", it would have to be so general ("do the good and don't do evil") that it would have no practical significance. Furthermore, modern science has "historicized" even biological human reality (see bioethics). Third, Protestant theologians have forcefully opposed the idea of natural law, calling it "human self-justification" (Hans Dombois) or "arrogance before God" (Heinz-Horst Schrey), on the basis that "it overlooks God's revelation in Christ" (Karl Barth), it is "a total interpenetration of creation and sin" (Helmut Thielicke), or it has an implicitly deist view of a creation which "God, so to say, would have abandoned" (Regin Prenter).

Under such combined criticisms, many have dismissed the notion of natural law. However, some of the questions which this concept answered have not disappeared. "Juridical positivism" (Hans Kelsen etc.) has proved insufficient as a foundation of law. There seems to be an ineradicable human sense of right which protests an unjust law, even when it has been "positively legislated". There is a rebellion against established patterns in the name of some superior justice attributed to the gods, to reason or to human conscience. We can, usually ex post facto, find social and economic reasons that explain the objective conditions underlying such appeals. But it would hardly seem intellectually honest to ignore this sense of transcendent good and justice.

The Christian community living in the world, however, cannot escape its responsibility to participate in the human effort to distinguish good from evil, to define moral values, to make moral judgments and to establish laws. In so doing, how should one relate the specific vision rooted in God's revelation, attested in scripture and experienced in the church, to the ethical insights (whatever their origin) of the human community? If we hold to the Christian doctrine of creation,* to the universality of the work of Christ, to the eschatological hope of God's kingdom,* are we not forced to establish some relation between God's creative, redemptive and fulfilling activity and the questions raised by human (personal, social, political) life in the world? In the context of these issues we find some theological attempts to re-interpret "natural law" or to find another theological key to give a response to such questions. Some of these attempts have been significant in the ecumenical conversation.

Some thinkers attempt to discover an anthropological structure which, avoiding the pitfalls of objectivism, can provide a basis for a joint reflection on ethics by Christians and non-Christians. Emil Brunner has done so by defining the human in terms of an I-Thou relationship which undergirds the basic category of "responsibility" as fundamental ethical structure. Building on that foundation, Brunner reinterprets the classic doctrine of "the orders" and develops a critical and constructive dialogue with secular ethical thinking. In a different line, Paul Tillich builds a system of correlation on the basis of the human openness to the transcendent as an "ultimate concern". This expression of being under the conditions of existence (of which Jesus as the Christ is the symbol) makes it possible to discuss ethical issues in their historical form without destroying their transcendent dimension (see Tillich's Systematic Theology, vol. 3). Although through a different line of reasoning, this approach is analogous to Karl Rahner's anthropological method, which Johann Metz has continued and transformed as basis for a "political theology" and a theology of praxis. On the Anglo-Saxon scene, and more directly related to WCC definitions, ethicists like John Bennett, John Macquarrie and J.H. Oldham have looked for "middle" ethical formulations (see middle axioms) on which Christians and non-Christians can cooperate and which, although not claiming to derive from some universal and unchangeable natural law, do represent a certain ethical sense or some common "awareness of the desirable good". Concrete utopias like the idea of the responsible society* or, in more recent times, the just, participatory and sustainable society* or justice, peace and the integrity of creation* belong to this category.

A reading of recent Roman Catholic ethical pronouncements suggests that, while natural law continues to be a significant element, biblical and theological considerations tend to occupy a privileged place as the basis for ethical definitions, mediated by an analysis of social, economic and scientific conditions. Vatican II's pastoral constitution Gaudium et Spes seems to point to a method which D. Lanfranchi (see his article "Ley Natural" in Diccionario Teológico Interdisciplinar) summarizes in three points: (1) the style is that of dialogue between the church and the world; both must give and receive, which means a dialogue with human sciences, cultures and religions; (2) the dialogue engages not only the magisterium but the whole church, laypeople as well as the clergy, therefore "every Christian who thinks and reflects on himself and on the meaning of his own life and activity contributes to the discovery and formulation of the natural law"; (3) in this dialogue the church offers, but does not impose, "its vision of man and of the natural law, taken from a higher light: revelation". While the document exhorts a person to enter into his or her own heart, there discerning one's "proper destiny beneath the eyes of God" (a typical Thomist view), there is a strong emphasis on "the dignity of the moral conscience" as the voice of God, "a law written by God" in the heart. The chapter on anthropology culminates in a Christological section in which Christ is seen as the key to the understanding and destiny of the human.

This Christological approach, which in principle would seem to be the direct opposite of natural-law theology, can, however, be seen as offering a fruitful approach to the questions mentioned above. Strongly affirming the unique and universal meaning of Christ's redemption for all humankind, Barth can re-instate a form of humanism in which the dignity of the human person* becomes a fundamental point of departure for ethics, while, by way of analogy, the kingdom of God which is revealed and enacted in Christ offers a parable for thinking about the civil community. The Christological approach has been carried through in Bonhoeffer's tantalizingly incomplete but enormously fruitful Ethics, in which human life is fully honoured in its autonomy, while Christ is seen as the ultimate being for all reality and ethics as "con-formity", with Christ "taking shape" in it.

The version of natural law as a universal, immutable law, knowable to all through reason and able to be formulated in specific terms in relation to almost every possible question (as certain rationalists claimed in the 17th century) is certainly impossible. Even classic theorists of natural law (Thomas Aquinas in the first place) qualified and corrected that view. But it is also clear that an ecumenical ethics cannot avoid today a dialogue with the re-interpretations of natural law in recent Catholic and non-Catholic ethics, not only because it is a dialogue within the Christian family, but because it relates to issues of fundamental importance for a Christian ethics that intends to be relevant to human reality.

See also anthropology, theological; grace.

■ D. Bonhoeffer, Ethik (ET Ethics, London, SCM Press, 1955) ■ E. Brunner, Das Gebot und die Ordnungen (ET The Divine Imperative, London, Lutterworth, 1937) ■ M. Cromartie, A Preserving Grace: Protestants, Catholics, and Natural Law, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1998 ■ E. Duff, The Social Thought of the World Council of Churches, London, Longmans Green, 1956 ■ J. Fuchs, Lex naturae, Dusseldorf, Patmos, 1955 ■ C.-H. Grenholm, Christian Social Ethics in a Revolutionary Age, Uppsala, Verbum, 1973 ■ H. Thielicke, Theologische Ethik (ET Theological Ethics, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1979).

NATURE

THE ENGLISH word "nature" (Latin natura, Greek physis) is used in at least three senses: (1) the constitutive nature of an entity (e.g. "a wolf is by nature cruel"); (2) natural phenomena untouched by humans (e.g. "nature and culture are two distinct but related realms"); and (3) the whole of reality (e.g. "nature has endowed human beings with a very complex brain structure"). The New Testament uses the word often in the first sense ("Jews by birth", Gal. 2:15; "by nature children of wrath", Eph. 2:3; "natural branches", Rom. 11:21,24), i.e. as the structure and constitution with which someone or something is born (see also James 3:6-7; 2 Pet. 1:4; 1 Cor. 11:14; Gal. 4:8). But there is no Hebrew equivalent for this Greek word physis.

The second and third senses of physis are not in the New Testament or the Old Testament, except in the Hellenistic, apocryphal 4 Macc. 5:5-8 (LXX), where the pagan Antiochus Epiphanes recommends swine's flesh to Eleazar the high priest as a gracious "gift of nature" and says it is wrong to reject "nature's favours".

Etienne Gilson thinks with Malebranche that "nature is par excellence an anti-Christian idea, a remnant from pagan philosophy which has been accepted by imprudent theologians". Aristotle and the Stoics used the word physis to denote more or less the whole universe with all its creative and regulative powers as a self-existent and self-sustaining whole.

In current usage one finds both the inclusive and the exclusive senses of the word "nature", i.e. including humanity or excluding it. Nature has often been opposed to culture or civilization, especially since Rousseau. One of the several meanings of the word as given by the Oxford English Dictionary (1908 ed.) is "the material world, or its collective objects and phenomena, especially those with which man is most directly in contact; frequently, the features and products of the earth itself, as contrasted with those of human civilization".

Theologians often speak of a process of "historicization of nature" in Israel when the three "nature-feasts" of unleavened bread, first-fruits and booths (Ex. 23:14-17; Deut. 16:1-17) were related to acts of God in history. But the Hebrew OT does not make the distinction between nature and history,* for the Hebrew language does not have words for these concepts as such. The great redemptive act of the exodus was as much an event in "nature" as in "history" (e.g. the burning bush, the ten plagues, the drying up of the sea, the land flowing with milk and honey, the thunder and lightning at the appearance of Yahweh).

The dichotomy between nature and many other entities, like grace, the supernatural, history, humankind, culture, etc., seems peculiar to the Western tradition. The 9th-century European Christian conception of natura included God. John Scotus Erigena (c.810-c.877) gave the four-fold classification of nature: (1) nature, creating and not created, i.e. God; (2) nature created and creating, i.e. the Platonic kosmos noētos, or world of archetypal or universal ideas generating particular existents; (3) nature created and not creating, in which category Erigena puts humanity, which cannot create ex nihilo; and (4) nature uncreated and not creating, a medieval conception of the final apokatastasis, or restoration, when all creativity will stop in a static perfection wherein God is all in all.

But medieval thought never conceived a "natural order" which was independent of the "supernatural order". "Nature" in our sense was a dynamic, contingent, caused entity. It had its own “natural laws”, but God was not subject to these natural laws and could interfere with them and annul them when needed, e.g. in the miracles. God is not bound by nature; nature is bound by God. God can also unbind the laws of nature.

This law-bound nature is active. Nature is an agent. All that happens in the world is caused exclusively by three agents: God, nature and humanity. Everything is an act of God, an act of nature or an act of humanity. When God acts, it is a supernatural act, as distinguished from the last two.

This way of thinking was strange to the Eastern fathers. They spoke about acting according to nature or contrary to nature (kata physin or para physin), but they also never spoke about anything hyperphysikos (supernatural), except in a poetic sense.

For the Eastern fathers, as for the biblical witness, the act of creation* is the opening phase of God’s redeeming work (see redemption). Both the book of Genesis and the gospel of John begin with an account of this opening phase. In the prophecies of Deutero-Isaiah we find that the framework of God’s redeeming activity is his original act of creation (Isa. 40:21-28, 42:5-9, 44:24-28, 45:12-25, 51:9-16, etc.). Part of God’s redeeming act is the restoring of creation (Isa. 41:17-20).

In the debate between the inclusive versus exclusive view of nature, Christians must be careful not to fall into the trap of including just two entities – humanity and nature. The package has always three “poles” – God, humanity and the world. Neither the second nor the third could exist apart from or independently of the first.

It is important to note here the fundamental tension between certain Eastern religions and the West Asian tradition of semitic religions. The latter prefer to put an almost unbridgeable gap between the world and the transcendent God. In contrast, Hinduism and Taoism generally have the same ethos as Stoicism in the West, where the world is God and God is the world. Only Buddhism steers clear of this semitic versus South Asian debate.

By refusing to raise the question of God* altogether and by positing the world and humanity as two inter-related and interacting entities, everything being dependent on everything else and everything in a process of dynamic change, the Buddhist doctrines of causality and dependent origination of phenomena at least avoid the cleavage of transcendence and keep everything together.

In the Indian tradition, the earliest strand, samkhya, is dualistic. Prakrti (nature) is contrasted with purusha (person). This is a non-inclusive view of nature, seeing it as devoid of its own consciousness or purpose, composed of various qualities (gunas) in mutual interaction. In opposition to this position, Sankara developed the monistic view in which what we call nature, including humanity, is Brahman, or the Absolute itself, wrongly perceived as separate from the Absolute. In the Chinese tradition of Tao, the two opposing but complementary principles of yin and yang together constitute all reality, including God, world and humanity.

The Christian teaching prefers the word ktisis (creation) to physis (nature) to refer to the whole world. The three classic passages in the NT are John 1:1-18, Col. 1:15-20, and Heb. 11:3. In speaking of the created order, the NT always insists that it is held together in and by the second person of the Trinity,* without whom it would be nothing. The biblical tradition not only insists that the created order has its beginning in God but also affirms that without God the world has neither present nor future. The Eastern fathers of the church continued this tradition. The classic patristic writing is Basil’s nine homilies on the Six Days of Creation (Hexaemeron). Most of the key doctrines whose origin is wrongly attributed to Augustine in the Western tradition can be found in Basil and Gregory of Nyssa two generations earlier. The world does not begin in time, but in God’s will and word (Hexaemeron 1.5ff.). The six days of creation are not 24-hour days (caused by the sun, created only on the fourth day) but long epochs. There is no “three-storey universe” as we see in Rudolf Bultmann’s caricature of patristic teaching. The created order is unfinished, dynamic, moving towards its fulfilment. Heaven is not a place but an order of many-dimensional reality closed to our senses.

Gregory of Nyssa (c.330-c.395) was more philosophical in his discussion of the created order. Spatio-temporal extension and incessant change are the characteristics of the created as distinct from the Creator. There is both continuity by participation and discontinuity by transcendence or standing apart, extension between God and world. The created order is a space-time process, or rather a procession, orderly and sequential, journeying through life from something to something. Life is an important aspect of that procession from origin to perfection; it is through the evolution of life that the procession moves forward. Human activity is the key for progress. Human aspiration for the greater good and humanity's free creativity of the good are the factors that make the world meaningful.

In the Byzantine tradition, Maximus the Confessor (580-662) uses the word "nature" only in the first sense, i.e. the constitutive nature of a group or class of entities. For "nature" in the inclusive sense he uses ktisis (creation). Its original unity comes by virtue of its common origin both in non-being and in the creative energy of the logos which holds it together. It has also a destined or eschatological unity, achieved by and in Jesus Christ, God-Man, body-soul, who took his body in the ascension to the heavens, or eternal realms. Creation is thus inseparable from redemption.

In modern science, nature was often thought of as an objectively existing entity, independent of the Creator and the observing human mind. Today the objective existence of a world can no longer be assumed in science. The world of phenomena can be seen as something emerging in human consciousness and experience, known to be ultimately composed of energy waves operating both in the mind and in the world.

Science persists in the hope that these phenomena can be explained without reference to any Creator outside of it. In science itself there is no basis for the concept of something called nature independent of God and humanity.

The concept of nature as a generic term for reality, whether inclusive or exclusive of humanity, is thus misleading. Christians know only a dynamic created order with a beginning and a destiny as well as a course or path to be traversed from beginning to fulfilment. This created order, which comes out of non-being, has the creative word of God as its original constitutive power and its present sustaining force. Its fulfilled unity is eschatological, to come at the end. This unity is achieved by the God-Man, body-soul Jesus Christ, who united in himself all things and reconciles them to God as a single offering.

PAULOS MAR GREGORIOS

- P. Evdokimov, "Nature", Scottish Journal of Theology, 18, 1965
- P. Gregorios, Cosmic Man: The Divine Presence, New York, Paragon, 1987
- P. Gregorios, The Human Presence, New York, Amity, 1987
- G.S. Hendry, Theology of Nature, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1980.

A theology of nature is not the same as a doctrine of creation. They are related, but they have different starting points and serve different purposes.

Belief in God as Creator declares that all existence has its origin in God, is dependent on him at every instant, stands secure in him and, despite much that is wrong, is to be affirmed as an expression of his loving purpose. In the Bible the doctrine takes shape, not in speculation about the nature of the world, but in the working out of the implications of the sovereignty and power of God, who has called and saved his people. The Lord of history* is Lord too of the powers of the world and provides his people with an orderly and stable environment in which they are to live by his laws. The first chapter of Genesis is a declaration of faith in such an environment, all the more remarkable for being made in a world where much was threatening, painful and mysterious.

Deeper insight into the doctrine shows its ultimate basis in God's grace,* an out-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

pouring of love constrained by nothing beyond itself, and finally validated by the revelation* in Jesus Christ.* As God's agent in creation (Col. 1:16-17), Christ sets his seal on its character and points forward to the new creation, in which all will be gathered up in himself. Meanwhile the operation of grace entails a certain distancing between God and his handiwork, the creation of a degree of "space" to allow creatures to be themselves and thus to respond freely to the love which is offered them.

Creation includes heaven as well as earth. Here the concept diverges most sharply from that of nature. Whatever is meant by "heaven" in this context – and interpretations have been many and various – it is clear that earth is not the sole sphere of God's concern and creative activity. Creation, in other words, is an inclusive term describing all that is not God in its relation to God, and disclosing a goodness and a purposiveness in things which, because they are gifts of grace, are not to be taken for granted. Such a belief is in theory compatible with very different cosmologies and histories of the universe, and in philosophical terms is directed, not towards detailed scientific explanations, but to the fundamental questions why anything should exist at all, and to what purpose.

By contrast, a theology of nature cannot avoid taking account of the way things are. The term "nature" itself is used in a variety of senses, sometimes referring to the essence of whatever is being described ("human nature"), sometimes to the particular characteristics of a person or thing ("a cruel nature"), sometimes to the world apart from human interference (land* which has "returned to nature"), and sometimes it is simply used as a word for everything, human beings included, as in the phrase "the natural world". These confusions are further increased by the two senses of "natural law".* The first sense, the scientific, refers to the way in which entities and processes of the observable world relate to and interact with one another. The second sense, the moral, refers to the ways in which human beings ought to behave if they had a fully rational insight into their true end as given by God. The common thread in all these meanings is the belief that things are what they are, and that this reality can in some measure be discerned and described. From a theological perspective the givenness in the ordering of things is seen as deriving from the creative activity of God. If this order is further seen as the outworking of a rational and intelligible divine plan, the way is open for the development of natural science, and as a matter of history it was in fact such a Christian belief in creation which made science intellectually possible.

However, such a simple identification between the divine plan and the world as studied by natural science does not do justice to the actual complexities inherent in the concept of nature. Some theologians, for example, would want to emphasize the extent to which the whole natural world is somehow entailed in the fallenness of humanity (Rom. 8:19-21) and thus expresses God's intention only in terms of what it is moving towards, rather than in terms of what it now is. There are doubts too about the extent of human rationality and thus about the ability of the human mind to discern the true nature of things unaided by revelation.

From an opposite perspective, some would bring scientific criticism to bear on theology, questioning whether in an evolving world the belief that there is a fixed nature of things can really be sustained. If everything is in process of change and development, then perhaps it is only the basic laws of nature, rather than any particular forms within it, which represent the orderliness of God's creative activity. The so-called harmony of nature, on this view, results from the complex interaction of many conflicting forces and is not necessarily stable or permanent. The recently developed chaos theory underlines the unpredictability of a great many familiar physical processes and points to a universe with very many more degrees of freedom than it has been customary to suppose since the rise of mechanistic physics. In such a fluid and open universe, our human ability to manipulate the natural world for our own ends assumes an even greater significance and places a heavy burden of responsibility on us as possessors of these powers.

Much contemporary discussion of nature centres on the extent to which the natural world is to be seen as resource to be exploited, a God-given reality to be respected and treasured for its own sake, or as a process in which human beings are themselves inextricably involved and in which they have no privileged place. Environmental concerns are leading to the re-discovery of neglected theological emphases, of which the most fruitful is still probably the idea of the responsible stewardship of nature. But other emphases, rooted in incarnational theology, stress the potentiality of the natural world for bearing the image of the divine and hence provide a theological basis for regarding it as having its own intrinsic worth. A theocentric understanding of nature, derived from the Christian doctrine of creation, might similarly underline the significance of all created things as having their own value in God's sight and therefore as being worthy of respect and protection.

Such thinking represents a radical departure from those Christian traditions in which the natural world was treated as a mere backcloth to human activity, and in which persons were treated as the sole bearers of moral value. It is possible that the reaction against this view may go too far in downgrading the unique significance of the personal. It also needs to be remembered that there is no way in which humanity can survive the current unsustainable levels of consumption and population increase without massive interference in the natural ordering of things. However, just as in theology grace is said not to destroy nature but to perfect it, ecological wisdom usually lies in learning how to work with the grain of nature rather than against it.

It will be obvious, even from this brief survey of some of the ways in which the concept "nature" is used, that such an ill-defined word can easily generate confusion unless its meaning is carefully specified in particular contexts.

JOHN HABGOOD

- R. Attfield, The Ethics of Environmental Concern, New York, Columbia UP, 1983
- I.G. Barbour, Religion and Science, San Francisco, Harper, 1997
- J.A. Carpenter, Nature and Grace, New York, Crossroad, 1988
- D. Gosling, A New Earth, London, Council of Churches for Britain and Ireland, 1992
- D.T. Hessel, Theology for Earth Community: A Field Guide, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1996
- M.J. Reiss & R. Straughan, Improving Nature?, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1996
- K. Soper, What Is Nature?, Oxford, Blackwell, 1995.

NAUDÉ, CHRISTIAAN FREDERICK BEYERS

B. 10 May 1915, Roodepoort, Transvaal, South Africa. Naudé, first editor of the ecumenical newspaper Pro Veritate, has been a strong promoter of the ecumenical movement in South Africa. On accepting the directorship of the Christian Institute, he was discharged from ministry in the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in 1963. The institute, which he had helped to establish, worked with Christians of all races on issues of church and society in South Africa and was the most outspoken anti-apartheid body in the country. Naudé served the institute for 14 years, till the paper he edited and the institute were both banned by the government in 1977. A banning order for seven years severely curtailed his freedom of movement. Serving as general secretary of the South African Council of Churches, 1985-87, he continued to oppose the policy of apartheid and to counsel various organizations in South Africa which assist disadvantaged people in educational and other spheres. Naudé studied at the University of Stellenbosch, 1932-39, and served the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk, 1940-63, working in seven congregations.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- C.F.B. Naudé, The Individual and the State in South Africa, London, Christian Institute Fund, 1975
- C. Villa-Vicencio & J.W. Gruchy eds, Resistance and Hope: South African Essays in Honour of Beyers Naudé, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1985. See also Hope for Faith, by Naudé and Dorothee Sölle (WCC, 1985) for a moving account of his conversion to Christ and involvement in anti-apartheid struggles.

NEILL, STEPHEN CHARLES

B. 31 Dec. 1900, Edinburgh, Scotland; d. 20 July 1984, Oxford. A missionary, church historian, teacher and ecumenical theologian, Neill was associate general secretary of the WCC, responsible for its study programme, 1948-50. He served as principal of a theological college before becoming bishop of the Anglican diocese of Tinnevely, South India, in 1939. He took a leading part in the movement for church union which later led to the formation of the Church of South India. He was a delegate to the world conference of the International Missionary Council at Tambaram (1938). He was professor of mission and ecumenics at the University of Hamburg, 1962-69, and professor of philosophy at the Department of Religious Studies, University of Nairobi, 1970-73. For over a decade he was general editor of World Christian Books, a series of short books designed for translation into many languages.

MARTIN CONWAY

■ S.C. Neill, Anglicanism, Harmondsworth UK, Penguin, 1958 ■ Brothers of the Faith, New York, Abingdon, 1960 ■ Christian Faiths and Other Faiths, London, Oxford UP, 1961 ■ The Church and Christian Union, London, Oxford UP, 1968 ■ R. Rouse & S.C. Neill eds, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 1: 1517-1948, London, SPCK, 1954.

NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS

THE TERM "new religious movement" (NRM) usually refers to a movement that (1) has become visible in its present form since the second world war, and (2) offers a religious or philosophical world-view or techniques for reaching some higher goal, such as spiritual enlightenment. "Non-conventional religion", "alternative religion" or (often with pejorative overtones) "cult" and "sect" are terms describing roughly the same miscellany.

Several NRMs provide a distinctive interpretation of the Bible, but NRMs have emerged from all the major religious traditions; some incorporate several traditions. Paganism and occult groups, the "new age" and "the human potential" movement, offering self-development through, for example, yoga, meditation, or holistic psychology, are also labelled NRMs - as are some movements that consider themselves part of a mainline tradition but are judged to exhibit certain "cultic" characteristics.

Members of the better-known NRMs in the more developed societies tend, disproportionately, to be materially advantaged young adults; most display high levels of enthusiasm and commitment. But the enormous diversity of beliefs and practices to be found within and between the NRMs cannot be overstressed.

Throughout history, established religions have been suspicious of NRMs, especially when a charismatic leader proclaims a new revelation within their own tradition. Since the early 1970s a number of organizations, some run by ordained ministers and a few supported by mainstream churches, have concentrated on exposing evils allegedly perpetrated by "destructive cults" and on demonstrating that NRMs are not "really" religious or "really" Christian. Although it does not happen so frequently in the 21st century, some members of such organizations have advocated the illegal practice of "deprogramming" to rescue adults from NRMs.

In 1980 the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization* tried to come to grips with the problem of distinguishing, with reference to NRMs, between "that which is truly of the Spirit of God and that which is satanic". In 1986 a consultation organized by the WCC and the Lutheran World Federation* (whose member churches had requested guidelines for appropriate responses to NRMs) produced several recommendations, including one that an ecumenical effort should be made to understand and interact with NRMs. The British Council of Churches also organized a consultation in 1986, which resulted in the Church of England setting up a nationwide, interdenominational network of advisers in collaboration with INFORM (Information Network Focus on Religious Movements), a charity supported by the British government and mainstream churches and committed to disseminating objective and balanced information about NRMs.

While generally chary of their beliefs and practices, several churches have forcefully condemned proposals to curtail the activities of NRMs. In Europe, the Dutch council of churches, for example, expressed disquiet over the apparent violation of religious freedom and the effect on human rights of a European Parliament motion "concerning the influence of new religious movements in the European Community", adding that it should not be possible to impose obligations on NRMs without a similar imposition on existing churches. In North America, Canadian churches have expressed similar sentiments; and, while it found Unification theology incompatible with traditional Christian doctrine, the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA has, with other religious bodies such as the American Baptist Churches, filed amicus curiae briefs in cases involving the Unification Church and other NRMs, on the ground that arguments presented to the US courts have threatened fundamental principles of religious freedom. In 1986 the Vatican published a preliminary report which, while displaying awareness of various problems, accepted NRMs as a positive challenge to stimulate the church's "own renewal for a greater pastoral efficacy".

As for the NRMs themselves, several embrace an ecumenical mission and have sponsored conferences promoting dialogue between themselves and other (Christian and non-Christian) religions. The NRMs' ecumenical ventures are, however, usually confined to dialogue with the more established religions; spasmodic attempts to unite (usually over issues of religious liberty) tend to disintegrate, largely because few NRMs wish to be identified with other NRMs. Some NRMs see ecumenism as irrelevant, insisting that one can practise, say, transcendental meditation while being a Methodist or a Roman Catholic. Yet others, such as the International Churches of Christ, consider that ecumenism undermines scriptural purity.

EILEEN BARKER

- E. Barker, New Religious Movements: A Practical Introduction, London, HMSO, 1989
- A. Brockway & J. Rajashekar eds, New Religious Movements and the Churches, WCC, 1987
- J. Vernet & C. Moncelon, Dictionnaire des groupes religieux aujourd'hui: Religions, églises, sectes, nouveaux mouvements religieux, mouvements spiritualistes, Paris, PUF, 1995
- B.R. Wilson & J. Cressell eds, New Religious Movements: Challenge and Response, London, Routledge, 1999.

NEW TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIAN UNITY

"THERE IS one body and one Spirit, just as you were called to the one hope of your calling, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of us all, who is above all and through all and in all." With this imposing summation, Ephesians (4:4-6) sets forth the unity* of Christian faith* and community, grounding it ultimately in the one God.* The logic is entirely straightforward: the oneness of God, Jesus Christ,* Christian confession, liturgy,* and eschatology* plainly implies the oneness of the body, the church.* In an apparent allusion to 1 Cor. 12, Ephesians refers to the church as one body (see also Eph. 1:22-23, where body and church are explicitly equated).

"Church" (ecclesia) quickly became the generic term for the individual Christian congregation, as well as the congregations as a whole, and so it has remained. Nevertheless, the New Testament has different ways of referring to the Christian community. It is not only the Body of Christ but the people of God (1 Pet. 2:9-10), God's building (1 Cor. 3:9), the family of faith (Gal. 6:10; cf. Eph. 2:19), God's temple (1 Cor. 3:16-17), the elect lady (2 John 1), etc., so that one may legitimately speak of images of the church* in the NT (Minear). Although these images reflect a healthy variety in the ways the church is conceived in the NT, most of them also convey a sense of its unity.

The emphasis of Ephesians on church unity accurately represents the bearing of the NT as a whole, even if comparable statements are seldom found elsewhere. This emphasis on unity did not, however, exclude diversity, as the wealth of images already suggests. In fact, Paul defends the legitimacy of diverse gifts and functions within the church as the work of the one Spirit (1 Cor. 12); they are necessary, moreover, for the church's well-being.

Paul regards his own ministry as being "in the priestly service of the gospel of God" (Rom. 15:16), which he relates on the one hand to his collection among the gentile churches of an offering for the Jerusalem church (vv.22-29) and on the other to the praise of God by both Jew and gentile (vv.9-13). In either case, Paul has in view the unity of the church as God's people (see people of God); in the one case in doxology, in the other in a quite concrete act of generosity and helpfulness which had engaged him for some time (see Gal. 2:10; 1 Cor. 16:1-3; 2 Cor. 8-9). In its own way, Ephesians reflects the successful culmination of Paul's ministry in its emphasis upon the accomplishment of union between Jew and gentile as the very essence of the work of Christ and consequently of the gospel Paul preached (Eph. 2:11-3:6).

Paul's earlier controversy with the so-called Judaizers was a concrete expression of his own sense that the unity of the church is essential to the appropriation of the gospel. Thus the approval of the pillar apostles was of crucial importance to him (Gal. 2:6-10). But the behaviour of Peter at Antioch (vv.11-16) Paul found intolerable, not only because it implied a defective soteriology (vv.17-21), but because it involved a concession to the circumcision party (v.12) that threatened the unity of the church, and therefore the gospel. While Paul did not in principle object to circumcision and observance of food laws among Jewish believers, he insisted upon the unity of the church in its table fellowship and eucharist,* and thus he ran afoul of those who gave such practices priority. The apostolic decree of Acts (15:19-21,23-29) looks like an effort to resolve such problems by laying down minimal food restrictions which all Christians should observe, but whether it was actually published in the time of Paul or at what stage in his ministry is a point of continued dispute among exegetes. In any event, both the controversy of Paul and the apostolic decree were efforts to protect the unity of Christians not only in theory but in practice and particularly in worship.

The gospels, representing for the most part the generation after Paul, presume the unity of the Christian community but for the most part do not deal directly with this issue because they are concerned with presenting the earthly Jesus, albeit in light of his death and resurrection.* Yet Mark announces the end of all food restrictions (7:19), and Luke proclaims the universal scope of the gospel (24:47), as does Matthew (28:19). But it is the gospel of John in particular that emphasizes the unity of Christians in one community. In his high priestly prayer, Jesus prays that his followers may be one so that the world may believe and know that he has been sent from God (John 17:21-23). Thus the unity of the church is the basis for mission,* and the work of Jesus Christ can be described as the gathering into one of the scattered people of God (11:51-52), "so there will be one flock, one shepherd" (10:16).

The fourth gospel's emphasis on unity is continued in 1 John, which speaks of fellowship with the Father and Son and among Christians (1:3). "Fellowship" (koinonia*) also means participation and communion* and connotes a close and intimate relationship. Therefore, one is not surprised at the author's abhorrence of schism* (2:18-19). Yet communion must be based on full and right confession; one cannot have fellowship with those who represent the spirit of error or false teaching (1 John 4:1-3; 2 John 9-10). There is one true Spirit, and those who teach what is obviously false cannot lay claim to any valid spiritual authority. The book of Revelation, genuinely if more remotely related to the other Johannine writings, in its graphic portrayal of the new heaven and new earth also presupposes the unity of the people of God in the end time (21:3,22-27). Here is expressed in typically apocalyptic terms the eschatological culmination anticipated in the gospel of John as well (cf. 14:2-3, 17:24).

Belief in the unity of confession, liturgy, community and eschatology, grounded in the one God and one Lord (Eph. 4:4-6), thus finds wide representation in the NT. The question of the nature of that unity was debated in NT times, as it is today. Obviously, the earliest churches manifested diversity and discord as well as unity, but while diversity was celebrated, discord and division were not. The NT attests to a primal sense of unity among Christians that is an ingredient of the revelation* of God in Jesus Christ. The living unity of all Christians, like the unity of Christian faith and confession, remains both a presupposition and a goal in the NT. The contradiction or obstruction of such unity is regarded as intolerable, and its attainment and visible, palpable manifestation as obligatory (see Old Testament and Christian unity).

D. MOODY SMITH

■ P.J. Achtemeier, The Quest for Unity in the New Testament Church, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1987 ■ R.E. Brown, "The Unity and Diversity in NT Ecclesiology", Novum Testamentum, 6, 1963 ■ J. Crowe, From Jerusalem to Antioch: The Gospel Across Cultures, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1997 ■ J.D.G. Dunn, Unity and Diversity in the New Testament, 2nd ed., London, SCM Press, 1990 ■ E. Käsemann, Exegetische Versuche und Besinnungen, II, 262-67 (ET New Testament Questions of Today, London, SCM Press, 1969, 252-59) ■ P.S. Minear, Images of the Church in the New Testament, London, Lutterworth, 1961 ■ J. Reumann, Variety and Unity in New Testament Thought, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1991 ■ R. Schnackenburg, Die Kirche im Neuen Testament (ET The Church in the New Testament, London, Burns &

Oates, 1965) ■ E. Schweizer, Gemeinde und Gemeindeordnung im Neuen Testament (ET Church Order in the New Testament, London, SCM Press, 1961).

NEWBIGIN, (JAMES EDWARD) LESSLIE

B. 8 Dec. 1909, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, UK; d. 30 Jan. 1998, London. In the fields of missiology and apologetics, Newbigin was an outstanding teacher, and in the practice of church unity an example of total commitment. He began his training for the ministry in the Presbyterian church in Cambridge, England, at Westminster College. He was ordained in 1936 and appointed by the Church of Scotland for missionary service in the Madras area of India, where he quickly gained a deep knowledge of Tamil. During the period of the second world war the foundations were being laid for the union of churches in South India, and Newbigin took a major part in the negotiations which led to the establishment of the Church of South India (CSI). At the inauguration of the CSI in 1947, he was appointed bishop in Madurai and Ramnad. As a participant in the inaugural assembly of the WCC in 1948 and in many ecumenical gatherings subsequently, Newbigin had become known to a wide circle as an able apolo-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

gist for the new united churches and a person with great theological insight. In 1959 he was called to become general secretary of the International Missionary Council,* based in London. He led that council to the point of integration in the WCC which was completed at the New Delhi assembly. He served as associate general secretary of the WCC and director of the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism till 1965. Invited back to India, he was the CSI bishop in Madras until he retired in 1974.

From 1974 to 1979 Newbigin was on the staff of the Selly Oak Colleges in Birmingham, lecturing there and in many other places on mission theology. In 1978 he became moderator of the United Reformed Church general assembly and from 1980 to 1988 served as minister of a small local church in the inner city. Continuing his writing and speaking ministry, he emphasized the missionary calling in the context of the abandonment by modern secular culture of the truth claims of faith. In this last phase of his service, Newbigin focused on the challenge of the liberal legacy, and this is the theme of several of his books which have had worldwide influence. But there is a unifying focus to all the output over the years, the calling of God to witness to the saving grace we see in Christ, and to do this as a wholly committed member of the Body of Christ, one body in all the world. There is a strongly Trinitarian thrust to all his writing. Three of his last books dealt with the confrontation between the claims of Christ and the modern Western culture.

Newbigin was a senior statesman of the ecumenical movement. He saw the WCC develop from its beginnings, and was within that circle of the Student Christian Movement which provided so many pioneers. His passion for the missionary engagement made him a critic of the more liberal theologies which have been influential in recent decades. Yet there was no anti-intellectual conservatism here. Rather, we saw a re-statement of classic evangelicalism, built on first-hand missionary experience, questioning all easy compromise with secularism. Newbigin's long ministry thus held together two primary ecumenical emphases – on mission and on unity – too often held apart.

BERNARD THOROGOOD

- L. Newbigin, The Other Side of 1984, 1983; Foolishness to the Greeks, 1986; The Gospel in a Pluralist Society, 1989: all WCC
- The Reunion of the Church, 1948; The Household of God, 1953; Honest Religion for Secular Man, 1966; The Finality of Christ, 1969: all London, SCM Press
- The Open Secret, 1978; Truth to Tell, 1991: both London, SPCK
- The Light Has Come, Edinburgh, Handsel, 1982
- Unfinished Agenda: An Autobiography, WCC, 1985
- G. Hunsberger, Bearing the Witness of the Spirit: Lesslie Newbigin's Theology of Cultural Plurality, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1998
- G. Wainwright, Lesslie Newbigin: A Theological Life, Oxford, Oxford UP, 2000.

NICEA

THE FIRST ecumenical council of Nicea (modern Turkish Iznik) was summoned by the Roman emperor Constantine the Great (288-337) to deal with the heresy* of Arius and other church matters. Though he originally intended the council to take place at Ancyra (present-day Ankara), Constantine sent letters to all the bishops of the catholic church inviting them to meet in council at Nicea and promising to pay travel expenses. Opening on 19 June 325, the council included Constantine himself. There are different views as to its duration, proceedings and the precise number of participants. The official one is that it was attended by 318 fathers (so Athanasius, Hilary, Epiphanius and also later ecumenical councils*); other estimates speak of more than 250 (Eusebius) or about 270 (Eustathius) or 320 (Sozomen), mainly Easterners, with only five delegates coming from the West. The bishop of Rome was represented by two priests.

The acts of the council have not survived, except the creed, the council's letter and 20 canons, but several ancient ecclesiastical authors, historians and theologians mention it. The consensus is that the views of Arius and his supporters, in effect denying the true godhead of Christ, were condemned. And a creed was accepted as the norm of the Christian faith which confessed the godhead of Christ by proclaiming the Son of God to be fully and truly God, born “from the being of God the Father”, and to be “consubstantial” (homoousios, i.e. “co-existing” or “one in being”) with him. This creed included four anathemas* repudiating Arius’s main theses. It seems that the creed was based on that used by the church of Jerusalem at the reception of converts to Christian catechism and baptism.* The council rejected a creed by Eusebius of Nicomedia and approved one by Eusebius of Caesarea, though without adopting it for universal use.

The council also resolved other ecclesiastical matters of dispute, including the schisms of Novatianism, Samosatianism and Melitianism and the dispute over the date of the celebration of Easter (see church calendar). Canon 8 deals with the return of the Novatianists to the church, and canon 19 with the return of the Paulinianists (the followers of the previously condemned heretic Paul of Samosata), specifying that they should be re-baptized and re-ordained. The schismatic Melitius, bishop of Lycopolis in Egypt, and his followers were dealt with more leniently, as one reads in the council’s letter, which has been preserved in Theodoret of Cyrus’s Ecclesiastical History. Easter was to be celebrated on the first Sunday after the first full moon of the spring equinox. The precise formula of the actual decision has not survived, though there are several reliable sources for it, including the letter of the council and the letter of Constantine to the churches after the council, which is preserved in Eusebius of Caesarea’s Life of Constantine.

The 20 canons issued by the council fathers deal with six areas of church concern: the qualifications and conduct of clergy; the precise rights of bishops and presbyters, including the introduction of the metropolitan system (both in canons 6 and 7); schismatic bishops and clergy (canon 8); penalties for, and restoration of, lapsed Christians (canons 11,12,14); the re-admission of Paulinianist heretics to the church (canon 19), and several procedural matters. Finally, as we gather from Gelasius’s Ecclesiastical History, the fathers accepted Paphnutius’s views in rejecting a proposal that would have required celibacy of bishops and presbyters. See also Nicene Creed.

GENNADIOS LIMOURIS

- W. Bright, Notes on the Canons of the First Four General Councils, Oxford, Clarendon, 1882
- C. Luibheid, The Council of Nicaea, Galway, Ireland, Officina Typographica Galway Univ., 1982
- I. Ortiz de Urbina, Histoire des conciles oecuméniques, vol. 1: Nicée et Constantinople, Paris, Orante, 1963
- V.I. Phidas, The First Ecumenical Council: Problems Related to the Summoning, Constitution and Operation of the Council, Athens, 1974 (in Greek)
- V.I. Phidas, The Presidency of the First Ecumenical Synod, Athens, 1974 (in Greek).

NICENE CREED

THE NICENE-Constantinopolitan Creed (381), or simply Nicene Creed (as it is referred to in this dictionary), as its name indicates, is traditionally regarded as an expansion of the original creed of Nicea* (325) and represents the work of the 150 fathers who assembled in Constantinople* in 381 to re-affirm the faith of Nicea. These expansions were necessitated by the various heresies which emerged since Nicea and which included the heresy* of the Pneumatomachians (Spirit-fighters), who denied the full or true godhead of the Holy Spirit;* and the heresies of Apollinaris of Laodicea (denied the integrity of the incarnation*), Sabellius of Ptolemais (denied the Trinity* by putting forth a unitarian theology), Marcellus of Ancyra and Photinus of Sirmium (denied the eternal generation of the Son and the permanence of the incarnation), Eunomius of Cyzicus (extreme Arianizer who held a tritheist point of view) and Eudoxius of Constantinople (Arianizer who denied the Holy Spirit). All these heresies were condemned by the first canon of the council of Constantinople I (381).

A comparison of the texts of the original Nicene Creed (325) and of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed reveals that the latter consists of the seven clauses of the former, with two slight omissions, and five new clauses which implicitly repudiate the above-mentioned heresies. The most important additions are “maker of heaven and earth”, directed against Marcionites, Manichaeans and especially Hermogenes, all of whom accepted the Greek philosophical view of the eternity of matter and, implicitly, of the world; “before all ages”, directed against Sabellius, Marcellus of Ancyra, Photinus of Sirmium and Eunomius; “from the Holy Spirit and the Virgin Mary”, directed against the Apollinarians; “and seated at the right hand of the Father... whose kingdom shall have no end”, directed against Marcellus and his disciple Photinus; and finally, almost the entire eighth article on the Holy Spirit, directed against the various shades of the denial of the godhead of the Spirit and based on 2 Cor. 3:17-18 (“the Lord”), John 6:63, Rom. 8:2 and 2 Cor. 3:6 (the “Giver of life”), John 15:26 combined with 1 Cor. 2:12 (the Spirit of truth, who proceeds from the Father) and 2 Pet. 1:21 (“who spoke through the prophets”). The phrase “who together with the Father and the Son is worshipped and glorified” is an oblique way of confessing the homoousion of the Holy Spirit, an accommodation to the point of view of traditionalist bishops who queried the use of non-biblical terms in the creed. The two omissions are connected with the phrases “from the substance (being) of the Father” and “God of God”; the former was probably dropped because, according to certain accredited fathers (Basil the Great, Gregory the Theologian and Gregory of Nyssa), it was contained in the term homoousios and could be misleading as having been wrongly used by Sabellians, whereas the latter was redundant, given the phrase “true God of true God”.

That this Nicene Creed of Constantinople is in fact an expansion of the original creed of Nicea, or that the faith of Constantinople as summed up in its creed is the faith of Nicea in an expanded form, is stressed in the letter which the 150 fathers addressed to Emperor Theodosius when they completed their deliberations, and in the conciliar letter which was sent by a similar council summoned in Constantinople in 382. The same point is stressed by many other witnesses, including the 4th-century Pseudo-Athanasian writing Dialogue between an Orthodox and a Macedonian, Neilus Ancyranus, alias Sinaita (d. 430), Nestorius of Constantinople, Flavian of Constantinople and, above all, the fourth ecumenical council of Chalcedon,* which explicitly joins together the two creeds in speaking of the one faith of Nicea, as all subsequent ecumenical councils do.

This view has been questioned in more recent times by German and British scholars who have propounded various scholarly hypotheses concerning the precise origins of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, none of which has been universally accepted. These hypotheses have primarily concentrated on the assumption that the Constantinopolitan Creed is not an expansion of the original creed of Nicea but a new creed, taken either from Jerusalem or from Constantinople, or newly constructed. Some of these have also argued (again, without wide acceptance) that there are differences of theological content, especially concerning the understanding of the crucial term homoousios, between the creeds of Nicea and Constantinople.

The Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed without the filioque* addition, which was introduced into the eighth article by the Western church much later, still enjoys the greatest universal acclaim among Christians. This is best illustrated in the major study programme of the WCC commission on Faith and Order “Towards the Common Expression of the Apostolic Faith Today”, which has made this creed its starting point. The result of this study has been published in book form as Confessing the One Faith. At the fifth world conference on Faith and Order (Santiago de Compostela 1993) many expressed a strong desire that the study should continue in order to help other ongoing Faith and Order studies (esp. in ecclesiology and hermeneutics) to move towards the point at which the actual common confession of the apostolic faith will enable Christians to restore full visible unity.

GENNADIOS LIMOURIS

■ T.H. Bindley, The Ecumenical Documents of the Faith, 4th ed. rev. by F.W. Green, London, Methuen, 1950 ■ Confessing the One Faith: An Ecumenical Explication of the Apostolic Faith as It Is Confessed in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed, WCC, 1991 ■ A. Hahn, Bibliothek der Symbole und Glaubensregeln der alten Kirche, Breslau, Morgenstern, 1897 ■ B. Hebblethwaite, The Essence of Christianity: A Fresh Look at the Nicene Creed, London, SPCK, 1996 ■ J.N.D. Kelly, Early Christian Creeds, 3rd ed., London, Longmans, 1972 ■ I. Ortiz de Urbina, Histoire des conciles œcuméniques, vol. 1: Nicée et Constantinople, Paris, Orante, 1963 ■ A. Ritter, Das Konzil von Konstantinopel und sein Symbol, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1965.

NICODIM (Boris Georgivich Rotov)

B. 14 Oct. 1929, Frolovo, USSR; d. 5 Sept. 1978, Rome. Metropolitan of Leningrad and Novgorod, Nicodim was the driving spirit behind the Moscow patriarchate's decision to join the WCC at the New Delhi assembly in 1961. He led the Russian Orthodox delegation to that assembly and thereafter was an active member of the WCC central and executive committees and, after Nairobi 1975, a president of the WCC. As assistant to Metropolitan Nicolai, head of the department of foreign relations of the Moscow patriarchate, Nicodim accompanied W.A. Visser 't Hooft and his staff team on an extensive visit of the Soviet Union. Head of this department, 1960-72, Nicodim became bishop of Jaroslavl in 1960, archbishop of the same diocese in 1961, and metropolitan of Minsk and of Leningrad in 1963. He consistently promoted better relationships with the Roman Catholic Church and greatly admired Pope John XXIII. Nicodim died suddenly during an audience with Pope John Paul I. Not afraid to face the frequent fierce and bitter attacks against his nation, his church and himself, he was a loyal supporter of the WCC and tireless in promoting the unity of the churches, as evidenced by the many consultations he organized or attended.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

NIEBUHR, REINHOLD

B. 21 June 1892, Wright City, MO, USA; d. 1 June 1971, Stockbridge, MA. The older brother of H. Richard Niebuhr, Reinhold was influential at Oxford 1937, at Amsterdam 1948, and also at the world Christian youth conferences in Amsterdam (1939) and Oslo (1947). In many ways he shaped ecumenical social thought both in the US and in the wider Western world. Although influenced by Karl Barth and Emil Brunner, he differed sharply from them in believing that Christianity has a direct prophetic vocation in relation

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

to culture. Stressing the egoism, the pride and the hypocrisy of nations and classes, he argued for a "Christian realism" and supported political policies that carefully delineated the limits of power. A one-time pacifist, he actively persuaded Christians to support the war against Hitler, and after the second world war had considerable influence in the US state department. He regarded as an error attempts to impose US solutions on the new nations that emerged from 1945 onwards, and always attacked American claims to special virtue.

Ordained to the ministry in the Evangelical synod in 1915, he was a pastor in Detroit, 1915-28, where his exposure to the problems of American industrialism, before labour was protected by unions and legislation, led him to advocate socialism. He broke with the Socialist party in the 1930s. He was professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary in New York, 1928-60, and one of the most popular preachers in university chapels.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ R. Niebuhr, Moral Man and Immoral Society, New York, Scribner, 1932 ■ The Nature and Destiny of Man, 2 vols, London, Nisbet, 1943-44 ■ Pious and Secular America, New York, Scribner, 1958 ■ K. Durkin, Reinhold Niebuhr, London, Chapman, 1989 ■ G. Harland, The Thought of Reinhold Niebuhr, New York, Oxford UP, 1960 ■ R. Harries ed., Reinhold Niebuhr and the Issues of Our Time, London, Oxford UP, 1986 ■ C.W. Kegley & R.W. Bretall eds, Reinhold Niebuhr: His Religious, Social and Political Thought, New York, Macmillan, 1956.

NIEMÖLLER, MARTIN

B. 14 Jan. 1892, Lippstadt, Germany; d. 6 March 1984, Wiesbaden. Member of the provisional committee of the WCC, 1946-48, Niemöller was a member of the central and executive committees, 1948-61, and a president of the WCC, 1961-68. His anti-Nazi religious activities and support of the Confessing Church* led to his arrest in 1937 and confinement in the concentration camps of Sachsenhausen and Dachau, most of the time as a "personal prisoner" of Hitler. He was freed by Allied troops shortly before he was scheduled to be executed. He took a leading part in the Stuttgart declaration* of guilt, 1945, and then was head of the foreign relations department of the Evangelical Church in Germany, 1945-56, and president of the territorial church of Hesse and Nassau, 1947-64. A submarine commander during the first world war, he argued after the second world war against German rearmament and for German neutrality. He opposed the creation of the Federal Republic of Germany in 1949, and was also against any crusade against communism and a vigorous opponent of US involvement in Vietnam. His visits to the Soviet Union did much to bring the churches there into the ecumenical movement. Ordained in 1924 a minister of the Protestant Church in Westphalia, in 1931 Niemöller was appointed pastor at Berlin-Dahlem.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ M. Niemöller, Reden, 1945-1954, 1955-1957, Darmstadt, Stimme der Gemeinde, 1957-58 ■ Reden, Predigten, Aufsätze, 1937 bis 1980, Berlin, Union, 1980 ■ J. Bentley, Martin Niemöller, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1984 ■ H. Kloppenburg ed., Martin Niemöller: Festschrift zum 90. Geburtstag, Cologne, Pahl-Rugenstein, 1982.

NILES, DANIEL THAMBYRAJAH

B. 4 May 1908, Ceylon; d. 17 July 1970, Vellore, India. D.T. Niles (always affectionately known as "D.T.") was active in the ecumenical movement for four decades and for the last three of these was one of its best-known leaders. He was the son of a distinguished lawyer and the grandson of a much-loved pastor and poet. After school and college in his native Jaffna, he studied theology in Bangalore from 1929 to 1933. Already deeply involved with the Student Christian Movement, from 1933 he was its national secretary and took part in the meeting of the general committee of the World Student Christian Federation* in Sofia. During this period he also served for a time with the WSCF staff in Geneva. In 1936 he was ordained to the ministry of the Methodist church and served for three years as district evangelist. He took a prominent part in the International Missionary Council* Tambaram conference of 1938 as a speaker and as secretary of the section on "The Authority of the Faith". Following Tambaram he went to Europe as part of a team bringing the message of Tambaram to the British churches, and then for a year (1939-40) he was in Geneva as evangelism secretary of the World's YMCA.*

Returning to Ceylon, he served from 1941 to 1945 as general secretary of the National Christian Council, the first full-time holder of that office. This introduced him to the arts of interchurch relations, in which he was to become such a master. From 1942 he organized annual theological conferences, which for the first time included Roman Catholics. He was chosen as one of the initial members of the negotiating committee for church union when it was set up in 1945. He was also involved in interfaith dialogue,* having been much influenced by his work at Tambaram with Hendrik Kraemer, "who made me see how essential it was for a Christian to think Christianly of other faiths". In his autobiographical memoir Niles speaks of "the many heart-searching conversations" he had with a Hindu friend as he tried to work out his beliefs on the relation of the gospel to other faiths.

In 1946 Niles was appointed to his first pastoral charge, which he was to hold for five years, at Point Pedro. During this period he was again to be in Europe for the WCC assembly at Amsterdam, where, with John R. Mott, he preached at the opening service. From 1948 to 1952 he was chairman of the WCC's Youth department and from 1953 to 1959 he was executive secretary of its Department of Evangelism. Meanwhile in 1950 the Methodist church had transferred him to the Maradana pastorate, and he was also director of the YMCA Bible Study Institute in Colombo. Niles strongly held that those involved in ecumenical work should keep firm roots in the local church,* and while he held the evangelism portfolio in Geneva, he was at the same time superintending minister of St Peter's church and principal of Jaffna Central College. It is not surprising that even Niles refers to this as "a heavy period".

From 1953 he was chairman of the WSCF and, along with Philippe Maury, planned and carried through an ambitious programme on "The Life and Mission of the Church", with the Strasbourg conference of 1960 as its centre-piece. Meanwhile from 1954 to 1964 he was also chairman of the northern district of the Methodist church while continuing to be heavily involved in the work of the WCC, including the assemblies at Evanston and New Delhi. From 1959 to 1960 he was also Henry Emerson Fosdick professor at Union Theological Seminary, New York.

Meanwhile in 1957 Niles embarked upon what was to be the major work of the last decade of his life. In that year, at Prapat in Sumatra, the decision was taken to establish an East Asia conference of churches, with Niles as its first general secretary. This, the forerunner of other regional bodies, was largely Niles's brain-child, and he was its unquestioned leader. It embodied his conviction about the local rooting of ecumenical work, with a dispersed staff all carrying responsibilities in their churches. Niles's deep commitment to local unity also caused him to be wary of powerful denominational bodies acting on a world scale. This led him, from 1961 onwards, to take an active part in the work of the World Methodist Council,* and he was responsible for the "Niles plan" for a world committee on missionary affairs to guide the council.

In August 1968, he took over the leadership of the Methodist Church in Sri Lanka as the president of the Methodist conference. In the same year he resigned from his position as general secretary of the East Asia Christian Conference and was made its chairman. His report of the ten years of the EACC under his guidance entitled "Ideas and Services" coupled reporting with envisioning the future of the EACC. It later became the basis for re-organizing the work of the EACC at the Singapore assembly in 1973, when it was renamed the Christian Conference of Asia. He was again asked to preach the opening sermon at a WCC assembly, this time at the fourth (Uppsala 1968). At this assembly he was also elected to the WCC presidium. In 1970 he went to the Christian Medical Hospital in Vellore, India, for treatment and later an operation for cancer, where he died.

Along with this astonishing range of public responsibilities, there was an almost ceaseless succession of journeys to all the six continents to preach, lecture and conduct university missions. Of his writings, perhaps the one which will be longest in use is the EACC Hymnal, for which he wrote a large number of English verse translations of Asian hymns. He was not, and did not pretend to be, a great theologian, but he had immensely fruitful theological and personal friendships with most of the leading theological thinkers of the time, and these enriched his writing and speaking. He was a great preacher, evangelist and pastor. Above all, he was an expositor of the Bible. His friend Bishop Kulendran has said of him: "He went to the Bible not to pick up a verse but to think with the biblical writers." He was also an ecumenical statesman, a strategist whose long-term planning did much to influence ecumenical development, and also a skilful tactician who could change a situation with a brilliant and unexpected move. He could outwit his opponents, but he did not make enemies. Central to his whole life was the giving and receiving of friendship. Typical of the man are these words from one of the last sermons he preached: "When I am dead, many things will be said about me – that I held this and that position and did this and that thing. For me, all these are irrelevant. The only important thing that I can say about myself is that I, too, am one whom Jesus Christ loved and for whom he died" (Gal. 2:20). Next to his love of God was the devotion which bound him to his wife, Dulcie, whom he married in 1935. A few months after his death, she followed him.

LESSLIE NEWBIGIN

■ D.T. Niles, A Testament of Faith, London, Epworth, 1972 ■ That They May Have Life, London, Lutterworth, 1952 ■ Upon the Earth, London, Lutterworth, 1962 ■ C. Furtado, The Contribution of D.T. Niles to the Church Universal and Local, Madras, CLS, 1978 ■ S.C. Neill, Brothers of the Faith, New York, Abingdon, 1960.

NISSIOTIS, NIKOS ANGELOS

B. 21 May 1925, Athens, Greece; d. 17 Aug. 1986, Athens. Nissiotis was a Greek Orthodox philosopher-theologian who built bridges over chasms of estrangement between the churches of the West (Roman Catholic and Protestant) and of the East, who lessened awkward suspicions of modern philosophy and other sciences towards theology, and who prompted reluctant fellow Orthodox to take as also their own the ecumenical movement and the WCC.

As a graduate student, Nissiotis digested European trends of thought after second world war. In Switzerland he studied Protestant dialectical theology with Karl Barth in Basel and Emil Brunner in Zurich, psychoanalysis under Carl Jung in Zurich, and existentialist philosophy with Karl Jaspers in Basel. At Louvain university (Belgium) he obtained a postgraduate diploma in Catholic neo-scholastic and historical philosophy, and then his doctorate in theology at Athens (thesis: "Existentialism and Christian Faith").

On the staff of the WCC ecumenical institute at Bossey* beginning in 1958, and its director 1966-74, he gave increased visibility to Orthodox theology, spirituality and liturgical practices, and he stressed interdisciplinary research and debate between theology and other sciences. The WCC delegated him as an observer to Vatican II* (1962-65) and appointed him a member of the RCC/WCC Joint Working Group.* As moderator of the commission on Faith and Order* (1976-83), he helped design the primary strategy and methodology for ecumenical theology, culminating in the 1982 text on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.*

The ecumenical community respected Nissiotis for his dialectical mind (which felt ill at ease if it was at ease) and for his heart, which beat with restless ecumenical fervour. He was able to keep one foot lovingly rooted in the ground of his Orthodox tradition, while the other foot stepped familiarly in the Protestant and Catholic traditions. This layman loved the church, despised churchiness. He savoured honest speech, could not digest pious platitudes. The sports world so respected him that it elected him to the International Olympic Committee (1978).

TOM STRANSKY

- M. Begzos, "N. Nissiotis", in Ecumenical Pioneers, I. Bria & D. Heller eds, WCC, 1995
- E. Castro, T. Torrance, P. Mar Gregorios, L. Vischer et al., in Nicos Nissiotis, M. Begzos ed., Athens, Grigoris, 1994 (with complete list of his writings)
- T. Stransky, A. Blancy, "Sketches of Nikos Nissiotis", ER, 48, 4, 1996.

NON-GOVERNMENTAL ORGANIZATIONS

THE TERM "non-governmental organization" (NGO) came into common usage with the creation of the United Nations* to designate private non-profit associations which provide an independent channel of expression of citizens' views in the formation of public policy and which engage in organized action in the economic, social and cultural fields. Other terms commonly used are "private voluntary organizations", "private sector organizations" and "civil society organizations".

The French revolution in 1789 first established freedom of association. Private organizations became widespread in the West from 1850, particularly in countries influenced by the Protestant reform movement, constituting a new factor in international relations. Among the first international associations to be created were the Evangelical Alliance (1846) and the World Alliance of YMCAs (1855). Both inter-governmental organizations (IGOs) and NGOs grew in number during the 20th century.

NGO representatives participating as advisers to governmental delegations at the San Francisco conference in 1945 urged that the new United Nations be an instrument not only of governments but also of the world's peoples. O. Frederick Nolde (later the organizing director of the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs [CCIA] was chosen as their spokesperson and argued convincingly for significant changes in the draft UN charter.

One result of their effort was the addition of a preamble which begins, "We the peoples of the United Nations determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war..." Another was the inclusion of article 71, which calls for "suitable arrangements [to be made] for consultation with non-governmental organizations which are concerned with matters within the competence of the Economic and Social Council".

Soon after 1945 the UN Economic and Social Council (Ecosoc) extended "consultative status" to a select group of international NGOs ranging from trade union federations, religious organizations (including the CCIA) and associations in such fields as science, social welfare, humanitarian assistance, education, peace* and disarmament,* decolonization, development* and the promotion of the status of women. Around the same time, similar arrangements were established by various UN agencies. The WCC, through the CCIA, maintains formal consultative relations with UNESCO, UNICEF, UNEP, FAO and ILO and is associated with other IGOs like UNHCR, UNDP, IOM, and WHO.

The term "NGO" was originally applied primarily to international non-governmental organizations comprising national affiliates in several countries, and to specialized national organizations recognized by the UN. Some 1500 have now been granted consultative status by the ECOSOC. More recently, the use of the term has been widened to include citizens' organizations at all levels of society working sometimes in opposition to governments, but now increasingly alongside or in cooperation with them.

The number of international NGOs grew from 1300 in 1960 to over 46,000 by 2000. National and local NGOs have proliferated in even larger proportion over the same period, many of them engaged in activities related to economic and social development (often serving as preferred channels for official overseas development funds flowing from the industrialized nations to developing countries), refugee* assistance and humanitarian aid, human rights* and the environment.

In a report to the general assembly in December 1996, the UN secretary-general described NGOs as important "new actors" in the process of global governance who play a central operational role in the development field and in response to humanitarian emergencies, and whose "democratizing potential" deserves a stronger voice in legislation and policy-making at the UN. New guidelines for consultative relations between the UN and NGOs, adopted by Ecosoc in July 1996, represented a step in this direction.

DWAIN EPPS

NORTH AMERICA: CANADA

THE CANADIAN ecumenical movement began before the 19th century. First, the transfer of political authority from France to the United Kingdom (1763) introduced a broad variety of denominational groups into Canada, most of them deriving from older communities in the American colonies or Great Britain. The independence of the USA 20 years later accelerated the pace of settlement in the so-called frontier areas, bringing in thousands of white, black and Amerindian Christians who chose to remain under the British crown. Most new townships had only one or two congregations, and many individuals simply joined the denomination which had first begun to serve in their area. Roman Catholicism and the principal branches of Protestant Christianity quickly established ecclesiastical jurisdictions according to their own models in the zones of more concentrated settlement. Nevertheless, the continuing expansion of the region under intensive cultivation produced a recurrent pattern of regular multi-denominational worship in a large number of less populous municipalities.

Around the turn of the 20th century, theological convergence and pragmatic considerations combined to inspire a widespread feeling that the Christian community, or at least the Protestant groups, should unite. Canadian Christians, it was said, ought to overcome the divisions inherited from Renaissance Europe and join in a fellowship of common faith and witness adapted to the special circumstances of their new society. Five major denominations began serious negotiations, but eventually the Anglicans and Baptists withdrew and only Congregationalists, Methodists and two-thirds of the Presbyterians merged to form the United Church of Canada in 1925. This was the very first such union of churches from different ecclesiological traditions in the world.

The United Church declared itself to be open to further combinations, and its representatives have held talks with representatives of several other churches. Conversations with Anglicans and Disciples came near to agreement in the late 1960s but finally ended without achieving their objective, and only the Evangelical United Brethren and a few independent congregations have joined during the years since the original union. In 1989 the Anglican Church of Canada and the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada formally agreed to a mutual sharing of word and sacraments, but with no fusion of structures. No other pluri-confessional mergers or covenants have been realized, although there have been several series of bilateral exchanges involving most of the churches now represented in the country, including the Orthodox.

After the initial wave of ecumenical enthusiasm had achieved the union of 1925, confessional loyalties re-asserted themselves with some force. Gradually, however, interest developed in a conciliar model as a middle option between uncompromising rivalry and corporate amalgamation, until in 1944 leaders of half a dozen denominations met at Yorkminster Baptist Church in Toronto to establish the Canadian Council of Churches (CCC).

Representatives of the same groups were among the founders of the WCC in Amsterdam four years later.

According to its constitution, the CCC is "a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit" (see WCC, basis of). Most of the country's largest denominations are part of the CCC: the United Church of Canada, the Anglican Church of Canada, the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada, the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) and the Canadian Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, which are involved in virtually every aspect of the CCC's life. The smaller churches participate in the measure that their resources permit. These include the Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, the British Methodist Episcopal Church (of Caribbean origin), the Salvation Army in Canada and Bermuda, the Council of Reformed Churches in Canada, the Greek Orthodox Church, the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, the Orthodox Church in America, the Coptic Orthodox Church, the Armenian Orthodox Church and the Polish National Catholic Church. Since becoming the CCC's first associate member in 1986, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops has joined in the work of several of the council's commissions and committees. In 1997 the bishops' conference requested, and received, full membership status in the CCC.

The triennial assembly is at once the CCC's principal public manifestation and its supreme authority. Delegates are chosen by the member churches, and representatives of local ecumenical groups and such related bodies as the Student Christian Movement and the Women's Inter-Church Council also attend. Each assembly elects the officers who will serve for the next three years.

The CCC has continued to grow, at the end of 2001 comprising 18 full members. The council's own staff has never become very large, but the council itself has consistently played a pivotal role in discerning and realizing the ecumenical agenda in Canada. It has also made a significant contribution to interchurch cooperation on an international scale, both through the structures of the WCC and in direct cooperation with regional and national organizations in every part of the world.

Ecumenical coalitions are a special feature of the Canadian ecclesiastical scene. Historically, each coalition was supported by the appropriate divisions of a group of church offices or mission societies, and each addressed a particular concern of the Christian community in Canada. Some had a geographical focus, others sought to inform public opinion and influence policy. Yet another type of coalition specialized in economic affairs. Altogether, there were about a dozen coalitions at any given time in official affiliation with the coalition administration committee of the CCC. In 2001 the coalitions merged to form a single umbrella organization known as the Canadian Churches for Justice and Peace. While providing centralized administration for the movement, the CCJP will continue the programme emphases of the coalitions.

The Canadian Churches' Forum for Global Ministries, whose roots reach back to the early 1920s, operates now as an agency of the CCC. It offers ecumenical training to prospective missionaries and special courses for people returning to Canada after a period of church service abroad. The forum also conducts overseas tours for Canadian theological students, and each year it brings a respected ecumenical personality to visit interchurch groups in several provinces. A more academic sister organization is the Churches' Council for Theological Education, which assists the churches and seminaries in coordinating ministerial formation across denominational and geographical obstacles, while the Canadian Association for Pastoral Education has a special interest in the training of hospital chaplains.

The Student Christian Movement (SCM), a major participant in the CCC's youth working group, provides ecumenical leadership on campus and forms vital contacts for the present and future among participating churches in all parts of the country. Another ecumenical organization with an active programme and a long history of working with the CCC is the Canadian Bible Society. The SCM and the Bible Society both have strong links to their own international federations. The Women's Inter-Church Council, an autonomous network of Christian women's organizations, is the Canadian link in the World Day of Prayer* structure and the touchstone for Canadian involvement in the Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women.*

In the years since the Second Vatican Council, the Roman Catholic Church has become an integral part of ecumenical life in Canada. RC dioceses and orders belong to most of the coalitions and local interchurch councils.

Relations between the CCC and the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada have been cordial, and at least two churches belong to both. Unlike the council, the fellowship also has individual memberships; the larger denominations in its ranks, however, are still reluctant to be too closely associated with the conciliar movement because of perceived differences in theological outlook.

STUART E. BROWN

■ M. Best, Will Our Church Disappear?: Strategies for the Renewal of the United Church of Canada, Winfield, Wood Lake, 1994 ■ T. Murphy & R. Perin eds, A Concise History of Christianity in Canada, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1996.

NORTH AMERICA: UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

BEWILDERING diversity and division have always marked Christianity in the USA. Some 700 different Christian churches exist, some large and some very small, each with its own independent authority and organization. Their differences and divisions are rooted in different theological, ethnic, social and racial backgrounds.

The reasons for this fragmentation provide insight into the peculiar character of the US churches and their struggle for unity* and faithfulness: (1) all the European schisms were transplanted to American soil; (2) a radical individualism and revivalism, especially on the American frontier, fostered the spirit of voluntarism and isolation; (3) religious freedom and the separation of church and state (i.e. no church holds a privileged position) was a fundamental civil doctrine which encouraged the rise of new, separate religious groups; (4) different waves of immigrants brought, and continue to bring, people of diverse ethnic, cultural and national traditions as well as the divisive tensions which these produce. In this milieu a new form of the church, the denomination (see denominationalism), became dominant, and the church often became identified with partisan names and traditions: Adventist, Baptist, Congregational, Disciples of Christ, Episcopal, Lutheran, Methodist, Moravian, Orthodox, Pentecostal, Presbyterian, Quaker, Roman Catholic, and churches of many other shades and varieties.

The proliferation of divided denominations, however, was countered by an equally dramatic movement towards Christian unity. Already beginning in the early 19th century, US Christianity was engaged in the struggle between sectarianism and catholicity, between division and unity. This ecumenical pilgrimage can be described in three categories.

The first approach is association through voluntary, non-denominational bodies. Early in American church history individual Christians, not churches as such, sought common action in particular tasks related to evangelism, religious education, social witness and reform. Leaders in these movements did not necessarily envisage their goal as the unity of the churches. Institutions which drew Christians together for witness and service included the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1810), the American Home Missionary Society (1826), the American Bible Society (1826), the American Sunday School Union (1824), the American Peace Society (1828), the American Anti-slavery Society (1833), and youth and student movements such as the Young Men's Christian Association (US, 1852), the Young Women's Christian Association (1872) and the Student Volunteer Movement (1886).

Particularly important to this cooperative spirit was the US branch of the Evangelical Alliance (1867), a fellowship within the World's Evangelical Alliance (London, 1846). Its purpose was "to bring individual Christians into closer fellowship and cooperation on the basis of the spiritual union which already exists in the vital relation of Christ to the members of his body in all ages and all countries". The Evangelical Alliance championed Christian unity, religious liberty for minorities in countries where an established church or other religions discriminated against them, the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, arbitrations for peace, and international mission. Although it was an association of individuals, not churches, the Evangelical Alliance was a portentous precursor to later ecumenical bodies in the US and worldwide. Its collaboration among individual Christians in addressing crisis concerns was a model for later Christians in dealing with such local and global issues as hunger, justice, peace, theological education, interfaith dialogue, racism and care for the poor and oppressed.

A second approach to unity in the US is conciliar ecumenism or cooperation in mission. The earliest model and pioneer was the Federal Council of Churches of Christ, constituted by 33 Protestant church bodies in 1908 (see federalism). Its purpose was "to manifest the essential oneness of the Christian churches of America in Jesus Christ as their divine Lord and Saviour". In particular its goals were (1) to bring the churches "into united service for Christ and the world", (2) "to encourage shared worship and mutual counsel in the spiritual life and religious activities of the churches", and (3) "to mobilize the combined influence of the churches in improving the moral and social conditions of people and to promote the application of the law of Christ in every relation of human life". The Federal Council had no authority to draw up a creed, to propose a common form of worship or church government, or in any way to limit the full autonomy of the member churches. Yet these Protestant churches established a new course for ecumenism through their common witness in evangelism, Christian education, race relations, works of mercy and relief, international peace and justice. While at this point the Orthodox churches in the US were not members, they later became full members in conciliar bodies.

In 1950 the conciliar impulse among American churches took another major step forward in the formation of the National Council of Churches of Christ (NCCC). While the Federal Council represented only a portion of cooperative activity among the churches, other strategic ecumenical organizations developed, like the Foreign Missions Conference of North America, the Home Missions Council, the International Council of Religious Education, and the United Council of Church Women. At the inauguration of the NCCC 13 ecumenical agencies and 29 member churches, including several Orthodox and African American, united into one inclusive national council, confessing "Jesus Christ as the divine Lord and Saviour". For the next several decades the NCCC witnessed to Christian unity through programmes on racial justice and liberation, women's issues, global mission, international witness towards relief and development (Church World Service), Christian education and youth work (United Christian Youth Movement), Bible translations such as the Revised Standard Version (1954) and New RSV (1989), Christian unity, stewardship and international affairs. Ironically, Faith and Order was intentionally left out until 1959 (following the North American Faith and Order Conference at Oberlin, Ohio, in 1957), when a commission was formed.

In 1981 the NCCC transformed its mandate and character from that of "a cooperative agency of the churches" to "a community of Christian communions". Such a covenantal relationship promised to call the US churches into a fuller expression of "visible unity as a sign of the unity of humankind and to enable the churches to act responsibly together in living out that wholeness in witness and service to the world". At the heart of this change was the desire for a more accountable sense of unity and mission. At the end of the 20th century, however, that vision had yet to be fully embraced by the member churches. In the meantime the crisis of the mainline churches – largely the constituents of the NCCC – as well as the crisis of ecumenical funding, the distrust of the NCCC's leadership and changes in American society have all led to a greatly diminished leadership and visibility of the NCCC. Some of the same factors have affected the work and witness of many local and regional ecumenical bodies.

The participation of the Orthodox churches – made more significant by the entrance of most Orthodox into the World Council of Churches – has greatly benefited the NCCC. In the 1990s, however, their effective participation lessened as the NCCC – according to their perceptions – advocated "positions that run contrary to historic Christian teachings" and made witnesses that Orthodox bishops, clergy and parishes find unacceptable. Especially divisive for the Orthodox are the emphasis on social and political activities, the acceptance of inclusive language, openness to gay and lesbian life-styles, the ordination of women and feminist theology. As the Orthodox churches become more integrated into the American society and assume a more ecumenical role, and as the Protestant churches come to understand the gifts of Orthodoxy and its pivotal witness with the whole church, their place in the ecumenical movement will bring renewal to ecumenism in the US. The future will require Protestants and Orthodox churches – partners in conciliar ecumenism – to participate more intentionally and humbly with the Roman Catholic Church and conservative evangelical churches in a wider Christian ecumenism.

A third approach to ecumenism which marks US church history is the search for visible church unity. While federation or cooperation is often thought to be the most dominant form of ecumenism in the US, American church history reveals that the witness to organic church union or visible unity has been equally prominent. In church union the traditions, sacraments, ministries, and witnesses of two or more divided churches are blended into a common faith and identity and brought into a common mission and sacramental life enriched by diversity. Beginning in the 19th century, four US churches have given special leadership towards visible unity: the German and Swiss Reformed, Lutheran, Episcopal and Disciples of Christ.

Philip Schaff, a Swiss-American Reformed church historian and theologian, greatly influenced the ecumenical perspective of the American churches by his prolific writings and his work with early ecumenical bodies such as the Evangelical Alliance. In 1893 he called for “federal or confederative union”, which envisioned the future uniting of Protestant churches and the Roman Catholic Church into an “evangelical catholicism”. Among German-American Lutherans, Samuel Simon Schmucker issued in 1838 his Fraternal Appeal to the American Churches, with a Plan for Catholic Union, on Apostolic Principles. His plan called for the formation of the Apostolic Protestant Church, whose unity would be based on “biblical fundamentals” with “diversity in non-essentials”. A united confession of faith would bind the churches together, and local congregations would retain their faith, ministry and discipline. This unity would bring about open communion and a mutual sharing of members and ministry.

The Episcopal Church produced three articulate advocates of Christian unity in the 19th century. In 1841 Thomas Hubbard Vail proposed one “comprehensive church”, which he defined as the currently constituted Protestant Episcopal Church. More irenically, William Augustus Muhlenberg in 1853 proposed an “evangelical catholic” church based on a diversity of worship and discipline and with a common episcopal ministry which all churches would gladly receive. In his 1870 book The Church Idea: An Essay toward Unity, William Reed Huntington offered the Episcopal Church to other Christians as “the Church of the Reconciliation”, inviting other churches to join with them in forming the “Catholic Church of America”. He proposed a four-point platform as the basis of all future church union attempts: the holy scriptures as the word of God, the primitive creeds as the rule of faith, the two sacraments of baptism and the Lord’s supper, and the historic episcopate. This proposal became known as the Chicago-Lambeth quadrilateral.*

Since their beginning in the American frontier of the 19th century, the Disciples of Christ have been a major witness to church unity, teaching that sectarianism and division in the church is sin and voicing an unconditional passion for visible unity among all Christians. In 1804 Barton Stone and a number of other ministers, mostly Presbyterians, issued a moving call for Christian unity entitled The Last Will and Testament of the Springfield (Kentucky) Presbytery. The radically ecumenical posture of this document declares, reminiscent of the New Delhi statement on unity, “We will that this body die, be dissolved, and sink into union with the Body of Christ at large.” Later Stone set the central conviction of his movement, stating, “Let Christian union be our polar star.” On the western Pennsylvania frontier two Scots-Irish immigrant ministers to America, Thomas Campbell and his son Alexander, found unbearable the anti-ecumenical teachings and practices of the 19th-century Presbyterians. Reluctantly they formed another church, the Disciples. Pledging to bring about the unity of all Christians based on the simplicity of the biblical faith, Thomas Campbell taught: “The church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally, and constitutionally one” (1809). Stone and the Campbells united in 1832 at Lexington, Kentucky, an event which launched the unique ecumenical leadership of the Disciples of Christ within the church universal.

In the 20th century church union among the churches in America was proposed – but not achieved – by three multi-lateral initiatives. Between 1918 and 1920 the American Council on Organic Union, meeting each time in Philadelphia, attempted to bring 19 “evangelical” (Protestant) churches into “a visible body” to be known as the United Church of Christ in America. While initially preserving denominational autonomy, a plan – called the Philadelphia Plan of Union – encour-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

aged collaboration in many mission areas as the first step towards fuller, organic union. In 1935 the popular Methodist evangelist E. Stanley Jones, influenced by his years as a missionary in India, travelled across the US and other countries calling for "union with a federal structure". Modelled upon the US federal-state political system, this plan would make the various denominations branches of the United Church of America. In 1949 a more mature Conference on Church Union sought to unite those churches which are "in sufficient accord in the essentials of the Christian faith and order" and which "already accord one another mutual recognition of ministries and sacraments". This so-called Greenwich plan was important for future church union conversations, especially because both predominantly white and African American churches were involved. Momentum for this venture was lost in 1953 when the Presbyterian Church in the USA withdrew and the Congregational Christian and the Evangelical and Reformed churches united in 1957 to become the United Church of Christ.

In 1962 the yearning for visible unity led to the formation of the Consultation on Church Union (COCU*), the most dramatic and far-reaching multilateral attempt at church unity in American history. COCU resulted from a sermon preached two years earlier at Grace Cathedral (Episcopal) in San Francisco by Eugene Carson Blake, then stated clerk of the United Presbyterian Church and later general secretary of the World Council of Churches. Blake called upon the churches to form a united church "truly catholic, truly evangelical, and truly reformed". Eventually nine churches entered in this pilgrimage: African Methodist Episcopal, African Methodist Episcopal Zion, Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), Christian Methodist Episcopal, Episcopal, International Council of Community Churches, Presbyterian (USA), United Church of Christ and United Methodist. At various stages theological commissions and plenaries of the nine COCU churches produced "Principles of Church Union" (1966), "A Plan of Union for the Church of Christ Uniting" (1970), ecumenical liturgies of the word and sacrament (1968, 1984) and of baptism (1973), "The COCU Consensus" (1984), and "The Churches in Covenant Communion" (1989). Highly significant for an inclusive expression of visible unity was the full participation of the three historic African American Methodist churches. The overcoming of racism was a central commitment of the COCU process.

When the COCU churches met in 1999 to approve the proposal for "covenant communion" (koinonia), two of the churches – the Presbyterian (USA) and the Episcopal – expressed their unreadiness to move towards the agreed-upon reconciliation of ministries because of disagreements on the ministry of oversight (episcopate). In response, the churches decided to pursue a modified relationship based on seven of the eight dimensions of covenanting and to live in unity under the common name of Churches Uniting in Christ (CUIC), which was inaugurated in January 2002.

In the late 1960s the US churches began to participate in interconfessional bilateral dialogues, an expression of the ecumenical movement that gained importance largely through the impact of Vatican II. The defining significance of the bilaterals can best be grasped by listing those of recent decades, many of which are linked to international dialogues. They include bilateral dialogues of Roman Catholics with Anglicans, Disciples of Christ, Lutherans, Orthodox, Reformed, Southern Baptists, and United Methodist. Also, the Lutherans have met separately with the Episcopal Church, Orthodox and Reformed. Other dialogues include Episcopal with Orthodox, and United Methodist with AME/AMEZion/CME.

In 1997 four churches of the Reformation – the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA), the Presbyterian Church (USA), the Reformed Church in America and the United Church of Christ – also entered into "full communion". This measure of unity was based on two documents: "A Common Calling" (1992) and "A Formula of Agreement" (1997), which declared there are no "church-dividing differences" among these churches. This agreement allowed the recognition of each other as churches in the gospel, of each other's baptism and celebration of the Lord's supper and of appropriate channels of consultation and decision making within the existing structures of these churches.

In 2001 the Episcopal Church in the US and the ELCA formally inaugurated "full communion". The Concordat of Agreement, a step towards eventual visible unity, affirms agreement in doctrine, the mutual recognition of each other's sacraments and ministries, as well as common witness in service. Lutherans agreed that the ordination/installation of all future bishops will involve prayers and the laying on of hands of both Episcopal and Lutheran bishops. Thus the threefold ministry of bishops, presbyters and deacons in historic succession will be the future pattern of the one ordained ministry of word and sacrament.

As the churches enter the 21st century, the search for Christian unity in the US faces dramatic issues: the identity crisis of the mainline churches; the extraordinary power of pluralism and individualism in the society and the churches; explosive alienations caused by race, culture, gender and ethnic identities; a radical localism; the rising presence and participation of Pentecostal and Holiness churches and the challenge of a growing interfaith presence. Within this changing landscape the American churches face new divisive issues and ecumenical dynamics in their mandate towards unity. The struggles for wholeness are profound, but ecumenism remains a gift of the gospel to these churches. As one looks over the course of the ecumenical movement, one is impressed both by how far the churches have come and by still how distant the goal of full, visible unity seems. Such is always the case with humankind's ability to live out God's grace.

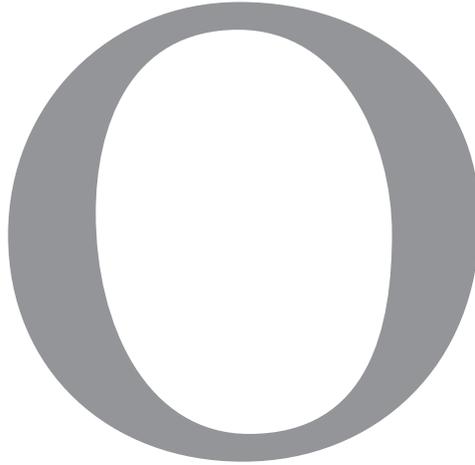

PAUL A. CROW, Jr

- J.A. Burgess & J. Gros eds, Growing Consensus: Church Dialogues in the United States, 1962-1991, Mahwah NJ, Paulist, 1995
- S.M. Cavert, Church Cooperation and Unity in America: A Historical Review, 1900-1970, New York, Association, 1970
- F.S. Mead & S.S. Hill, Handbook of Denominations in the United States, 11th ed., Nashville TN, Abingdon, 2001
- J.R. Nelson ed., Christian Unity in North America: A Symposium, Studies after Oberlin, 1957, St Louis MO, Bethany, 1958
- R.E. Richey ed., Denominationalism, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1977
- M. Sawyer, Black Ecumenism: Implementing the Demands of Justice, Valley Forge PA, Trinity, 1994
- G. Wingenback, Broken, Yet Never Sundered: Orthodox Witness in the Ecumenical Movement, Brookline MA, Holy Cross Orthodox Press, 1987
- D.H. Yoder, "Christian Unity in Nineteenth-Century America", in HI-1.

NORTH AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ECUMENISTS

THE NORTH American Academy of Ecumenists (NAAE) is the successor organization to an association of American and Canadian professors of ecumenics that was born of the ecumenical interest generated by the first North American Faith and Order consultation, held in Oberlin, Ohio, in 1957. In the wake of Vatican II,* this association re-established itself as an academy in 1967. The goal of the NAAE is to inform, relate and encourage men and women whose profession or ministry involves ecumenical activities and studies. Membership includes clergy and laity, professors and students. It is an "academy" by virtue of its members' shared concern for the theological reflection and scholarship that must accompany the movement towards mutual religious understanding and the unity of the churches. Its annual conference proceedings and papers appear in the Journal of Ecumenical Studies and in Ecumenical Trends.

JOSEPH A. LOYA

ODELL HODGSON, LUIS E.

B. 28 Nov. 1912, Buenos Aires, Argentina; d. 22 Jan. 2000, Premià del Mar, Spain. Odell Hodgson represented his country at the first world conference of Christian youth at Amsterdam 1939. Between the assemblies at New Delhi and Uppsala he was a member of the working committee of the Department on Church and Society and he cooperated in various interchurch aid activities. He represented the International Missionary Council* in the joint committee that prepared its integration with the WCC, 1959-61. Lay leader of the Methodist Church in Argentina and Uruguay, and first lay president of the Methodist church in Uruguay, 1973-75, he participated in the initiation of the Latin American Union of Evangelical Youth (ULAJE) in 1941 and was its vice-chairman, 1945-55; he was executive secretary of Church and Society in Latin America (ISAL), 1961-68; and he contributed to the formation of the Commission for Evangelical Unity in Latin America (UNELAM), 1963-64.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

OIKOCREDIT

OIKOCREDIT, or the Ecumenical Development Co-operative Society as it was originally called, was established in 1975 at the initiative of the WCC as “an instrument for the promotion of justice and development among the poor” and as “a proper means of re-deploying part of the investment resources of the churches”. Using a model of a just economic order, churches can play a more concrete role in economic development by mobilizing credit for development in poor areas through loans and investments with cooperative enterprises. The finances originate from churches, religious orders and individuals who support development as a liberating process for economic growth, social justice and self-reliance.

Oikocredit has 461 members of all denominations: Roman Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox. By December 1999 it had mobilized approximately EUR 120 million in share capital; and thousands of people had improved their economic status and self-reliance through participation in enterprises financed by Oikocredit. Although Oikocredit funds groups unable to qualify for commercial credit because their collateral is insufficient or their repayment capability is unproved, it has maintained the full face value of the loan fund and shareholders' investments. Of the EUR 57.3 million which were outstanding in 1999 with 272 projects in 65 countries, a large part consists of money repaid by poor people whom no bank would trust.

Oikocredit puts into practice resource sharing: for the poor who share the borrowed capital by repaying it, and for churches and individuals (1) by investing in people normally considered unworthy or too powerless to qualify, and (2) by sharing power. The majority of the votes and most of the members of the board of directors are from developing countries.

GERT VAN MAANEN

OIKOUMENE

“OIKOUMENE” is derived from the Greek word oikein, “to inhabit”. With the meaning of “inhabited earth” or “the whole world”, the term has been used since Herodotos (5th century B.C.). Since the Hellenistic period the term has been used in secular contexts to refer politically to the realm of the Greco-Roman empire or to mark the cultural distinction between the civilized world and the lands of the barbarians.

The biblical writings generally follow the secular usage, e.g. taking oikoumene as a synonym for “earth” (Ps. 24:1), yet without giving particular prominence to the term. In the New Testament the political connotation of the term is visible in Luke 4:5-7 (see also Luke 2:1; Acts 17:6) and in Revelation (esp. 16:14). The expected reign of God can be called the “coming oikoumene” (Heb. 2:5).

The subsequent, much more widespread ecclesiastical use of the term is linked with the extension of the Christian community across the entire Roman empire. By the 4th century the oikoumene had become the “Christian world”, with the double (political and religious) meaning of “Christian empire” and “whole church”. The adjective oikoumenikos (Latin universalis or generalis) refers to everything that has universal validity. Thus, ecumenical is a quality claimed for particular councils and their dogmatic decisions (see ecumenical councils) or is used as a title of honour for specific patriarchal sees or for respected teachers of the whole church.

In Roman Catholic and Orthodox tradition, which preserved the memory of the early link between church and empire, the term remained in use, though its meaning became more and more technical. The churches of the Reformation which developed into regional or national entities lost sight of the ecumenical dimension for more than 200 years. The pietistic revival (under Nicholas von Zinzendorf et al.) led to the re-discovery of the worldwide missionary calling of the church as well as to a renewal of the consciousness of Christian unity* and fellowship across the differences of nations and confessions (Evangelical Alliance, 1846). In both contexts the term “ecumenical” has been reclaimed; the specifically modern meaning, however, refers to a spiritual attitude manifesting the awareness of the oneness of the people of God* and the longing for its restoration (Söderblom).

Present-day usage is largely conditioned by the new reality of the organized ecumenical movement, as represented in particular by the WCC, and the different ways of reacting to this reality. The WCC itself, in an early statement by its central committee (1951), gave an account of its understanding of the term “ecumenical”. In the light of the original Greek meaning, the term should be used “to describe everything that relates to the whole task of the whole church to bring the gospel to the whole world. It therefore covers... both unity and mission in the context of the whole world.” It has proved difficult to maintain the tension built into this definition.

Thus, the Roman Catholic Church, after having overcome its very strong initial reservations, accepted the new usage of the term, placing the emphasis, however, exclusively on the unity dimension. The Decree on Ecumenism of the Second Vatican Council* (1964) defines: “The term ‘ecumenical movement’ indicates the initiatives and activities encouraged and organized... to promote Christian unity” (para. 4).

The Orthodox churches have participated actively in the ecumenical movement from the beginning. With a critical accent they defined their understanding of the ecumenical movement as “ecumenism in time”: “The immediate objective of the ecumenical search is, according to the Orthodox understanding, a re-integration of Christian mind, a recovery of apostolic tradition, a fullness of Christian vision and belief, in agreement with all ages” (New Delhi 1961).

Among the churches of the Reformation there is no common understanding of ecumenism. For many Protestant majority churches “ecumenical” refers to the external relations with churches in foreign countries. For those living among a diversity of denominations, “ecumenical” means the coming and being together of churches. For many, the ecumenical movement represents the manifestation of Christian concern for a world community in justice and peace. Over against this “worldly ecumenism” conservative evangelicals advocate a “confessing ecumenism” gathering the true believers from among the churches.

Within the ecumenical movement the WCC has sought to integrate the vision of John 17:21 (“that they may all be one... so that the world may believe”) with the vision of Eph. 1:10 (God’s “plan for the fullness of time, to gather up all things in [Christ], things in heaven and things on earth”). But the effort to integrate these two biblical visions has been challenged by a continuing tension and sometimes antagonism between those who advocate the primacy of the social dimension of ecumenism and those who advocate the primacy of spiritual or ecclesial ecumenism. More recently, a growing number of voices from the churches, especially in Asia but also in Latin America, have spoken of the need for a “wider ecumenism” or “macro-ecumenism” – an understanding which would open the ecumenical movement to other religious and cultural traditions beyond the Christian community.

Churchly and worldly, spiritual and missionary-social dimensions belong together in a comprehensive understanding of oikoumene. Oikoumene is a relational, dynamic concept which extends beyond the fellowship of Christians and churches to the human community within the whole of creation.* The transformation of the oikoumene as the “inhabited earth” into the living household (oikos) of God – that remains the calling of the ecumenical movement.

KONRAD RAISER

■ Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the World Council of Churches: A Policy Statement, WCC, 1997 ■ W.A. Visser ’t Hooft, The Meaning of Ecumenical, Burge Memorial Lecture 1953, London, SCM Press, 1953 ■ W.A. Visser ’t Hooft, “The Word ‘Ecumenical’: Its History and Use”, in HI-I.

OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH

THE OLD Catholic Church (OCC) considers the ideal of the undivided church* of the first centuries to be the focus of unity,* while realizing that historically the actual existence of such a primitive undivided church is problematic. Therefore this ideal is perhaps even more a task for the future than a fact of the past. In its active enthusiasm for the ecumenical movement from its very beginning, the OCC demonstrates its belief in the necessity of this task.

The history of the OCC of the Netherlands as a separate institution goes back to the troubles of the post-Reformation period. Since the Protestant authorities had ended the formal existence of the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) and had forbidden its public worship, the central authorities at Rome considered the Netherlands to have reverted to the status of a missionary area. Yet substantial parts of the Catholic church had remained intact and continued to function. A conflict slowly grew between the missionary ecclesiology of RC missionaries and the more established ecclesiology of the secular clergy, who obeyed the apostolic vicars who had replaced the pre-Reformation bishops. This conflict was worsened by accusations of Jansenism hurled at the secular clergy.

The outcome was the deposition, in 1702, of the apostolic vicar Peter Codde. As a consequence, a large part of the secular clergy with their parishes returned to the Roman party. The chapter of Utrecht finally chose an archbishop of its own, Cornelis Steenoven, who was consecrated in 1724 by a sympathizing French (Canadian) bishop, Dominique Marie Varlet. This act meant a definite breach between Rome and Utrecht. The official name of the Dutch Old Catholic church became "Roman Catholic Church of the Old Episcopal Clergy", a name which became more significant at the moment that the RCC in the Netherlands restored its hierarchy in 1853.

In 1870 a movement against the proclamation of the infallibility* of the pope and his universal jurisdiction by the First Vatican Council* arose in Germany, Switzerland and Austria-Hungary (esp. in Bohemia and Moravia), from where the name "Old Catholic" originated. In 1889 two of these newly established Old Catholic churches united with the Church of Utrecht in the Union of Utrecht. The bishops published a declaration which begins with the motto of St Vincent of Lérins: "Let us hold that faith which has been believed everywhere, always, by all. For that is truly and in the strictest sense Catholic." This motto immediately refers to the controversy around the First Vatican Council. It should be used not so much as a formal criterion of the truth (otherwise nothing can ever change in the church) but rather as an appeal to all Christians to hold the Catholic faith* of all ages, in order that they may all be one in this faith. Until this unity has been achieved, no single church should make one-sided attempts to formulate new Christian dogmas.*

The Old Catholic churches, from their diverse beginnings, have remained episcopal churches (see episcopacy). Most of the bishops are chosen in the churches, and the role of synods and laity is increasingly important for the very identity of these churches. The Polish National Catholic Church of the USA and Canada, and the Polish Catholic Church in Poland, which joined the Union of Utrecht in the 20th century, basically have the same episcopal-synodical structure. Smaller Old Catholic communities in France, Sweden and Italy have their own priests but cooperate with neighbouring countries which have a bishop. In all churches of the Old Catholic communion, clerical celibacy ceased to be an obligation. Recently, women have been admitted to the diaconate* and also to the priesthood, which has led to difficulties between the Western European and North American Old Catholic churches.

From 1870 onwards, intensive ecumenical contacts, especially with the Anglican and Eastern Orthodox churches, resulted in Anglican-Old Catholic intercommunion,* established by the 1931 Bonn agreement (the relationship was termed "full communion" in 1958) and in the Old Catholic-Orthodox dialogue,* 1973-87. In 1965 a concordat of full communion,* modelled after the Bonn agreement, was established with the Spanish Reformed Episcopal Church, the Lusitanian Church (Portugal) and the Philippine Independent Church.

Old Catholic involvement in the ecumenical movement formally began with the participation of two bishops, from the Netherlands and Switzerland, at the Lausanne Faith and Order* conference (1927). This side of ecumenism has always remained a major interest for Old Catholics, who have never missed a F&O conference. Old Catholics also participate in other activities of the WCC and of national councils of churches.* The OCC believes the unity which the ecumenical movement seeks for the churches is one which needs to exist as a reconciled diversity* of all, rooted in the common faith and order of the ancient church of the first ecumenical councils* and their creeds.

MARTIN PARMENTIER

■ G. Huelin ed., Old Catholics and Anglicans, 1931-1981, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1983

■ C.B. Moss, The Old Catholic Movement: Its Origins and History, London, SPCK, 1948.

OLD CATHOLIC-ORTHODOX DIALOGUE

THE RELATIONSHIP between Old Catholics and Orthodox has developed in five phases. The first was 1871-88. While the Dutch Old Catholic church from the 18th century repeated the Roman anathemas* against the Eastern church, the young anti-Vatican movement in Germany began to take initiatives for a serious dialogue. Anglicans and Orthodox were both invited to the Bonn reunion conferences of 1874 and 1875. It was decided that agreement on the faith of the ecumenical councils,* scripture and Tradition,* the office of bishop and the seven sacraments was necessary for unity.* Both the developments which had led to the declaration of papal infallibility* in the Roman Catholic Church and those which in Protestantism had led to discontinuity with the early church were rejected. As for the filioque,* it was agreed that the clause had been inserted wrongly into the creed but that it was possible to explain it in an orthodox way.

The second phase was 1889-1917, i.e. from the establishment of the union of Utrecht until the Russian revolution. In this period, dialogue commissions were formed in Rotterdam (Old Catholic) and in St Petersburg (Orthodox). The commissions never met, but they exchanged memoranda on the filioque, the eucharist* and the canonical validity of Old Catholic episcopal orders. Conservative theologians like Bishop Sergius of Yamburg (later patriarch of Moscow) required that Old Catholics should first of all recognize the Orthodox church as the one true church.* In 1904 Patriarch Joachim of Constantinople wrote an encyclical demanding an official and comprehensive confession of the faith of the Old Catholic churches. Due to communication problems this demand was not received in Utrecht (the demand was reiterated and met in 1970). In 1912 the Russian commission stated, with approval of the holy synod, that all questions put to the Rotterdam commission had been answered satisfactorily.

The third phase was 1920-60. The initiative now shifted from Russia to Constantinople. Three months after the Anglican-Old Catholic Bonn agreement in 1931, an official Old Catholic-Orthodox conference met in Bonn. No serious dogmatic points of difference were found to remain, but the Orthodox delegates had no power to accept the conference's decisions on behalf of their churches. None raised the matter of the recently concluded Anglican-Old Catholic intercommunion.* Later Orthodox criticism of this relationship was disappointing for Old Catholics, as the chairman of the 1931 conference, one of the subsequent critics, was the fully informed Orthodox archbishop in England.

The fourth phase was 1961-75. It began with the pan-Orthodox conference of Rhodes in 1961 and the official delivery by the Old Catholics to the ecumenical patriarch on 21 June 1970 of the Homologia (which was first requested in 1904). It lasted until the actual beginning of the "dialogue of truth" by the joint commission of Old Catholic and Orthodox theologians in 1975.

The fifth phase comprised the direct dialogue held 1975-87 on the following subjects: (1) the doctrine of God:* divine revelation* and its transmission, the canon* of holy scripture, the Holy Trinity;* (2) Christology: the incarnation* of the Word of God, the hypostatic union, the mother of God; (3) ecclesiology: the nature and marks of the church, the unity of the church and the local churches, the boundaries of the church, the authority* of the church and in the church, the indefectibility of the church, the synods (councils) of

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

the church, the necessity of apostolic succession, the head of the church; (4) soteriology: the redeeming work of Jesus Christ,* the operation of the Holy Spirit* in the church and the appropriation of salvation; (5) sacramental doctrine: the sacraments* of the church, baptism,* confirmation,* the eucharist, penance,* the anointing of the sick,* ordination,* marriage;* (6) eschatology:* the church and the end of time, life after death, the resurrection* of the dead and the renewal of the earth; and (7) ecclesial communion:* conditions and consequences. Between 1975 and 1987 the two sides reached formal agreement on all these points.

With the completion of this dialogue, a sixth phase of the Old Catholic-Orthodox relationship has begun. Now the churches will have to decide what practical conclusions can be drawn from the theological agreement which has been reached. A major point for consideration is the relationship of full communion between the Old Catholic and other churches, and the extent to which in the present ecumenical situation Old Catholic-Orthodox communion could and should be an exclusive one. A remaining task therefore is to relate the positive results of this bilateral dialogue* to the multilateral dialogue* of the churches of the WCC, especially as it develops through the work of the commission on Faith and Order.*

The sixth phase of this dialogue has become characterized by new problems: the debate about the ordination of women in the Old Catholic churches and the closer relationship of some Old Catholic churches with churches of the Reformation. On the first issue, consultations were held in 1996, and the results are published in Bild Christi und Geschlecht. On the second issue, it has been emphasized that no full intercommunion has been established anywhere.

MARTIN PARMENTIER

■ U. von Arx ed., Koinonia auf Altkirchlicher Basis (= Internationale Kirchliche Zeitschrift, 79, 4, 1989: German, French and English texts)

■ U. von Arx & A. Kallis eds, Bild Christi und Geschlecht: Gemeinsame Überlegungen und Referate der Orthodox-Alt-katholischen Konsultation zur Stellung der Frau in der Kirche

und zur Frauenordination als ökumenischem Problem (= Internationale Kirchliche Zeitschrift, 88, 2, 1998) ■ P.A. Baktis, "Old Catholic-Orthodox Agreed Statements on Ecclesiology: Reflection for a Paradigm Shift in Contemporary Ecumenism", ER, 46, 4, 1994 ■ J. Gros, H. Meyer & W. Rusch eds, Growth in Agreement II: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, 1982-1998, WCC, 2000.

OLD TESTAMENT AND CHRISTIAN UNITY

THE BEARING of the Old Testament on Christian unity merits discussion from several points of view: canon,* lectionary practice (see liturgical texts, common) and interpretation (see hermeneutics).

It is well known that the OT canon of the Protestant churches agrees with the Hebrew Bible as regards the number of books. But the OT and the Hebrew Bible are not really the same, in view of the Jewish three-stepped canon of Tanakh (law, prophets and writings). In contrast, the terminology often used in dividing up the Christian OT is somewhat amorphous and even misleading ("historical" books, "prophetic" books etc.). In Protestant Christianity the influence of Luther has been paramount, although earlier figures such as Jerome also favoured the smaller (Hebrew) canon. In contrast to the Reformation, the Roman Catholic tradition accepted a broader canon (including 1-2 Macc., Jdt., Tob., Sir., Wis., Bar., and certain parts of Dan. and Esth.), which was officially proclaimed at the council of Trent* in 1546. The position of the Eastern (Orthodox) churches is rather fluid. The general tendency is to accept some of the books generally called apocryphal (e.g. even 3 Macc.).

The adoption of a common liturgical lectionary by the mainline Christian churches in many parts of the world has been a bold and truly ecumenical move. At least Christians might share common biblical passages on Sundays and other holidays, despite their holding separate worship services. It is not a matter of great importance that the translations may differ (thus, for English-speaking Roman Catholics, the New American Bible or the New Jerusalem Bible, as opposed to the

New Revised Standard Version or the New English Bible). In truth there is no “Catholic” or “Protestant” Bible in the vernacular. Translations are done under various auspices, but the translators work from commonly accepted critical texts in the original languages. Differences between them are dictated by technical and scholarly differences of opinion, not by religious beliefs. Such has been the experience of the Catholic and Protestant scholars who have collaborated in some of the English translations as well as the French (Traduction oecuménique de la Bible) and the German (Einheitsübersetzung).

For the last two centuries the historical-critical method has dominated the interpretation of the OT by Christians (see exegesis, methods of). Despite its limitations, which have been vigorously proclaimed in recent years, this methodology remains a valuable hermeneutical tool – and ecumenical as well. For it has brought together biblical scholars (Protestant, Catholic and Jewish) in a common effort to understand the OT in its historical setting. The accepted results of this scholarship have influenced clerical and lay leadership in these communities. It is the most effective means of correcting certain theological biases and clarifying the theological presuppositions of Christian interpreters. Protestant Christianity, particularly Lutheran, has tended to interpret the OT in the light of the contrast between law and gospel; Roman Catholics and Orthodox have favoured the typological approach. Progress in hermeneutical sophistication has enabled all Christians to hear the OT on its own terms and not in stereotypes. The gospel (or better, Christian interpretation of the gospel message) needs to be corrected in the light of torah piety (Pss. 1, 119), and the eschatology* of the New Testament needs the grim realism of Job and Ecclesiastes if the Christian is to understand the mystery of God.*

Christianity has been able to find its roots in the OT (despite Adolf von Harnack’s advice to the Protestant churches to abandon it, à la Marcion) and to stress continuity with certain ideas (“people of God”* etc.). But this selective usage should be broadened by the obvious challenges one Testament offers to the other. Thus, churchly triumphalism deserves to be humbled by the puzzling treatment accorded to the children of Israel as people of God. Or freedom from the law (antinomian strains) needs to be balanced by the emphasis on the mitzvot as seen in Deuteronomy. A biblical theology which merely justifies a narrow Christian view contributes nothing to the oikoumene.

The old problem of scripture and Tradition no longer needs to be viewed as involving two adversaries. Modern biblical studies have highlighted the role of Tradition in the formation and production of the biblical word (see Tradition and traditions). Current hermeneutical theory acknowledges that all texts, including the Bible, have an after-life of their own, in which their meaning is extended. However, there persists in all branches of Christianity a certain fundamentalism which is unwilling to admit the limitations of the word of God* (see e.g. the description of Yahweh, the warrior God, in Joshua). The irony of fundamentalism is that it shares the common traditional concepts about the Bible (e.g. inspiration,* biblical truth), but it proceeds to apply these concepts to the biblical text in a rigid manner. For many fundamentalists the Bible itself replaces the church. The education of Christian readers might profitably begin with the OT, which presents such a wide variety of literary forms and thereby prepares for a more sophisticated approach to the word of God.

See also fundamentalists, New Testament and Christian unity.

ROLAND E. MURPHY

- J. Barr, Fundamentalism, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1978
- R.E. Brown, Critical Exegesis and Church Doctrine, New York, Paulist, 1985
- R.E. Brown, The Critical Meaning of the Bible, New York, Paulist, 1981
- Pontifical Biblical Commission, “The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church”, Origins, 6 Jan. 1994.

OLDHAM, JOSEPH HOULDSWORTH

B. 20 Oct. 1874, Bombay, India; d. 16 May 1969, St Leonards on Sea, UK. One of the chief architects of the ecumenical movement from the end of the 19th century up to the formation of the WCC in 1938 and its foundation in 1948, Oldham was founder and organizer of more significant ecumenical initiatives than any other Christian of his generation, with the possible exception of John R. Mott. Executive secretary of the world missionary conference in Edinburgh 1910, in 1911 he became the secretary of the continuation committee, and in 1921 the secretary of the International Missionary Council,* which replaced it. From his office in 1912 he launched the International Review of Missions, which he edited until 1927. In 1934 he became chairman of the research committee for the Universal Christian Council on Life and Work*, and organizer of its conference on "Church, Community and State" in Oxford, 1937. In 1938 he prepared with others the meeting in Utrecht which drew up the constitution and made final plans for the formation of the WCC. Not surprisingly he was made an honorary president of the Council at its first assembly in 1948.

When the work of the continuation committee was interrupted by the first world war, Oldham shifted his attention to the problems of German missionaries interned in British colonies. This brought him to the attention of the British colonial and foreign office, where he gained a reputation as a determined and reliable representative of the missionary movement. Already in the war years he was thinking of the future: What should be the pattern of missionary cooperation and the goals of missionary work in the new spiritual, social and political conditions which the war was producing?

The wartime experience had strengthened his conviction that "there is one gospel which is entrusted to Christ's one church, broken though that may be". This church had to find the means to communicate this gospel in a new "one world" context.

In the following years he became deeply involved in the problems of colonial Africa. He took the lead in the missionary struggle against racism* and forced labour. He pressed the colonial governments to give more attention to education, while at the same time working for the preservation of African culture by helping to create the international Institute of African Languages and Cultures, of which he became the administrative director. The publication of Christianity and the Race Problem brought him to the forefront of a struggle which would preoccupy the ecumenical movement to the present day.

During the 1930s Oldham's attention was drawn to the development of the modern state, a result of the political and economic upheavals of the time. The preparatory study programme he organized for the Oxford conference on the spiritual-ethical basis of the church's task in the world became a model of ecumenically common study. This brought the Life and Work movement out of its early tendency towards idealism and utopianism and provided it with carefully thought-out positions on such matters as the "function of the church in society", the "Christian understanding of man", and the "kingdom of God and history". These works greatly clarified and strengthened the world Christian community as it faced the rise of Hitlerism, the threat of the totalitarian state, and the problem of economic justice and order, for which the Oxford conference is now chiefly remembered. Throughout the war years Oldham promoted ecumenical study interest, especially among laypersons in English-speaking countries, through his leadership of the Christian Frontier Council and the influential Christian News-Letter, which he and Kathleen Bliss edited.

In 1946 he became vice-chairman of the study commission on "The Church and the Disorder of Society" in preparation for the WCC first assembly in 1948. His essay in the preparatory study volume A Responsible Society produced the key idea for the assembly's report on social questions. Oldham also pressed hard for more ecumenical attention to the "meaning of work" in modern technological society. After 1955 he ceased all active involvement in the ecumenical movement.

He was educated at Edinburgh Academy in Scotland and at Trinity College, Oxford. His plan to enter the Indian civil service was radically altered by his conversion at an Oxford meeting conducted by American evangelist Dwight L. Moody. He later spent a year at the University of Halle, where his teacher was Gustav Warneck, a leading German missiologist. Oldham was never ordained and remained an elder in Free St George's, Edinburgh, until he moved to England in 1921 and became an Anglican layman.

At his memorial service in London, W.A. Visser 't Hooft summarized thus Oldham's immense contribution: "Ecumenical history is full of examples of new development which he started, but which others carried to their conclusion. I have no hesitation in saying that the ecumenical movement owes more to him than to any other of its pioneers."

KATHLEEN BLISS

- J.H. Oldham, Christianity and the Race Problem, London, SCM Press, 1924
- The Function of the Church in Society, London, Allen & Unwin, 1937
- The Remaking of Man in Africa, London, Humphrey Milford, 1931
- The Resurrection of Christendom, London, Sheldon, 1940
- The World and the Gospel, London, United Council for Missionary Education, 1916
- K. Clements, Faith on the Frontier: A Life of J.H. Oldham, Edinburgh, Clark, 1999.

OPPRESSION, ECUMENICAL CONSEQUENCES OF

THE SUPPORT of the ecumenical movement for those struggling for liberation from oppression has been a noteworthy aspect of ecumenism during much of the 20th century. Although not perfectly and not unanimously, the ecumenical movement has in many ways been the conscience of the Christian church as it has sought to express solidarity with the oppressed and those struggling for justice. This role was particularly evident during the struggle against apartheid* in South Africa, as both inside and outside the country the ecumenical church played a key role in ending the oppressive system.

Through sharing in such endeavours, churches and Christians have often discovered the reality of their unity in Jesus Christ, despite the fact of denominational and confessional differences. Such experiences of Christian unity have been rooted in a common commitment to Jesus Christ, expressed in worship and embodied in social action. Although traditional issues of faith and order may not be discussed explicitly, the unity experienced is based implicitly on a deep faith in God's justice, love and liberating power revealed in Jesus Christ.

However, the achievement of liberation and the transition to democracy has often coincided, in South Africa and elsewhere, with a back-tracking on ecumenical commitment and a concomitant strengthening of denominational identity and resolve. This resurgence of denominationalism* may not be surprising in hindsight because ecumenical commitment during the years of the struggle may not have fundamentally altered denominational allegiance for the vast majority within the churches. Ecumenical participation in the struggle for justice and liberation has often been limited to those who have been prepared to take a stand for the truth and accept the cost of prophetic witness. Nonetheless, it remains ecumenically tragic when Christians and churches who were engaged together in such struggles fail to build on that experience once the transition to a more just social order is achieved.

We cannot lightly dismiss the value of denominational identity, for in times of social change and crisis it has often proved a source of security and empowerment. Yet denominationalism (i.e. a failure to recognize the provisionality of denominations) is clearly a major stumbling block to the full life of the ecumenical church, making any movement beyond denominational boundaries seem threatening to the experience of koinonia, meaningful identity and relationships, and often effectiveness in mission. When denominational priorities are placed above the ecumenical mandate, and therefore above the call to the church of Jesus Christ to witness to the reign of God, then what should be a cause for mutual enrichment becomes a source of division which undermines the witness of the church.

The search for Christian unity and the struggle for justice in the world belong together, as has been amply demonstrated in many contexts. That is, the unity of the church is not simply a matter of uniting denominations in common structures and institutions but of developing koinonia* within a broken and divided world. Moreover, since the major sources of division within the church are often more social, cultural, sexual and political than theological, the search for unity must deal with these divisive realities if it is to be an authentic expression of the unity we have in Jesus Christ.

Christian unity which is culturally or socially homogeneous, even if it involves the overcoming of historic divisions, is not really an adequate expression of the Trinitarian koinonia which is given in Christ through the Spirit. Sharing the common life of the Spirit respects and yet finds a way to overcome the limitations of natural relationships with others who are not of the same culture, race, nation, gender or class. By such sharing, the church witnesses to the reign of God in Jesus Christ through the power of the Spirit.

Until the reign of God is revealed in all its fullness, both the struggle for justice and the search to express Christian unity more faithfully remain an ongoing responsibility of the Christian church. The ending of apartheid did not mean a final victory over injustice, but it ushered in a new era in the struggle against racism, poverty and the oppression of women. So the struggle for justice continues. Central to this struggle is the need to deal with the past in a way which will bring the truth into the open and lead to healing and reconciliation. Such goals are central to the ecumenical ministry of the church. How tragic it will be if now, when the witness and ministry of the church are so crucial, the church withdraws into its denominational shells and fails in being a laboratory of reconciliation and koinonia within its own life, and an agent for the healing of the nations.

See also violence, religious roots of.

JOHN W. DE GRUCHY

■ W. Boesak, God's Wrathful Children: Political Oppression and Christian Ethics, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1995.

ORDER

IN 20TH-CENTURY ecumenical discussions on social issues, order and liberty/freedom* have been correlative terms, often representing two major philosophical and political traditions at work, the two major thrusts of social thinking in dialectical tension and even the two major systems of social organization influencing ecumenical actions and concerns. The WCC's constitution includes the following purposes: to express the common concern of the churches in the service of human need, the breaking down of barriers between people, and the promotion of one human family in justice and peace. This responsibility for participating in a new ordering of human society has largely been centralized within the Council's organizational structure, although its actions have always been closely inter-related. An overview of the history of this involvement shows continuity as well as changes and development.

"ORDER" IN ECUMENICAL SOCIAL THOUGHT

The concept of social disorder formed an important backdrop to several ecumenical initiatives of the 19th century. In the development of ecumenical social thought and action in the early 20th century, reflected for example at two Life and Work conferences (Stockholm 1925 and Oxford 1937), this theme became even more apparent. "The forces of evil against which Christians have to contend are found not only in the hearts of men as individuals, but have entered into and infected the structure of society, and there also must be combatted" (William Temple, Oxford conference report).

Before the WCC's Amsterdam assembly (1948), J.H. Oldham, W.A. Visser 't Hooft, Reinhold Niebuhr and M.M. Thomas discussed the best term for identifying the church's responsibility in the world. Phrases like "open society", "free society" and "free and responsible society" were considered, before "responsible society"* was adopted. For two decades, this proved to be the key phrase describing the ecumenical vision of the church's role in the social order.

The overall theme of the Amsterdam meeting was "Man's Disorder and God's Design". Sections 3 and 4 dealt specifically with the church and the disorder of society, and the church and the international disorder. A preparatory booklet said: "We see also signs of God's design in the struggles... for economic justice, for political freedom, for a world order that can deliver humanity from war. The results of these efforts will be imperfect and subject to corruption by man's pride and self-interest, but to work for these goals is a responsibility that God lays upon men." In the following years, most of these motifs re-appeared repeatedly.

At Evanston (1954), the term "responsible society" was broadened, and its meaning as a guide for action was clarified: "Responsible society is not an alternative social political system, but a criterion by which we judge all existing social orders." Sections 3, 4 and 5 dealt with topics related to the question of responsible world order amid disorder and conflict: social questions (the responsible society in a world perspective), international affairs (Christians in the struggle for world community) and intergroup relations (the churches amid racial and ethnic tensions).

After Evanston, a complex and widespread study on "Common Christian Responsibility towards Areas of Rapid Social Change" concentrated on the responsibility of the churches in diverse socio-economic and political contexts, with special emphasis on the new nations formulating their concerns and viewpoints. This study laid the foundation for the world conference on Church and Society (Geneva 1966), on "Christians in the Technical and Social Revolutions of Our Time", addressing economic development in a world perspective; the nature and function of the state* in a revolutionary age; structures of international cooperation – living together in a pluralistic world society; and humankind and community in changing societies. The underlying theme was clearly the responsibility for social action in diverse, rapidly changing, revolutionary contexts, an emphasis far different from that of Oxford and Amsterdam. Several of these issues led to other studies and projects.

In 1968 Uppsala affirmed the positions taken at Geneva. The same year a committee on Society, Development and Peace was constituted by the WCC and the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace (SODEPAX*). A wide field of issues was addressed at two major conferences (Beirut 1968 and Montreux 1970), in various research documents and in manifold activities.

In 1970 the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development (see development) started its work, confident about the possibilities of transferring technology,* international economic cooperation and infusions of foreign capital. During this process, however, the growth model of development came under heavy criticism, as the emphasis shifted to the people's own struggle for liberation, for justice and economic self-reliance.

A meeting at Bucharest in 1974, concluding a five-year study programme on "The Future of Man and Society in a World of Science-Based Technology", introduced the long-term concept of a "just and sustainable society", which was debated at Nairobi (1975) and further developed by the central committee meeting in 1977 into a “just, participatory and sustainable society”* (JPSS) programme. The search for a just order now found even greater emphasis, with participation and sustainability indicating necessary dimensions of this struggle for justice in the world order.

Again at Nairobi questions of social organization played a major role when, under the theme “Jesus Christ Frees and Unites”, the sections, among other things, dealt with seeking community: the common search of people of various faiths, cultures and ideologies (sec. 3); education for liberation and community (4); structures of injustice and struggles for liberation (5); and human development: ambiguities of power, technology and quality of life (6). The official report was published under the apt title Breaking Barriers.

After 1977 the JPSS programme formed a very important part of ecumenical social vision and action. An advisory committee delineated the three key concepts, emphasizing a theological interpretation of the people’s struggle against unjust powers in the perspective of the messianic kingdom (see kingdom of God).

A major development took place when the Vancouver assembly (1983) called on the churches to engage “in a conciliar process of mutual commitment (covenant) to justice, peace and the integrity of creation” (JPIC). It was seen not as a new programme but as a “programme emphasis”, affecting all the work being undertaken. In January 1987 the central committee spelled out what this process entails: it is a call to the churches to speak and act together in each place; to do so as a faith response; to base their positions on biblical teachings, Christian traditions and careful analyses of their own situations; to grasp the inter-relatedness of the varying contextual issues and to work on a global response as well; to draw upon available resources, including those of other faith traditions and ideologies.

This call affected almost all activities and became the new overall vision for responsible participation in ordering human society. Several regional meetings have already addressed facets of the process, many discussions have been held, position papers published, and initiatives taken.

Representatives of the Vatican Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity and the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace have already joined the discussions. Precisely because of the truly ecumenical participation, concepts of both “conciliarity”* (council) and “covenant”* are still problematic, discussed continuously and understood differently.

The WCC’s team on Justice, Peace and Creation is, for example, focusing on concerns related to the churches’ role in a world increasingly dominated by science and technology. Especially the integrity of creation (see justice, peace and the integrity of creation) has become important, with the insight that “attempts to maintain social and ecological stability through old approaches to development and environmental protection will increase instability, so that stability must be sought through change”. A search for a theology and ethics of nature* has become an integral part of the search for responsible social ordering.

A world convocation on JPIC met in Seoul in early 1990, in which the Roman Catholic Church participated fully, although not as “co-inviter”. This meeting, however, was not the culmination of the process but only an important step along the way.

THREATS TO A JUST ORDER

The inter-related global threats responded to in JPIC, namely oppression (see oppression, ecumenical consequences of), militarism* and the destruction of the environment,* are all seen in terms of disorder. One aspect of the response against oppression and injustice is the striving for a New International Economic Order (see economics). By the end of the 1980s, feelings of frustration and despair replaced the earlier optimism in the global social and economic context. The concept of development as understood in the early 1970s has become extremely suspect. High rates of unemployment* in wealthy industrialized countries, a widening gap between rich and poor, volatility in the international monetary system, the concentration of economic power in transnational corporations, the enormous proportions of international debt and repressive measures against popular movements trying to change the impoverishment of a growing number of people in the world have all led to this sense of crisis.

A second aspect of this response was the so-called international food disorder programme. Vancouver made a 13-point call to action in this regard to the member churches, and over the next seven years a task force involved representatives from all programme areas of the Council in addressing its implications. The call included strengthening structures for meeting emergencies, building ecumenical support for long-term solutions, monitoring international policies, providing support for the participation of the poor in food production and distribution, being advocates for farmers and landless rural workers, and denouncing contemporary International Monetary Fund policies. After the 1990 Seoul conference these concerns were incorporated in the WCC's approach to justice, peace and the integrity of creation as well as its critique of globalization (see food crisis/hunger).

An important aspect of the response against militarism is a series of world military order studies, conferences and reports. Especially from the third-world perspective the extent of world militarization and the fact that political and economic decisions are made in terms of military interests, often leading to legitimation of the destructive and unjust order of "law and order" and the violation of human rights,* have been pointed out.

Similarly, the three concepts used in JPIC to describe the purpose of the churches' social action can all be seen in terms of order: justice, peace and the integrity of creation – "introducing a sense of wholeness in a fragmented and divided society"; the new idea of "integrity of creation" goes beyond the call for a "sustainable society" precisely in that it "points to an understanding of the wholeness of created life in the world as it is in the plan of God"; the process means that "we must all orient ourselves to a Word which incorporates the whole created order and is prepared to suffer for its healing".

For order in an ecclesiological sense, see church order, Faith and Order.

D.J. SMIT

- M. Arruda ed., Ecumenism and a New World Order, WCC, 1980
- A.J. van der Bent, Christian Response in a World of Crisis, WCC, 1986
- P. Bock, In Search of a Responsible World Society: The Social Teachings of the World Council of Churches, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1974
- EAT-WOT, Search for a New Just World Order: Challenges to Theology, Bangalore, EAT-WOT, 1997
- C. Mulholland comp., Ecumenical Reflections on Political Economy, WCC, 1988
- K. Srisang ed., Perspectives on Political Ethics, WCC, 1983.

ORDINATION

IN ECUMENICAL discussion about ordination, five questions have to be considered: What is the rite of ordination? Who is ordained? By whom is the ordination performed? In what context is this to be done? What rites of unification can be found for a mutual recognition of ministries between churches?

At least since the time of The Apostolic Tradition, the church order attributed to Hippolytus, the ancient rite for the ordination of bishop, presbyters and deacons consisted primarily of the laying on of hands, with a prayer for the grace of the Spirit. In other documents, it is apparent that installation of bishops in the cathedra was significant because of their responsibility for apostolic teaching. In Eastern churches, in the ordination of a bishop the imposition of hands was later complemented by the placing of the gospel on the neck of the ordinand, and in all ordinations by investiture and the acclamation of the people. In Western churches, from the early middle ages, the central rite was first accompanied and then eventually obscured by anointings, investiture and the tradition of instruments. The use of these ceremonies fortified a priestly and sacramental understanding of order.

The 16th-century reformers looked for a ritual that would give priority to God's call to ministry, place the ministry in relation to the common priesthood of all the faithful, and avoid priestly or sacramental interpretations of order. As they acknowledged but one ministry of word and sacrament,* so they largely practised but one ordination, doing away with the distinction between presbyter and bishop. For Luther, the service of ordination consisted of the laying on of hands and the recitation of the Lord's prayer, though Lutheran churches did keep other elements of prayer for the ordinand. John Calvin accentuated election and prayer by the congregation and did not deem the laying on of hands to be necessary. Many Reformed churches did keep it, however, or substituted for it the extension of the right hand of fellowship. Though pastors and teachers were the ministers of the word, sometimes elders and deacons were ordained with similar rites.

The Anglican church retained the laying on of hands and the prayer of the people, doing away with the medieval blessing prayers, in which it found elements of the priestly and the sacramental and which had come to be called prayers of consecration. It also retained the offices of bishop, presbyter and deacon (see ministry, threefold). Baptists and Congregationalists preferred ordination services which would show the tie to God's call and to the local congregation rather than depict an act of ecclesiastical bestowal of power. In some cases, the laying on of hands was kept as part of such services, linked with prayer for the ordinand by the congregation and forms of recognition of ministry by the local congregation or by a broader fellowship of churches. The extension of the right hand of fellowship was sometimes used instead of the laying on of hands. While ordination was primarily for ministers of word and sacrament, at times deacons and elders have been or are installed with similar observances in these churches.

In recent times, the ordination services of the Church of South India have had an influence on Protestant churches generally, and many revised ordination rites have restored the laying on of hands to pride of place. Other factors in new rites include the presentation and examination of the candidate, exhortation and the prayer of the people. Studies of the ancient tradition pertinent to liturgical reform have had their impact on the ordinal of the Roman pontifical. Though it retains anointings and the tradition of instruments, the Roman pontifical now gives clear priority to the laying on of hands and the blessing prayer, incorporating a petition for the gift of the Spirit. This ritual also includes the prayer of the people, presentation and examination of the candidate, and episcopal exhortations. Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* has now suggested that all churches restore the laying on of hands as the primary ordination rite, as sign of the gift of the Spirit for ministry, along with the suggestion that all churches restore the threefold ministry of bishop, presbyter and deacon. Implementing this would entail introducing distinct ordination services in those churches which still prefer ordination to the one ministry of word and sacrament, without ritual distinction of orders.

It is one thing for churches to adopt this ritual of laying on of hands with prayer; it is another for them to agree on its significance and its necessity. For this reason studies of the ancient tradition have become important to ecumenical agreement. It cannot be said without reservation that there is clear evidence of the need for the rite in the appointment of church officers in the New Testament, although a number of texts associate it with a sending for ministry or assignment to community responsibility. The introduction of the rite may have been influenced by a post-baptismal laying on of hands in recognition of the gift of the Spirit in the early church and by a ritual for the appointment of prophets within Judaism. However, as far as historical origins are concerned, it is only in The Apostolic Tradition that it is clearly said that bishop, presbyters and deacons are to be appointed with an episcopal laying on of hands and prayer, and that they alone are to be inducted into office in this way. In some early church orders, deaconesses and widows are included among those who receive the laying on of hands. It is hard to know, however, whether they were intended to be numbered among the clergy (see laity/clergy) or even whether such a practice was much followed. The requirement of the laying on of hands for the threefold ministry and its reservation to them did indeed become the universal practice of the church, though not necessarily in all local churches at the same time. Nor was the same weight given to it everywhere, and it did not stand alone without a larger set of observances.

We can grasp some idea of the difference in shades of meaning attributed to the laying on of hands by contrasting the use of the Greek word cheirotomia with that of the Latin word ordinatio. The former means precisely the laying on of hands, and its primary significance is the gift of the Spirit for the service of the church. It is not clear whether at first it meant the actual empowerment for office or a prayer for the guidance of one otherwise designated and installed. It may well be anachronistic to make such distinctions, given that cheirotomia and blessing constituted a unity with other actions, including election or approval of the candidate for ministry by the people, assignment to the service of a particular church within the communion of churches, the participation of other churches (often through their bishops), the prayer of the people as well as of the bishop who ordained, fasting and other forms of preparation, and completion of the rites in the celebration of the eucharist.* In contrast, while ordinatio includes reference to multiple procedures, it does not directly mean the laying on of hands but brings the official assignment to office to the fore and is used also for installation in the lesser orders, for which laying on of hands was not employed. While in churches using this term "laying on of hands" was a normal part of the ordination of bishops, presbyters and deacons, it is advanced as an opinion by some scholars that on occasion, even without the rite, the ordinatio might be taken as complete, provided a person was legitimately assigned as a member of the clergy.

Such matters obviously affect the ecumenical acceptance of the laying on of hands by a bishop as the common ordination rite. It becomes more acceptable to all, the more it is kept in fuller context, including a link to a particular church and the recognition and prayer of all the people. For some churches, it would be viewed more favourably if it was not invested with a strong sacramental efficacy and if the need for continuity in ministry through episcopal ordination was not deemed indispensable to the validity of ministry. Without such attributions of sacramental efficacy, it could be accepted as indeed a sign of the gift of the Spirit and of the apostolic continuity of the church in which ministry is exercised. The Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches, however, would like to see their own sacramental appreciation of the rite acknowledged. Mutual agreement on this sacramental understanding was formulated in 1988 by the Joint International Commission for theological dialogue between the Orthodox church and the Roman Catholic Church. As far as mutual recognition of ministries between the churches is concerned, for the RCC issues of validity need first to be resolved, involving episcopal succession and the understanding on which ordinations are performed. For Orthodox churches, recognition of ministry must occur within the context of recognition of churches. For many Protestant churches, a common faith must lie at the foundations of such acceptance. Thus the conditions surrounding the adoption of this rite are not the same for all churches, even though there is a growing acceptance of its use and significance.

See also diaconate, episcopacy, ministry in the church, ordination of women, presbyterate, priesthood.

DAVID N. POWER

- P. Beasley-Murray ed., Anyone for Ordination? A Contribution to the Debate on Ordination, Tunbridge Wells, UK, Marc, 1993
- P.F. Bradshaw, Ordination Rites of the Ancient Churches of East and West, New York, Pueblo, 1990
- L.W. Countryman, The Language of Ordination: Ministry in an Ecumenical Context, Valley Forge PA, Trinity, 1992
- J. Lécuyer, Le sacrement de l'ordination, Paris, Beauchesne, 1983
- M.B. Pennington, Called: New Thinking on Christian Vocation, Minneapolis, Seabury, 1983
- J.F. Puglisi, The Process of Admission to Ordained Ministry: A Comparative Study, 2 vols, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1996, 1997
- W. Vos & G. Wainwright eds, Ordination Rites, Rotterdam, Liturgical Ecumenical Center Trust, 1980
- M. Warkentin, Ordination, a Biblical-Historical View, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1982.

ORDINATION OF WOMEN

SOME WOULD argue that the move towards the ordination* of women to a ministry of word (see word of God) and sacrament* began within the pages of the New Testament. Jesus' treatment of women was revolutionary in the cultural context of his day, and he entrusted to women the news of his resurrection. Women held prominent positions in the early Christian communities and throughout the history of the church have exercised a recognized (though not ordained) ministry as confessors, teachers, theologians and abbesses.

Nevertheless, the 12 apostles were men, the ordered threefold ministry* (of bishop, presbyter and deacon) from its emergence early in the 2nd century was male and, for 19 centuries, the ministry of word and sacrament has been exercised only by men. At the Reformation it was a characteristic of the radical movements, especially the Anabaptists, to accept women as ministers.

The movement to ordain women to a full ministry of word and sacrament began in the 19th century in the context of the changing role of women in Western industrializing countries. Women were moving out of the home to work in factories, education and social work. In the church, recognized but not ordained ministries developed. Roman Catholic religious orders for women burgeoned; women were accepted and sent as missionaries; in fast-growing European industrial towns women exercised a ministry as social workers, Salvation Army sisters, Anglican Church Army sisters, Wesleyan class leaders. The order of deaconess, revived among the Moravian Brethren in the 18th century, was instituted in 1836 in Kaiserswerth in Germany in Reformed and Lutheran traditions and spread to Protestant churches all over Europe and eventually to churches around the world.

Those churches which at the time of the Reformation had moved away from the threefold pattern were the first to ordain women. The absence of a "catholic" view of the priesthood* of the ministry had its effect. Moreover, since many of these churches emphasized the local or regional church (see local church), this development could take place without the formal agreement of a worldwide communion.* For example, the Methodists in the US ordained women in 1956, in England in 1974; among Reformed churches, the Congregationalists of England and Wales ordained women in 1917, the Congregational Union of Scotland in 1929 and the Eglise réformée in France in 1965. By 1960 Lutheran churches in Germany, Scandinavia (except Finland) and the US had all ordained women. The ordination of women in the Church of Sweden in 1960 marked a significant development in a church which had maintained the historic episcopal succession and which had an agreement of intercommunion,* based on the recognition of ministries, with the Church of England, a church which claimed to retain the ministry of the universal church at the Reformation.

A 1970 survey carried out by the WCC found Baptist, Congregational, Disciples, Lutheran, Methodist, Reformed and United churches which ordained women. But many of the churches that ordain women had not taken this move in Africa, Asia and Latin America. Clearly the status and role of women in society in the different continents affect the practice of the ordination of women.

Since 1970 the number of women ordained in churches that ordain women has increased, and the practice has spread in the developing countries. Although no church has reversed its decision to ordain women, there is often resistance to the ministry of women, and positions of responsibility are slow in opening up.

In 1971 Hong Kong became the first of a number of Anglican provinces to ordain women (having already, as an emergency, ordained a woman during the second world war, an ordination subsequently set aside); the USA, Canada, New Zealand, Brazil, Kenya and Uganda followed, and by 1997 a large number of the 37 provinces ordained women to the presbyterate. The Church of England ordained its first women as priests in 1993 and by 1997 almost 2000 of its 11,000 priests were women. The Church of England continues to recognize the position of those who are opposed to women priests. By act of synod it has consecrated three bishops who are themselves opposed to the ordination of women and who minister to congregations who remain opposed. This act is the consequence of the Church of England's understanding that the matter of women's ordination to the ministry of the universal church remains a matter of discernment and open reception in the whole church. At the Lambeth conference in 1978 the provinces agreed to remain in communion with one another in spite of different beliefs and practices. However, the fact that the priestly ministry of women lawfully ordained in some provinces is not recognized in others means that there is in fact no longer full interchangeability of ministries, and thus not full communion, within the Anglican communion.

By 2000 the Old Catholic churches in Austria, Germany, the Netherlands and Switzerland had ordained women to the priesthood, while other Old Catholic churches are opposed. The situation is to be reviewed by the international conference of bishops to decide whether and how communion may be maintained with a difference of belief and practice on the matter.

The position in the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches remains unchanged, although an unofficial movement favouring the ordination of women in the RCC has appeared, particularly in the Netherlands, the USA and England. The official Roman Catholic position is stated in Inter Insigniores, a 1976 declaration of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. The RCC is not free, it is said, to change the unbroken tradition of the universal church on this matter. In his apostolic letter Ordinatio Sacerdotalis of May 1994, Pope John Paul II declared he had no authority to change the church's tradition of ordaining only men to the priesthood. The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued a response in November 1995 stating that the teaching of the pope's letter is to be understood as belonging to the deposit of faith and is to be held definitively.

The Orthodox churches remain opposed. In 1989 they held a consultation in Rhodes to set out their reasons for maintaining the unbroken tradition of the church. Thus the two largest and oldest churches continue to uphold the tradition of an all-male priesthood.

The movement to ordain women to the full ministry of word and sacrament, especially among the churches springing from the Reformation, has coincided with the movement towards the visible unity* of the church. The one has clearly had an effect on the other, for the visible unity of the church involves the recognition not only of all its baptized members as members of a single community of faith but also of those who are called to be ministers of the one communion. As long ago as 1916 the Anglican William Temple expressed a view which many committed ecumenists have shared: "I would like to see women ordained;... desirable as it would be in itself, the effect might be (probably would be) to put back the re-union of Christendom – and re-union is more important."

The conflict between the movement to ordain women and the move towards the unity of the church is illustrated by the experiences of uniting churches. The existence of women ministers in the United Church of Canada was one of the reasons that Anglicans did not enter union with that church in 1956. In the Anglican-Methodist scheme for unity in England in the 1960s, the Methodists delayed ordaining women in order that the two churches might consider the matter together. Only after the failure of the scheme did Methodists proceed to ordain women. In the subsequent covenanting* proposals involving United Reformed, Methodist, Moravian and Anglican churches, the ordination of women was once more an issue. Since 1997, discussions between the Methodist Church and the Church of England have once more drawn attention to the difficulty of moving to visible unity when only one partner has women exercising a ministry of oversight and the legislation of the other church excludes the possibility.

When women were admitted to the full ministry in the Church of Sweden, it was argued that this step would gravely damage relations of intercommunion with the Church of England (however, see Anglican-Lutheran dialogue, Porvoo communion). In 1931 the Old Catholics and Anglicans entered into the Bonn agreement, one of "full communion". The move of some Anglican provinces to ordain women met with grave concern among Old Catholics, and ultimately the Polish National Catholic Church terminated the agreement. At the consultation of united and uniting churches in 1987, the situation was summed up in this way: "For some churches the ordination of women adds to the hindrances to unity; but the united churches are clear that further union for them is being made a more open possibility by the willingness of those to share that ordination of women which they have found to be a creative element in their common life."

The theological issues involved in the ordination of women have been clarified and developed particularly in the context of ecumenical conversation. The concern was already voiced at the first world conference on Faith and Order (Lausanne 1927) and has been a recurring theme in WCC assemblies, in the work of F&O and in WCC departments responsible for women's concerns. The Council has proved both the most creative but also the most divisive forum in which to face the issue. The churches in the catholic tradition, particularly the Orthodox churches, have felt forced to face a question which was not on their own agenda and which challenged unacceptably their belief that the holy Tradition* is clear and unchangeable.

The 1982 Lima document on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* does not treat the ordination of women in the main part of the ministry text but considers the issue in a commentary (to M18), which gives a short description of the positions of those churches which ordain women and those which do not. There is no convergence between the churches on the matter. Behind those short sentences lies a long history of debate and clarification of the issues, not least through the insights of the study on "The Community of Women and Men in the Church", which in 1980 produced a book entitled Ordination of Women in Ecumenical Perspective.

The contribution of the WCC has been to help the churches to set the discussion within the context of an emerging convergence on the understanding of ministry and priesthood and perhaps, even more important, within the concept of the unity we seek. The studies on the unity of the church and the renewal of human community have enlarged and enriched the perspective of this unity. Some have come to maintain that the churches' ministry must include women in order to show to the world the depths of unity in human community and to make the values of the gospel and the vision of the kingdom credible in a broken and divided world. The unity of the church ought not to be set over against the unity of the human community. In the context of the WCC the challenge has also gone to the churches that "openness to each other holds the possibility that the Spirit may well speak to one church through the insights of another. Ecumenical considerations, therefore, should encourage, not restrain, the facing of this question." The WCC provides the right context for deepening the understanding of the exegetical, doctrinal and pastoral questions which arise in relation to the ordination or non-ordination of women to the priesthood. The discussion continued within the work of the Decade of Churches in Solidarity with Women. It is increasingly recognized that all the different opinions and practices need to be acknowledged and no church marginalized in the ongoing debate.

Bilateral conversations, particularly those between churches with differing practices, have had to face the issue squarely. The matter has figured prominently in the Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue.* Just as growth in communion and reconciliation of ministries seemed possible on the basis of the agreed statement on ministry, some Anglican provinces proceeded to ordain women, which led the pope to caution about this "grave new obstacle" to the movement towards unity. In an official correspondence between the pope, the archbishop of Canterbury and Cardinal Johannes Willebrands some of the central arguments for and against the ordination of women were set out.

They include the question of the representative nature of priesthood and whether women may appropriately represent God in Christ, particularly in the presidency of the eucharist.* The argument relates to the fundamental significance of the maleness of Jesus in the incarnation* and the relation of maleness to the nature of God. It is bound up with the argument, used also by some in fundamentalist and evangelical traditions, for the headship of men and for the “proper subordination of women to men in the order of creation, which also precludes women’s ordination”. A third argument concerns how decisions are taken on a matter relating to the ministry of the universal church when there is division in the church. Some believe only a truly ecumenical council* would have power to resolve the issue. The agenda revealed in ecumenical dialogue touches matters at the centre of faith* regarding what is believed about the ministry, the church, men and women created in God’s image and, most crucial of all, the nature and being of God.* Churches committed to unity are forced to face how they may move into deeper communion while remaining divided on the issue.

Until recently, developments have mainly concerned the ordination of women to the presbyterate.* The first woman bishop, Marjorie Matthews of the United Methodist Church, USA, was greeted at the 1983 Vancouver assembly of the WCC. More recently, in England for example, women have assumed oversight roles in the Methodist and the United Reformed churches, both non-episcopal churches. By 1997 there were women bishops in Lutheran churches in Scandinavia and Germany.

The Lambeth conference in 1988 resolved that, should a woman be consecrated bishop in a province of the Anglican communion, every attempt would be made to maintain “the highest degree of communion” possible, despite lack of agreement on the issue of women bishops. The development would be tested in an open process of reception in the Anglican communion and the universal church. A commission was set up to monitor developments in the Anglican communion. In 1989 Barbara Harris was consecrated bishop in the USA and became suffragan bishop in the diocese of Massachusetts. In 1990 Penelope Jamieson was consecrated bishop of Dunedin, New Zealand, the first woman to become a diocesan bishop in the Anglican communion. With these two consecrations women became fully a part of the threefold ministry in the Anglican communion. In the 1998 Lambeth conference 11 women bishops took part for the first time, although not all provinces recognize the episcopal ministry of women. The Church of England recognizes neither women as bishops nor the ministry of those (men or women) ordained by a woman bishop. No male bishop refused to attend the conference, and the bishops passed a resolution affirming an ongoing process of discernment and open reception within the Anglican communion and the universal church. According to the Roman Catholic Church this development makes reconciliation of ministries between Anglicans and Roman Catholics more difficult.

See also ministry in the church.

MARY TANNER

■ E. Behr-Sigel & K. Ware, The Ordination of Women in the Orthodox Church, WCC, 2000

■ M. Hayter, The New Eve in Christ: The Use and Abuse of the Bible in the Debate about Women in the Church, London, SPCK, 1987

■ C. Parvey, “Stir in the Ecumenical Movement: The Ordination of Women”, in The Force of Tradition: A Case Study of Women Priests in Sweden, B. Stendahl ed., Philadelphia, Fortress, 1985

■ C. Parvey ed., Ordination of Women in Ecumenical Perspective, WCC, 1980

■ F.W. Schmidt, A Still Small Voice: Women, Ordination, and the Church, New York, Syracuse, 1996

■ B.B. Zikmund, A.T. Lummis & P.M.Y. Chang, Clergy Women: An Uphill Calling, Louisville KY, Westminster John Knox, 1998.

ORIENTAL ORTHODOX CHURCHES

THE SIX Oriental Orthodox churches – Coptic, Syrian, Armenian, Ethiopian, Eritrean and (Indian) Malankara – are also called ancient Oriental, lesser Eastern, and pre- or ante-Chalcedonian churches. They are the churches of the first three ecumenical councils* (Nicaea,* Constantino-ple* and Ephesus) but do not accept the fourth, Chalcedon* (451). The six churches are in communion* with each other.

The Ethiopian, Coptic and Indian churches have been full members of the WCC since its inauguration in Amsterdam in 1948. The Syrian church joined at the New Delhi assembly (1961), and in Paris in 1962 the central committee admitted the Armenian church. Since the entry of Byzantine Orthodox churches at New Delhi, there have been a number of bilateral consultations between the Byzantine and Oriental churches which have brought them closer to each other, though communion has not yet been achieved (see Oriental Orthodox-Orthodox dialogue).

The statement of Nikos Nissiotis at New Delhi – that once there is a schism,* both parties are in schism – was objected to by conservative theologians, but it has paved the way for mutual respect in place of the ancient heresy-hunting, which was perhaps a necessary stage during the development of dogmas. Whenever the paradoxical mystery of Christology and the Trinity* could not be fully appreciated, rationalism erected walls that blocked wider communion. The Faith and Order* commission of the WCC paved the way for bilateral consultations between theologians of Byzantine and Oriental churches at Aarhus (1964), Bristol (1967), Geneva (1970) and Addis Ababa (1971).

The Coptic Orthodox Church traces its history back to St Mark the Evangelist, who founded the church in Egypt. The ancient Egyptian patriarchate of Alexandria represented one of the chief sees of the early church within the Roman empire. The Copts, descendants of the ancient Egyptians, preserved the Coptic language in their liturgy.* Through a long period of persecution since Byzantine times, the Coptic Orthodox Church tenaciously held fast to the “faith of the fathers”. A chief strength was its continuing the great ascetic-monastic traditions that originated in the Egyptian deserts. The church has initiated considerable missionary work in other parts of Africa and has a significant diaspora* in North America, Europe, Australia and the Middle East.

The Syrian Orthodox Church, which traces its origins to A.D. 37, holds the traditions of St Peter’s work. The church suffered severe persecution during the struggle against Hellenistic domination at the time of the council of Chalcedon and later through Mongol invasions and Turkish rule. The patriarchate had to be moved several times, finally being established in Damascus only in the 20th century. Syrian liturgical and theological life flourished until the 13th century but steadily declined afterwards. The monastic movement produced many universally acknowledged saints* and contributed enormously to the creation of a rich liturgical tradition. In 1665 the Antiochian church came into contact with the ancient church of St Thomas Christians in India, which led to the West Syrian liturgy being introduced to the Christians in South India. Though the Syrian church is vastly reduced in number because of Muslim domination, it has a considerable diaspora in the US, Australia and Europe.

The Armenian Apostolic Church traditionally attributes its beginning to the preaching of St Thaddeus and St Bartholomew. In 301 Armenia became the first nation to make Christianity its official religion. Victims of terrible persecution through the centuries, Armenian Christians heroically preserved their apostolic faith. The catholicos of All Armenians resides in Etchmiadzin, Armenia. There are three ecclesiastical centres within the church apart from Etchmiadzin: the catholicate of Cilicia (Antelias, Lebanon), the patriarchate of Jerusalem and the patriarchate of Constantinople. The Armenian church has a significant diaspora in all the continents. The Armenian national aspirations and the Armenian Orthodox faith are integrally interconnected.

The Ethiopian Orthodox Church traces its history back to apostolic times. Long under the tutelage of the Coptic Orthodox Church, the Ethiopian church declared autocephaly in 1950 and is now governed by its own patriarch in Addis Ababa. The church uses both the ancient language of Geez and modern Amharic in its liturgy. Influenced by a long tradition of monastic spirituality, this church has produced considerable religious literature and has its own iconographic tradition. It is now gradually moving beyond age-old social and economic structures to meet contemporary challenges.

The Eritrean Orthodox Church is also an autocephalous church, with a direct relationship to the Coptic Orthodox Church. Its first patriarch, Philipos I, was consecrated in 1998.

The Malankara (Indian) Orthodox Church has always cherished the tradition of St Thomas as the founding father of Christianity in India. The Indian church, now divided into Roman Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox families, has suffered from Western colonial missions. The church came into contact with the Syrian patriarchate of Antioch in 1665 and thus inherited the west Syrian liturgical and spiritual tradition. The Orthodox church in India declared itself autocephalous in 1912, though conflicts with the Syrian patriarchate continue. With two theological colleges, Kottayam and Nagapur, a mission training centre and many educational and charitable institutions, the church is fully involved in the life of the country. Besides the catholicos residing at Kottayam, Kerala, the church has 17 bishops and more than 1000 parishes. It has a diaspora in North America, Malaysia, Singapore and the Gulf countries.

Five of the Oriental churches have contributed leaders to the ecumenical movement: Aboon Theophilus, patriarch of Ethiopia, was one of the presidents of the WCC from Evanston to New Delhi; the late Armenian Catholicos Karekin (Sarkissian) was the vice-moderator of the central committee from Uppsala to Nairobi; the late Paulos Mar Gregorios of the Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church (India) had been one of the presidents from Vancouver to Canberra and also moderator of the Sub-unit on Church and Society from Nairobi to Vancouver; Patriarch Shenouda and the late Bishop Samuel of the Coptic Church, Patriarch Ignatius Zakka of the Syrian Church, and V.C. Samuel of the Malankara Church have done signal service for the ecumenical movement; Vasken, former catholicos of All Armenia, has hosted a number of ecumenical meetings in Holy Etchmiadzin.

The contributions have been greatest in the area of Faith and Order of the WCC.

GEEVARGHESE MAR OSTHATHIOS

- Aram I Keshishian, "The Oriental Orthodox Churches", ER, 46, 1, 1994
- H.E. Fey ed., A History of the Ecumenical Movement: The Ecumenical Advance, vol. 2: 1948-1968, London, SPCK, 1970, ch. 11
- R. Roberson, The Eastern Christian Churches: A Brief Survey, 6th ed., Rome, Orientalia Christiana, 1999
- The Star of the East, 4, 3, 1982
- Wort und Wahrheit, supplementary issues 1-4, 1972-78.

ORIENTAL ORTHODOX-ORTHODOX DIALOGUE

THE DIVISION between the Eastern Orthodox and the Oriental Orthodox families of churches can be traced back to the council of Chalcedon* (451). The Eastern Orthodox family (all those churches in communion* with the see of Constantinople) accepted Chalcedon as the fourth ecumenical council,* while the Oriental Orthodox (ancient churches of Egypt, Syria, Armenia, India and Ethiopia; in 1998, also Eritrea) rejected the council. The main conflict was in the area of Christology – how the divine and the human natures are united in the person of Jesus Christ.* However, strong political, cultural and social factors also played a part. The differences resulted in the breach of communion between these two Eastern families, which in spite of separation maintain to this day a remarkable unity* in theological approach, liturgical-spiritual ethos and general church discipline.*

The conflict between the Alexandrine and Antiochene theological traditions in the East was a major factor in the Christological controversy of the 5th century. Already in the council of Ephesus in 431 the conflict came to a head. Nestorius, the patriarch of Constantinople and a theologian belonging to the Antiochene tradition, was condemned. Cyril of Alexandria's Christology was accepted by the council as the norm of orthodoxy. The council of Ephesus was only the beginning of a long drawn-out controversy which culminated at Chalcedon.

In the Antiochene phrase "two natures after the union", the Alexandrine side suspected a “Nestorian” dividing of natures in Christ. Alexandrine phrases like “from two natures” and “one incarnate nature of God the Word” appeared to the Antiochenes as reflecting the monophysite confusion of natures. Emperor Theodosius tried to reconcile the two factions in 433 through the Formulary of Reunion, but it did not bring about lasting peace. The Alexandrines and the Antiochenes interpreted the terms of the reunion differently.

The issue of Eutychianism can be understood only against that background. Eutyches, an old monk in Constantinople, was accused of denying that Christ was in two natures after the union and that the incarnate Christ was consubstantial with us human beings. He was condemned in 448 in the home synod of Constantinople. Eutyches was not a theologian and probably did not understand the subtleties of the Christological discussion. It is clear, however, that he had strong connections in the imperial court through his nephew Chrysaphius, who was the grand chamberlain of the emperor. The Alexandrine side used his services for political connections at the court.

Meanwhile Pope Leo I of Rome had sent a tome to the East setting forth a Christological doctrine apparently intended to resolve the controversy. Some Antiochene theologians found its Christology similar to their own. The tome brought in the new factor of Western theology to the already muddled situation in the East and further complicated it.

In the second council of Ephesus (449), convened by Emperor Theodosius and presided over by Dioscorus of Alexandria, Eutyches was admitted to communion on the assurance that he adhered to the faith of the fathers as expressed in Nicea* and Ephesus. Leo’s contribution, intended to be read in the council, was ignored.

In the council of Chalcedon 451, these two issues – the admitting of Eutyches to communion and the ignoring of the tome of Leo – were brought up as two principal accusations against Dioscorus I, patriarch of Alexandria (441-51). The council condemned Dioscorus, though his doctrinal orthodoxy was neither examined nor questioned, and at the same time it acknowledged the Christology of the tome of Leo as truly Orthodox.

It is noteworthy that the non-Chalcedonian churches which rejected the doctrinal formulations of Chalcedon never adhered to any monophysite or Eutychian doctrine as attributed to them by the Chalcedonians. It is also now recognized that the Chalcedonian churches did not intend any Nestorianism in holding the Christology of Chalcedon. The mutual recognition of this fact is the starting point of the new dialogue. This fact, however, had been already recognized by perceptive theologians in the earlier post-Chalcedonian era. Serious attempts were made to bring together the two sides and to restore the broken communion, but persistent cultural and political factors hindered the attempts at reunion. The dialogue could be resumed only recently, after 1500 years of separation.

A series of four unofficial conversations took place between 1964 and 1971 at the initiative of Paul Verghese (later Metropolitan Paulos Gregorios) and Nikos Nissiotis, both on the WCC staff at the time. Agreed statements were produced from these conversations, which underline the complete Christological agreement between the two families. The first (Aarhus 1964) declared: “We recognize in each other the one Orthodox faith of the church. Fifteen centuries of alienation have not led us astray from the faith of our fathers... On the essence of the Christological dogma we found ourselves in full agreement. Through the different terminologies used by each side, we saw the same truth expressed.” Finding common ground in the formulation “one incarnate nature (physis or hypostasis) of God’s Word”, a phrase used by Cyril of Alexandria, the common father of both sides, both traditions re-affirmed their rejection of both the Nestorian and Eutychian teachings.

The fundamental agreement reached in Aarhus was re-enforced in subsequent conversations by agreement in several new areas. “Some of us affirm two natures, wills and energies hypostatically united in the one Lord Jesus Christ. Some of us affirm one united divine-human nature, will and energy in the same Christ. But both sides speak of a union without confusion, without change, without divisions, without separation. The four adverbs belong to our common tradition. Both affirm the dynamic permanence of the Godhead and the Manhood, with all their natural properties and faculties, in the one Christ" (Bristol consultation 1967). Both sides could affirm together "the common Tradition of the one church in all important matters – liturgy and spirituality, doctrine and canonical practice, in our understanding of the Holy Trinity, of the incarnation, of the person and work of the Holy Spirit, on the nature of the church as the communion of saints with its ministry and sacraments, and on the life of the world to come when our Lord and Saviour shall come in all his glory" (Geneva 1970).

The major difficulties on the way to the restoration of communion identified by these unofficial consultations were the following: (1) the meaning and place of certain councils in the life of the church (the Chalcedonian side accepted seven ecumenical councils, while the non-Chalcedonian family accepted only the first three as ecumenical councils); (2) the respective anathematization or acclamation as saints of certain controversial teachers in the church like Leo, Dioscorus, Severus (patriarch of Antioch), and others; (3) jurisdictional questions related to manifestation of the unity of the church at local, regional and world levels.

It was agreed that councils should be seen as charismatic events in the life of the church rather than as an authority over the church. The agreement calls for making a distinction between the true intention of the dogmatic definition of a council and the particular terminology in which it is expressed. The latter has less authority than the intention.

As to the anathemas,* it may not be necessary formally to lift them. Nor is it necessary for a church to recognize as saints those who were once condemned by that church. The Addis Ababa consultation of 1971 gave special attention to the questions of anathemas. It advocated the quiet dropping of anathemas. The lifting of anathemas, however, could be formally announced at the time of union. It was agreed that the church has the authority to lift the anathemas which it once imposed for pastoral or other reasons.

The unofficial conversations suggested to their churches, among other proposals, the appointment of an official joint commission to deal with the issues that separated the two families in the past and to consider the mutual agreement reached at an unofficial level so that necessary steps could be taken to restore full unity in eucharistic communion.

Responding to the solid Christological agreement reached by the unofficial consultations and to their suggestions to appoint an official commission, the churches took action and constituted officially a joint commission of the theological dialogue between the Orthodox church and the Oriental Orthodox churches. In the second meeting of this commission, at the Anba Bishoy monastery in Egypt in 1989, a historic agreement was signed. Opening a new chapter in ecumenical history and overcoming 1500 years of separation, the agreed statement said: "We have inherited from our fathers in Christ the one apostolic faith and tradition, though as churches we have been separated from each other for centuries. As two families of Orthodox churches long out of communion with each other, we now pray and trust in God to restore that communion on the basis of the apostolic faith of the undivided church of the first centuries which we confess in our common creed."

The third meeting of the joint commission (Chambésy 1990) re-affirmed the earlier agreement on faith and recommended to local churches in both families that all previous anathemas against each other's councils and fathers should be lifted. Now that both sides have accepted the first three ecumenical councils as their common heritage, the Oriental Orthodox will respond positively to the Orthodox interpretation of the four later councils, in line with the common agreement in all other aspects of faith.

The fourth meeting of the joint commission (Chambésy 1993) made proposals for the lifting of anathemas, which would be done unanimously and simultaneously by the heads of all churches through the signing of an appropriate ecclesiastical act. This action would restore communion with immediate effect. All condemnation, synodical and personal, against each other would be removed. A list of the heads of churches to be remembered in the liturgy (diptych) would be prepared. Questions of regional jurisdiction would be settled by the concerned local churches. As decided by the committee, the two co-chairpersons of the joint commission together have been visiting local Orthodox churches, on both sides, to encourage the process of unity.

With major theological and historical obstacles to unity now being removed, there is fresh hope that the Orthodox churches will soon take action to restore communion between their two families.

K.M. GEORGE

■ C. Chaillot & A. Belopopsky eds, Towards Unity: The Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches, Geneva, Inter-Orthodox Dialogue, 1998 ■ “Communiqué of the Joint Commission of the Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Churches, 20-24 June 1989, Egypt”, The Star of the East, 2, 1-2, 1989 ■ P. Gregorios, W.H. Lazareth & N.A. Nissiotis eds, Does Chalcedon Divide or Unite? Towards Convergence in Orthodox Christology, WCC, 1981 ■ reports of the unofficial conversations between theologians of the Eastern Orthodox and Oriental Orthodox churches from 1964 to 1971, Greek Orthodox Theological Review, 10, 2, 1964-65; 13, 1968; 16, 1-2, 1971 ■ V.C. Samuel, The Council of Chalcedon Re-examined: A Historical and Theological Survey, Madras, CLS, 1977.

ORIENTAL ORTHODOX-REFORMED DIALOGUE

INFORMAL conversations and contact among the Reformed and the Oriental Orthodox churches* during ecumenical gatherings eventually paved the way for officially organizing dialogues between these two Christian communions. A formal letter of invitation was sent by the general secretary of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* (WARC) to the head of each of the five Oriental Orthodox churches in 1991, which led to a first meeting in 1992 among a group of authorized representatives of the Oriental Orthodox churches and representatives of the WARC at the Ecumenical Centre, Geneva. This meeting was co-chaired by Pope Shenouda III of Alexandria and Milan Opočenský, general secretary of the WARC.

Pope Shenouda III extended an invitation to hold the first dialogue session in 1993 at Anba Bishoy monastery, Wadi El-Natroun, Egypt. The mutual edification and enrichment experienced at the Anba Bishoy monastery dialogue led to a commitment by both families to pursue the dialogue on a regular basis. Subsequent meetings were held at Driebergen, Netherlands (1994); Kottayam, India (1997); Richmond, Virginia, USA (1998); Damascus, Syria (1999); Musselburgh, Scotland (2000); and Beirut, Lebanon (2001), which concluded the first phase of dialogue.

The dialogue began by dealing with the understanding of scripture* and Tradition* in each other's churches, with this discussion connected to the mission and ministry of the church today. The progress has been slow but productive. The session at Richmond began a process of developing a common statement on the theological issues discussed so far.

A highlight of these dialogues was the adoption at the session in Driebergen of the agreed statement on Christology, which emerged from the biblical traditions and the patristic roots to which both the partners in dialogue owe their allegiance. The dialogues have helped these two families of churches to understand and appreciate each other's theological positions and traditions and acknowledge the need for greater ecumenical cooperation in dealing with the common contemporary challenges facing Christians, humanity and creation itself.

H.S. WILSON

■ H.S. Wilson ed., Oriental Orthodox-Reformed Dialogue: The First Four Sessions, Geneva, WARC, 1998.

ORIENTAL ORTHODOX-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

THE ORIENTAL Orthodox churches* comprise six independent churches – Armenian, Syrian, Coptic, Ethiopian, Eritrean and Indian (Malankara) – that historically inherit a refusal of the Christological teachings of the council of Chalcedon* (451). This rejection led to a break in communion* with those who accepted the council's teachings. In contrast to the Chalcedonian formula of one person and two natures in Christ, these churches affirmed the formula of Cyril of Alexandria, who spoke of "the one incarnate nature of the Word of God". In the eyes of the Oriental Orthodox, those who accepted Chalcedon held an essentially Nestorian Christology, which, in spite of verbal clarifications, compromised the unity of Christ's person. For Catholics, the "one nature" formula of the Oriental Orthodox seemed indistinguishable from the monophysite position of Eutyches, who taught that Jesus' humanity was totally subsumed into his divinity.

Movement beyond these entrenched positions gained momentum in the late 1960s, in the context of visits by heads of Oriental Orthodox churches to Rome and unofficial meetings of theologians. These contacts have resulted in substantial progress towards resolution of those theological problems which have traditionally divided the two communions. Since 1967 the following heads of Oriental Orthodox churches have met with the pope in Rome: Armenian Catholicos Khoren I (Cilicia) in 1967, Armenian Catholicos Vasken I (Etchmiadzin) in 1970, Syrian Patriarch Ignatius Yacoub III in 1971, Coptic Pope Shenouda III in 1973, Syrian Patriarch Ignatius Yacoub III in 1980, Ethiopian Patriarch Tekle Haimanot in 1981, Armenian Catholicos Karekin II (Cilicia) in 1983, Syrian Catholicos of India Mar Baselius Thoma Mathews I in 1983, Syrian Patriarch Ignatius Zakka I in 1984, Ethiopian Patriarch Paulos in 1988, Armenian Catholicos Karekin I (Etchmiadzin) in 1996, and Armenian Catholicos Karekin II (Etchmiadzin) in 2000. Several of these visits culminated in the signing of important joint communiqués or common declarations.

Alongside these official visits, five unofficial theological consultations have been held between theologians of both sides under the auspices of the Pro Oriente* foundation in Vienna, in 1971, 1973, 1976, 1978 and 1988. At these meetings, Christological and ecclesiological issues were discussed, and final communiqués were published stating areas of agreement and continuing disagreement.

The most substantial progress has been in the area of Christology. As early as 1970, in the common declaration signed by Pope Paul VI and Armenian Catholicos Vasken I, theologians were encouraged to explore this area, which was the theme of the first Pro Oriente meeting in 1971. The work of these theologians provided a basis for the historic Christological profession of faith signed by Pope Paul VI and Coptic Pope Shenouda III in 1973. Avoiding terminology which had been the source of disagreement in the past, this declaration made use of new language to express a common faith in Christ.

The second theological consultation (1973) took up this theme again. In its final communiqué, the group affirmed that while the Oriental Orthodox consider that some of the terms used at Chalcedon can be misleading, both sides agree that the formula can be understood in a correct manner. The heretical Eutychian and Nestorian Christologies were both rejected.

Since 1973, popes and Oriental Orthodox hierarchs have repeatedly asserted that their faith in Christ is the same. In the 1984 common declaration of Pope John Paul II and Syrian Patriarch Ignatius Zakka I, which also contained a common Christological profession of faith, it was stated that past schisms and divisions concerning the doctrine of the incarnation* "in no way affect or touch the substance of their faith", because the disputes arose from differences in terminology and culture. The 1996 common declaration of Pope John Paul II and Armenian Catholicos Karekin I spoke of their "fundamental common faith in God and in Jesus Christ".

These various affirmations make it clear that the Christological dispute between these two communions has been substantially resolved. We must remember, however, that the Ethiopian, Eritrean and Indian churches have not yet been party to such agreements.

Progress has also been made in the area of ecclesiology, but difficulties remain. Both sides have clearly recognized the ecclesial reality of the other and the authenticity of each other's sacraments.* In their 1984 common declaration, Pope John Paul II and Patriarch Ignatius Zakka I even authorized their faithful to receive the sacraments of penance,* eucharist* and anointing of the sick* in the other church when access to one of their own priests was materially or morally impossible.

The theology of ecumenical councils* and primacy* has been discussed at the Pro Oriente meetings. Although much common ground has been discovered, certain divergences remain unresolved.

The particularly sensitive issue of Eastern Catholic churches* made up of former Oriental Orthodox Christians or their descendants was discussed at the 1978 consultation. Oriental Orthodox strongly assert that the existence of these churches is inseparably linked to Roman Catholic proselytism* among the Oriental Orthodox, based upon a denial of the ecclesial reality of their churches. In response to this concern, proselytism on the part of either side had been condemned in the 1973 common declaration of Pope Paul VI and Coptic Pope Shenouda III.

The 1988 fifth theological consultation evaluated the results of the first four meetings and called for the establishment of an official theological dialogue between the Roman Catholic Church and the Oriental Orthodox churches as a whole. Since that time Pro Oriente has sponsored local consultations in Egypt, India and Syria.

Within this complex set of relationships between the two communions, a separate official dialogue between the Roman Catholic and Coptic churches has been in progress since its institution by Pope Paul VI and Pope Shenouda III in 1973. Eight meetings have taken place, in 1974, 1975, 1976, 1978, 1988, 1990, 1991 and 1992. Theological experts of the two sides have examined various issues and submitted recommendations to their respective authorities.

Moreover, an official theological dialogue between the Roman Catholic Church and the Orthodox Syrian Church of India began in 1989. The latter church includes a large part of the Oriental Orthodox faithful in India; the others remain under the jurisdiction of the Syrian patriarchate in Damascus.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

■ C. Chaillot & A. Belopopky eds, Towards Unity: The Theological Dialogue between the Orthodox Church and the Oriental Orthodox Churches, Geneva, Inter-Orthodox Dialogue, 1998 ■ Official documents from this relationship up to 1995 can be found in Oriental Orthodox-Roman Catholic Interchurch Marriages and Other Pastoral Relationships, Washington DC, National Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Standing Conference of Oriental Orthodox Churches, 1995. The papers presented at the first five unofficial Pro Oriente consultations were published in English in supplements to Wort und Wahrheit, nos 1-4, 1972-78. Selected documentation from all four meetings has been published as Four Vienna Consultations, Vienna, Pro Oriente, 1988.

ORTHODOX-REFORMED DIALOGUE

THE FIRST official international dialogue between the Orthodox churches and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* (WARC) took place in 1988 in Leuenberg, Switzerland, with 34 participants from different countries, under the leadership of Metropolitan Panteleimon Rodopoulos (for the Ecumenical Patriarchate) and Lukas Vischer (for the WARC). The primary theme considered was the doctrine of the Trinity,* as based on the Nicene Creed.* The second gathering, held in Moscow in 1990, continued discussions on the same subject.

Behind these official Reformed-Orthodox dialogues lies a long history of Orthodox and Protestant contacts. The earliest exchange of letters took place between the Lutheran theological faculty of the University of Tübingen and Ecumenical Patriarch Jeremiah II of Constantinople from 1573 to 1581 (see Lutheran-Orthodox dialogue). For the Calvinists, the first Orthodox-Reformed discussions centred on the stormy debate over the "unorthodox" confession of faith of Ecumenical Patriarch Cyril (Kyrill) Loukaris (ruled 1620-38).

Under the influence of Calvin's teachings, Cyril summarized his reforming beliefs in his published Eastern Confession of the Christian Faith. The original document can be seen at the Geneva public library, which has a wealth of materials related to this controversial confession. This confession eventually cost Cyril his life; to the best of our knowledge, this reform-minded patriarch never repudiated his statement, though there have been numerous attempts either to discredit or to dismiss it as a political document in the highly volatile polemics between Protestants and Catholics seeking to win the favour of Orthodox believers at that time.

In light of this history, it is necessary for present Orthodox-Reformed dialogues to establish firm grounds on which both traditions can confess the essentials of their Christian faith* in common, hence the decision for the official international dialogues to focus on the Trinitarian foundation based on the Nicene Creed. More recently, the international dialogues have centred on the church. This was the case in Aberdeen, Scotland, for the fifth session (1996), where the theme was "The Identity and Unity of the Church" in the context of the Nicene Creed and the patristic tradition of the ancient church.

The sixth session, held in Zakynthos, Greece, in 1998, focused on the crucial issue of church membership and sacraments. The seventh session, which took place at Pittsburgh (PA) in 2000, discussed further the implications of church membership within the Body of Christ with an emphasis on baptism and chrismation. While there is agreement on our common ground on baptism, there is still a difference in our understanding of the role and seal of the Spirit in chrismation.

In retrospect, it seems that these official international dialogues have been well prepared through a prior series of earlier Orthodox-Reformed consultations initiated in several countries. As early as the 1920s in Romania (Transylvania), discussions between Orthodox and Reformed had started; they continued in the 1950s in Germany, 1968-75 in North America, the 1970s in Hungary (Debrecen) and since 1981 in France and Switzerland.

The themes in these various consultations have ranged widely with studies on Christology, the eucharist,* the role of confession and creeds,* God's saving and sanctifying work through the Holy Spirit,* the meaning of the divine liturgy,* God's revelation* and history,* historical relativism and authority* in Christian dogma,* tradition* and contemporaneity, spiritual values and social responsibility of the church to society, the relationship of creation* and redemption* (nature* and grace*), and practical and pastoral issues such as mixed marriages* and proselytism.*

As each side seeks to interpret faithfully their tradition, participants are constantly discovering the common bonding of the Holy Spirit. Orthodoxy appeals to the tradition of the "undivided church", which preceded the great schism* of 1054 between the Eastern and Western churches, and points to the ecumenical councils* beginning with Nicea* as its norm. The Reformed tradition looks to scripture and the earliest church for its standards. Dialogue offers the possibility for accepting each other's respective traditions without losing the special gifts each brings to the table of dialogue for our mutual edification and enrichment.

CARNEGIE SAMUEL CALIAN

- C.S. Calian, "Cyrill Lucaris: The Patriarch Who Failed", JES, 10, 2, 1973
- C.S. Calian, Icon and Pulpit: The Protestant-Orthodox Encounter, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1968
- C.S. Calian, Theology without Boundaries: Encounter of Eastern Orthodoxy and Western Tradition, Louisville KY, Westminster/ John Knox, 1992
- J. Meyendorff & J. McLelland eds, The New Man: An Orthodox and Reformed Dialogue, New Brunswick NJ, Agora, 1973
- The Orthodox Church and the Churches of the Reformation, WCC, 1975
- T.F. Torrance, Trinitarian Perspectives: Towards Doctrinal Agreement, Edinburgh, Clark, 1994
- T.F. Torrance ed., Theological Dialogue between Orthodox and Reformed Churches, Edinburgh, Scottish Academic Press, 1985
- T.F. Torrance, Trinitarian Perspectives: Toward Doctrinal Agreement, Edinburgh, Clark, 1994
- L. Vischer ed., Agreed Statements from the Orthodox-Reformed Dialogue, Geneva, WARC, 1998
- L. Vischer "The Legacy of Kyrill Loukaris: A Contribution to the Orthodox-Reformed Dialogue”, MS, 25, 2, 1986. The Zakynthos 1998 papers are published in Greek Orthodox Theological Review, 43, 1-4, 1998.

ORTHODOX-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

THE SCHISM* between what are now known as the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches is usually traced back to the mutual excommunications* of Patriarch Michael Cerularius of Constantinople and Cardinal Humbert, the papal legate, in 1054. But in fact this was only a single low point in a long history of strained relations that reached its real culmination only with the crusades* and the sack of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204. Although many non-theological factors were relevant in this gradual estrangement of Eastern and Western Christians, doctrinal issues were also involved. The most important of these concerned the eternal procession of the Holy Spirit* (related to the addition of the filioque* to the Nicene Creed* by the Western church) and papal primacy.*

Two major attempts at achieving re-union between the two churches took place at the second council of Lyons in 1274 and the council of Florence in 1438-39. But in both cases, although a formal union was promulgated, it was ultimately rejected by the general Orthodox population. Centuries of mutual isolation and hostility ensued, with each church de facto denying the ecclesial reality of the other.

The situation began to improve only in the 1960s, when important changes in attitude took place within both the Catholic and the Orthodox churches. From the Catholic perspective, the convocation of the Second Vatican Council,* coupled with the presence of Orthodox observers at the Council, marked a greater openness to the Orthodox. A positive evaluation of the Eastern tradition is found in the Council documents (see Decree on Ecumenism* 14-18). From the Orthodox perspective, the third pan-Orthodox conference (Rhodes 1964) encouraged local Orthodox churches to engage in studies preparing for an eventual dialogue with the Catholic church.

Other events in the same decade exemplified a growing “dialogue of charity” between the two communions and increased the momentum towards a formal theological dialogue. In January 1964 Pope Paul VI and Patriarch Athenagoras of Constantinople met for the first time, in Jerusalem. In a common declaration of 7 December 1965, the mutual excommunications of 1054 were “erased from the memory” of the church. In 1967 the pope and the patriarch exchanged visits in Rome and Istanbul.

This more positive atmosphere made possible the establishment of a joint commission in 1976 to prepare for an official dialogue. In 1978 it submitted a programmatic document to the authorities of both churches in which the goal of the dialogue was clearly defined as the re-establishment of full communion.* It proposed a methodology according to which the dialogue would begin with the elements that unite Catholics and Orthodox and then move to the more divisive points. The commission recommended that the sacraments* be considered first, especially as they relate to ecclesiology (see church).

The official announcement of the beginning of the theological dialogue was made jointly by Pope John Paul II and Patriarch Dimitrios I in Istanbul on 30 November 1979. This new joint international commission for theological dialogue between the Catholic church and the Orthodox church was to include experts representing both churches in equal numbers, the Orthodox side including representatives of all 14 autocephalous and autonomous Orthodox churches. The fact that a large number of members were to be Catholic and Orthodox hierarchs revealed the importance both churches attributed to this dialogue.

The first plenary session took place on the Greek islands of Patmos and Rhodes in 1980. This organizational meeting unanimously adopted the plan for dialogue set forth in the 1978 document and chose initial themes for examination. Cardinal Johannes Willebrands, president of the Vatican’s Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity,* and Archbishop Stylianos of Australia (Patriarchate of Constantinople) were chosen as co-presidents. Three joint sub-commissions were set up to produce studies which would then be synthesized into draft documents to be debated at plenary sessions held every two years.

The second plenary session took place in Munich in 1982. Here the first agreed text was finalized: "The Mystery of the Church and of the Eucharist in the Light of the Mystery of the Holy Trinity". It describes a common approach to the relation between the eucharist* and the Trinity,* the church and the eucharist, and the local church* and the universal church.

The Greek island of Crete was the site of the third plenary session, in 1984. A draft document entitled "Faith, Sacraments and the Unity of the Church" was discussed. It treated the relationship between the profession of the same faith* and sacramental communion, giving particular attention to the sacraments of initiation. Because of some Orthodox reservations about Catholic practices in this matter, and some technical difficulties, it was not possible to adopt the document at that time.

The fourth plenary took place near Bari, Italy, in two separate sessions one year apart. The first session, in 1986, was boycotted by several Orthodox churches because of what they understood as both Catholic support for the schismatic Macedonian Orthodox church and continued Catholic proselytism* among Orthodox Christians. Once these issues were resolved, the plenary met in a second session at Bari in 1987. Here the document that had been discussed at Crete was revised and approved.

The Orthodox monastery at Valamo, Finland, hosted the fifth plenary session in 1988. A third common document was adopted, entitled "The Sacrament of Order in the Sacramental Structure of the Church, with Particular Reference to the Importance of the Apostolic Succession for the Sanctification and Unity of the People of God". It was also decided at this session to establish a sub-commission to study the vexed questions of Uniatism and the status of the Eastern Catholic churches.* Moreover, the topic of the next document, to be discussed in 1990 at the sixth plenary session in Freising, Germany, was decided upon: "Ecclesiological and Canonical Consequences of the Sacramental Structure of the Church: Conciliarity and Authority in the Church".

But between the meetings in Valamo and Freising, the cataclysmic political changes in Eastern and Central Europe added a new factor to Orthodox-Catholic relations that had a direct impact on the progress of the dialogue. The collapse of the communist regimes allowed for the re-emergence of Eastern Catholic churches that had been officially liquidated by the communists and forced to merge with the local Orthodox churches. This development set the stage for confrontation as the Eastern Catholics demanded the return of churches that had been in Orthodox hands for decades, and as the Orthodox feared a resurgence of the old Catholic policy of Uniatism, through which Orthodox faithful had been drawn into the Catholic church, often through missionary activity, while being allowed to retain their Orthodox rituals and other practices. The situation was worsened by the fact that contemporary improvements in Catholic-Orthodox relations were virtually unknown in the region. Very hurtful conflicts between Eastern Catholics and Orthodox were taking place in western Ukraine and Romania.

When the international commission gathered in Freising in June 1990, at the request of the Orthodox side, the document prepared for discussion was set aside and the question of the origins of Uniatism and the present status of the Eastern Catholic churches was taken up instead. A brief statement was issued, and a process was set in motion for a fuller treatment of the topic at the seventh plenary session, which took place at Balamand, Lebanon, in 1993. Here a document was issued entitled "Uniatism, Method of Union of the Past, and the Present Search for Full Communion". The document hinges on two central points: it rejects Uniatism as a method of achieving unity between Orthodox and Catholics, and it affirms the right of the Eastern Catholic churches to exist and to respond to the pastoral needs of their faithful.

The document has been criticized in some Catholic and Orthodox circles, how-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

ever, and has been rejected formally by the Orthodox Church of Greece and the Greek Catholic church of Romania. Given the lack of a consensus, the Orthodox side requested that the same topic be taken up again at the eighth plenary session, originally scheduled to take place in 1996 in Emmitsburg, Maryland, USA, under the auspices of the archdiocese of Baltimore. After a series of postponements, it was rescheduled for 1999. But the NATO bombardment of Serbia earlier that year made it impossible for some of the Orthodox to travel to a NATO country, and the session was again postponed, until July 2000. During the meeting the commission discussed a draft document, "Ecclesiological and Canonical Implications of Uniatism", but was unable to reach agreement. The members agreed to "report to their churches who will indicate how to overcome this obstacle for the peaceful continuation of the dialogue".

Thus the dialogue has been going through a difficult phase in recent years as the two sides struggled with an emotionally charged issue brought to the fore by unforeseen political developments. Nevertheless, as was envisaged in the 1978 document that set the course of this dialogue, progress has been made in the effort to establish a common theological foundation, on the basis of which the more difficult questions, especially the role of the church of Rome and its bishop among the local churches, can be most fruitfully discussed.

It should also be noted that the Russian Orthodox Church, while fully participating in the international Orthodox-Catholic dialogue, was engaged in separate theological conversations with the Catholic church between 1967 and 1987. These conversations were held at irregular intervals and were largely restricted to the social teaching of the two churches. Six meetings took place, dealing with the following topics: "The Social Thought of the Roman Catholic Church" (Leningrad 1967), "The Role of the Christian in the Developing Society" (Bari 1970), "The Church in a World in Transformation" (Zagorsk 1973), "The Christian Proclamation of Salvation in a Changing World" (Trent 1975), "The Local Church and the Universal Church" (Odessa 1980) and "The Diaconal Function of the Church, Especially in the Service of Peace" (Venice 1987). Press communiqués, at times substantial, were released at the end of each session. Since 1987 official discussions on concrete issues have taken place between representatives of the Moscow patriarchate and the holy see on a regular basis.

RONALD G. ROBERSON

- J. Borelli & J. Erickson eds, The Quest for Unity: Orthodox and Catholics in Dialogue, Crestwood NY/Washington DC, St Vladimir's Seminary/US Catholic Conference, 1996 (includes texts of all the agreed statements of the international dialogue as well as the national dialogue in the US)
- E. Kilmartin, Towards Reunion: The Orthodox and Roman Catholic Churches, New York, Paulist, 1979
- J. Meyendorff, Rome, Constantinople, Moscow: Historical and Theological Studies, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1996
- E.J. Storman ed., Towards the Healing of Schism: The Sees of Rome and Constantinople: Public Statements and Correspondence between the Holy See and the Ecumenical Patriarchate, 1958-1984, New York, Paulist, 1987.

ORTHODOXY

"ORTHODOXY" means "right opinion" or "right belief" (also "right glorification", as in the Slavonic translation). Consequently, any human community which bases itself on an accepted system of thought, opinions or beliefs can claim "orthodoxy" for its doctrines. Within the Christian context, the term came to be associated with certain sections of Eastern Christendom: the Chalcedonian (or Eastern Orthodox) and non-Chalcedonian (or Oriental Orthodox) churches. In this narrow sense the word will be dealt with here.

Eastern Christians are not united within one communion.* The main divisions appeared in the 5th century. Some did not accept the third ecumenical council (Ephesus 431), and more rejected the fourth (Chalcedon* 451). This non-acceptance was due both to the theological disagreements over the Christological debates and to the reluctance of some, mainly non-Greek or non-Byzantine Christians, to accept the idea that the coniliar dogmatic definitions should be imposed as imperial laws by the capital, Constantinople (see dogma). In hindsight after 15 centuries, those theological differences now appear to have been mainly due to terminological misunderstandings; furthermore, the subsequent displacements of power have suppressed all traces of political imperial domination on the part of Byzantium-Constantinople, or New Rome. With the fall of the Russian empire in 1917, most of Orthodoxy has lost any dream of a Byzantine "symphony". Issues blocking reunion today are indeed not so much theological as practical (see Oriental Orthodox-Orthodox dialogue).

The gradual estrangement between the Christian West and the Christian East culminated in a split between what had been the two halves of the Roman empire, which most historians label as the Latins and the Greeks. In fact, the "Latins", though they all used Latin as their liturgical and theological language, included Germanic Franks, Celts and Anglo-Saxons; the "Greeks" or "Byzantines" incorporated the traditions not only of Constantinople but also of Asia Minor, Egypt (Alexandria), Syria (Antioch) and Palestine (Jerusalem).

The date generally recognized as that of the schism,* 1054, was that of an exchange of excommunications* between the legates of Pope Leo IX and the patriarch of Constantinople, Michael Cerularius. (These excommunications were solemnly lifted in 1964 by Pope Paul VI and Athenagoras I, the patriarch of Constantinople; see Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue.) But the 1054 dating is somewhat conventional, for only later did the other three patriarchates of the famous "pentarchy" (Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem) break with Rome (universally recognized as the ancient "primatial" see; see primacy). And already in the 9th century difficulties had begun (e.g., between Photius, patriarch of Constantinople, and Pope Nicholas I).

The real issues at stake in the schism were doctrinal and ecclesiological: (1) the Western addition of the filioque* ("and from the Son") to the Nicene Creed,* concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit;*

and (2) the jurisdictional claims of the papacy to a right of universal intervention. In spite of progress made, these two questions still constitute the main obstacles to reunion between the Orthodox and the Roman Catholic churches.

One of the consequences of the Western crusades* in the East (1095-1270) was a worsening of the breach between East and West. The papal appointment at that time of "Latin" bishops who paralleled existing Orthodox bishops in such ancient sees as Antioch and Constantinople represented in fact an unchurching of long-existing Christian communities. Moreover, attempts at reunion at the councils of Lyons (1274) and of Ferrara-Florence (1438-39) not only failed but, in the eyes of the vast majority of the Orthodox, actually represented a consummation of the schism. After Florence, the two halves of Christendom largely ignored each other.

As a result of this breach and estrangement, the Orthodox world has not experienced the Western crises which resulted in the Protestant Reformation and in the Roman Catholic Counter-Reformation. The Orthodox world had its own crises in the East, as it had to deal from afar with the Reformation and Counter-Reformation, its isolation under Islamic rule, the fall of Christian Constantinople to the Muslims (1453), the rise of nationalisms, etc. But since these crises did not affect the essential faith* of the church, the Orthodox preserved a very strong sense of unbroken continuity with the faith of the apostles (see apostolicity) as interpreted and witnessed to by the seven great ecumenical councils* and the fathers of the church (see patristics).

Undeniably, the theology taught in Orthodox schools, particularly in the "Byzantine", or Eastern Orthodox, world, came under Western influences, both medieval scholastic and Protestant. Beyond a few surviving vestiges of these influences, however, Orthodoxy has rediscovered its own proper identity through patristic revivals. These revivals have helped to reveal the common, authentic theological spirit of the Eastern and the Oriental Orthodox, which refuses the systematizing tendencies of various crystallizations.

The essential theological approach of Orthodoxy consists in an uncompromising adherence to the confession of Jesus Christ* as the incarnate Son of God, second person of the Holy Trinity.* In this perspective, the incarnation* is the most central event in history,* the only true revolution, because in Jesus Christ and his redemptive work, the personal, Triune God, the living God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, not only manifests but gives himself fully to humanity.

The divine person of Jesus Christ assumed humanity, doing so even to the utmost limits of the human condition: unto death itself, and death upon the cross, with the agony of the dying person's sense of being forsaken by God. Humanity thus becomes totally transformed, re-generated in him. This tasting of death by a divine person – what Gregory of Nazianzus calls “the humanity of God” which “sanctifies humanity” – could only result in victory over death, in the destruction of death. This accomplishment necessarily confers a new quality on all life. The sacrificial action of Jesus Christ re-generates, re-creates the whole of creation.* “A few drops of blood re-make the whole universe” (Gregory of Nazianzus). This humanity, which Christ assumed and sanctified, has a cosmic dimension. Christ's victory over death grants a new life to the whole of creation. Each human being, called to “put on Christ” (Gal. 3:27), is royally, prophetically and ministerially responsible for the whole universe.

The resurrection* is therefore a cosmic and very central event, and the Orthodox accordingly place great emphasis on the passion-resurrection of Christ, the paschal character of the Christian life. This life is offered in Christ through the gift of grace,* which is the breath of the Holy Spirit – the gift of God himself. Salvation,* in the Orthodox perspective, is not restricted to redemption* in the strict sense, i.e. only freeing humanity from sin.* Salvation is viewed in terms not so much of one's justification* as of one's participation in the true destiny of human nature, fully realized in Christ. Salvation is offered to all as a free gift, to be freely accepted by all. The gift of the Holy Spirit enables human beings to become “participants of the divine nature” (2 Pet. 1:4).

This participation of human beings in the divine life of the Holy Trinity – their incorporation in Christ as adopted sons and daughters through the Spirit of the Son, who in their hearts cries “Abba! Father!” (Gal. 4:6; cf. Rom. 8:15) – is what the Orthodox often express in the famous patristic adage “God became man that man may become God” (Irenaeus et al.). It is also the meaning of the term “deification” (theosis).

Participation in the divine life implies growth in Christ to the dimension of becoming a true person,* i.e. the dimension of cosmic humanity, members of Christ, members of one another, temples of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19, 12:12; Eph. 4:25). Christians are co-responsible for the recapitulation of the whole creation for union with God. In other words, the whole of history is their responsibility, and no human situation can possibly be excluded. It is a “eucharistic” view of the destiny of humanity and creation. And the eucharistic offering – the very heart of life – is “for the life of the world” (liturgy of John Chrysostom and of Basil the Great; cf. John 6:51). Consequently, the eucharist* commits all to participate in history.

The Orthodox conception of salvation leads to the understanding that the church* is not just an institution in a purely human sense but is primarily a community of persons who are built into “a spiritual house”. “Like living stones, let yourselves be built into a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, to offer spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ” (1 Pet. 2:5). The church is hierarchical, but hierarchy must be viewed in the larger perspective of 1 Cor. 12 and 13 – within the same Body of Christ, with a diversity of functions, bound together in love and called to witness to this love – which excludes any sense of domination or subservience.

According to the Orthodox teaching on the church, all its institutional aspects (hierarchy, discipline, organization, etc.) should be nothing but the expressions of the deep nature of the church as described above. They are all by nature charismatic (see charism(ata)), their authority is that of Christ and the Spirit, the “two hands of the Father” (Irenaeus). They are all there to serve the essential and central action of the church: the eucharistic offering for the whole creation in the unity of the one Spirit and in communion with all things visible and invisible – “the whole company of heaven” (liturgy of the Church of England). This eucharistic offering, as the Orthodox like to recall, quoting Chrysostom, does not end in the church building but is there to irrigate the whole of life through the faithful. They should go out into the world as witnesses, every one in his or her own way, according to the diversity of gifts, to the new life offered to humanity in Christ.

The foundation of Orthodox ecclesiology is the local eucharistic community: the bishop (see episcopacy), surrounded by and presiding over the presbyterate* and the community. This local church* or diocese (today often the parish, where the priest fulfills most of the bishop’s duties, i.e. preaching of the word of God* and presiding over the celebration of the sacrament*) – in so far as it is faithful to the faith of the apostles, the catholic faith of the church, and therefore is in communion* with all the local churches faithful to the same faith – is not a part of the church universal but is itself an expression of the church universal.

Consequently, the Orthodox church is, according to its ecclesiology, a fellowship of local churches, in communion of faith and sacrament. But only one local church – traditionally, the church of Rome – is entrusted with the duty to “preside in love” over all the churches. Since the split between East and West, however, the church of Constantinople presides over the Eastern Orthodox churches.

The relations of communion and unity in faith among the local churches constitute what the Orthodox mean by conciliarity.* The conciliar nature of the Orthodox church is sometimes expressed in councils, but it is not restricted to them and is not dependent on their actual meeting. According to Orthodox ecclesiology, every time the eucharist is celebrated, the conciliar nature of the church is expressed. The plurality of consecrators of a local bishop also clearly expresses conciliarity: as co-consecrators, bishops from neighbouring local churches witness to the faithfulness to the apostolic faith of the church in which the new bishop will in turn be guaranteeing this faithfulness.

Conciliar relations among local churches through the president, whose role is to be the sign of unity, are well expressed in the 34th of the so-called Apostolic Canons: “Let the bishops of each province recognize the one who is primate among them, let them accept him as their head and let them do nothing without his having expressed his opinion, even though it is incumbent on every one to look to the affairs of his diocese and the dependent territories. But he in his turn must do nothing without the accord of all. Thus concord will reign, and God will be glorified through Christ in the Holy Spirit.” The Trinitarian conclusion indicates that relations among churches are to be based upon the same principles of unity in diversity as those of persons in the church; furthermore, personhood is in the image of the unity in diversity in the Holy Trinity.

Quite naturally, many discrepancies exist between this ideal teaching and the actual historical reality of Orthodox churches. Many distortions of Orthodoxy are due to human sinfulness. For instance, Orthodoxy at the dawn of the 21st century presents many divisions, in particular those of jurisdiction which have become clearly apparent with the dispersion of Orthodox throughout the world, especially in the West. With the rise of nationalism* in the 19th century, there appeared a tendency to identify Orthodoxy with a particular culture, ethnic group or nation. This tendency was condemned as a heresy* in 1872 by a local council in Constantinople (received by all the other churches) under the name “phyletism”. In spite of this condemnation, the tendency still exists among the Orthodox to substitute in practice a nationalistic ecclesiology for the traditional territorial principle, following the apostolic definition (e.g., “the church of God that is in Corinth”, 1 Cor. 1:2) which unites all the people (Jews, Greeks, etc.) in a given place in one eucharistic community. The Orthodox who are scattered throughout the world tend to be claimed by their “mother churches” according to an ethnic, cultural or national principle, which leads to a multiplicity of jurisdictions in one place instead of one bishop in each place (see diaspora). Although some progress has recently been made, the debate continues; at issue is the purity of ecclesiology.

Another temptation for modern Orthodoxy is the crystallizing of patristic theology into a new form of scholasticism as a system of thought. Instead, there should be ever-renewed efforts to orient each generation to a living sense of union with God. This tendency simply to repeat as a rigid catechism what the fathers have said in the past may be termed repetitive orthodoxy, which often leads to a refusal to consider the challenges of history today. Some who succumb to this temptation have tended to reject ecumenism as the heresy of the 20th century, holding that the unity of Christians can be achieved only through the formal conversion of all to the historic Orthodox church.

Orthodox ecclesiology claims to be eucharistic; the church is the sacrament par excellence. All too often, however, the reality of life belies this understanding of the church. In too many cases baptism* (as well as marriage*) tends to be a purely social event, and people may partake of the eucharist only once a year, if at all. Many churches have indeed reacted against this contradiction within Orthodoxy, but there is still a long way to go. Another problem is that, in too many cases, the eucharistic prayers are said in such a way that people cannot hear them. As a result, the laity* tend to regard themselves (and are regarded) as passive members of the church who are not fully co-responsible in the unity of the one church and in the unity of the one Spirit with the presiding minister, thus obscuring the reality of 1 Cor. 12 and 13.

The vast majority of Orthodox churches are engaged in the ecumenical movement. With the exception of one or two communities (such as the Russian Church in Exile or the Greek Old-Calendarists, and two churches – Georgia and Bulgaria – which withdrew in 1997-98), they are all member churches of the WCC. Thus, in spite of all its historical sins, Orthodoxy has a vocation* in the striving towards the recovery of unity among Christians. This vocation is a very special one, since the Orthodox firmly believe that “the Orthodox church is the church of Christ on earth” (Sergius Bulgakov). This conviction, paradoxical as it may sound, can on certain conditions serve the ecumenical search for unity. Bulgakov expresses the first condition: “The church of Christ is not an institution but a new life with Christ and in Christ, moved by the Holy Spirit.” In other words, the Orthodox community can truly serve Christian unity in so far as they witness to true Orthodoxy and remember that when Orthodoxy is true to itself, it confesses that it does not know the limits of the church of Christ: the Spirit “blows where it chooses” (John 3:8). Also, the Orthodox serve Christian unity whenever they remember that one of the essential duties in being an Orthodox consists in one’s permanent conversion to Orthodoxy.

NICHOLAS LOSSKY

■ A. McGuckin, Standing in God’s Holy Fire: The Byzantine Tradition, London, Darton, Longman & Todd, 2001 ■ For further bibliography, see Eastern Orthodoxy.

P

PACIFIC

THE AREA covers Melanesia, Micronesia and Polynesia. Christianity was first introduced here by Spanish missionaries in Micronesia in the 17th century, but its significant spread began when the London Missionary Society (LMS) sent missionaries to Tahiti in 1798. From that time the Christian faith moved across the islands broadly from east to west until, in the 20th century, it became the majority faith of all Pacific peoples except among descendants of the migrant Indian (Indo-Fijian) population in Fiji. In Micronesia, nearer the equator, many islands became Christian as a result of Protestant and Roman Catholic missionary activity originating in North America. In Australia and New Zealand sub-bases developed for missions from Britain and continental Europe.

A cooperative spirit prevailed among the Protestant missions from the beginning. Comity agreements provided that different denominations would work in different territories. Only in Samoa did any serious competition develop between Protestant bodies, in this case Wesleyan Methodists and the LMS (predominantly Congregationalist). The usual situation was one of denominational uniformity within each area and isolation of each area from the others. The relation to Roman Catholics was another matter. Usually arriving later on the scene than the Protestants, and therefore in many places a minority, Catholics were regarded with hostility, a feeling which they reciprocated.

The main large-scale contact between the churches of different territories took the form of Pacific Islander missions sent from Christianized islands to unevangelized areas – first from Tahiti to the Cook Islands and Samoa, then from Tonga to Samoa and Fiji, and finally, in large numbers, from Fiji, Samoa, Tonga and the Cook Islands to Papua New Guinea and Solomon Islands. This contact, however, did not develop much understanding, since there was a tendency among Polynesian Islander missionaries to regard those they served as primitive and to report them as such to their home constituencies.

Not until 1926 was there any interdenominational conference on church work in the island Pacific. Sydney and Auckland were the scenes of two conferences held in connection with a visit of the ecumenical leader John R. Mott. A larger conference was held in Morpeth, Australia, in 1948, but these meetings were for foreign missionaries, not Islanders. The first meeting to involve Islander Christians was convened jointly in 1961 under the auspices of the International Missionary Council and the World Council of Churches at Malua, Western Samoa. Here the decision was made to form a Pacific Conference of Churches (PCC), a resolution put into effect in 1966. The PCC then became the main vehicle of ecumenism in the Pacific.

Another vehicle was the Pacific Theological College in Suva, also founded in 1966 as an international training centre where future leaders of the churches could study together and come to know each other. It was the first Pacific institution to confer the bachelor of divinity degree and, later, the master of theology. Soon after its establishment, ecumenical associations of theological schools were formed – the South Pacific Association of Theological Schools (SPATS) for schools east of New Guinea, and the Melanesian Association of Theological Schools (MATS) for schools in Papua New Guinea and Solomon Islands. The former had a rather fitful existence for a time but has re-gained strength; the latter has been a strong, continuing force for cooperative study and advancement.

Christian education has also developed ecumenically. Following the Malua conference, an ambitious plan was formulated for an ecumenical effort to write a complete Christian education curriculum from pre-school to adult grades. This was to be related to island life and was to draw on island culture. Eventually the entire Pacific Island Christian Education Curriculum was completed and published in 28 books.

The establishment of the curriculum and the Pacific Theological College was a result of the Malua meeting. In both cases the WCC played an important part. The strong presence of the PCC also owed a great deal to the enabling role played by the WCC, through bringing together leaders from the Pacific, both from the church and the community, to meet and share common concerns and to be exposed to the wider ecumenical movement. When these ecumenical agencies were coming into existence during the 1960s, an enormous change was taking place in the Roman Catholic Church. With the convening of the Second Vatican Council,* implementation of the Council's constitutions and decrees led to Catholic attitudes in the Pacific Islands undergoing profound transformation. Joint action for mission followed. Up until this time Catholics had held aloof from contacts with other churches and from the ecumenical organizations. They then began to get to know their fellow Christians and to consider cooperating with them. Taken together, Catholics made up the largest single church in the Pacific, and they constituted the biggest church in New Caledonia and Papua New Guinea. Soon they became one of the strongest ecumenical forces in the region. The Catholic bishops conference of the Pacific (CEPAC) joined the PCC in 1976 and the Catholic bishops conference of Papua New Guinea did the same in 1991. The Catholic theological schools became members of MATS and SPATS. The central Roman Catholic regional seminary was established near the Pacific Theological College, promoting cooperative efforts and mutual understanding in theological education.

All the developments considered thus far were on an international scale. National ecumenism came later, reversing the usual order. The slowness in national reconciliation and collaboration may be attributed largely to the effects of the comity maintained by the early missions. Because of comity each country tended to have at first only one church, which regarded itself as the church of the whole people. It looked upon other churches, when they came in, as interlopers.

The formation of ecumenical organizations would imply an equal place for all churches, something that the previously dominant bodies were not eager to allow. National councils of churches became strong first in those countries which had no single dominant church, primarily Papua New Guinea and secondarily Solomon Islands. Papua New Guinea developed the Melanesian Council of Churches, the largest and most active of all the national councils. After some years of remarkable effectiveness on the national scene, with a large staff and close contacts with the government, it passed through a period of financial and personnel difficulties from which it only gradually recovered. The Solomon Islands Christian Association has played a significant role in its country, as has the Tonga Council of Churches. Lesser, but still valuable, bodies have been the Fiji Council of Churches, the Samoa Council of Churches and the Vanuatu Christian Council.

In recent years the influx and growth of a large number of non-cooperating churches has gradually altered the picture as far as ecumenism is concerned. Most of these churches are of a Pentecostal or charismatic type, though the largest and most rapidly growing is the Mormon (Latter-day Saints) church. Small efforts have been made towards developing understanding and possible cooperation with some of these bodies. The most significant of these efforts is the cooperative contact of the Melanesian Council of Churches with the Evangelical Alliance of the South Pacific, an organization of newer churches and Christian institutions, in Papua New Guinea. In general, however, separation from these bodies is continuing and represents the greatest challenge to the ecumenical spirit in the Pacific.

See also Pacific Conference of Churches.

CHARLES W. FORMAN

■ M. Ernst, Winds of Change: Rapidly Growing Religious Groups in the Pacific Islands, Suva, PCC, 1994 ■ C.W. Forman, The Island Churches of the South Pacific: Emergence in the Twentieth Century, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1982 ■ C.W. Forman, The Voice of Many Waters: The Story of the Life and Ministry of the Pacific Conference of Churches in the Last 25 Years, Suva, Lotu Pasifika, 1986 ■ J. Garrett, Footsteps in the Sea: Christianity in Oceania to

World War II, WCC, 1992 ■ J. Garrett, To Live among the Stars: Christian Origins in Oceania, WCC, 1982 ■ J. Garrett, Where Nets Were Cast: Christianity in Oceania since World War II, WCC, 1997 ■ K. James & A. Yabaki eds, Religious Cooperation in the Pacific Islands, rev. ed., Suva, Univ. of the South Pacific, 1989.

PACIFIC CONFERENCE OF CHURCHES

THE PACIFIC Conference of Churches (PCC) is the regional ecumenical organization for the island Pacific,* foreshadowed by decisions of the first Pacific Conference of Churches, held at Malua, Western Samoa, in 1961. Its official formation took place five years later at its first assembly on the Loyalty island of Lifou, in Vanuatu. Subsequent assemblies were held in Fiji (1971), Papua New Guinea (1976), Tonga (1981), Western Samoa (1986), Vanuatu (1991) and Tahiti (1997). The headquarters were first in Samoa but in 1967 moved to Suva, Fiji. The PCC is one of several major regional bodies linked, through delegated representative status, with the WCC.

The conference grew rapidly under the leadership of two of its general secretaries, Setareki Tuilovoni (1967-74) and Lorine Tevi (1977-81), both of Fiji. It was also much strengthened by the contributions of an early chair, Sione 'Amanaki Havea of Tonga (1966-71). More recently, Bishop Patelisio Finau (Roman Catholic, Tonga) gave a similar impulse to ecumenism as chair preceding his death in office in 1993. New churches joined the PCC's fellowship, and membership was also thrown open to national Christian councils. In 1976 most of the Roman Catholic dioceses of the Pacific joined, and in 1991 six new bodies were accepted, including the two largest Pacific churches, the Catholic bishops conference of Papua New Guinea and the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Papua New Guinea. The conference has always had strong participation from the French-speaking islands of New Caledonia and Tahiti, and they are now fully incorporated into its life, with the provision of simultaneous translation at its meetings and the publication of French versions of its reports and documents. The only countries where it has lost members are Papua New Guinea and Solomon Islands.

Participation by the churches of Micronesia has been sporadic because of distance.

The conference has reached out to the churches with a variety of programmes. It has introduced modern methods of Christian education and training for better family life, spreading these through seminars all over the area. It has helped the churches in their communication efforts and in youth programmes. It has tried to improve the role and status of women by holding regional conferences for women and setting an example itself with the appointment of a woman as chair, Fetaui Mata'afa (1971-76), and another as general secretary (Tevi). It has devoted much attention to economic development rooted in the realities of village life. It has taken the lead in dealing with political problems of the region, speaking out against nuclear testing and in favour of movements leading up to national independence for Island countries.

In 1982 the steady growth of the organization was reversed in a decision, taken under the leadership of the long-time chairman, Bishop Jabez Bryce of Fiji (1976-86), to make drastic reductions in staff and programmes in the hope of decreasing extreme dependence on foreign funds. But the dependence did not change and from 1986 on there has been steady re-growth.

CHARLES W. FORMAN

■ C.W. Forman, The Voice of Many Waters: The Story of the Life and Ministry of the Pacific Conference of Churches in the Last 25 Years, Suva, Lotu Pasifika, 1986.

PACIFISM

THE DERIVATION of the word "pacifism" – from Latin pax (peace) and facere (to make) – establishes an immediate connection with Jesus' statement in the Sermon on the Mount: "Blessed are the peace-makers" (Matt. 5:9). There have been many varieties of pacifism based both on religious and on secular philosophies – most notably Buddhism. Within the Christian church, the transition which culminated under the Emperor Constantine changed the church from being a religion whose adherents refused to kill in its first three centuries to being the religion of the empire and the army.

There has always been a minority tradition of Christian pacifism based on the Sermon on the Mount, for example, Francis of Assisi, the left wing of the Reformation (e.g. Mennonites) and the Quakers, founded in the 17th century in England by George Fox. A Quaker, William Allen, founded the Society for the Promotion of Permanent and Universal Peace in 1816. By 1900 there were at least 400 peace organizations. The mood of optimism and belief in progress was punctured by the first world war.

The abolition of war, like the abolition of slavery, had seemed a realizable goal to many at the time of the Hague conferences of 1899 and 1907. War* is, historically, almost entirely a male activity, and feminist analyses link the social structures of patriarchy and war closely together. Pacifist women have been strongly represented through peace organizations from the Women's International League of Peace and Freedom (early conferences in 1915 and 1920) through to the Greenham women. Eminent individuals among their number include Bertha von Suttner, Muriel Lester, Maude Royden, Dorothy Day and Aung San Sun Kyi (Myanmar's Nobel laureate).

In the 20th century the Sermon on the Mount was returned to the Christian church as practical politics by a Hindu, Mahatma Gandhi (1869-1948). He, in turn, had been inspired by such thinkers as Henry David Thoreau (1817-62) from the US and the unorthodox Russian Orthodox Leo Tolstoy (1828-1910). Gandhi used pacifist methods, including civil disobedience, in the movement to liberate India from British colonial rule. From Gandhi, the line of influence passes through such struggles as the US civil rights movement, led by Martin Luther King, Jr, and black opposition to apartheid in South Africa, with such non-violent leaders as Albert Luthuli in an earlier generation and Allan Boesak, Frank Chikane, Desmond Tutu and Brazilian bishop Dom Helder Camara in Brazil in the latter phase.

Shortly after the outbreak of the first world war, the Fellowship of Reconciliation* was established. During the war conscientious objection led to significant numbers of people being imprisoned, including the atheist philosopher Bertrand Russell in Britain. Disillusionment after 1918 gave a massive boost to pacifism, as churches realized that they had often lent uncritical support to national war efforts.

Between the two world wars pacifism became a mass movement under such leaders as Dick Sheppard, founder of the Peace Pledge Union. But as the storm clouds of fascism* darkened in the 1930s, support for pacifism waned. Pacifism as a mass movement was past, and a much smaller core of conscientious objectors refused to serve in the second world war. Nazism proved to be the decisive factor in undermining the popularity and credibility of pacifism. In theological circles, the critique of Reinhold Niebuhr and the example of Dietrich Bonhoeffer proved damaging for pacifism.

The advent of the nuclear era has made a profound difference to the traditional arguments between pacifists and adherents of the just-war* theory. Since the second world war, with peaks beginning in the late 1950s and late 1970s, major “ban-the-bomb” movements have developed with strong Christian and Christian pacifist involvement. The debate about German re-armament in the 1950s (led by Barth, Niemöller, Heinemann, Gollwitzer et al.) and the British Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament set the trend. There was a growing convergence between pacifists and “nuclear pacifists”, who argued that strict application of just-war criteria precluded the use of nuclear weapons. The movement beginning in the late 1970s, with strong campaigns in the US and most of Western Europe (particularly Holland and the Federal Republic of Germany), had strong pacifist involvement, particularly through women’s organizations and participation. The anti-nuclear campaign drew many Christians into an activist and pacifist expression of their faith.

At the same time, pacifism has been challenged in terms of the right of resistance in the face of oppression. During the 1950s and 1960s decolonization* proceeded surprisingly peacefully in many countries, but in others armed liberation* movements were formed. The decision of the WCC to support the humanitarian projects of armed liberation movements in Southern Africa created controversy within its member churches. The strongest rejection came from churches not known for a predominantly pacifist position, particularly in the Federal Republic of Germany and Great Britain.

This debate followed the 1968 Uppsala assembly, where Martin Luther King, Jr, was to have preached. Before his murder earlier that year, King had taken an unpopular stance and courageously denounced the Vietnam war – a cause which unleashed the mass protests of the 1960s, including much of the 1968 student movement.

In Latin America, Brazilian bishop Helder Camara argued that in terms of both principle and practice, active non-violence was the best way to break the “spiral of violence”, whereas Camilo Torres, Ernesto Cardenal and others argued that armed resistance could be required. All stressed the primacy of liberation.

Recent events in countries as different as the Philippines and those in Central Europe have shown that mass non-violent movements can bring political transformation (although China serves as a counter example). It can be a costly method, as the teaching, example and death of leaders including King and Gandhi have emphasized. History is not so clear-cut or moral as to guarantee the success of non-violence, and political change often occurs as a result of a mix of non-violent and violent forms of resistance (e.g. in South Africa). Many historical examples show, however, that massive levels of state violence in war or repression have a severely declining utility, and mass non-violent action is increasingly seen as both a moral and a more effective approach. These conclusions also have relevance to the nuclear debate. Related concepts such as civilian defence, non-offensive defence and non-provocative defence are appropriate attempts to implement pacifism – or at least non-aggressive forms of defence – as a substitute for the weaponry of mass destruction. Gene Sharp has done prodigious work in cataloguing the range of techniques below the threshold of violence that people can use.

Ecumenical debate has reflected these shifts in the world political scene. The WCC’s first assembly (Amsterdam 1948) stated that “war as a method of settling disputes is incompatible with the teaching and example of our Lord Jesus Christ”. From the European context, the final document of the European Ecumenical Assembly (1989) stated: "There are no situations in our countries or on our continent in which violence is required or justified" (61). It is perhaps a measure of the injustice in the countries of the South that there are no comparably clear ecumenical statements from other continents, or at the world level. The WCC's world convocation on Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation* (Seoul 1990) spoke, however, of the need to overcome the institution of war, and it continued the clear denunciation of the possession as well as the use of weapons of mass destruction. Non-violent alternatives received renewed impetus through the WCC's Programme to Overcome Violence emanating from the Johannesburg 1994 central committee. The Decade to Overcome Violence, 2001-10, conceived at the WCC's eighth assembly (Harare 1998), invites all Christians to "offer their own gifts for peace-making according to their own particular calling, to learn from one another and to act together".

Whereas the church consensus of the Constantinian era accepted war and state violence, the emerging ecumenical consensus rejects war but does not preclude resistance to tyranny or oppressive government. The historic peace churches* (Quakers, Mennonites etc.), pacifist fellowships within denominations and interfaith and interdenominational groups such as the International Fellowship of Reconciliation provide the organizational face of Christian pacifism. Churches have campaigned for the rights of conscientious objectors and succeeded in achieving this right in a number of countries.

See also just war; militarism/militarization; peace; violence and non-violence; violence, religious roots of.

ROGER WILLIAMSON

■ R.H. Bainton, Christian Attitudes to War and Peace: A Historical Survey and Critical Re-evaluation, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1982 ■ R.M. Brown, Religion and Violence, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1987 ■ H. Camara, Spiral of Violence, London, Sheed & Ward, 1971 ■ J. Ferguson, War and Peace in the World's Religions, London, Sheldon, 1977 ■ P. McAllister ed., Reweaving the Web of Life: Feminism and Non-violence, Philadelphia, New Society, 1982 ■ P. Meyer, The Pacifist Conscience, New York, Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1966 ■ C. Moorhead, Troublesome People: The Warriors of Pacifism, Bethesda MD, Adler & Adler, 1987 ■ D. Parker & B.J. Fraser eds., Peace, War and God's Justice, Toronto, United Church Publ. House, 1989 ■ J. Wallis ed., Peacemakers, Sydney, Harper & Row, 1983 ■ J. Wallis ed., Waging Peace, San Francisco, Harper & Row, 1982 ■ W. Wink ed., Peace Is the Way: Writings on Nonviolence from the Fellowship of Reconciliation, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 2000 ■ J.H. Yoder, He Came Preaching Peace, Scottsdale PA, Herald, 1985.

PAN-ORTHODOX CONFERENCES

THE PAN-ORTHODOX conferences were inaugurated at Rhodes in 1961 at the initiative of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, after consultation with all the canonical Eastern Orthodox churches. It was not, however, the first pan-Orthodox encounter. After the great schism between East and West (1054) and the fall of the Byzantine empire (1453), the ecumenical patriarch, in collegial cooperation with all the patriarchs of the East, convoked several councils in Constantinople (1484, 1590, 1735, 1848, 1872) to deal with canonical and ecclesiological matters, including the elevation of the metropolitan of Moscow to patriarchal dignity (1590).

Behind Rhodes 1961 was the recognition of new Orthodox realities resulting from the establishment in the Balkan peninsula of many national Orthodox churches at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th centuries. In 1923 (Constantinople) and in 1930 (Mt Athos) two inter-Orthodox meetings were held, the first dealing with pastoral and canonical issues, and the second with the preparation of the agenda for a general synod of the Orthodox church. A pre-synod meeting scheduled for 1932 could not be held because of the precarious world situation.

This agenda, finally addressed at the 1961 conference, included doctrinal, missionary, socio-ethical and ecumenical topics. The second and third conferences (Rhodes 1963, 1964) dealt with the issues of bilateral dialogues* with other churches and denominations, and the attendance of Orthodox observers at the Second Vatican Council. The fourth conference (Chambésy, Geneva, 1968) revised the agenda drawn up in 1961 and established an inter-Orthodox preparatory commission of the Great and Holy Council of the Orthodox church.

The first pre-conciliar pan-Orthodox conference met in Chambésy (1976) and decided upon a ten-point agenda for the council: the Orthodox diaspora, autocephaly, autonomy, the diptychs, revision of the calendar, marriage impediments, fasting rules, interchurch relations, the ecumenical movement, and peace and justice. The inter-Orthodox theological preparatory commission will prepare documents on each of these subjects which, after further elaboration and approval by the pre-conciliar conferences, will be referred to the future Great and Holy Council for consideration and action.

Of special importance for the ecumenical movement are two documents drawn up by the third pre-conciliar pan-Orthodox conference (Chambésy 1986). The first, entitled "Relations of the Orthodox Church with the Christian World", evaluates and sets guidelines for the bilateral dialogues of the Orthodox church with the Roman Catholic, Anglican, Old Catholic, Lutheran, non-Chalcedonian (Oriental Orthodox) and Reformed churches. In the second document, "The Orthodox Church and the Ecumenical Movement", the Orthodox church as a whole expresses its commitment to Christian unity and reiterates its readiness to continue to participate in all ecumenical bodies, particularly within the WCC. The document stresses, however, that "the Orthodox church, loyal to her ecclesiology, to the identity of her internal structure and the teaching of the undivided church, while participating in the WCC, absolutely rejects the idea of the equality of confessions and refuses to conceive church unity as an interconfessional re-adjustment. In this sense, the unity sought within the WCC cannot simply be the result of theological agreements."

In addition, the document underlines the necessity of creating within the WCC and other ecumenical organizations the conditions needed to enable the Orthodox churches to act on the basis of their own ecclesiological identity, in accordance with their own way of thinking and on an equal footing with other churches.

The pan-Orthodox conferences are convoked by the ecumenical patriarch, primus inter pares in the Orthodox church, and presided over by the senior delegate of the Ecumenical Patriarchate, which is responsible for overall coordination. Since 1970 a secretariat for the preparation of the Great and Holy Council has been located at the Orthodox centre of the Ecumenical Patriarchate in Chambésy.

After his election in 1991 to the see of Constantinople, Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew, in an effort to strengthen inter-Orthodox unity, convoked summit meetings parallel to the above pan-Orthodox conciliar process, which enabled the Orthodox primates to speak in unison on a variety of issues affecting the Orthodox church, the Christian oikoumene in general and contemporary society. Two such meetings took place in Constantinople (Istanbul) in 1992 on "Sunday of Orthodoxy" and on the island of Patmos in 1995 on the occasion of the 1900th anniversary of the book of Revelation.

See also Eastern Orthodoxy, Orthodoxy.

GEORGES TSETISIS

- M. Aghiorgoussis, "Towards the Great and Holy Council, the First Pre-synodal Pan-Orthodox Conference in Geneva", Greek Orthodox Theological Review, 21, 1976
- Damaskinos of Tranoupolis, "Towards the Great and Holy Council", Greek Orthodox Theological Review, 24, 1979
- S. Harakas, Something Is Stirring in World Orthodoxy, Minneapolis, Light & Life, 1978
- N. Lossky, "Préparation du concile panorthodoxe", Etudes, 1977
- Synodika, 6 vols, minutes of pan-Orthodox conferences, secretariat for the preparation of the Great and Holy Council, Chambésy.

PARMAR, SAMUEL L.

B. 7 Aug. 1921, Banaras, Uttar Pradesh, India; d. 29 May 1979, Allahabad, India. Associate director of the Ecumenical Institute of Bossey,* 1964-67, Parmar, a member of the Church of North India, was chairman of the working committee on Church and Society, member of the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs, vice-chairman of the World Student Christian Federation,* and WCC representative on the SODEPAX committee. He also held leading church-related positions in his own country: he was vice-chairman of the Student Christian Movement of India, chairman of the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society, Bangalore, and a member of the executive committee of the National Council of Churches of India. He taught international economics at Allahabad University College. A competent economist and knowledgeable on issues of development, he was an adviser to the Uppsala assembly, and his contributions helped in shaping the WCC's understanding of the processes and goals of development.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ S. Parmar, Lift Up Your Eyes: A Layman's Quest for Hope, Madras, CLS, 1972.

PARTICIPATION

PARTICIPATION implies belonging to and involvement in an organization, being an active member of a decision-making body, involved in policy making or participating in the procedures, programmes, staffing or financing of the organization. Within the ecumenical movement there are different levels of participation. For most, attendance at an international ecumenical event is a one-time experience of personal involvement at the world level; for a few, however, that experience will evolve into a more active involvement in the ecumenical bodies that set policy and make decisions.

Pressure for adequate representation by women, laity, youth, people with disabilities, indigenous peoples – the marginalized – has raised questions about the purpose of WCC gatherings. The very success of the participatory process has brought with it frustrations and problems never envisaged when the original 147 member churches first assembled in Amsterdam in 1948. Enormous difficulties surface today whenever the WCC has to allocate assembly seats, appoint a presidium or central committee, compile membership of commissions and working groups or choose staff. The participatory process, demanding that various categories be fully represented, can overshadow the stated aim of the activity or meeting itself. Some of the WCC difficulties stem from failure to recognize that different forms of participation are required by different kinds of events.

GROWTH OF INTERNATIONAL PARTICIPATION

From the earliest days of the ecumenical movement, outstanding leaders from the so-called younger churches, especially from Asia, had been actively participating in international conferences. The years from the 1940s to the late 1960s found these churches involved in the transition from Western-mission-centred patterns to indigenous leadership. Not only did the assembly meet on Asian soil (New Delhi 1961), but the Council moved to be genuinely worldwide with the admission of 11 African churches to its membership.

By the time of the world conference on Church and Society in 1966, participants from Africa, Asia and Latin America were in equal numbers to those from the North. Their presence influenced the Council to change priorities and perspectives on world affairs. Concern for development,* for revolution,* for non-violent forms of struggle and for racial justice* became embodied in WCC programmes. After an absence of 40 years from the WCC, Christians from the People's Republic of China were represented for the first time when the China Christian Council applied for membership at the Canberra assembly (1991). The participation of a church undergoing rapid growth and change will influence the world church in the years ahead.

The 1966 conference marked a shift in emphasis for the WCC, for it was the first to have more lay participants than clergy. The Vancouver assembly (1983), with nearly half the participants from the laity, strongly recommended that the churches encourage the full participation of the laity and ensure the equipping of laity for ministry in the world. However, despite the good intentions, timing of church events and conferences very often excludes those who are bound by the terms of their secular employment.

The Commission on World Mission and Evangelism conference at San Antonio, Texas (1989), was a highly participatory event leading to Acts of Faithfulness, which endeavoured to evoke from the participants a sense of active commitment towards the resolutions they made. Stories of involvement in mission* at the local level dominated the conference, requiring a follow-up of reflection and articulation of the theological insights arising from that involvement. Utilizing the gifts of the people of God* leads to creative tension between participants whose ability is to testify to their experiences through the medium of storytelling and those with the gift to articulate the ecumenical vision from a theological perspective. Unless both are present, the Body of Christ is not complete.

The growing participation by representatives of indigenous peoples* at San Antonio blossomed at the Canberra assembly. The history of Aborigine extermination and cultural genocide enacted at the assembly became a focus for other indigenous peoples wishing to raise issues about land rights, language and cultural identity in their own countries of origin.

PARTICIPATION OF CHURCHES

At its 40th anniversary in 1988 the WCC was still confronted by the fact that roughly two-thirds of Christianity was not participating in its work for unity* and renewal.* Among those who have not sought closer relationships are churches which oppose the search for worldwide unity on principle, as for example many on the evangelical wing of the Protestant churches, as well as members of independent Christian groups and churches. Nor is the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) a member of the WCC.

In contrast to the rather chilly reaction the RCC gave the first assembly at Amsterdam (1948), Roman Catholic observers were present at the third assembly at New Delhi and in larger numbers at later assemblies. After Vatican II* a whole network of new relationships was established through the Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity.* Discussions at following assemblies, the work of the Joint Working Group* since 1965, full participation in the Faith and Order* commission since 1968, representation on other commissions and two papal visits to the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva have underlined a policy of increased collaboration.

At Amsterdam only four Eastern Orthodox churches – the Ecumenical Patriarchate, the Church of Cyprus, the Church of Greece, and the Romanian Orthodox Episcopate of the USA – were represented. By the time of New Delhi, however, the removal of misunderstandings and the climate of change in East-West political relationships opened the way for the entry of four large Eastern European Orthodox churches into the WCC. The Orthodox have made a unique contribution to the ongoing debate on the unity of the church, but their participation has meant a difficult adjustment to a predominantly Protestant and Western ethos, liturgy,* agenda and style of work. Recently they have argued that their representation in the affairs of the Council has not properly reflected their strength within Christendom. Moreover, changed attitudes within non-Orthodox churches on such matters as the ordination of women, use of inclusive language for the person of God, the discussion of human sexual orientation, alleged syncretic actions in acts of worship, and confusions in the area of ecclesiology has made for difficulties in the partnership. The Special Commission on Orthodox Participation in the WCC wrestled with these issues for almost three years, and in a unanimously agreed report (2002) suggests ways in which the World Council may become a more participatory body: decision making by consensus, establishing a framework for common prayer, moving in mutual trust to handle critical social and ethical issues, commitment to further ecclesiological work, and elaboration of processes whereby churches become members of the council and as such are represented in its governing bodies. In particular, the report identifies two ways of relating to the WCC: as member churches belonging to the fellowship, or as churches which, without obligation on either side, wish to be in association with the WCC.

PARTICIPATION OF VARIOUS GROUPS

The ecumenical movement has made efforts over the years to increase the participation of several specific groups of people.

Children. While children and their needs have been a focus of discussion within the ecumenical movement since a WCC consultation on children in 1951, their participation has been limited. By 1980 the admission of children to the eucharist* had become a matter for serious debate within the ecumenical movement. This issue was discussed in 1980 at Bad Segeberg, Federal Republic of Germany, followed later that year by a consultation on "Children as Active Partners in the Christian Community", at Evian, France. Apart from a final statement and a "Message to the Children of the World", there were no specific recommendations to the churches.

Not until the sixth assembly of the WCC at Vancouver in 1983 did the active participation of children become a reality. In preparation for the assembly, children from more than 30 countries contributed pictures, poems and stories illustrating the theme "The City of Hope". Recommendations urged the participation of children within church structures, in decision making and in discussions of Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.*

At the Harare assembly in 1998 a padare (informal get-together for sharing) was held to draw particular attention to the dignity of children and their rights. Children from 13 countries who had been involved in two WCC consultations on children's issues in 1996 and 1997 wrote a letter requesting WCC member churches to support a global ecumenical children's network.

Persons with disabilities. In the course of the centuries countless Christians have given their lives to the service of people with disabilities, but the question remains as to how much the churches have allowed persons with disabilities to participate fully in their own communal life. Not until the Faith and Order commission meeting at Louvain in 1971 was the participation of the disabled taken seriously. From the fifth assembly of the WCC in Nairobi (1975) came a historic statement on "The Handicapped and the Wholeness of the Family of God". It warned: "The church cannot exemplify 'the full humanity revealed in Christ', bear witness to the interdependence of humankind or achieve unity in diversity if it continues to acquiesce in the social isolation of disabled persons and to deny them full participation in its life."

The Nairobi report brought about a deepened engagement with persons with disabilities in many churches. Concerns expressed led to a consultation on "The Life and Witness of the Handicapped in a Christian Parish" at Bad Saarow, German Democratic Republic (1978). A statement urged: "Full and unconditional acceptance of the disabled must be made a reality at the very heart of the church's life. It must not be relegated to the circumference nor treated as a separate specialist area of the church's life."

The Vancouver assembly expanded the recommendations of Bad Saarow by encouraging local congregations to examine factors which hinder integration and participation by the disabled, and by suggesting that churches accept people with disabilities as students and teachers in theological colleges. It was noted for the first time at an assembly that a "small but significant group of disabled persons took part".

The first of three regional consultations of the programme on disabilities was held in Montevideo, Uruguay (1987). The consultation recommended to the WCC that at least 15 persons with disabilities be delegates of churches at the seventh assembly of the WCC in 1991 and that the needs and participation of persons with disabilities be considered as integral components at regional consultations. In 1990 the programme produced a resource kit containing biblical and theological reflections for the churches.

In a statement on human rights brought before the eighth assembly in Harare, the WCC declared: "We re-affirm the right of persons who have special needs because of physical or mental disabilities to equal opportunity in all aspects of the life and service of the church... We welcome the creation of the new network of ecumenical disability advocates, and encourage churches to support it."

Women. Throughout their history both the Young Women's Christian Association* (YWCA) and the World Student Christian Federation* (WSCF) have provided an invaluable training ground for women leaders in the ecumenical movement. Networks formed within the two movements during the second world war were utilized by the WCC in process of formation to circulate a questionnaire about the role of women in the church. Replies from 58 countries provided a basis for study and discussion at a conference on "The Life and Work of Women in the Church" prior to the first assembly of the WCC in Amsterdam. Despite only 6% of the representatives being women, the assembly supported the suggestion that a permanent commission on the life and work of women in the church be formed.

Beginning in the 1960s the developing world was preoccupied with questions concerning marriage and family* life. Regional assemblies in Asia and Africa in the early 1960s provided a catalyst for a series of seminars involving large numbers of women throughout each region. These were followed by an equally enthusiastic participation of churches in the Pacific and throughout Europe. Bridging the 1960s and 1970s was a growing relationship with Roman Catholic women.

Some 160 women from 49 countries met in Berlin in 1974 to study "Sexism in the 1970s" and to challenge the churches to recognize them as equals and partners in the work of the church. The participants in Berlin urged that, beyond the fifth assembly, a special project be established called "Education for Participation", regionally based, funded and staffed by women. Participants pledged to work together to raise financial support to send women from their home churches as official delegates to the Nairobi assembly in 1975. As a result women made up a conspicuous 22% of the assembly. The document "The Community of Women and Men in the Church" was recommended for a three-year study by the churches. From 1978 to 1981 the study programme enjoyed the most extensive grassroots participation of any such project in WCC history, culminating in a consultation at Sheffield in 1981. Among many recommendations, Sheffield urged that 50% of all members elected to sub-units and committees of the WCC be women. The Vancouver assembly provided proof of the effectiveness of Sheffield, as 30% of the delegates were women.

Over the years participation by Orthodox women in ecumenical activities had been slow to receive official encouragement from their churches. At the conference for Orthodox women in Agapia, Romania, in 1976, at least half of the 45 women present had studied theology, and several were active in ecumenical affairs. The high profile of Orthodox women at Vancouver led to a heightened desire for more information about the Orthodox church.

In 1988 the WCC initiated an Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women, calling on the churches for full participation by women in church and community life. This decade culminated in a festival of celebration held immediately before the eighth assembly in Harare.

Staff from the WCC along with 60 representative women attended an NGO forum at the fourth UN world conference on women, held at Beijing in 1995. The WCC went to Beijing to listen, contribute through running workshops and take the voices of women back to churches. A five-person delegation attending the intergovernmental meeting called for an ecumenical gathering where women of faith could join together in discussion.

Young people. Youth* can trace the genesis of their participation in the ecumenical movement to the middle of the 19th century. The Young Men's Christian Association* and the World YWCA,* founded in 1844 and 1855 respectively, were only marginally concerned about their relationship to the churches prior to the first world war. The Student Christian Movement which came into existence between 1890 and 1910 almost from the first took up the cause of Christian unity. All three movements nurtured future leaders with an ecumenical outlook. Both world wars provided opportunities for the movements to work among the armed forces and maintain the fellowship across enemy lines. Work with prisoners of war was later followed by involvement with refugees and displaced persons.

The first great worldwide gathering of Christian youth was held in Amsterdam in 1939, just before the outbreak of the second world war. After both world wars, the International Fellowship of Reconciliation* organized work camps for young people in Europe in order to promote reconciliation and peace through service. By 1950 work camps were taken into the programme of the newly formed Youth department of the WCC. Thousands of young people experienced at first hand a living, working, worshipping fellowship lasting from three weeks to one year in countries around the world. The Ecumenical Institute at Bossey* provided youth with a centre for discussion and study of ecumenical concerns.

Some 1700 young people gathered in Lausanne in 1960 from all parts of Europe. Lausanne, like the simultaneous Strasbourg conference of the WSCF, saw the beginnings of a radical re-interpretation of the ecumenical task. Regional youth assemblies followed elsewhere, reflecting the call of the post-colonial world to revolution. The 1960s saw the rise of denominational youth movements, with many young people trying to participate on equal terms in local churches.

From 1965 a series of encounters was held between younger Orthodox and Protestant theologians, joined in 1970 by Roman Catholics. A total of 127 young people attended the pre-assembly youth conference prior to the fourth assembly of the WCC at Uppsala (1968), manifesting a spirit both confident and defiant. The meeting issued a statement declaring that youth were anxious to participate in the assembly to the fullest possible extent. Youth argued for full participation of youth concerns within all departments of the WCC.

By the 1970s many youth deeply involved with crucial issues within their own societies were experiencing alienation from the churches and a growing disenchantment with the ecumenical movement. This was the time of new religious movements, including the Jesus movement, which many young people saw as a celebration of their own culture. Also during this time, a growing number of young people gathered to participate in discussion and worship with the Taizé* community in France.

The WCC Youth programme received a particular lift from the Vancouver assembly, where 13.5% of the delegates were youth, compared with 9% at Nairobi. Major ecumenical meetings provide a unique opportunity for youth to learn about and to participate in the ecumenical movement by attending as stewards.

The year 1985 was the International Year of Youth. Its theme, "Participation, Development and Peace", was developed in inter-regional conferences which strengthened the international network of ecumenical youth. In 1986 the WCC youth working group met at Iloilo City in the Philippines. It was a landmark for the global ecumenical youth movement and became a forerunner to the Ecumenical Global Gathering of Youth and Students, which took place at Rio de Janeiro in 1993.

Rural youth programmes have developed networks which take initiatives to remedy rural problems in developing countries. In Asia the young detainees' programme seeks to support youth who have been imprisoned for their commitment to the poor and oppressed. Through world youth projects, 40 projects and programmes are supported worldwide. Opportunity is also given for youth to serve as interns with the WCC and regional youth offices. By 1987 the main thrust was towards strengthening networks and fostering solidarity rather than arranging conferences or coordinating structures.

CONCLUSION

Philip Potter shared with the Vancouver assembly his hope that the "churches should be a fellowship of participation". If this vision is to become a reality locally and internationally, far more creative effort needs to be made to open up channels through which that participation can be experienced. Following the Vancouver assembly the Sub-unit on Renewal and Congregational Life promoted ecumenical liturgy and music through worship workshops, leading to the formation of regional networks formed to assist congregations to become vital centres of Christian worship, life, mission and service through their lay members. Locally, participation is often hampered because ecumenical activity is seen as an optional extra to the programmes of individual churches rather than as an integral part. Internationally, the number who can participate is limited by finance. Wider and more representative participation calls for an active expansion of the inner circle in the selection process and a genuine commitment to enable as many people as possible to participate for their own enrichment and that of the ecumenical movement.

DOROTHY HARVEY

■ D. Gill, "Participation: Beyond the Numbers Game", in ER, 40, 3-4, 1988 ■ S. Herzel, A Voice for Women: The Women's Department of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1981 ■ G. Müller-Fahrenholz, ... And Do Not Hinder Them: An Ecumenical Plea for the Admission of Children to the Eucharist, WCC, 1982 ■ G. Müller-Fahrenholz ed., Partners in Life: The Handicapped and the Church, WCC, 1979 ■ Participatory Action Research on AIDS and the Community As a Source of Care and Healing, WCC, 1993 ■ D.M. Paton ed., Breaking Barriers, Nairobi, 1975, London, SPCK, 1976.

PARTIES, POLITICAL

POLITICAL parties are groups organized both to achieve political ends and to exercise political power within a broader system of government. Like interest groups, political parties pursue the social, economic or ideological causes of an organized constituency. Unlike interest groups, political parties seek to gain political office, power and control to effectuate these causes – usually by popular election, sometimes by revolutionary force.

Though many prototypes can be found in history, political parties first came to prominence in early 19th-century European and American democracies. Through colonization, popularization and imitation since then, political parties have come to operate virtually everywhere – in democratic, aristocratic and autocratic polities alike. They range from small "cadre parties" comprising a handful of elites or autocrats to "mass-based parties" with millions of adherents and representatives, local and international.

Political parties usually galvanize around individuals, ideologies and institutions. Charismatic leaders, chieftains or gurus, such as Gandhi, Hitler, Mandela or Khomeni, can inspire a political party for a generation or two. Political ideologies of liberalism or socialism, or ties of blood, soil and language, can often sustain political parties over several generations. Religious, social and economic institutions can play critical roles in nurturing the ideology and supporting the causes of political parties. Whatever their nucleus, political parties of any note and duration have refined structures and procedures for selecting officers, enlisting members, declaring goals and implementing policies in their quest for political power.

Religion has been a particularly pervasive agent of political party formation in the 20th century. In Europe and Latin America, for example, the Christian Democratic Party has been a formidable political force, recently joined by several Evangelical political groups. In Saharan Africa, the Middle East, Turkey, Pakistan, Indonesia and elsewhere, political parties and leaders associated with various Muslim sects have come to dominate politics. In the former Soviet Union, China, North Korea and elsewhere, various Communist parties, bound together by a common faith in Marxist atheism, have boasted millions of local members and ample allies worldwide.

Modern nation states have come to embrace either a one-party, two-party or multi-party system. One-party systems – as prevailed in fascist Germany and Italy before 1945, the Soviet communist bloc until 1989, and many post-colonial African, Latin America and Asian communities throughout the 20th century – have a strong tendency to political dictatorship and minimal toleration of dissent. Two-party systems – which are quite rare outside the USA – tend to prefer single-member electoral districts or regions and a strong executive branch. Multi-party systems – which dominate Western and Eastern Europe today – tend to feature proportional representation, legislative coalitions and executive power-sharing. One of the cardinal features of modern democratization is the shift from a one-party to a two- or multi-party system, with free and open popular elections.

The ecumenical movement must avoid partisan support for one political party or political cause alone. It must instead use its collective power and moral suasion to facilitate the formation and functioning of political parties and structures that embrace the universal commands of love, peace and justice and the universal ideals of liberty, equality and fraternity.

JOHN WITTE, Jr

■ M. Duverger, Political Parties, London, Methuen, 1954 ■ B. Graham, Representation and Party Politics, Oxford, Blackwell, 1993 ■ V. Randall ed., Political Parties in the Third World, New York, Sage, 1988 ■ G. Sartori, Parties and Party Systems: A Framework for Analysis, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1976.

PATON, WILLIAM

B. 13 Nov. 1886, London, UK; d. 21 Aug. 1943, Kendal, UK. William Paton was the “fourth man” of post-1910 British ecumenism, somewhat overshadowed by Temple, Bell and Oldham. “If he had been an Anglican, he would have been an archbishop,” said Cyril Garbett. He was the indispensable diplomat and bureaucrat behind the creation of the WCC.

Paton was educated at Whitgift School, Pembroke College, Oxford, and from 1908 to 1911 at Westminster College, Cambridge, under John Skinner. From 1911 to 1921 he served his apprenticeship with the Student Christian Movement, being secretary of the Student Volunteer Missionary Association, and for a year was secretary with the Indian YMCA. In 1917 he was ordained in the Presbyterian Church of England. The Indian YMCA re-called him in 1921 as its secretary, and he later served, with K.T. Paul, in the reformed National Christian Council of India, Burma and Ceylon. He had a formidable reputation as a missionary strategist foreshadowing Indian independence and the Church of South India. Paton thus belonged to the generation shaped by John R. Mott and Edinburgh 1910 – he parodied Mott’s slogan “the evangelization of the world in one generation” as “the moon turned to blood in one generation”.

Direct evangelism* began to move into dialogue, and books such as J.N. Farquhar’s The Crown of Hinduism greatly influenced Paton. After 1927, when he succeeded J.H. Oldham as secretary of the International Missionary Council,* the first of the three “prongs” of the post-Edinburgh ecumenical initiatives, Paton’s key task was organizing the missionary conferences at Jerusalem (1928) and Tambaram (Madras, 1938). Jerusalem was typified by a more liberal approach to missions. Christianity seemed the “crown” or fulfilment of the great world faiths. Paton’s policy of encouragement of full participation of the so-called younger churches was highly significant. For Tambaram, preliminary reading (sponsored by Paton) included Hendrik Kraemer’s Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, with its assertion of the centrality of Christ in human history, downplaying all “religion”, including Christianity. Since the second world war some of the emphases stemming from Jerusalem have come to the surface again.

Paton’s diplomatic and organizing skill came into full prominence when, with W.A. Visser ’t Hooft, he became associate general secretary of the provisional WCC in 1938. He was also deeply involved in the British scene with Jews, refugees, internees and peace aims, where he was an ally of Bell and Carter.

Paton was awarded the doctorate of divinity by Edinburgh university in 1939. His book A Life of Alexander Duff revealed his lifelong interest in missionary education, which had full scope in his work for the Lindsay report on Indian higher education (1931) and editorship of the International Review of Missions. Almost his last published article ends: “Behind all the holding of conferences and making of organizations there has grown up a reality of personal trust and friendship together with a minimal organization. It is impossible for any Christian mind to doubt that the drawing together on the part of the churches just at the time when political hopes of peace grew darkest was no less than the act of God training and fitting us for what was to come" (W. Temple ed., Is Christ Divided?, 1943, 23).

A rock-like character, he was the "Admirable Crichton" of the formative years of the ecumenical movement. This and his work in India reveal him to be a man of greater stature than is often realized. His theology moved from the missiology of the era of J.R. Mott to the more confessional ecumenism of the age of Kraemer and Barth.

JOHN MUNSEY TURNER

- W. Paton, The Church and the New Order, London, SCM Press, 1941
- A Faith for the World, London, Edinburgh House, 1929
- The Faiths of Mankind, London, SCM Press, 1932
- Jesus Christ and the World's Religions, London, CMS, 1916
- A Life of Alexander Duff, London, SCM Press, 1923
- The Message of the Worldwide Church, London, Sheldon, 1939
- World Community, London, SCM Press, 1938
- E.M. Jackson, Red Tape and the Gospel: A Study of the Significance of the Ecumenical Missionary Struggle of William Paton, Birmingham, Phlogiston Publ. & Selly Oak Colleges, 1980
- M. Sinclair, William Paton, London, SCM Press, 1949.

PATRISTICS

"PATRISTICS" or "patrology" is a term which designates the academic discipline dedicated to the study of the fathers. In the Old Testament the concept of paternity was often used as a reminder of the continuity of the people of Israel, going back to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the "first fathers" (or "patriarchs"). God was often designated as the God of the fathers, pointing at the genetic continuity of the "holy nation", chosen by God.

In this biblical context Jesus commands his disciples, "call no one your father on earth" (Matt. 23:9), since membership in the people of God "in Christ" is not created genetically by "the will of man" (John 1:13) but by a new birth "of water and Spirit" (John 3:5), God himself being the only heavenly Father (Matt. 6:9) of those who have received adoption in his Son, Jesus.

However, human beings are assuming ministries which are actually accomplishing the work of God, e.g. Simon becomes a stone (John 1:42; cf. Matt. 16:18), whereas Christ is the true "rock" of Israel (1 Cor.

10:4); or Peter is told to shepherd (John 21:15), although God is the shepherd of Israel (Ps. 23:1). Thus Paul claims to have become the Corinthians' "father" in Christ (1 Cor. 4:15), and spiritual fatherhood becomes associated with presidency at sacramental functions and is assumed by bishops or presbyters. By extension, with the rise of spiritual direction by monastic elders, the title of father or mother is also attributed to holy monastics beginning in the 4th century. The general usage designates as fathers those who – after the time of the apostles – have secured the continuity of the apostolic message by teaching the true faith and thus assuring the "spiritual birth" of Christian generations (see apostolicity). Writing in the 2nd century, Irenaeus declares: "When any person has been taught from the mouth of another, he is termed the son of him who instructs him, and the latter is called his father" (Against Heresies 4.41.2).

Particular concern for the study of patristics, i.e. the life and writings of "fathers", is understandably emphasized in connection with the idea of Tradition,* which implies continuity and consistency in the teaching of the church at all times. The role of patristics in shaping theology necessarily depends upon the authority* attributed to Tradition. In the Orthodox church the patristic legacy provides the main authoritative direction for understanding and interpreting the content of scripture (see hermeneutics, teaching authority). In Roman Catholicism, patristic authority is also emphasized, but the existence, in the modern church, of a more clearly defined magisterium* tends to make references to the fathers less essential in practice. This magisterium has adopted four qualifications for those who are to be regarded as fathers of the church: orthodoxy of doctrine, holiness of life, ecclesiastical approval and antiquity. The title "doctors of the church" is attributed to those who lack the last qualification, i.e. those who lived after the 8th century. This category includes the great scholastics who determined the direction of Western theology since the middle ages. The Orthodox, although sometimes insisting upon the particular traditional authority of the period of the ecumenical councils,* which coincides with the classic patristic period, would not consider such chronological limits as absolute and would accept the authority of many fathers who lived in the second millennium of Christianity.

Another concept important both for Orthodox and Roman Catholics in their approach to patristic authority is the notion of patristic consensus.* Since it is obvious that, on the one hand, no single individual can be seen as an exclusive interpreter of Tradition and that, on the other hand, there are contradictions on individual issues between otherwise very authoritative fathers, the real content of transmitted truth should be sought where there is unquestionable consensus. Sometimes the consensus is easier to define in terms of theological methodology or a general approach to issues, rather than in actual theological formulations. One speaks then of the “sense of the fathers”.

The overall insistence of the reformers of the 16th century on the Bible as the unique – or at least a very privileged – source of divine revelation* removed patristics from the basic curriculum of most Protestant theological schools. It should be noted, however, that Calvin, Luther and particularly Melancthon looked at the fathers with great respect as authoritative commentators on scriptural texts.

There is a further problem related to the question of authority: any academic course in patristics today includes the study of authors who do not qualify as either fathers or doctors of the church. Indeed, it is impossible to understand the historical development of Christian thought without considering the entire contents of early Christian literature, which includes persons who were formally condemned by ecclesiastical authority either during their life-time (Nestorius) or after their death (Origen, Theodore of Mopsuestia). There are also influential authors whose true identity is unknown because they wrote under a cover name (Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite). Secular historians of Christian doctrine would include such authors in their survey without hesitation, whereas Orthodox or Roman Catholic theologians would attempt to qualify their position in reference to the mainstream of Tradition.

Early Christian literature, which is generally studied under the general name of patristics, has come to us in Greek, Latin and Syriac, with additional texts available in Coptic, Ethiopian, Armenian, Arabic, Georgian and sometimes Slavonic versions. Their publication in printed form began in the 16th century. Some publications involved interesting ecumenical concerns. For instance, the French Benedictines of St Maur – a congregation founded in 1618 in Paris – worked with the generous support of King Louis XIV, who was interested in finding in early Christian literature some support for his Gallican sympathies. “Maurist” editions are being used in a reprinted form today. Similarly, the publication in Venice in 1718 by Nikodemos the Hagiorite of the famous Philokalia – a large anthology of Greek patristic texts on the spirituality of “mental” prayer – would have been impossible without the editor’s Western contacts. (He also published a modern Greek paraphrase of the Spiritual Exercises of Ignatius Loyola.) In 1882 Adolf von Harnack began the famous series Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der altchristlichen Literatur as a source for the study of early Christianity on the basis of his own Protestant approach.

The most widely available collections of Greek and Latin texts – the Patrologia Graeca (162 vols) and the Patrologia Latina (221 vols), by the French priest J.-P. Migne (d.1875) – are also in their own way an ecumenical witness. Migne was very comprehensive, including texts of various Christian theological tendencies (even Greek anti-Latin polemics, e.g. Patriarch Photius). He also reprinted the Orthodox Philokalia. Furthermore, his Greek patrology ends with A.D. 1453, whereas the Latin one stops at the works of Innocent III (1160-1216). Paradoxically, the editor seems to imply that the patristic tradition continued longer in the East than in the Latin West.

The texts printed by Migne have often been superseded by new series, with more critical editions. The French series Sources chrétiennes was started in Paris in 1941 by Henri de Lubac and Jean Daniélou in the conscious attempt to restore the traditions of the early church within Catholicism, thus making ecumenical dialogue easier. This same ecumenical concern earlier dominated the so-called Oxford movement within Anglicanism. The famous Library of the Fathers (45 vols, Oxford, 1838-88), containing the English translations of major patristic texts, was edited by Edward Pusey, John Keble and Cardinal Newman and laid the basis for the “Anglo-catholic” revival. It was often reprinted and complemented by other English editions, including the more recent series initiated by Roman Catholics. As a result, works written by Greek or Latin fathers are now more available in English than in French or German translations. In 19th-century Russia, patristic translations were initiated by the leader of modern Russian theological scholarship, Metropolitan Filaret (Drozdov, 1782-1867). It is important to note that Filaret’s patristic interests were inseparable in his mind and activities from biblical research: in particular, he was a zealous promoter of a new Russian translation of the Bible.

The obvious importance of these great enterprises of editing and translating the writings of the fathers lay in the concern, in each case, to grasp the mind of the Christian community before the occurrence of historical schisms,* splits or other crises. The result, more often than not, was a better understanding of what is absolute and permanent in the Christian faith* and what is of relative importance, determined by passing historical factors. Certainly not all approaches to patristic research were successful: e.g. in spite of great scholarly achievement, the liberal 19th-century school, led by Harnack, hardly succeeded in its attempt to prove that, starting with the 3rd century, Greek Christian thought was Hellenized to the point of becoming intrinsically unfaithful to original “Paulinism”. The achievements of the Oxford movement were more lasting. It did not swing the entire Anglican communion to “catholic” principles, but it became very influential in establishing the thoroughly biblical content of patristic thought, as it developed in the classic period of the 4th century.

The revival of patristic studies in France and Germany after the second world war represented attempts, among Roman Catholics, to understand the Christian traditions as independent from medieval scholasticism, which had appeared to many as stale and unhelpful in the framework of the prevailing new existential approach to theology. Furthermore, on the patristic basis, the dialogue with other Christians, particularly the Orthodox, was becoming easier. Some basic methodological achievements, linked to the patristic revival, seem to be universally accepted today: e.g. the existence of two distinct models of Trinitarian theology in the 4th century – the Augustinian in the West and the Cappadocian in the East – which explains the divisive issue of the filioque* addition to the creed; the impossibility of understanding the later development of the Roman papacy without first admitting the predominance in early Christianity of an ecclesiology of the local church,* etc.

If one avoids the temptation of making the notion of a “return to the fathers” into a slogan or a conservative panacea, there is no doubt that the entire problem of Tradition, as it stands before divided Christians today, requires reference to the methodology and achievements of patristics. Unless one accepts a blind doctrine of sola scriptura – which very few Protestants would uphold today – one cannot discover the mind of Christianity without referring to the fathers, recognizing that the specific authority of scripture is enhanced rather than diminished when one studies the ways in which it was read and understood throughout the centuries.

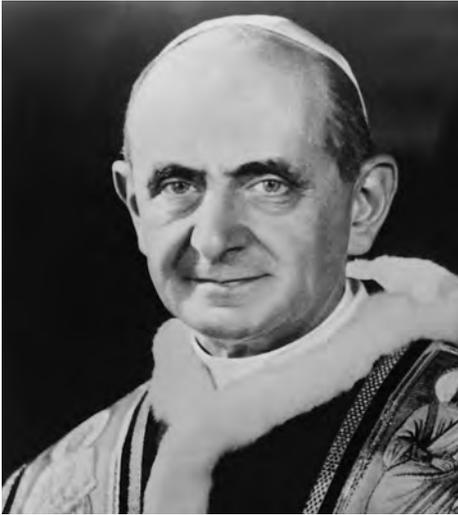

JOHN MEYENDORFF

- H. Alfeyev, Le mystère de la foi. Introduction à la théologie dogmatique orthodoxe, Paris, Cerf, 2000
- K.M. George, The Early Church. Defending the Faith, Witness and Proclamation: Patristic Perspectives, WCC, 1996
- W. Henn, One Faith: Biblical and Patristic Contributions toward Understanding Unity in Faith, New York, Ramsey, 1995
- J. Meyendorff, Living Tradition, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir’s Seminary, 1978
- J. Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, vol. 1: The Emergence of the Catholic Tradition; vol. 2: The Spirit of Eastern Christendom (600-1700), Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1971-74
- J. Quasten, Patrology, 4 vols, Utrecht-Brussels, Spectrum, 1950-87.

PAUL VI (Giovanni Battista Montini)

B. 26 Sept. 1897, Concesio, Lombardy, Italy; d. 6 Aug. 1978, Rome; bishop of Rome and pope from 21 June 1963. Paul VI presided over the last three sessions of Vatican Council II* and guided the Catholic church through its difficult post-council transition.

Born into an upper-class family and ordained in 1920, Montini went to Rome for graduate studies in philosophy, canon law and literature, then served the Roman curia,* where he remained for 22 years in its secretariat of state. He also ministered to students at the university of Rome, set up a weekly newspaper to develop a Catholic intellectual elite and organized seminars from which leaders of the Christian Democratic Party would emerge. During the second world war Pius XII entrusted to Montini a variety of duties: directing the Vatican's extensive relief work, settling displaced persons and hiding political refugees.

Montini had remained responsible for the ordinary affairs of the church until 1954, when (to the cynical surprise of insiders) Pius XII removed his most direct influence in the Vatican by appointing him archbishop of Milan, one of the church's largest ecclesiastical jurisdictions. Montini quickly revealed his organizational skills and pastoral sensitivity in concern for social needs and the role of the laity. Calling himself the "archbishop of the workers", he gave priority to winning back to the church the labouring class in the communist strongholds of Milan.

He was active in the central preparatory commission for Vatican II and a prominent leader among the bishops at its first session (1962), especially in pressing for a new document on the church in the modern world. After the death of John XXIII in June 1963, Montini was elected his successor and vigorously continued a council that he would not himself have called. He described the objective of Vatican II "to make the church of the 20th century ever better fitted for proclaiming the gospel to the people of the 20th century". If John XXIII had conceived and given spirit to the council, Paul VI helped give the event its flesh and blood. The main reason for his hesitations over the radical drafts on ecumenism, the Jews, and religious freedom was to ensure that the opposing minority bishops would become convaincus, pas vaincus (convinced, not conquered).

Within the Roman curia, Paul VI established offices to implement new concerns: secretariats for promoting Christian unity,* for non-Christians, for non-believers; also the council for the laity, the commission for justice and peace, and the office of mass communications. He diminished the Italian influence in the curia, better internationalized the college of cardinals, and instituted the synod of bishops as an instrument of collegial consultation; it represented the various episcopal regions and met in 1967, 1969, 1971, 1974 and 1977. He was the first modern pope to travel outside Italy, visiting the holy land, India, South America, Africa, Australia, Oceania, the United Nations (New York), Constantinople and Geneva (WCC, June 1969).

Paul VI judged that the distrust and rivalries among the churches produced a "strange, absurd situation", one of Christianity's and humanity's "gravest problems". He considered ecumenism an obligatory, "mysterious" part of his papal ministry, though he admitted that most other Christians regarded the papacy as an ecumenical stumbling block. He met with Anglican and Protestant leaders, addressed ecumenical groups, reminded RC bishops of their ecumenical responsibilities and gave his updated ecumenical reflections during the annual Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.*

After he and Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras embraced on the Mount of Olives in Jerusalem as "two pilgrims with eyes fixed on Christ" (January 1964), both later agreed solemnly to "remove from the memory and from the midst of the church the excommunication of 1054" (7 December 1965). Paul VI visited Athenagoras in Istanbul in July 1967, and the patriarch returned the visit in Rome in October. These two heads of "sister churches"* proclaimed common declarations.

The same was done when the pope received also the heads of the Armenian Orthodox (1968), the Syrian Orthodox (1971), and Coptic Orthodox (1973) churches.

Called “progressive” for his appeals for social justice in the evolution of developing countries (Populorum Progressio, 1967), for his teaching on urbanization, racial discrimination, environment and the evolution of Marxism (e.g. Octogesima Adveniens, 1971) and for his call for evangelization of the modern world (Evangelii Nuntiandi, 1975), Paul VI was just as loudly dubbed “conservative” on the eucharist (Mysterium Fidei, 1965), artificial birth control (Humanae Vitae, 1968), priestly celibacy (Sacerdotalis Caelibatus, 1967) and the non-ordination of women (1977).

As revisionist history takes a more objective look at Pope Paul’s personality and the tasks he could not avoid and did face head-on, in the evaluation of the nine modern popes since Pius IX (d. 1878), one hears, with hints of nostalgia, Montini’s name mentioned as “the greatest of them all”.

TOM STRANSKY

- G. Camadini ed., Paolo VI e l'ecumenismo, Roma, Studium, 2001
- P. Hebblethwaite, Paul VI, New York, Paulist, 1993
- P. Hebblethwaite, Paul VI et la modernité dans l'Eglise, Rome, Ecole française Palazzo Farnese, 1984
- E.J. Stormon ed, Towards the Healing of Schism: Public Statements and Correspondence between the Holy See and the Ecumenical Patriarchate, 1958-1984, New York, Paulist, 1987
- T. Stransky & J.B. Sheerin eds, Doing the Truth in Charity: Vatican and Papal Statements on Ecumenism, 1964-1980, New York, Paulist, 1982.

PAX CHRISTI INTERNATIONAL

PAX CHRISTI International, an international Roman Catholic peace movement, was initiated in March 1945 by a small French group led by Bishop Pierre Théas of Lourdes, recently released from a Nazi prisoner-of-war camp. The group’s original purpose was to promote reconciliation between the French and the Germans, especially but not exclusively Catholics. During the 1950s and 1960s, the movement spread through most of Western Europe, then to the USA, Canada and Australia (1970s); then to Asia and Africa (1980s); then to Central and Eastern Europe (1990s).

As a federation of national sections, PCI “believes that Christians should be in the forefront of the search for new approaches in the field of demilitarization, security and arms trade, human rights, ecology and development and the linking of these issues”. PCI tries to establish a broad Catholic coalition of different political stances, striving also for dialogue and cooperation with other Christian associations. It propagates papal and other church statements on justice and peace, and supports peace prayer campaigns and studies on sociological, psychological and spiritual conditions of peace, e.g. Christian alternatives to violence and the use of “de-militarizing” Catholic education. PCI supports its autonomous youth forum delegates from national sections and coordinates their peace work in summer camps and hostels and youth leadership conferences (e.g. “Migrants and Xenophobia in Europe” and “Conscientious Objection and Alternative Service”). PCI has contacts with similar groups in other churches, and with ecumenical and inter-religious organizations such as the Christian Peace Conference,* the World Conference on Religion and Peace,* and the WCC, especially in its ecumenical process concerning justice, peace and the integrity of creation.* PCI is represented with consultative status in several intergovernmental organizations, e.g. the UN Economic and Social Council, the UN Human Rights Commission, and the Council of Europe.

PCI headquarters are in Brussels. It publishes a bimonthly Newsletter in English and French.

TOM STRANSKY

PAX ROMANA

FOUNDED in Switzerland in 1921, Pax Romana (PR) is an international movement of Roman Catholic students, with a section (since 1946) for graduates and professionals – International Catholic Movement for Intellectual and Cultural Affairs (in French, MIIC). Under the umbrella of “Christian presence and evangelization of culture”, PR’s concerns and priorities include the search for more humane means of scientific development, promotion of intercultural dialogue, joint actions with the poor and oppressed for the defence of their culture and human dignity, and re-inforcement of human rights in all political regimes.

As an international community of laity,* PR in 2001 embraced federations from 71 countries in all six continents. Its headquarters are in Geneva, but specialized secretariats are located elsewhere: Catholic secondary school teachers (Vienna); Catholic engineers, agronomists and industry officials (Paris); Catholic jurists (Barcelona); Christian artists (Munich); and scientific questions (Boulogne-sur-Seine, France).

In 1887 Baron George de Montenach and Count Albert de Mun tried to organize French and Swiss RC students through a meeting, eventually held two years later in Fribourg. But such efforts led to an organization only after the first world war. In its beginnings PR was kept aloof from ecumenical cooperation (see RCC and pre-Vatican II ecumenism). But with Vatican permission in 1955 PR sponsored a conference on the university, culture and human community, with the World Student Christian Federation.*

One of PR's most innovative leaders in ecumenical activities was the Australian Rosemary Goldie, the PR staff member in Fribourg. In 1952 she left for a top position in the Roman curia.* She organized international and regional congresses of the lay apostolate, including the post-Vatican II congress of laity in Rome (1986), with active participation by lay representatives of other churches. In 1967, after she had become a general secretary of Pope Paul VI's newly created Council for the Laity, she initiated contacts with the WCC, the WSCF, YWCAs and YMCAs.

Besides its publication of seminar and conference reports, PR issues a newsletter in English, French, and Spanish and a journal Convergence (since 1989 also with the International Young Catholic Students and the International Movement of Catholic Students).

TOM STRANSKY

■ Memory and Hope: Pax Romana, 1947-1987, Geneva, Pax Romana, 1989 ■ G. De Weck, Histoire du mouvement des étudiants catholiques vers la fondation d'une confédération internationale (1887-1925), Fribourg, 1926.

PAYNE, ERNEST ALEXANDER

B. 19 Feb. 1902, London, UK; d. 14 Jan. 1980, London. Vice-moderator of the WCC central committee, 1954-68, and a president of the WCC, 1968-75, Payne was general secretary of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland, 1951-67, vice-president of the United Society for Christian Literature and of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and chairman of the executive committee of the British Council of Churches, 1962-71. He studied in London, Oxford and Marburg and was ordained in 1928. Trained in church history and the history of denomina-tionalism, he influenced the discussion on the "non-theological factors in the making and unmaking of church union" and played an important role in the revision of the basis of the WCC in 1954. In a rare recognition for a Free churchman, a memorial service for him was held in Westminster Abbey, London.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ E.A. Payne, The Free Church Tradition in the Life of England, London, SCM Press, 1944 ■ The Growth of the World Church, London, Edinburgh House, 1955 ■ Thirty Years of the British Council of Churches, 1942-72, London, BCC, 1972 ■ W.M.S. West, To Be a Pilgrim: A Memoir of Ernest A. Payne, London, Lutterworth, 1983.

PEACE

THE HEBREW “shalom” designates not only the reduction of conflict but rightness, wholeness – not only peace but justice.* The same root is properly translated as liberation* or salvation.* It denotes things as they should be and shall be in the divine purpose. The vision of Isa. 2 and Micah 4 promises that peoples will “no longer learn war” because “the oracle of Yahweh will go out from Jerusalem”.

That this shalom is fulfilled in the work of Jesus Christ* is what the apostles called good news. “Peace on earth” was promised by the angels of Luke 2:14. That the inauguration of God’s rule is at hand was the promise of John, as it was of Jesus. In the light of this beginning, the seventh beatitude calls peace-makers “children of God”. The fulfilment of the law by a “higher righteousness” (Matt. 5) reveals that it is by loving one’s enemies that disciples are like their heavenly Father. Eph. 2:14 says that Christ is “our peace” because by reconciling Jew and gentile he has created “one new humanity” (v.15). This reality expresses itself in the harmonious interaction of the many ministries in the body (Eph. 4 and par. in Rom. 12 and 1 Cor. 12) and in formal procedures of conflict resolution (Matt. 18:15-17; 1 Cor. 6:5-6). Effective reconciliation* is a real experience in the believing community, and its extension to the ends of the earth is a concrete social project.

The peace-making function of the church* as community is undergirded theologically by the confession of Christ’s lordship, which refuses to let the rulers of the present world sacralize its oppressive and divisive structures. The primitive Jewish denunciation of idolatry unveils the pretensions of any who would claim the right to sacrifice lives to their causes.

The re-alignment which began in the 4th century abandoned the universality of the gospel vision in favour of an alliance of the bishops with the Roman empire, yet it did promote a vision of peace in the earthly city. Pax Romana, now externally Christianized, was not the Hebraic vision of a global right order* but rather the relative tranquillity of a very large, but not worldwide, empire. Constantine’s support for the churches was seen as prefiguring and furthering the kingdom of God.* Augustine re-defined the peace of God as belonging in heaven or in the human heart. It no longer called for loving the enemies of the empire or for empowering underdogs.

Medieval bishops and synods worked for the pax terrena, seeking to restrain local wars by proclaiming “the truce of God” and “the peace of God”, or by intervening between princes as mediators. Gradually canon law* (Gratian) and then academic theologians (Francisco de Vitoria, Francisco Suarez) developed the “justifiable war” or “just war”* tradition as a “concrete utopia”. The notion that wars could be evaluated in terms of authority, cause, intention, means, etc. projected the unrealistic hope that the violence of rulers might be restrained by respect for due process and the rights of the victim. Jurists like Hugo Grotius formulated these visions of restraint in the language of international law. Treaties (culminating in those at The Hague, 1899, 1907) committed governments to respect rules safeguarding the rights of prisoners and occupied populations. Thus the usage was re-inforced that “peace” refers to reducing unrest and damage, under the control of the present regime, including the use of violence in a “police” function.

As nationalism undermined the vision of Christendom and technology* increased war’s destructiveness, other kinds of utopia arose as well. Visions of world order were projected by philosophers like Kant, later taken over by popes and politicians. The first world war was supposed to end war; anti-militarists spoke of outlawing war. In the Kellogg-Briand pact (1927) governments disavowed “war as an instrument of national policy”. Vatican social teaching (see social encyclicals, papal) posits such a world order as the way to eliminate war. “Peace” here means a reversal of Augustine’s relegating to heaven the promise of a new righteous order; the hope has continued to be that the present regimes could be called on to carry it out.

The other critical vision came to be called pacifism.* Rooted historically in the radical renewal vision of the historic peace churches,* recovered in the 19th century by Tolstoy, Garrison and others and in the 20th by the International Fellowship of Reconciliation,* pacifism rejects on moral grounds all war, even for causes purported just. Ever since the Oxford Life and Work conference (1937), ecumenical statements have recognized the unresolved tension between just war* and pacifism as moral positions. There has been less responsible theological attention directed to the fact that in many cases the military activities in which Christians have served their governments cannot stand up to scrutiny under just-war principles, and would not have been acceptable if there had been such testing.

Without resolving the tension, numerous areas of common witness* have been found. Just-war and pacifist reasoning agree in rejecting war waged for unjust causes, or the use of means unable to respect the criteria of discrimination, proportion, and non-combatant immunity. These criteria found expression in the work of the WCC study commission on Christians and the prevention of war in a nuclear age (1955-57), which rejected any all-out use of nuclear weapons.

The question of war had been present in WCC assemblies since the creation of the WCC. Amsterdam 1948 (sec. 4) included such affirmations as "war is contrary to the will of God" and "peace requires an attack on the causes of conflict between the powers" but could not find agreement in answering the question: Can war now be an act of justice? Evanston 1954 emphasized the relation of peace and justice at the national and international levels and encouraged "a continuing effort to reach agreement on outstanding issues, such as the peace treaties and disarmament" and "readiness to submit all unresolved questions of conflict to an impartial international organization and to carry out its decisions". Uppsala 1968 drew on earlier work in stating: "The concentration of nuclear weapons in the hands of a few nations presents the world with serious problems: (a) how to guarantee the security of the non-nuclear nations; (b) how to enable these nations to play their part in preventing war; and (c) how to prevent the nuclear powers from freezing the existing order at the expense of changes needed for social and political justice." But not until Vancouver 1983 did the all-out rejection of nuclear weapons find expression in assembly documents.

Both pacifists and just-war theorists call on present governments and international agencies to make the most of present possibilities for peaceful change and the reduction of hostilities. They work in the spirit of the WCC in process of formation, which in 1946 created the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs to monitor the state of international relations and to testify at those points where a common witness is possible.

A further commonality between just war and pacifism became visible as well in the 20th century. Whereas pacifism, as represented from the age of Francis of Assisi and the Waldensians until that of Tolstoy and Garrison, was at first held by persons and small groups with no political weight and seemed to call only for abstention from involvement in violence, possibilities for effectively achieving political goals through non-violent direct action have become visible. Mohandas K. Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr, have been among the architects and protagonists of this development, whose presence and potential are far wider than currently recognized. This fact was confirmed in an exploratory way by the WCC study on "Violence, Non-Violence, and the Struggle for Justice" (1971-73), which took cognizance of the growth of peace studies as a branch of political science and of conflict resolution as a social skill. War and police violence are no longer self-evidently the ultimate means of restoring peace and achieving justice.

Further common concerns support the struggle against racism* (since Uppsala) and against militarism (since Nairobi). The Programme to Combat Racism* heightened the awareness that in places where no war is going on, human dignity is nonetheless being violated. The militarism studies made it clear that, not only in classic dictatorships but also in the "national security state", where the might of the armed forces is directed within their own borders, both peace and justice are ill served by "preparedness".

The world Christian community, especially as visible in the new missionary movements of the 18th and 19th centuries and the ecumenical relationships developed still more recently, represents an agency of peacemaking in ways that are often under-estimated. The mere fact of being a transnational, polycultural community is peace action. Missionary service and international diakonia* educate those who send and pray, those who travel, and those who receive, in cross-cultural awareness of the believing community as a global fellowship, first-fruits of a global humanity. Interchurch reconciliation develops models for possible interdependence between nations and blocs. World Christendom brings prophetic judgment to bear on injustices occurring in regions whose rulers do not want the "peace" of their regime disturbed, and it supports Christians in a posture of resistance. People-to-people relationships develop international understanding from below, as support and corrective for the less redemptive internationalisms of diplomacy, trade, tourism, sport and entertainment.

As ecumenical thought became less Eurocentric, the equation of peace with tranquility under the present regime was increasingly questioned. The usage arose of yoking the concepts "justice" and "peace" in dialectical tension. Some meant by this conjunction that neither justice nor peace is possible without the other. Others meant that justice (defined in terms of a particular contemporary political programme) must come first, thereby retrieving in a new form the just-war tradition. To this binary formulation has been added since Vancouver (1983) "the integrity [or safeguarding] of creation", recognizing that neither tranquillity nor structural change can suffice without the underlying resources of ecology, economy and culture.* This broadening of the leitmotif coincided with the call for a new kind of conciliar process which should work somehow "from below". The present system of cooperating and competing confessional bureaucracies cannot adequately channel the energies and the shared commitments which such a restored vision of the wholeness shalom demands.

The 1999 WCC central committee deplored "the erosion of the authority and capacity of the United Nations... to develop, codify and guarantee respect for the international rule of law" and insisted on heeding the Canberra plea to "promote non-violent approaches to conflict transformation and resolution, and post-conflict healing and reconciliation".

See also disarmament, international order, militarism/militarization, violence and non-violence.

JOHN H. YODER

- G. Baum & H. Wells eds, The Reconciliation of Peoples: Challenge to the Churches, WCC, 1997
- R. Billheimer & T.M. Taylor, Christians and the Prevention of War in an Atomic Age, London, SCM Press, 1981
- J.S. Conway, "The Struggle for Peace between the Wars", ER, 35, 1, 1983
- J. Dear, The God of Peace: Toward a Theology of Nonviolence, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1994
- D. Durnbaugh ed., On Earth Peace, Elgin IL, Brethren, 1978
- D. Gill, "Violence, Non-Violence and the Struggle for Justice", ER, 25, 4, 1973
- H.J.M. Nouwen, The Road to Peace: Writings on Peace and Justice, J. Dear ed., Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1998
- J.H. Yoder, Christian Attitudes to War, Peace and Revolution, Elkhart IN, 1983
- J.H. Yoder, When War Is Unjust: Being Honest in Just-War Thinking, 2nd ed., Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1996.

PENANCE AND RECONCILIATION

THE FORMS for the remission of sins committed after baptism* have undergone some surprising changes in the course of church history. The 1st and 2nd centuries knew various and even divergent practices. The Pauline literature appears to exclude reconciliation* after baptism (1 Cor. 5:13; see also Heb. 6:4-6), while Matthew already foreshadows an ecclesial procedure (18:15-17); several texts allude to a kind of general confession (James 5:16; 1 John 1:8-2:2; Didache 14:1).

The 3rd century saw the development of a "canonical penance". In the East, the Epistola Canonica of Gregory Thaumaturgus distinguishes four successive stages through which penitents must pass. In the West, canonical penance, which could be undergone only once in a life-time for the serious sins of murder, adultery and apostasy, is a sort of partial excommunication* and comprises three steps: the entry into the order of penitents (at the beginning of Lent, from the 4th century onwards), the actio paenitentiae, or (long) period of amendment, and finally the celebration of reconciliation (on Holy Thursday) presided over by the bishop, when the entire community prays for the penitents, now re-instated into full ecclesial communion.*

By the 5th century the East was placing more stress on the therapeutic aspect of penance; confession was tied to spiritual guidance, and often the penitent confessed to a monk. From the 7th to the 11th centuries, the West acquired from Irish monks a "tariff penance", whereby sins were penalized according to degrees of gravity specified in the Penitential Books. Its abuses led to yet another form, namely "confession", which is characterized by four parts: contrition, confession made to a priest, satisfaction (all three being acts of the penitent), and absolution. At the end of the middle ages, a "devotional confession" had developed, which sometimes became more frequent than communion.

THE REFORM OF THE 16TH CENTURY

In practice, the rejection of confession was not always as clear-cut as the theological principles of the Protestant Reformation might require. Luther was acquainted with confession, even though, from 1520, he no longer counted it as a sacrament.* The Augsburg confession refers to confession in article 12, and to penance in article 13; the Apology for the Augsburg confession lists penance among the sacraments (art. 13). Calvin strongly criticized the "power of the keys" attributed to the priest but did not minimize the place of forgiveness of sins in the church (Institutes 3.4). The Anglican Book of Common Prayer provides for auricular confession and also for a general confession of sins during the eucharist and the office; the 16th article of religion provides for the forgiveness of sin after baptism. The other reforming movements were more radical, usually retaining only a general confession of sins during worship and occasionally forms for confession in small groups.

CONTEMPORARY TENDENCIES

Theological reflection on penance and reconciliation is done today within the context of soteriology, notably by means of the Pauline concept of reconciliation. This solid theological framework allows one to go beyond confessional controversies and to bring into focus the essential theological question, i.e. the reality of salvation* (reconciliation) in the church. A good example of this rethinking is provided in the beginning of the introduction to the Roman Ordo Paenitentiae (1973).

Along the same lines, current theology grounds reflection on penance and reconciliation in baptism, notably by recalling their historic origin as paenitentia secunda. This reflection is concerned with the forgiveness of sins, those committed before baptism, as well as those committed subsequently. In this context the questions of the sacramentality of penance and of its minister may also be re-formulated.

Theologians are divided on the importance of confession in penance. Some attribute to it a great importance, renewed today by psychology and the need people have to be "heard" in the midst of secularized society; they stress the therapeutic aspect of the process. Others prefer to emphasize its ecclesial dimension, the subsequent reconciliation among members of the community and, at the extreme, its aspect of church discipline.* In this respect, the choice of terminology (whether penance, confession or reconciliation) is not neutral. Attempts are made to take into account the social and collective aspect of sin,* but theologies of penance are as yet too little in touch with psychoanalysis, sociology, and even the moral theology of sin.

There is now a diffusion of diverse forms, contrary to the standard forms for so long used in auricular and in general confession. Thus, the Roman Ordo Paenitentiae of 1973 first offers a revised ritual for individual confession and then two forms for community celebration, the first with individual, and the second with communal confession and absolution (with canonical restrictions for the latter). In Western Catholicism, one witnesses a passage from frequent confession to a rhythm of a few celebrations per year.

Orthodoxy has diverse practices. In some Greek- and Arabic-speaking churches, confession has almost entirely disappeared, while in the Slavic churches, the most traditional forms of confession are still maintained. In Anglicanism there is a certain re-assertion of the value of confession, attested in the revision of liturgical books. Thus the American Book of Common Prayer (1979) includes "The Reconciliation of a Penitent", as does the Canadian Book of Alternative Services (1980). The same tendency is manifest in some currents of Lutheranism, where pastors invite the people to a community celebration during penitential seasons such as Lent.

These issues have been little discussed within the ecumenical movement, perhaps because of the sacramental quality attributed to penance and reconciliation by the Catholics and Orthodox, which is troublesome for the Protestant churches. Recent theological tendencies, however, seem bound eventually to remove the obstacle.

The most ecumenical aspect of the question is that of the reconciliation of the churches themselves. Today, many consider the ecumenical endeavour as a true ministry of reconciliation. The unions realized among various churches offer material for reflection.

See also redemption.

PAUL DE CLERCK

- E. Bezzel, Frei zum Eingeständnis: Geschichte und Praxis der evangelischen Einzelbeichte, Stuttgart, Calwer, 1982
- Evangelische Lutherische Liturgische Konferenz, Agenda, Bd 3: Amtshandlungen, Hanover, Lutherische Verlag, 1994
- H. Karpp, Die Busse, Zurich, EVZ-Verlag, 1969
- Reconciliation: Gift of God, Source of New Life, 2nd European Ecumenical Assembly, Graz, Styria, 1998
- Studia Liturgica, 18, 1, 1988
- M. Thurian, La confession (ET Confession, London, SCM Press, 1958)
- E. Timiadis, The Sacrament of Confession and the Confessor, Joensuu, Univ. of Joensuu, 2001.

PENTECOST

THE TERM derives from pentēkostē (lit. 50th), the Greek name for the Jewish Feast of Weeks at the close of the grain harvest 50 days after Passover and Unleavened Bread (see Tob. 2:1). In the early church, "Pentecost" at first designated the whole period of 50 days from Easter;* only later did it refer particularly to the 50th day, which became a feast in its own right.

The 50 days celebrating Christ's resurrection* were the "most joyful season" (Tertullian), one "great Sunday" (Athanasius); there was no kneeling for prayer but only standing (to mark the heavenly location of believers in Christ, in anticipation of the general resurrection); and there was no fasting (a foretaste of the heavenly banquet with the messianic bridegroom). In the 4th century, the 50th day was regarded as the seal of the period, with Christ's ascension and the Spirit's descent as its twin themes. At the turn into the 5th century, the two distinct feasts emerged of Ascension (40 days after Easter; see Acts 1:1-11) and Pentecost (see Acts 2:1-4). The vigil of Pentecost became a baptismal occasion, and the white robes of the baptized account for the English "Whit-sunday".

First in sectarian Judaism in the intertestamental period, and then in rabbinic Judaism by the 2nd and 3rd centuries of the Christian era, the Feast of Weeks has become associated with the law-giving and covenant* of Sinai. Sermons at the feast of Pentecost by Christian preachers of the 5th century relate the new covenant of the Spirit to the old covenant of the law. Furthermore, the gift of the Holy Spirit* for apostolic preaching is considered as a reversal of Babel, bringing unity* and catholicity* to the church* and its mission.* An ancient Latin collect prays: "Make the peoples dispersed by the division of language to be joined by your heavenly gift in the united confession of your name."

In the modern ecumenical movement, Pentecost became a time of special prayer for Christian unity. The preparatory conference of Faith and Order* at Geneva in 1920 appealed for an annual week of prayer for the unity of the church, ending with Whitsunday. In 1941 F&O changed its dates to the 18-25 January octave, but the Pentecost time remains favoured in some parts of the world (see Week of Prayer for Christian Unity). The presidents of the WCC send a Pentecost message to member churches every year.

See also Holy Spirit.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

- R. Cabié, La Pentecôte: L'évolution de la cinquante pascale au cours des cinq premiers siècles, Tournai, Desclée, 1965
- J. Gunstone, The Feast of Pentecost: The Great Fifty Days in the Liturgy, London, Faith, 1967.

PENTECOSTAL-REFORMED DIALOGUE

THE BILATERAL dialogue between the Pentecostal movement and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* (WARC), presently in its early stages, is the first official ecumenical conversation by Pentecostals* with a Protestant world communion. Dating from the turn of the 20th century, Pentecostalism is best known for its emphasis on the ongoing sanctification* and empowerment of the Holy Spirit* in the life of the church* and its mission* in the world.

The general council of the WARC proposed the possibility of dialogue with Pentecostals at the request of its Korean members during its meeting in 1989 in Seoul, South Korea. A series of contacts followed between WARC theology secretary Henry Wilson (India) and Pentecostal theologian Cecil M. Robeck, Jr, (Pasadena, CA). Wilson and Robeck convened the organizational meeting in Mathersey, England, in 1994. Delegates reviewed the current state of Reformed-Pentecostal relations around the world, taking note of various regional discussions between their members in the Netherlands, South Africa and, to a lesser extent, the US. It was proposed that the first round of international discussions centre on the issue of spirituality* in the two traditions.

The first dialogue was hosted by the Waldensian Church on behalf of the WARC at Torre Pelice, Italy, in 1996. It was proposed that the dialogue between the two traditions seek to increase mutual understanding and respect, identify areas of theological agreement, convergence or disagreement, and explore possibilities for common witness.* Discussions revolved around the issue of spirituality in relation to biblical interpretation, justice and ecumenism. The discussions focused on the mutual challenge implied in the centrality of the Word in the Reformed tradition and the Pentecostal emphasis on the Spirit. All agreed, however, on the central role that both the Bible and the Holy Spirit play in the church's obedience to Christ through proclamation and praxis. Delegates from both sides of the dialogue were challenged by the diversity of their respective traditions in arriving at common affirmations concerning spirituality.

The second round of talks occurred in 1997 in Chicago at McCormick Theological Seminary with the theme "The Role of the Holy Spirit in the Church". Papers were offered on the relation of the Holy Spirit to scripture* and the role of the Spirit in both proclamation and spiritual gifts. Most significantly, the issue of the nature and role of prophecy* in the church today was discussed, especially in relation to the role of scripture as the criterion for discerning the apostolic witness. Both teams concurred that prophecy was vital as a means of making the apostolic voice in scripture dynamic and relevant for today, but the Reformed team tended to accent the role of prophecy in social criticism. The Pentecostals, while not discounting the importance of social criticism, emphasized prophecy as an inspired utterance for personal and ecclesial edification. Both teams confessed together that the Spirit is necessary for the function of the Bible as the word of God* for the church, for "it is only by the Holy Spirit that the scriptures become the living Word of God for the church" ("Word and Spirit, Church and World", para. 33).

The third round took place the following year at Kappel, Switzerland, focusing on "The Holy Spirit and Mission in Eschatological Perspective". Dominant attention was given to the issue of the relationship between the gospel and culture.* The Reformed team affirmed the historic commitment of Reformed churches to Jesus Christ as the way of salvation,* but in agreement with the world conference on mission and evangelism at San Antonio, Texas (1989), also noted that "we cannot set limits to the saving power of God" (ibid., para. 72). The Pentecostals noted their historic hesitance to recognize any possibility for salvation outside of faith in Jesus Christ. Both sides were able to confess together that "the gospel implies first the salvation of humanity, but also the enhancement of human dignity and liberation" (para. 70).

The fourth round of talks occurred in 1999 at Seoul, Korea, with the theme "The Holy Spirit, Charisma and the Kingdom of God". Major attention was placed on the nature and function of spiritual gifts in the church. Pentecostals noted their historic emphasis on the extraordinary gifts discussed in 1 Cor. 12-14 and asked the Reformed team why such little attention is paid to these gifts in the mainstream life of many of their churches. The Reformed team noted that Reformed churches are "sometimes too casual" in exercising spiritual gifts and "do not encourage or even sanction" many of those listed in 1 Cor. 12-14. But they also resisted the notion that any one gift (like glossolalia) or set of gifts can become normative for Christian experience. Both teams agreed that “no biblical listing of gifts is a template to be laid over the entire church” (ibid., para. 55) and affirmed that all segments of the church need to broaden their understanding of the spiritual gifts.

The fifth meeting in Brazil was occupied with the writing of the final report for the first five years of talks, which has now been published. Discussions are underway concerning the possibility of another five years of conversation. Regardless of what the future holds for the dialogue, the talks since 1996 have helped to build bridges of understanding between these two significant families of Christians.

FRANK D. MACCHIA

■ F.D. Macchia, “Spirit, Word, and Kingdom: Theological Reflections on the Reformed/Pentecostal Dialogue”, Ecumenical Trends, 30, 3, 2001 ■ “Word and Spirit, Church and World: The Final Report of the International Dialogue between Representatives of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and Some Classical Pentecostal Churches and Leaders, 1996-2000”, Pneuma: Journal of the Society for Pentecostal Studies, 23, 1, 2001.

PENTECOSTAL-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

UNIQUE among the international dialogues, the Pentecostal-Roman Catholic conversations began with official Roman Catholic representatives but only with Pentecostal and other Protestant charismatics whom the co-chairman, David Du Plessis, had recruited. The impetus had come from contacts Du Plessis had made as guest of the Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity* to observe Vatican Council II;* from initiatives of Ray Bringham, an American charismatic; and from the Vatican’s acceptance of the fast-rising charismatic movement within the Roman Catholic Church. From the beginning of the dialogue in 1972, Kilian McDonnell, US Benedictine priest, has been co-chairman.

The dialogue was initially organized in five-year periods, with one session per year. During the first period (1972-76) the Pentecostal team included also charismatics from Protestant churches, who presented the majority of the papers. The topics concentrated on the Holy Spirit’s* role in Christian initiation, the Spirit and the church,* and the Spirit’s role in prayer and worship.

For the second period (1977, 1979-82), the Pentecostals decided to exclude charismatics from other churches. Du Plessis’s efforts to get official denominational backing, especially from the large American Assemblies of God, met constant rebuff, but he secured participation by smaller Pentecostal groups. Topics addressed faith* and experience, biblical hermeneutics,* speaking in tongues, healing, the church as communion* in worship, scripture and Tradition, Mary,* and ministry in the church.*

The three-year gap before the third quinquennium (1985-89) partly reflected the Vatican’s concern that the dialogue receive more backing from Pentecostal denominations. For this third series, on the theme “Perspectives on Koinonia”, David Du Plessis (d.1987) was replaced as Pentecostal co-chairman by his younger brother, Justus.

Since the third quinquennium there has been more Pentecostal participation, often as observers, with some backing of Pentecostal denominations, in a more international team. The fourth series, from 1990 to 1997, has been the most focused, leading to the joint report on “Evangelization, Proselytism and Common Witness”, the most important document to come from this dialogue. At the turn of the third millennium, and in face of the secularization* of post-modernity, Catholics and Pentecostals outline the scriptural and theological bases of their understanding and practice of evangelization and ask each other challenging questions about the proclamation of the gospel and ministries for social justice. A fifth phase began in 1998 on the theme “Christian Initiation and the Baptism in the Holy Spirit”.

The importance of this dialogue may lie primarily in assisting a largely anti-ecumenical movement slowly to re-evaluate its attitudes and positions. In this process the visionary role of David Du Plessis and the contribution of ecumenist and scholar Cecil M. Robeck, Jr, the Pentecostal co-chairman since 1992, have been of particular significance.

PETER HOCKEN

■ N. Baumert & G. Bially eds, Pfingstler und Katholiken im Dialog, Düsseldorf, Charisma, 1999 ■ T.R. Crowe, Pentecostal Unity: Recurring Frustration and Enduring Hopes, Chicago, Loyola Univ., 1993 ■ V.-M. Kärkkäinen, Spiritus ubi vult spirat, Helsinki, Luther-Agricola-Society, 1998 ■ K. McDonnell, "Improbable Conversations: The Classical Pentecostal-Roman Catholic International Dialogue" and "Five Defining Issues: The International Classical Pentecostal-Roman Catholic Dialogue", OC, 31, 1995 ■ "The Report: Evangelization, Proselytism and Common Witness", IS, 96, 1, 1998.

PENTECOSTAL WORLD CONFERENCE

ORGANIZED in 1947 in Zurich, Switzerland, the Pentecostal World Conference (PWC) intended originally to have limited legislative powers which would facilitate relations between the various Pentecostal denominations and aid them in common witness. Broad Pentecostal participation, inclusive of the Brazilians, Scandinavians and many independent Pentecostals, was made possible only when the powers of this body were limited to those of persuasion and consensus. Its purposes now include the promotion of "spiritual" fellowship, demonstration before the world of the "essential unity of Spirit-baptized believers" in fulfilment of Jesus' prayer in John 17:21, and cooperation on other items of mutual concern.

Every three years about 5000 to 10,000 Pentecostal leaders gather to listen to popular speakers, worship together, network with their peers, exchange ideas and information, challenge one another to greater responsibility in witness, and occasionally to make non-binding pronouncements. Between conferences the work of the PWC is overseen by an international advisory board which is generally composed of heads of communions and preachers with high visibility. Information is disseminated through the quarterly World Pentecost. The 1995 meeting was in Jerusalem; 1998, Seoul, Korea; and in 2001 in Los Angeles, to commemorate what some argue is the centennial anniversary of Pentecostalism.

See Pentecostals.

CECIL M. ROBECK, Jr

■ C.M. Robeck, Jr, "Taking Stock", One World, 210, 1995.

PENTECOSTALS

THE 20TH-CENTURY Pentecostal movement affirms a post-conversion work of the Holy Spirit.* This work is designated baptism in the Spirit, generally understood as empowerment for mission* and ministry,* and is said to represent the restoration of the spiritual gifts listed in 1 Cor. 12:8-10 (see charism(ata)). Of these gifts, speaking in tongues has particular significance for most Pentecostals as the initial evidence of baptism in the Spirit.

First-generation Pentecostals saw the Pentecostal movement as a revival with distinctive characteristics. It was the latter rain, a downpour of Holy Spirit in the last days before the parousia, comparable in power only to the spring rain of the New Testament church. It was the full gospel, completing the restoration of the gospel established by the Reformation and furthered by Wesleyan sanctification.* It was the "foursquare gospel", manifesting Jesus as Saviour, Healer, Baptizer in the Holy Spirit, and Coming King. It was the apostolic faith, identical with the supernatural faith of the first Christians. It was Pentecostal, because in baptism in the Spirit each believer experiences a personal Pentecost, with God restoring the divine endowments of the church poured out at Pentecost* but lost through later apostasy and unbelief. These terms have influenced the name of many Pentecostal denominations.

Most Pentecostal histories hold that the Pentecostal movement stems from the ministry of Charles Parham, around 1900-1901 in the US; he first linked baptism in the Spirit with glossolalia. The movement's explosion beyond a local Holiness revival in Kansas and Texas resulted from the multiracial Azusa Street revival in Los Angeles, 1906-1909, under the black pastor William J. Seymour. Further impetus came from Parham's mission in Zion City, Illinois, in late 1906. Within two years of the Azusa Street outbreak, the Pentecostal movement had centres throughout the US, in many northern European countries, in India and China, and in West and South Africa. The following years saw its establishment in Latin America, especially in Brazil and Chile, and more missions in Africa and Asia.

The Pentecostal movement initially had a strong eschatological orientation (see eschatology). It emphasized that Pentecost had to be preached throughout the world before the imminent return of the Lord. Many Evangelicals denounced the Pentecostal movement for unbridled emotionalism, spiritual deception and the subordination of scripture to experience. Strongest opposition was from among Holiness groups. They had been a matrix for Pentecostal concepts and provided most Pentecostal recruits in North America and Europe.

Despite this Evangelical rejection, the Pentecostal movement in America and Europe adopted conservative Evangelical doctrine, pre-millennial eschatology and a fundamentalist approach to biblical exegesis. In the USA this process was cemented by white Pentecostal membership in the National Association of Evangelicals, from its founding in 1943.

The Pentecostal movement's rapid spread led to the formation of Pentecostal denominations and independent ministries. We can distinguish four categories: (1) Holiness churches which add baptism in the Spirit as a third blessing after regeneration and sanctification, e.g. the black Church of God in Christ (1907), the Church of God of Cleveland, Tennessee (1907) and the Pentecostal Holiness Church (1911); (2) two-stage Pentecostals, mostly from a Reformed background, who profess baptism in the Spirit as a "second blessing", e.g. the Assemblies of God (1914), the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada (1919); (3) the Oneness Church, which rejects the Trinity,* affirms a modalist Christology, and baptizes only in Jesus' name, e.g. the United Pentecostal Church (origins in 1914, formed in 1945); and (4) churches which restore the offices of apostle and prophet on the basis of Eph. 4:11, e.g. the Apostolic Church (1918).

Other major figures in the Pentecostal movement were Lewi Pethrus of Sweden, who strongly defended the autonomy of each assembly; Smith Wigglesworth, an itinerant British evangelist; Aimee Semple McPherson, American evangelist; Donald Gee, British educator; and Nicholas Bhengu, an African prophet. Missionary heroes include the American Lillian Trasher in Egypt, the Swedes Daniel Berg and Gunnar Vingren in Brazil, the Canadian C. Austin Chawner in Mozambique, and the English William Burton and James Salter in the Congo.

The Pentecostal movement has flourished among the poor and uneducated (hence the title of R.M. Anderson's study Vision of the Disinherited). It appeals through its oral-gestural character, involving less conceptual forms of communication, such as hand-clapping, raised arms, dance, visions, dreams and prophecy, and through its participatory patterns, which characterize especially the earliest phases of the movement. Consequently, Pentecostal churches begin as bodies of fervent believers who exalt spiritual experience and wisdom over formal education. Bible colleges and educational institutions have followed only in the third and fourth generations.

The Pentecostal movement has spread rapidly in the third world, faster in the indigenous churches than in those controlled by foreign mission boards. In Latin America, Pentecostals now account for 80% of the Protestants, far outstripping the numbers in older Protestant missions and churches. Worldwide Pentecostals now number more than 150 million Christians. The largest family of churches is the Assemblies of God.*

The first Pentecostal world conference* was held at Zurich in 1947, the second in Paris in 1949. These early conferences saw fierce opposition to attempts to form a representative body that could speak for the entire Pentecostal movement. Now held every three years, they are largely celebratory occasions which centre on worship, testimonies and inspirational preaching, without any forum for public debate.

Pentecostals have generally been hostile to the ecumenical movement, which they perceive as embracing the apostate and stigmatize as merely human efforts to organize institutional unity. This opposition has been less marked in the third world, with two Chilean Pentecostal churches joining the WCC in 1961, followed in 1969 by the larger "O Brasil para Cristo" church of Manoel de Mello. The vision of baptism in the Spirit promoting Christian unity inspired some early Pentecostals. It had been kept alive especially by David Du Plessis (d.1987; see charism(ata)). He attended all the WCC assemblies from Evanston to Vancouver and laboured to gain official denominational support for the international Pentecostal-Roman Catholic dialogue.* An international Reformed-Pentecostal dialogue took place between 1996 and 2000 leading to a report “Word and Spirit, Church and World”.

Local theological dialogues involving Pentecostals have taken place in Finland, the Netherlands and South Africa. Some American Pentecostal scholars have participated in the Faith and Order* study on the apostolic faith and reflect those more open attitudes which are developing within the Society for Pentecostal Studies, formed in 1971. The Pentecostal movement today faces the dilemma of how to be less sectarian without becoming too cerebral and thus losing its power and appeal.

PETER HOCKEN

■ S.M. Burgess & G.B. McGee eds, Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, Grand Rapids MI, Zondervan, 1996 ■ H. Cox, Fire from Heaven: The Rise of Pentecostal Spirituality and the Reshaping of Religion in the Twenty-First Century, London, Cassell, 1996 ■ D. Dayton, Theological Roots of Pentecostalism, Metuchen NJ, Scarecrow, 1987 ■ W.J. Hollenweger, Pentecostalism, Peabody MA, Hendrickson, 1997 ■ W.J. Hollenweger, The Pentecostals, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1972 ■ OC, 23, 1-2, 1987 ■ C.M. Robeck, A Collection of Pentecostal Writings on Ecumenical Issues, Pasadena CA, Robeck, 2000 ■ C.M. Robeck, “Pentecostals and Ecumenism in a Pluralistic World”, in The Globalization of Pentecostalism, M. Dampster et al. eds, Oxford, Regnum, 1999.

PEOPLE

THE TERM “people” is an elusive word with different meanings and connotations in its various historical, linguistic, national, cultural and ideological settings. Theologically, it is significant in the ecclesiological use as “people of God”,* in the biblical references to people and also in the modern social, economic and ideological meanings and connotations.

The biblical vocabulary presents some problems. The two basic Hebrew terms, ‘am and goy (plural goyim), usually translated “people” and “nation” respectively, are sometimes used interchangeably, but as a rule the former designates relations of consanguinity (family and extended family). Goy, however, usually designates land and political organization. The two terms are applied both to Israel and to other peoples, but the first is preferred for Israel, whereas goy(im) is more used for the other nations. The word ‘am is used in many composite names with the name of God, while goy is not used in this way. In this sense we could say that Israel is a “people” that becomes a “nation”, although we cannot rigidly separate these two dimensions of Israel’s life and calling (see land). Variations, however, also include social conditions within Israel. Perhaps the most interesting is the expression ‘am ha ’erets (the people of the land), which in pre-exilic times designates either “the men” or more frequently the higher sectors of society (landowners, authorities) and after the exile is used for the non-Jewish (e.g. Samaritans) living within or around the borders of the returned exiles. Finally, by extension, the phrase designates in the times of Jesus “the people who do not know (or do not observe) the law”, the despised “multitudes”, for whom Jesus felt compassion.

The New Testament vocabulary is also complex. Laos is used in at least four ways: as a number of peoples without any definite identity, as a specific people having definite particularities, as “the common people” over against the rulers or the “upper classes” and as “the chosen people”, the eschatological community, the people of the covenant.* Luke seems to prefer the popular meaning (as crowd or population), while Pauline literature leans to the figurative meaning (the Christian community). In this connection it is interesting to note the use of ochlos (usually translated “crowd”), which, with some exceptions, the gospels use for “the common people” who came to Jesus, those despised by the higher classes and the religious authorities, a term almost synonymous with ‘am ha ’erets.

Even this cursory review points to at least three significant theological issues: (1) the relation of people to God, which appears in different linguistic constructions and finally becomes a technical term, “people of God”; (2) the “internal” constitution of the people, i.e. the relation between the different sectors of the people – full citizens, leaders, common people – and the relation between people in consanguineous relations and as structured in a political body; and, finally, (3) the relation between “the people” (Israel, the church) and the other peoples (“the nations”, Greek ta ethnē).

ECUMENICAL USAGE BEFORE THE SECOND WORLD WAR

The notion of people appeared in missionary discussions about “the religions of the peoples”, usually posed in terms of the relation between the revelation in Jesus Christ and the non-Christian religions (see revelation, mission). The issue has re-appeared lately as part of the claims of marginalized peoples (native populations, black) or traditional cultures to recover their own cultural identity, including their religious symbols and traditions.

A more direct challenge for the ecumenical movement was the ideological use of the concept of people by totalitarian movements such as fascism* and Nazism. Extraordinary claims for a particular people are not new. However, the ideology of “pan-Germanism” with all its political connotations, developed in Romanticism and incorporated in different organizations and associations since the last decades of the 19th century, assumed political and religious proportions that presented the church with an unavoidable challenge. The Oxford conference (1937; see ecumenical conferences) was partly dominated by the need to respond. The problems involved three inter-related issues. First, by identifying people and nation, the mystical attributes related to the Volk (in its romantic and even some pietistic tendencies) were transferred to the political ambitions, policies and decisions of the state. Second, since this Volk was also considered a superior race (a myth of consanguinity and soil, Blut und Boden), the idea of “purity of the people” fostered ethnic persecution (see e.g. anti-semitism). Third, a certain “revelational” and even “salvific” significance is attached to people, a claim that goes from the extremes of elevating a supposedly original Germanic religion to the rank of exclusive and superior revelation and rejecting Christianity as a corruption (Alfred Rosenberg), through degrees of identification of Christianity with this Germanic religion to more modest claims of some special and unique identity and role for the German (or Germanic) people.

The issue engaged both Edinburgh 1937 and Oxford 1937. The Oxford statements address the three issues mentioned above: a totalitarianism that denies “the sovereignty of Christ and the freedom of the church”, the persecution of minorities on the basis of race and colour and “the deification of one’s own people”, which is “a sin against God”. This last point could only be understood as a response to an affirmation of Theodor Heckel early in 1937, stating positively that “fundamentally National Socialism is the Volk. At its heart is the unique life-style of the (biologically) homogeneous Volk and its rich store of creative values.”

Beyond these more specific declarations, the quest for a social and political ethics based on the notions of justice and freedom, “a responsible society”, can be understood as an attempt to build, on a Christological basis, a response to the challenge of totalitarianism. The relation between the Confessing Church* and the WCC was strengthened during the war and led to actions like the Stuttgart declaration.* The warning against the dangers of a “people’s ideology” led the WCC and many member churches in the 1940s and 1950s to a definite mistrust of all nationalist claims, which is reflected even in the names for the churches that avoid genitives of the land, preferring forms like “church in...” and other more neutral expressions.

THIRD-WORLD CONTRIBUTIONS

With the participation of third-world churches, a different perspective appeared on questions of “people” and “nationalism”. Peoples that had just gained their independence or who were in the midst of liberation struggles against colonial or neo-colonial domination saw their commitment to the nation as a legitimate expression of a Christian’s commitment to justice and freedom (see decolonization, nation). “People” here gains a positive meaning. Moreover, mainly in Asia and Latin America, where local economic and political minorities or military regimes, frequently allied to foreign interests, held control, the struggle for emancipation brought the people – now in the social sense of the common people, the poor,* the peasants – against the power elites. Governments in Asia and Latin America, reacting to the restiveness of growing populations, became totalitarian and mercilessly curtailed civil liberties and violated the human rights of their peoples. As a consequence, people’s movements erupted all over Asia and Latin America, and the more perceptive elements of the churches stood in solidarity with the people and took up their cause. Their sufferings are perceived as a powerful cry to the God of justice, who, in mysterious ways, introduces a dynamics in history which judges, liberates and transforms society as a whole.

In secular history, the visible initiator and bearer of this historical dynamics is the people. People, therefore, are not the objects of history but the subjects of their own history. God is perceived as being genuinely incarnate in people's struggles for justice* and humanity because justice belongs to the very nature of God. But God's identification with the poor, the oppressed and all victims of injustice is not because of some ontological or ethical quality of goodness which the people possess but because of their actual historical condition as victims of injustice. Such an understanding of "people" holds enormous revolutionary potential, and the most articulate practitioners have been involved in different kinds of movements for socio-political transformation. A good number have been incarcerated, tortured and murdered because their thought and action are perceived to be subversive of the interests of the state. In such contexts ancient creeds and primeval symbols once more become energizing and inspiring.

This struggle has made possible a new exploration of the biblical, theological and political dimensions of the concept of people. Asian theologians point out that the Bible itself enshrines this understanding of people. Biblical scholarship indicates that the people of God referred to in the Bible was not a single tribe but a motley group of marginalized, powerless, disfranchised people who were bound together by a common experience of oppression and injustice, and by a common yearning for justice and freedom (N. Gottwald, Tribes of Jahweh, 1979). The OT prophets confronted tyrannical rulers and corrupt wielders of religious authority with God's judgment. In much of the NT, Jesus is portrayed as an iconoclast who champions the cause of the poor, the powerless, the oppressed. He associated himself with the poor, prostitutes, drunkards, the sick – a segment of society that the official theology of the time considered outside the pale of God's kingdom. For Jesus there is a linkage between the people and the kingdom of God,* and this linkage is the focus of many Asian theologians today.

The Christian Conference of Asia* has organized a number of consultations and seminars to explore systematically the implications of a people-centred theology in the areas of Christology, ecclesiology and soteriology. A new openness has emerged towards such groups, seen as being of a piece with the Body of Christ. And soteriology is being given a socio-political dimension, in which a person's liberation is linked with his or her actual solidarity with the poor and oppressed. Such theologians do not romanticize people, for they know only too well that people can and do embrace false values, can be swallowed up by the psyche of the mob and can give rise to and follow demagogues; but as victims of injustice, they yearn for God's justice and righteousness. In other words, the theological understanding of people is consistent with the theology of grace which runs through mainline theological thought: people are the bearers of God's grace* because as victims of injustice they are the ones God seeks to be in solidarity with. And God does not merely liberate people from injustice; God also seeks to express God's image in them, to transform them and make them agents of God's liberating grace.

While there is substantial agreement among third-world theologians and communities on this understanding of people, the various social, political, cultural and religious differences lead to different emphases. In Latin America in the 1960s and 1970s, the concept of people received mainly a social, economic and political connotation, defined by three concentric circles: (1) the poor and oppressed, the marginalized majorities (peasants, workers, sub-proletariat); (2) those who become aware of themselves and their condition and assume the cause of their liberation (who could be seen as an avant-garde or a force within the larger poor population); and (3) those who, without belonging to the marginal, make an option for them and unite themselves with them in their historical pilgrimage. The idea that the people, in this sense, belong by right to the "people of God" is not theologically problematic, since these majorities are almost totally Christian (see church base communities; theology, liberation).

In two points, however, corrections to thinking have been necessary. In the first place, the experience of participation in the life of this people led theologians to realize the importance of ethnic and cultural factors in the self-understanding of the people and the meaning of such factors in the struggles for liberation. Culture and race could not be seen as a secondary or peripheral dimension but as belonging together with the social and economic condition for any significant understanding of people. Culture, tradition and ethnic belonging are inseparable from religion, particularly among native and black populations.

Second, in Asia and Africa it has become clear that these dimensions have been prominent from the beginning. In Asia the theological efforts to recover and re-read the religious and cultural tradition, as expressed in folklore, dance, language, customs and gestures (see culture), can be seen in much theological production in India, Korea (see theology, minjung) and the Philippines. The biographies and stories of the people are one of the main sources from which theology must be derived. Thus, the people are seen not as recipients of a theology elaborated elsewhere but as the subject of theology. In Latin America, Bible reading in the church base community takes this character of theological reflection, a hermeneutics* born from the experience of the people in contact with the biblical text.

CURRENT ECUMENICAL INITIATIVES

Several WCC programmes focus on the role, the condition and the struggles of "the people", particularly in the meaning indicated in the preceding paragraphs. At the political level, the defence of human rights,* the Programme to Combat Racism* and the support of land rights claims of native populations are all part of the people's struggles. The Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development programme of the church in solidarity with the poor and the work of the sub-commission on rural and industrial mission have related to people's movements. In 1985 the Programme on Theological Education organized a consultation in Mexico on theology by the people. The concern was twofold: to seek new ways of doing theology in community, and to see that an active commitment to justice and peace become an integral concern of the theological enterprise. Though the consultation was very much aware of theological (as well as political) dangers present in an uncritical populism, and though attention was called to the need for a certain distancing in any rigorous reflection, it strongly affirmed a theology that positively recognizes and assumes its organic relation to the people and the historical and cultural conditions which, frequently unacknowledged (and therefore uncritically incorporated), are present in all theological work.

CYRIS MOON and LEVI V. ORACIÓN

- S. Amirtham & J. Pobee eds, Theology by the People, WCC, 1986
- K.Y. Bock ed., Minjung Theology: People as the Subjects of History, Singapore, CTC-CCA, 1981
- K.Y. Bock ed., Towards the Sovereignty of the People, Singapore, CTC-CCA, 1983
- G. Castillo-Cardenas, Liberation Theology from Below, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1987
- I.M. Fraser, Reinventing Theology as the People's Work, Madurai, Unemployed Young People's Assoc., 1985
- G. Mathew ed., Struggling with People Is Living with Christ, Hong Kong, CCA, 1981.

PEOPLE OF GOD

IN THE OLD Testament, "people of God" designates the calling and mission of Israel as the people chosen by God from among all the peoples (Ex. 6:7 etc.). In the New Testament the term describes the self-understanding of the Christian community (1 Pet. 2:9), which is the "true" people of God of the end times, founded by the self-offering of Christ and united by the Spirit of God. Through faith* in Christ and baptism* into him, Israel and all peoples are made into the one new people of God, which takes concrete form in the local church. This claim of the primitive Christian community raised the problem of the respective places of Israel and the church* in the history of salvation (see salvation history), which already in the patristic literature was reduced to a metaphoric opposition between Israel as the prototype of infidelity and sin* and the church as the prototype of salvation* (see Israel and the church). As a result of the Jewish-Christian dialogue,* a growing number of theologians today affirm that God remains faithful to Israel and keeps the covenant with his chosen people.

In the 20th century the biblical term received fresh attention as part of the renewal of ecclesiology. The way was prepared by exegetical studies and by a more general shift in the approach to ecclesiology, involving now also the historical character of the church and the role of Christology and eschatology. At Vatican II* “people of God” appears in Lumen Gentium as a second central concept in ecclesiology alongside “sacrament” (i.e. the church as a sign and instrument of salvation; LG 9-17). The category there serves as a basis for the unity of laity* and clergy in the church as the one messianic people of God. Towards humankind as a whole, which is the people of God in the broadest sense and diversely related to the church, the church acts as the sign and the instrument of salvation and unity.* The existence of the church is determined by the hope that all humankind may be integrated into the messianic people; until this unity is finally achieved, the church’s existence remains a “pro-existence”, i.e. for the sake of the world. The church moves towards this consummation as the pilgrim people of God. Within the Roman Catholic Church, the formulations of LG were particularly taken up by liberation theology and linked with the idea of a “people’s church”. The church as the people of God goes hand in hand with the acquisition of (political) peoplehood by oppressed social groups.

In ecumenical work on ecclesiological questions, “people of God” has likewise been adopted as an image of the church. In Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* (1982), the understanding of ministry is developed on the basis of the opening declaration that “God calls the whole of humanity to become God’s people” (M1). The mission* of the church to proclaim the kingdom of God* in the world is founded on this calling (M1-4; see also the final “perspectives on ecclesiology” in BEM, 1982-1990). In The Nature and Purpose of the Church (interim report, 1998), the church, as the people of God, “continues the way of pilgrimage to the eternal rest prepared for it (Heb. 4:9-11)”; it is “a prophetic sign of the fulfilment God will bring about through Christ by the power of the Spirit” (31).

In comparison with other descriptions of the church, “people of God” has the following advantages as an ecclesiological image. It does not allow the nature of the church to be separated from its concrete historical form. The nature of the church is determined by its relation to the kingdom of God. As the people called by God, the church lives under God’s direction until the kingdom comes. At the same time, the church plays a part in the history of salvation by acting, in faithfulness to its vocation,* as a sign of hope in every particular situation. The image of the people of God presupposes the active participation of all members of the church, while also pointing to the unity of the church and finally of all humankind. Besides the danger of a politicization of the concept (which is present in liberation theology), other open questions remain in connection with the Jewish-Christian dialogue and the dialogue with other living religions (see dialogue, interfaith), as well as in the matter of the concrete structures required by the church in fulfilment of its calling.

See also images of the church; laity/clergy; ministry in the church; people; theology, liberation.

URSULA SCHOEN-GIESEKE

- BEM 1982-1990: Report on the Process and Responses, WCC, 1990
- L. Boff, E a Igreja sa fez povo (partial ET Ecclesiogenesis, Maryknoll NY, Orbis 1986)
- E. Käsemann, Das wandernde Gottesvolk (ET The Wandering People of God, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1984)
- M. Keller, Volk Gottes als Kirchenbegriff, Zurich, Benziger, 1970
- G. Lindbeck, “The Church”, in Keeping the Faith, G. Wainwright ed., Philadelphia, Fortress, 1988
- People of God, People of Nations, Geneva, LWF, 1993.

PERSON

THE LATIN word for person, persona, probably derives from the Greek prosōpon, which refers to the mask an actor wore in the theatre. Both the Latin and Greek words for person were associated with the role one took upon oneself either as a part of the Greek theatre or as a member of the Roman state. In neither case was the concept of a person determinative of the essence of someone (i.e. who one really is), a concept expressed in Greek as hypostasis, and in Latin as substantia.

The notion of person has a crucial place within early Christian Trinitarian and Christological discussions. These early debates sought formulations which would witness to the church's confession of biblical monotheism as well as the divinity of the Son and the Spirit. Yet one of the results of the early debates and councils was that the concept of person no longer simply meant the role one takes but now indicated one's being, one's essence. Exactly how this change took place is not actually clear; however, it was the arguments within Eastern and Western churches concerning the relation of the Father, Son and Spirit which brought the notion of person to the centre.

The church in the East and the West realized that the central challenge was to speak of God* in a way as to respect both the divine unity or oneness and the eternal expressions of God as Father, Son and Spirit. Eventually, the church agreed that the most appropriate formulations would have to affirm that God is one divine reality in three eternal manifestations. Western theological formulations, following the lead of Tertullian and the suggestions of Augustine, spoke of God as one substance or essence in three persons, una substantia, tres personae (Tertullian, Against Praxeas, 11-12; Augustine, On the Trinity, books 1-7). In basic agreement with the West, the East, following the Cappadocian fathers, spoke of God as one divine nature or being, mia physis, or ousia, in three persons, treis hypostaseis (Basil, Letter 38, 2). Unfortunately, some terminological confusion resulted from the fact that the East used hypostasis for what is three, while the West used substantia for what is one (and persona for what is three).

By using the concept of person (hypostasis or persona), the church was able to affirm that God is not the sum of three divine parts; rather God is Father, Son and Spirit, indicative of one essence. Yet the use of "person" also revealed a subtle but crucial difference between Eastern and Western theological formulations. This difference stems not from any overarching theological dispute between East and West but from perceived theological dangers within their somewhat different philosophical contexts.

In fear of tritheism, the West placed emphasis on the unity of the Father, Son and Spirit in the divine essence. It was better to think of God first as one essence in three persons, because everything that can be said of God can be said equally of Father, Son and Spirit. "Person" was therefore basically a limiting term which prohibited the exchange of divine names (e.g. the Son is not the Father, etc.).

Attempting to rework Aristotelian and Neo-platonic categories, the East placed emphasis on the unity of the Father, Son and Spirit in the person of the Father. It was better to think of God as the Father, who is the source of the Son by generation and of the Spirit by spiration, because there is no naked divine substance which exists without the divine persons. This meant that "person" was fundamentally a positive term which constitutes the divine nature or essence. The divine nature consists in the fact that God is the persons of Father, Son and Spirit in communion.

This subtle difference in the use of "person" meant that the West was able to guard itself more carefully than the East against any accusations of tritheism. Western theologians were able to say that it was the relations of Father, Son and Spirit in the divine essence which made them persons. Thus the divine persons were defined as three relationally distinct ways of existing in one essence (Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae, 1a.29.4). While the East was in basic agreement with the West that the divine persons are constituted by their relationships, the West was unable to grasp the break the East had made with the general doctrines of essence or substance. Such a break meant that the divine essence does not precede but is constituted by the Father's begetting of the Son and sending forth the Spirit. As John Zizioulas states, God is Trinity "because the Father as a person freely wills this communion" (44).

PERSON AND INDIVIDUALISM

Western theologians, for the most part, have been more uncomfortable than their Eastern counterparts with the notion of person. The West perceived the notion as inadequate because, even with the important qualifications, it was difficult to see how the divine persons could suggest real relations without also suggesting three distinct beings. The danger of God's being thought of as three distinct beings was based not only on the continuing acceptance of substance-essence categories but also on the acceptance, in some measure, of the Boethian definition of person, which placed incommunicability, substantiality, and intellectuality as fundamental to being a person (Boethius, Treatise against Eutyches and Nestorius, 3; see Fortman, 161ff.).

The idea of person was made more problematic with the addition of the attributes of personality and self-consciousness. With the inclusion of these attributes, added during the Enlightenment, most Western theologians now saw the notion of person as an obstacle to be overcome in elaborating the doctrine of the Trinity as well as in explaining the relation of God as person to the human person (Barth, 35ff.). If a person could be defined as a self-conscious individual with intrinsic rights who was able to reason and pursue the perceived good, then God could not actually be three persons (but possibly was one person).

Theological reflection in the West has had to contend with the ideology of individualism, which defines the person according to essential attributes and rights. Such persons are the building blocks of community and society, and thus the protection of the wills and rights of the individual becomes our greatest task. Against this perspective, some theological circles in the West have attempted to return to the Trinitarian persons and their relations as the basis upon which we understand ourselves as persons. Thus Walter Kasper has argued that persons are defined not by their individual essence or attributes but by their relationships (285ff.; cf. Hill).

Although this return in the West to the doctrine of the Trinity* signals an attempt to overcome "substance" definitions of personhood, the West has still not fully appreciated the break Eastern theologians have made with essence-substance presuppositions. It was the necessity that Father, Son and Spirit fully partake in the non-corporeal divine essence that was overturned by the Eastern theologians (Zizioulas, 40ff.; cf. Lossky, 111ff.).

Eastern theologians have wanted to push the West beyond simply saying that "God is not a substance because God's existence is prior to God's essence", towards seeing that God as the person of the Father (who in love begets the Son and sends forth the Spirit) constitutes God's essence. Thus the movement of the persons towards each other in love is the mode of God's existence (Zizioulas, 46). For the East, individualism can be overcome only by overcoming the notions of divine or human essences applied to the idea of person.

PERSON AND CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY

Theologians in the East and West recognize that the Trinitarian concept of person should serve as the basis of our definitions of personhood. They also recognize that to understand fully what it means to be a person, one must enter into communion* with the Triune God through the sacramental life of the church.* In and through the life of the church, we partake in the divine life in which the Son by the Spirit turns us towards the Father. The church must stress that in Jesus Christ we enter into a new understanding of personhood. We are persons not because of any essential national, racial or biological necessities but because we live in response to the love of God. The church accordingly must remember that true unity and healthy human community take place only as we enter into fellowship with the Triune God (John 17).

See also anthropology, theological.

WILLIE J. JENNINGS

- K. Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik (ET Church Dogmatics, V/1, Edinburgh, Clark, 1936) ■ E.J. Fortman, The Triune God: A Historical Study of the Doctrine of the Trinity, Grand Rapids MI, Baker, 1972 ■ W.H. Hill, The Three-personed God, Washington DC, Catholic Univ. of America Press, 1982 ■ W. Kasper, Der Gott Jesu Christi (ET The God of Jesus Christ, New York, Crossroad, 1986) ■ C.M. LaCugna, God for Us: The Trinity and Christian Life, San Francisco, Harper, 1993 ■ V. Lossky, A l'image et à la ressemblance de Dieu (ET In the Image and Likeness of God, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1974) ■ A.J. Torrance, Persons in Communion: Trinitarian Description and Human Participation, Edinburgh, Clark, 1996 ■ T.G. Weinandy, The Father's Spirit of Sonship: Reconceiving the Trinity, Edinburgh, Clark, 1996 ■ J.D. Zizioulas, Being as Communion: Studies in Personhood and the Church, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1985.

PLURALISM

PLURALISM has engaged the attention of philosopher William James (A Pluralistic Universe, 1909), who argued against monistic metaphysical systems in defence of the multiformity of nature,* and of political scientists who have contended for a diversity of social organization over against the monopoly of an absolute state. Ecumenically, pluralism became an issue at a comparatively late stage. While some at the first Life and Work* conference (Stockholm 1925) saw in the League of Nations the potential nucleus of a worldwide Christian commonwealth, by the time of the Oxford Life and Work conference (1937), the tune had changed, in view of the threat the forces of neo-paganism posed to any unified Christian culture.

Secularization* and the renaissance of cultural and social diversity demonstrated two things. First, the ideal of a monolithic corpus Christianum and its attendant privileges had to be abandoned. Christians were becoming a minority in the world, and in any case "return" to an integrated Christian commonwealth made no sense for non-Western churches, which had never had a share in the authority of Western Christendom. Within the Roman Catholic Church, Vatican II* emphasized the recognition of a universal plurality, replacing compulsion by intellectual and political freedom.

Second, ecumenical discussion of the issue should recognize a distinction between existing plurality and pluralism (in the sense of diversity as a value in itself). It should avoid the extremes of exclusiveness (ignoring plurality in order not to succumb to pluralism) and inclusiveness (transferring the fact of plurality into pluralism), for neither does justice to the need for peaceful relations in the "global village" and the right of people to freely live a meaningful life in society. In common usage, however, the terms "plurality" and "pluralism" are interchangeable.

The ecumenical movement has pioneered in demonstrating that an approximation to Christian unity* is possible with converging church structures and theological traditions alongside continuing diversity of theological reflection and plurality of life-styles. Plurality of theological perspectives has vastly increased with the emergence of third-world and feminist theologies. As Christian cooperation transcends historical frontiers, the question inevitably arises whether similar processes are possible within the plurality of religions in the world. On the whole, the ecumenical movement has refused to countenance an introverted and exclusivist Christianity which ignores the existing plurality of religions and ideologies, while not endorsing the pluralist view that all religions are so many paths to one divine reality (see uniqueness of Christ, theology of religions).

As new channels of dialogue between people of different faiths open up (see dialogue, interfaith), many ecumenically initiated, the relevance of an enlightened understanding of religious plurality becomes clearer. Respect for and cooperation with others can disclose commonalities among people of different faiths. What is held in common serves as a basis for understanding what is different, and vice versa. The freedom for worship which one group expects must be granted to others. One of the outstanding ecumenical tasks is thus to articulate a Christian theology of religion* which can promote and undergird a responsible dialogue with people of different faiths. A number of attempts are being made to work out fresh approaches to such a theology, and the WCC's sub-unit dealing with dialogue has significantly contributed to it. In 1984 the sub-unit organized a Jewish-Christian conference on "The Meaning and Limits of Religious Pluralism in the World Today". The topic has since also been dealt with in dialogues with Hindus, Buddhists and Muslims. In January 1990 the sub-unit brought together in Baar, Switzerland, an ecumenical group of prominent theologians from Protestant, RC and Orthodox churches to explore the basic issues of religious plurality. The Lutheran World Federation* convened a similar meeting in 1986.

Since 1990 the WCC inter-religious relations and dialogue team has continued to promote interfaith contacts, to analyze and monitor the role of religion in society, and to encourage theological reflection on religious plurality. A number of key consultations and publications have been central to this con-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

tinuing concern, including My Neighbour's Faith and Mine: A Study Guide (1986), "Teaching Christianity in Dialogue with Other Faith Traditions" (Geneva 2000), "Women and Religious Education and Instruction" (Mülheim 1999), "Anti-semitism in Church and Society" (Warsaw 1999) and "Religious Freedom, Community Rights and Individual Rights: A Christian-Muslim Perspective" (Hartford CT 1999).

HANS GENSICHEN

- C. Braaten, "Who Do We Say That He Is?", Occasional Bulletin of Missionary Research, 4, 1980 ■ S. Bruce, Religion in the Modern World: From Cathedrals to Cults, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1996 ■ W. Brueggemann & G.W. Stroup eds, Many Voices, One God: Being Faithful in a Pluralistic World, Louisville KY, Westminster John Knox, 1998 ■ H. Coward, Pluralism: Challenge to World Religions, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1985 ■ J. Dupuis, Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1997 ■ C. Gillis, Pluralism: A New Paradigm for Theology, Louvain-la-Neuve, Faculté de Théologie, 1993 ■ J. Hick, "Religious Pluralism", in Encyclopedia of Religion, 12, New York, Macmillan, 1987 ■ K. Koyama, "A Theological Reflection on Religious Pluralism", ER, 51, 2, 1999 ■ "Local Congregations in Pluralistic Societies" (= IRM, 85, 337, 1996) ■ L. Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society, WCC, 1989 ■ J.P. Rajashekar, Pluralism and Lutheran Theology, Geneva, LWF, 1988 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, "Pluralism - Temptation or Opportunity?", ER, 18, 1966 ■ P.L. Wickeri ed., The People of God among All God's Peoples: Frontiers in Christian Mission, Hong Kong/London, CCA/CWM, 2000 ■ P.L. Wickeri, J.K. Wickeri & D.M.A. Niles eds, Plurality, Power and Mission, London, CWM, 2000.

POLYGAMY

POLYGAMY is the practice of a plural marriage in which there is more than one spouse simultaneously. It includes polyandry (one woman married to more than one man) and polygyny (one man married to more than one woman). One can also speak of "serial polygamy", or marital relations with a person besides one's first spouse. Here (and customarily) "polygamy" has the sense of polygyny.

From fairly early in its history, Christianity taught that monogamy is the paradigm of marriage. That history was in part shaped by Graeco-Roman culture, including the influence of Roman law at several points: consent is essential for marriage; its purpose is procreation; impediments to marriage include impotence, consanguinity and disparity of cult. The idea that marriage is indissoluble and monogamous probably owes something to the Graeco-Roman traditional pagan "religion of the hearth". The indebtedness to this tradition was well articulated by Augustine when he wrote: "Now indeed in our time, and in keeping with Roman customs, it is no longer allowed to take another wife, so as to have more than one wife living" (The Advantage of Marriage 7). He also deduced views of marriage from the New Testament, where marriage acquires sacramental significance (21).

The missionary church took this Romanized understanding of marriage, including a negative view of polygamy, to the ends of the earth. On the few occasions polygamy was tolerated, it was because, as Pope Gregory II wrote in 726 to Boniface, missionary to the Germanic peoples of northern Europe, the people lacked "high ideals" or because it was expedient to wean primitive people gradually from their rude practices.

In those earlier times polygamy was not discussed as a missionary and pastoral problem but was always debated in apologetic and theoretical terms, especially trying to deal with the embarrassing fact that many of the Old Testament patriarchs had more than one wife. Against this background the council of Trent* condemned the pastoral proposals of the 16th-century reformers Martin Luther and Philipp Melancthon, who justified the polygamous marriages of Henry VIII of England and Philip of Hesse.

When Roman Catholic missionaries went to Africa, they demanded that polygamists divorce all but one of their wives, thereby inflicting great pain on wives who had entered the relationship innocently before becoming Christian. This approach was based on Pope Paul III's constitution Altitudo (1537). In the 20th century Pope Pius XII went further in enunciating a canonical regulation by which the pope had the power to dissolve valid marriages between non-Christians, neither of whom intended to receive baptism.

Protestants have displayed a slightly more liberal attitude which includes several variations: (1) women and children may be baptized but not the polygamous husband; (2) the husband may be baptized if he divorces all wives but his first; (3) the husband may be baptized if he divorces all but his preferred wife; (4) the entire family may be baptized in clear understanding that subsequent plural marriages are forbidden; (5) on the testimony of their faith alone, anyone in a polygamous marriage may be baptized, with no further conditions. Polygamy has thus been seen as a missionary issue, though the seemingly liberal approach was tinged with an anthropology that left much to be desired, ethnocentrism and rather questionable exegeses of scripture.

The Anglican Lambeth conference of 1888, responding to the debate in Africa, especially in the diocese of Natal at the time of Bishop John Colenso, faced the matter directly. Only 21 of the 104 bishops were prepared to accept polygamists, and 34 opposed any concessions, even to the wives of polygamists. With some qualifications, it declared that "polygamy is inconsistent with the law of Christians concerning marriage". Only at the Lambeth conference of 1988 was the official position revised to allow polygamists to be received into the church, provided they promised not to take any more wives; they were not to be compelled to put away their wives. The consent of the local Anglican community was also to be sought (res. 26). Similarly, the Bremen mission, in its church rules for 1976, opted for monogamy as "the true marriage according to God" but still allowed the admission of polygamists to baptism* and communion* (para. 62).

Today African Instituted Churches,* a mark of buoyant Christian life in Africa, are divided over the issue of polygamy. The evidence suggests that the positive acceptance of polygamy by some of the AICs is a significant factor behind their growth. However, such churches have been excluded from ecumenical fellowship for presumably not upholding authentic Christian faith.

Several basic issues are at stake in the discussion of polygamy. First, should the law of monogamy become a criterion of Christian faith and a mark of the true church? There is room for debate. Second, whatever one's theological position on the issue, it must be in dialogue with the evidence from social scientists, lest the church's position become irrelevant and pastorally harmful. Third, it is important not to make a caricature of a particular people's marriage customs. Some have viewed polygamy as a sign of loose living, whereas in Africa, for example, social traditions have encased polygamous relationships in strict morality.

Two issues need separate responses: What should be done with a polygamist who desires to join the church? What should be done with a Christian who decides to become a polygamist for whatever reason? The first question is one of pastoral practice. Is it sensible for the church to refuse membership on grounds of polygamy when others who commit serious sins are not unchurched? The second question is the more difficult one of theology. Although churches have typically formulated laws against polygamy, it is worth asking here whether the law of the church equals the law of Christ.

See also anthropology, cultural.

JOHN S. POBEE

■ D.S. Bailey, The Man-Woman Relationship in Christian Thought, Toronto, Longman, 1959 ■

"The Committee of Churches of Dar es Salaam on the Government's Proposals for a Uniform Law of Marriage", Tanzania Standard, 28 Nov. 1969 ■ A. Hastings, Christian Marriage in Africa, London, SPCK, 1973 ■ E. Hillman, Polygamy Reconsidered, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1975.

PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR PROMOTING CHRISTIAN UNITY

In 1989 the PCPCU superseded the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity (SPCU), the title generally used in this volume. The SPCU originated as a preparatory organ of Vatican II,* then functioned as a Council drafting body, and since 1966 it has been the permanent office of the Roman curia* which deals with the pastoral promotion of the church's participation in the one ecumenical movement. In 1989 John Paul II made minor structural changes in his Roman curia, and the SPCU became a pontifical council.

John XXIII created the SPCU in 1960 to enable "those who bear the name of Christians but are separated from this apostolic see to find more easily the path by which they may arrive at that unity for which Christ prayed". The pope appointed Cardinal Augustine Bea (1881-1968) to be the SPCU president, and Johannes Willebrands (1909-) its secretary. After Bea's death, Willebrands was president until 1989, when Cardinal Edward I. Cassidy succeeded him. Cardinal Walter Kasper took over in 2001.

The SPCU began official contacts with leaders in the Anglican, Orthodox and Protestant churches. It evaluated their suggestions for the Vatican II themes and, as appropriate, used them for its own draft work or passed them on to other preparatory commissions. The SPCU negotiated with the world confessional bodies (e.g. the World Methodist Council) to delegate observers to the Council. By the end of its fourth session, 169 persons, including substitutes, had been officially delegated.

The SPCU was responsible for drafting four promulgated pastoral documents on ecumenism (see Decree on Ecumenism), on religious freedom, on the relation of the church to the non-Christian religions, and on divine revelation (co-drafted with the theological commission).

SPCU contacts with other Christian communions initiated the personal and organizational relations which in the period after Vatican II led to the active presence of SPCU-delegated observers at confessional and interconfessional gatherings and to a series of international bilateral dialogues. The SPCU has been co-sponsoring theological dialogues with the Lutheran World Federation (1965), the Anglican communion (1966), the World Methodist Council (1966), the Old Catholic Churches of the Union of Utrecht (1966), the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (1968), Pentecostals (1972), the Disciples of Christ (1977), the Orthodox church (1979), the Baptist World Alliance (1984), the World Evangelical Fellowship (1993), and the Mennonite World Conference (1998).

The first annual meeting of the Joint Working Group* between the RCC and the WCC was held in 1966. This group recommends to the parent bodies the agenda and means of collaboration in studies and action.

Since Vatican II the SPCU has been issuing norms and guidelines on specific topics. Of major import are its Ecumenical Directories* of 1967 and 1969, and the comprehensive, cohesive directory of 1993.

The PCPCU has two sections: the Eastern deals with the Orthodox churches of the Byzantine tradition and the Oriental Orthodox churches (Coptic, Syrian, Armenian, Ethiopian, Eritrean and Malankara), as well as the Assyrian Church of the East; the Western section is responsible for the Anglican and Protestant churches. The PCPCU is in liaison with other offices of the Roman curia with overlapping competencies, e.g. with the congregations for the doctrine of the faith, for the Eastern Catholic churches, for the evangelization of peoples, and with the pontifical council for justice and peace.

In 1968 the SPCU launched the independent Catholic Biblical Federation* and, with the United Bible Societies, co-authored guidelines for interconfessional cooperation in the translation and distribution of the Bible (1968, rev. ed. 1987).

In bearing the holy see's competence for Jewish religious concerns, the SPCU formed, with the International Jewish Committee for Interreligious Consultations, the Catholic/Jewish international liaison committee. In 1974 Paul VI set up the commission for religious relations with the Jews; its president is ex officio the PCPCU president. In 1975 the commission issued guidelines and suggestions for implementing Vatican II's statement on the Jews; in 1985, notes on the Catholic presentation of Jews and Judaism in preaching and catechesis; and in 1998, We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah.

TOM STRANSKY

■ SPCU, Information Service, Vatican City, three times a year in English and in French ■ "An Historical Sketch of the SPCU", in Doing the Truth in Charity: Vatican Ecumenical Documents, 1964-80, T. Stransky & J. Sheerin eds, New York, Paulist, 1982 ■ T. Stransky, "The Foundations of the SPCU", in Vatican II by Those Who Were There, A. Stapoole ed., London, Chapman, 1986.

POOR

THE ECUMENICAL concern for the poor during the decades after Amsterdam 1948 moved from an overview approach to becoming a pivot around which the dogmatic task as a whole might turn.

The concordance view. "The unequal distribution of the blessings of life is not ideal in the sight of God" (Westminster Dic- tionary of the Bible). Such a premise led to a lining up of biblical data for an overview of the poor. Usually the Mosaic law functioned as bedrock of the biblical notion of the poor, especially in regard to equality in ownership of the land. A Jubilee every 50 years seemed the proper recourse, ensuring that injustices accrued in land ownership would be corrected (Lev. 25:13-25). From here the wide range covered by these dynamics would be visible: widows, orphans and strangers in the land enjoy what we might call the protection privilege of the poor (e.g. Ps. 9:18). It is common knowledge that the prophets frequently speak up for the poor (e.g. Isa. 1:23; Mal. 3:5). Within this framework it seems obvious why Jesus shows special concern for the poor (Matt. 11:5; Luke 14:21-23) and why the early church was strongly committed to care for its own poor and also other poor. So everywhere in the Bible, the conclusion runs, the implication is that God wants us to help the poor.

The liberation view. With the 1968 Medellín* conference the ecumenical image of the poor changed. Now God was viewed as doing more than just expressing displeasure with the unequal distribution of material blessings. The poor were seen as a major agent in the working out of the divine purposes in history.* But it took an awakening of the church of an entire continent to give the poor so crucial a role. In the Medellín documents the Roman Catholic Church in Latin America discovered its inescapable solidarity* with the poor, so it could envision its future as the church of the poor protesting poverty.* The word "poor" now became less sentimental: "The 'poor' person today is the oppressed one, the one marginalized from society, the member of the proletariat struggling for... basic rights;... the exploited and plundered social class, the country struggling for its liberation" (Gustavo Gutiérrez).

The God of the poor. Since Medellín, Latin American theology has moved towards assessing the reality of God* itself in the light of the poor. In Jon Sobrino's terms: "The present history of the world is the ongoing history of the suffering of God." The theodicy question will therefore be answered in a new way (see suffering). Now theological discourse is more dialectical than analogical. In terms of the analogy of being, the divine was known more in terms of its likeness to created reality. Now the stress is on the unlikeness, for dialectical cognition knows things in their dissimilarity. The theological will here "be known... from its contrary, from the negative structures of reality, the structures of oppression as lived experience" (Victorio Araya). Encounter with God is thus mediated through oppression and injustice as these realities point to the utterly different, i.e. liberation,* life (see life and death) and justice.* Black theology and other minority theologies take this position.

The poor God. As the debate moves towards a new dogma of the character of God, we realize that ultimately God is known not in the sheer point/counterpoint of merely human discourse dialectics but in the work of Jesus manifest in the eucharist,* living the proclaimed word. In the body language of this life, God personally appears as despised and rejected by human beings, a refugee child, a rejected prophet, a crucified Messiah. Encounter with God is mediated through these very distinct negativities unlocking God's liberating struggle for justice in all of creation.

See also people; theology, liberation; theology, minjung.

FREDERICK HERZOG

- V. Araya, God of the Poor, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1987
- C. Boerma, The Poor Side of Europe, WCC, 1989
- J.H. Cone, Black Theology and Black Power, New York, Seabury, 1969
- G. Gutiérrez, Teología de la liberación (ET A Theology of Liberation), Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1973
- B.L. Myers, Walking with the Poor: Principles and Practices of Transformational Development, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1999.

POPULATION

THE WCC HAS addressed various issues related to global population growth since the late 1950s. In 1959, at the initiative of Richard M. Fagley of the WCC's Commission on International Affairs, the officers of the WCC and the International Missionary Council convened an international ecumenical study group on "Responsible Parenthood and the Population Problem" (Oxford 1959). As a result of the WCC study on "Christian Responsibility towards Areas of Rapid Social Change" (1955-62), Egbert de Vries calls attention in his book Man in Rapid Social Change (1961) to the population problems in Africa, Asia and "other areas of rapid social change" and mentions five critical features: the dramatic drop in death rates in the last decades, the absence of empty spaces into which excess population could move, the difficulty in achieving rapid increases of food supply in the short run, the lack of purchasing power to buy, in a large scale, imported food, and the cultural and social resistance to forms of family planning or other methods of birth control.

The fourth assembly in Uppsala (1968) was the first to directly address the challenge of the population question, pointing to the enormous task of providing food and housing for a population that was projected to double by the end of the century. At the same time it called on the churches to support the needed action and to resolve their differences about certain methods of population control.

In 1971 in the context of the ecumenical study of limits in growth, environment and use of resources, the central committee authorized an international study of the related problems of population policy, social justice and the quality of life. The result was received by the central committee in 1973 and was commended to the churches "for study, comment and suitable action".

In 1974 the WCC central committee submitted a report on "Population Policy, Social Justice and the Quality of Life" to the UN international conference on population held in Bucharest, Romania. The report called upon developed countries to reduce their wasteful consumption, assist developing countries with their growing populations and consider the impact population growth would have on their plans for economic development. The report recommended that state-sponsored population policies be "non-coercive", and it supported the right of parents to have access to the means of family planning that were "acceptable to them on conscience".

The WCC assemblies in Nairobi (1975) and Vancouver (1983) did not deal with population issues in substantial detail. The assembly in Canberra (1991), however, declared that member communions of the WCC can no longer "ignore the root causes of population growth which lie, more than in anything else, in the poverty and the lack of social security still prevailing in two thirds of the world".

Since Canberra, concern about population issues within the WCC has increased. A 1992 study document, "Christian Faith and the World Economy Today", re-affirmed the "important link between population growth on the one hand and poverty and inequality on the other hand". Another report was issued by the group on population and development at an ecumenical meeting held in conjunction with the earth summit in Rio de Janeiro in June 1992. The report stressed that the WCC should continue to view population policies within the larger context of sustainable development. It also emphasized "the rights of women to reproductive freedom and to the conditions which make choice possible and meaningful". The report encouraged WCC member churches to pressure governments "to provide adequate health care, safe reproductive options, education and other information" that enable responsible reproductive choices.

In 1994 the WCC sent a delegation to the UN international conference on population and development, held in Cairo, Egypt. After the conference, the WCC executive committee asked an international group of experts to prepare a discussion paper for member communions on population issues. The subsequent report, "Churches, Population and Development: Cairo and Beyond" (1996), referred primarily to the UN Programme of Action which was adopted in Cairo.

The 1996 discussion paper focused on four particular areas of concern. First, with regard to the environment, the paper criticized the failure of the conference "to outline any concrete measures that Northern governments should take to change unsustainable consumption and production patterns".

Second, it offered a substantial critique of the assumption that sustainable development requires sustainable economic growth. Instead, it offered an alternative conception of sustainable development rooted in the quest to develop "sustainable communities".

Third, the 1996 paper praised the new emphasis the Programme of Action placed on reproductive rights as the foundation for population policies. The paper asserted that "reproductive rights are understood to encompass the right to safe, effective contraception, safe legal abortion, safe, women-controlled pregnancy and childbirth, and access to infertility treatment and health services". (Many churches and Christians maintain a traditional opposition to abortion as a means of population control.)

Fourth, it noted the substantial emphasis the Programme of Action gives to migration issues. It called for the strengthening of "the substantial cooperation among churches and with intergovernmental agencies in responding to refugees, internally displaced persons and migrants".

JAMES B. MARTIN-SCHRAMM

■ Churches, Population and Development: Cairo and Beyond, WCC, 1996 ■ R.M. Fagley, The Population Explosion and Christian Responsibility, New York, Oxford UP, 1960 ■ J.B. Martin-Schramm, Population Perils and the Churches' Response, WCC, 1997 ■ Population Policy, Social Justice and the Quality of Life, WCC report to the UN third world population conference, 1974 ■ J.C. Schwarz, Global Population from a Catholic Perspective, Mystic CT, Twenty-Third Pubs, 1998.

PORVOO COMMUNION

THE PORVOO communion comprises those episcopally ordered churches of Northern Europe which are "in communion" by virtue of their approval of the 1992 Porvoo Declaration. As of 2000 these were the Anglican churches in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales; and the Lutheran churches in Estonia, Finland, Iceland, Lithuania, Norway and Sweden.

See also Anglican-Lutheran dialogue.

DAVID TUSTIN

POTTER, PHILIP A.

B. 19 Aug. 1921, Roseau, Dominica (West Indies). Third general secretary of the WCC (1972-84), Potter devoted a long career in church service to mission, ecumenism and work with youth and students. Besides 24 years on the WCC staff, he was a missionary to poor and mostly illiterate Creole-speaking people in Haiti, president of the World Student Christian Federation* and a staff member of the Methodist Missionary Society in London.

In 1944, after leaving the post of assistant to Dominica's attorney general to become a Methodist lay pastor on the island of Nevis, Potter began ministerial training at Caenwood Theological Seminary in Jamaica (later he did post-graduate work at London University). Jamaica Student Christian Movement representative at the world conference on Christian youth (Oslo 1947), he was spokesperson for youth at WCC assemblies in 1948 and 1954, and from 1954 to 1960 he worked in the WCC Youth department in Geneva.

As a Methodist Missionary Society overseas secretary, he was active in the International Missionary Council during integration with the WCC; and in 1967 he became director of the WCC Division of World Mission and Evangelism, though he had looked forward to spending the rest of his career as a theological teacher. Named to succeed Eugene Carson Blake as WCC general secretary in 1972, he led the Council until the end of 1984, when he finally took up the challenge he had felt earlier to return to the Caribbean to work with students at the University of the West Indies, though he continued some international travel and ecumenical involvement.

A central committee resolution honouring Potter on his retirement identified some main thrusts the WCC owed to his leadership: "the insistence on the fundamental unity of Christian witness and Christian service which the gospel commands and makes possible, the correlation of faith and action, the inseparable connection between the personal spiritual life of Christian believers and their obedient action in the world". An eloquent and forceful speaker and leader of Bible studies, Potter received numerous honorary degrees and awards.

PAULINE WEBB

■ M.N. Jagessar, Full Life for All. The Work and Theology of Philip A. Potter, Zoetermeer, Uitgeverij Boeckencentrum, 1997 ■ K. Raiser ed., House of Living Stones: Hommage to Philip A. Potter, Heiningen, Pro Ökumene, 1996 ■ P. Webb ed., Faith and Faithfulness, WCC, 1984 ■ The Whole Oikoumene, comp. Ans J. van der Bent, WCC, 1980.

POVERTY

IN HER celebrated book The Idea of Poverty (1984), Gertrude Himmelfarb observes that by the middle of the 18th century in England it was not possible to speak categorically about “the poor”, despite the intensive debate about “the poor” and “poverty” which had been going on at least since the Elizabethan poor laws, enacted in 1597-98. “In the period of only a century, circumstances conspired to create a highly differentiated poor.* This was not a matter of raising or lowering the poverty level. The changes affecting the poor were changes in kind as well as degree, in quality as well as quantity, in ideas, beliefs, perceptions, values. They were changes in what might be called the ‘moral imagination’.” The notion of poverty had become so complex that it was difficult to define poverty and to develop a coherent strategy to reduce it.

Ecumenical literature of the last 60 years reflects the same diffuse and changing understanding of poverty, which is not surprising in view of the diverse cultural assumptions, social situations and groupings of the poor reflected in the ecumenical debate. Given this complexity, it is useful to identify common denominators in an ecumenical understanding of poverty and to examine why poverty occurs and how to alleviate it.

The ecumenical discussion focuses on poverty which is generalized (widespread, affecting 40-50% of a nation’s population), persistent (rather than cyclical) and systemic (rather than poverty which results from indolence, incapacitation, etc.). Other types of poverty are important, but destitution as a generalized and persistent phenomenon is so universal, central and demanding that the ecumenical debate centres on systemically induced poverty. Most ecumenical literature on poverty centres on broad discussions of social justice, socio-economic development, a “responsible society”,* a “just, participatory and sustainable society”,* capitalism, communism, a New International Economic Order.

A corollary of this emphasis on a systemic analysis means that poverty is a historical (social, economic, political) issue rather than a natural one. Generalized poverty is not perceived as resulting primarily from the shortcomings of individuals, natural laws such as the survival of the fittest, the pre-ordained ordering by God of social divisions, ineluctable laws of supply and demand exacerbated by population (as in Malthus), or even a defective and ungenerous natural environment. Poverty is usually perceived as a direct result of the failure, intentional or otherwise, of political and economic organization to satisfy the legitimate rights of all people for a dignified, equitable life. Moreover, these are perceived as rights which should be expected and demanded from any social system, rather than reliance upon charity or benevolent paternalism. It is assumed that defective systems can be corrected to meet basic human needs.

An ecumenical perspective on poverty is not limited to an exclusively economic understanding, although economic criteria are crucial. In recent years the notion of poverty has expanded from questions of mere subsistence to include a wide range of human and social rights. Marginalization from political processes, denial of opportunities for education or job, denial of speech and assembly, etc. are seen as integral to deprivation and poverty.

This view is illustrated in Julio de Santa Ana’s influential Towards a Church of the Poor (1979), which defines poverty as “unfulfilment of basic human needs required to adequately sustain life free of disease, misery, hunger, pain, suffering, hopelessness and fear, on the one hand, and the condition of defenceless people suffering from structural injustices on the other. Such a life would not be limited to the satisfaction of basic human needs but would include an existence with dignity, based on the exercise of justice, participation and freedom.” The definition of poverty is blurred, but it is clearly more than a matter of lacking material wealth.

Because poverty is understood as primarily systemic, produced by inadequate political, economic and social organization, today's global interdependence of these systems makes poverty dependent upon a constellation of forces which transcend national boundaries and policies. Those peoples who are culturally, technologically, economically and politically powerful globally re-inforce their own (and one another's) power, at the expense of the half to three-quarters of the world's people living in poverty. An adequate analysis of poverty and an effective strategy to diminish it must be conceived globally. Thus the ecumenical debate addresses such issues as transnational corporations, third-world indebtedness, trade and tariff policies, transfers of capital and technology, a New International Economic Order.

Poverty is perceived as both absolute and relative – absolute because there are minimum conditions essential for sustaining life itself; relative because poverty is partially defined by what levels of existence are possible in a particular society, what levels are enjoyed by other members of that society and what levels have come to be defined as necessary. Two objective economic criteria have increasingly found their way into ecumenical conversations: physical quality of life index (measured by infant mortality, literacy and life expectancy) and equality index (measuring the relative economic conditions of the different quintiles of the population). Composite indexes of economic well-being, such as average caloric consumption and gross national product, are generally considered irrelevant or inappropriate.

Much ecumenical literature suggests that the poverty of the many is a direct result of the undue affluence of a relatively few. There exists an enrichment/impoverishment relationship, a zero-sum situation, in which the increased material well-being of some necessarily entails diminished weal for others. This analysis of the relationship between wealth and poverty has not been endorsed in any ecumenical conference, but it has grown in prominence in less formal statements. It tends to become a simple class analysis.

An intriguing change in terminology has occurred in the WCC's discussions of poverty. From 1948 to 1974 there was emphasis on "poverty", a term to reflect structural analyses of why people are destitute and marginalized. There was an economically defined "sub-class" of people, oppressed and marginalized, below an identified material poverty line. The vast majority of the poor were poor because of structures of oppression. In the early 1970s a terminological shift occurred. Instead of referring to poverty, it became fashionable to talk about "the poor". Several reasons could be adduced for this change. The term "poverty" seemed too impersonal and abstract. "Poverty" too easily assumed that structures are benign and reformable, ignoring the power realities against which the poor struggle tooth and claw. "Poverty" seemed to miss non-economic, and especially political, aspects of deprivation and alienation. To some, "poverty" seemed to treat the poor and marginalized as a homogeneous entity, when actually there are differences and controversies among them.

The analysis of poverty's causes remained, but strategies to cope with it changed. Perhaps the major reason for changed terminology was a growing conviction that the remedy for poverty was not top-down reforms but changes of structure emanating from among the poor, acting as agents for their own emancipation. What has emerged is an implicit tension between those who emphasize changing international structural relationships (e.g. debt policies, transnational corporations' policies) and those who stress the need for people's movements to define and fight for their own destiny. To some extent these two analyses and strategies, which are both competitive and complementary, are reflected in the language of "poverty" and "the poor".

Ecumenical literature is highly critical of every economic system; none can be identified with the Christian gospel. In the 1950s and 1960s, the WCC's literature was careful to point out the failure of both capitalism and communism. An alternative "third way" has been a constant theme. In the 1950s the concept of a responsible society was formulated to point towards this third way, emphasizing political and economic freedom and responsibility. By the mid-1970s, a "just, participatory and sustainable society" was advocated, highlighting material well-being, political participation and ecological sanity. The ecumenical position, especially as it has been defined in the WCC and in regional and national Christian councils, increasingly criticizes laissez-faire capitalism.* There is an expressed conviction that some form of socialism,* not equated with communism, is the system most likely to overcome poverty.

Notwithstanding allegations to the contrary, ecumenical views on poverty are rooted in biblical-theological arguments. Convinced that a passion for social justice is essential to a Judeo-Christian understanding of covenant,* current ecumenical literature argues that God makes a "preferential option for the poor". This option for the poor is evident in the calling of a slave people, in the denunciation by the prophets of the amassing of and reliance on wealth, and in Jesus' calling of a no-name band of disciples. This option for the poor is not only an emotional attachment to the vulnerable. It is based upon the relative freedom of the poor to eschew the securities and prestige of this world; they think they do not need the present structures, so they can be relatively free to challenge them. While all people are called to be agents of liberation,* the poor are most fully free to receive the gospel and thus to be agents of new possibilities. Their location in society gives them a perspective on reality different from how things appear "from the top". This perspective is sometimes referred to as the epistemological privilege of the poor. Much current ecumenical literature stresses that the poor have historically played this creative role, and that because of their social position they can play that role again today. The possibilities for social transformation are linked closely with the capacity of the poor to achieve their own emancipation, the liberation of the rich and the healing and wholeness of even non-human nature.

Finally, this emerging vision of the roots and character of poverty has led to significant alteration in understanding the role of the churches in overcoming poverty. In broad strokes one can trace differing stages in the churches' understanding of how they should promote justice and overcome poverty. First, poverty is an expression of the "laws of nature", of divine will. The churches' task is to respond to the most egregious and destructive consequences of this poverty through charity, without changing the system. Second, poverty is the result of unpredictable and unfortunate forces in one's environment, but that environment is basically sound. Again, the churches' task is to offer relief. Third, poverty is a result of moral or character failings of the poor. The church should urge regeneration of the sinful. Fourth, poverty is a consequence of humanly devised social systems which need improvement. The churches' task is to bring a prophetic judgment and constructive presence to the reform of social structures, usually through top-down evolutionary reform. Finally, poverty is a result of social structures which express and perpetuate the vested interests and egoism of the powerful, who are reluctant to relinquish privilege. The churches' main task is to identify with and support those groups of the poor struggling to win their own and others' liberation and dignity. Such support means taking seriously the goals and strategies of those engaged in the struggle for justice.

This enumeration is not an airtight typology or a description of a linear evolution of ecumenical thinking about poverty. What is abundantly clear, however, is the complex, creative and emergent character of ecumenical reflection on poverty. This debate rests on differing assumptions and analyses; it is a sociological, anthropological, political and economic debate. But in the final analysis, ecumenical literature reveals that the issue of poverty ultimately entails a theological, moral and spiritual debate as well.

See also development, economics.

RICHARD D.N. DICKINSON

■ C. Boerma, The Poor Side of Europe, WCC, 1989 ■ C. Elliott, Comfortable Compassion, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1987 ■ G. Gutiérrez, The Power of the Poor in History, London, SCM Press, 1983 ■ D.A. Leon & G. Walt eds, Poverty, Inequality and Health: An International Perspective, Oxford, Oxford UP, 2001 ■ D. Narayan, Can Anyone Hear Us?, New York, Oxford UP, 2000 ■ H.L. Perkins, Roots for Vision: Reflections on the Gospel and the Churches' Task in Re-Peopling the De-Peopled, Singapore, CCA, 1985 ■ Poor in the World Economy, WCC, 1989.

POWER

POWER IS not only the self-expression of a subject, whether divine, human or natural; it expresses a relation between a subject and an object. Recovery of this insight, in which Christian theology and the ecumenical movement have played a significant role, has been one of the outcomes of 20th-century ideological struggles.

POWER IN THE MODERN AGE

The issue was posed for the modern age by the vast expansion of human control over the forces of nature. The conversion of coal, oil and then the nucleus of the atom into energy to drive machines has changed the very meaning of the word in the popular mind. Power has come to mean first a natural force at the service of endlessly expanding human needs and desires. The implicit assumption has been that there is no determinate limit to its expansion and that the meaning of human life consists in the freedom to enjoy it.

The older meaning of the word did not disappear, however. Rather, political-social power was compounded with technological-economic power in new unstable ways. Forces of production, often anonymous, have created new power elites who have sought political influence in various ways. At the same time, a revolution of rising expectations has empowered masses of people in both the benefits of an expanding economy and the political power that gives it direction. It is not surprising that other masses, powerless for centuries, are rising in revolutionary action to claim their share.

Reinhold Niebuhr was the first to grasp this modern complex of issues theologically. Human power, he wrote, is good, as the response of human vitalities to their Creator. It is also the source of evil in the world as "the will to live becomes the will to power", which knows no limits to its desire for domination. The first task of human society,* therefore, is to avert the judgment of God and human destruction by balancing power against power so as to achieve a relative justice.* This justice is always unstable, however. The balance of power on which it rests will break down unless it is set under the inspiration and judgment of higher levels of mutual-ity, ultimately that of the saving grace* of God in Jesus Christ. It is itself subject to judgment by the Lord of history, whose ultimate mercy and character is revealed on the cross. In Niebuhr's view, history will be, until the final judgment, the story of various forms of power – political, economic, religious, popular and military – struggling to achieve tentative forms of order which express a relative justice but also a new form of domination subject to further protest and change, challenged and humbled by the mercy of God in the servanthood and sacrifice of Christ.

Niebuhr's great contribution was to overcome both the simple continuity between divine and human power in liberal Christianity and the dualism of traditional orthodoxy, with a dialectical understanding of sin* and grace in the human power struggle. In this contribution he provided a foundation for the ecumenical movement.

In 1948 the WCC Amsterdam assembly warned of "vast concentrations of power", both political and economic, and a technical society having a "momentum of its own" rooted in human creativity and power struggles but subjecting human beings to its laws while destroying community and deepening injustice throughout the world. The assembly sounded a note of triumphant hope in its message: "There is a word of God for our world. It is that the world is in the hands of the living God, whose will for it is wholly good, that in Jesus Christ his incarnate Word who lived and died and rose from the dead, God has broken the power of evil once for all and opened for everyone the gate into freedom and joy in the Holy Spirit.” The task of living this message, however, meant subordinating and humanizing these powers, finding a way between the absolutes of communism and laissez-faire capitalism to create just and satisfying ways of life for “little men in big societies” and of decentralizing power into responsible decision-making communities (sec. 3 report).

THE ECUMENICAL DEBATE: AMSTERDAM TO GENEVA

Amsterdam set the agenda of the ecumenical movement in dealing with power for the next two decades. It had three levels.

A practical theological understanding of the power of God in Christ. Niebuhr posed the issue in speaking of the transcendent yet ever-relevant presence of the crucified Christ in a world of human power struggles. Karl Barth re-defined it as the reality of God who is not abstract omnipotence: “To possess the power to do everything without distinction would be a limitation or rather the removal of his power and not its extension. Possessing that power, he would not be God.” Rather “God’s omnipotence is the omnipotence of his free love”, of the perfection of his “grace, holiness, mercy, justice, patience and wisdom” in Jesus Christ (Church Dogmatics, II/1, 490-608). Dietrich Bonhoeffer in his immensely influential Letters and Papers from Prison, against the background of his own life and death, gave the theme an urgent social relevance: “Man’s religiosity makes him look in his distress to the power of God in the world...; the Bible directs man to God’s powerlessness and suffering; only the suffering God can help. To that extent we may say that the development towards the world’s coming of age... which has done away with a false conception of God opens up a way of seeing the God of the Bible, who wins power and space in the world by his weakness.”

The power of God in the serving, crucified and risen Christ to save the world from its own powers became a dominant theme of the ecumenical movement in the period following Amsterdam. It was central to the messages of the assemblies at Evanston 1954 and New Delhi 1961. The World Alliance of Reformed Churches* took as the theme of its assembly in Brazil in 1959 “The Servant Lord and His Servant People”. Its combination of repentant humility with action and confidence in the power of the word (see word of God) permeated missiological reflection, as mission practice during this period moved from its centre in the West to being a worldwide enterprise.

Biblical reflection on the nature of power. “We do not find the Bible claiming to be a book of philosophy or science or history. It does not speak to us of God but in the name of God... Each of [God’s] words is an act. For this reason we can refer interchangeably to the Bible as the word of God or as the book of the acts of God.” With these words Suzanne de Diétrich set the tone of ecumenical Bible study which she herself helped to guide for nearly 30 years (see Bible, its role in the ecumenical movement). The biblical God is a God who acts, a God of power, a God who creates, who calls, who binds himself to us in covenant,* who is faithful when we are faithless and who redeems the world in Christ. This perspective describes not so much a particular biblical theology as an attitude towards the Bible which has characterized the ecumenical movement from its formation. Hendrick Kraemer called this attitude “biblical realism” in his challenge to the world mission of the church in 1937. It is active encounter with the power of God, through which the churches are constantly called to repentance in their relations with the world and with one another and also to re-discover together their ecumenical mission.

This encounter has also had another dimension: a fresh study of the relation between the power of Christ and the principalities and powers of the world in the New Testament. Several writers from various traditions have contributed to this discussion. In each case the question was raised how these powers operate in the world today. At least one such power, the political, is clearly identified in the NT (Rom. 13). If Mammon is taken seriously, there are also economic powers. Albert van den Heuvel suggests, citing Col. 2, that “public opinion, the pressure of conformity, moral rules and religious observances, philosophies and ideologies" are also among them.

In any case, ecumenical study has made certain points clear. First, the powers are created by God and have their meaning in God's purpose and plan. Second, the powers are rooted in human desires and actions, in human idolatries and false absolutes, but in their structure they transcend human beings and have power over them. We are responsible both for them and for their victims. As such, they are destructive and rebellious against God. Third, Christ on the cross was the victim of these powers. In his resurrection* he is Lord over them. Fourth, the church* is witness in a world dominated by the powers of Christ's victory and coming reign. This role involves conflict against the powers (Eph. 6:12) and witness to them of their true purpose in the economy of God (Eph. 3:10). We are left with the continuing question of identifying the powers in modern society which need to be resisted and redeemed, and of the strategy of this conflict and this witness.

Guidance for Christian responsibility amid the powers of the contemporary world. The term "responsible society"* was coined at Amsterdam to indicate both a style of Christian action and the form of a society towards which that action would aim. "For a society to be responsible under modern conditions, it is required that people have freedom to control, to criticize and change their governments, that power be made responsible by law and tradition and be distributed as widely as possible throughout the whole community, [and] that economic justice and provision of equality of opportunity be established for all the members of society" (sec. 3). Theologically, the concept found its deepest roots in Dietrich Bonhoeffer's "Structure of Responsible Life", lived concretely for the neighbour in the world of political and social forces, ready to accept the guilt of impure but necessary action in the power struggle, a life guided but not dominated by conscience and the law, bearing witness in the human struggle to the presence and coming judgment and mercy of Christ (Ethics, ch. 6).

The form which this responsibility took in the ecumenical witness varied with time and place. The Bangkok (1949) and Lucknow (1952) conferences of the churches in Asia emphasized fundamental social revolution beset by ideological conflicts as the basic power at work in their world. They called for "the proclamation of the word of God with a profound sense of its relevance to the ideological and political conflicts of the Orient" (Bangkok) and in that context for democratic transformation of the social order, for freedom of religion and other human rights, for effective land reform and full development of natural resources, for common sharing of the national wealth and responsible development of human community.

The WCC's Evanston assembly (1954) made a discriminating analysis of state* power as not the source but the guardian of social justice, of economic power in concrete terms which went beyond the labels of "capitalism"* and "socialism".* It then explored the differing particular responsibilities of the church in the Western world, the communist world and the economically underdeveloped regions of Asia, Africa and Latin America. The Salonika conference on "Christian Action in Rapid Social Change" (1959) emphasized (1) the powers of technology,* (2) nationalism,* and (3) the dynamics of economic development.* It called for Christian action towards new forms of human community to cope with the first, discriminating participation in nation-building to bring out the creativity and counter the idolatry of the second, and the right use of the world's resources to promote "the widest possible participation in the planning process and in the execution of plans" for progress in the midst of the third.

The Geneva conference on Church and Society (1966) said bluntly that "in seeking a responsible society we need to discover the operations of power, unveil the hidden centres of power and hold all power accountable to men and God... Since man fulfills his God-given potential only by exercising power and by sharing in making the decisions that affect his life, we believe that maximum participation in authentic decision making must characterize the systems where technologies are shaped and employed." This vision includes workers as well as experts and managers in an industry, and an informed general public, organized perhaps in advocacy groups to bring countervailing power to bear where needed. It also includes the state, which the report said should not be the only repository of power but should nevertheless have the means of controlling other centres in the public interest.

Beyond this understanding, however, consensus in the Geneva conference broke down. There was no agreement as to the degree to which the state should exercise its controlling and managing power, about the way in which participation in state power by conflicting groups and interests among the people should be organized, or even about the role of law* vs the powers of revolutionary change. Behind such differences lay a deeper dispute about the nature of power itself, which challenged the context of previous ecumenical debate.

This challenge had many sources in social experience and ideology.* But whether it grew out of the cause of black power in the US or South Africa, the class struggle of the poor in Latin America or the rising self-consciousness of peoples in Asia, the theme was the same: the experience of living in the midst of a struggle against the dominant and oppressive powers in society is basic to humanity, to faith* and to theology. To be aware of oneself as a human being, to be conscientized, is to find oneself already in the midst of struggle against the structures of class domination. In the midst of this praxis and theoretical awareness, one discerns also one's relation to the power of God.

THE ONGOING DEBATE

This starting point and this stance have had three consequences for the ecumenical debate about power.

First, a profound suspicion of the ideological bias in previous ecumenical theology and social ethics, and a demand that solidarity with the oppressed, whether with the poor* in class terms, with the blacks in terms of race, or with "the people" as culturally defined, be the starting point for all theological and ethical action and reflection. "God's word of reconciliation means that we can only be justified by becoming black," wrote James Cone in the US situation. "Theology to be authentically Asian must be immersed in our historic-cultural situation and grow out of it. Theology which should emerge from the people's struggle for liberation would spontaneously formulate itself in religious-cultural idioms of the people." So wrote the Asian participants in an ecumenical conference whose report appears in Towards a Church of the Poor. One could multiply the examples. Only from a particular position and engagement in the world power struggle can truth about God be known.

Second, the demand that action in the form of engagement on the right side of social conflict be the test of faith and the form of Christian obedience. The WCC, representing the churches of the world, must therefore also be so involved. This is the motivation behind the Programme to Combat Racism,* and it defines the difference in emphasis between interchurch aid and the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development.

Third, a theology of continuity between the human struggle for liberation and the saving work of God in Jesus Christ. "The historical-political liberating event is the growth of the kingdom and is a salvific event; but it is not the coming of the kingdom, not all of salvation. It is the historical realization of the kingdom and therefore it also proclaims its fullness." So wrote Gustavo Gutiérrez in his now-classic Theology of Liberation. Christ is identified with the human power struggle of the poor and completes it with his work.

The issue at stake in all three points of this challenge is not the empowerment of the poor and the oppressed to achieve their just participation in society, which has been a theme of ecumenical ethics from the beginning. Nor is it the healthy reminder that the theology and ethics even of Christian people can be distorted and biased by their political and economic interests and allegiance of the power structures in which they feel secure. This, too, has been an ongoing discovery of churches in mission and in ecumenical encounter, a cause for continual repentance and renewal of life.

The fundamental question is rather that of the relation between divine and human power. Can the world be redeemed by replacing the principalities and powers that now dominate it with others representing the people and the poor? Is the justice achieved by human struggle itself subject to the judgment of God and the correction of further struggle for the corruption which is present in its relative goodness? Are there resources in the Christian community to empower believers in their struggle against injustice while at the same time believing in and praying for divine forgiveness and transformation of us all? Will we learn in this light that human power is more ambivalent and more complex than we now imagine? Much work remains to be done in internal ecumenical struggle to clarify the relation of God's power in Christ to our own.

A final word must be said which qualifies this whole discussion. During the past 30 years, the awareness has been forced upon the world that human power over the non-human creation, or nature,* although without determinate limits, can defeat itself and lead to our destruction. The discovery of nuclear power is only the most obvious example. Synthetic chemical compounds that do not degrade, pesticides that also poison people, energy-producing fuels that pollute the air and change our climate – these are only a few examples of the consequences of human power that have not been brought to live within the limits of God's creation.

The problem in this area is that nature cannot rise up and liberate itself. Future generations, who will bear the consequences of our technology and industry, cannot vote in our elections or struggle against our exploitation of them. Instead, we must muster the restraint and discipline to respect the integrity of creation, although we have the power to destroy it for our immediate profit. "The Christian hope sets science and technology in the open-ended process of God's history with his creation," says the report of the WCC conference on "Faith, Science and the Future" in 1979. Human beings cannot renounce their power. Their task is to discern the promise of nature in partnership with humanity. This too is ecumenical agenda for the future. It is intertwined with the struggle for justice, in that no ecological policy will succeed which is not secured by shared access for all to the resources of the earth and just distribution of the products made from them.

The power of God is indeed self-limited by covenant with the people of God, implicitly with the whole creation as well. It is an open-ended covenant filled with promise, a covenant redeemed even when human beings in their power struggles seek to destroy it. Under the risen Christ and looking to his coming, it is a promising covenant fulfilled in the service of one another and appreciative use of the creation around us. The exercise of power in this responsibility is an ecumenical art we are only beginning to learn.

See also justice, peace and the integrity of creation; order.

CHARLES C. WEST

- K. Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik (ET Church Dogmatics, II/1, Edinburgh, Clark, 1957) ■ H. Berkhof, Christ and the Powers, Scottsdale PA, Herald, 1962 ■ D. Bonhoeffer, Ethik (ET Ethics, London, SCM Press, 1955) ■ J. Cone, Black Theology and Black Power, New York, Seabury, 1969 ■ A. van den Heuvel, These Rebellious Powers, London, SCM Press, 1966 ■ R. Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man, vol. 1, London, Nisbet, 1943 ■ J.P. Mackey, Power and Christian Ethics, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1994 ■ K.A. Pasewark, A Theology of Power: Being beyond Domination, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1993 ■ J. de Santa Ana ed., Towards a Church of the Poor, WCC, 1982 ■ H.-R. Weber, Power: Focus for a Biblical Theology, WCC, 1989 ■ C.C. West, The Power to Be Human, New York, Macmillan, 1971.

PRAXIS

THE WESTERN reception of the notion of praxis should be traced back to Aristotle's distinction between pure contemplation (theōria), production (poiēsis) and a human moral action which expresses the intention of the agent, the value of which cannot be separated from the agent (praxis). While some ascetics and mystics shared the Neo-platonic contempt for praxis as contaminated by the material world in which it operates, many church fathers, including Clement of Alexandria, saw it as an expression of Christian love. The word does not necessarily appear, but the form of human expression that it designates is present in scholastic theology, although always second to theory. The theological significance of human purposeful action inspired by love has never been denied, even if it is differently valued. A whole theological tradition has extolled it over against a purely intellectual and propositional theology. The tradition of "practical Christianity" has been a powerful component of the ecumenical movement from the very beginning, finding polemical expression in the slogan "doctrine divides, but action unites". Such vindication, however, does not attach to praxis any epistemological or methodological significance in dogmatic thinking. "Theoria" may or may not be liked, but it remains – even when directed to "religious experience" – the only muse of dogmatics.

Marx inverted the Aristotelian paradigm and assigned to praxis the place of privilege, arguing that in human beings' purposeful transformation of the world, they create themselves as well as the world around them. To be sure, they cannot do it capriciously or arbitrarily but according to the laws of the material world (of which they are part) – not as a purely mechanical operation (poiēsis) but as human work, an intention through which one affirms one's freedom.* Antonio Gramsci tries to capture this dialectics when he rebaptizes Marxian materialism "the philosophy of praxis".

This overshadowing influence of Marx in the modern recovery of the notion of praxis rendered it suspicious when contemporary political and liberation theology re-introduced it, not only in the realm of ethics but as an instrument of knowledge, a methodological principle and a form of verification in dogmatics. Thus in the Vatican "Instruction on Certain Aspects of the Theology of Liberation" (1984), the use of "praxis" in some currents of that theology is criticized for its relation to "the materialist conception of history to which praxis is linked", for its political contents centred on class struggle and it made revolutionary praxis a criterion of truth.

It is therefore important to characterize more precisely the place attributed to praxis in these (liberation and political) theologies. In a more general sense we can say that the act of knowledge is never a purely passive contemplation of abstract truth but is an act involving the totality (psychological, social, historical) of the human reality of the knower, including his or her intentional relation to the world. Praxis cannot be conceived as independent from theory. In fact, theory is reached by a process of abstraction on the basis of praxis; a specific practice, as a concrete form of human praxis, always has an implicit theory. Thus, praxis cannot be understood as mere pragmatic action. This relation between praxis and its theoretical content is a mutual one in which each element supports, tests and corrects the other. Since praxis signifies an active relation to the world, it necessarily affects its subject; persons are thus modified by their praxis as they modify the world by it.

More specifically, the theologies mentioned usually highlight some elements. First, the contents of the Christian praxis envisaged is defined by "an option for the poor", thus pointing to a location (which is both social and spiritual) in history and society which defines a "horizon of knowledge". Second, it is a praxis of faith,* which is therefore controlled by the object of that faith, Jesus Christ* – his person, his message, the kingdom which he announced and inaugurated. Third, it is a communal praxis, lived and acted out and critically revised within the community of faith. Fourth, it verifies the Christian message in so far as it makes it a reality in human history.* One could say that it enacts the presence of the kingdom, although in the limited and imperfect form of a sign which participates in the reality it signifies but does not render it perfectly present. Finally, since the Spirit of God is present in history, Christian praxis is an act of discernment and therefore a form of knowing (see John 7:17) with dogmatic significance. In this sense Gustavo Gutiérrez can say that “theology is a critical reflection on Christian praxis in the light of the word”.

The word “praxis” has not entered the WCC vocabulary in any significant way. But the “action-reflection” model, which is operative in several programmes and activities of the WCC, is inspired by analogous concerns.

See also theology, liberation; theology, political.

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO

- C. Boff, Theology and Praxis: Epistemological Foundations, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1987
- J.B. Metz, Faith in History and Society: Toward a Practical Fundamental Theology, New York, Seabury, 1979.

PRAYER IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

ECUMENICAL prayer was anticipated by Jesus in the “Our Father”, focused upon his followers in the great prayer for unity* in John 17 and then widened out again to embrace all human beings in the spread of the gospel since Pentecost.* It is prayer offered for the unity of Christ’s universal church* and the well-being of the world he came to save. Although this vision has never been wholly lost sight of in divided Christendom, it was, however, left mainly to a few discerning souls in every tradition to recognize their unity of spirit with those otherwise separated from them, and to travelling Christians of one kind or another to promote a cross-fertilization of prayer and devotion across confessional and national boundaries. It was not until the turn of the 19th century and through an awakened concern for mission* and unity and a growing experience of the interdependence of the whole human family that the deeper implications of such prayer began to be more widely known and available.

The first modern movement to be inspired by our Lord’s high priestly prayer “that they may all be one” arose from two quite separate sources and resulted eventually in what is now well known as the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.* Today this week is observed either in January or at Pentecost, according to local preference, and has continued to give many local Christians an experience of ecumenical prayer. As an extension of the week of prayer, many religious communities follow the practice of lighting a candle week by week – the Thursday candle – accompanied by the prayer: “Grant that in you, who are perfect love, we may find the way that leads to unity, in obedience to your love and your truth.”

Described in the Orthodox Easter prayer as “the myrrh-bearing women”, the ministering-praying women of the New Testament have been followed and identified with the countless Christian women who, as part of families, congregations, religious orders and positions of leadership, have played a vital part in healing the bruised and broken Body of Christ. Over the last 100 years two women’s organizations have made a second, particularly important contribution to ecumenical prayer. The World Day of Prayer,* founded in the USA in 1887 in response to needs following the civil war and for prayer for missions overseas, has developed over the years into a worldwide movement, composed mainly of women, who engage in “informed prayer and prayerful action” on behalf of the needs of the whole world. The second such movement, conceived in 1956, was the brain-child of the Asian Christian Women’s Conference. Focusing on the smallest coin of each country’s currency, offered with prayer for peace, the Fellowship of the Least Coin continues to draw a response from women all over the world.

More recent participation of women in ecumenical prayer and decision making has led to a demand that the language of prayer itself should be revised to do justice to the place and activity of women within the church and to acknowledge the feminine attributes of God. Ecumenical prayer is currently being greatly enriched along these lines: “O God whose word is life and whose delight is to answer our cry, give us faith like the Syro-Phoenician woman, who refused to remain an outsider; that we too may have the wit to argue and demand that our daughters be made whole, through Jesus Christ, Amen” (Morley).

A third and arguably the most significant contribution to the growth of ecumenical prayer has been the quickening of concern for the renewal and mission of the church, which led to the inception of the modern missionary movement and to its fruit in the suffering, praying, growing churches around the world today.

Originating in a series of humble "concerts of prayer" for the renewal of the church in Scotland in the late 18th century, the movement eventually spread to other countries and played an important part in the programme of the newly formed mission agencies and subsequently in their great conferences. Attributing much of the success of the 1910 world missionary conference in Edinburgh to the fact that it had been the focus of wide intercession,* John R. Mott wrote: "The heart of Edinburgh was not in its speeches but in its periods of prayer." Ninety years later, the same has been said of a series of important and increasingly representative gatherings of Christians, in the shape of the successive assemblies of the WCC (the eighth of which was held in Harare in 1998), that at the heart of each were acts of corporate worship which, to those privileged to share in them, offered an unparalleled opportunity to experience the riches of truly ecumenical prayer.

In the early years of the modern missionary movement, first by necessity and later by desire, cooperation developed between the different missionary groups, accompanied by prayer and consultation and later common action, and eventually, in some places, by plans for church union. Thus it was that united prayer among missionaries of different denominations grew, much of it directed towards the renewal and evangelistic outreach of the newly established churches. Such prayer, however, was not without its critics among local Christians, many of whom were excluded from early missionary assemblies and who came to feel that prayer itself only too easily became an instrument of paternalism. Moreover, many local Christians resented imported denominationalism* and imposed forms of worship and sought freedom to address God in their own way and in the mode of their own culture. A prayer used at a later Asia youth assembly expressed what many were feeling at a much earlier time: "O Lord, lead us not into imitation." It was a prayer which was already being answered as early dependency and denominationalism gave way to autonomous churches and eventually, in some areas, to the formation of united churches, whose liturgies have contributed in a special way to ecumenical prayer.

The fourth and central strand in the development of ecumenical prayer emerges from the well-known early student gatherings in Europe and North America, where young men and women met together for prayer, to read the Bible and to face the challenge of service overseas. In such prayer and meeting, impatience with denominational differences was generated; to meet the needs of these young people, organizations like the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations and the Student Christian Movement came into being. Between them they produced the earliest books of ecumenical prayer and worship. Now somewhat dated and limited in the range of their material, they were nevertheless pioneers in their field and gave many of the future leaders of the missionary and ecumenical movement their first taste of ecumenical prayer. The presence of such student groups at Edinburgh 1910 and subsequent ecumenical gatherings, and the concerns they voiced, along with those of representatives of an ever-widening circle of churches, were to form the milieu of the WCC. Many of those present at the WCC's first assembly (Amsterdam 1948) spoke of the moving moment when, after hundreds of years of confessionalism and division, representatives of many different churches and nationalities were for the first time able to say the Lord's prayer together, each in his or her own tongue.

The worship of the early assemblies, however, remained fairly traditional as the various church leaders shared their own denominational treasures. Those earlier years were marked by an over-optimistic internationalism, which regarded the kingdom of God* as attainable in a relatively short period of time. This assumption was to be severely challenged, along with the patterns of prayer which went with it. The reality of the ever-changing world situation demanded a realignment of prayer and theology, which provided the theme for a particularly formative WCC assembly at Uppsala in 1968.

Work camps and student conferences and the changing needs of young people produced more informal acts of worship and new approaches to intercession. A growing number of churches from a wide spectrum of traditions, including members of the Orthodox family, African Independent, Pentecostal and black American churches, and with an ever-increasing representation from third-world countries, officially entered the ecumenical movement, bringing with them both ancient liturgies and new insights into prayer and worship. Many of these challenged what was held to be an overly cerebral approach to worship and pointed to new dimensions of prayer in the form of symbols, music and movement more meaningful to the vast majority of the world's Christians.

In addition, the wide-reaching changes initiated at Vatican II* have allowed greater participation of Roman Catholics in ecumenical prayer, and the revitalization of many traditional Christian practices and acts of devotion has been reflected in a renewed interest in a specifically Christian life-style, the use of silence, pilgrimages and the observance of vigils and fasts. Similarly, the hurt and pain experienced by Christians in many places and situations has forced ecumenical prayer back to its biblical roots and to the crying and questioning of the people of God in the Old Testament, producing many contemporary lamentations. A more sympathetic approach to those of other faiths has brought with it an awareness that they too are people of prayer and have much to offer on this subject and others.

Meanwhile in response to various WCC assembly themes from Uppsala onwards, the Council's mandate and ecumenical vision have been widening considerably, and this has been mirrored in the content of its prayer. The programmes of development* and those to combat racism, to promote peace and health and the good of the environment; the ever-growing recognition of social justice as a spiritual commitment; and the decade of churches in solidarity with women have all had their implications for ecumenical spirituality. While in an increasingly one-world culture there are still significant differences of need between different peoples, there are also an increasing number of concerns held in common across the world. But unity continues unchanged as a central theme of all ecumenical prayer, although perhaps nowadays directed less towards organized schemes of union and more towards the ending of the shame and scandal of divisions at the local level, in addition to that between peoples and races divided from one another. To respond to all such needs the concept of solidarity has been fostered in recent years to express a relationship which is to be deepened between different churches and peoples of the world, and in which prayer and the sharing of spiritual resources is held to play a very important part. To this end an ecumenical cycle of prayer has been produced.

If the widening out of its concerns over the years has led some to refer, disparagingly, to the WCC as "the United Nations at prayer", it is a title which is nevertheless welcomed by some, especially when it comes to finding ways of identifying with those many people around the world who, often in situations of desperation, relate their prayers to the realities of their lives as they use one of the most ecumenical of all prayers: "Maranatha: come, Lord Jesus, come, soon."

See also ecumenical prayer cycle, spirituality in the ecumenical movement, worship in the ecumenical movement.

JOHN CARDEN

- A.J. van der Bent, "The Concern for Spirituality: An Analytical and Bibliographical Survey of the Discussion within the WCC Constituency", ER, 38, 1, 1986
- J. Carden comp., With All God's People: The New Ecumenical Prayer Cycle, 2 vols, WCC, 1989
- J. Carden ed., Stations of Salvation: A Procession of Prayers from around the World, London, Cassell, 1997
- E. Castro, When We Pray Together, WCC, 1989
- Ecumenical Decade -

Churches in Solidarity with Women: Prayers and Poems, Songs and Stories, WCC, 1991 ■ T. Jasper & P. Webb, Worship in Every Event: Worship Resources for Every Day, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1998 ■ G. Lemopoulos ed., Let Us Pray to the Lord: A Collection of Prayers from the Eastern and Oriental Orthodox Traditions, WCC, 1996 ■ J. Morley, All Desires Known, London, SPCK, 1992 ■ G. Mursell, Out of the Deep: Prayer as Protest, London, DLT, 1989.

PRESBYTERATE

THE TERM “presbyterate” has been given to the second order of ministry from the time when the three orders of bishop, presbyter and deacon were clearly distinguished. The words presbyteratus and presbyter are still used in the Latin version of the Roman pontifical, though they are usually translated in other languages as “priesthood” and “priest”. Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* has the traditional distinction between bishop and presbyter in mind when it suggests the universal adoption of the threefold ministry (see ministry, threefold).

Ecumenically what is at stake is the distinction between the ministry of the bishop and that of presbyters within the one pastoral ministry, as well as the importance of adopting an episcopal church structure which places a second order of pastors, called presbyters, under the supervision of the episcopacy.* At the world conference on Faith and Order* in Lausanne in 1927, there seemed to be some acknowledgment of the three kinds of church structure under the names of episcopal, presbyterian and congregational (see church order). In the responses to BEM, some churches have asked why this distinction has now been dropped, so that a presbyterian structure with only one order of pastors and a supervisory presbytery should be expected to give way to an episcopal structure that appears to favour distinct roles of bishop and presbyter within the pastoral ministry. Others have asked why there is no reference to the role of elder, as distinct from pastor, as practised in some Reformed churches.

Calvin allowed for only one ministry of word and sacrament, without internal distinction of orders. In the church structure of Geneva he assigned this place to pastors, but he also had elders (this term translates the Greek presbyteroi), teachers and deacons, since he found these offices in the New Testament. Elders were not pastors and had no part in the ministry of word and sacrament, but they had a role in church governance. With some differences in how the office is envisaged and in how elders are designated, many churches today believe that elders are part of the church structure indicated in NT texts. Ecumenically, the question arises whether adopting a distinction between bishop and presbyter within the pastoral ministry introduces an unnecessary ranking within that ministry and also whether so doing suppresses an office distinct from it that is, however, pertinent to the good of the church.

It is not easy to draw any clear conclusions about bishops and presbyters in NT writings. The church in Jerusalem seems to have been governed by a group of presbyters, or elders, under the presidency of James, adopting a pattern found in Jewish communities (Acts 11:29-30, ch. 15; Gal. 2:9). This pattern carried over into some churches of Asia Minor (Acts 14:23). In other churches, leaders are called bishops and deacons (Phil. 1:1). There is no great precision about the ministry of any of these roles. The pastoral epistles mention both bishops and presbyters. Some exegeses take the titles as synonymous.

In the post-apostolic period, there is reason to believe that some churches, such as Rome and Alexandria, were governed by a presbyterium, or group of presbyters, one of whose number exercised the sacramental and presidential ministry in the community. In the letters of Ignatius of Antioch there is clear mention for the churches of Asia Minor of the tripartite ministry of bishop, presbyters and deacons. This is the pattern clearly adopted in the ordination* ritual of The Apostolic Tradition attributed to Hippolytus, which prevailed until the Reformation.

Despite the clear distinction of names, there is no great clarity in the evolution of the presbyterate as a distinct office and ministry. From writings such as those of Hippolytus and Cyprian of Carthage, there is reason to see that the office was by very nature collegial and that the main role of the presbytery was to advise and act with the bishop in matters of church government, such as the purchase and disposal of church property, the selection of ministers, the healing of conflicts within the community and the excommunication* and reconciliation* of sinners. Their part in teaching and in sacramental ministry appears to have been at first one of substitution for the bishop. With the expansion of the church and the separation of local churches into diverse communities, presbyters assumed as normal the presidency of smaller communities, and a sacramental and teaching ministry. Indeed, by the 4th or 5th century the ordination of presbyters was to this pastoral office rather than to membership in the collegial presbyterate, though traces of this latter role are to be found in church order and canon law* down through the ages. Such was the evolution that in time the sacramental ministry and priesthood* were predicated primarily of the presbyterate rather than of the episcopacy, which was taken by many medieval theologians to be a divinely instituted jurisdiction rather than a sacrament. Thus the words sacerdos and presbyter became practically synonymous. In English, the word "priest" is related etymologically to presbyter but has assumed a sacerdotal meaning.

At the Second Vatican Council,* the Roman Catholic Church clearly affirmed the sacramental nature of the episcopacy. At the same time, it affirmed that ordination to the presbyterate is ordination to the comprehensive ministry of word, sacrament and pastoral care, rather than only to sacrament. In allowing this ministry to both bishop and presbyter, it attributed a supervisory and magisterial role to the bishop and retrieved something of the collegiate sense of the presbyterium from early centuries, applying it to the exercise of the full ministry. If one abstracts the sacerdotal and hierarchical factors in Roman Catholic teaching, it appears to correspond in a general way to the suggested adoption of the threefold pattern in ecumenical discussions. While the adoption of the episcopacy would be a sacramental expression of the church's apostolicity* and would provide for a link between churches beyond local boundaries, the existence of a group of presbyters sharing in the pastoral ministry would allow for its collegiate nature in the particular church. The risk is that the collegiate would be swallowed up in the hierarchical and that the equation of presbyterate with pastoral ministry would suppress the participation of the church membership in the ordering of church life through its representative elders.

An examination of the simple word "presbyterate" thus uncovers a number of valid ecumenical questions. Is it not important to maintain a collegiate responsibility, even on the local level, for pastoral ministry? Does the distinction between bishop and presbyter allow for this collegiality,* and how is it to be maintained if this division is adopted? However, is it not also important to keep open a collegiate responsibility for church governance which includes the members not appointed to the pastoral ministry (i.e. the laity)? Can this broader involvement now be allowed for through the office of elder, and does the equation between presbyterate and pastoral ministry of word and sacrament not obscure this part of church heritage?

See also ministry in the church, priesthood.

DAVID N. POWER

- J.L. Ainslie, The Doctrines of Ministerial Order in the Reformed Churches of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, Edinburgh, Clark, 1940
- R.E. Brown, Priest and Bishop: Biblical Reflections, Paramus NJ, Paulist, 1970
- H. von Campenhausen, Ecclesiastical Authority and Spiritual Power in the Church of the First Three Centuries, Stanford, Stanford UP, 1969, pp.76-123
- D.N. Power, Ministers of Christ and His Church: Theology of the Priesthood, London, Chapman, 1969
- P.S. Wright, The Presbyterian Elder, rev. W.B. Lane, Louisville, Westminster John Knox, 1992.

PRIESTHOOD

AS A CULTIC term connected with the offering of sacrifice, "priesthood" is problematic in ecumenical discussions at the point where the theology of ministry* intersects with the theology of the eucharist.* The Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches teach a ministerial priesthood that is exercised in the celebration of the eucharist and that is distinct from the common priesthood of all the baptized exercised in the pursuit of a life according to the gospel and culminating in the act of worship. The first is indeed related to the second and is intended to bring it to fruition, but it is particular inasmuch as it means an exercise of sacramental ministry and offering performed in the person of Christ. Without the power given to the ordained ministry to perform this service, the common priesthood could not be nurtured or expressed in the service of the eucharistic sacrifice.

With the teaching of the Second Vatican Council* on the laity,* the Roman Catholic Church began to give much more prominence to the active role of the baptized in teaching, apostolate and worship than it had done for some centuries, but it continues to give some preference to the use of the word "priesthood" in speaking of the sacramental powers and ministry of the ordained and to teach a difference in kind rather than in degree between common priesthood and ministerial priesthood. This understanding of the term therefore remains a point of tension in the dialogue between the Roman Catholic Church and the Protestant churches, although the tension has been eased somewhat by reason of the agreements formulated on the nature of the eucharistic sacrifice, when seen in its proper sacramental relationship to the sacrifice of the cross. Nonetheless, it continues to be disputed whether priesthood in the New Testament sense is to be used only of the baptized and of the church as a body, or whether it has a more particular meaning in the case of the ordained.

The roots of the dispute are found in the early Christian assumption of sacerdotal terminology to speak of the church and the faithful, and later of its worship and ministries. The initial tendency of NT writers was to eschew any direct use of priestly terms, so as to contrast the gospel with the older covenant.* Even in the case of Christ's death, formal use of sacrificial language is low key, the principal purpose of any reference to it being to indicate that this redeeming death is the fulfilment of the Old Testament types, including the sacrificial ones such as the paschal lamb and the covenant sacrifice. The letter to the Hebrews deliberately writes of Jesus Christ* as priestly mediator and of his death and heavenly intercession as priestly. Whenever a cultic term is used in the NT in reference to the church,* it is to designate a life according to the gospel, acts of mutual service, and the ministry of apostolic preaching. In a more general way, the church as a body is called a living sacrifice, a royal priesthood, a temple of God's Spirit, for in its obedience to the gospel, true worship is rendered to God, and the glory of God is made manifest to all. Some Catholic exegetes believe that this usage is a legitimate foundation for the language of ministerial priesthood, but the point is controversial.

In the post-apostolic church, sacrifice and priesthood began to be used of the eucharistic prayer, or more generally of the eucharistic celebration, by way of such OT texts as Mal. 1:10, or by way of contrasting this one sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving with the religious sacrifices of the Jews and of the pagans. With 3rd-century writers like Hippolytus and Cyprian, the bishop began to be called a priest because of his presidency of the eucharist, where he offers the gifts. Subsequently this term is used also of presbyters who join the bishop in this ministry or take his place (see presbyterate). When writers such as John Chrysostom made a formal link between the action of the bishop and the heavenly liturgy of Christ the High Priest, sacerdotal language was the natural way of expressing that relation. Hence, in the use of sacerdotal terminology the relation of the minister to Christ came more into the forefront than did his relation to the people. Medieval and scholastic theology then related the priesthood of the minister to his action in persona Christi and gave the ministerial priesthood decided priority over the common priesthood. In face of the problems of the reformers, the council of Trent* formally taught the priesthood of the sacrament of order and its connection with the eucharistic sacrifice.

Many of the dialogues which have taken place between the Roman Catholic Church and other churches since the Second Vatican Council have found some reconciliation of differences in the new accent on the priesthood of the church as such, both common and ministerial; in the sacramental and memorial understanding of the eucharistic sacrifice; in the clear relationship of the ministerial priesthood to the common priesthood, both in worship and in the church's obedience to the gospel; and in the clear subordination of both to the one priesthood of Jesus Christ. Thus Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* states: "Ordained ministers are related, as are all Christians, both to the priesthood of Christ, and to the priesthood of the church. But they may appropriately be called priests because they fulfill a particular priestly service by strengthening and building up the royal and prophetic priesthood of the faithful through word and sacraments, through their prayers of intercession, and through their pastoral guidance of the community" (M17).

The statement in BEM is quite irenic, but it glosses over the particular sacramental relation to Christ which the Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches predicate of the ordained bishop and presbyter. Thus other dialogues, such as that between the Vatican Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity and the Lutheran World Federation,* note a continuing divergence in the use of priestly predicates and in sacramental practices, highlighting the sacrifice of the ordained minister, sanctioned by the Roman church but found unsatisfactory by the Lutheran. For its part, in response to the ARCIC (see Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue) statements on eucharist and ministry, the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith found the priestly and sacrificial nature of both eucharistic action and ordained ministry underdeveloped. In offering the response to this request for clarifications, ARCIC II stated that it preferred not to use the word "character" to describe the quality of ordained ministry. Instead, it chose to express the reality intended by the word by emphasizing the Spirit's seal on the minister and the irrevocability of the call given and the gifts bestowed. With regard to the role of the ordained minister in the eucharist, the ARCIC response underlined that it is only an episcopally ordained minister who presides at the eucharist, and that this presidency is exercised in Christ's name, bringing the whole congregation into Christ's self-offering.

While there is a growing consensus on the role of the ordained minister in the life and liturgy of the church, differences still remain over the use of the term "priest" and over the sacramentality of order and ordination.* The 1991 report from the Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue,* The Apostolic Tradition, expressed the considerable accord reached but located the difference between the two churches in the preferred use of the term "sacrament" on the one side and of the term "sign" on the other. This and similar positions also affect the precise understanding of the relation between the common priesthood of the faithful and the priesthood attributed to the ordained.

See also episcopacy, sacrament(s).

DAVID N. POWER

- B. Cooke, Ministry to Word and Sacraments: History and Theology, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1976, pp.525-657
- R.J. Daly, Christian Sacrifice: The Judaeo-Christian Background before Origen, Washington DC, Catholic Univ. of America Press, 1978
- J.H. Elliott, The Elect and the Holy: An Exegetical Examination of 1 Peter 2:4-10 and the Phrase "basileion hierateuma", Leiden, Brill, 1966
- W. Lazareth, "Priest and Priesthood", in The Encyclopedia of the Lutheran Church, 2, 1964-66
- A. Marriage, The People of God: A Royal Priesthood, London, Darton, Longman & Todd, 1995
- J.-M.R. Tillard, "What Priesthood Has the Ministry?", OC, 9, 1973
- A. Vanhoye, Old Testament Priests and the New Priest according to the New Testament, Petersham MA, St Bede's, 1986.

PRIMACY

PRIMACY is one of the burning ecumenical issues. The difficulty springs from two sources: first, the biblical texts which speak of Peter's special role within the apostolic community make no reference to a succession in the fulfilling of this function; second, the subsequent functioning of the Roman primacy has raised problems to do with prestige and power that have frequently seemed intractable. The issue of primacy was central to the separation between East and West (see East-West confrontation) and, within the West, to the division at the Reformation.*

PRIMACY IN ECUMENICAL DIALOGUES

The achievements in this area that have followed the entry of the Roman Catholic Church into the ecumenical dialogue are significant. There has been convergence and even agreement on some points, which is particularly evident in The Final Report of ARCIC I (1981) (see Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue). It is there recognized that the New Testament references apply to Peter and not to his successors. However, a broader interpretation of the way in which God in his providence (i.e. in the patristic sense of this term) acts on behalf of his church* permits the affirmation that the primacy is in accord with God's plan. Indeed, the care of the churches, with their need to remain visibly united in their confession of faith,* sacramental life and mission,* requires a ministry of this nature. The only episcopal see that lays claim to this office is Rome, the city which preserves the witness of Peter and Paul, who were martyred there (Final Report, Authority I, nos 22-23; Authority II, nos 2-9,33). Nevertheless, the form in which the primacy is exercised continues to be problematic. Nor was it possible to reach full agreement on an understanding of infallibility* (Authority II, nos 29,31).

The Methodist-Roman Catholic joint commission (see Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue) has paid equal attention to this question (Nairobi report, 1986, nos 39-75). Agreement was achieved with regard to the role attributed to Peter in the NT (nos 39-47) and to the need for a ministry of authority* (no. 48), but the matter of the Roman primacy raised difficulties when it was faced concretely. While the idea of primacy remains alien to Methodists (no. 37), they admit that it could be useful (no. 58). The Catholic viewpoint is objectively presented in this report, but the Methodists declare that, if they should some day come to accept some degree of primacy and leadership from the bishop of Rome, their reasons might differ from those affirmed by the Roman Catholic Church today.

In the USA the Lutheran-Roman Catholic group (see Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue) has examined the problem in depth (Lutherans and Catholics in Dialogue, vols 5-6). For the sake of unity* and the universal mission of the church, the Lutherans are prepared to accept an authentic Petrine office (5.28,30), provided it would be purged of the aberrations condemned by the Reformation, become pastoral rather than juridical, respect evangelical freedom, submit to the authority of the word of God* and safeguard the spiritual inheritance of the Lutheran tradition. Infallibility wisely construed, which would be concerned with the faith and refrain from the oppressive use of authority, could be of service to the Spirit in guiding the church towards the fullness of truth.

These conclusions are close to those of the French Dombes Group. Its document of 1985 on Le ministère de communion dans l'Eglise universelle (Documentation catholique, no. 83, 1986) proposed that the Petrine office should be at the service of a universal communion,* acting primarily as an arbitrator between churches, as a guide in discerning new directions for the future and as the bond and promoter of visible unity (nos 152-62). But a primacy of power and centralized authority is not acceptable (nos 136,153).

There has as yet been no statement on this subject from the Orthodox-Roman Catholic commission (see Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue). However, it is clear that as a result of the warm exchange of words and gestures between Paul VI and Athenagoras (see Tomos Agapes: Vatican-Phanar, 1958-70, 1971), Orthodoxy is changing the way it looks at the primacy of the bishop of Rome. The harsh stance taken by the encyclical of the four patriarchs in response to Pius IX's invitation (In Suprema Petri Sede, 6 January 1848) is no longer that of Athenagoras, who describes the ancient see of Rome as first according to honour and order. But the Orthodox churches would find it difficult to accept a Roman primacy which differed from that of the first few centuries, even if some Orthodox sense the need for a ministry of unity in a form different from the one presently exercised by the patriarch of Constantinople.

PRIMACY IN THE HISTORIC ROMAN CHURCH

From a historical perspective the primacy of Rome is that of a local church* in the city where the witness of Peter and Paul was fused by their martyrdom into an indivisible confession of faith. In Peter, this faith is linked to the preaching of Jesus and the memory of the Twelve, who represent Israel and the privileged witnesses to the life, death and resurrection of the Lord. In Paul, the newness of the faith, its universal mission and its radical openness are revealed. Because the church located in Rome is thus the guardian of this apostolic witness (see apostolic tradition, apostolicity), its directives are to be followed in order to preserve unity. In looking to Rome in times of crisis, the other churches remain, or should remain, free from any interference in their own internal affairs, because the Roman primacy is not based on domination.

Each bishop is the representative of his local church; the bishop of Rome is thus present as guardian and instrument of the primacy of the church of Peter and Paul. He continues the function of leadership exercised among the apostles by Peter, who had particular concern for the faith both before and after Pentecost,* first as spokesman for the apostolic group and then later as its leader. It is in this context that the words "strengthen your brothers" (Luke 22:32) and even "you are Peter" (Matt. 16:18) should be applied to the bishop of Rome. This background provides the basis of the conviction that through the bishops of the see of Rome, the primacy entrusted to Peter survives as the bond of communion with the authentic apostolic tradition.

However, it is a primacy which is an integral part of, and inseparable from, the episcopal body (see episcopacy). The point of departure was "Peter himself, a single person" (Cyprian, On the Unity of the Catholic Church, 4-5), but with him it is the whole collegium that becomes involved. As Augustine explained: "If Christ spoke to one person alone, it was in order to emphasize unity" (Sermons 295.2-8; Letters 53.2; Homilies on the Gospel of John 124.5). Primacy must be understood within this framework.

Until the intervention of Leo the Great (440-61) at Chalcedon,* ecumenical councils* were in communion with Rome without being under its authority. The element essential to these assemblies was their communion in faith and spirit, a requirement to which the Eastern church adheres to this day. Before Leo there was no submission to a primacy of jurisdiction. A turning point came when Leo asserted his sense of the rightful authority he had as bishop of Rome, which was the meaning of his intervention at Chalcedon, where his legate occupied the chief seat beside Patriarch Anatolius. He also intervened when the rights of some episcopal sees were being infringed. His function was one of service.

The exercise of the prerogatives of Rome was remarkably balanced under Gregory the Great (590-604), but this spirit gradually gave way to an increasing claim to absolute power. Gregory VII laid down regulations for the functioning of this power in Dictatus Papae (1075), and Innocent III (1198-1216) went as far as to say that the ancient patriarchal churches had received their privileges from the church of Rome. The rupture with the Eastern churches, followed by the conciliar controversy (see conciliarity), led to a further hardening of attitudes in the West and resulted in the view of a church governed by a pontiff who looked on the other bishops as his vicars rather than as brothers.

Against the background of these later developments, Vatican I's* constitution Pastor Aeternus sounds moderate. In it the raison d'être of the Roman primacy is viewed as the close unity of the bishops and the koinonia* of all Christians (DS 3050-52). Vatican I made it clear that the primacy belongs to the church of Rome and that it takes effect in the bishop of Rome through the exercise of a genuinely episcopal authority (DS 3060) that does not restrict the authority of other bishops over their own flock (DS 3061). The Roman primate is bishop of Rome, but he is not bishop of any other local church. Nevertheless, he does have over the faithful of other local churches a power which is “immediate” (i.e. does not necessarily pass through any intermediaries) and “ordinary” (i.e. is not delegated but is given by virtue of his function).

VATICAN II AND PRIMACY

Vatican II did no more than re-read Pastor Aeternus by placing it within the totality of Tradition.* In this way it opened itself to the challenge brought by the Orthodox churches. According to Vatican II the bishop of Rome is a member of the episcopal college, which, as such and in its entirety, inherits all that is transmissible of the functions which pertained to the apostolic group. The Roman primacy is that of the head within this college. Yet for the college as such to have the full and supreme power over the whole church, it must be united with its head, the bishop of Rome. He, however, may not consider himself as above the college even when, by virtue of his special responsibility, he uses his freedom to intervene.

Since Vatican II the Catholic conscience has become more aware that this primacy is, by its very nature, a ministry of communion. The diversity of traditions, circumstances and peoples is the concrete expression of the local churches; and the safeguarding of their communion is the charge of the bishop of Rome acting in accordance with Christ’s will, which was first affirmed in the vocation of Peter.

Koinonia is not confined to a mere “being-together”. It requires unanimity in the profession of faith despite diversity of expression. On major points, it requires someone to point out the errors to be avoided. It needs information to be passed to all the churches concerning the ways some of them seek to resolve common problems. Finally, it calls for the admonition of any groups which seriously depart from the common faith and practice.

In his encyclical letter Ut Unum Sint, John Paul II stressed in a new way the necessity for all the churches to “receive” this service of primacy. He also asked the leaders and theologians of all the churches to discuss with him in “a patient and fraternal dialogue” what would be the best way to exercise a real ecumenical primacy. He acknowledged the desire expressed at the fifth world conference of Faith and Order to reconsider seriously this issue, which he considered essential to his ministry.

J.-M.R. TILLARD

- N. Afanassieff, N. Koulomzine, J. Meyendorff & A. Schmemmann, La primauté de Pierre dans l'Eglise orthodoxe (ET The Primacy of Peter, Leighton Buzzard, UK, Faith, 1973) ■ J.J. von Allmen, La primauté de l'Eglise de Pierre et de Paul: Remarques d'un protestant, Fribourg, Ed. universitaires, 1977 ■ C.E. Braaten & R.W. Jenson eds, Church Unity and the Papal Office: An Ecumenical Dialogue on John Paul II's Encyclical "Ut Unum Sint", Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 2001 ■ J.F. Puglisi ed., Petrine Ministry and the Unity of the Church, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1999 ■ R. Brown, K.P. Donfried & J. Reumann eds, Peter in the New Testament, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1973 ■ J.R. Quinn, The Exercise of the Primacy: Continuing the Dialogue: Essays, P. Zagano & T.W. Tilley eds, New York, Crossroad, 1998 ■ J.R. Quinn, The Reform of the Papacy: The Costly Call to Christian Unity, New York, Crossroad, 1999 ■ K. Schatz, Der päpstliche Primat (ET Papal Primacy from Its Origins to the Present, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1996) ■ J.-M.R. Tillard, L'évêque de Rome (ET The Bishop of Rome, Wilmington DE, Glazier, 1983).

PRO ORIENTE

FOUNDED in 1964 by Cardinal Franz König of Vienna, the Pro Oriente foundation promotes eclesial relations between the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) and the Eastern churches: the Eastern Orthodox,* the Oriental Orthodox* (also called pre-Chalcedonian: Coptic, Syrian, Armenian, Ethiopian, Eritrean and Indo-Syrian), and the Assyrian (pre-Ephesian). PO does so through scientific research, publications and visits which contribute to a better mutual understanding of the Christian East.

PO's first ecclesiological colloquium in 1974 between RC and Eastern Orthodox theologians helped lead to the official theological dialogue between the RCC and the Orthodox local autocephalous churches, with the aim to “advance towards the re-es-establishment of full communion between the Catholic church and the Orthodox sister churches” (Patriarch Dimitrios I and Pope John Paul II, 1979; see churches, sister).

PO initiated relations with the Romanian Orthodox Church by inviting Romanian bishops to ecumenical symposia and conferences and by the visits of Cardinal König to Romania (1967) and the Romanian patriarchs Justinian (1968) and Teoctist (1987) to Vienna. PO improved relations between the Ethiopian Orthodox church and the RCC. Ethiopian Orthodox theologians participated in the five consultations, and Patriarchs Tekle Haimanot (1981) and Paulos (1993) were visiting guests of the RCC in Austria and later of John Paul II in Rome.

PO sponsored five Vienna consultations between RC theologians and those of the Oriental Orthodox (1971, 1973, 1976, 1978 and 1988), which formed the first dialogue with the RCC and whole family of Oriental Orthodox churches since the schisms at the ecumenical council* of Chalcedon (451). The Vienna agreement on Christology (“Wiener Christologische Formel”) avoided the disputed definition of Chalcedon. Study seminars and regional symposia continue the dialogue.

In 1994 PO started a new round of dialogue with the Assyrian Church of the East* in the framework of all branches of the Syriac tradition (non-Chalcedonian and Eastern Catholic*), thereby assembling for the first time all churches concerned from the Middle East and India.

PO has organized over 100 ecumenical symposia in Vienna, as well as theological conferences and scientific symposia; sponsored three exhibitions of icons; published 60 volumes on ecumenical, theological and historical subjects (in German, English, French, Russian, Greek, Arabic and Malayalam); and provided several scholarships to Orthodox students.

FRANZ GSCHWANDTNER

- German publications, 25 vols, Innsbruck, 1975-2000
- Oikoumene: Dialogue and Problems, 4 booklets, Salonika, 1998-2000 (in Greek)
- Syriac Dialogue, 1994-2000, 4 vols, Vienna, 1995-2000
- Vienna Dialogue, 10 booklets, Vienna, 1990-99
- Wort und Wahrheit, suppl. issues 1-5, 1972-88 (papers and minutes of five Oriental Orthodox-RCC consultations).

PROGRAMME TO COMBAT RACISM

RACISM* IS denounced as incompatible with the Christian doctrine of the human being and the nature of the church of Christ. But for over 40 years (between the 1925 Stockholm Life and Work conference and the 1968 Uppsala assembly), the churches within the ecumenical movement were not sure how to combat it. In those years over 30 statements had been issued, condemning racial discrimination and racism. But despite some humanitarian programmes to help the victims of racism, there was no success in tackling the problem at its roots.

In the 1960s eminent Christians like Martin Luther King, Jr, Albert Luthuli and Eduardo Mondlane deeply influenced the racism debate, and King’s assassination only weeks before he was to address the WCC’s Uppsala assembly in 1968 gave the matter an urgent focus. The assembly urged the WCC to “embark on a vigorous campaign against racism” and to undertake “a crash programme to guide the Council and member churches in the matter of racism”.

More pressure came in 1969 from a WCC-sponsored world consultation on racism held in Notting Hill, London. In an emotional and often confrontational meeting, representatives of the racially oppressed demanded, among other things, a boycott of all institutions supporting racism, a fund for the payment of “reparations” for the injustices suffered over the centuries, and support for the armed struggle of oppressed blacks in situations where all other means had failed. Though these demands were not met, they certainly influenced the recommendations to the WCC central committee, which set up the Programme to Combat Racism. Out of a heated and emotional debate, a five-year mandate was adopted for the programme. It was renewed in 1974, and PCR’s activities continue under the mandate of the WCC’s team on justice, peace and creation.

PCR’s scope and focus was to deal with racism as a worldwide problem.

However, the coincidence of an accumulation of wealth and power in the hands of white people, as a result of their historical and economic progress during 400 years, made it necessary to give special attention to white racism in different parts of the world. The member churches were called upon to confess their involvement in the perpetuation of racism and to allocate a significant portion of their total resources, without employing paternalistic mechanisms of control, to organizations of the racially oppressed and those supporting the victims of racism.

PCR's mandate stipulated five major emphases: (1) white racism, which in its many forms is by far the most dangerous; (2) institutionalized racism, as reflected in social, economic and political power structures which use racism to enhance their power; (3) the need for a re-distribution of social, economic, political and cultural power from the powerful to the powerless as an essential aspect of combating racism; (4) the absence of a single, universally appropriate strategy for combating racism; (5) the need to analyze and correct the churches' complicity in benefiting from and furthering racism.

A commission on the PCR was appointed to guide its work and to make specific policy and programme recommendations to the central committee. The new sub-unit developed a list of programmatic categories for its work, ranging over the many aspects of worldwide racism, initiated research and published material on different forms of racism and the struggle of the oppressed. It also became responsible for the administration of the WCC special fund to combat racism, from which annual grants are made to racially oppressed groups and organizations supporting the victims of racism. From 1970 to 2001 a total of more than US$12 million was distributed.

Much of PCR's attention and energy has been focused on Southern Africa. As a result of research and recommendations, beginning in 1972 the central committee made policy decisions on (1) a withdrawal of investments from Southern Africa, (2) an end to bank loans to the South African government, (3) a break in WCC relations with banks doing business with South Africa, (4) a halt to white emigration to Southern Africa, (5) a rejection of South Africa's bantustan policy, (6) a mandatory arms embargo and a halt to nuclear collaboration with South Africa, and (7) comprehensive sanctions against South Africa.

In addition, PCR sponsored a number of important consultations between church and liberation movement leaders, as in Lusaka 1987 and Harare 1988, which helped to chart the course of international church support for the struggle against apartheid.* In 1989 an eminent church persons group visited a number of countries that have a high level of economic ties with South Africa, to encourage them to maintain their boycott.

As changes began to come to South Africa in 1989 and 1990, PCR supported preparations for the historic National Conference of Churches in South Africa (Rustenburg* 1990). The meeting took place 30 years after the Cottlesloe* consultation, the watershed in WCC relationships with Afrikaner churches and the South African government.

While Southern Africa remained a priority, PCR has also focused on the struggle of indigenous people and land rights in general (see land). A 1989 land rights consultation, held in Darwin, Australia, affirmed the inherent right of indigenous peoples to self-determination and control of their territories, as well as the establishment of their governments and the maintenance of their traditional cultural and religious practices.

PCR also developed a programme on women under racism, designed to give visibility to issues and concerns of women who suffer from triple oppression: racism, sexism* and classism. In 1986 a world consultation was held on the issue in Geneva. Emphasis is placed on indigenous and dalit women (in India) and on the issue of race and tourism, its impact on the rights and the dignity of women as well as the effects on indigenous values and culture.* Following a global gathering of women in Trinidad and Tobago in 1992, an international network of information and action, called Sisters (Sisters In the Struggle To Eliminate Racism and Sexism), was established.

PCR has been significantly involved in discussions about the resurgence of racism in Europe and has extended its support work with minority groups in Asia and South America. The dramatic increase in institutional and community racism in the USA has meant new PCR efforts in that country, including a 1993 campaign on racism as a violation of human rights.

Over the years, PCR has given considerable attention to racism in education. In 1978 a study was made on racism in school textbooks, and in 1990 PCR organized a consultation in Toronto on racism in education and the media, with emphasis on North America.

After the lifting in 1990 of the bans on the liberation movements in South Africa and the release from prison of Nelson Mandela, the leader of the African National Congress, the WCC, in cooperation with the Roman Catholic Church, started the Ecumenical Monitoring Programme in South Africa in 1992. It became a major joint venture of the churches, both nationally and internationally, to monitor violence, negotiations and the first democratic elections in 1994.

The end of constitutional apartheid drew PCR to include, as a priority, the plight of indigenous peoples. In 1991 the Canberra assembly adopted a statement of commitment to indigenous peoples and to land rights entitled "Move beyond Words". It acknowledged indigenous peoples as the victims of racism and recognized that respect for their spirituality and culture needed to be restored. The WCC's unique contribution on this issue has been to link the issues of land and spirituality.

A dalit solidarity programme in support of the 200 million people of India outside the caste system, who have been victims of discrimination for centuries, became one of PCR's priorities in the early 1990s. In Africa PCR gave considerable attention to the struggle of the Ogoni people in Nigeria, as a part of its involvement in ethnicity work.

PCR, from its beginning, has been one of the most controversial among WCC initiatives. While there was strong support from many member churches, there was also criticism, especially over its sup-

