port of liberation movements in Southern Africa. Some of those movements are now legitimate governments, and the WCC and PCR's vision and commitment have been vindicated. Indeed PCR is now often pointed to as one of the ecumenical success stories. All WCC units and sub-units were forced to deal with racism as it affected their respective mandates. Member churches were challenged in an unprecedented way to take a stand and to become actively involved in racial issues. The WCC had taken sides with the racially oppressed; charity was being replaced by solidarity. The WCC became more relevant to the majority of Christians and even to people of other faiths. Concrete action against racism severely tested the ecumenical fellowship, but it did not break.

BALDWIN SJOLLEMA

- E. Adler, A Small Beginning: An Assessment of the First Five Years of the PCR, WCC, 1974
- J. Mutambirwa, South Africa: The Sanctions Mission, WCC/ZED Books, 1989
- PCR Information, reports and background papers, 1979-91
- B. Rogers, Race: No Peace without Justice. Churches Confront the Mounting Racism of the 1980s, WCC, 1980
- B. Sjollema, Isolating Apartheid. Western Collaboration with South Africa: Policy Decisions by the WCC and Church Responses, WCC, 1982
- J. Vincent, The Race Race, London, SCM Press, 1970
- P. Webb ed., The Long Struggle: The Involvement of the WCC in South Africa, WCC, 1994.

PROPERTY

DEFINITIONS of what constitutes property, as well as attitudes towards ownership, vary with different cultures and epochs. Property is what is owned, but all theories on property depend on the respective economic systems and ideologies (from Proudhon's "property is theft" to the libertarian "taxation is theft", to limitations on water rights, mineral rights, intellectual property, trademarks, design, copyright etc.).

The basic biblical criteria and attitudes towards property are relevant and valid in any society. Because God is the absolute owner of all things, no individuals or groups have absolute ownership of property, but all human beings are responsible to God as stewards (Ps. 24:1). Limitations are found in the prescriptions of the sabbatical year (Ex. 21:2, 23:10; Deut. 15:12) and the year of Jubilee (Lev. 25:10). The prophets of the Old Testament reveal God's bias in favour of the oppressed and the poor, widows, orphans, slaves and foreigners, who need solidarity and help.

Jesus underlines the perils of wealth, although he does not condemn the possession of property or renounce ownership of land, house or money. While he does not condemn rich people as such, Jesus does point out the danger of accumulating earthly treasures (Matt. 6:19-21) and lays down the principle that life does not consist in the abundance of possessions (Luke 12:15). The kingdom of God* must come first; everything else is secondary and subsidiary (Matt. 6:33).

Property must be shared with others. As God's stewards, we are at the same time everyone's neighbours. Stewardship does not imply mastery over nature, economic forces and society, which would be corruption of neighbourliness. Both the New Testament letters and the history of the early church present examples of sharing (e.g. Acts 4:31-35; 2 Cor. 8:1-5; Phil. 4:10-20; Gal. 6:1-10).

Property is closely related to power.* The rich have power over the poor because of their economic strength. Although article 17 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) underlines the right of property as an individual and personal right, ownership also means social responsibility, and as a social right it must be socially justified in respect to its acquisition, its effect on the owner and its consequences for the rest of the nation or the world. Here, the question of scale is decisive. As the ownership of property increases (up to the level of the transnational corporation), so responsibility increases for the right use of power.

The ecumenical movement has from its beginning urged the Christian churches to work for greater justice in the distribution of the world's resources in order to narrow the yawning gap domestically and globally between rich and poor. (See various WCC conferences, e.g. Geneva 1966 on Church and Society, and MIT 1979; Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation, Seoul 1990; see also the Lutheran World Federation studies "Christian Ethics and Property", 1981-87, "Christian Ethics and Land", 1985-90; and the US Catholic bishops' pastoral letter on "Catholic Social Teaching and the US Economy".)

The findings of the ecumenical studies can be summarized as follows: (1) the churches need to be prophetic critics of all social, economic and political systems, of personal or systemic injustices; (2) the churches are called to represent their biblical concern for the poor and suffering of this world; (3) the churches should have a concern for life-styles that are simpler and involve less consumption, for ecology of "spaceship earth" as common property of humankind in longer-range planning, and for a balance between private rights to property and responsibility to the world of nations and to the public good.

BÉLA HARMATI

- H. Brattgaard, Im Haushalt Gottes (ET God's Stewards, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1963)
- M. Hengel, Eigentum und Reichtum in der frühen Kirche (ET Property and Riches in the Early Church, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1974)
- O. Hirmer, Marx-Money-Christ: An Illustrated Introduction to Capitalism, Marxism and African Socialism, Examined in the Light of the Gospel, Harare, Mambo, 1981
- J. Míguez Bonino, Toward a Christian Political Ethics, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1983
- National Conference of Catholic Bishops, "Catholic Social Teaching and the US Economy: Pastoral Letter", Washington DC, 1986
- L. Rasmussen, Earth Community, Earth Ethics, WCC, 1996
- M.L. Stackhouse, D.P. McCann & S.J. Roels with P. Williams eds, On Moral Business: Classical and Contemporary Resources for Ethics in Economic Life, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1995.

PROPHECY

PROPHECY is found in many religions, but it has occurred most significantly in religions of history* such as Judaism, Islam and Christianity. In the biblical tradition prophets are messengers of God in times of crisis, i.e. times of ambivalent and eschatological openness. They act out of a deeply felt personal relationship with, and obligation to, God. For their witness (martyria), they often pay with their lives (see martyrdom). They claim to have received special revelations from God ("Thus says the Lord" is a typical beginning of their message) which offer a radical alternative to existing beliefs, ethical standards or established structures, whether religious, societal or political. Since these structures are represented by priests and political leaders, prophets tend to stand in marked opposition to such figures. They are easily accused of being "false prophets", which indicates that prophecy cannot avoid the ambiguities of any partisan involvement in a critical moment of history.

As messengers, prophets belong to God, proclaiming God's glory, righteousness, anger or mercy. They act in the name of the God who is coming, who is ready to do new and unheard-of things. In the light of the advent of God, prophets proclaim and predict new historical developments. According to the nature of the crisis, these may be times of judgment and doom or of comfort and renewal. Prophets are not essentially interested in forecasting doom; they are endowed with the Spirit to see through, to disclose the future impact of present evils in order to call people to conversion. Therefore, prophecy has always a salvific dimension.

Jesus placed his ministry in the line of the great prophets before him, such as Moses, Elijah and Isaiah (e.g. Luke 4:17-21; Matt. 17:2). The early Christians were convinced that prophecy is a gift of the Holy Spirit* (a charisma*) as important as teaching, oversight (episcopate), or healing (1 Cor. 12:27-28 and elsewhere). Consequently, the Christian churches have always taught that the prophetic element is essential for the well-being of the church. But owing to the nature of prophecy, it could never be defined or instituted as a constitutive part of the churches' ministry. Mostly in hindsight, churches have come to acknowledge some of their servants and martyrs who had been much contested at their time as true prophets of God.

Similarly, some of the leading persons in the ecumenical movement have been acknowledged as prophetic. Laypersons such as John R. Mott, Robert Gardiner or Joseph Oldham, or clergy such as Nathan Söderblom, Charles Brent, Dietrich Bonhoeffer or Oscar A. Romero, are now revered as prophetic servants of the universal church in times of trial and persecution.

However, whether the ecumenical movement as such should be called prophetic is open to debate. Certainly it has the role of reminding the churches of their shortcomings (such as lack of unity,* sharing and solidarity*). In this way some messages and actions of the WCC have had all the characteristics of prophetic witness.

The Faith and Order* study on "God in Nature and History" (1967) expressed the hope that the WCC would be able, if necessary, to "pronounce the right prophetic words in the name of the churches". The WCC's 1968 assembly placed itself under a markedly prophetic word: "Behold, I Make All Things New". Its decision to embark on the Programme to Combat Racism* was greeted by some as prophetic, discarded by others as too worldly. As none dare to call themselves prophets unless they are prepared to carry the terrible burden of such a calling, so no one dare designate or label from outside who or what is prophetic. Prophecy is something awaited in prayer and to be followed in discipleship.

As the churches grow together in their common calling to serve the world and each other, they also owe to each other the elementary charism of prophecy. But to identify this charism with a particular institution or movement is incompatible with the nature of prophecy. It appears more appropriate to describe the role of the ecumenical movement in the words of one of the WCC general secretaries, Philip Potter, who wrote in 1981: "We... are called to be paracletes, to comfort and counsel one another. We are called to be beside each other, helping, exhorting, consoling, strengthening. That is what fellowship within our congregations and churches and between the churches around the world is all about."

See also revelation, witness.

GEIKO MÜLLER-FAHRENHOLZ

■ L. Boff, Igreja, Carisma y Poder (ET Church, Charism and Power, London, SCM Press, 1985) ■ B. Chenu, L'urgence prophé-

tique: Dieu au défi de l'histoire, Paris, Bayard, 1997 ■ J.E. Corbett, Becoming a Prophetic Community, Atlanta, John Knox, 1980 ■ A. Hastings, The Shaping of Prophecy: Passion, Perception and Practicality, London, Chapman, 1995 ■ G. Müller-Fahrenholz, Heilgeschichte zwischen Ideologie und Prophetie, Freiburg, Herder, 1974 ■ P. Potter, Life in All Its Fullness, WCC, 1981.

PROSELYTISM

IN THE NEW Testament, prosēlytos refers to a convert to Judaism (Acts 2:10). To induce someone towards such conversion* is to proselytize, and zealous efforts to do so are proselytism. Ecumenically, the term has acquired the negative connotation of the perversion of Christian witness* through secret or open improper persuasion such as bribery, intimidation or external coercion.

Proselytism became a major interchurch problem through Roman Catholic and Protestant missionary work in countries where other Christian churches were already present – e.g., among the Eastern Orthodox* and Oriental Orthodox* churches in the Middle East, Ethiopia and India, and among the RCs in Latin America. Since 1552 the activities of RC Western mission orders in the Middle East and Eastern Europe had helped to form Eastern Catholic churches* (in full communion with the church in Rome) from Orthodox church members, e.g. Armenian Catholic, Greek Catholic and Chaldean Catholic. In some areas, converts from Orthodox and RC backgrounds formed Protestant churches, e.g. the Presbyterian in Egypt, the Lutheran in Ethiopia, the Anglican in Palestine. The mother community regarded the formation of these churches as an act of proselytism; the missionaries saw them as the inevitable consequence of authentic witness to the gospel and the true church of Christ.

Agreement on the distinction between true witness* and unacceptable proselytism has thus become an issue of mutual ecclesial acceptance. Significantly, proselytism was studied around the time of increasing Orthodox involvement in the WCC, the integration of the International Missionary Council,* and Vatican II* (see common witness). The WCC third assembly (New Delhi 1961) commended the document on “Christian Witness, Proselytism and Religious Liberty”. In 1970 the Joint Working Group* between the Roman Catholic Church and the WCC (JWG) issued a study document on “Common Witness and Proselytism”.

Both documents point to the contrast between true witness and proselytism. The New Delhi statement affirms that mutual witness is an essential part of the ecumenical fellowship, including witness to Christians who have lost contact with their own church and who, through renewal, have been carried from one church into another. It may even lead to a witness against the doctrine and practice in another church believed to be contrary to truth (see the Toronto statement* of 1950). Equally, the right to change church affiliation on grounds of conscience is affirmed as part of religious liberty.*

The perversion of witness into proselytism depends on the intention and the means used. Every intention to divide another church or to draw members from it constitutes proselytism as is the offer of material or social advantages.

The 1970 JWG document offers more clarifying detail. “Proselytism embraces whatever violates the right of the human person, Christian or non-Christian, to be free from external coercion in religious matters or whatever in the proclamation of the gospel does not conform to the ways God draws free men [and women] to respond to God’s calls in spirit and in truth.” Proselytism in attitudes and behaviour includes “exploitation of the need or weakness or of the lack of education of those to whom witness is offered”, as well as “unjust or uncharitable reference to the beliefs or practices of other religious communities”.

Although a wide ecumenical consensus condemns proselytism in principle, the distinction between legitimate Christian witness or evangelism* and negative proselytism is not so easily drawn in practice, especially under circumstances such as intermarriage, competing congregations, immigrant and migrant contexts. The memory of some of the traumatic experiences of the past persists, and not all groups consider themselves bound by the ecumenical consensus.

A 1996 updated JWG study document, "The Challenge of Proselytism and the Calling to Common Witness", lists present tensions: well-intentional evangelistic activities which may often ignore the Christian reality of the "target" churches or their particular approaches to pastoral practices and missionary strategies which aim to re-evangelize baptized but "non-practising" members of other churches, even while there are different interpretations of who is "un-churched" or is a "true" Christian believer. Or in the climate of new religious freedom in some areas, some churches judge that others are pressuring their members to change their allegiance. For example, after the re-opening of Eastern Europe for more overt religious activities, some foreign missionary efforts are aggressively entering that predominantly Orthodox region in order to win adherents from the vulnerable local churches. The region has also witnessed aggravated tensions between the Eastern Catholic and Orthodox churches, e.g. in the Ukraine.

The JWG places these problems of religious freedom and proselytism in the ecumenical framework of church unity and common witness.* A similar approach is taken in the 1998 report "Evangelization, Proselytism and Common Witness" from the Pentecostal-Roman Catholic dialogue.*

PAUL LÖFFLER

- I. Bria, "Evangelism, Proselytism, and Religious Freedom in Romania: An Orthodox Point of View", JE Studies 36, 1-2, 1999
- "The Challenge of Proselytism and the Calling to Common Witness", ER, 48, 1996
- "Christian Witness, Proselytism and Religious Liberty in the Setting of the WCC", rev. report in Evanston to New Delhi, WCC, 1961
- Common Witness, WCC, 1981
- "Common Witness and Proselytism", ER, 23, 1971
- M. Marty & F. Greenspan eds, Pushing the Faith: Proselytism and Civility in a Pluralistic World, New York, Crossroads, 1988
- J. Witte, Jr & M. Bourdeaux, Proselytism and Orthodoxy in Russia: The New War for Souls, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1999.

PROSTITUTION, CHILD

CHILDREN HAVE been used in organized prostitution in Europe, Asia and the Middle East from earliest times. The practice became less common at the beginning of the 20th century, but the last decade has seen an alarming increase in the number of children used in prostitution. Estimates from UNICEF and governments indicate that there could be as many as 2 million children under the age of 16 years in forced prostitution worldwide. The growth has been attributed, inter alia, to fear of HIV/AIDS, a resurgence of patriarchal power, confused morality and the growth of tourism.

In May 1990 the Ecumenical Coalition on Third World Tourism convened an ecumenical consultation on Asian child prostitution in Chiang Mai, Thailand. This meeting received research documents prepared by national councils of churches which pointed to widespread use of children in prostitution in Thailand, the Philippines, Sri Lanka, India and Taiwan. It also concluded that foreign travellers were helping to fuel the demand for children as sex partners. The meeting set up a continuation committee which established an international non-governmental agency to be known as End Child Prostitution in Asian Tourism (ECPAT).

The new agency was initially funded by ecumenical development agencies in Germany, Sweden, the Netherlands, the United Kingdom and Australia, and headquarters were established in Thailand. The issue soon became international, and within three years ECPAT had 26 offices around the world. Initial success came with the decision of a number of governments to amend their extra-territorial laws to make possible the conviction of child sex abusers for crimes overseas: Germany passed the new law in 1993; France and Australia in 1994; the USA, Belgium and New Zealand in 1995.

Interpol set up a special branch to deal with child prostitution, and for the first time the issue was being seen as an international matter. By 1996 ECPAT had moved beyond Asia to become an international agency and had changed the meaning of its acronym to "End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking in Children for Sexual Purposes", following the three areas of child sex abuse listed in the UN convention on the rights of the child.

The first world congress against the commercial sexual exploitation of children was held in 1996 in Stockholm. The meeting was unique because it brought together government delegates with representatives of non-governmental organizations and churches working on the issue. Official delegations from 119 governments attended and adopted a declaration and an agenda for action which undertook to put in place by the year 2000 strategies which would help end child prostitution. A second world congress was held in Yokohama, Japan, in December 2001, with representatives from 134 governments participating.

RON O'GRADY

■ R. O'Grady, The Hidden Shame of the Church: Sexual Abuse of Children and the Church, WCC, 2001 ■ R. O'Grady, The Rape of the Innocent: One Million Children Trapped in the Slavery of Prostitution, Bangkok, ECPAT, 1994.

PROTESTANTISM

JUST AS THE disciples of Christ were only belatedly called Christians, so too those who supported the Reformation were called Protestants only from 1529 onwards. This was the date of the second diet of Speyer, when five princes of the holy Roman empire and 14 free cities "protested" against the decision taken three years earlier which had granted the princes (or cities) the right to decide as sovereigns what the religion of their subjects should be. In support of their stand they affirmed: "In matters which concern the honour of God and the salvation of our souls, every individual must stand alone before God and give an account." Until then the Protestants had been called by different names – Lutherans, Evangelicals, Huguenots. The term "Protestantism" has more than a negative side to it. Rather, it is an affirmation of the freedom of faith.*

One might think that Protestantism arose out of a challenge to the abuses of the Roman Catholic Church, such as the sale of indulgences, the second-rate quality of the lower clergy or the dissolute lifestyle of the higher clergy. But these abuses had been denounced already for over a century. Hence, the Reformation would have been original only in succeeding, at least partially, where others had failed. But at a more profound level, the Reformation criticized the importation of the Roman tradition into the gospel, such as the doctrines of purgatory, Mariology, the veneration of saints and the power of the clergy. Even here Protestantism is not wholly original, for it owes something to humanism, which commended a return to the primary documents – in this case, the holy scriptures. Many humanists, however, did not become Protestants; the most famous example was Erasmus (1467-1536).

THE DEVELOPMENT OF PROTESTANTISM

The real originality of Protestantism lies in its fresh reading of the Bible, which led Martin Luther (1483-1546), an Augustinian monk and theologian, to claim that Christians are "justified", i.e. they become righteous in the sight of God, not by their works and the merits which derive from these, but by God's grace* alone, received in faith and not by means of works (see justification). Even if human beings or the individual conscience approves these works, God in his holiness cannot accept them as righteous, for human beings are sinners through and through, and their works are evil (see sin). Only the redeeming work of Christ is pleasing to God, and in his grace God "reckons to us" the righteousness of Christ. Our righteousness is therefore external (forensis), for we are not its source, which does not mean that it is unreal, for God does accomplish what he tells us and promises to us in his creative word. Having become good trees, by grace alone, we bear good fruits, in so far as we continue to have faith in Christ crucified and raised. In turn, this faith is not a work; it is a gift of God, awakened in us by the Holy Spirit.*

Protestantism thus developed a new understanding of faith. Faith is not primarily intellectual assent to doctrines which the church,* its councils and the pope formulate. First and foremost, faith is a personal bond of trust in Christ and recognition of the rightness of the judgments which God pronounces on sinful human beings. At least in the beginning, Protestants unanimously recognized the ancient ecumenical symbols or creeds,* and even drew up their own doctrinal confessions of faith: Augsburg confession (1530), confession of La Rochelle (1559 and 1571), Scots confession (1560), second Helvetic confession (1560), Westminster confession (1646), etc. But these confessions are not standards with absolute authority. Only holy scripture – in so far as, in Luther's words, it is the bearer of Christ – has the force of the ultimate standard or court of appeal (norma normans); the confessions are standards only to the degree that scripture confirms them (norma normata).

Polemics naturally accused the Reformation of moral laxity because of its claim that works do not save. This censure is unfounded. While works cannot produce salvation,* they are nonetheless an essential to demonstrate that we have not received the righteousness of Christ in vain – or as the Heidelberg catechism (1563) says, to give evidence to God of our gratitude. This is the true basis of a rigorous Protestant ethic.

This ethic is all the more rigorous in that while Roman Catholic tradition progressively reduced good works to prayer, pilgrimages, charitable gifts, etc., Protestantism for both Luther and Calvin re-established the dignity of work* in the world, hence Luther's struggle against monastic vows, in which he saw a flight from Christian responsibilities in the world, the city and the family. Hence also Calvin's doubtless bolder initiatives to encourage trade and industry. Calvin's exegesis of relevant Old Testament passages clearly shows that they condemned loans at exorbitant interest rather than loans at interest rates that were intended to increase production. The clerical profession has no pre-eminent status for Christians; those who work to ensure a livelihood for their family, the prosperity of their town and help for the deprived are as worthy of respect as the minister entrusted with the proclamation of the word of God. One's trade, according to Luther, is also one's calling or vocation.*

This rehabilitation of secular work led certain sociologists and historians, especially Max Weber in The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1904-1905), to look for the origins of the capitalist quest in the Protestant ethic. But one must note, as Weber explicitly does, that it was the puritan spirit which above all provided the religious foundations and created the necessary mental attitudes for capitalist enterprise, at least in its beginnings. This thesis continues to find critics, who so far have managed only to clarify a thesis which in its essentials retains its full value.

Protestantism sought to reform the church from within but failed in this respect because of the intransigence of popes and the holy Roman emperor. The Protestant churches were compelled to constitute themselves as separate churches. But even before the schism* was completed, they evolved an ecclesiology different from Rome's. For a start, they asserted that the pope and even councils could be mistaken, that scripture remains the supreme arbiter, that it has a clarity of its own and that its obscure parts are clarified by its more self-evident passages. This was in embryo the modern idea – accepted by Protestantism and in large measure by Roman Catholic theologians today – that there is a canon within the biblical canon.*

Furthermore, while the Roman Catholic Church maintained that there is no church except where there are priests ordained by a bishop who is within the apostolic succession and in communion with the pope as the successor of Peter, the Reformation maintained that the church exists wherever the word of God* is rightly proclaimed and where the sacraments* instituted by Christ (i.e. only the two sacraments of baptism* and the Lord's supper, or eucharist*) are administered in agreement with the gospel. The church is a community of sinners who have been forgiven and, prompted by the Spirit, are brought together by the word of God.

Patently in its definition of the church, Protestantism gave pride of place to the event by which the people are brought together through the word, as compared with the institution as a socio-historical phenomenon. This is not to claim that Protestantism rejected all ecclesial institutions. As the schism moved towards its completion, it adopted a variety of institutional forms in its various denominations, but all of these institutions were marked by their collegial character and by the increasing role of the laity* in the government of the church (see church order).

Defining faith as a relation of personal trust in the Lord meant depriving the church of its power as an institution. No longer did the church mediate and dispense salvation, even as a secondary cause. Its one role is to proclaim and bear witness to the salvation which God effected in Christ, and to do so in the most varied ways – by preaching, administering the sacraments and declaring forgiveness (no longer itself doing the forgiving), and by mutual aid, service and the care of souls. Thus the church was made subordinate to the redeeming work of Christ, and ecclesiology depended on Christology. The church is a second reality. But it is not a secondary one, for it is and remains the Body of Christ, and all whom God has justified are brought into the church (in particular, by baptism); this body is called to grow in unity* and holiness.* Though the church has a divine foundation, it is not in itself a divine reality, and as an earthly institution it has its limitations. God alone knows who the true believers are; it is not up to the ecclesiastical institution to make this decision. This view explains why the practice of excommunication* eventually lost a great deal of its significance in the churches of the Reformation.

The ecclesiastical dispute with Rome has naturally been accompanied by a profound difference in regard to the ministry (see ministry in the church). That the ministry is an essential is not disputed in churches which resulted from the Reformation. But pastors are not priests, in that they have no special character or power which would distinguish them from laypeople. In principle, although pastors are ordained to their ministry, laypersons can carry out the same activities if the occasion arises and if they are called upon to do so by the constituted authorities. Already in 1520 Luther framed the Protestant doctrine of the priesthood of all believers, stating that all baptized Christians “can pride themselves on already being priests, bishops and pope”.

But he added, “It is not appropriate for each person to fulfill the same office”, because of his concern for order and his respect for each person’s calling.

The question of the nature of the ministry remains a stumbling block in the ecumenical dialogues begun some decades ago between the Protestant churches and the Roman Catholic and Orthodox churches. Difficulties over the mutual recognition of ministries remain a serious barrier in the quest for unity. The three confessions have been able to reach agreement on recognizing baptism, which in any case may be validly administered by a layperson, according to the Roman Catholic Church. But in regard to the Lord’s supper (or eucharist), there is no such recognition. According to present Roman Catholic teaching, there are certain values in the Lord’s supper celebrated in the Protestant churches, but the Lord’s supper is defective because it is not presided over by a minister considered validly ordained in the apostolic succession. Hence intercommunion* and a fortiori intercelebration are not possible. Rome does extend, within certain limits, eucharistic hospitality to baptized Protestants, but this is a one-way hospitality.

The current stage of the problem is found in connection with the 1982 WCC Faith and Order document Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry,* prepared by Protestant, Orthodox and Roman Catholic theologians. This document clearly shows that there has been some convergence on questions of ministry, but some responses still pose a continuing deadlock: Protestantism cannot give up its concept of the priesthood of all believers, nor can it acknowledge that its ministers have an intrinsic power to effect sacraments.

To sum up so far, one can define Protestantism in the three classic formulas: sola gratia (grace alone), sola fide (faith alone), sola scriptura (scripture alone) – to which Calvin liked to add soli Deo gloria (to God alone be glory).

THE EXPANSION OF PROTESTANTISM

International communications were not easy in the 16th century, yet the expansion of Protestantism was extremely rapid. Theologians and the clergy, and merchants too, were significant agents of that expansion. But it was checked by the wars of religion, persecutions (the Inquisition in Spain and Italy, the repressiveness of the monarchy in France, etc.) and the application of the principle in the (German) holy Roman empire that the sovereign in each region would decide the religion of his people, but also by the internal divisions in Protestantism between Lutherans, Calvinists and Zwinglians, especially in regard to the way Christ is present in the Lord's supper.

Nevertheless, Protestantism in its Lutheran form conquered central and eastern Germany, the Rhineland area of Germany and south of the River Main, the Baltic lands and Scandinavia. In its Calvinist form the Reformation spread in France (around 1560 nearly a third of the kingdom was Protestant) and in Switzerland, though there, especially at Zurich, it was also in a Zwinglian mode. In the Netherlands it took a Calvinist and also a Mennonite form.

England is a special case. The break with Rome was the result of a conflict between King Henry VIII and the pope, who refused to annul Henry's marriage with Catherine of Aragon. The schismatic Church of England (1534) was however quickly penetrated by Reformation ideas under the influence of Archbishop Thomas Cranmer of Canterbury, and of the Strasbourg reformer Martin Bucer, as the 1552 prayer book and the articles of religion show. In Jean Baubérot's words, the Church of England is "a theologically Protestant church with an ecclesiastical structure which has remained close to Roman Catholicism", while the Church of Scotland was and remained resolutely Calvinist. Protestantism was making headway also in the direction both of Bohemia, where the Bohemian Brethren had already prepared the ground, and of Hungary. The old church of the Waldensian valleys in northern Italy also rallied behind the Reformation.

In general terms, at the beginning of the 18th century confessional boundaries were more or less fixed, choices had been made, and the period of consolidation had begun which favoured both the emergence of denominational orthodoxies and a growing inflexibility on their part. This general comment finds two major exceptions: the (seeming) elimination of Protestantism in France by the revocation of the edict of Nantes (1685), and the progressive and continued growth of Protestantism in North America.

The Anglicans landed in Virginia in 1607 and converted certain Indians and blacks. The Anglican church they founded established itself also in the two Carolinas and, in the 18th century, in Georgia. But Protestantism's great triumph in North America was the work not of the Anglicans but of Puritan and Congregationalist Non-conformists from the Netherlands and from England, followed by the Baptists and the Methodists. While no religion is constitutionally "established" any longer there, many in the US saw their country as a great Protestant nation. However, significant immigration has resulted in a strong Roman Catholic presence, and the country has had a Roman Catholic president (John F. Kennedy). The state maintains diplomatic relations with the Vatican.

But Protestantism became divided. The above account has highlighted the reasons for the divisions of the large Protestant churches which stem directly from the Reformation. But from the 16th century onwards, further divisions arose. The Mennonites,* who continue to this day, reject infant baptism, adopt a principle of non-violence and assume an ascetic approach to the world. Anabaptism also rejected infant baptism and re-baptized adults but exhibited a variety of forms, pacifist on the one hand, violent on the other. The latter tendency gave it an affinity with the movement of Thomas Münzer (1489-1525), who originally supported Luther but later became his opponent. While commending a spiritualized form of Christianity, Münzer supported the peasants' revolt and died with those who took part in it. One can see in him a distant ancestor of present theologies of liberation.

MOVEMENTS OF RENEWAL OR AWAKENING

Through the 17th to 19th centuries, movements of renewal or awakening arose also in the historic Protestant churches. Some evolved within the church, such as pietism. Others, either by accident or design, ended up in schisms and in the founding of new churches which identify themselves as Protestant.

The first is the Baptist movement, with origins at the beginning of the 17th century. It is in fact the heir to Anabaptism, for it rejects infant baptism and considers as members only persons baptized after they make a personal confession of their faith and give signs of their conversion. The Baptists* are a church of those who personally profess their faith, as opposed to the churches of the masses which directly emerged from the Reformation. Fundamentally the Baptist movement is congregationalist. Only the local congregations are called churches, and they enjoy a great deal of independence. They are linked by conventions. Considered as a sect in many European churches, where they are a very small minority, the Baptists represent large, powerful conventions of churches in some other countries. In the USA, the Southern Baptist Convention is the largest Protestant denomination.

Then comes Methodism,* initially a movement of awakening which John Wesley (1703-91) led within the Church of England. But his para-church structures eventually led to separation from the national church, while in the newly independent USA Methodism became an autonomous church in 1784. In English-speaking countries Methodism became a strong, powerful and well-organized family of churches. Methodist churches of the American branch retained the episcopal system.

Many more small churches and denominations derive indirectly from the Reformation and maintain some links with the historic Protestant churches.

Despite – or sometimes because of – its divisions, Protestantism, from the end of the 18th century to our own day, has been distinguished by intense missionary activity (see missionary societies). Some dates illustrate the vitality of these missions, which had for their main fields of activity Africa and Madagascar, India, Southeast Asia, the Pacific islands and China: in 1792 the Baptist Missionary Society of London was founded; in 1795 the London Missionary Society; in 1799 the Dutch Mission at Rotterdam; in 1799 the (Anglican) Church Missionary Society; in 1810 the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (initially a joint undertaking, then Congregationalist) at Boston; in 1813 the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society at London; in 1814 the American Baptist Mission at Boston; in 1815 the Basel (Switzerland) Mission; in 1822 the Société des missions évangéliques de Paris (Paris Evangelical Missions Society). Many other missionary societies, often fundamentalist in type and of American origin, came into existence during the 19th and 20th centuries.

All these missions had considerable success. For example, French Protestantism, with only 1 million members, started missions in Africa, Madagascar and the Pacific, and brought 1.2 million converts to Christian faith. But they transferred overseas both a very Westernized form of Christianity and their own confessional divisions – with disastrous results. To put an end to this competition, the world missionary conference (Edinburgh 1910) launched an appeal for unity. This conference, which is conventionally reckoned as the start of the modern ecumenical movement, explains also Protestantism's significant role in the organization and personnel of both Life and Work* and Faith and Order* and in the creation of the WCC. To a greater degree than Eastern Orthodoxy, which had little overseas mission activity, Protestantism (including Anglicanism) was for long the vanguard of ecumenism.

In the European homelands, Protestantism has made little evangelistic progress. Since the end of the 16th century, confessional barriers between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism have, it seems, become fixed. There were, and still are, many individual conversions in both directions, but they are not statistically significant. Besides, since industrialization and urbanization made their appearance, neither Protestantism nor Roman Catholicism really has succeeded in reaching the de-Christianized masses, despite the numerous efforts which still continue. Except for the 1 million Baptists in the USSR, there has been no expansion of Protestantism in Europe.

In contrast, Protestantism has expanded remarkably in traditionally Roman Catholic Latin America and the Caribbean. In this vast continent there were only around 120,000 Protestants in 1920. In 2000 they numbered more than 35 million. In general, the evangelizing was not the work of the great historical churches but of the Pentecostals;* offshoots of both Congregationalism and Methodism, they began in North America in the early 1900s. Most often, the more intense Protestant evangelization has been in the small, conservative, often fundamentalist evangelical churches, rather than in the great historic churches, which are firmly established and highly institutionalized.

In 2000 there were about 340 million Protestants among about 2 billion Christians, in a world of 6.1 billion people. Churches do not all record their numbers in the same way. Most include children in their statistics, but churches opposed to infant baptism, such as Baptists, count only baptized adults. And churches vary on the registration of inactive members. Theologically and sociologically linked with the Protestantism of the Reformation as it is, the Anglican communion numbered 80 million members in 2000.

PROTESTANTISM TODAY

Thus Protestantism represents a relatively significant body of people in a world where Christianity is itself a minority. But the Protestant churches are divided, although they have a very substantial common theological basis and closely related forms of worship. How long will they remain so? This question is hard to answer. The great majority of the Protestant churches belong to the WCC, and the large confessional families such as the World Alliance of Reformed Churches,* the Lutheran World Federation,* the Anglican communion,* the Baptist World Alliance* and the World Methodist Council* increasingly undertake common activities and dialogues with a view to unity.

These dialogues have made particular progress between Lutheran and Reformed Christians. In Europe most Lutheran, Reformed and United churches approved the Leuenberg* agreement (1973), which established a complete "table and pulpit fellowship". In the USA, the Consultation on Church Union* was under way from the early 1960s. Finally, in many countries most Protestant churches are members either of a federation or of a national or regional Christian council, to which they delegate responsibility for taking certain common measures in ethics or socio-political life, and even, as in France, for some pastoral ministries and chaplaincies (prisons, hospitals, army).

In addition to the various unions of Protestant churches already effected between Reformed and Congregationalist bodies, Reformed and Methodists, etc. (of which the first was the United Church of Canada in 1925), other unions were under discussion in the early 21st century. Many past disputes have been overcome, and as a general rule a clear distinction is drawn in Protestantism between those increasingly fewer problems which still justify a separation of churches and those which reveal a legitimate diversity of theological trends. These latter, moreover, often cut across confessions and, for their part, do not justify retention of the boundaries between the churches.

The legal position of Protestantism in secular society varies greatly, from situations where there is a church-state agreement in the strict sense of the term "concordat" (with church ministers as state officials) to total separation of the churches and the state. Between these extremes are systems which are semi-concordats and forms of separation which do not exclude cooperation with the state and the allocation of various subsidies to the churches. In Germany, for instance, church and state are separate, but the state collects a church tax which is proportional to general taxation and passes it on to the churches. To be excused payment of this church tax, one must give official notice that one has left the church. In addition, regional subsidies (from the Länder) can be allocated to the work of the churches, and they support the university faculties of theology. In the USA church and state are separate, but issues such as prayers in the public schools are resolved in different ways depending on the decisions of the supreme court and of individual states. In all the Scandinavian countries except Sweden the sovereign is in theory head of the Lutheran church, but in practice the churches enjoy a very great deal of freedom. In the Church of England the monarch is legally “governor” of the church, and parliament retains a residual veto in matters of worship and doctrine. In France, to eliminate the grip of the Roman Catholic Church on the schools, a free compulsory secular primary school was established in 1881 (though confessional schools were not abolished), and in 1905, in an atmosphere of violent anticlericalism, a law separating the churches and the state was passed. Protestants had no difficulty in accepting this law, but not until 1923 did Roman Catholics accept it. Since then, relations have become less strained, and through social and medical work, etc. the state indirectly subsidizes the churches.

Since the demise of communist regimes in Central and Eastern Europe beginning in 1989-90, churches there have come to enjoy greater independence in relation to the state. Legal restrictions remain in force in several countries, applying particularly to minority religious groups. With the expansion of religious freedoms came an influx of programmes of evangelism* sponsored by churches and evangelical missions* based outside these nations. Churches long established in the region protested against this perceived proselytism,* sometimes to the point of calling for tightened state controls. Growing co-operation among the churches is encouraged by the joint committee of the Conference of European Churches* and the Council of the Conference of European Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church (see Europe: Central and Eastern).

Generally, Protestantism favours a legal arrangement under which it enjoys full autonomy from civil authorities not merely for preaching and teaching but also for its internal organization. This preference takes it back to its deepest roots. The Lutheran doctrine of the two “regiments”, or kingdoms (the spiritual and the temporal, which are parallel but essentially independent of each other), is a doctrine which Calvin fully adopted; in fact, it represents an initial form of secularity, clearly designed to be compatible with the political organization of Christendom at the time. When the political authorities and lay society were secularized, it was normal, in Protestant eyes, for secularity to take on new forms to ensure full freedom for the preaching of the gospel. This acceptance of a secularization* of state, institutions and public life in no way means that Protestantism had given up playing a part in society and withdrawn into itself for the sole task of saving individual souls. This temptation existed, but today it seems to have been removed.

THE SOCIAL ASPECTS

Protestantism has recognized that a human being created by God is a whole, that the body is part of the person, that everyone has a social and community dimension, and that the salvation promised in Jesus Christ relates to the whole human being. Under the influence of movements like the social gospel,* social Christianity, religious socialism, Life and Work, and finally the WCC, Protestantism, for the most part, sees that social justice, fair sharing of wealth and resources, the preservation of peace, and ecological balance in a world entrusted by God to human beings and preserved with a view to future salvation are not secondary tasks but in fact integral to preaching the gospel. This realization has been clearer and quicker in the churches that came directly out of the Reformation than in the individualistic type of evangelical churches, although the latter are also beginning to embrace these concerns.

At all times, indeed, the Protestant churches have pressed their members to practise charity, but they have seen that this personal activity was too limited to be really effective. Hence the emergence, especially from the 19th century onwards, of large charitable diaconal and nursing institutions. Many of these are still active today and seek to equip themselves with modern technological aids. But while these bodies contribute to healing certain wounds inflicted by industrial and urban society and by wars, they have not tackled the roots of the evil. Initially the Protestant churches paid special attention to preventing these evils, e.g. by setting up, even before states thought of it, organizations such as welfare centres and holiday camps for young people and structures for social workers. Several of these services then became models which inspired the state and lay society. Later on, these same churches thought they ought to contribute to creating a public opinion which would exercise pressure on the state to change unjust laws, encourage industrial concerns to undertake better sharing of profits, give their employees a share of power in decision making and more effectively combat unemployment.

Yet many Protestant churches played a significant part in combating the proliferation of nuclear weapons, in stopping nuclear test explosions – in fact supporting denuclearization. In these struggles the Protestant churches cooperate with other churches, political parties, trade unions, etc. And when cooperating with other social forces, the churches have almost always been concerned to preserve their own identity and not to let themselves be taken over by political parties whose ideology they refuse to accept.

Many qualifications of this description might be made. Members within the Protestant churches are not all of one mind, even on limited individual issues, when it comes to deciding on matters relating to the economy, politics or disarmament. Motions, even when approved by synods with a very large majority, do not have compelling power in Protestantism. Nevertheless, Protestant churches generally sense the need to exercise a watchful politico-social and if possible prophetic ministry, without succumbing to a politicization which would be disastrous both for the unity of the ecclesial community and for the gospel message itself. Protestantism thus treads along a narrow ridge from which it is hard not to stray. What matters is that Protestantism should, in agreement with scripture (esp. Rom. 12:1-2), remain a power for renewal and for changing the world and not be conforming to it.

Protestantism will be successful in this task only in so far as its theologies are well rooted in scripture, well worked out, and capable of giving substance to its preaching. In no way need these theologies be uniform. A great part of the 20th century, from the 1920s to 1960, was inspired by great theological systems – of a Karl Barth, a Reinhold Niebuhr, a Rudolf Bultmann, a Paul Tillich, a Dietrich Bonhoeffer – and by the vast amount of work done by Old and New Testament exegetes. In this last field Protestant scholars, who were the vanguard, are now joined by their Roman Catholic colleagues, and the work of exegesis* is now being carried on ecumenically. The great Protestant theological renewal, which eclipsed the traditional conflicts between orthodox, liberal and pietist thinkers, has temporarily come to a halt, as if to draw breath. Many theologians are concentrating on more limited fields. Their work is preparing the way for the very necessary renewals of tomorrow, for the theologies which relate to the indigenization of Christianity are still in their infancy, and the so-called liberation theologies (which are not specifically Protestant) are exciting ethical calls which must be listened to.

ROGER MEHL

- D.B. Barrett & T. Johnson, "Annual Statistic Table", IBMR, 24, 1, 2000
- G. Casalis, "Protestantism", in Encyclopaedia Universalis, Paris, Encyclopaedia Universalis, 1968
- P. Gisel, J. Baubérot et al. eds, Encyclopédie du protestantisme, Genève, Labor et Fides, 1995
- H.J. Hillerbrand ed., The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Reformation, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1996
- R. Mehl, Traité de sociologie du protestantisme (ET The Sociology of Protestantism, London, SCM Press, 1970).

PROVIDENCE

"PROVIDENCE" is a summarizing concept for God's general ordering of nature* and caring activity for the particulars of communal life and individual existence. According to traditional doctrine, providence comprises (1) God's upholding the creatures against nothingness, (2) God's cooperating with their created creativity, and (3) God's directing the worldly events to the fulfilment of their inner aims and God's eternal purpose of salvation.* This scheme, however, conceals the many faces of Christian belief in providence. While doctrinal theology has focused on God's global structuring of the world, spiritual traditions have rather highlighted the abandonment to divine providence in local situations of trial and temptation, of prayer and lament, of attentiveness or disobedience to divine will.

In the scriptures recognized by the Roman Catholic Church, the word "providence" (Greek pronoia, Latin providentia) is found only in Wis. 14:3, 17:2. Traditionally, the concept has been discerned also in Gen. 22:8 (Vulgate Deus providebit). Nevertheless, the idea of providence is central in the Old Testament: God* is the Lord of history* – Israel's and all nations' (e.g. Deut. 4:19; Amos 9:5-7; cf. Gen. 9:8-17). What God plans will be effected (e.g. Isa. 46:9-11). After the exile this idea of God's foreknowledge and all-directing reality was extended to the individual (e.g. Jer. 1:5; Ps. 139; cf. Gen. 50:20) and furthermore generalized (Wis. 8:1). Beside the idea of God's global providence in history, we find the notion of God's design for the local moment (kairos). God has made everything to suit its time (Eccles. 3:1-8), and human beings are called to act with timing, according to the God-given moment (Isa. 28:23-29; Prov. 15:23, 25:11; Sir. 4:20).

In the New Testament the active presence in creation* of the Triune God provides the cosmological background for soteriology (John 5:17; 1 Cor. 12:6; Acts 17:27). God cares for the lowest creatures, and even more for human beings. This statement of belief invites humans to participate in the praxis of faith: living without anxiety and loving without respect of persons (Matt. 5:45, 6:25-34, 10:29-31).

The soteriological interest is predominant in the NT. God's eternal plan (prothesis, e.g. Rom. 8:28; Eph. 3:11) extends to the universe as a whole (Rom. 8:19-23; Eph. 1:10; Col. 1:20). Although God's hidden purpose is revealed to the elect (Eph. 1:7-9), "the wisdom of God in its rich variety" (Eph. 3:10) exceeds all understanding (vv.18-19). The faith that God in everything cooperates for good with those who love him implies no mere optimistic Weltanschauung but means rather that no fate or fortune can separate from the love of Christ (Rom. 8:28,31-39; cf. Luke 13:1-5).

In the early church, the fathers very soon (1 Clement 20) elaborated the doctrine of providence by assimilating certain cosmological ideas of Plato, the Stoics and later Platonism. The polemics against the Epicurean doctrine of accident and fortune is unanimous from Justin Martyr (First Apology 28) onwards, and the charge of Epicureanism was raised also against the Gnostics (Irenaeus, Against Heresies 3.24-25). Stoic ideas of a ruling world-soul were corrected, in so far as they denied human freedom (Origen, On First Principles 3.1.6), and the dependency of fate on the purpose of God (Augustine, The City of God 5.8) was underscored. Nevertheless, providence was generally considered to be accessible to the minds of pious pagans.

Beside the problem of evil, the reconciling of God's omniscience and omnipotence with human freedom* was essential to the doctrine of providence. Among the Greek fathers, we find the idea of providence as part of divine pedagogy: God does not determine the particular course of events but awaits patiently the appropriate response of human freedom (so Origen, On First Principles 3.20). After the Pelagian controversy, the theologians of the West normally took the outcomes of the human free will to be predetermined: the will of the human person is embedded in a causal order, fixed by God; the will, however, does not act under external pressure, but according to its inner compulsion and thus is phenomenologically free (The City of God 5.9-10). Boethius formed a theory of a double perspectivity: seen from the point of view of eternity, God's knowledge is not a foreknowledge of future events but is a co-knowledge with any creature, being simultaneous with past, present and future time (Consolation of Philosophy 5.6). This theory was later adopted by Anselm and entered through Thomas Aquinas into Protestant dogmatics up to this day.

In scholastic theology, providence was normally considered as part of God's eternal knowledge and connected with predestination. Protestant dogmatics, inspired by nominalistic voluntarism, underlined the historical activity of God's providence. Consequently, the doctrine of providence was treated under the heading "creation". According to Luther, God cooperates with any creature (WA 18,752-54), using it as his "mask" (e.g. WA 31/I,436). Likewise, Calvin declared any creature to be God's instrument (Institutes 1.16.2). Both denied the intelligibility of providence to human reason. In Protestant orthodoxy, the Thomistic distinction between first cause (God) and second causes (the created order) was adopted. Thereby, especially the Lutherans stressed the relative independency of the created order, whereas some Reformed rejected the idea that God merely "permits" the evils that happen. Since Karl Barth (Church Dogmatics III/3) this difference is no longer controversial between Lutherans and Reformed.

From early Enlightenment to Romanticism, providence had a double locus. It was part of dogmatics and devotional literature, and part of natural theology. In natural theology, providence was interpreted in the light of an optimistic this-worldly teleology, leaving out the eschatological reservations of classical doctrine. Newton regarded the continual presence in creation of an active Spirit as necessary to explain the order which reigns among the otherwise unrelated atoms. Gottfried Leibniz, in contrast, conceived the world as a pre-established harmony, leaving no reason for God to intervene in a world created once for all as perfect.

In our time, the concept of providence has been vigorously challenged. Scientific determinism, culminating 1850-1920, left no room for God in nature.* The sense of the tragedies of history since the world wars divested any optimistic immanent teleology of its plausibility. And the abuse of the term "providence" in Nazism caused traditional theologians (e.g. Carl Heinz Ratschow) to abandon the concept.

Dialectical theology, if not attacking the concept, interpreted providence Christologically, as the paradox of God's gospel in creation (so Regin Prenter). After Vatican II* the Catholic church has also interpreted providence in the light of the history of salvation (see Lumen Gentium 7), although the earlier assertion of the intelligibility of providence by human reason alone is still upheld (so Humani Generis, DS 3875).

Almost consensually, modern theology refuses to think God's plan as fixed in details beforehand. God's creation is often seen as a result of God's self-limitation, making room for created creativity. History being open-ended, God always communicates with human freedom throughout the contingencies of history. This perspective has recently given rise to new interpretations of providence which, sensitive to the ambiguities of history, see God as the source of human freedom and novelties in the cosmos, thus underscoring the spiritual dimensions of the Christian faith in providence.

In the same vein, the majesty of God has been interpreted in terms of future rather than in terms of past: God is the attractant power of the future (Pierre Teilhard de Chardin), and the comings of the kingdom of God* are manifestations of God as the power of the future (Wolfhart Pannenberg, Jürgen Moltmann). Process theology perceives God's presence in history in terms of God's offering still new possibilities to the self-creative agents of the world, persuading them to take over voluntarily God's (objectively best) proposals as their own aim. This Whiteheadian idea of God's luring has been received by Langdon Gilkey, while transforming the Pelagian tendency of self-creativity into the idea rather of created freedom. In the light of science, chance has been re-evaluated as God's providential means to let the matter explore its created, inbuilt possibilities (Arthur Peacocke, David J. Bartholomew, John Polkinghorne).

Paul Tillich concretized the idea of providence with reference to historical kairoi, i.e. situations pregnant with destiny, which nevertheless demand decision (Systematic Theology 5.2). Through his struggle with the Nazist Emanuel Hirsch, Tillich realized the necessity of a Christological criterion for reading the signs of the times (Matt. 16:3). Tillich may have inspired the idea of kairos as a God-given time of prophetic critique and resolute action in the South African Kairos document* against apartheid* (1985). Likewise, Latin American liberation theology* stresses that God's will must be "enfleshed in history". But God is more than a provident God in general; he takes sides with the poor* and invites anybody to follow him (Gustavo Gutiérrez, Ronaldo Muñoz).

See also salvation history.

NIELS HENRIK GREGERSEN

- R. Bernhardt, Was heisst "Handeln Gottes": Eine Rekonstruktion der Lehre von der Vorsehung, Gütersloh, Chr. Kaiser 1999
- L. Gilkey, Reaping the Whirlwind: A Christian Interpretation of History, New York, Seabury, 1981
- J. Polkinghorne, Science and Providence: God's Interaction with the World, London, SPCK, 1989
- J. Walsh & P.G. Walsh eds, Message of the Fathers of the Church, vol. 17: Divine Providence and Human Suffering, Wilmington DE, Glazier, 1985.

R

RACISM

RACISM has been a matter of concern to the Christian church from early times. It was J.H. Oldham, in his Christianity and the Race Problem (1924), who pioneered a systematic theology against racism. Racism as an issue formally entered the agenda of the fledgling ecumenical movement at the Jerusalem conference of the International Missionary Council in 1928, and then again in Oxford (1937).

The inaugural assembly of the WCC in Amsterdam in 1948 was alive to the issue of racism. It identified “prejudice based upon race or colour and from practices of discrimination and segregation as denials of justice and human dignity”. Amsterdam argued that the church must take action against racial prejudice: “if the church can overcome the national and social barriers which now divide it, it can help society overcome those barriers”.

Building upon the reports of the world conference on Church and Society (Geneva 1966), the fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968) produced a conceptual and analytical framework for the elimination of racism. More particularly, Uppsala stated that “racism is linked with economic and political exploitation” and then went on to define racism as “ethnocentric pride in one’s own racial group and preference for the distinctive characteristics of that group; belief that these characteristics are fundamentally biological in nature... strong negative feelings towards other groups who do not share these characteristics, coupled with the thrust to discriminate against and exclude the out-group from full participation in the life of the community”.

A similar definition of racism had come from the committee of experts commissioned by UNESCO who produced their "Statement on Racism and Racial Prejudice" in 1967. But Uppsala went further and made special mention of white racism as lying at the root of white domination and privilege.

On the basis of such understandings, the WCC central committee in 1969 mandated the establishment of a Programme to Combat Racism* (PCR) within the WCC. PCR was formed to undertake the churches' crusade against racism. The central committee firmly stated that "racism is not an unalterable feature of human life. Like slavery and other social manifestations of man's sin, it can and must be eliminated." It went on to assert: "There can be no justice in our world without the transfer of economic resources to undergird the re-distribution of political power and to make cultural self-determination meaningful."

In recent years an effort has been made to distinguish between racialism and racism. One can understand racialism to be the use of racial or ethnocentric characteristics to determine value or access or participation and, by the same token, to exclude others. Racialism may not necessarily be value-laden as such. It does not say that one person is better than another because of race but simply that one chooses not to associate with people on account of their race. But racism has become a political ideology, on the basis of which the social reality is being interpreted and political and economic decisions made. In essence a racist ideology attaches value to ethnocentric characteristics and seeks to maintain deterministic relations between biological characteristics and cultural attributes. However, one must not lose sight of the fact that, ultimately, racism is about power. As an ideology* it is the means whereby the dominant group, as determined by racial characteristics, imposes its will upon others so as to exclude them from effective participation in decision making and to exploit them for economic gain.

Some fundamental questions have been raised about the relationship between race and class. It is necessary to understand that the pattern of inequality at work in the world arises fundamentally from economic exploitation. This analysis attempts to make sense of the fact that a combination of economic power and racial or cultural characteristics of the dominant group leads to racism. The valuation of the class factors in racism is not to make Marxist analysis a determinant as such but to point to an adequate understanding of racism and the means necessary to develop action to eliminate it. A. Sivanandan argues that it is necessary to maintain this dual consciousness if one is to address the structural inequality on which racism is based. He says that the fight against racism must not be reduceable to "the fight against prejudice, the fight against institutions and practices and to a fight against individuals and attitudes".

The second cluster of issues which is now being challenged centres on the focus on white racism that obscures other and dominant forms of racial ideologies like tribalism, language and caste that are at the root of many conflicts in the world today. In any event, ethnocentrism is not a universally adequate way to characterize racial ideology, as so many people who are victims of racism have characteristics which are hardly distinguishable from those who maintain hegemony over them.

These nuances have been reflected in the work of the PCR. The emphasis on the elimination of white racism can be seen in PCR's support for the liberation movements and in other struggles for decolonization. PCR has become best known for its campaigns against apartheid* in South Africa and the consequences thereof in the Southern African region. However, the end to constitutional apartheid and the election of a democratic government in South Africa had significant consequences on the programme work of PCR and the ecumenical movement as a whole. For example, the uniquely close cooperation which had developed between the churches and the largely secular anti-apartheid movements began to diminish. On a positive note, the new situation allowed for renewed energy and commitment of resources to areas of anti-racism work which had received a lower priority during the liberation struggle in Southern Africa. It was at this point in the history of PCR that work on the rights of indigenous peoples and the twin oppressions of racism and sexism received more attention.

Sadly, these new developments were not matched by renewed commitment from the member churches. Some commentators spoke of the churches' perception of racism being almost entirely confined to their support for the struggle against apartheid in South Africa. The new challenge was for the churches to look at racism "in their own backyard", a slogan which emerged from WCC's world consultation on racism held in Noordwijkerhout, Netherlands, in 1980.

So the priorities of PCR and other anti-racism programmes began to expand to embrace advocacy for the rights of indigenous peoples and the rights of racially and ethnically oppressed minorities worldwide. The interconnections of race, gender and class were recognized in programmes with a focus on women and caste discrimination, and the situation of Dalits also achieved higher visibility.

More recently, those involved in the struggle for racial justice have expanded their understanding of the dimensions of racism to encompass economic migration and environmental racism. But it was the 2001 United Nations World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance in Durban, South Africa, that gave dramatic focus to the issues widely seen as fundamental in the struggle against racism: reparation and compensation for past deeds, such as slavery, slave trade and land dispossession. Even within South Africa the post-apartheid healing process highlighted these issues. These present to the churches challenges in the area of the theology of restorative justice and its ethical dynamics.

PCR's method of operation has been radical in that it has always sought to get at the roots of institutional and structural inequalities. To seek partnerships for effective action remains a fundamental part of PCR's method. PCR has invited representatives of oppressed peoples and communities to develop common strategies and unite their voices in international forums. Once again the churches are drawn into alliances with civil society. Perhaps there may again be a return to the time of close cooperation between churches and secular movements, as during the apartheid era.

N. BARNEY PITYANA and MARILIA SCHÜLLER

- E. Adler, A Small Beginning: An Assessment of the First Five Years of the Programme to Combat Racism, WCC, 1974
- A. van der Bent ed., Breaking Down the Walls: Statements and Actions on Racism (1948-85), WCC, 1986
- IRM, 49, 235, 1970
- B. Rogers, Race: No Peace without Justice, WCC, 1980
- B. Sjollema, Isolating Apartheid: Western Collaboration with South Africa: Policy Decisions by the WCC and Church Responses, WCC, 1982
- J.J. Vincent, The Race Race, London, SCM Press, 1970
- C.E. Welch, "Mobilizing Morality: The WCC and its Programme to Combat Racism, 1969-1994", Human Rights Quarterly, 23, 4, 2001.

RADIO

RADIO HAS sometimes served as a catalyst for ecumenical understanding, especially in countries where broadcasting has been a state monopoly and where the various Christian traditions are strongly represented. This role was particularly marked in Britain where, in the early 1920s, the English and Welsh Nonconformist churches still retained some of their 19th-century strength and where Roman Catholicism posed no numerical challenge to the established churches of England and Scotland. Despite initial misgivings by the Roman Catholic hierarchy, the main churches were soon working together in the BBC (which allowed the churches no direct control over programmes). Ecumenism was encouraged by the BBC provision of its own worship studios and even a BBC hymnbook. In 1926 the (ecumenical) "Sunday committee" became known as the central religious advisory committee.

Other European countries took a different route. In the north, until the 1990s, the Lutheran state churches retained control over worship broadcasts, as did the Catholic church in Spain, Italy and Portugal. In the Netherlands, each tradition has been provided with its own self-contained radio channel. Matching funding by the state has been allocated in direct proportion to the number of subscribers. One aspect of the Hungarian system (which has survived for more than 70 years) allows the state to allot religious airtime in proportion to the number of Catholic, Calvinist, Lutheran, Baptist and Methodist adherents in the population – an arrangement that is even-handed but certainly not ecumenical.

Religious programming which answers the needs of specific communities or which reflects local socio-cultural circumstances is finding a niche in countries seeking to reclaim lost histories and re-establish long-suppressed identities. We see this development in the countries of the former Soviet Union and in Eastern Europe. However, it is no less true of Western Europe, where local radio and cable TV stations offer "Christian" channels and where, in some countries, religious broadcasting is for a minority.

In Europe, as elsewhere, current trends towards technological convergence and globalization suggest that religious programming must simultaneously maintain its place in public service broadcasting (with its "open" audience) and pursue alternatives in privately funded channels (with their "closed" audience). Rapid digitalization of both radio and television technologies, together with the expansion of satellite and cable networks, will also offer other possibilities, such as the Internet, where there are numerous contact points for faith groups.

Radio remains the most effective means of communication in Africa. Its importance lies in the fact that it surpasses all other media in terms of audience accessibility and use. None of the churches or Christian councils owns a radio station, although a good number of them do have their own recording studios, where a variety of programmes are produced, then broadcast over the national networks. Mainline denominations have invested in transmitters within Africa, particularly ELWA (Lutheran World Federation). Evangelical radio has long been active. IBRA (Sweden) is active in East Africa.

In most sub-Saharan countries, airtime is given free to churches. The World Association for Christian Communication (WACC) has been supporting programmes in Cameroon, Sudan, Botswana and Congo. In Rwanda, WACC has long supported the radio ministry of the Protestant council, through donating production costs and sponsoring radio producers' workshops.

Radio is particularly important to Christian mission in Asia. In many cases, only short-wave radio has maintained embattled Christian communities. The world service religious programmes of a number of Western countries (conspicuously Britain) have been widely influential and usually non-divisive. The effects of short-wave Evangelical broadcasts to Soviet Asia and China are still being assessed. Broadcasts from the Seychelles by FEBA (Far Eastern Broadcasting) have become well-known in India and have included a mix of programming. Locally generated Christian radio is heard predominantly in Indonesia. Radio Sion is operated by the Evangelical Christian Church (Reformed background) in Minahasa, Sulawesi province. The station broadcasts in FM on social and development issues in the region, mostly to farmers and fishermen.

Christian radio is strongest of all in the Philippines. The Development Education Media Services (DEMS) in the southern Filipino city of Davao is a non-governmental organization which was successful in broadcasting social issue-oriented dramas as a way of empowering people, especially the peasant community in Mindanao. What is unique in DEMS work is that its programmes were contributed by peasants, church workers of different religious backgrounds, and high school and college students. The production is therefore low-cost but effective.

Christian radio stations in Asia have their own training and technical challenges, as well as limitations on freedom of expression. As the pace of change in terms of both economy and politics increases dramatically in this vast and pluralistic continent, Christian radio continues to play a role in the development and the empowerment of people.

The predominantly Christian Pacific region is characterized by the active involvement of Christians in radio and TV. Kristen Redio in Lae, Papua New Guinea, provides an ecumenical presence of Christian programmes in the largest island nation in the Pacific. A United Church pastor/broadcaster works for the government radio religious programmes section. Many Christians work for the secular EM-TV in all aspects of production. Christian communicators have formed concern groups to monitor TV programmes and educate the public on issues relating to them. Media Watch is an occasional newsletter in Fiji which is produced by a group of concerned Christians on media awareness. They hold regular meetings with TV producers and government regulators.

The radio bombardment of Latin America with a radio religion that preaches a highly individualistic version of the Christian message has done little to foster ecumenical understanding. An honourable exception is KCJB Quito ("The Voice of the Andes"), which is involved in local broadcasting and charitable work as well as worldwide broadcasting.

The USA continues to host the single largest concentration of Christian broadcasting interests in the world. With 1328 Christian radio stations, 163 Christian television stations, assorted Christian cable channels and Internet-based Christian radio and television networks, the medium and the message seem to be thriving in a highly competitive, commercial environment.

Religious radio began in the United States. In the 1930s the new coast-to-coast radio networks relied for input from Catholic, mainline-Protestant and Jewish organizations. Under the Nixon presidency (1969-74), a process of government deregulation transformed religious broadcasting. While a commitment to provide religious programming remained a requirement in broadcast-licence applications, these religious programmes would no longer be required to be in company-provided free airtime ("sustaining time"). In other words, companies could now accept payment for religious programming. A number of other deregulatory measures sealed the fate of any special deal between the mainline churches and public broadcasting. From the 1960s, Evangelicals began to dominate American religious broadcasting.

The market for Christian/commercial broadcasting is finite. Large commercially driven Christian stations have begun to encounter the same commercial problems as their secular counterparts. The mainline churches have begun to compete, and all indications suggest that audiences for religious broadcasting are more discriminating in their listening than believed previously.

As the statement of global communication for justice, brought out by the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA and approved by the general board in November 1993, affirms: "We understand communication to be basic to community and the right to communicate a basic human right. The right to receive and to provide information is as fundamental to the quality of life as worship, food, clothing and shelter. Christians, as citizens, have an obligation to exert whatever influence they can to ensure that the mass media in our society operate to serve the public good rather than merely commercial interests or those of individuals."

PETER ELVY

RAHNER, KARL

B. 5 March 1904, Freiburg im Breisgau, Germany; d. 30 March 1984, Innsbruck, Austria. One of the most influential contemporary Roman Catholic theologians, especially in German-speaking countries but also among Latin American liberationists. Rahner made original contributions to the ecumenical dialogue from his particular Catholic theological perspective. His concept of "anonymous Christian" depends on the offer of grace and salvation to all men and women throughout history. He believed that ecumenism is an achieved reality at the level of ordinary people, though it continues to be discussed and debated at the higher rungs of church authority. He held that, with Vatican II, the church gained a truly universal consciousness. His re-interpretation of doctrines such as the inspiration of the scriptures and human subjectivity as spirit in the world gave them a radical and global perspective. His literary and philosophical idiom was largely influenced by Martin Heidegger, under whom he studied in Freiburg. He joined the Jesuit order in 1922 and was ordained in 1932. He was appointed professor of dogmatic theology, in Innsbruck in 1949 and then in Munich in 1964. He was a main editor of Denzinger's Enchiridion Symbolorum (1952), of the new Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (10 vols, 1957-65) and of the six-volume encyclopedia Sacramentum Mundi (1968-70), which was strongly influenced by his outlook.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- K. Rahner & H. Fries, Unity of the Churches: An Actual Possibility, New York, Paulist, 1984 ■
- J.B. Ackley, The Church of the World: A Comparative Study of Word, Church and Office in the Thought of Karl Rahner and Gerhard Ebeling, New York, Lang, 1993 ■
- R. Bleistein, Bibliographie Karl Rahner, 1924-69, 1969-74, Freiburg, Herder, 1969, 1974.

RAISER, KONRAD

B. 25 Jan. 1938, Magdeburg, Germany. General secretary of the WCC, 1993-. From a first theological degree in Tübingen in 1963 and ordination in 1964, he went on to earn a master's degree in 1965 and a doctorate in 1970. After doing industrial and social chaplaincy in Berlin and Stuttgart, Raiser spent a year at Harvard studying sociology and social psychology. His first period with the WCC was from 1969 to 1983, as study secretary in Faith and Order, then deputy general secretary. He followed this with a professorship in systematic theology and ecumenics at the Protestant theological faculty of the University of the Ruhr in Bochum, Germany, until taking up his current post. Raiser was an adviser and a member of the drafting committees at the European Ecumenical Assembly in Basel, Switzerland, in 1989, and at the WCC's world convocation on "Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation" in Seoul, Korea, in 1990. He also served as vice-moderator of the reference committee at the WCC's Canberra assembly in 1991, where he was a delegate of his church. He was awarded an honorary doctorate by the University of Geneva in 1996.

PAULINE WEBB

- K. Raiser, For a Culture of Life, WCC, 2002
- Identität und Sozialität, 1971 ■ Ökumene im Übergang (ET Ecumenism in Transition, WCC, 1991) ■ To Be the Church, WCC, 1997.

RAMSEY, ARTHUR MICHAEL

B. 4 Nov. 1904, Cambridge, UK; d. 23 April 1988, Oxford. Archbishop of Canterbury, 1961-74, and a president of the WCC, 1961-68, Ramsey (as did his predecessor, Archbishop Fisher) promoted church union negotiations between the Anglican church and other churches in the third world. In 1962 he visited Patriarch Athenagoras I in Constantinople, he received Patriarch Alexis in London in 1964, and he met with Pope Paul VI in the Sistine chapel in Rome in 1966. He was greatly disappointed by the failure of the Church of England in 1969 and 1972 to approve the plans for reunion with the Methodist church. Educated in Cambridge and orained in 1928, Ramsey was canon of Durham cathedral and professor of divinity at Durham University, 1940-50, Regius professor of divinity, University of Cambridge, 1951-52, bishop of Durham, 1952-56, and archbishop of York, 1956-61.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- A.M. Ramsey, Canterbury Pilgrim, London, SPCK, 1974 ■ From Gore to Temple, London, Longmans, 1960 ■ The Gospel and the Catholic Church, 2nd ed., London, Longmans, 1956 ■ O. Chadwick, Michael Ramsey: A Life, Oxford, Clarendon, 1990 ■ R. Gill & L. Kendall eds, Michael Ramsey as Theologian, Boston MA, Cowley, 1995.

RANSON, CHARLES WESLEY

B. 15 June 1903, Northern Ireland; d. 13 Jan. 1988, Lakeville, CT, USA. From 1929 to 1945 Ranson served as a missionary in India, principally in the Madras area; for the last two years he was secretary of the National Christian Council of India, Burma and Ceylon. General secretary of the International Missionary Council* from 1948, ten years later he became director of the Theological Education Fund, then president of the Methodist Church in Ireland, 1961-62. From 1968 to 1972 he was professor of theology and ecumenics at the Hartford Seminary Foundation.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ C.W. Ranson, The Christian Minister in India, London, Lutterworth, 1945 ■ A Missionary Pilgrimage, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1988 ■ Renewal and Advance, London, Edinburgh House, 1948 ■ That the World May Know, New York, Friendship, 1953.

RECEPTION

DURING the past 30-35 years of the ecumenical movement, "reception" has become a new key-term for the gradual and mutual acceptance by the churches of the results of ecumenical dialogues (see dialogue, intrafaith). As a technical term, however, it was used much earlier in canonical discussions and regulations regarding the authority or authentication of councils and synods, the validation of legislative action in and among churches, the validity or validation of baptism,* eucharist* and ordination* as practised within heretical communities. And recently, it has appeared in the theoretical context of the history of law, of literature and ideas in general, with regard to the impact and spread of customs, formulas or ideas in a given cultural field. So one can speak of the reception of German law into Roman law from the 6th century onwards, or of the reception of the work of Freud in America.

Reception in its explicit theological meaning, derived from the biblical vocabulary of (apo)lambanein and (apo)dechesthai

(receive, welcome), points to one of the main characteristics of faith* itself. We believe we receive our existence as creatures from God,* our salvation* as redemption* through Jesus Christ,* a new life as "anointed ones" in the Holy Spirit.* We receive the word of God* and the sacraments* as signs of the new covenant.* We receive the mission* to be disciples and ministers, prophets and teachers of the community through the laying on of hands in the Spirit. Such inheritance, handed down through the ages, has been received with differences of form and manner, owing to diversities of genius and conditions of life. Therefore only mutual exchange and reception of various traditions within one communion* could build up the unity* and catholicity,* the holiness* and apostolicity* of the early church.*

In that context, the reception of conciliar decisions by the local churches was more than a process of legitimation alone. It implied the testing and appropriation of such decisions in the life of the churches. The same would be true for the results of the ecumenical dialogues of the last 35 years, even if their canonical weight cannot be compared with the conciliar decisions of the church.

Discussion on reception within the ecumenical movement started in the context of the Second Vatican Council* (1962-65) through a collection of essays edited by Hans Jochen Margull, Die ökumenischen Konzile (1961). The WCC's New Delhi assembly (1961) requested Faith and Order* to undertake a study on "Councils and the Ecumenical Movement", the result of which was published in 1968. The final report on "The Importance of the Conciliar Process in the Ancient Church for the Ecumenical Movement", adopted at the F&O meeting in Louvain (1971), describes reception as follows: "Reception represents the process by which the local churches accept the decision of a council and thereby recognize its authority. This process is a multiplex one and may last for centuries. Even after the formal conclusion of such a process and the canonical reception of a council's doctrinal formula, usually through a new council, the process of reception continues in some way or other as long as the churches are involved in self-examination on the basis of the question whether a particular council has been received and appropriated properly and with justification. In this sense we can say that in the ecumenical movement the churches find themselves in a process of continuing reception or re-reception of the councils".

Such a wider idea of reception as a spiritual process of appropriation and mutual critical testing of the traditions along the lines of "the faith of the church through the ages" was explicitly discussed further in F&O consultations at Crét-Bérard 1977 ("Towards an Ecumenical Consensus on Baptism, the Eucharist and the Ministry"), at Odessa 1977 ("How Does the Church Teach Authoritatively Today?"), at the third and fourth forums on bilateral dialogues* (1980 and 1985) and at the fifth world conference on Faith and Order in Santiago de Compostela (1993). In several bilateral dialogues paragraphs on reception urge the churches to take the results of the dialogues seriously and to deal with them at all appropriate levels of authority and of the involvement of their members. A most remarkable test case of reception in this sense was the invitation to the churches to respond to the Lima text on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry,* sent to the churches in 1982. Over 190 churches responded, which marks a new stage within the ecumenical movement indeed, by involving nearly all churches in a reception process, both at the level of "the widest possible involvement of the whole people of God" and of "the highest appropriate level of authority" (BEM, p.x).

ANTON HOUTEPEN

■ Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, 1982-1990: Report on the Process and Responses, WCC, 1990 ■ J.T. Ford & D.J. Swan eds, Twelve Tales Untold: A Study Guide for Ecumenical Reception, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1993 ■ L.L. Gaither, To Receive a Text: Literary Reception Theory as a Key to Ecumenical Reception, New York, Lang, 1997 ■ A. Houtepen, "Reception, Tradition, Communion", in Ecumenical Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, M. Thurian ed., WCC, 1983 ■ G. Kelly, Recognition: Advancing Ecumenical Thinking, New York, Lang, 1996 ■ U. Kühn, "Reception: An Imperative and an Opportunity", in Ecumenical Perspectives on BEM ■ H.J. Margull, Die ökumenischen Konzile (ET The Councils of the Church), Philadelphia, 1966) ■ W.G. Rusch, Reception: An Ecumenical Opportunity, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1988 ■ M. Thurian ed., Churches Respond to BEM, 6 vols, WCC, 1986-88.

RECONCILED DIVERSITY

RECONCILED diversity or, more exactly, "unity in reconciled diversity", is a concept of church unity* that goes back to two conferences of representatives of Christian World Communions* (CWCs) in 1974 (Geneva). A year before, the Faith and Order* commission had elaborated its concept of "conciliar fellowship" (Salamanca 1973), requesting also that the CWCs engaged in bilateral dialogues* "clarify their understanding of the quest for unity by cooperating with the WCC". The CWCs felt unable to endorse the F&O "conciliar fellowship" concept and, instead, developed the concept of unity in reconciled diversity.

Its guiding principle is that "the variety of denominational heritages [is] legitimate" and "remains a valuable contribution to the richness of the life in the church universal". Accordingly, church unity should not necessarily demand the surrender of denominational convictions and identities, as often advocated and usually implied in the concept of organic union.* Rather, denominational traditions and confessional convictions can have a continuing identifiable life within the one church, provided that in a process of dialogue, living encounter and mutual correction, they have lost their denominational exclusiveness and divisive trenchancy and have thus been transformed into a "reconciled" diversity.

The concept of reconciled diversity condenses into a concise formula concerns which have always been voiced in the ecumenical movement. It is an expression of one of the two legitimate and not mutually exclusive tendencies in the search for unity, the one "whose primary stress is upon the necessity for faithfulness to the truth as it has been confessed in the past and as it is embodied in the received traditions" (Nairobi 1975).

Reconciled diversity in its developed sense includes all essential elements required for unity: a shared faith,* mutual recognition of baptism,* eucharist* and ministry,* and agreed ways of deciding and acting together. It should be admitted, however, that the last aspect may be the weak point of the concept. Any application of the reconciled diversity concept should show that genuine Christian unity can be a fully committed fellowship only in life, witness and service and that reconciliation of diversity must therefore lead beyond mere peaceful co-existence.

The sometimes heated debate about concepts of unity during the years following 1974 seems to have come to a conclusion in the course of 1978. It was acknowledged that the reconciled diversity concept intends neither to rule out the concept of organic union nor to be a counter-concept to conciliar fellowship, inasmuch as "conciliar fellowship presupposes organic union" (Accra 1974). Its point of divergence from these concepts is the basic conviction that not only contextual (cultural, ethnic, etc.), but also confessional, diversity can be a "legitimate diversity" compatible with and even necessary for the true unity of the church. At the first forum on bilateral dialogues (Bossey 1978), and at the F&O commission meeting in Bangalore (1978), it was affirmed that the concepts of unity under discussion, especially the organic union and the reconciled diversity concepts, are "not to be seen as alternatives. They may be two different ways of reacting to the ecumenical necessities and possibilities of different situations and of different church traditions" (Bangalore).

In many circles the reconciled diversity concept has been very positively received. In 1977 the Lutheran World Federation* endorsed it as a "valuable help in the present phase of the ecumenical movement". In other instances at least its basic intention was strongly affirmed, or equivalent concepts were developed (e.g. the vision of the one church as a "communion of communions" or as a communion* of different ecclesial typoi*).

See also communion; conciliarity; reconciliation; unity, models of; unity, ways to.

HARDING MEYER

- G. Gassmann & H. Meyer, The Unity of the Church: Requirements and Structure, LWF report 15, 1983 ■ H. Meyer, "Einheit in versöhnter Verschiedenheit" – "konziliare Gemeinschaft" – "organische Union", ÖR, 27, 1978.

RECONCILIATION

RECONCILIATION is the renewal of relationship with the Triune God (see Trinity) accomplished for us in Jesus Christ* and offered to us in word and sacraments through the church.* The reality of this reconciliation is what the church proclaims to the world. It decisively shapes the way the church understands itself and its service to Christ. Reconciliation has been understood as (1) a biblical-traditional category of ecclesial discourse, (2) a principle which guides Christian life and service, and (3) a standard which calls the church to unity* and energizes ecumenical activity.

Central to the biblical witness is the notion that humanity has been reconciled to God by a sheer act of God. This activity of God finds its locus in Jesus of Nazareth (2 Cor. 5:18-21) and its antecedent in the cultic history of the people of Israel (Lev. 16). At the heart of this history is the motif that God has made a covenant* with Israel and, despite their unfaithfulness, God acts to restore covenant. Reconciliation is first the renewal of covenant with the people of God through Jesus the Messiah of Israel.

Jesus Christ has overcome the enmity between God and humanity and has thereby restored our communion with God (Rom. 5). The church, which understands its own existence to be grounded in the ministry, death and resurrection of Jesus, has seen in the scriptures various themes which help illumine the work of Christ. Thus closely related to the concept of reconciliation are the themes of redemption* and atonement. These themes, understood to indicate the objective condition of our restored relationship with God, re-inforce the fact that salvation* is based on God's own initiative in Jesus Christ. He is our reconciliation, and humanity is called to be reconciled to God.

The church lives as the reconciled community, which means that the life of the church should display the proper response of humanity to the work of God. To be reconciled to God means to enter into reconciliation with all peoples, nations and tribes (Eph. 2). Therefore the church acts as an agent of forgiveness and love both within and outside its community (John 20:22-23; 1 John 4:7-12). To those outside its community the church proclaims the restoration of all things in Christ and therefore the end of divisions and war and the invitation to live reconciled lives (Col. 1). The church offers the means whereby its members can live personally reconciled to God. For those who have fallen away, it provides means to re-enter into communion. The renewal of communion, made possible by the presence of the Spirit of Christ in the church, is the ground for the activity of repentance and the repeated gift of forgiveness. Reconciliation issues in sacramental activities in the church because the church lives within the pax Dei.

The fact of division in the church stands over against the message of reconciliation that the church is called to proclaim. However, the church can remove the breach in its own life if it allows God to work fully through the word of God* and the sacraments of baptism,* eucharist* and penance (or reconciliation). Through the word and sacraments, the church can partake in the life of repentance it offers to the world. Thus, when Christians rightly celebrate the eucharist and practise their baptism, they have already entered into a fellowship which should move them to acts of reconciliation with their sisters and brothers.

In many places the church is visibly active in witnessing to the reality of reconciliation. In South Africa it was at the heart of the epic movement of the government away from its apartheid* policies. The church and its leaders remain heavily engaged there in the establishment of justice. Yet with justice the church seeks also the establishment of unity and peace among all the peoples of South Africa. In this difficult and complex situation, the South African church's witness includes bringing to light the whole truth of the horrors and crimes done under evil regimes while at the same time testifying to the power of forgiveness and the call to live reconciled lives before the living God of Jesus Christ. Indeed through ecumenical acts of love the church in South Africa is working to remove the breaches of communion in its own life created in and by South Africa's historic racial divisions.

Entering into actions of reconciliation witnesses to a common commitment to live in obedience to the reconciling God and therefore opens the actors to the possibility of entering into the reality of the healing power of the Holy Spirit. Such sacramental acts are the "medicine of the church" by which the church can let itself be healed and offer to the world the healing that is inherent in communion with God.

See also penance and reconciliation, reconciled diversity.

WILLIE J. JENNINGS

- M. Battle, Reconciliation: The Ubuntu Theology of Desmond Tutu, Cleveland, Pilgrim, 1996
- D. Bonhoeffer, Gesammelte Schriften, vol. 4 (ET Christ the Center, New York, Harper & Row, 1978)
- L.G. Jones, Embodying Forgiveness, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1995
- P. Lee ed., Communication and Reconciliation: Challenges Facing the 21st Century, WCC, 2001
- J.M. Lochman, Versöhnung und Befreiung (ET Reconciliation and Liberation), Philadelphia, Fortress, 1980
- T.F. Torrance, Theology in Reconciliation, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1975
- D.M. Tutu, No Future without Forgiveness, New York, Doubleday, 1999
- M. Volf, Exclusion and Embrace, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1996
- G. Wainwright, "The Reconciliation of Divided Churches: A Witness to the Gospel", Studia Liturgia, 18, 1988
- J. Webster, Barth's Ethics of Reconciliation, New York, Cambridge, 1996
- R.A. Wells, People Behind the Peace: Community and Reconciliation in Northern Ireland, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1999.

REDEMPTION

THE CENTRAL biblical theme of salvation* is conveyed in the Bible in a number of images, one of which is redemption (Greek apolytrōsis); others are justification,* sacrifice and reconciliation.* Every image is a partial truth, highlighting a particular aspect of a greater whole. Redemption, an image from captivity, highlights the captivities from which redemption is offered, namely, legalism and self-sufficiency (Rom. 8:34; Gal. 3:10), sin,* death and the cosmic powers (Eph. 6:12; Rom. 8:35). In the history of the church these captivities have tended to be spiritualized. A characteristic of the ecumenical movement has been to call peoples to move from only a personal and individualistic understanding of sin and redemption to embrace also the redemption needed at institutional and corporate levels. Cosmic powers are also a kind of organized disobedience to the will of God, taking the form of self-aggrandizement and independent pride, appearing variously in political, social, economic, personal and corporate forms.

The image of captivity also highlights the costliness of the act of redemption. Specifically, it is at the cost of the life of Jesus Christ* (1 Cor. 6:20, 7:23). To that extent redemption is a present reality, almost equivalent to the forgiveness of sins (Col. 1:14). It is, however, not a fait accompli, nor is it yet possessed in its fullness (Eph. 1:14, 4:30; Rom. 2:5). The contemporary ecumenical movement has been exploring such themes as costly discipleship and costly obedience.

The larger ecumenical question is, given redemption in the name of Jesus Christ, what is the fate of those who have never had Christ preached to them and those who belong to other faith traditions (Buddhism, Hinduism, Islam, African Traditional Religions etc.)? Karl Barth's distinction between religion* and Christian faith* has long dominated theological thinking: religion, "the concern of the godless man", is abolished through Jesus Christ, who justifies the sinner. Others stress that one cannot have faith without religion (which is rooted in one's cultural context) because all revelation,* including the Christ-event, is apprehended through one's religion (see culture). Other scholars argue that there are intimations of Christ in other religions and that Christian faith is continuous with experience of the mysterium tremendum et fascinatum found in other faith traditions – hence such ideas as the "anonymous Christ" or similar concepts in African or Asian theologies. The basic question in ongoing ecumenical debate is how, or whether, God's continuing self-disclosure in the constantly widening experience of human beings can still be rightfully described as "in Christ" (see uniqueness of Christ).

If the death of Christ is the means of redemption, then what is the role of the church?* The church itself is founded on the new covenant* at Calvary and commissioned to go and preach that offer of redemption in Christ (see mission). The ecumenical debate about the role of the church in Christ's saving work, as well as the value of good works and religious practices, has been addressed by the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission's statement "Salvation and the Church" (1987) and the Lutheran-Roman Catholic text "The Church and Justification" (1993). The consensus emerging is that salvation may not be restricted to any established institution, not even the church (over which God exercises sovereignty), and that there is Christ without Christianity. Christ's presence transcends the boundaries of Christendom, even though there can be no Christianity without Christ.

Redemption is not only "deliverance from" but also "freedom for". Two ancient paradigms illustrate this truth: the Graeco-Roman practice of sacral manumission, a legal and religious rite by which a slave became a devotee of a deity in return for someone paying the price of his freedom, and the exodus experience of the Hebrews. Redemption, positively speaking, is for a new life of freedom,* which is not the same as licence to perform according to self-will. God's action of redemption is to be matched by human beings' keeping their part of the covenant relationship, including making needed changes in the social, economic and political life of each culture.

See also dialogue, interfaith.

JOHN S. POBEE

- ARCIC II, Salvation and the Church, London, SPCK, 1987
- "Church and Justification", in GinA-II
- F.W. Dillstone, The Christian Understanding of Atonement, London, SCM Press, 1984
- R.R. Ruether, Introducing Redemption in Christian Feminism, Sheffield, Sheffield Academic Press, 1998.

REFORMATION

THE ECUMENICAL understanding of the Reformation has been dominated by a re-assessment of Martin Luther. In large part the concentration on Luther has been prompted by Roman Catholic historians who, far more than their Protestant counterparts, have identified the origins of the Reformation with Luther's religious crisis and subsequent career. While Catholic historians like Alexandre Ganoczy, Kilian McDonnell and Jacques Pollet have made substantial contributions to the study of Calvin and Zwingli, the principal energies of Catholic historians engaged in the study of Protestant origins have traditionally been devoted to an evaluation of Martin Luther.

Until the end of the 19th century, Catholic historiography was dominated by the essentially negative portrayal of Luther drawn by the Catholic polemicist Johannes Cochlaeus in his famous book Commentary on the Acts and Writings of Martin Luther (1549). Since medieval Catholic theology taught that heresy* is more a matter of will than intellect, more a defect of character than a failure of understanding, Cochlaeus attempted to account for Luther's heresy by identifying the defects of his character that prompted his apostasy from Rome. As Cochlaeus saw matters, Luther was a proud and self-centred man, driven by his appetites and utterly lacking in religious seriousness.

The attack on Luther's character was not altogether abandoned by Catholic historians in the early 20th century, as the writings of Jacques Maritain and G.K. Chesterton demonstrate. Nevertheless, the traditional picture of Luther's religious development was modified by the work of two Catholic scholars, Heinrich Denifle and Hartmann Grisar. In 1904 Denifle, a medieval historian then an archivist in the Vatican library, published a two-volume study of Luther's early theology entitled Luther and Lutheranism in Its First Development. Luther had claimed that he had been taught to regard the righteousness of God described in Rom. 1:16-17 as the punishing righteousness with which God justly punishes sinners. As Luther later recounted it, his theological breakthrough occurred when he realized that the righteousness of God in this passage refers, not to God's punishing righteousness (iustitia activa), but to the righteousness with which God makes sinners just (iustitia passiva).

Denifle examined a wide range of medieval commentaries on Rom. 1 and concluded that Luther's claim about the medieval exegetical tradition could not be sustained. Even though Luther alleged that all of his teachers identified the righteousness of God in 1:16-17 with God's punishing activity, Denifle could not find a single Catholic commentator who did so. Without exception they identified the iustitia Dei with God's reconciling gift to the sinner. It seemed therefore to Denifle that Luther's critique of Catholic theology rested in large measure on his ignorance of the very tradition he presumed to criticize.

Although Denifle had introduced the question of theological causes for the Reformation, he was not inclined to press his point in such a way as to mitigate the traditional Catholic attack on Luther's character. On the contrary, Denifle was only too happy to catalogue what he regarded as Luther's besetting sins: pride, spiritual negligence, intemperance and unchastity. He was even willing to accept the scurrilous rumour that Luther, like Francis I, was a victim of syphilis. "Luther," Denifle cried, "there is nothing divine in you!"

Unlike Denifle, the Jesuit historian Hartmann Grisar was less interested in Luther's theological development than in his psychological profile. Grisar argued that Luther was psychologically unbalanced, haunted by an abnormal hatred of good works. The doctrine of justification* by faith alone, codified in the confessional books of the Reformation churches, originated out of Luther's compelling inner need to offer a theological rationalization for his uncontrolled lechery, drunkenness and gluttony. What Cochlaeus and earlier Catholic critics had attributed to flaws in Luther's character, Grisar was inclined to attribute to abnormalities in his psychological composition.

A new era in the ecumenical re-evaluation of the Reformation was inaugurated by the publication in 1939-40 of the two-volume study The Reformation in Germany by the Roman Catholic historian Joseph Lortz. Lortz broke decisively with the older Catholic tradition of scholarship that blamed the Reformation on flaws in Luther's character. He accepted the view, advocated by Luther himself, that, as an Augustinian friar, Luther had been a morally upright and decent man who had followed in scrupulous detail the rules and regulations of his order. Lortz was even willing to defend, against Catholic critics like Denifle, the unpopular proposition that Luther was a profoundly Christian theologian, whose theology of the cross and doctrine of assurance touched on deep themes in the gospel. From Lortz's perspective the tragedy of the Reformation could not be traced to moral grounds, as traditional Catholic historiography had argued, but to theological causes.

Lortz regarded the theology of Aquinas as the finest flowering of the medieval Catholic tradition. Unfortunately for 16th-century Europe, Luther was not trained at Cologne in the authentically Catholic theology of Aquinas, but at Erfurt in the "fundamentally uncatholic" theology of William Ockham. Luther studied the commentaries and writings of Gabriel Biel and Pierre d'Ailly, disciples of Ockham, whose theology, Lortz believed, reflected the unclarity and confusion that marked the later middle ages. Luther correctly perceived many of the problems inherent in Ockhamistic theology and made a genuinely Catholic protest against its distortions of the Catholic theological tradition. However, because Luther was not schooled in the theology of Aquinas, he went to what Lortz regarded as unwarranted extremes in his theological critique of Ockhamism and so lapsed into heresy. Nevertheless, even as a heretic, he was not guilty of moral turpitude, as Cochlaeus had argued, but only of theological subjectivity. From Lortz's perspective, the schism* in the Western church might have been avoided if only Luther had studied the balanced, Augustinian theology of Aquinas.

A new note in the Catholic re-appraisal of Luther was sounded by Otto Pesch in his massive study of the doctrine of justification in the theology of Aquinas and Luther. Unlike Lortz, who bemoaned the absence of the stabilizing impact of the theology of Aquinas on Luther, Pesch argued that Luther and Thomas held very similar understandings of grace.* They differed not so much in what they said as how they said it. Thomas wrote sapiential theology that described in an objective and detached way the unfolding of the creative and redemptive acts of God, whose being conditions, but is unconditioned by, the things he made. Luther wrote existential theology from the perspective of an engaged believer who stands in the presence of a living God of grace and judgment, who has called the believer by name. In Pesch's opinion, differences in theological style and method have led historians to overestimate the differences between Luther and Thomas and to misunderstand and misjudge their substantial agreements. To recover an understanding of the theological agreements between Luther and Thomas, often hidden beneath the real, but far less significant, disagreements in style, would itself represent an important ecumenical step forward for Protestants and Roman Catholics.

Protestant historians, with some notable exceptions, have made fewer contributions to the study of Catholic reform in the 16th century than Catholic historians have to the study of Protestant origins. While Protestant historians have engaged in their own wide-ranging re-assessment of the major Protestant reformers, their principal contribution to the ecumenical re-assessment of the Reformation has centred in their re-evaluation of the theological and religious situation in the Western church on the eve of the Reformation. No longer content with a confessionally biased description of religious life in the later middle ages, Protestant historians from Reinhold Seeberg and Adolf Martin Ritter to Bernd Moeller and Heiko Oberman have attempted to reconstruct a more accurate picture of the milieu in which the Reformation was born. Especially important in this re-assessment has been the study of late medieval scholastic and mystical theology from Ockham and Thomas Bradwardine to Biel and John of Paltz.

Over the last three decades an approach to the Reformation has developed that is neither Protestant nor Catholic, though supported by a wide spectrum of Protestant, Catholic and secular historians. This newer approach regards the Reformation, not as a single unified movement to which a second unified movement, the Counter-Reformation, reacted, but as a complex series of interdependent religious, social and political movements. On this reading, Luther's reformation was one of many reformations occurring before 1600 and may even have been the most important. But the 16th century was marked by multiple religious reformations – Lutheran, Reformed, Erasmian, Anabaptist, Catholic, Erastian, anti-Trinitarian, Chiliastic, Epicurean – that interacted with each other in an intricate pattern of dependence and independence. The principal task of Reformation historians is to understand and explain the originality, individuality and interdependence of these multiple movements of religious reform. The older view that equated the beginnings of the Reformation with Luther's religious experience has now been replaced by a view that situates Luther within the context of his own age, a period impatient with the status quo and stirred by new longings and aspirations. Only within this broader context, Reformation historians now feel, can the achievements and limitations of Luther's Reformation be properly assessed.

Scholarly re-assessments of the Reformation have begun to reach the level of the official ecclesiastical leadership, apparent, for

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

example, in the speeches of Pope John Paul II during his visits to the Federal Republic of Germany in 1980 and 1987. The 1990 report of the Reformed-Roman Catholic* international dialogue commission sought to re-read the history of the 16th century with a view to “the reconciliation of memories”.

DAVID STEINMETZ

■ F. Büsser, Das katholische Zwinglibild, Zurich, Zwingli, 1968 ■ B. Cottret, Calvin: A Biography, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 2000 ■ A. Ganoczy, Le jeune Calvin. Genèse et évolution de sa vocation réformatrice (ET The Young Calvin, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1987) ■ K.G. Hagen, “Changes in the Understanding of Luther: The Development of the Young Luther”, Theological Studies, 29, 1968 ■ H.J. Hillerbrand ed., The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Reformation, New York, Oxford UP, 1996 ■ C. Lindberg, The European Reformations, Oxford, Blackwell, 1996 ■ H.A. Oberman, Luther: Mensch zwischen Gott und Teufel (ET Luther: Man between God and the Devil, New Haven CT, Yale UP, 1989) ■ S.E. Ozment ed., Reformation Europe: A Guide to Research, St Louis MO, Center for Reformation Research, 1982 ■ O.H. Pesch, “Twenty Years of Catholic Luther Research”, Lutheran World, 13, 1966 ■ D.C. Steinmetz, Calvin in Context, New York, Oxford UP, 1995 ■ D.C. Steinmetz, Luther in Context, Bloomington IN, Indiana UP, 1986 ■ G. Tavard, “Reassessing the Reformation”, OC, 19, 1983 ■ G. Wainwright, Is the Reformation Over? Catholics and Protestants at the Turn of the Millennium, Milwaukee WI, Marquette UP, 2000.

REFORMED ECUMENICAL COUNCIL

THE REFORMED Ecumenical Council (REC) is a council that in 2000 comprised 38 Reformed and Presbyterian churches located in 24 countries. Its member churches, which represent about 5 million Christians, have come together for closer fellowship on the basis of a shared confession of faith.*

The REC was formerly called the Reformed Ecumenical Synod. Founded in 1946 by ethnically Dutch churches in the Netherlands, North America and South Africa, it was created out of a desire to speak of God’s grace* to a fragmented, post-war world. The adopted confessional unity* was the basis on which the founding churches established their witness* to each other and to the world. Today member churches work towards the unity of the Reformed faith, to contribute to the unity of the whole church.

The REC meets in general assembly every four years. Between assemblies, an interim committee makes decisions on council matters. A permanent secretariat handles the daily business of the council. Three permanent commissions in theological education, mission and diakonia, and youth and Christian education serve the council. Problems such as racism and sharing of resources receive special attention. The REC has publications arising from its conferences, committees and official meetings. Through three periodicals, News Exchange, Theological Forum and Mission Bulletin, the council communicates to its members and other churches outside the council.

The REC regularly sends delegates to other Christian ecumenical meetings, but it is limited and cautious about such contacts. Its members, generally, have relations with both Evangelical and ecumenical organizations.

RICHARD L. VAN HOUTEN

REFORMED/PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES

ALTHOUGH “reformed” often refers to all churches which were shaped by the Reformation of the 16th century, there were already by the end of that century ecclesiae reformatae which distinguished themselves under that name from the Lutheran churches. The distinctions were both in doctrine and in form of church government.

These churches were often described as Zwinglian or Calvinist, names the churches themselves resisted, declaring that they sought to be reformed according to the word of God.* While grateful for the witness of the reformers, they were convinced that a reformed church is also semper reformanda (always to be reformed) in accordance with the divine purpose.

When the Swiss reformation spread to Scotland, great emphasis came to be laid upon achieving a polity which was both scriptural and effective for continuous reformation (see church order). Presbyterianism was held by many to be such a polity, while courageous minority groups opted for a Congregational order, over against the authority of either bishop or council. From this historical development there emerged the churches of continental Europe called Reformed and those of Great Britain and Ireland called Presbyterian or Congregational/Independent.

Along the paths of exile and in the settlements of trade and empire, the European movement steadily expanded throughout the world. The World Alliance of Reformed Churches* reported, in 2001, 215 churches with well over 70 million members and adherents in 107 countries.

The distribution of these millions around the world is very uneven. The centres of strength, with numbers over a million each, are Australia, Canada, Germany, Hungary, Indonesia, the Netherlands, the Republic of Korea, South Africa, Scotland and Switzerland. Yet strength is not only in numbers, and minority churches have a proud record. In Mediterranean countries, in Latin America, in Asia, Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific, churches with total membership only of thousands have endured under persecution and repression, often winning the respect of other Christians and of the surrounding community. One of the frequently used symbols of Reformed/Presbyterian churches is the burning bush; though burning, it was not consumed.

THEOLOGY

These churches did not intend at the Reformation or in their more recent foundings to begin a new church* or to teach new doctrine. They commonly affirm the doctrines of the Apostles'* and Nicene* Creeds; their confessions are attempts to expound the central themes of the scriptures. They have disagreed among themselves about the use of creeds* and confessions to test the orthodoxy of members and ministers, but they have always emphasized the importance of declaring the truth through word and sacrament.

Main emphases of Reformed teaching have been the sovereignty and authority of God,* the lordship of Jesus Christ* as the divine Saviour, and the centrality of scripture* as the rule of faith and life. In relation to these positive doctrines of divine rule and revelation,* many theologians of this tradition have also emphasized the total dependence of created humankind upon God, the utter lostness and depravity of sinners and the consequent need of a saving action by God which by prevenient grace* draws the sinner back to a right relationship with the Creator and Redeemer. If these emphases then become the basis for a logical extrapolation of doctrine, a harsh predestinarian view of salvation* and damnation can emerge. The developments within the Reformed family of churches have tended towards a return to the primary emphases on divine lordship and grace, but past doctrinal controversies are by no means over. They are often revived when ecumenical discussion takes place.

POLITY

The polities of the Reformed churches were consciously developed to enable a return to what was held to be the discipleship of the early church. The main features of the Presbyterian polity are the parity of ministers, the participation of all members in church government and the authority of councils (see conciliarity).

While exceptional needs call for the exercise of a special authority, as in the case of the first apostles, the regular ministry of word and sacrament is exercised by ministers who have an equality of standing. If one of them (or indeed a layperson) presides over a meeting or a council, it is as a moderator elected for a fixed period of service. In meetings of the local church or councils of representatives of local, regional or national churches, the ministers are conjoined with lay elders; the voting is not carried out in separate groups of ministers and laity. In the local church some meetings are open for the participation of every member. Regional and national leadership and decision making belong to councils, not to individuals.

This polity is open to considerable variations. The most important is that which produced Congregationalism* by a fusion of elements from the Reformed tradition and from the radical wing of the Reformation. Here the wider councils are only advisory to a local church, in which the presence of the risen Christ gives full authority to the deliberations of the church meeting. A second variation affects the relation between ministers and elders in terms of the New Testament offices: are only ministers presbyters, with elders as helpers and administrators (see 1 Cor. 12:28), or are both ministers and elders presbyters, some being preachers and teachers as well as ruling (see 1 Tim. 5:17)? Third, there may be additional offices, e.g. church professors of theology, deacons in community service and, in the Hungarian-speaking churches, bishops with a long-term role of presidency and oversight.

REFORM, UNITY AND DIVISION

From their beginnings Reformed churches have had a vision of a reconstituted Christian unity.* In the view of the Reformed leaders, the failure to achieve consensus* with the Lutherans was a tragedy, which Lutheran-Reformed dialogue* in the 20th century has sought to overcome. Calvin and Farel succeeded at least in turning three Protestantisms into two by the historic consensus of Zurich (1548) with the Zwinglians. In succeeding centuries such very different men as Richard Baxter in England and Friedrich Schleiermacher in Germany have struggled to realize a unity based in reform.

It is sadly evident, however, that Reformed churches have also shown a tendency to division. It is difficult even to draw a chart of the many divisions among Presbyterians in countries as varied as Scotland and Brazil. Admittedly there are comings together as well as fallings apart to complicate the charting, but the overall impression is of a splitting trend.

Those who have anxiously considered the reasons for this trend have found them both in features accidental to the church's life, such as national characteristics of stubbornness or impetuosity, and in negative consequences of the positive features of Reformed doctrine and polity. To stress the right of all to ponder the scriptures, each in their own language, may lead to dispute over interpretations; to give to all a participation in church government may turn dispute into schism,* when a defeated minority leaves a council to establish a purer reform in its own assembly. The conviction that God's truth is to be known is turned into the belief that a particular church or group or individual knows it better than anyone else.

Within their own life and through their interchurch relations, the Reformed churches have often been notably self-critical, sometimes with penitent recognition of the divisive tendencies just described. This feature, coupled with the vision of unity inherent in scriptural reformation, has led Reformed churches in the modern era to make a strong contribution to the ecumenical movement.

ECUMENICAL CONTRIBUTION

The foundation of Presbyterian (1875) and Congregational (1891) worldwide confessional bodies was seen by the participant churches as a step towards wider relationships. At its formation, the Alliance of Reformed Churches throughout the world holding the Presbyterian system declared: "In forming this alliance, the Presbyterian churches do not mean to change their fraternal relations with other churches, but will be ready, as heretofore, to join with them in Christian fellowship." This policy has been repeatedly endorsed by subsequent gatherings of the alliance and of the International Congregational Council.

Reformed churches were among the first to respond to the initiatives which led ultimately to the founding of the WCC. While many of the conservative churches grouped in the Reformed Ecumenical Council* have distanced themselves from the WCC, the majority of Reformed churches have continued to be deeply involved in ecumenical developments. Most united churches (see united and uniting churches) have had a Reformed church among those which formed them.

As churches of Presbyterian and Congregational polity sought union, in 1970 the 11th assembly of the International Congregational Council and the 20th general council of the Alliance of Reformed Churches united, to form the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* (Presbyterian and Congregational). Its 23rd general council was held in Hungary in August 1997 with the theme "Break the Chains of Injustice" (Isa. 58:6).

MARTIN H. CRESSEY

■ J.-J. Bauswein & L. Vischer eds, The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1999 ■ S. Loudon, The True Face of the Kirk, London, Oxford UP, 1963 ■ M. Pradervand, A Century of Service: History of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, 1875-1975, Edinburgh, St Andrew, 1975 ■ L. Vischer ed., Reformed Witness Today: A Collection of Confessions and Statements of Faith by Reformed Churches, Bern, Evangelische Arbeitsstelle Ökumene Schweiz, 1982.

REFORMED-ROMAN CATHOLIC DIALOGUE

AFTER LONG hesitation the Reformed churches in 1968 followed others by engaging, especially through the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (WARC),* in international, interconfessional, bilateral conversations (see dialogue, bilateral). Their policy had previously always been to favour multilateral conversations, in particular those conducted through the WCC (see dialogue, multilateral). They nevertheless decided to take this new step in order to avoid duplications on the national level, or indeed to make up for the lack of dialogue there, but above all with the worldwide constituency of the Roman Catholic partner in mind. It was on this authoritative level that the WARC sought to achieve dialogue, and their aim was effective common witness.*

Reformed-Roman Catholic dialogue, however, did not await the outcome of Vatican II and the changes it introduced before making a start in several European countries and the US and Australia. Over the centuries very few dialogues were undertaken, such as the Poissy Colloquium in France (1561) or the correspondence between Bossuet and Leibniz in the 17th century, but these efforts failed because of the intolerance of the times, such as the wars of religion or the revocation of the edict of Nantes (1685). Not until the rise of the ecumenical movement were talks revived on a fresh basis, particularly by pioneers such as Yves Congar or Paul Couturier, who organized the Groupe des Dombes* in 1937. Bilateral dialogue was not so much a deliberate choice as a convergence of various historical circumstances. On the European continent the Reformation had primarily produced only the two major traditions – Lutheran and Reformed – with their churches covering more or less distinct geographical areas, which led to bipolar confrontations between Roman Catholicism, on the one hand, and either Lutherans or the Reformed, on the other.

Doctrinal divergence on the nature, place and role of the church* in relation to God and to the world had been a cause of Reformed hesitation to enter into dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church, which appeared to have a different set of priorities. The question of the central position of the church or its displacement from such a position determined the theme of the first series of bilateral conversations on “The Presence of Christ in Church and World” (1970-77), and this topic was pursued in the parallel and trilateral conversations (bringing in also the Lutherans) on “The Theology of Marriage and the Problem of Mixed Marriages” (1971-77). The second phase of the bilateral dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church, “Towards a Common Understanding of the Church” (1983-89), continued under firmly Trinitarian colours.

The first series of conversations in the bilateral Reformed-Roman Catholic dialogue resulted not so much in the working out of a consensus* as in the listing of points of agreement and divergence which had been noted while it was proceeding. The final report goes no further than to follow the sequence of the successive phases of the dialogue and the themes tackled in them: “Christ’s Relationship to the Church” (1970), “The Teaching Authority of the Church” (1971), “The Presence of Christ in the World” (1972), “The Eucharist” (1974) and “On the Ministry” (1975).

Throughout, importance was attached to hermeneutical problems, as regards scripture, the relation between the Testaments and covenants, the status of the canon, the relation of scripture and Tradition, the meaning of metaphors for the church in the New Testament, the diversity of NT models for the church, the recognition of the normative among relativities, the universal in the particular, the importance of the confession of faith, the nature of interpretative authority in the church and the role of the Holy Spirit as both giver and gift in the church. Second, the dialogue accorded real value to the world and its history as being (1) the immediate object of the saving plan of God in Christ through the Holy Spirit,

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

and (2) the ethical domain of a church which is itself a historical entity endowed with the gifts, or charisms, of the Holy Spirit and appropriate structures for its missionary work.

Third, Christ is in the world and in the church, which witnesses to him and points to him; Christ is present because of his lordship as the glorified and risen One: the church as guide, model and herald of the coming kingdom for the world proclaims and celebrates him in that world. Hence, ecclesiology is that of the "pilgrim people", whose eucharistic memorial bears witness to a communion with the glorified Christ through the Holy Spirit, a communion founded on fellowship with Christ in his glory rather than on the substitutionary nature of his expiatory sacrifice on the cross, which is seldom referred to. The resultant ecclesiology is along the lines of the true presence of Christ as Lord in the Holy Spirit and not of continuous incarnation. Fourth, an ecclesiology of service to the world takes shape implicitly, fluctuating between a more "ontological" Roman Catholic and a more "relational" Protestant conception (André Birmelé), between the idea of a church which is a sanctifying sacrament and of a church which is a sign and a witness. Finally, there are still questions which relate primarily to the ministry – to its form and scope, the conditions for its fullness and mutual recognition, its character as a sacramental sign, the internal relation between ministry and charism and between order and power, and the primacy of the legal or the liturgical sphere.

The same facts and questions were noted in the dialogue on marriage and mixed marriages in the pastoral and practical fields and were similarly presented. This dialogue took into consideration an extra partner, at least in the West: secularization,* which raises questions about what circumstances make a church marriage indissoluble and sacramental. The ecumenical question remains about the sacramental nature of marriage and the conclusions to be drawn for pastoral work, especially as to marriages which fail or are renewed (i.e. the re-marriage of divorced persons). Is marriage in the same category as baptism, with its unrepeatable character as an avowal of God's enduring covenant, or is it like the condition of the sinner who is forgiven? Is marriage sanctified because of the inherent sacramental nature of the mystery of salvation, or is it because of the extension of forensic justification through grace and faith?

Under the title "Towards a Common Understanding of the Church", the 1990 report of the international dialogue between Reformed and Roman Catholics is a more mature and cohesive document than the product of the first phase. The first chapter aims to serve as a "reconciliation of memories" which may become possible through new and self-critical perspectives on the separate and mutual histories of the two communities over the past 450 years. Then a "common confession of faith" by the dialogue commission shows what is already taken to be agreed Christologically, soteriologically and ecclesologically: Christ is the only mediator between God and humankind, and his work reveals that he is the Son within the Trinity; justification is received by grace through faith, "a faith embraced with a freedom restored to its fullness", so that the justified "can henceforth live according to righteousness"; and the church is confessed as the community of all who are called, redeemed and sanctified through the one mediator and in the one Spirit.

In the more directly ecclesiological third chapter, there is re-consideration of the relation between the gospel and the church as the chosen "place, instrument and minister" of the grace it receives in the sovereign liberty of God. Difficulties reside largely in different understandings of the relationship between what is confessed concerning the church and the concrete forms of its historical existence. Two rival conceptions of the church are discerned to be potentially complementary: the church is both "the creation of the Word" and "sacrament of grace"; the church is the servant of Christ's unique mediation, although never either its source or its mistress. Yet divergence, incompatibility, or at least tension appears to remain concerning the questions of continuity and discontinuity in church history, of the visible and invisible nature of the church, and (in these contexts) of the forms and significance of ecclesial structures and ministerial order.

In pointing the way forward, the fourth and final chapter envisages that increasingly common testimony, joint action and mutual challenge should become part of a deepening fellowship as remaining differences are settled or accepted (there remains a difference about what issues are serious enough to be church-dividing), and as exploration is made of the kind of unity needed for the ultimate goal of full communion in one faith and one eucharistic fellowship.

In 1992 a consultation within the World Alliance of Reformed Churches recommended among themselves a “frank analysis” of the changed and changing relations between Roman Catholics and Reformed since Vatican II, reflecting the variety of situations and positions of the Reformed churches around the world and the critical issues facing them. Before a new agenda should be set for dialogue, there was need to clarify the issue of the reception* of existing work as well as that of the wide range of opinions and traditions within the Reformed family. Nevertheless, in 1993 a joint consultation with Roman Catholic and Lutheran partners on “Christian Fundamentalism Today” initiated a new type of issue-oriented collaboration. In 1998 a third round was started in the WARC-Roman Catholic dialogue with the general theme “Church as Community of Common Witness to the Kingdom of God”, thus pursuing conversation between the two communions amid acknowledged tensions.

ALAIN BLANCY

- Bilateral Dialogues, studies from WARC 24, 1993 ■ A. Birmelé, Le salut en Jésus Christ dans les dialogues oecuméniques, Paris, Cerf, 1986, pp.255-76,331-43 ■ A. Blancy & M. Jourjon eds, Pour la communion des Eglises: L'apport du Groupe des Dombes, 1937-1987, Paris, Centurion, 1988 ■ M.E. Brinkman & H. Witte eds, From Roots to Fruits: Protestants and Catholics towards a Common Understanding of the Church, Geneva, WARC, 1998 ■ Christian Fundamentalism Today, studies from WARC 26, 1994 ■ “Consensus oecuménique et différence fondamentale”, reflections and proposals of the joint RC-Protestant committee in France, in La documentation catholique, 1931, 1987 ■ N. Ehrenström & G. Gassmann eds, Confessions in Dialogue, WCC, 1975, pp.49-52,120-23 ■ H. Meyer & L. Vischer eds, Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, WCC, 1984, pp.279-306,433-63 ■ “The Presence of Christ in Church and World: Evaluation Session of the Roman Catholic-Reformed Dialogue”, Reformed World, 36, 1980-81 ■ A. Sell, A Reformed, Evangelical, Catholic Theology: The Contribution of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, 1878-1982, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1991 ■ L. Vischer & A. Karrer eds, Reformed and Roman Catholic in Dialogue, Geneva, WARC, 1988.

REFUGEES

FROM THE VERY beginning, service to refugees has been an important part of the diaconal ministry of the World Council of Churches. In fact, during the second world war, when the WCC was “in the process of formation”, churches were actively cooperating to assist Jewish and other refugees to escape Nazi persecution. During its first 20 years of existence, the WCC’s attention was largely directed to European refugees who had been displaced during the second world war. However, by the 1970s, the programme had become global in nature and decentralized in structure. Rather than being centrally administered from Geneva, local, regional and national churches and ecumenical agencies assumed primary responsibilities.

In 1981 the WCC central committee adopted a public statement on “The Churches and the World Refugee Crisis”. The introductory paragraph states that refugees, as victims of social, economic and political injustice and armed conflicts, who are struggling for survival and for the recognition of their human dignity, “have a natural claim on the churches”.

Refugees fleeing their home country are in need of protection and assistance. The creation in 1951 of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) provided an important instrument for the international protection of refugees and the promotion of durable solutions. The 1951 UN Convention on Refugees defined refugees as individuals outside their countries of origin who are unable or who, because of well-founded fear of persecution on the basis of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion, are unwilling to return. Individuals found to be refugees under the convention are accorded certain rights – most notably the right not to be returned to their country of origin against their will.

Traditionally UNHCR has identified three durable solutions for refugees – voluntary repatriation (returning home once the conditions which led to flight are resolved), local integration in the country of asylum and resettlement to a third country. All three of these solutions are becoming more difficult. As wars last longer and are increasingly characterized by the widespread use of landmines, it is more difficult for refugees to return home in safety and dignity. Experiences in Rwanda, Bosnia and a dozen other places reveal that refugees are increasingly being returned before the wars are over. In terms of local integration, the reality is that no government wants refugees. Most refugees remain in countries of the South, where large-scale refugee influxes raise economic, political, cultural and social questions. Increasingly governments are allowing refugees to remain only on a temporary basis. Finally, the traditional resettlement countries – the USA, Canada, Australia and New Zealand – have all reduced the number of refugees they will accept. Beginning in the mid-1980s, the number of refugees arriving on borders of northern countries increased significantly. As a result, Western governments began not only to adopt more policies designed to deter asylum-seekers from arriving in the first place but also to coordinate these restrictive policies with each other.

The churches have long been in the forefront of assisting refugees and immigrants. From emergency relief to long-term support, churches have worked to find lasting solutions. Over the last decade, they have increasingly been drawn into a more active advocacy role, protesting restrictionist policies of their governments and advocating humane treatment of particular groups, such as women and children, with UNHCR. The WCC has been particularly active in urging UNHCR to assume a more active and visible role in the protection of refugees. Thus in 2001, the WCC was an active participant in UNHCR's Global Consultations on Refugee Protection (Geneva). However, the churches' concern has never been limited to those officially recognized by the UN or by governments as refugees. Growing numbers of people have been displaced within their own countries' borders. These internally displaced people – who in 2000 numbered more than officially recognized refugees – flee for the same reasons as refugees and are often more vulnerable to violence. However, there is no international system to provide protection and assistance to them. Moreover, the line between migrants (those who leave their countries for essentially economic reasons) and refugees (those who leave because of war or persecution) has become increasingly fuzzy. Recognizing that refugees are not the only ones forced to leave their communities, churches are increasingly using the term “uprooted” to refer to those forced to leave their homes – whether they are internally displaced people, refugees, or migrants displaced for environmental or economic reasons.

In addition to its work in mobilizing assistance to uprooted people through ecumenical partners, the WCC plays an essential role in convening global and regional meetings of churches and ecumenical agencies to coordinate strategies. An international refugee reference group, now known as the Global Ecumenical Network, meets regularly to share information on regional developments, analyze global trends and formulate common advocacy and information strategies. In November 1995 the WCC, together with Caritas Internationalis and the Lutheran World Federation, convened a global consultation in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia, to develop coordinated church perspectives on service to uprooted people.

While refugee ministry has always been important in the life of the WCC, emphasis is shifting towards a more prophetic interpretation of the meaning of refugee service. In September 1995 the WCC's central committee adopted a major policy statement entitled “A Moment to Choose: Risking To Be with Uprooted People”, in which it challenged churches worldwide “to re-discover their identity, their integrity and their vocation as the church of the stranger. Service to uprooted people has always been recognized as diakonia – although it has been peripheral to the life of many churches. But we affirm that it is also an ecclesial matter. We are a church of the stranger – the church of Jesus Christ the stranger.”

See also migration, sanctuary.

GEERTRUIDA VAN HOOGEVEST and ELIZABETH G. FERRIS

RELIGION

RELIGION is a phenomenon which is experienced directly. No people or tribe is without it, however variously it finds expression and even if it has not been specifically identified by name. It has not everywhere been defined by a special term because in some cases it permeates the whole life of a group. There is no such thing as religion in abstraction; we can experience it only in religions that actually exist. But these go back to the appearance of a God or the breaking through of transcendence – of the holy – in meditation and ecstasy. Human beings respond to this experience in worship and ethics; they give it form and make it reproducible. Three types of religion can be distinguished.

Tribal religions. The worship of such religions focuses on the cycle of the year and on the life-cycle. Rites take the form of festivals covering hazards and high points in everyday life. They emphasize veneration and not doctrine. In many instances ancestor veneration is central, linking together tradition, identity and tribal unity. The piety made available in them continues to underlie all other religions, especially ethnic (“folk”) religions which have actually been founded and have superimposed themselves on this piety and adapted themselves to it.

Religions with a founder. Here the new element is that these religions originate in historical times and have a rigorously ethical approach which claims worldwide validity. Doctrine is central in such religions. The rites of the existing tribal religion are mostly integrated in the new cult but are symbolically re-interpreted in accordance with the latter’s own doctrine (e.g. the Christmas festival in Christianity and pilgrimage in Islam). New festivals are introduced which focus on the life of the founder or on other important historical events.

Mysticism. Often this type of religion is not at all sympathetic to ritual. Mysticism* can break through the distinctive features of religions and seeks to lead them back to the unity behind them, which is accessible in meditation and ecstasy.

Every religion carries within it the germ of its own degeneration or perversion. For this reason soothsayers, prophets or reformers appear, seeking to take a religion back to its origins or to change it by leading it forward to something new. Thus criticism of religion is actually inherent in it. But in our own day this criticism has taken on a new dimension in that it stands outside religion and seeks to triumph over it as a whole.

Christians believe that God as Jesus’ Father, the Creator, stands behind all religions and that through them God wants to protect human beings in their life and in their humanity. Religions are thus part and parcel of God’s work of preservation in the world. To what extent they are also part of God’s saving activity is variously answered in Christian churches and teachings. But there is no lack of unanimity in the conviction that God’s saving activity in Christ is for all human beings and must be made accessible to all (see uniqueness of Christ).

See also dialogue, interfaith; God; theology of religions.

THEO SUNDERMEIER

- J.P. Asmussen, J. Laessde & J.C. Colpe eds, Handbuch der Religionsgeschichte, 3 vols, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1974
- W. Doniger ed., Encyclopedia of World Religions, Springfield MA, Merriam-Webster, 1999
- M. Eliade, Patterns in Comparative Religion, London, Sheed & Ward, 1958
- W.L. King, Introduction to Religion: A Phenomenological Approach, New York, Harper, 1968
- G. Van der Leeuw, Phänomenologie der Religion (ET Religion in Essence and Manifestation: A Study in Phenomenology), 2 vols, New York, Harper, 1963
- N. Smart ed., Atlas of the World’s Religions, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1999.

RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES

THE FIRST steps towards monasticism and other forms of religious communities occurred in the 2nd century, when many virgins and widows in the cities followed a distinctive pattern of life. Then in the deserts of Egypt and Syria, hermits (anchorites) followed a strict asceticism, and gradually most of them gathered around a master, such as Anthony of Egypt (c.251-c.356). In Upper Egypt Pachomius (c.290-346) developed this experience into a stable common life (cenobites), and in Cappadocia Basil of Caesarea (329?-79) wrote a rule for his several monasteries, with a pastoral concern for the poor and for defenceless strangers. The council of Chalcedon* (451) provided the first official church recognition of religious institutes, by that time well flourishing in cities and rural areas. Both desert traditions developed in Palestine, which boasted of over 10,000 “single ones” by the mid-500s – a “city in the desert”.

Renouncing marriage and family, profession and wealth, the monks devoted themselves to prayer and contemplation and to such activities as painting and making religious articles and serving others by medical aid and teaching. Monasticism began as a movement of laypeople but gradually was transformed into a more official calling, so that only monks could become bishops in later Byzantium.

In the West, John Cassian (c.360-435), after leading a monastic life in Bethlehem and Egypt, established a monastery for men and another for women in Marseilles, France. Later in Italy Benedict of Nursia (480-546), considered the founder of Western monasticism, constructed several autonomous monasteries. His rule of ora et laborare (prayer and work) gives absolute priority to worship, around which study, especially of the scriptures, and work revolve almost inseparably. It became the guide for Benedictine monks and nuns and for those in several similar communities. To them more than to any other groups one can credit the preservation of Graeco-Roman culture and the missionary advance, establishment and consolidation of the church in northern and central Europe.

The 13th century saw the rise of mendicant orders, such as the Franciscans, Dominicans and Carmelites; by rule they were freed from the monastic obligation of stable residence for the sake of engaging in more flexible apostolic activities. At the dawn of the Reformation, new orders arose, such as the Jesuits (1540). Then appeared congregations of women and of men who took no vows and dedicated themselves to education, health care and foreign missions, such as the Brothers of the Christian Schools (1680), a lay fellowship.

Foreign missions in the 19th century attracted dozens of new Roman Catholic communities founded solely for that work, such as the Mill Hill in England (1866), Verona in Italy (1867), and in France the White Fathers and Sisters (1868). The same period saw two new RC communities for explicit ecumenical work, as that was then understood: the American Paulist Fathers (1858) and the Franciscan Atonement Friars (1890).

In the 20th century, another RC model of consecrated life developed – secular institutes. By private vows and promises, men and women –single and married, lay and ordained – live “in the world”, alone, in families, or in groups; they strive for the perfection of charity and work for the sanctification of the world. Such are, for women, the Grail (1921) and the Catechists of the Virgin Mary (Japan, 1980), and (for both sexes) the Focolare* (1943).

The Second Vatican Council (see Vatican Councils I and II) urged all these forms of religious life to renewal and adaptation by a continuous return to the sources of Christian life, especially the study and meditation of the gospel, and to the original inspirations that brought the communities into being. Vatican II asked all religious institutes to embrace “the ecumenical initiatives and objectives of the Council”.

THE REFORMATION AND PROTESTANT COMMUNITIES

One of the many factors leading to the Reformation was the loss of monastic integrity in too many religious houses and the immoral lives of too many monks and nuns. Martin Luther entered the Augustinians in 1505, in his belief that this vocation would most nearly assure salvation. In 1519 he commended vowed celibacy as a good exercise of one’s baptismal pledge of lifelong struggling with sin. But by 1521 he rejected vows as tantamount to seeking righteousness and salvation outside of Christ and faith. John Calvin was far harsher in his condemnations; for him monks were papal minions who represented idleness, pride, hypocrisy and ignorance.

Although the reformers rejected religious vows and suppressed monasteries, in northern Germany six communities of nuns did survive in the Lutheran tradition. And some forms of religious life as attempts to replicate the first Christian community in Jerusalem (see Acts 2:42-43) revived in the Moravian Brethren and in the German Herrnhuter (1700s). Other examples are the many Lutheran deacon and deaconess "charity communities" in Germany (1800s); the (Reformed) Sisters of Charity in France and, in the USA, the Society of the Women in the Wilderness and the Ephrata cloister (1800s); the Swedish Lutheran Society of St Bridget, the Danish Theological Oratory and the Norwegian Order of the Cross (early 1900s).

In Europe after the first world war, Lutheran and Reformed brotherhoods and sisterhoods gathered men and women, theologians and laity, around a common spiritual rule and discipline as they continued to live single or family lives "in the middle of the world", e.g. the Humility Order (1925) and Michaelsbruderschaft (1931). In India the Christian ashram movement began, and in the USA, the Koinonia farm.

In the Church of England, Elizabeth I (ruled 1558-1603) finally suppressed all religious orders. During the next three centuries some Anglican religious houses were established, although none have survived. The modern Anglican revival began in 1845 (Sisterhood of the Holy Cross, London). By the 1960s there were over 100 female communities in Great Britain and Ireland, devoted to teaching, charitable and social work or for contemplative prayer in cloistered life; during this same time, 40 Episcopalian sisterhoods were active in the USA. Anglican male communities are less numerous. The most noted are the Society of St John the Evangelist (1866; Cowley Fathers), now in England, USA and Canada; the Nashdom Benedictines (1914); the Franciscans (1921); and the Society of the Holy Cross (1881, USA). Anglican communities of men and of women, with foreign and indigenous members, are in Africa, Australia, New Zealand, India, Japan and elsewhere.

After the second world war a more obvious revival took place in new Protestant communities such as the Marian Sisterhood of Darmstadt (1947), the Swedish Sisterhood of Mary (1954), and the Sisters of the Church of South India (1964). The Taizé community* in France was originally composed only of Reformed brothers (1949) but now has also Anglican and Roman Catholic members.

Since the mid-1960s in Western Europe and North America, male and female vocations* to most forms of structured religious life have been drastically fewer, alike in Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican and Protestant communities. The reasons for this swift reduction are unclear. But elsewhere, with decolonization and indigenous consciousness of new nations, there has been a sharp increase of new members in older communities and in new indigenous ones: in Asia, Augustinian Sisters of Our Lady (Philippines) and the male Missionaries of the Blessed Sacrament (India); in Africa, Daughters of Mary (Nigeria) and Bazozefiti St Joseph Brothers (Rwanda).

ECUMENICAL WITNESS

Despite aberrations and extravagances, monasticism, in East and West, preserves two truths for all Christians: without discipline there can be no holiness,* and discipline which costs nothing (which lacks renunciation in any form) is valueless. For the monks and nuns themselves, renunciation is neither condemnation nor denial of the world; rather, in Christ God reveals the glory of the coming kingdom, and in its light "the image of this world passes".

The monastic approach to theology has developed recognizable characteristics. It stresses a contemplative unity between scriptures, patristics and liturgy, and a union between spiritual reflection and experience. The word of God* is prayed and experienced more than analyzed and systematized. This authentic core of monastic theology and spirituality is finding a home in the ecumenical arena.

Through his writings and personal spiritual pilgrimage, the Trappist monk Thomas Merton (1915-68) still introduces thousands of Christians to the relation of contemplation to social justice ("solitude and solicitude"), helps them to see "the monk in each of us", and reaches out to other monastic traditions, especially the Buddhist.

Cloistered communities of contemplatives give quiet witness by using their monasteries and convents also as retreat centres, where clergy and laity of all communions can participate in regular liturgies and meditation and can seek spiritual counsel. Most RC, Anglican and Protestant religious communities regard an ecumenical spirit as essential to their vocation of prayer, study and activities; in fact, they are usually more ecumenical than the general clergy. Taizé in France, Benedictine monasteries, such as Chevetogne* and St John's (Collegeville, MN, USA), the Cittadella Ecumenica Taddeide and the Bose community in Italy are praying, intellectual centres for ecumenical gatherings. In the early 1980s an ecumenical council of religious began to network RC and Anglican communities, holding that the promotion of Christian unity is "an integral part of our life and mission".

Some pronouncements from monasteries of Mt Athos appear anti-ecumenical, perhaps reflecting a fear that Orthodoxy may be compromised and the churches may be too accommodating to the vagaries of modern times. Other monks have been active bridge-builders in their witness of prayer and dialogue, such as the Armenian Orthodox in Jerusalem and the Russian Orthodox at Zagorsk (Moscow) and St Serge (Paris). Many Orthodox leaders in the ecumenical movement, both bishops and others, have arisen from the monastic tradition.

TOM STRANSKY

■ Anglican Religious Communities Year Book, Norwich, UK, Canterbury, 1989 ■ F. Biot, The Rise of Protestant Monasticism, Baltimore, Helicon, 1963 ■ T. Gannon & G. Traub, The Desert and the City: An Interpretation of the History of Christian Spirituality, Chicago, Loyola UP, 1984 ■ D. Knowles, From Pachomius to Ignatius, Oxford, Clarendon, 1966 ■ A. Schmemmann, Historical Road of Eastern Orthodoxy, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1977 ■ A Spirituality for Our Times: Report of a Consultation on Monastic Spirituality, WCC, 1987.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

"RELIGIOUS FREEDOM" and "religious liberty" are generally synonymous in common usage, though some view the former as a broader concept and the latter as a specific term to denote a political or legal right.

Article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UN, 1948) states: "Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion: this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance." This article reproduces virtually verbatim the proposal made by the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs (CCIA) of the World Council of Churches when the declaration was adopted in Paris in 1948. It does not constitute a complete definition of religious liberty, but it is widely accepted as universal basis for the protection of this right.

The question of religious liberty was first raised at the Edinburgh meeting of the world missionary conference in Edinburgh in 1910, generally regarded as the beginning of the modern ecumenical movement. Ever since then there has been a progressive evolution in ecumenical understanding of religious liberty influenced by historical and political changes, the diversity of situations in which the churches live and the expansion of the constituency and concerns of the WCC.

The first assembly of the WCC (Amsterdam 1948) described freedom of religion as an essential element in any good international order. "This is an implication of the Christian faith and of the worldwide nature of Christianity." Amsterdam laid down four basic principles: (1) the right to determine one's own faith and creed; (2) the right to express one's religious beliefs in worship, teaching and practice and to proclaim the implications of those beliefs for relationships in a social or political community; (3) the right to associate with others and to organize with them for religious purposes; and (4) the right of every religious organization, formed or maintained by action in accordance with the rights of individual persons, to determine its policies and practices for accomplishing its chosen purposes.

The statement on religious liberty adopted by the third assembly of the WCC (New Delhi 1961) re-affirmed the Amsterdam principles and made significant advances especially in the theological and social aspects. "Holding a distinctive Christian basis for religious liberty, we regard this right as fundamental for men everywhere," it said. "Christians see religious liberty as a consequence of God's creative work, of his redemption of man in Christ, and his calling of men into his service. Accordingly human attempts by legal enactment or by pressure of social custom to coerce or eliminate faith are violations of the fundamental ways of God with men. The freedom which God has given in Christ implies a free response to God's love and the responsibility to serve fellow men at the point of deepest need." The New Delhi statement highlighted the freedom to manifest one's belief through religious witness and practice in political and social life as an essential element of religious liberty for Christians in the light of the demands of the gospel.

During the 1970s new perspectives on religious liberty were developed by the WCC within the broader framework of Christian responsibility and human solidarity. The CCIA consultation on "Human Rights and Christian Responsibility" (St Pölten 1974) recalled that the WCC has frequently declared that religious liberty is a basic human right and went on to insist: "This right is required so that the full responsibilities of Christian faith may be undertaken. This right is not a privilege or an exclusive freedom for the church. Human solidarity demands that we should be aware of the inter-relatedness of all rights, including the rights of those of other faiths or no faiths... The right to religious liberty exists in order to serve the community according to the commands of the gospel." The fifth assembly of the WCC (Nairobi 1975) affirmed the findings of the St Pölten consultation, saying that human rights cannot be effectively treated in isolation from the larger issues which lie at the root of human rights violations. It affirmed the indivisibility of civil and political (individual) rights and economic, social and cultural (community or peoples') rights, and that religious liberty was inseparable from other enunciated fundamental human rights. It noted that human rights violations occur in specific and different contexts of society and their social structures. Struggles to protect the human rights even of the individual requires participation in the wider struggle for justice and the liberation of the entire community.

The sixth assembly in Vancouver in 1983 identified the threat to religious freedom that came from the growing climate of religious fanaticism and the rise of political fundamentalism. During the period leading up to the seventh assembly, the CCIA's Human Rights Advisory Group addressed the concern for religious liberty against the background of tensions and conflicts which increasingly reflected religious factors, stressing the important role played by Christians in several parts of the world in political and social struggles as part of their faith-based commitments.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

From the time of the Edinburgh conference the ecumenical movement was concerned about "discrimination and repression exercised by dominant religious majorities against minorities". In Toronto (1950) the WCC central committee spoke of "serious infringements of religious freedom in certain countries in which the Roman Catholic Church is the dominant religion and in regions in which the Muslim faith is the dominant religion".

Before the 1960s the Roman Catholic Church's views on religious freedom oscillated between the thesis that those "in error" had no claim to religious liberty and the hypothesis that religious liberty can be provisionally granted to non-Catholics when the common good makes it advisable and complete repression of erroneous belief is not practicable.

The Vatican's understanding of religious liberty and human rights changed radically as a result of the Second Vatican Council* in the mid-1960s. In its document Dignitatis Humanae the church provided, in the words of the WCC central committee in 1966 that welcomed the Declaration on Religious Freedom, a "clear statement proclaiming full, civil, religious freedom, both individual and collective, for everybody everywhere". The second report of the Joint Working Group* between the RCC and the WCC in 1967 concluded that "though the theological justification may still differ from one church to the other, there is basic agreement on what the principle of religious liberty requires in practice".

Vatican II's* declaration on religious freedom limited itself to clarifying one particular, but vital, aspect of religious freedom in civil society, speaking more in juridical than theological terms to society as a whole. Every person, it said, has a right "to immunity from coercion" in religious matters. The church thus repudiated coercion in matters of religion. Christians must respect religious freedom even more conscientiously than others. The human response to God in faith* must be free, no one may be coerced into faith, nor can anyone be subject to coercion to prevent them from leaving the church.

Subsequent statements from the Vatican on religious freedom were very similar to the views expressed by the WCC in earlier times. In his World Day of Peace message (1 January 1988) Pope John Paul II said, "In the first place, religious freedom, an essential requirement of the dignity of every person, is a cornerstone of the structure of human rights. It follows that the freedom of individuals and of communities to profess and practise their religion is an essential element for peaceful human existence." This emphasis on the uniqueness of religious liberty and its place in the international order coincides with the Amsterdam declaration to which reference is made above.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY AT THE UN

The UN general assembly in 1981 adopted the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief. With the declaration, it reminded the nations that it is in the higher interests of humankind to put an end to persecution based on religion or belief and related forms of prejudice. In some respects, however, the declaration constitutes a reduction rather than an enlargement of existing standards. The freedom to change one's religion or belief (Universal Declaration of Human Rights) is not explicitly reiterated in the declaration, and the right to freedom of religious practice, is conspicuously absent.

According to the declaration religion or belief, for those who profess them, is a fundamental element in believers' conception of life, and therefore freedom of religion or belief should be fully respected and guaranteed. Freedom of religion or belief should also contribute to the attainment of the goals of world peace, social justice and friendship among peoples.

The UN Human Rights Commission named a special rapporteur to monitor compliance with the declaration, as a means for holding governments accountable to the international community for breaches of religious tolerance in their countries.

SOME CURRENT TRENDS

As it has done over the years, the ecumenical movement has to take into account the emerging global situation in dealing with religious liberty today. Several new developments are worthy of note. The transformation in former socialist countries that has led to the abandonment of the official atheism of former communist lands has considerably widened religious liberty. However, these changes have also brought with them new issues and problems in the area of human rights and religious liberty. One of these has been the proliferation of internal conflicts in the former socialist societies that reflect old national, ethnic and religious tensions. Forms of religion-based nationalism in many countries here and in other lands have created situations in which the religion of the majority becomes the primary identity of the nation. Adherents of religions other than the dominant one may find themselves relegated to second-class status in society and in the eyes of religious-based legal systems.

At the UN World Conference on Human Rights in Vienna (1993) another new challenge appeared that showed a widening gap between the North and the South on the understanding of rights. Some countries of the South expressed reservations about the universality of human rights, claiming that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and subsequent international human rights instruments were products of Western, Christian culture, philosophy and tradition and therefore could not be considered applicable in parts of the world with other histories, traditions, cultures and religions.

Another noticeable feature of the post-cold war period has been the process of globalization. It has led to a widening gap between rich and poor nations and the rich and poor within nations. Expanding poverty breeds violations of human rights and increases pressures on the state and the international community to protect them. Another feature of globalization, however, has been its tendency to weaken the powers of the state to promote and defend the rights, including the right to religious liberty, of its own citizens. The exercise of religious liberty depends in large part on effective guarantees for other human rights. This extends to the third generation of human rights that includes that includes the rights to development, peace and a healthy natural environment. Religious liberty occupies a unique and distinctive place among human rights. The statement of the eighth WCC assembly challenged the churches to remain constantly active and vigilant with respect to the universality, indivisibility and especially the implementation of the full range of human rights.

NINAN KOSHY and DWAIN EPPS

- A.F. Carrillo de Albornoz, The Basis of Religious Liberty, London, SCM Press, 1963 ■ Freedom of Religion and Belief. Basis of Peace, Washington, DC, International Religious Liberty Association, 1984 ■ N. Koshy, Religious Freedom in a Changing World, WCC, 1992 ■ F.H. Littell ed., Religious Liberty in the Crossfire of Creeds, Philadelphia, Ecumenical Press, 1978 ■ J.C. Murray ed., Religious Liberty, an End and a Beginning. The Declaration on Religious Freedom: An Ecumenical Discussion, New York, Macmillan, 1966 ■ J.C. Murray, Religious Liberty: Catholic Struggles with Pluralism, J.L. Hooper ed., Philadelphia, Westminster, 1993 ■ Religious Freedom: Main Statements by the WCC, 1948-75, WCC, 1976 ■ Statements on Religious Rights and Related Rights from 1937 to 1955 Made by the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs and Related Ecumenical Agencies, WCC, 1955 ■ L.J. Swidler ed., Religious Liberty and Human Rights in Nations and Religions, Philadelphia, Ecumenical Press, 1986 ■ J.D. Van der Vyver, "Religious Freedom and Proselytism: Ethical, Political and Legal Aspects", ER, 50, 4, 1998.

RENEWAL

THE WORD "renewal" did not come into vogue in ecumenical circles until the publication of W.A. Visser 't Hooft's book Renewal of the Church (1956). This was followed by an ecumenical consultation on renewal held in 1957 in New Haven, Connecticut (USA), under the sponsorship of the WCC Departments of Laity and the Cooperation of Men and Women in Church and Society. "The Missionary Structure of the Congregation",* an influential WCC study programme arising out of the New Delhi assembly (1961), focused to a considerable degree on renewal in and for mission.

During the 1960s the impact of the charismatic renewal was being felt in many churches, and the outcome of the long years of liturgical study and renewal became crystallized in many new liturgical texts and revisions (see liturgical reforms). Within the WCC, the magazine Risk, founded in the Youth department in 1965, became an instrument of explanation and discovery in the context of the renewal agenda. Over the years, its issues on a range of subjects – from development* to liturgy,* from black theology* to cinema – were widely read.

Renewal was given greater ecumenical currency in the 1960s by use of the term in Roman Catholic circles. Pope John XXIII's use of the word aggiornamento (lit. "bringing up to date") in calling the Second Vatican Council* was echoed in the documents of the Council as renewal: "In this assembly, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, we wish to enquire how we ought to renew ourselves, so that we may be found increasingly faithful to the gospel of Christ".

The theme of the WCC's fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968) – "Behold, I Make All Things New" – foreshadowed considerable ecumenical attention to renewal in the subsequent decade. This newness was the subject of much debate. Some spoke of "new situations, demanding new forms of life and new structures for the church". Communities of renewal such as Corrymeela, Taizé, East Harlem Protestant Mission and Emmaus House were established.

Orthodoxy claimed a holistic view of renewal, of recovery of the valid Tradition* and experience. On such terms, renewal had a certain ambiguity about it. It was represented not only as a response to rapid change but also as the recovery and re-endorsement of the basic and ancient truths of Christianity.

With the re-structuring of the WCC in the early 1970s, attention to renewal was centred in its unit for education and renewal. Consultations in the period between the Uppsala and Nairobi assemblies (1968-75) reflected the renewal theme, with sharp tension between those who advocated active and radical participation in the post-1968 student groups and youth movements and those who believed that renewal is essentially a churchly matter for the edification and nurture of congregational life. The essence of much of the most stimulating renewal activity was its transience; as a plurality of "theologies" developed, the legitimacy of any single spirituality came to be questioned more and more.

A workshop on spirituality* at the WCC's fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975) tried to identify some useful criteria for spiritual renewal. The term "spirituality for combat", coined by M.M. Thomas, enjoyed some currency. But in subsequent years, a re-invigorated retreat movement, re-discovering techniques of Ignatian spirituality, for example, has become even more influential. More and more writers are exploring the question of a style for contemporary spirituality in which ecumenism is almost taken for granted.

By its very nature, the work on spirituality does not lend itself to general treatment in large conferences, but specific aspects of spiritual life have been explored in more intimate WCC workshops such as the one on monasticism in 1986. The role of iconography and of symbolism in nurturing spirituality was explored in a workshop held in 1987 at the time of the celebration of the 1200th anniversary of the seventh ecumenical council (Nicea II), which in the Orthodox tradition restored the veneration of icons* after a period of iconoclasm. And in the growing dialogue with people of other faiths, experiences are shared across the faiths of the insights of mysticism* and ways of contemplative meditation.

Worship workshops, held in regional centres, have encouraged the exchange and circulation of local music and lyrics, and substantial international collections of such liturgical materials have been published. A worship resource centre has been established at the ecumenical centre in Geneva. Thus, worship shared across the traditions and cultures becomes an element not only of renewal but also of experiential ecumenism.

The growth of church base communities,* of house churches* and of charismatic groups may be ways of bringing renewal to church congregations but may also become stumbling blocks in the way to a fuller ecumenism. In 1989 a WCC team visit to Brazil published its report under the title "Renewal from the Roots" and described the base communities as "providing a model of grassroots ecumenism".

In all such processes of ecumenical renewal, the laity* have a key role to play.

See also education.

REX DAVIS

■ A.J. van der Bent, From Generation to Generation: The Story of Youth in the WCC, WCC, 1986 ■ J.L. Bodegon, Quest for Church Renewal: One Baptism, One Faith, One Hope – Sermons, Quezon City, Crossroads, 1998 ■ S. Crose, The Grassroots Church: A Manifesto for Protestant Renewal, New York, 1966 ■ R. Davis, Locusts and Wild Honey: The Charismatic Renewal and the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1978 ■ J.C. Hoekendijk, De kerke binnenste buiten (ET The Church Inside Out), Philadelphia, Westminster, 1966 ■ J.S. Pobee ed., Theology, Ministry and Renewal of God's People: Sixteen Bible Studies, WCC, 1995 ■ Renewal (= Risk, 5, 3/4, 1969) ■ G. Wainwright, "Renewal as a Trinitarian and Traditional Event", Lexington Theological Quarterly, 25, 1991.

RESPONSIBLE SOCIETY

THE ECUMENICAL movement has widely regarded "the responsible society" as a goal for political action. This social-ethical criterion made possible a critical evaluation of both communism and capitalism.* Amsterdam 1948 defined the concept as follows: "A responsible society is one where freedom is the freedom of men who acknowledge responsibility to justice and public order, and where those who hold political authority or economic power are responsible for its exercise to God and the people whose welfare is affected by it."

The "responsible society" was regarded as a free and democratic society, where all citizens are guaranteed freedom and where those holding political authority are responsible to the electorate. It was also regarded as a society where the individual and the state aspire to social and economic justice.* The Amsterdam assembly stated that the responsible society was to be neither communist nor capitalist. Communism was criticized for guaranteeing neither political nor economic freedom, and capitalism was criticized for the state's not taking responsibility for a just distribution of welfare.

The WCC assembly in Evanston (1954) emphasized that the responsible society is not a specifically "Christian" social system, a third alternative to communism and capitalism. Rather, it is "a criterion by which we judge all existing social orders and at the same time a standard to guide us in the specific choices we have to make". However, the responsible society was regarded to be a democratic society with both private ownership and public economic initiative.

During the Rapid Social Change study (1954-59), the responsible society was given as a social ideal for the developing countries. At the world conference in Salonika in 1959, the aim of social change in developing countries was stated to be a society where "men are called to accept responsibility to God and their fellow men for the choices and decisions on which the life of their societies is based; and responsible participation in social and political life can only be achieved where each national group or unit can express itself in freedom". The responsible society now included a demand for the national independence of developing countries and their liberation from the colonial powers.

As a social ideal, the responsible society has been based on two different theological traditions. The Barthian tradition is represented by J.H. Oldham, W.A. Visser 't Hooft and Roger Mehl. They advocate a "pure theological" social ethics, according to which the criteria for a right political action can be known only through revelation in Christ. Their ethics is deontological, i.e. the criterion for a right action is not good consequences but the will of God. The natural-law* tradition is represented by William Temple, John C. Bennett and Heinz-Dietrich Wendland. They advocate a "humanely grounded" social ethics, according to which we can understand what is right independently of revelation* in Christ. Their ethics is teleological, i.e. an action is right if it produces better or less evil consequences than alternative actions.

According to Oldham, who introduced the concept of the responsible society (see middle axioms), an action is right if it is carried out as a response to the guidance of God. Human beings are "responsive persons", in the sense that they should act in response to the call of God in every new situation, and society ought to be formed in such a way that every human being can be responsive in this sense. A responsible society is a free society, where human beings, by their freedom to control, criticize and replace the government, are respected as responsible persons with freedom to obey God.*

According to Bennett, certain moral convictions could be embraced by both Christians and non-Christians. The responsible society is a social ideal which is universally human in this sense. It is a democratic society, where the government is controlled by those governed. It is also a mixed economy, where a market economy is combined with both public and private ownership of the means of production. This political and economic system is desirable, since it promotes such intrinsic values as freedom, justice and welfare.

The responsible society was used as a social-ethical criterion at the WCC assembly in New Delhi (1961) and at the Church and Society world conference in Geneva (1966). However, in Geneva this social ideal was also criticized, mainly by theologians from the third world. The alternative was regarded to be a socialist society with both political and economic democracy. In the 1970s the responsible society was replaced by other ecumenical social ethical criteria, such as "the just, participatory and sustainable society".*

See also society.

CARL-HENRIC GRENHOLM

- A. van der Bent, Commitment to God's World: A Concise Critical Survey of Ecumenical Social Thought, WCC, 1995
- C.-H. Grenholm, Christian Social Ethics in a Revolutionary Age: An Analysis of the Social Ethics of John C. Bennett, Heinz-Dietrich Wendland and Richard Shaull, Uppsala, Verbum, 1973
- J.H. Oldham, "A Responsible Society", in The Church and the Disorder of Society: Man's Disorder and God's Design, Amsterdam Series, vol. 3, London, SCM Press, 1948
- The Responsible Society. "Christian Action in Society": An Ecumenical Inquiry, WCC, 1949
- L. Vischer, "The Vision of a Responsible Society after Fifty Years", ER, 50, 4, 1998.

RESURRECTION

THOUGH beliefs about the resurrection were certainly vital to the Christological and Trinitarian dogmas of the early councils, the resurrection itself was never comparably defined. We find instead what Gerald O'Collins calls "a living consensus" grounded in the New Testament witness to the resurrection and maintained by the common creeds of the churches.

Yet, in the midst of this ecumenicity, there has also been controversy, primarily over the relationship of the resurrection to the cross. It has often been asserted that the East worships the risen Christ, the West the crucified Christ. This generalization is unfair to both traditions, but it does point to a historic tension between them. The resurrection, writes Kallistos Ware of the East, "fills the whole life of the Orthodox church". The Orthodox see the cross from the perspective of the empty tomb. Even in his suffering, Jesus is "indestructible life" (Heb. 7:16), the Incarnate One of God who vanquishes the power of death by his death. "On the tree he triumphed over the powers which opposed him," proclaims the Orthodox baptismal liturgy. Orthodox hymnology exalts the cross itself as "life and resurrection" and "life-bearing".

For the West, the cross is more a sign of human godlessness. That we would crucify the Lord of glory shows the extent to which we have fallen in sin.* Yet it also reveals the depth of God's love: God sacrifices his own Son so that we sinners may be reconciled to God. Since Luther, Protestant theology has considered the cross to be the standard of all Christian preaching: only through the crucified Christ does God save us (1 Cor. 1:18-25). The West fears that the East does not allow the cross to stand on its own horrific terms but too easily subsumes it under the triumphant glory of the resurrection. The Orthodox reply that Christ offers not only forgiveness of sin but new life, prefigured by his resurrection, for all creation. In their view, the West has not sufficiently appreciated the cosmic scope of salvation* achieved by Christ but has focused too narrowly on the justification of the sinner.

These contrasts need not be divisive, for there are numerous points of contact between East and West for constructing a common faith. The Eastern fathers hardly neglect the forgiveness of sins as part of Christ's total work, sometimes even speaking of the cross, like the West, in juridical and penal terms. Anselm, who is often charged with focusing the West on atonement, understands the ultimate end of the cross to be the resurrection of the dead, when God will perfectly "complete what he began with human nature" (Cur Deus Homo? 2.4).

Most important, however, the 20th-century liturgical movement* has helped to recover the unity of Christ's death and resurrection found in the paschal celebration of the early church. The Jewish passover (Hebrew pesach, from which is derived the Greek pascha) remembered the central saving event of the old covenant,* God's deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage. The Christian pasch celebrated a new exodus, God's redemption of humanity from sin and death through Jesus Christ (1 Cor. 5:7-8). The service originally proceeded as an all-night vigil from Saturday evening to Easter* morning. Through a series of lessons and psalms, Christ was proclaimed as the fulfillment of Old Testament salvation history.* Then, at dawn, the darkness of the cross yielded to the light of the resurrection, and fasting and expectation gave way to joy. Worshippers passed with Christ from death to life, as in the words of Paul: "We were buried with him, and lay dead, in order that, as Christ was raised from the dead... we shall also be one with him in a resurrection like his" (Rom. 6:4-5, NEB). In one continuous service, ending appropriately with baptism* and eucharist,* the paschal celebration kept together cross and resurrection, suffering and victory. Only around the 4th century, did this single celebration start to divide, with eventually Good Friday commemorating the cross, and Easter the resurrection.

There is now a growing ecumenical consensus that the paschal mystery prohibits any opposition or competition between a "theology of the cross" and a "theology of the resurrection". The two cannot be isolated from each other or from the great sweep of salvation history remembered in the pasch. While some modern theologians have sought to deny the centrality of the resurrection or reduce it to the genesis of faith in the life of the disciples, the paschal mystery asserts the fullness of resurrection belief in unity with the cross: God's act in raising the crucified Jesus from the dead re-creates the whole of creation – personal, social, historical, cosmic. Dying and rising with Christ is the mystery of redemption* itself. The old, sinful life is crucified with Christ; new life comes through the risen Lord's gift of the Spirit.

All Christians, Eastern and Western, can claim the paschal celebration of the early church as their common heritage and theological norm. The ecumenical significance of the paschal mystery cannot be overstated. Through it, Christ would purify and renew his church for service to God and to the world. Indeed, the paschal mystery is the very means of our union with Christ and, as we faithfully struggle to overcome our divisions, the basis of our union with each other.

See also Jesus Christ, life and death.

ROWAN D. CREWS, Jr

- O. Casel, Das christliche Kultmysterium (ET The Mystery of Christian Worship, Westminster MD, Newman, 1962) ■ S.T. Davies et al. eds, The Resurrection: An Interdisciplinary Symposium, Oxford, Oxford UP, 1997 ■ F.X. Durrwell, La résurrection de Jésus, mystère de salut (ET Resurrection, London, Sheed & Ward, 1960) ■ V. Kesich, The First Day of the New Creation: The Resurrection and Christian Faith, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1982 ■ W. Lazareth ed., The Lord of Life, WCC, 1983 ■ T. Lorenzen, Resurrection and Discipleship: Interpretive Models, Biblical Reflections, Theological Consequences, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1995 ■ G. O'Collins, Jesus Risen, New York, Paulist, 1987.

REVELATION

THE 20TH CENTURY has witnessed the slow reconstruction of the doctrine of divine revelation in the aftermath of the Enlightenment. In particular, it has been realized again that God* is not simply another being in the universe whose existence, essence and self-expression may be assessed on purely naturalistic grounds. This reconstruction is not complete, and in fact progress towards it has been marked as much by the raising of new perplexities as by the resolution of old ones. Nevertheless, a trajectory within these newer revelation theories is discernible.

The doctrine of divine revelation begins (as do all doctrines) with an observation concerning human beings: we are open to experiences which disclose God. The God thereby revealed is thus not solely the object of the experience but in fact the very ground of its possibility (i.e. the gracious self-revealer). Thus the doctrine of divine revelation is ultimately concerned not so much with what is revealed or discovered about God as it is with how any such self-transcending revelatory discovery is possible in the first place. We shall return to this description after summarizing the major features of 20th-century discussion of the doctrine.

Regardless of how one defines "20th century" in this context, by all accounts its fundamental Protestant expression begins with Germanic neo-orthodoxy's rejection of theological subjectivism, the idea that knowledge of God was immanent within creation and thus fully accessible to the human rational subject. "General revelation", it appeared, had largely done away with the need for any "special" revelation ("additional" revelatory acts of God necessitated by human sin*). But now, with Protestant neo-orthodoxy, we find the complete (Karl Barth) or virtually complete (Emil Brunner) rejection of the possibility of general revelation and hence of natural theology.

For Barth, divine transcendence means that God is wholly other than human beings and as such is utterly unknowable by humans except through the self-disclosing acts of the preached word, the biblical word and the living Word (Christ). Were any sort of degree of knowledge of God possible apart from these acts, each would be attenuated. Specifically, this means that no genuine (much less saving) knowledge of God is discoverable within creation itself by means of human reason. Barth insisted that the two realms or categories of the divine and the created are mutually exclusive, hence only dialectically related. Human finitude, radically compounded by and ultimately indistinguishable from human sinfulness, completely annihilates the possibility of discovering God from below. God's self, identical with Christ, can be revealed only through Christ (see Jesus Christ).

Brunner maintains the distinction between the divine and the created realms as seriously as Barth in all areas except for personal encounter. The God of the Bible clearly desires personal encounters with sinful human beings and brings them about. For this to be possible, there must be something in pre-saved human nature that in and of itself can receive the divine initiative and thus complete the divine intention of human salvation.* Apart from some such postulate, there could be no way to distinguish between human beings, whose efforts towards God (ex hypothesi) always fail, and animals, who make no such efforts at all. In particular, there could be no way to distinguish their respective responsibilities towards God, especially for the person who really believed Barth and consequently gave up even trying to think about God. Instead, Brunner said, God's sovereign transcendence is shown in the operations of the human conscience,* whose accusing and excusing functions point beyond themselves precisely to God, who both judges and pardons. And it is in the encounter with the personal God, seen most clearly in the special revelation of Jesus Christ, that humans become confident that God would rather excuse than accuse. Contrary to Barth, Brunner held that sin is in fact a form of relationship with God, albeit a negative one. From that ground, then, God encounters human beings in grace* and redemption.*

Germanic neo-orthodoxy culminated as an ecumenical expression in the 1934 Barmen declaration (see Confessing Church). Barmen rejected the historical immanentism of Nazi theology – in particular, its identification of Nazi policies with the kingdom of God.* In place of such theology, it advocated a return to a supernatural and Christocentric revelation as the only sufficient guide for personal faith* as well as social morality. But some in the Confessing Church nevertheless stopped short of Barth's dialectical brick wall, preferring instead Dietrich Bonhoeffer's axiom that "God is the beyond in our midst".

Roman Catholic theories of revelation during the 20th century tended, not surprisingly, to focus more on the corporate encounter with God than on the individual one, which led to the reduction of revelation to salvation in much Protestant thought. This is said without ignoring Catholics such as Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, whose notion rested ultimately upon "contact between two centres of consciousness" rather than any form of external verification such as reason, miracle, ecclesial authority or the like.

In general, Roman Catholic theories have followed, and at times provoked, the evolution from Vatican I's* Dei Filius (1870) to Vatican II's Dei Verbum (1965). In the former, the Roman Catholic Church saw itself as the sole and terminal sign of revelation, in that it alone bears the verifiable marks of unity,* holiness,* catholicity* and apostolicity* in their concrete entirety. This self-description resulted historically in the anti-modernist entrenchment of the early 20th century, whose internal characteristic was rejection of the critically new and whose external characteristic became virtual ecclesial sectarianism. More particularly, anti-modernism insisted that revelation is transcendental as well as immanent, that it proceeds from miraculous divine intervention, that it has a predominant doctrinal or intellectual aspect and that it is gracious and hence not naturally present within the human person. The traditionalists in this controversy were eventually impressed with the incompatibility of their theology, according to which God continues to be revealed to and through the church* within history,* with their historiography, according to which the meaning of history is found in its primitive and pristine origins. The first official recognition of this incompatibility is found in Pope Pius XII's encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943), whose signal effect was to allow Roman Catholic biblical scholars to resume their use of historical criticism in exegesis because it was no longer perceived as a necessary threat to divine revelation (see exegesis, methods of).

Dei Verbum made the church rather the sacrament* of revelation. This modification located the concept of revelation in a historical rather than a strictly dogmatic context, seeing it as both word and deed, dynamically creative, universal as well as particular, calling for obedience by all (including the magisterium), and finally as critically grounded within scripture rather than fully parallel to it.

Among contemporary Protestants, Wolfhart Pannenberg also affirmed encounter as the mode of divine revelation, as Brunner and Bonhoeffer had done. For Pannenberg, though, the encounter is with God through history rather than through conscience – in particular, the qualitative "end" of history brought about in the resurrection* of Jesus. The resurrection of Jesus certifies our own future resurrection and reveals God by showing that both private and corporate history depends for its fulfilment upon the God "who gives life to the dead and calls into existence [i.e. everlasting life] the things that do not exist [i.e. the dead]" (Rom. 4:17). What is revealed here is God's power and love, first for Jesus and thus for us as well, which makes the death and resurrection of Jesus, and reflexively his historical life, salvific and not merely exemplary. The faith which estimates the resurrection in this way lives today in view of the ultimacy of the kingdom of God,* which in turn both testifies to God's presence in the revelation and helps to bring about that kingdom in history. But because this revelation is of God's own self, only the Christ-revelation is directly valid; all other "revelations" are but indirect divine "manifestations". Hence Pannenberg rejects as fatally circular the concept of salvation history,* according to which a determinate segment of history critically evaluates the remainder by means of an ongoing tradition of partial self-disclosures culminating in Christ. Both the presupposition (a super-revelatory word-disclosure guaranteeing the critical distinctiveness of salvation history) and the effect (all other history is merely profane) of this concept are unsatisfactory. Pannenberg prefers instead a universal history in which the whole is evaluated, proleptically yet rationally, by the singular and climactic resurrection-disclosure.

The Roman Catholic Avery Dulles objects to Pannenberg's theory of "revelation as history" because it posits events, rather than words, as primary to divine revelation. This position is unsatisfactory because events are by definition meaningless apart from interpretation, and interpretation is by nature cognitive or verbal. We should instead view revelation as both deed and word. Dulles suggests the use of "symbolic revelation" as a proper category here, in that symbols are cognitive entities (words) which have evocative and hence participatory effects (events) within human life and history. "Word and deed thus participate in one another. Speech is at once an operation of the intelligence and a motor phenomenon."

It is not entirely surprising to discover Pannenberg's preference for history over word affirmed within liberal (or ethical) Protestantism, represented here by F. Gerald Downing. Downing contends on biblical grounds that the category of revelation is subservient to that of salvation, that it was largely unknown to the biblical authors because it implies a full and complete personal disclosure which ex hypothesi we cannot expect of God, and that the term is fraught with ambiguity because its primary modern usage is epistemological rather than religious (i.e. it served as the warrant for theological argumentation against those who thought such a possibility simply incoherent, rather than serving for actual saving encounters with God). Therefore, says Downing, the only "revelation" of interest to the Christian community is what will come at the end. What the biblical tradition has instead of present revelation is salvation, a form of "commitment [which] is essentially love in response to... the 'myth' of the prior love of 'real God in Christ'". What counts here is not the historical verifiability of the myth but rather the agapic quality of the obedient commitment which flows from it.

The notions of revelation within liberation theologies resist easy systematization, at least in part because liberationists are not much concerned either with denominational borders or traditional methodologies. Generally they fall within this same ethical or praxis-oriented construct. Central to all is the insight that Christ's death revealed God precisely as victim. Hence God's word reaches us today as a summons to participate in the struggle to liberate today's victims. Gustavo Gutiérrez says: "History is the scene of the revelation God makes of the mystery of his person. His word reaches us in the measure of our involvement in the evolution of history."

For Karl Rahner, revelation is the self-disclosure of God, not in an extrinsic (and especially propositional) sense, but instead as the loving and hence radically personal mystery presupposed by the existence of material beings capable of loving self-transcendence (i.e. human beings). Transcendentally considered, revelation is the dynamic ground of the coming-into-being of humans, in that humanity constitutes the "other" which God lovingly posited as the ultimate possibility of the acceptance of self-transcending divine love. Historically considered, revelation centres in Jesus of Nazareth, in that he was the obedient and receptive person by whom God's love (ultimately inseparable from God's self) was accepted and thus became most fully evident within the conditions of history. Far from being a mere communication of propositional information from heaven to earth, an encounter between persons of merely different ontological value, divine revelation is seen by Rahner as the condition absolutely presupposed by the existence of humanity. And since humanity does exist precisely as material reality capable of spirit, i.e. the dynamic exchange of self-transcending love (one notes the difference between this and Downing's agapic or uni-directional love), then the divine self-communication must be its ground both in particular and in general. Jesus Christ is at once the real God as communicated, the fully human acceptance of this communication, and the historically definitive manifestation of this offer and its acceptance.

Because (still according to Rahner) there is no human being who is not essentially constituted by the dynamic love of God, divine revelation is universal in scope (see universalism). What were traditionally considered its outer limits are better thought of as demarcating the boundary between explicit and implicit reception of God's self-communication. This position better accounts both for the universality of the notions of faithfulness and sin, and for the presence of genuine truth among the various world religions and philosophies. Apart from some such expression of universality within revelation theories, it is impossible to say with precision either how sin is against God, or how truth can exist within non-biblical religions.

Rahner's transcendental method has been criticized as overly psychological, hence insufficiently relational or communal. This weakness may be met by further clarifying his notion of spirit as the fundamental locus of dynamic self-transcendence. The activities of spirit may be specified as knowing, loving and hoping. Each of these shows the human person in self-transcendence, historically and incrementally progressing beyond ignorance, autonomy and anxiety. Each is grounded within the dynamic category of goodness, which functions as a power beckoning the human spirit from ignorance to knowledge, from autonomy to love and from anxiety to hope. Furthermore, each is communal, necessarily relating the spiritual subject with other such subjects in the common pursuit of their goals. Finally, especially in view of the latter, these activities are collectively grounded within the Triune God: Father as mysterious ground of knowing, Son as object of the Father's love and hence the prototype of human love, and Spirit as creative appropriation of this love, and thus the possibility of dynamic intentionality and progress (see Trinity).

This account of divine revelation overcomes two characteristic weaknesses within many traditional ones: (1) the uncritical presumption of the meanings of "God" and "human beings" in theories which intended to relate them, and (2) the seclusion of divine revelation within the biblical religions. But it does not fail to address their intentions, especially those relating to the possibility of a relationship between God and humans, on the one hand, and the gracious (i.e. inescapably responsible and ultimately good) character of that relationship and consequent possibility of sin, on the other.

Revelation did not often figure explicitly as a principal theme in ecumenical discussions during the last decades of 20th century. An exception is the "statement on revelation and faith" which the Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue* published as its 1996 report under the title The Word of Life. The joint commission sought "commonly acceptable ways of expounding the historical self-disclosure and indeed self-gift of the Triune God, focused in Jesus Christ, the Word made flesh and brought home to successive generations of believers by the Holy Spirit, released in power at Pentecost" and "a common account of how men, women and children, opened to the gracious presence of God, are enabled to commit themselves, body and soul, heart and mind and will, to their Maker and Redeemer and, in communion with him, become renewed in the divine image, in the holiness and happiness which is God's intention for humankind". With 1 John 1:1-3, the statement "starts from the particularity of the God of Israel's self-revelation in Christ: the divine Word, who was in the beginning with God and has led the history of the chosen people, has been made flesh in Jesus. That sheer self-gift of God is a word of life to humankind... In Christ, in his words, his deeds, his entire existence, God has been revealed in audible, visible, palpable form; God has been received by human ears, eyes and hands. What the first believers have taken in, they then bear witness to and transmit, for the message spreads the offer of a life shared with God. The modes of the announcement will appropriately reflect, echo and hand on what was seen, heard and touched in the embodied manifestation of God in Jesus Christ. Accepted in faith, the words, signs and actions of the gospel will become the means of communion with the one true God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. The divine life into which the Spirit introduces believers will be a common life, as each transmits and receives what is always the gift of God.” This ecclesial text brings together much, through by no means all, of what had been achieved in theological reconstruction of the topic in the 20th century.

KERN ROBERT TREMBATH

■ J. Baillie, The Idea of Revelation in Recent Thought, New York, Columbia UP, 1956 ■ K. Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik (ET Church Dogmatics, II/1 and II/2, Edinburgh, Clark, 1957 and 1964) ■ B.A. Demarest, General Revelation, Grand Rapids MI, Zondervan, 1982 ■ A. Dulles, Models of Revelation, Garden City NY, Image, 1985 ■ Joint Commission between the Roman Catholic Church and the World Methodist Council, The Word of Life: A Statement on Revelation and Faith, Lake Junaluska NC, World Methodist Council, 1996 ■ R.P. McBrien, Catholicism, rev. ed., San Francisco, HarperCollins, 1994, ch. 7 ■ W. Pannenberg ed., Offenbarung als Geschichte (ET Revelation as History, New York, Macmillan, 1968) ■ K. Rahner, Grundkurs des Glaubens (ET Foundations of Christian Faith: An Introduction to the Idea of Christianity, New York, Seabury, 1978, parts 1 and 5) ■ K.R. Trembath, Divine Revelation: Our Moral Relation with God, New York, Oxford UP, 1991 ■ K. Ward, Religion and Revelation: A Theology of Revelation in the World's Religions, Oxford, Clarendon, 1994.

REVOLUTION

THE VARIOUS meanings of “revolution” include the idea of radical change, the overthrow of an old order and the introduction of a new. Usually it means abrupt, self-conscious change, although occasionally historians will discover, in retrospect, a “silent revolution” that took place over a period of time. A revolution is not necessarily violent, but most of the famous revolutions of history have been violent, either because revolutionaries attacked an old order or because the old order sought violently to repress the new movement.

Traditionally the term, used in both astronomy and human history, referred to the restoration of an order* that had been disturbed. Just as the heavens made their apparent annual revolution around the earth, human history moved to restore a given order. In ancient China, for example, when evil rulers violated “the mandate of heaven”, a revolutionary movement was justified in overthrowing the past regime and re-establishing an order that could again claim the mandate.

In societies influenced by the Bible, revolution often aimed to introduce a genuinely new era. The God of scriptures was capable of doing “a new thing” (Isa. 43:19). That belief had many expressions. In the late middle ages and Renaissance, it took on a broad historical meaning. The Franciscan monk Joachim of Fiore (c.1135-1202) developed the doctrine of the three ages (of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit) and contributed to a vivid expectation of the future. The Enlightenment secularized the theme. The 17th-20th centuries saw the English, American, French, Soviet and Chinese revolutions, along with many revolutions against colonial powers. Fascists and Nazis claimed to be revolutionary, partly to avoid the stigma that went with identification as “counter-revolutionary”.

The earliest modern revolutions were avowedly political, although economic factors were important, too. In Marxist revolutions the primary emphasis was economics, but politics, although theoretically subordinated to economics, played a major part. The vocabulary of revolution extended to art, architecture, and much of cultural life – but it remained for Mao Zedong to popularize the term “cultural revolution” in a total sense.

THEOLOGY AND REVOLUTION

Historically, religion* often functions to legitimize existing structures of power,* for most rulers have claimed some kind of divine right or sanction for their authority.* All who object are then put in the position of resisting divine order. A priest-king can combine religious and military power against foes domestic or foreign. When offices of king and priest are separate, the two may work out a partnership convenient to both.

A religion and its followers may criticize the existing order in the name of a transcendent God* who judges all human systems. In the biblical record Moses confronted Pharaoh, demanding freedom for a people.

Later, Nathan challenged David, Elijah challenged Ahab. In a classic confrontation the priest Amaziah tried to stifle the prophet Amos, telling him to leave Bethel, which was “the king’s sanctuary” (Amos 7:13), but Amos refused to be silenced (vv.14-17). These cases are not quite revolutions, because old orders persisted, but the revolutionary impulse is clear.

Three contemporary theological meanings of revolution may be distinguished: (1) metanoia, the New Testament term usually translated “repentance”, has been described by theologian H. Richard Niebuhr as “permanent revolution”, the ceaseless transformation of faith and ethics; (2) in the NT the Magnificat* testifies that God puts down the mighty from their thrones and exalts those of low degree; the beatitudes of Jesus portray the kingdom of God* as a revolutionary reversal of existing society, bringing blessing to the poor,* the meek, the persecuted; (3) “revolution” most commonly means an organized political movement overthrowing an oppressive government.

Theology almost universally recognizes the kingdom of God as a radical transformation of historical societies. In much of Christian history, however, that kingdom has been located in an other-worldly heaven or at the end of history, where it has little meaning for present political and economic life. Thus Christendom could be understood as a divinely ordained social order (often with reference to Rom. 13) – certainly imperfect, but God’s will for a sinful world.

However, protests were possible. John of Salisbury in the 12th century and Thomas Aquinas in the 13th recognized a carefully qualified right of tyrannicide in extreme cases. John Wycliffe (d.1384) and Jan Hus (d.1415) joined biblical fervour and the cry for social change.

Karl Mannheim in Ideology and Utopia saw a decisive turning point in modern history at the point when the expectation of the imminent kingdom of God “joined forces with the active demands of the oppressed strata of society”. Thomas Münzer (d.1525) identified NT eschatology* with social revolution, earning the enmity of political rulers and Roman Catholic and Protestant church leaders. Martin Luther, who had earlier called on the princes to recognize the just demands of the peasants, responded in furious anger to Münzer’s revolutionary theology.

Yet Luther late in his career called on the princes to resist the emperor, “even though it mean a revolution”. Calvinists and Puritans (including Theodore Beza, John Milton and others) more frequently justified revolutionary acts against kings. Many modern revolutions have invoked some religious or theological vindication. The American Declaration of Independence (1776) appealed to “the laws of nature and of nature’s God”. But all these examples diverge from Münzer’s identification of eschatology and revolution.

THE CONTEMPORARY SITUATION

Social revolution has become a frequent, if controversial, theme in ecumenical theology. On a world scale, Christians have supported many revolutions of peoples seeking self-government and independence from colonial powers (see colonialism, decolonization). Ironically, the prior colonization had often claimed Christian sanction; in some revolutionary conflicts (most conspicuously in South Africa), both sides have given theological justifications, although the world church has resolutely opposed apartheid.*

In the anti-colonial revolutions of the 20th century, the chief actors have been people of many faiths. Some have been Christians, specifically guided by theological concerns. For example, T.B. Simatupang, a hero of the Indonesian struggle for independence and later a president of the WCC, acknowledged the influence of Reinhold Niebuhr in his own participation in the revolution (ER, 1985). Niebuhr, who worked out his theology of conflict primarily in relation to the Nazi threat, characteristically found justification for coercion in a sinful world, both to maintain government against anarchy and to resist tyranny. The break-up of the old imperial systems has not always brought freedom.* People have continued to struggle against oppression by national despots and by foreign powers (nations and business corporations) that maintain economic dominance, often called neo-colonialism.

In the 1960s revolution broke into ecumenical discussion on a new scale. In 1966 the WCC called a conference in Geneva on the theme “Christians in the Technical and Social Revolutions of Our Time”. The addresses and discussions showed a wide recognition of a revolutionary spirit in the Bible and a revolutionary ferment in the contemporary world. Some speakers called for a “revolutionary theology”. There was recognition of vast injustice in the world and the need for some kind of social revolution. The report of section 2, “The Nature and Function of the State in a Revolutionary Age”, urged non-violent methods of change but raised the question “whether the violence which sheds blood in planned revolutions may not be a lesser evil than the violence which, though bloodless, condemns whole populations to perennial despair”.

In 1965, Vatican II* produced its pastoral constitution Gaudium et Spes (The Church in the Modern World), with its attention to large-scale social injustices. In 1967 Pope Paul VI, building on Vatican II and prior papal teachings (esp. of Leo XIII, Pius XI and John XXIII), issued his encyclical Populorum Progressio (On the Development of Peoples). It pointed to grave social ills, including the economic bondage of some newly independent nations. The pope advocated “a new humanism”, with property rights subordinated to justice* for all peoples, freedom from imposed servitude, land re-distribution, international debt relief and international re-distribution of wealth. While warning against illusory messianism and “totalitarian ideologies”, he said: “A revolutionary uprising – save where there is manifest, long-standing tyranny which would do great damage to fundamental personal rights and dangerous harm to the common good of the country – produces new injustices, throws more elements out of balance and brings on new disasters” (para. 31). That statement was noteworthy, both for the warnings against revolution and for the exception that justified revolution.

In 1967 some 16 bishops of the third world (from Latin America, Africa, Asia, Eastern Europe and Oceania) issued the statement “Gospel and Revolution”. They affirmed that revolutions are part of history, not always good, but sometimes necessary and productive of good fruits. Christians, they said, “should know how to recognize the hand of the Almighty in those events that from time to time put down the mighty from their thrones and raise up the humble, send away the rich empty-handed, and fill the hungry with good things” (para. 12).

In 1968 the fourth assembly of the WCC (Uppsala), receiving the report of the Geneva conference of 1966, authorized re-structuring of some programmes. Coincidentally, 1968 was the year of the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr – a reminder that revolutionary activity, even when committed to non-violent methods, may meet violence. The next year the WCC launched the Programme to Combat Racism,* one that led to controversies when it made grants for non-violent educational activities to organizations that in other activities might resort to violence (or counter-violence against existing violence).

In 1968 the Latin American bishops conference (CELAM) at its historic second meeting in Medellin, Colombia, issued landmark statements on justice and peace.* It held that both liberal capitalism and the Marxist system “militate against the dignity of the human person”. It called for political and economic reforms, with liberation from neo-colonialism. Affirming that justice is a prerequisite for peace, it strongly urged non-violent change but pointed out the reality of “institutionalized violence” in existing systems.

The next decade saw an outpouring of “theologies of liberation”, including Latin American (both Roman Catholic and Protestant), feminist and black theologies. Although these include great variety in detail, all can be called revolutionary in the broad sense of the term.

The story is far from finished. The non-violent protests of Chinese students, crushed by government troops in 1989, evoked expressions of support in Chinese churches. The people’s movements of Eastern Europe in 1989-90, predominantly non-violent, marked revolutionary protests against purportedly revolutionary, entrenched governments. The break-up of the Soviet Union might be seen as several revolutions against a system that itself came out of revolution. The Middle East is filled with potential revolutions, some against traditional feudal absolutisms re-inforced by modern technology, others against modern governments them-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

selves the products of revolutions. All signs are that the age of revolution is not ended.

ECUMENICAL THEOLOGICAL-ETHICAL ISSUES

The theological appraisal of revolution is complex because conflicting values are involved. The biblical tradition recognizes that some kind of government and order are essential to social life and well-being but does not sanctify every system of authority. The records of the exodus and the crucifixion are testimonies that governments can do criminal acts. Cries for justice often demand radical social change, but not every discontent with government is an occasion of revolution.

The first theological-ethical issue raised in most discussions is usually violence (see violence and non-violence). All Christians indeed can be reluctant to engage in violence. But the objection to violence involves, in many cases, a pseudo-argument. Since most people, including most Christians, justify violence on at least some occasions, even though with regret and restraint, the special rejection of revolutionary violence requires explanation. In situations of radical injustice, enforced by violence, it is hard to refute the argument that revolutionary violence is more justifiable than the institutional or systematic violence it opposes. The Russian Orthodox theologian Nicholas Berdyaev maintained that class war is an "irrefutable fact", that the greater violence is exercised by the privileged, that war may sometimes be "a good" – even though the church should seek to "spiritualize" the struggle.

But other theological-ethical issues remain. Is revolution, in intention and action, truly aimed at justice? Some revolutions, like most coups d'état, are simply grabs for power. They substitute one oppressor for another. The proverbial statement about revolutions devouring their own children deserves close attention. Even well-intentioned revolutionaries may, in the exercise of power and the fanaticism of struggle, betray their aims and become tyrants.

Does the revolution maximize the possibilities of non-violent action and restrain violence as far as possible? Just as the classic doctrine of just war* imposes restraints on violence, a doctrine of "just revolution" must do the same. In the heat of conflict, these restraints are often forgotten, but they remain ethical responsibilities. Guerrilla warfare, one characteristic form of revolutionary war, has special temptations. Juan Luis Segundo has pointed out that such war is especially destructive of what he calls the social ecology.

*How does ideology* impinge on theology?* In every social order, the privileged are likely to value the existing order and magnify the perils of change. The oppressed are likely to depreciate the order and magnify the benefits of change. Thus ideology influences theology and ethics. The Bible often says that the poor and humble are more likely to recognize reality than the rich and haughty. That perspective is a help in correcting ideological bias. It does not of itself tell us that every proposed overthrow of the social order is good.

How does the revolutionary relate eschatology and ethics? Thomas Münzer, as noted above, virtually merged revolutionary ardour with apocalyptic expectations. Most contemporary Christians agree with CELAM's Medellín document that temporal progress and the kingdom of Christ are not the same. But they may also agree that the kingdom of Christ requires action for justice in the temporal sphere. Christians are called simultaneously to distinguish between their ultimate loyalty to God and their immediate political causes, yet to keep a lively dialogue between the two.

Only an idolatry of the status quo can discourage all revolution. Yet revolution can itself become an idol. The distinction between God and idols is a constant issue for the ecumenical church throughout its history and into the foreseeable future.

See also totalitarianism.

ROGER L. SHINN

- N. Berdyaev, Christianity and Class War, New York, Sheed & Ward, 1933
- P. Berryman, Stubborn Hope: Religion, Politics and Revolution in Central America, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1994
- C. Brinton, The Anatomy of Revolution, rev. ed., New York, Random, 1938
- M.E. Marty & D.G. Peerman eds, On Revolution and Non-Revolution, Violence and Non-Violence, Peace and Power (= New Theology, 6, 1969)
- Z.K. Matthews ed., Responsible Government in a Revolutionary Age, New York, Association Press, 1966
- J. Míguez Bonino, Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1975 ■ Paul VI, "Populorum Progressio", Tablet, 221, 1967 ■ R.L. Shinn, "Liberation, Reconciliation and 'Just Revolution'", ER, 30, 4, 1978.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH

WHERE ONE begins the history of the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) is itself a matter of theological judgment, fraught with serious ecumenical implications. Is Roman Catholicism (RC) a post-Reformation phenomenon, or is it the original form of the church?* Is "early Catholicism" to be found already in the New Testament, or is it an entirely post-biblical development? Catholic scholars, even very liberal ones such as Hans Küng, insist that Catholicism is present from the beginning, that the history of the RCC has its starting point within the NT rather than in the post-Reformation period.

If, indeed, one holds that RC is not simply a denomination within Christianity but its original expression, how does one deal with the historical fact that the earliest community of disciples gathered in Jerusalem, not in Rome? Indeed, the see, or diocese, of Rome did not even exist at the very beginning, nor did the Roman primacy.*

For many Catholics, the adjective "Roman" tends to obscure rather than define the reality of Catholicism. For them, the history of the Catholic church begins with Jesus' gathering of his disciples and with the eventual post-resurrection commissioning of Peter to be the chief shepherd and foundation of the church. Accordingly, it is not the Roman primacy that gives Catholicism its distinctive identity within the family of Christian churches but the Petrine primacy.

HISTORY

For the Catholic tradition, the classic primacy texts are Matt. 16:13-19, Luke 22:31-32 and John 21:15-19. Given their symbolism, the conferral of the power of the keys on Peter suggests an imposing measure of authority.* Yet this authority was not to be exercised in any absolute way, since from the beginning Peter is presented as consulting with the other apostles (see apostolicity) and even being sent by them (Acts 8:14), and he and John act almost as a team (Acts 3:1-11, 4:1-22, 8:14). Nevertheless, the biblical images concerning Peter (fisherman, shepherd, elder, proclaimer of faith in Jesus, rock) continued in the life of the church and were enriched by additional ones: missionary preacher, great visionary, destroyer of heretics, receiver of the new law, gatekeeper of heaven, helmsman of the ship of the church, co-teacher and co-martyr with Paul.

According to tradition Peter was martyred and buried in Rome, the centre of the empire and eventually the centre of the RCC. During the first five centuries the church of Rome gradually assumed pre-eminence among all the churches. It intervened in the life of distant churches, took sides in theological controversies, offered counsel to other bishops on doctrinal and pastoral questions and sent delegates to distant councils. The see of Rome came to be regarded as a kind of final court of appeal, as well as a focus of unity* for the worldwide ("ecumenical") communion* of churches. The correlation between Peter and the bishop of Rome became fully explicit during the pontificate of Leo I (440-61), who claimed that Peter continued to speak to the whole church through the bishop of Rome.

In the view of some other Christian communities, the RCC has its origin in the Edict of Milan (in 312, also known as the Edict of Constantine), whereby the church, now free from persecution, came to enjoy the status of an imperially protected and favoured religion. Thus we have the term "Constantinian Catholicism".

By the beginning of the 5th century, German tribes began migrating through Europe without effective control. This movement, somewhat inaccurately called the barbarian invasions, lasted some 600 years. It changed the institutional character of Roman Catholicism from a largely Graeco-Roman religion to a broader European religion. The influence of Germanic culture on Catholicism was especially pronounced in the areas of devotion, spirituality and organizational structure. Church office became more political than pastoral, and imagery for Christ, the church and its leaders became increasingly militaristic.

When, at the beginning of the 8th century, the Eastern emperor proved incapable of aiding the papacy against the Lombards in northern Italy, the pope turned for help to

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

the Franks. This new alliance led to the creation of the holy Roman empire, which began dramatically in 800 with the crowning of Charlemagne. The line between church and state,* already blurred by the Edict of Milan, was now practically erased.

With the collapse of the Carolingian empire, however, the papacy fell into the hands of a corrupt Italian nobility. Only with the reformist pontificate of Gregory VII (1073-85) was the papacy's reputation restored. Papal prestige was even more firmly enhanced during the pontificate of Innocent III (1198-1216), who fully exploited the Gregorian teaching that the pope has supreme, even absolute, power over the whole church.

By the middle of the 13th century the classic papal-hierarchical concept of the church had been securely established, and the pope's power was said to embrace both church and state alike (the so-called two-swords theory). Newly elected popes were crowned like emperors, a practice that endured until suddenly discontinued by Pope John Paul I in 1978. Emphasis on the juridical, over against the communal, aspects of the church did not significantly subside, however, until the Second Vatican Council (1962-65).

The historical bond between the church of Rome and the church of Constantinople came apart through a series of gravely unfortunate and exceedingly complex political and diplomatic manoeuvres, starting with the excommunication* of Michael Cerularius, patriarch of Constantinople in 1054, and culminating in the fourth crusade (1202-1204) and the sack of Constantinople by Western knights. Two attempts at bringing the two sides back together – at the councils of Lyons in 1274 and of Florence in 1439 – did not have lasting results. Indeed, the climate began to change for the better only with the election of Pope John XXIII in 1958, with the Second Vatican Council* and then with the historic pilgrimage of Pope Paul VI in 1964 to meet Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras in Jerusalem,* the mother church of all churches.

By the beginning of the 14th century, other events had introduced a period of further disintegration of unity, reaching a tragic climax in the Protestant Reformation* of the 16th century (see Protestantism). The confrontation between Boniface VIII and Philip the Fair over the latter's power to tax the church opened a wide breach between the papacy and the imperial authority. Then there were the scandalous financial abuses during the subsequent Babylonian Captivity of the papacy at Avignon, France (1309-78). There followed a rise in nationalism and anti-clericalism in reaction to papal taxes, and then papal authority itself came to be challenged on theological grounds by Marsilius of Padua and others. Conciliarism rose as a challenge to the prevailing monarchical concept of the church.

The Western schism* of 1378-1417 (not to be confused with the more serious and more enduring East-West schism between Rome and Constantinople) produced at one point three different claimants to the papal throne. The council of Constance (1414) turned to the new principle of conciliarism to end the schism, by asserting that a general council, not the pope, is the highest ecclesiastical authority. One claimant was deposed, a second resigned, and a third eventually died. Martin V was elected on St Martin's Day, 11 November 1417.

There were other, more immediate causes of the Reformation of the 16th century: the corruption of the Renaissance papacy of the 15th century, the divorce of piety from theology and of theology from its biblical and patristic roots, the negative effects of the Western schism and the rise of the national state – not to mention the powerful personalities of Luther, Calvin and Zwingli. The Reformation itself took different forms, so different that one should perhaps speak more precisely of reformations in the plural. The reformers of the right (Lutherans and Anglicans) retained essential Catholic doctrine but changed certain canonical and structural forms. The reformers of the left (followers of Zwingli and the Anabaptists) repudiated much of Catholic doctrine and sacramental life. The reformers nearer to the centre (Calvinists) modified both Catholic doctrine and practice but retained much of the old.

The Roman Catholic response, belated but vigorous, was given at the council of Trent* (1545-63), which was itself part of a broader movement known as the Counter-Reformation, conducted principally under the leadership of Pope Paul III (1534-49). The council proved to be the single most important event in the history of the RCC during the four centuries between the Reformation and the Second Vatican Council. By and large, the post-Tridentine RCC emphasized the doctrines, devotions and institutions that were most directly attacked by the Protestants: veneration of the saints,* Marian piety, eucharistic adoration, the authority of the pope and the bishops (see episcopacy) and the essential role of ordained priests in the sacramental life of the church (see priesthood, sacraments). Other important elements tended to be downplayed precisely because of their favourable emphasis by the Protestants: the centrality of Christ in theology and spirituality; the communal participatory nature of the eucharist* (“priesthood of all believers”) and the responsibility of the laity* in the life and mission* of the church.

Because of the Reformation, Catholic missionary activity was reduced in those countries where Protestantism began to flourish, but Catholicism was carried abroad by Spain and Portugal, who ruled the seas and who sought new gains for the church to offset losses throughout Europe. Religious orders such as the Dominicans, Franciscans and Jesuits were instrumental in bringing the Roman Catholic faith to India, China, Japan, Africa and the Americas. The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith was established in 1622 to supervise all of these new missionary undertakings.

By the beginning of the 17th century, the church faced another crisis from within. Jansenism, an Augustinian-inspired movement in France that emphasized the corruption of human nature, generated a new form of Catholic life that was excessively rigorous, even puritanical. When Rome moved against Jansenism, many in France saw Rome’s action as a threat to the independence of French Catholicism. Gallicanism, by which this nationalistic reaction was to be known, held that all papal decrees are subject to the consent of the entire church, as represented in a general council. This view was later condemned by the First Vatican Council (1869-70), which declared, against Gallicanism, that the infallible teachings of the pope are irreformable, that is, not subject to the subsequent consent and approval of any other ecclesiastical body or authority, including a national church.

In the 18th century the Enlightenment offered the next challenge to the RCC. Exalting reason at the expense of authority and the natural at the expense of the supernatural, the Enlightenment touched RC primarily in the Catholic states of Germany, stimulating advances in historical and exegetical methods (see exegesis, methods of) and catechetical reform and promoting popular education for clergy and laity alike. Although the Enlightenment did not influence Catholicism (so much of which flourished in southern Europe) as early or as profoundly as it did Protestantism, it did mark the beginning of the end of an unhistorical, classicist Roman Catholic theology.

The French revolution (1789) had a much more immediate and decisive impact on the RCC, bringing about the definitive end of medieval Catholicism. The feudal, hierarchical society of the middle ages was simply swept away. And so was Gallicanism, as the Enlightenment uprooted the clerical system upon which it had been based.

In France and Germany the Enlightenment produced a counter-reaction in the form of Romanticism, a movement that extolled RC as the mother of art and the guardian of patriotism. Thousands of European intellectuals returned to the church with new enthusiasm. With few exceptions (Cardinal Newman’s work being a shining one), RC theology at this time was restorative rather than progressive – restorative not of the biblical and patristic witnesses but of a scholasticism of a generally decadent kind. A rigid traditionalism arose in France, the forerunner of the post-Vatican II movement led by the excommunicated Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre. The practitioners and partisans of traditionalist theology were said to look “beyond the mountains” (the Alps) to Rome for papal direction and support, hence the name “Ultramontanism”. The popes of these decades, Gregory XVI and Pius IX, were entirely sympathetic with this new reactionary trend, and nowhere was this papal defiance of modern developments more sharply stated than in the latter pope’s Syllabus of Errors (1864).

The 19th century also witnessed the rapid development of industrialism and of

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

concomitant social problems. Marxism provided one answer to the new challenge, taking advantage of the growing alienation of the workers not only from the fruits of their labour but also from their RC heritage. The church's response, however belated, came in an encyclical* letter of Pope Leo XIII in 1891, Rerum Novarum, which defended the rights of workers to unionize, to receive a just wage and to work under humane conditions (see encyclicals, social).

By the first years of the 20th century, the RCC faced yet another major problem. A new ecclesiastical movement known as modernism proposed that dogmatic truths (see dogma), as well as truths contained in the Bible, are neither absolute nor unchanging but are affected and shaped by historical conditions and circumstances. Pius XI condemned modernism in 1907, an action that profoundly affected Catholic biblical and theological scholarship until just before the Second Vatican Council. The anti-modernist spirit in the RCC intimidated particularly seminary faculties, but not even bishops were immune from unsympathetic scrutiny. Some of the positions that had once been denounced as modernist, however, were later embodied in the teachings of the Second Vatican Council and even in certain decrees of the Roman curia* as they touched upon such controverted topics as the historical truth of sacred scripture and the development of dogma.

The period between the two world wars was especially important for RC, if only because many of the developments occurring then were to find fruition at Vatican II: the liturgical movement,* the biblical movement, the social action movement, the lay apostolate movement, the missionary movement and, finally, the ecumenical movement. The last, however, had the most difficult path to follow, given the negative tone of Pope Pius XI's encyclical Mortalium Animos (1928) and assorted curial directives against any kind of participation by Catholics in ecumenical conferences. But even against this official resistance, pioneering Catholic theologians were ecumenically alive, such as, for example, Yves Congar (see RCC and pre-Vatican II ecumenism).

No other person or event more profoundly affected modern RC, however, than Pope John XXIII (pope 1958-63) and the Second Vatican Council that he conceived and called. His first major encyclical was devoted to the problem of unity, Ad Petri Cathedram (1959), in which he greeted non-Catholics as "separated brethren", and his last, Pacem in Terris (April 1963), addressed "to all people of good will", advocated human dignity and freedom as a basis for a world order of peace and justice.

The Second Vatican Council taught, in the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church and the Decree on Ecumenism,* that the church is the whole people of God* and that it includes non-Catholic Christians as well as Catholics, all united by a common baptism* and a common faith in Jesus Christ and his gospel. Christian unity requires on the part of all sides renewal and reform, both institutional and spiritual. Indeed, the disintegration of Christian unity was a tragedy for which all involved parties must accept blame.

The Council's landmark Declaration on Religious Freedom declared that no one is to be forced in any way to embrace the Christian or the Catholic faith (see religious liberty), and the Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to non-Christian Religions insisted that God speaks and works also through other religions. The church, therefore, should engage in dialogue and other collaborative efforts with them (see dialogue, interfaith). The Jews, finally, have a special relationship to the church, one that should not be soured by the false belief that the Jewish people bear blame for the death of Jesus (see antisemitism).

Vatican II adjourned in December 1965. The history of the RCC since the Council – through the pontificates of Paul VI (1963-78), John Paul I (1978) and John Paul II (1978-) – has been a story of the church's efforts to come to terms with the various challenges, opportunities and crises that the Council generated, directly or indirectly. The principal challenge remains the same as it has always been: How can the church be faithful to its historic identity and mission and at the same time adapt itself to each new social, political and cultural milieu?

At the end of the second millennium, the RCC numbered 1045 million persons, or 17% of the world's population (Annuario Pontificio 2000). Of these millions, 11.4% were in Africa, 10.5% in Asia, 27.8% in Europe, 49.5% in North and South America and 0.8% in Oceania.

THEOLOGY, DOCTRINE AND SPIRITUALITY

As the name “catholic” itself suggests, the RCC is characterized in principle by a radical openness to all truth and to every authentic value (see catholicity). It is comprehensive and all-embracing. It is not linked with any one culture, nation or region. It is as African as it is European, as Slavic as it is Latin, as Mexican as it is Irish, as Indian as it is Polish.

Every list of “Catholic fathers” or “Catholic mothers” includes the great theological and spiritual writers of the period before, as well as after, the division of East and West and then the divisions within the West. Irenaeus and Gregory of Nyssa are as much Catholic fathers as are Augustine and Thomas Aquinas. Catholics continue to read Ignatius of Antioch and Clement of Alexandria, Athanasius and Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory of Nazianzus and Augustine, Anselm of Canterbury and Bernard of Clairvaux, Abelard and Hugh of St Victor, Aquinas and Bonaventure, Robert Bellarmine and John Henry Newman, Karl Rahner and Hans Urs von Balthasar.

The RCC is open to The Cloud of Unknowing and the Introduction to the Devout Life, to the way of Francis of Assisi and of Bernard of Clairvaux, to Ignatius Loyola and John of the Cross, to Abbot Marmion and Thomas Merton. Catholics are guided as much by the council of Nicea* as by Vatican I, as much by Chalcedon* as by Lateran IV, as much by Trent as by Vatican II. They read Gregory the Great as well as Paul VI, Clement of Rome as well as Leo XIII, Pius XII as well as John XXIII.

The RCC is characterized by a both/and rather than an either/or approach. For the Roman Catholic tradition, it is not nature* or grace* but graced nature; not reason or faith* but reason illumined by faith; not law* or gospel but law inspired by the gospel; not scripture* or Tradition* but scripture as both the product and norm of Tradition; not faith or works but faith issuing in works and works as an expression of faith; not authority or freedom but authority in the service of freedom; not unity or diversity but unity in diversity. Holding this tradition together in creative theological tension are three central Roman Catholic principles: sacramentality, mediation and communion.

Sacramentality. In its classic (Augustinian) meaning, a sacrament is a visible sign of an invisible grace. Pope Paul VI provided a more contemporary definition: “a reality imbued with the hidden presence of God”. A sacramental perspective is one that sees the divine in the human, the infinite in the finite, the spiritual in the material, the transcendent in the immanent, the eternal in the historical. God is present to people, communities, movements, events, places, objects, the world at large, the whole cosmos. The visible, the tangible, the finite, the historical – all these realms are actual or potential carriers of the divine presence. Indeed, for the Roman Catholic it is only in and through these material realities that God can even be encountered. The great sacrament of encounter with God is Jesus Christ,* and the church is the sacrament of encounter with Christ.

For the Roman Catholic the world is essentially good, though fallen, because it comes from the creative hand of God (see creation), and it continues to be sustained by God’s providential presence (see providence). The world, though fallen, is redeemable because of the redemptive work of God in Jesus Christ (see redemption). The world, though fractured and fragmented, is capable of ultimate unity because of the abiding presence of the Holy Spirit.*

Over against this sacramental vision is the view, strengthened by memories of past excesses, that God is so “totally other” that the divine reality can never be identified with the human, the transcendent with the immanent, the eternal with the historical. The abiding Protestant fear is that Catholics take the sacramental principle to the point where they are just short of, if not actually immersed in, idolatry.

Mediation. A kind of corollary of the principle of sacramentality is the principle of mediation. A sacrament not only signifies but also causes what it signifies. For the Catholic, God is not only present in the sacramental action, as an object of faith, but actually achieves something in and through that action (ex opere operato, the council of Trent taught). Thus, created realities not only embody the presence of God, they make that presence effective for others. The encounter with God is a mediated encounter.

Catholicism's commitment to the principle of mediation is evident, for example, in the importance it has always placed on the ministry of the ordained priest and on the intercessory role of the saints, especially of Mary, the mother of Jesus. Again, the Protestant raises a word of caution. Just as the principle of sacramentality edges close to the brink of idolatry, so the principle of mediation moves one along the path towards magic.

Communion. Finally, the RCC affirms the principle of communion: our way to God, and God's way to us, is not only a mediated but a communal way. The encounter with God is a communal encounter. For the Christian, it is an ecclesial encounter. The word is proclaimed by the church, and we respond within the church.

For this reason the mystery of the church has always had a significant place in RC theology, doctrine, pastoral practice, moral vision and devotional life. The church is the sacrament of Christ, mediating saving grace through sacraments and various ministries. It is the people of God and the Body of Christ, an integral part of the communion of saints. Indeed, it is here, at the point of RC's understanding of itself as church, that one comes to the heart of the distinctively RC understanding and practice of Christian faith. For in ecclesiology we find the convergence of sacramentality, mediation and communion, which have always been so characteristic of the RCC.

The Protestant again raises a word of caution. If we emphasize too much the principle of communion, we run the risk of endangering the freedom of the individual. If sacramentality can lead to idolatry, and mediation to magic, the principle of communion can lead to a collectivism that suppresses individuality and an authoritarianism that suppresses freedom of thought.

The ecumenical encounter addresses all such concerns. Only through dialogue based on mutual respect can each tradition, including the Roman Catholic, come to know itself better, purify itself of imperfections and distortions, and contribute finally to the fullness of unity for which Jesus prayed.

RICHARD P. MCBRIEN

- W. Beinert & F. Schüssler Fiorenza, Handbook of Catholic Theology, New York, Crossroad, 1995
- R.A. Burns, Roman Catholicism after Vatican II, Washington DC, Georgetown UP, 2001
- L. Gilkey, Catholicism Confronts Modernity: A Protestant View, New York, Seabury, 1975
- A. Hastings ed., Modern Catholicism: Vatican II and After, New York, Oxford UP, 1991
- M.F. Kohmescher, Catholicism Today: A Survey of Catholic Belief and Practice, New York, Paulist, 1999
- G.A. Lindbeck, The Future of Roman Catholic Theology, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1970
- R.P. McBrien, Catholicism, 2nd ed., San Francisco, HarperCollins, 1995
- R.P. McBrien ed., The HarperCollins Encyclopedia of Catholicism, San Francisco, HarperCollins, 1995
- B. Sesboué ed., Histoire des dogmes, Paris, Desclée, 1995.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH AND PRE-VATICAN II ECUMENISM

THE ORGANIZERS of the 1910 Edinburgh world missionary conference* intentionally did not invite Roman Catholics or Eastern Orthodox. But in 1914 the commission of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the USA, which was initiating efforts to bring about a conference on faith and order questions for "all Christian communions throughout the world which confess our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour", invited the holy see of Rome to participate (November 1914). Within seven weeks Cardinal Gasparri, the secretary of state to Benedict XV (pope 1914-22), vaguely answered with neither an acceptance nor a rejection. The door may have been opened, but the first world war (1914-18) discouraged further probes.

In May 1917 Benedict XV promulgated the Code of Canon Law, containing 2414 canon laws, which took effect in 1918. Canon 1325 forbade "Catholics from holding disputations or meetings, especially public ones, with non-Catholics, except with permission of the apostolic see or in urgent cases, with the local ordinary". Nevertheless, in renewed efforts to enlist participants in the proposed world conference on faith and order, the US Episcopal deputation met Benedict XV in the Vatican in May 1919.

His prepared written response was an unambiguous no.

Because of the RC understanding of “the unity of the visible church of Christ”, the RCC could not take part in such a congress. The pope promised his prayers that “if the congress is practicable, the participants may, by God’s grace, see the light and become reunited to the visible head of the church, by whom they would be received with open arms”. In 1921 Benedict XV declined also an invitation to send RC participants to the first conference on Life and Work (Stockholm 1925).

Shortly after the first Faith and Order conference (Lausanne 1927), Pius XI (pope 1922-39) promulgated Mortalium Animos, the encyclical* on “fostering the religious union”. By “participation in assemblies of non-Catholics”, both the RCs and others would easily have confirmed that one religion/church is as good as another, that ecumenical gatherings were negotiations of revealed truths through compromise and that the RCC would be tacitly accepting some of the Protestant ecclesiologies of the day. The very foundations of the Catholic faith would be “subverted by the desire of other Christians to treat the Catholic church as one among many churches”. Therefore, if Catholics were allowed to encourage such gatherings, “they would be countenancing a false Christian religion quite alien to the one true church of Christ”. The pope concluded: “There is only one way in which the unity of Christians may be fostered, and that is by promoting the return to the one true church of Christ of those who are separated from it; for from that one true church they have in the past unhappily fallen away.”

RC ecclesiology and pastoral solicitude that any ecumenical efforts may be misunderstood by Catholics and other Christians thus determined the church’s non-involvement. Ever since Leo XIII (pope 1878-1903) the RCC was earnestly seeking the reunion of all Christians, especially with the Eastern churches. But that reunion was one-way – return to Rome, the only home. The RCC believed that it was co-extensive with the one church of Christ. For its members to mix with others who were not clear on what the ecumenical movement is, or where it should move, would compromise witness to this belief. The basis of the fledgling movement should be more credal by incorporating RC ecclesiology before Catholics could join others in the venture.

Mortalium Animos blocked other ecumenical involvement. For example, the Vatican closed down any follow-up to Belgian Cardinal Mercier’s directed “Malines conversations” (1921-26), which had proposed the union of the Church of England with Rome while preserving the Anglican tradition, discipline and hierarchy – “united but not absorbed”. And in 1948 the Vatican asked the Netherlands bishops to forbid RCs to be present in any role, no matter how unofficial, at the WCC’s founding general assembly in Amsterdam.

Meanwhile, the “outside” ecumenical movement was clarifying its own visions and intents for Christian unity, and it was becoming more visible in the life of the churches – enough for Rome to take a second look.

The shift in RC evaluation and policy began in the 1950s. After Amsterdam, the defender of Catholic faith (called the holy office) in the Roman curia* issued Ecclesia Sancta (Dec. 1949). It positively evaluated the ecumenical movement “among those who are dissident from the Catholic church” and “believe in Christ the Lord” as “an inspiring grace of the Holy Spirit”, and thus “for the children of the true church [Catholics] a source of holy joy in the Lord”. Other Christians do care deeply for church unity, and RCs should take their efforts seriously, in charity and in prayer. Under strict guidelines, RC experts, approved by the local hierarchy, can participate in discussions “on faith and morals” with other Christians, but all religious indifferentism should be avoided. Even though the RCC still stood firmly in its ecclesiology of “return”, it now accepted the basis for that dialogue-in-fellowship which had been serving of other Christians.

The WCC Toronto statement (1950), aided in its formulation by a small group of RC theologians (e.g. Yves Congar), recognized that membership “does not imply the specific doctrine concerning the nature of church unity” or that “each church must regard the other member churches as churches in the true or full sense of the word”. This clarification eased RC unofficial contacts with the WCC, especially through the new Catholic Conference for Ecumenical Questions* (1952), which prepared its own responses to WCC Faith and Order issues. Its secretary, Johannes Willebrands, met frequently with fellow Dutchman W.A. Visser 't Hooft, WCC general secretary. But more public direct activities were still in the future. The Vatican forbade RC active presence at the 1954 WCC second general assembly (Evanston).

Pope John XXIII established the Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity* (1960) and approved an official delegation of its observers to the WCC New Delhi assembly (1961). But the qualitative change or "defining event" still had to be in RC ecclesiology and the principles which would flow from it. Such was the 1964 Decree on Ecumenism* of Vatican Council II.*

See also encyclicals, Roman Catholic.

TOM STRANSKY

■ G. Baum, That They May Be One: A Study of Papal Doctrine (Leo XIII-Pius XII), London, Bloomsbury, 1958 ■ C.-J. Dumont, Les voies de l'unité chrétienne, Paris, Cerf, 1954 ■ G. Thils, Histoire doctrinale du mouvement œcuménique, Paris, Desclée, 1962 ■ O. Tomkins, "The Roman Catholic Church and the Ecumenical Movement, 1910-1948", in HI-I.

ROMAN CURIA

LARGELY the creation of Pope Sixtus V in 1588, who sought to implement the Counter-Reformation more effectively, the Roman curia (essentially the Vatican bureaucracy) carries out, under direct authority of the pope, his governing responsibilities for the institutional, pastoral and missionary needs of the worldwide church. Paul VI legislated curial reforms in 1967, as did John Paul II in 1988.

To clarify often popularly interchangeable identifications: the apostolic see (of Rome) or holy see (of Rome) applies not only to the pope or "Roman pontiff" but also to the Roman curia. The Vatican is the 106 acres on one of the seven Roman hills (Vaticanus) that includes the present papal residence, some offices of the Roman curia and St Peter's basilica.

The curial departments (dicasteries) of various ranks have assigned tasks, supervised overall by the secretariat of state. These are congregations (among the 9: for the doctrine of the faith, for the Oriental [i.e. Eastern Catholic] churches, for bishops, for the clergy, for the evangelization of peoples, for catholic education); pontifical councils (among the 11: for the laity, for promoting Christian unity, for inter-religious dialogue, for culture [including dialogue with non-believers], for justice and peace, "Cor Unum" [i.e. for Catholic aid and human development projects], for social communications); and commissions (among the 11: for theology, for the Bible, for archaeology, for Vatican finances). Attached to the Roman curia are institutions such as the Vatican Radio, L'Osservatore Romano, the TV Centre, Vatican Polyglot Press, the Vatican library and papal charities.

The cardinal head of a department is a member of others with overlapping concerns. For example, the cardinal president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity* is an ex officio member of the congregations for the doctrine of the faith, the evangelization of peoples, the Oriental churches, and divine worship and the discipline of the sacraments, and he is a consultant to the council for inter-religious dialogue. Most of the congregations, councils and commissions conduct plenaries every one to two years, with members and consultants attending from around the world.

In 2000 the Vatican spent US$194.4 million for curial salaries and operations, plus the cost of maintaining and operating St Peter's, the library, the radio and TV stations, diplomatic embassies, and the special jubilee events. The Vatican also subsidized many overseas seminaries, other educational institutions, and health and social development facilities. In the same year, the Vatican took in about US$203 million, primarily from investments and donations from local churches, foundations and individuals.

Tensions remain between the Roman curia and national episcopal conferences over the degree of freedom deserved by the latter in decision making, and the consultative role of the occasional synods of bishops in Rome. Behind these tensions are various understandings and practices of collegiality.*

TOM STRANSKY

■ J. Lahey, "Roman Curia", in The Harper-Collins Encyclopedia of Catholicism, R. McBrien ed., San Francisco, HarperCollins, 1995 ■ P. Nichols, The Pope's Divisions, London, Faber, 1981 ■ T. Reese, Inside the Vatican, London, Oxford UP, 1996. The offices and officials of the Roman curia are listed in the yearly Annuario Pontificio, Vatican Polyglot Press.

ROMERO Y GALDAMES, OSCAR ARNULFO

B. 15 Aug. 1917, Ciudad Barrios, El Salvador; d. 24 March 1980, San Salvador. Of poor rural origins, Oscar Romero was theologically trained at the Gregorian University (1937-42) in Mussolini's Rome. The new priest returned to El Salvador in 1943, became the bishop's secretary and pastor of the cathedral in San Miguel, the executive secretary of the Central American bishops secretariat (1968) and finally archbishop of San Salvador (1977). Fragile and no "hero", the new archbishop was at first politically cautious, but then after the murder of a close Jesuit friend he slowly began publicly to condemn the violent activities of both the leftist guerrillas and the rightist military government of General Carlos Romero (no relation) and his national guard; he also championed the rights of the poor and powerless amid their efforts for land reform. He refused to support a new military-civilian junta; its "reforms are worth nothing if they are stained with so much blood". Faced with repeated threats to his life, Romero declared: "I am prepared to offer my blood for the redemption and resurrection of El Salvador. If God accepts the sacrifice, I hope it will be a seed of liberty and sign of hope." During each Sunday's celebration of the eucharist, he read the list of that week's deaths by violence. At the altar of a San Salvador hospital, an unknown assassin shot the celebrating archbishop. His tomb has become a holy site of prayer and pilgrimage.

TOM STRANSKY

■ O.A. Romero y Galdames, Assassiné avec les pauvres (ET The Church Is All of You, Minneapolis, Winston, 1984) ■ J.R. Brockman,

Romero: A Life, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1983 ■ M.T. Porcile Santiso, "Oscar Romero", in Ecumenical Pioneers, I. Bria & D. Heller eds, WCC, 1995.

RUSTENBERG DECLARATION

THE RUSTENBURG declaration emerged from a consultation of churches in November 1990. The most representative such event in South African history, the conference was attended by representatives of the African Independent Churches, evangelical churches, the Gereformeerde Kerk, the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk (NGK), the Roman Catholic Church, member churches of the South African Council of Churches, and observers from the WCC and other ecumenical partners. The Nederduitse Hervormde Kerk and Afrikaanse Protestantse Kerk, which broke away from the NGK in 1986, declined an invitation to attend.

At the heart of the declaration stands a confession of guilt, acknowledging the different ways in which different churches have legitimated and supported apartheid.* It rejects the theological support of apartheid as a heresy* and sin,* and calls for concrete forms of restitution.

Facing pressure from the various constituencies represented, a key sentence of the declaration reads: "Some of us are not in full accord with everything said in this conference, but on this we are all agreed, namely the unequivocal rejection of apartheid as sin." A press statement after the conference by the moderator of the NGK re-affirmed this church's confession of guilt, while disassociating it from some aspects of the declaration. The Rustenburg declaration has brought the churches in South Africa into a closer relationship than ever before. Full ecumenical unity has, however, not yet emerged. "We have started a process," said SACC general secretary Frank Chikane. "I only hope the NGK will be able to move ahead with us. Time will tell whether they can."

See also Kairos document, kairos documents, Stuttgart declaration.

CHARLES VILLA-VICENCIO

S

SACRAMENT(S)

DIFFERENCES over the understanding and practice of sacraments have been the cause, symptom or result of some of the deepest and most stubborn divisions among churches. Knowledge of centuries-long developments in the understanding and practice of the sacraments will help to clarify persistent difficulties encountered in ecumenical dialogue concerning them.

Almost all the various Christian churches identify a number of sacramental rites which represent the continued work of the Saviour in his church.* “Sacrament” is the name given to actions by which believers receive a share in the salvation* effected by God in Christ. The action of each sacrament has some substantive basis in the biblical revelation, although the Bible has no generic term for them.

Christendom managed for a whole millennium without a general doctrine of the sacraments, although the foundations for such a doctrine were laid in the patristic period. As is made sufficiently clear by the New Testament accounts relating to baptism* and the Lord’s supper (see eucharist), but also to the laying on of hands, anointing with oil and the giving of the Spirit, it does not mean there were no sacraments in the earliest church.

In the development of sacramental thinking in the early church, Jewish and Hellenistic influences certainly cannot be excluded. Baptism and the Lord’s supper, as Paul shows in 1 Cor. 10:1-22, were already given parallel status in the primitive church as saving events, against the background of the Old Testament mediations of salvation. And Rudolf Schnackenburg sees the emergence of sacramental ideas influenced by Hellenistic modes of thought in the conception that eternal salvation and life were mediated by a material element and word (see Eph. 5:26) and by earthly gifts bestowed by the Lord (John 6:53-58), and that in these rites the mystery of a regeneration (Titus 3:5; 1 Pet. 1:23, 2:2; John 3:3-8), a sanctification (Heb. 12:9-11) and permanent union with the Lord (John 6:56-57) took place ("Sakrament", in Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 1964).

Subsequently such saving rites were described generally as sacred actions. Baptism and the Lord's supper were given special importance, and the former also included chrismation* or confirmation.* Nevertheless, individual churches laid different emphases on the value of each of the so-called sacred actions.

God's saving work in the sacred actions is directed through the church to believers. God's saving power makes use of specific material elements such as water, oil, the altar, church buildings. As the means of salvation have been entrusted by Christ to the church, these actions are normally administered by church functionaries specially authorized to do so. This authorization in many churches rests on a corresponding ordination,* which likewise counts as one of the sacred actions.

In view of the mysterious working of God's grace,* the sacred actions have been described as mystēria. In the LXX, mystērion simply means something hidden and refers neither to the Greek mystery religions nor to any rite. In the NT, mystērion is used for God's eschatological purpose, now revealed in Christ, and stretching beyond Israel to include the nations (Mark 4:11; Rom. 11:25, 16:25-27; Col. 1:25-27, 2:2-3, 4:3; Eph. 1:9-10, 3:1-12, 6:19; Rev. 10:7). The apostolic ministry is to be "servants of Christ and stewards of God's mysteries" (1 Cor. 4:1).

From the standpoint of the Greek church fathers, each mystērion is a reflection of the prototype, an antitypon. "This is called a mystery because we look at one thing and believe another" (John Chrysostom, Homilies on 1 Cor., 7.1). In Neo-platonic thinking, which left its imprint very clearly on early Christianity and still affects the Eastern churches today, the mystēria represent a link between Creator and creatures, between the prototype and the antitype, the former being mysteriously present in the latter and effective in it. The mystēria are therefore symbols which efficaciously represent realities.

As Tertullian translated the term mystērion by sacramentum, the Western interpretation subsequently changed considerably. Sacramentum actually meant not only an act of consecration but also the oath taken by soldiers and confirmed by an outward sign. In the Latin regions, instead of the symbolic and representational character intrinsic to the word mystērion, what now came into prominence was the sacrament as a sign.

Augustine above all placed emphasis on the sacrament as a visible sign. "A sign is a thing which, over and above the impression it makes on the senses, causes something else to come into the mind as a consequence of itself" (On Christian Doctrine 2.1). For this reason the invisible God too has in the course of salvation history* revealed himself constantly to human beings by means of signs (visible significationes), and these visible signs (signa) point to an invisible divine reality (res) to which they bear a resemblance. "Signs... are called sacraments when they are applied to divine things" (Letters 138). But as the visible sign does not have a saving effect without being linked to the word of God,* in Augustine's view "the word is added to the element, and there results the sacrament as if itself also a kind of visible word" (Homilies on the Gospel of John 80.3).

Although Augustine was also quite attached to Neo-platonic ideas, the shift of emphasis from mystery to sign, which began in Tertullian, acquired its theoretical basis with Augustine. But into the second millennium the Western church continued to use sacramentum in the two senses of "sacred sign" and "mystery". Likewise there was still no rigorous restriction of the term to the seven sacraments listed by the council of Lyons in 1274. As long as the Neo-platonic idea of prototype and antitype was followed, it was clear that the former was present in the latter. When, however, in the West from the 9th century onwards, the old Latin idea established itself of a pictorial representation which regarded the antitype as no more than a similitudo, something with a similarity to the prototype, then the question began to be more and more pointedly brought up of how the real presence of Christ was to be explained. Thus the issue of causality was raised.

To the extent that the emphasis in the West was definitively shifted in early scholasticism to the sign, the mystery lost importance, and the Eastern and Western views of the sacrament began to diverge. In the West, the view of Berengarius of Tours (d.1088) was that Christ was represented in the eucharist “only symbolically”, and the need to respond to this heretical view perhaps prompted the development of a doctrine of the sacraments.

The decisive definitions were provided by Hugh of St Victor and Peter Lombard. Hugh of St Victor (d.1141) proceeded from the natural symbolism of a corporeal reality which, when dispensed by a recognized officiant, becomes a sign of grace on the basis of an institution by Christ (which for the 12th century as yet raised no problems). The defect of this definition lay in the fact that not all sacraments contain a material sign. Peter Lombard (d.1160) therefore stated that the specific character of a sacrament lay in its efficacy, thus paving the way for a new shift of emphasis away from the sign and onto the nature of sacramental efficacy. “For that is properly called a sacrament which is a sign of the grace of God and a form of invisible grace, so that it bears its image and works as its cause” (Sentences 4.1.2). It was Lombard who fixed the number of the sacraments as seven, the usual number in the Roman Catholic Church.

Then came the distinction between the action of the officiant (opus operantis) and the action accomplished (opus operatum). The sacrament is a work of God’s, not of the officiant’s, and it therefore causes grace by the work performed (ex opere operato). But this conclusion does not leave out of account the subjective frame of mind of the officiant and the recipient. If someone does not intend to administer a sacrament or to receive one, then no sacrament is administered or received!

To the second half of the 12th century belongs also the formulation of the doctrine of sacramental character. Already in William of Auxerre (d.1231 or 1237) there is a hint of the view that baptism, chrismation (confirmation) and holy orders give the soul an ineradicable character by which those so marked out are united for ever with God or Christ and are distinguished from those who do not possess this character.

The appropriation of Aristotelian thought by the high middle ages also continued to affect the further development of the doctrine of the sacraments. From the 13th century onwards the outward sign of the sacrament is defined by the concepts of matter and form. And at the same time a clear description is now provided for causality in the sacramental event.

Thomas Aquinas (1225-74) classifies the sacraments as sacred signs. He thinks human beings, as spiritual and corporeal creatures, can attain to knowledge of supersensory things only through those that are sensory (Summa theologiae 3.60.4). Because of their ambiguity the sensory objects must be more closely defined by the word – more precisely, by God’s word – because the sacraments are for the sanctification* of human beings, and God alone bestows sanctification and therefore also the means of sanctification. Here the Aristotelian distinction between matter and form comes into play. “In the sacraments the words are as the form, and sensible things are as the matter. Now in all things composed of matter and form, the determining principle is on the part of the form, which is as it were the end and terminus of the matter” (ibid. 3.60.7). According to Aquinas, therefore, the word (which is an interpretative sign) has precedence over the visible element in terms of significance. For Aquinas the sacraments are not only vessels of salvation but instruments of grace in the hand of God, and they have an effect independently of the worthiness of the officiant or of the recipient. “The sacraments of the new law are both cause and signs; hence, too, is it that, to use the common expression, they effect what they signify” (ibid. 3.62.1.1).

In the Reformation the development that began when scholasticism was at its zenith was taken to its strictly logical conclusions by consistent absolutizing of the significance of the word (i.e. the word of God). For Luther the sacrament was already closely linked with the word of God, but on the basis that the same effect properly belonged to the sacrament as to the word proclaimed in preaching. Both were vehicles of grace leading to the forgiveness of sins, the indwelling of Christ and finally eternal life.

Luther considered, not the nature of the sacraments as such, but the way they related to believers. For him, three elements constitute a sacrament: God's word of promise, the sacramental sign, and faith.* Since such a word of promise from God can be directly derived from holy scripture only in the case of baptism, the Lord's supper and penance, Luther finally accepted only two sacraments, the Lord's supper and baptism (to which he subordinated penance as its renewal). Luther derived the efficacy of the sacraments from the divine word of promise. For him the sacraments are indeed genuine means of grace, but the sacramental sign can never lead to faith or salvation without the word of promise. The real object of faith is not the sign but the word of promise, for which reason the importance of the sacramental sign diminishes.

This tendency can be seen even more markedly in Zwingli and Calvin. In their view God's effective work of salvation becomes accessible only through preaching. For Zwingli the sacraments have meaning only as symbols relating to Christ and the saving events of the past, and they are of service to believers as a memorial action or a public confession in the community. Accordingly they depict, but do not bestow, salvation (see F. Blanke, "Zwingli's Sakramentsanschauung", Theologische Blätter, 1931).

Calvin occupies an intermediate position between Luther and Zwingli. For him the sacrament is "a testimony of divine grace towards us, confirmed by an outward sign, with mutual attestation of our piety towards God" (Institutes 4.14.1). The sacramental signs receive a new definition and meaning through the word of God, without becoming the vehicles of a spiritual power. They are only a concession by God to human nature, which depends on the senses, a figurative expression of the divine promise; in this way they undergird faith.

The council of Trent* reacted in 1547 with 13 canons which were directed primarily against Luther. Canon 1 postulated seven as the number of sacraments. Relatively often the view is taken today in Roman Catholicism that the number seven does not relate to anything fixed in numerical terms so much as it points to the completeness of all the means of salvation taken together. It is striking that none of the other Christian churches agrees completely as to the number or identity of the sacraments, apart from baptism and the Lord's supper. In canon 2 Trent admitted that there is an order of precedence among the sacraments. Originally all the sacraments flowed into the central event of the eucharist and were therefore also administered within its context.

New approaches to a theology of the sacraments did not appear till around the middle of the 20th century. With the Second Vatican Council* the ecclesial dimension of the sacraments was again brought into the foreground in the Roman Catholic Church, as opposed to the more individualistic and seemingly "objectifying" view of them. We owe this development to theologians like Henri de Lubac, Otto Semmelroth, Edward Schillebeeckx and Karl Rahner. In the dogmatic constitution Lumen Gentium we read that "the church, in Christ, is in the nature of sacrament – a sign and instrument, that is, of communion with God and of unity among humankind" (1). From the Christ-church relationship Rahner drew the conclusion that there is also a church-sacrament relationship. By founding the church, Christ established a primal or basic sacrament and so also its actualization in the seven sacraments. Wherever the church meets human beings in a specific salvation situation, it actualizes the appropriate sacrament of the seven.

Protestant theologians express reservations about a view of the church as the primal sacrament. For Eberhard Jüngel, Christ himself is the sacrament of the church, and baptism and the Lord's supper are the two ways of celebrating this sacrament (see Jüngel & Rahner). In both Roman Catholicism and Protestantism there is now a quest for new approaches aided by an interpretation in terms of salvation history and by anthropological and semiotic criteria.

Generalizing, we may give the following description of the differences between the major Christian confessions as to their view on the sacraments tēr differences originating in the Western departure from the idea of mystērion:

First, following the tradition of the ancient church, the Orthodox and Oriental churches stress the mysterious saving action of God in the sacred actions, which they describe as mystēria.

Second, in the sacraments, the Roman Catholic Church emphasizes seven means of salvation which are efficacious as signs, but it regards the church as the primal sacrament.

Third, the Protestant churches (which have no uniform concept of the sacraments) place the accent instead on the divine word of promise and limit the sacraments to baptism and the Lord's supper, understood in different ways as symbolic actions.

Some of these characteristic differences continue to be characterized in the churches' responses to the Lima text (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry*). Several Orthodox responses, for example, find the use of the term "sign" inadequate in connection with the sacraments, understanding it as a "pointer" to something external rather than as embodying the reality itself. Or again, many Protestant responses reject any mediatory role for the church in the communication of divine grace to believers. In its 1990 report on the churches' responses to BEM, however, the Faith and Order commission offers a clarification that takes up positive suggestions from the churches and that sets "sacrament" within a context that is fully Trinitarian, Christological, anthropological, soteriological and eschatological:

"In the incarnation, life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, God has communicated effectively the mystery of his saving love to the world. Through the power of the Holy Spirit, the risen Christ continues this saving action of God by being present and active in our midst. For this purpose God continues to act through human persons, through their words, signs and actions, together with elements of creation. Thus God communicates to the faithful, and through their witness to the world, his saving promise and grace. Those who receive in faith and trust this gracious action of God are thereby liberated from their captivity to sin and transformed in their lives. Those who receive this gift respond to it in thanksgiving and praise and are brought into a koinonia* with the Holy Trinity and with each other and are sent to proclaim the gospel to the whole world. Through this divine action, communicated through words, signs and actions, this community, the church, is called, equipped and sent, empowered and guided by the Holy Spirit to witness to God's reconciling and re-creating love in a broken world. And so all who in faith long for fullness of life in Christ may experience the first-fruits of God's kingdom – present and yet to be fully accomplished in a new heaven and earth" (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, 1982-1990, 143-44).

ROBERT HOTZ

■ W. Beinert, "Die Sakramentalität der Kirche im theologischen Gespräch", in Kirche und Sakrament, J. Pfammatter & F. Furger eds, Zurich, Benziger, 1980 ■ L.-M. Chauvet, Symbolos et sacrement: Une relecture de l'existence chrétienne (ET Symbol and Sacrament: A Sacramental Reinterpretation of Christian Existence, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1995)

■ R. Hempelmann, Sakrament als Ort der Vermittlung des Heils, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992 ■ R. Hotz, Sakramente im Wechselspiel zwischen Ost und West, Zurich, Benziger, 1979 ■ E. Jüngel & K. Rahner, Was ist ein Sakrament?, Freiburg im Breisgau, Herder, 1971 ■ P. Lyons ed., Parola e sacramento, Rome, S. Anselmo, 1997 ■ J. Macquarrie, A Guide to the Sacraments, London, SCM Press, 1997 ■ A. Moos, Das Verhältnis von Wort und Sakrament in der deutschsprachigen katholischen Theologie des 20. Jahrhunderts, Paderborn, J.A. Moehler Inst., 1993 ■ D. Power, Sacrament: The Language of God's Giving, New York, Crossroad, 1999 ■ C. Rochetta, Sacramentaria fondamentale, Bologna, Dehoniane, 1989 ■ E. Schillebeeckx, Christ and the Sacrament of Encounter with God, London, Sheed & Ward, 1963 ■ E. Schillebeeckx & B. Willems eds, The Sacraments in General, New York, Paulist, 1968 ■ Th. Schneider, Sakramente, Zeichen der Nähe Gottes, Grundriss der Sakramententheologie, Mainz, Grünewald, 1979 ■ D. Staniloae, Orthodoxe Dogmatik Bd. III, Solothurn, Benziger, 1995 ■ G. Wainwright, "Word and Sacrament in the Churches' Responses to the Lima Text", OC, 24, 1988 ■ G. Wenz, Einführung in die evangelische Sakramentenlehre, Darmstadt, Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1988 ■ J.F. White, The Sacraments in Protestant Faith and Practice, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1999.

SAINTS

AT THE BEGINNING of his epistle to the Romans, Paul wrote: "To all God's beloved in Rome, who are called to be saints: Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (1:7). This name "saints" is one given to the members of the first Christian communities (e.g. Eph. 1:1). It may signify the Christians who constitute the "church of God" in a particular place (2 Cor. 1:1; Heb. 13:24-25; Col. 1:2), or it may signify the whole Christian people (Eph. 1:1; 1 Cor. 1:2). Its most frequent equivalent is "brothers (and sisters)", as in Col. 1:2: "To the saints and faithful brothers and sisters in Christ in Colossae" (cf. Phil. 4:21-22). Saints form a new community coming both from the Jewish community in Jerusalem (Acts 9:13; Rom. 15:25) and from gentile Christianity (Rom. 1:7). The apostle is one of them: "I am the very least of all the saints" (Eph. 3:8). Later, they were called Christians (Acts 11:26).

SAINTS AND THE MYSTERY OF THE CHURCH

The notion of saints should be seen as part of the mystery of the church,* "those who are sanctified [i.e. the holy people] in Christ Jesus" (1 Cor. 1:2), the people of the New Testament. It includes certain basic affirmations.

"One only is holy, One only is the Lord, Jesus Christ, to the glory of God the Father." This is a very ancient liturgical exclamation which echoes the hymn of the Lamb (Rev. 15:3-4), acclaimed as Kyrios (Eph. 4:5; Phil. 2:11) and as "the Holy One of God" (John 6:69; cf. Luke 4:34). Jesus Christ* is holy both as the Son of God and as bearer of the Spirit when at his baptism the Holy Spirit* descended on him (Luke 3:22). With this authority and power he destroyed the unclean spirits (Luke 4:33-37). Christians "have been anointed by the Holy One" (1 John 2:20), being called to become "a temple of the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor. 6:19). The identity itself of the saint is to be bearer of the Spirit.

The faithful are called saints because of their participation in the holiness of God, who is holy by his own nature (Isa. 6:3). Christians are saints in God's holiness (1 Pet. 1:15), in Christ (Phil. 4:21). They are "God's chosen ones, holy [or saints]" (Col. 3:12). One aspect of the mystery of the church is this new consecration in Christ of a "priestly kingdom", "holy nation", "royal priesthood" (Ex. 19:6; 1 Pet. 2:9; cf. Isa. 43:20-21), which is not exclusive or restricted. An essential criterion of the new people is that "you are no longer strangers and aliens, but you are citizens with the saints and also members of the household of God, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, with Christ Jesus himself as the cornerstone" (Eph. 2:19-20).

It is part of the mystery of the church to be the manifestation of God's glory and holiness, for God "has blessed us in Christ with every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places, just as he chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world to be holy and blameless before him in love" (Eph. 1:3-4). He presents to himself a glorious church "without a spot or wrinkle or anything of the kind – yes, so that she may be holy and without blemish" (Eph. 5:27). Christ sacrificed himself for her to make her holy (Eph. 5:25-26). Christ made the church his body, in spite of the sin* of its members. Hence, the church must always be in a state of renewal, of repentance.

Scripture refers also to the communion of saints,* the friends and fellow heirs of Christ (see Eph. 4:1-6), the "inheritance among all who are sanctified" (Acts 20:32). He will come "to be glorified by his saints and to be marvelled at... among all who have believed" (2 Thess. 1:10). The kingdom of God* is promised to them and includes "the riches of his glorious inheritance among the saints" (Eph. 1:18). The book of Revelation recalls those who, having finished their earthly pilgrimage, enjoy God's presence in the heavenly city (Rev. 7:9-17). "To be 'in Christ' is to be in his body, a member of a fellowship which transforms the local neighbourhood, which overleaps boundaries of nation and race and whose own boundaries are lost to sight in the infinite horizons of the eternal communion of saints" (Oliver Tomkins, Youth in the World-Church, 1947).

Belonging to a community is a sign of the new condition (see 1 John 2:19). Conversion* means, then, "to share in the inheritance of the saints in light" (Col. 1:12). It implies equally "the service of the saints" (1 Cor. 16:15).

As a holy people, the church has the capacity to discern, to sort out, to reveal the light that “darkness did not overcome” (John 1:5). The church of God received the power to bind and to loose (see John 20:23) and the power to judge (1 Cor. 6:2).

THE VOCATION OF SAINTS

Saints’ vocation* is to hallow the name of God: “The name of God is in its own nature holy, whether we say so or not; but since it is sometimes profaned among sinners, according to the words, ‘through you, my name is continually blasphemed among the Gentiles’ (Rom. 2:24), we pray that in us God’s name may be hallowed; not that it becomes holy from not being holy, but because it becomes holy in us, when we become holy; and do things worthy of holiness” (Cyril of Jerusalem, Mystagogical Catechesis 5.12).

“You shall be holy, for I am holy” (1 Pet. 1:16). This verse teaches that the saints have their own way of life, a distinctive spirituality – a radical orientation of life, not in a legalistic sense, but in an incarnational sense: “Clothe yourselves with the new self, created according to the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness” (Eph. 4:24). The emphasis is here on the cleansing of the inside so that the outside may also be clean (Matt. 23:26).

The life of a saint is the most valid exposition of Christ himself. The disciple can speak of “Christ who lives in me” (Gal. 2:20) or of Christ “speaking in me” (2 Cor. 13:3). In fact, the saints gain later the special connotation of those who reflect the likeness of Christ (2 Cor. 3:18), who have “become participants of the divine nature” (2 Pet. 1:4), and who develop into “maturity, to the measure of the full stature of Christ” (Eph. 4:13).

In the saints’ experience, Christ comes to offer the gifts of his kingdom, and they themselves become the first-fruits of it. “I chose you and I appointed you to go and bear fruit, fruit that will last” (John 15:16). The saints worship God by offering their living bodies as a holy sacrifice (Rom. 12:1). In fact, the discipline of the saint implies a continuous ascetic combat. The struggle of the saint is primarily not to lose sight of Jesus, who leads us into our faith and brings it to perfection (Heb. 12:2).

SAINTS AND THE ECUMENICAL COMMUNITY

The theme of saints has its own value for ecumenical concerns. For ecumenical spirituality, for example, one cannot separate or confuse sanctification* and social transformation. Those who are more active socially do not have the right to exclude those who place a special emphasis on conversion, renewal, holiness* – and vice versa. Both disciplines should be experienced and preserved in their distinctiveness. Therefore “let... the righteous still do right, and the holy still be holy” (Rev. 22:11).

The theme of saints is also essential in order to keep the search for visible unity* deeply rooted in the life of prayer, of mutual intercession among the churches. The practice of continued intercession for one another, and for all the churches, keeps before every Christian something of the catholicity* of the church of Christ. It enables the churches to see one another not with the eyes of confessional appraisal and historical assessment but as joint petitioners before the throne of God. It opens one not only to give but also to receive within the fellowship of prayer and service.

In the ecumenical community the churches bring their particularities of life, worship and witness. From the “saints” tradition we learn about the extraordinary power of the Christian life (“holiness as witness”) for the proclamation of the gospel. The churches have arrived at a more active appreciation of what we might call the common priesthood of all the baptized (see 1 Pet. 3:15; Rev. 1:6, 5:9-10), of the gifts of grace, vocations and ministries found in the communities; they devise new life-styles which commend the gospel in today’s world; they have reconsidered the lives of saints, martyrs and mystics as real spiritual nourishment for the communities.

It is highly important for today’s ecumenical spirituality and liturgical renewal to recognize the saints as encouraging examples on the pilgrim journey and as symbols of the church universal: “Confessing the apostolic creed in our worship, we affirm our belief in the community of saints. Thus we are reminded that we live together with the martyrs of all times. Christians who give their lives for the sake of the kingdom are martyrs. We remember them in our worship as encouraging examples. They are symbols of the total church. They give us inspiration as to how 'worship and work must be one'. We have learned that the unity between worship and daily Christian life needs urgently to be recovered" (Gathered for Life, 1983). Commemoration of all saints and martyrs of the church universal is observed on the first Sunday after Pentecost in the Orthodox churches and on 1 November in the Western tradition.

SAINTS AND THE LITURGY

The tradition of mentioning the names of saints before God and of making intercession for each other is apostolic (see Eph. 1:15-23). The commemoration of saints is a liturgical act. Some saints are venerated only in certain places, in certain local churches; the names of other saints appear in the calendar of the church universal.

"We worship him, the true Son of God. We honour our martyrs as teachers and followers of the Lord" (Martyrdom of Polycarp 17.3). The second council of Nicea (787) made the distinction between the true worship due to God (latreia) and proper devotion accorded to the sacred images and to the saints. (The council also decided that each new church should contain a relic of a saint on the altar table.) The veneration given to the saints in the Roman Catholic and Orthodox tradition goes to the only Holy One, Jesus Christ. In the liturgy of this tradition, Christians invoke saints as intercessors and protectors, not as mediators. Saints make supplication for the pilgrim church (Eph. 6:18). They render thanks to God for those who enter the glorious church and do not cease to offer prayers for the historical church.

"The church has always believed that the apostles, and Christ's martyrs who had given the supreme witness of faith and charity by the shedding of their blood, are quite closely joined with us in Christ. She has always venerated them with special devotion, together with the Blessed Virgin Mary and the holy angels. The church too has devoutly implored the aid of their intercession. To these were soon added those who had imitated Christ's virginity and poverty more exactly, and finally others whom the outstanding practice of the Christian virtues and the divine charisms recommended to the pious devotion and imitation of the faithful" (Vatican II, Constitution on the Church, 50).

Owing to some excesses in the reverence of saints in the development of the liturgy, Protestants in particular felt that the uniqueness of Christ as mediator was threatened. This fear led to reactions against the invocation of saints and the suppression of their commemoration in the liturgy and the liturgical calendar. In today's ecumenical context, it is perhaps necessary to beware of excesses leading to deviations in Christology and at the same time to pay serious attention to the presence in some Protestant liturgies of the notion of the "communion of saints". It is also necessary to consider seriously what it means to be a saint in today's world, in the light of the Christian belief that the Spirit "blows where it chooses" (John 3:8).

See also martyrdom.

ION BRIA

- R. Larini, Il libro dei testimoni: martirologio ecumenico, Cinisello Balsamo, Edizioni San Paolo, 2002
- O. Procksch, "Hagios in the New Testament", in Theological Dictionary of the New Testament, G. Kittel ed., vol. 1, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1976
- K. Schlemmer ed., Heilige als Brückenbauer: Heiligenverehrung im ökumenischen Dialog, St Ottilien, EOS, 1997

SALVATION

THE OLD TESTAMENT view of salvation appears in passages which recount events of deliverance and liberation* and speak of blessings granted and promised, of peace and life. Two basic features set the pattern here.

First, salvation is not only deliverance and peace* for the individual, but primarily affects the people as a whole. The fundamental paradigm is to be found in the exodus from Egypt and the entry into the promised land so that life can be lived without hindrance in the service of Yahweh. Here we have a total process which directly includes both physical and social well-being. In particular, the idea of all-embracing shalom gives the OT view of salvation its character.

Second, the issue is one of promise and fulfilment occurring within the existing world and therefore not oriented as a rule to the Beyond. Only in late OT passages – and especially in apocalyptic texts – do we find evidence of a vision of salvation that goes beyond the bounds of this world, characterized as it is by death (e.g. Isa. 25:6-8).

In its various groups of writings, and in varied terminology, the New Testament also sees salvation (sōtēria, e.g. Acts 4:12) as an act of deliverance and consequently as the condition of a fulfilled life into which deliverance leads. Such a deliverance, however, is now wholly and exclusively bound up with the name and person of Jesus Christ* as the deliverer – the Saviour (sōtēr, e.g. Luke 2:11). Essentially such a deliverance through Jesus Christ is from the powers of sin* and death (see life and death), and primarily each individual participates in such a deliverance or salvation on the basis of repentance, conversion* and faith.* Salvation is ultimately a future event in which death will be overcome (Rom. 8:23-24; Rev. 21:4-7), but at the same time it is a gift granted and obtained in the present (Luke 17:19; Rom. 5:1-5; John 5:24-26), though accompanied by the continuing challenge from sin, suffering* and dying. But it would be a mistake to attribute a purely individualistic view of salvation (“the salvation of souls”) to the NT. Instead, it takes up OT promises which describe salvation in physical and social terms (e.g. Luke 4:18-19).

The cures Jesus performs epitomize and point to his saving activity. The individual and his or her salvation are bound up with the community of those welded together by baptism* into the congregation of the new covenant* of salvation (Acts 2:38-47; Gal. 3:27-28; Eph. 2:19-22). The salvation which is yet to come can be described as eating and drinking in fellowship in the kingdom of God* (Luke 22:30). And we hear of a new heaven and a new earth, the new city of God (Rev. 21:1-5). Paul thinks of the whole creation* waiting for redemption* (Rom. 8:19-21).

The NT also describes salvation in a variety of images. In Jesus’ preaching, the message about the kingdom of God – as a religious and communal, individual and social, present and future reality – has pride of place. After Easter the saving work of Jesus Christ is interpreted as reconciliation,* redemption, priestly ministry, sacrifice, etc. This kind of salvation coming from Jesus Christ is encountered by the individual as liberation, justification,* renewal,* sanctification,* light, life and so on. The different NT writings and groups of writings thus prepare the way for the many ideas and conceptions of salvation that have been subsequently worked out in the history of theology and the church.

ASPECTS RELATING TO THE HISTORY OF DOGMA

In the history of theology the meaning of salvation has primarily been considered in regard to the person and work of Jesus Christ. Following Gustav Aulén, we may distinguish three fundamental types of interpretation.

The first was given its shape in the early church and still determines the way salvation is viewed in the Orthodox churches. In it, Christ appears as the one who frees human beings from the power of death and sin. Basically this liberation happens through God’s assumption of full humanity in the incarnation* and the healing work of God accomplished thereby. But it happens also through the victory of the risen Christ over the power of death and of the Prince of this world (see resurrection). Thus through Christ we are granted salvation in the sense of being restored in the image and likeness of God (theōsis).

As opposed to this basic type, a second view of salvation received its imprint in Western theology and particularly in the Latin middle ages, focusing especially on the interpretation of Christ’s death, which it understands as an expiation of human sins. Anselm of Canterbury (1033-1109) in his teaching on satisfaction – the most famous example of this type – interpreted the death of Jesus as the destiny (originating in God) of the God become flesh, through which God’s honour, offended by human sin, is satisfied, thus making reconciliation, justification and forgiveness possible. The reformers in particular remained committed to this model of how salvation is to be understood.

Third we find – above all in modern European theology – an interpretation of Jesus Christ’s saving activity which turns our attention wholly to the person of the earthly Jesus – his preaching, action and religious attitude. Thus the Protestant theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768-1834) identified what was special in Jesus of Nazareth as the strength of his awareness of God. Thus human salvation results in so far as human beings let themselves be embraced in Jesus' basic religious attitude, sharing in the self-surrender he made for them and thus following him.

While the first type of understanding continues to characterize the Orthodox churches' view of salvation, the Latin type has been more at home in the Roman Catholic and large Protestant churches. This difference, however, has never caused division in the churches but indicates rather a legitimate diversity of descriptions – foreshadowed in the NT – of the one mystery. In fact, in the belief held by all the churches on salvation, we find elements of all three paradigms for interpreting Christ's saving activity. Common to all three models of interpretation is Christ's being regarded as the one who has come "for us" (in the two senses of "in our stead" and "for our sake"). They also share the understanding this act gives of God* as the One who from God's very nature is active on behalf of us human beings. This view was worked out in the Trinitarian idea of God, according to which the Father is at work for our salvation through the Son in the Spirit (see Trinity). Because of the crisis in metaphysics and the rise of historical awareness, the third type of interpretation strikes a chord in present-day thinking and can therefore be found in a wide variety of modern theologies, including the theology of liberation, which has discovered the liberating, subversive Jesus of Nazareth.

The controversies of the Reformation period produced opposing views of (the appropriation of) salvation, which caused division in the church. Central to the controversy was the teaching on justification inherited from Paul: How do human beings profit from the salvation made available in Christ? Roman Catholic theology which derived from the middle ages saw justification as a supernatural pardoning of the sinner, implying his or her re-creation as a person who has been dedicated to God in faith, love and hope* and has been freed in principle from the dominion of original sin. The Reformation feared that this was a wrong way of defining the freedom* and intrinsic worth of human beings in God's sight and that it directed them into the path of good, pious, meritorious works, thus robbing them of their true consolation. "Justification by faith alone", in contrast, was understood by the reformers to mean the sinner's acquittal by grace* (salvation as the speaking of a word), an acquittal received in trusting faith, which also results in good works. But here the justified sinner exists in a tension between the sin which remains and the righteousness which results from the acquittal (simul iustus et peccator). On the Roman Catholic side it was feared here that due justice would not be done spiritually and theologically to the power of the re-creating grace of the Holy Spirit* (as in Rom. 8).

ECUMENICAL DISCUSSION

In contemporary ecumenical discussion the question of salvation is being pursued primarily in three directions.

Re-thinking of the 16th-century controversies. Analysis has been undertaken showing that we no longer have to regard these controversies about how salvation was to be viewed as ecclesiastically divisive. In its final report, the second world conference on Faith and Order* (Edinburgh 1937) produced joint statements on the significance of grace, on justification and sanctification, and on God's action and human responsibility in regard to the sovereignty of God's action. Justification and sanctification, God's action and the human will are not alternatives but are necessarily complementary in the description of the process of salvation.

The 16th-century's contrasting views of salvation have more recently been the subject first and foremost of Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue,* in which many insights from research in the history of dogma and of theology have found a place. Alongside the results of the North American dialogue (Justification by Faith, 1985) may be mentioned in particular the document Lehrverurteilungen – kirchentrennend? (1986), produced in the Federal Republic of Germany. The way is prepared for specific comments on the theme by hermeneutical reflections (e.g. on the time-bound nature of certain statements of the problems and modes of expression, and on the significance of a common understanding of the biblical witness). No premature harmonization of general ideas is made, but the consolation of the sinner and the re-creating power of the Spirit of God are two parallel concerns, formulated in the 16th century as opposites, each of which is necessary, although they cannot be reduced systematically to a single formula. On the basis of the American and German work, representatives of the Lutheran World Federation and the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity were in 1999 able to sign a Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, in which historically controversial matters were subsumed as different emphases under a fundamentally agreed understanding. The Orthodox concept of theōsis as the epitome of God's saving activity should be brought more fully into this discussion.

The idea of salvation as for today. Completely new dimensions of a possible contemporary understanding of salvation began to emerge at the beginning of the 1970s, when salvation, in the slogan "Salvation Today", was the theme for an entire ecumenical conference – the world conference on mission in 1973 in Bangkok, which responded to the promptings from the WCC assembly at Uppsala in 1968. It is stressed that "salvation for the whole person" is meant, as in Luke 4:18, and especially also a new social justice* and liberation from oppression and exploitation: Christ shows us the unity of body and soul, individual and society, humanity and creation. God's all-embracing salvation for the whole person frees us for our own total salvation. By our commitment to liberation from the oppression and exploitation of others, we procure "in fear and trembling" the salvation bestowed by Christ. In the European theology of the 1960s (e.g. that of Jürgen Moltmann) and at the same time perhaps in Latin American liberation theology,* it was increasingly recognized that salvation is a total event which embraces society and social structures too. Here history as a whole is seen as a process of salvation (see salvation history), and the OT idea of shalom plays its part as a prospect of hope. The world conference on mission in Melbourne in 1980, with "Your Kingdom Come" as its theme, also clearly stressed the social dimension of salvation (esp. with regard to the world's poor).

This highlighting of the horizontal and social dimension of salvation did provoke opposition from various churches (e.g. from the Russian Orthodox Church and among Evangelicals). In the WCC it was felt necessary to talk in more nuanced, balanced terms, without abandoning the horizontal trend (see M.M. Thomas's speeches at the meetings of the central committee and the Nairobi documents, 1975). It proves necessary to distinguish between (earthly) well-being and (eschatological) salvation. Does holy scripture not record situations of outward well-being which are nevertheless devoid of saving grace? And conversely, must not the reality of salvation be proclaimed where earthly, social well-being has not yet been achieved? In this context mention must be made of discussion on the meaning of mission,* which also regards the simple equation of salvation and earthly well-being as problematic.

Salvation for non-Christians? A third cluster of questions has been brought into ecumenical discussion by the documents of Vatican II,* which raise the question of salvation for non-Christians. The constitution Lumen Gentium speaks of the grace of God even among members of other faiths and even among unbelievers, but at the same time it underlines the relation of such grace to its centre in the (Roman Catholic) church of Christ. Since then, the possibility of the salvation of non-Christians has also been discussed in various ways in Protestant theology and within the WCC's programme of dialogue, in regard to other faiths and world-views (see the Chiang Mai consultation, 1977). Some theological models (which naturally also meet with hesitant or disapproving reactions) suggest an implicit or "anonymous" Christianity. The possibility of the salvation of non-Christians is thus combined with the tying of salvation to Jesus Christ in line with the witness of the NT (see uniqueness of Christ). Here again the question of the meaning of mission is raised. On this point the reality and problem of salvation require considerable thought at a deeper level.

ULRICH KÜHN

■ G. Aulén, Den christna försoningstanken (ET Christus Victor, London, SPCK, 1931) ■ A. Birmelé, Le salut en Jésus Christ dans les dia- logues oecuméniques, Paris, Cerf, 1986 ■ F.W. Dillistone, The Christian Understanding of Atonement, London, SCM Press, 1984 ■ Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 2000 ■ R. Lanooy, For Us and for Our Salvation: Seven Perspectives on Christian Soteriology, Utrecht-Leiden, Interuniversitair Instituut voor Missiologie en Oecumenica, 1994 ■ K. Lehmann & W. Pannenberg eds, Lehrverurteilungen – kirchentrennend?, vol. 1 (ET The Condemnations of the Reformation Era: Do They Still Divide?, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1990) ■ J.M. Lochman, Versöhnung und Befreiung: Absage an ein eindimensionales Heilsverständnis (ET Reconciliation and Liberation: Challenging a One-dimensional View of Salvation, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1980) ■ J. Matthey ed., Your Kingdom Come: Report on the World Conference on Mission and Evangelism, Melbourne, 1980, WCC, 1980 ■ P. Potter ed., Bangkok Assembly 1973, WCC, 1973 ■ G. Wainwright, For Our Salvation, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1997.

SALVATION ARMY

THE SALVATION ARMY (SA) movement began in 1865 when William Booth founded the Christian Mission. Originating in Booth's revival meetings in the slums of London's East End, the mission quickly spread throughout the British Isles by the effective use of recent converts to evangelize others in a language familiar to them. In 1878 the name "The Salvation Army" was adopted. Expansion in Great Britain immediately leaped forward.

The SA speedily took root overseas, first in the US and then Australia (1880), followed by France (1881), Canada, India, Switzerland and Sweden (1882) and other parts of the world. When Booth died in 1912 (in SA terminology, "was promoted to Glory"), the Army was established in almost 50 countries. As of 2000, the SA operated in 107 countries, using 173 languages in preaching the gospel. It had 15,669 corps (churches) and 25,475 officers (full-time ministers).

The objects of the SA are "the advancement of the Christian religion... of education, the relief of poverty, and other charitable objects beneficial to society or the community of mankind as a whole". Salvationist doctrines, following mainstream Christian beliefs, include acceptance of the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as "the divine rule of Christian faith and practice"; belief in the Triune God (see Trinity), the atoning work of Christ, the necessity for repentance and faith* in claiming salvation,* and the call to live a holy life. Every SA soldier is required to subscribe to an 11-point statement of doctrines. SA worship is non-liturgical. Extemporaneous prayer, personal testimony of members and preaching of the word by the leader are important features. Often a brass band leads the singing.

Salvationists are taught that they are "saved to serve" – they are soldiers in their spare time, without remuneration. Officers, trained in SA training colleges, devote their whole lives to the cause and receive a modest salary. All Salvationists are expected to live a disciplined life of high moral standards, including abstinence from alcohol and tobacco.

From the beginning the SA was involved in schemes to help the poor. From simple soup kitchens to feed the starving of London's East End, the movement's social work has evolved to meet modern needs with modern methods. Centres for the homeless, the alcoholic, and deprived children cater annually for thousands of people. Hospitals and clinics provide healing and hope, schools and institutions provide education, with all being done in the name of Christ. Salvationists believe, however, that people cannot be made whole by the ministry to the body and mind alone.

The SA claims to be an "integral part and element of the Great Church, a living fruit-bearing branch of the True Vine". The SA was a founding member of the WCC, but since 1981 the Army has been in a revised adviser status as a recognized Christian World Communion, a change initiated by the SA. This status is more suited to the Army's polity of a single international headquarters representative for all its worldwide constituents. The SA continues to play a significant role in the WCC, including attendance at meetings of its central committee, as well as in other movements such as the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization.* It is an associate member of the World Evangelical Fellowship* internationally, with many of its territories full members of WEF-related national bodies. Many of its territories are also full members of WCC-related national councils of churches.

The SA has one international leader, the general, elected by the movement's leading officers, who form the high council. The general directs all SA operations from the world headquarters in London, though he or she spends much time in necessary travel, reviewing the work, preaching the gospel. In 2002 the SA was led by General John Gowans, elected in 1999.

EARL ROBINSON

- F. Coutts, The History of the Salvation Army, vols 6-7, London, Hodder & Stoughton, 1973-86
- F. Coutts, No Discharge in This War, 3rd ed., London, Salvation Army, 1994
- H. Garipey, Mobilized for God, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 2000
- E.H. MacKinley, Marching to Glory, San Francisco, Harper & Row, 1980
- Salvation Story – Salvationist Handbook of Doctrine, London, Salvation Army, 1998
- R. Sandall, The History of the Salvation Army, vols 1-3, London, Nelson, 1947-55
- A.R. Wiggins, The History of the Salvation Army, vols 4-5, London, Nelson, 1964-68.

SALVATION HISTORY

CHRISTIANS believe that God* is at work in history,* hence this divine work has its history. Since salvation* is a historical reality, the notion of salvation history presents itself as an appropriate way to perceive and interpret history.

This approach can be found in the Bible. The covenant* tradition in the Hebrew Bible, for instance, affirms the particular history of God with the people. The testimonies of the Hebrew prophets are connected with different readings of Israel's history. Similarly, when Luke writes his gospel and the Acts of the Apostles, his aim is to give an account of God's saving work in and through Jesus Christ,* which continues in the ministry of the apostles. Throughout the history of Christianity efforts have been undertaken to interpret the past in terms of salvation history, i.e. to show that the present is in line with God's all-embracing design and purpose.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the emergence of the ecumenical movement should have been accompanied by attempts to place this new historical phenomenon in the perspective of God's great purpose. The founders of the modern ecumenical movement were convinced that God willed them to struggle for this new task. They saw the past history in terms of divine preparation. Referring to John R. Mott, George Bell, Eivind Berggrav, Donald Baillie and others, W.A. Visser 't Hooft declared in 1961: "They felt constrained to work for the unity of the church of Christ, simply because that unity is an essential part of God's design."

Neither is it surprising that a similar tone was struck at Amsterdam 1948. Its theme, "Man's Disorder and God's Design", reflects a salvation-history approach, as clearly evidenced in the section 1 report: "God's redeeming activity in the world has been carried out through his calling a people to be his own chosen people. The old covenant was fulfilled in the new when Jesus Christ, the Son of God incarnate, died and was raised from the dead, ascended into heaven and gave the Holy Ghost to dwell in his body, the church. It is our common concern for that church which draws us together, and in that concern we discover our unity in relation to her Lord and Head."

We can see here a three-stage concept of salvation history: (1) God's story with Israel, (2) God's story with Jesus Christ, (3) God's story with the churches leading up to the one church* universal. In the oikonomia of God the oikoumene* has a providential place (see providence).

The third assembly of the WCC (New Delhi 1961) underscored and widened this approach. Christ, the "light of the world", is proclaimed in cosmic dimensions (see the contributions of Joseph Sittler and Paul Devanandan). Under the world-ruling Christ there can be but one church and one history of salvation, into which all histories of the world must ultimately flow.

The Second Vatican Council* (1962-65) took a similar approach, describing the history of our globe through its evolutionary stages as God's creative history leading to God's self-disclosure in the Son. It regarded the world's religions as agents in humanity's search to grasp the meaning of this great history but affirmed that the real meaning is revealed through Christ in the Holy Spirit* to the (Catholic) church as that sacramental institution in which God's purpose is most adequately manifested. This approach was also significantly influenced by the work of Protestant scholars, especially Oscar Cullmann.

The Bristol document "God in Nature and History" of the Faith and Order* commission (1967) can be regarded as a summary of ecumenical thinking on history. It seeks to combine secular evolutionary thinking with the notion of salvation history. It describes the global evolutionary process as God's creation history, which culminates in Christ's ministry and finds its fulfilment in God's ultimate reign (see kingdom of God).

With the Uppsala assembly (1968) a shift from reflection to action takes place. God is confessed as the Lord of change and renewal,* hence the church is called to be an agent of change and renewal. Since God is at work, his disciples must work also. Salvation history is not something to think about but something to work out in concrete solidarity for the poor* and oppressed. This approach comes very close to the affirmation of the Latin American Roman Catholic bishops conference at Medellín* (1968) concerning God's "preferential option for the poor". Since then, salvation history has been looked at less in terms of a hermeneutical clue to understand history than as a prophetic tool to change it.

In both versions, however, the concept of salvation history remains ambiguous and requires effort to understand its character. Salvation history is a way in which faith* sees and interprets the vast expanse of history and should never be mistaken for an objective account of what history is. Properly understood, salvation history has a doxological meaning, i.e. it is a way of celebrating God's creative and redemptive presence in this world. It will at times also have a prophetic meaning, i.e. it must elucidate ethico-political options and challenges (see prophecy). Whenever this limited perspective is overlooked, systems of salvation history stand in danger of harmonizing the deep contradictions of history, of simplifying the mystery of Christ's cross and resurrection, and thus of turning into triumphalism.

GEIKO MÜLLER-FAHRENHOLZ

■ H. Berkhof, Christus de zin der geschiedenis (ET Christ the Meaning of History, London, SCM Press, 1966) ■ O. Cullmann, Heil als Geschichte (ET Salvation in History, London, SCM Press, 1967) ■ "God in Nature and History", Study Encounter, 1, 1965 ■ G. Müller-Fahrenholz, Heilsgeschichte zwischen Ideologie und Prophetie, Freiburg, Herder, 1974.

SAMARTHA, STANLEY JEDIDIAH

B. 7 Oct. 1920, Karkal, South India; d. 22 July 2001, Bangalore. First director of the WCC Sub-unit on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies, 1970-81, Samartha was able to secure wide acceptance for dialogue as an important ecumenical concern. He studied at Madras University; United Theological College, Bangalore; Union Theological Seminary, New York; and Hartford Seminary Foundation (PhD), and did post-graduate studies at the University of Basel, 1951-52. From 1947 to 1960 he was connected with the Basel Mission Theological Seminary (later Karnataka Theological College), Mangalore, from 1947-49 as lecturer and from 1952 as principal. Ordained to the ministry in 1952, he became principal of Serampore College, West Bengal, and consultant to the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society, Bangalore. Samartha was visiting professor at United Theological College, Bangalore, and also connected with the South Asia Theological Research Institute.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ S.J. Samartha, Courage for Dialogue, WCC, 1981 ■ The Hindu Response to the Unbound Christ, Madras, CLS, 1974 ■ One Christ,

Many Religions: Toward a Revised Christology, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 2000 ■ C.D. Jathanna ed., Dialogue in Community: Essays in Honour of Stanley J. Samartha, Mangalore, Karnataka Theological Research Institute, 1982 ■ C.S. Soans, Dialogue and/or Mission: An Approach to the Theology of Stanley J. Samartha: Dissertation, Ann Arbor MI, UMI Dissertation Services, 1999.

SAMUEL, BISHOP

B. Dec. 1920, Cairo, Egypt; d. 6 Oct. 1981, Cairo. Bishop Samuel attended the WCC's Evanston assembly in 1954 and afterwards was a member of the WCC central committee. An interpreter of the Coptic church to the churches in the West, he helped to establish a basis of understanding and dialogue with the Roman Catholic Church. He was also instrumental in theologically reconciling the different Orthodox churches. Educated in Cairo and at Princeton University, USA, in 1949 he chose the monastic order known as Makary El Souriany. Consecrated as bishop in 1962, he served many villages in Egypt, explaining the Bible, starting a group for Coptic education, and establishing the rural diakonia. He was director of the churches' department of social studies. Appointed by President Anwar Al-Sadat to administer the church in terms of its state relationships, he was among those assassinated together with the president.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

SANCTIFICATION

THE CHRISTIAN faith* includes the confidence that God wills the sanctification of all who are one body with Christ (see holiness). As "participants of the divine nature" (2 Pet. 1:4), disciples are to lead holy lives. "As he who called you is holy, be holy yourselves in all your conduct" (1 Pet. 1:15). All Christian traditions teach sanctification, with various emphases.

Eastern Orthodox Christianity understands participation in the life of the risen Christ as "divinization" (theōsis), which transforms not only the human person but the whole cosmic order. In the West, the Augustinian spiritualization and individualization of the "new creation" prevented sanctification from being seen in the framework of a cosmic process of divinization. Sanctification became a progressive cleansing of the person from sinfulness, by the gift of grace.* Medieval theologians taught the power of human nature to cooperate with grace. Notwithstanding our total need of grace in regard to salvation* and the absolute priority of God's sanctifying initiative, they stressed the compelling call to grow in sanctity through meritorious works.

"Perfection" in the sense of sinlessness was the prevailing outlook on sanctification when Luther's despairing conscience found relief in the gospel of justification* by faith, "without the works of the law". Justification as imputation of Christ's righteousness to the sinner through faith makes all notions of growth in sanctity irrelevant: Christ's righteousness is imputed totally as the Holy Spirit* works faith in the soul. Christ alone is the holiness of his disciple, who is "simultaneously a sinner". Roman Catholicism fosters more optimistic views of righteousness: "We are truly called just, and we are just" (council of Trent*). According to Vatican II,* faith, hope and charity equip us "to bear increasingly rich fruit of the Holy Spirit".

Following the Reformation breakthrough on the issue of justification, new patterns of sanctification arose, opposing (1) the idea of the persistence of sin in the righteous, and (2) Luther's idea of "faith alone", which seemed to ignore the role of moral conversion. German pietism saw justification as the beginning of "rebirth", with an emphasis on the growth of the "new man". Calvin related sanctification to God's election. For him, the fear of God's judgment, in firm reliance upon his mercy, leads to a life obedient to divine law and church discipline. In Methodism, "Christian perfection" (entire sanctification) is the goal of initial conversion: penitents who are forgiven for their sins retain a "residue of sin within" which calls for a "second work of grace". In discipline, methodical devotion, avoidance of worldly pleasures, "growth in grace" and victory over sin are then sought and may be achieved. The international Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue* was able to reach extensive agreement on the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit (Honolulu report, 1981). Contemporary Holiness movements* value the personal experience of the Spirit, including "baptism in the Holy Spirit", which gives power to live an effective Christian life.

The yearning for sinlessness in today's discussions about eschatological transfiguration – in the Roman Catholics' insistence on the "objective" agency of the church's ministry and sacraments in salvation, and in the Protestant concern for ethical righteousness – makes it worth recalling the rich man's lesson (Mark 10:17-22): sinlessness avails little, God alone is good, and holiness comes through following Christ. Forgiveness of sins, rather than sinlessness, is God's truth for sanctified sinners.

DANIEL OLIVIER

■ Histoire des saints et de la sainteté chrétienne, 11 vols, Paris, Hachette, 1986 ■ R.N. Flew, The Idea of Perfection in Christian Theology, London, Oxford UP, 1934 ■ C. Lindberg, The Third Reformation? Charismatic Renewal and Lutheran Tradition, Macon GA, Mercer UP, 1983 ■ J. Meyendorff & J. McLelland, The New Man: An Orthodox and Reformed Dialogue, New Brunswick NJ, Angora, 1973 ■ M. Opočenský & P. Réamonn eds, Justification and Sanctification in the Traditions of the Reformation: Prague V, Geneva, WARC, 1999 ■ K. Ware, "Salvation and Theosis in Orthodox Theology", in Luther et la réforme allemande dans une perspective oecuménique, Chambésy, Eds du Centre oecuménique, 1983.

SANCTUARY

SANCTUARY is traditionally offered by the church as a protective community to refugees* whose basic human rights are being violated. It is a faith practice which reaches back to the earliest memories of the people of Israel, and a movement of the ecumenical church in response to the current plight of refugees throughout the world. In January 2000 an estimated 22.3 million persons were listed as of concern to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (11.7 million refugees, 1.2 million asylum-seekers, 2.5 million returned refugees, and 6.9 million internally displaced persons and others of concern). These are people who cross borders without documents to flee war and persecution, or they are displaced within their own country. In all cases these are the most vulnerable and suffering people imaginable.

The name "sanctuary" has been given in the USA to the movement for the protection of refugees from Central America whom the US government has been sanctioning or deporting since 1980, claiming that they were not bona fide political refugees but had crossed the borders for economic reasons. A number of Catholic and Protestant churches have challenged this interpretation of the refugee act of 1980, have organized themselves to provide transportation, reception, protection and re-location of these refugees in what has been called (recovering a term from the times of slavery) the underground railroad, and have declared themselves "sanctuary churches". The US government has arraigned and indicted a number of people involved in these actions. The ethical and legal debate and the processes continue. Churches and individuals engaged in this task have made explicit the theological, biblical and ethical grounds of their action.

The Bible is replete with stories and instructions on sanctuary, asylum* and the treatment of refugees. The Hebrews, displaced from their own land by famine, are enslaved in Egypt. God hears their cry and liberates them from their suffering and bondage. Therefore, Israel is to remember that they were once aliens or sojourners and that special care must be taken of the stranger in their midst (Lev. 19:33-34; Deut. 10:18-19). The God who saved Israel from bondage is the protector of the poor and suffering (Ps. 145; Num. 35:9-11).

Within the Old Testament we find both the tradition of cities of refuge and altar sanctuary, both for the purpose of saving human life from blood vengeance until judicial safeguards can be employed. Jesus begins life as a refugee child fleeing from Herod. He identifies with the poor and persecuted (Matt. 25:43). The early church is instructed to receive the stranger (Heb. 13:2).

The community of faith often affords the only possible protection to people fleeing for their lives. Seeking safe haven from death squads, arbitrary arrest and detention, torture,* or conditions of war, desperate people throughout history – those fleeing internal persecution in their own countries as well as those who find themselves to be strangers in a strange land – have sought the church as a place of sanctuary. When one has nowhere to turn, the door of the church is a beacon of hope and refuge in a dark and desperate world.

The practice of sanctuary is again emerging as a movement within the ecumenical church, which assumes responsibility for the non-violent protection of human rights. Sanctuary is more than a matter of individual conscience. It is the church entering into communion with the violated and oppressed and building together a community of solidarity and love. The refugee becomes a gift from God, the presence of Christ to the sanctuary church. The refugee becomes not the object of charity or paternalistic ministry but, rather, the spiritual guide for congregations to help the protective community read the Bible as much of it was written – through the eyes and hearts of refugees.

When the protective community of faith adds a public witness to its practice of sanctuary, then the state is held accountable for its violations of human rights and the church becomes prophetic. Often the church must practise sanctuary in silence in order to protect those who need refuge. But even in these instances, the church provides documentation of human rights abuses so that the truth can be spoken with authority at a later time. When a church cannot speak publicly of severe repression, it must depend on other communions within the international community to assume the prophetic role.

Refugees who cross international borders without documents, exposing the root causes of their flight into exile, can become a part of the witness of the sanctuary church. Refugee rights are directly linked to issues of military intervention, pacification, low-intensity conflict, arms sales, foreign-aid programmes and police training.

As more and more countries adopt highly restrictive policies to prevent the admission of refugees, prophetic witness may risk aiding refugees to cross borders safely. Many nations are trying to deal with the refugee problem by closing borders to applicants for asylum, intercepting boats at sea, and requiring individual proof of refugee status under more restrictive terms. The public resistance of faith communities to these violations of human rights has extended the prophetic role of the church across national borders.

In many instances, the refugee becomes the prophetic voice within the faith community, speaking truth to political powers about the causes of their suffering and exile. In the case of internally displaced people, the church is often the only voice documenting gross violations of human rights,* torture, bombing or starvation of civilian populations in counter-insurgency military strategies. Through this solidarity and communion with the suffering and violated, the sanctuary church becomes one Body in Christ.

JOHN FIFE

- I. Bau, This Ground Is Holy: Church Sanctuary and Central American Refugees, New York, Paulist, 1985
- H. Cunningham, God and Caesar at the Rio Grande: Sanctuary and the Politics of Religion, Minneapolis, Univ. of Minnesota Press, 1995
- P. Golden & M. McConnell, Sanctuary: The New Underground Railroad, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1986
- J. Schaeffer ed., Sanctuary and Asylum: A Handbook for Commitment, Geneva, WARC, 1990.

SANT'EGIDIO COMMUNITY

IN 1968 ANDREA RICCARDI, an Italian high school student, launched a new lay community from the small Roman church of Sant'Egidio (St Giles). It sought to implement Second Vatican Council demands in the light of the gospel by a common spirituality in providing service to the poor of Rome, "the forgotten people". Its ministries include soup kitchens, "popular schools" for disadvantaged children, and care for neglected elderly and AIDS victims. At the beginning of the millennium this fast-growing new movement, a favourite of John Paul II, lists 15,000 lay members in more than 20 countries worldwide.

In October 1992 Sant'Egidio brokered a peace accord in Mozambique, ending a brutal civil war that had left over one million dead over almost two decades. In December 1996 the community negotiated an end to the civil war in Guatemala and paved the way for a truth commission to document 26 years of horrors. Former UN secretary-general Boutros Boutros-Ghali coined the phrase "the Rome formula" in reference to the "powerless" Sant'Egidio's careful and honest approach with the politically powerful.

The commitment to peace led the community also to ecumenical and inter-religious relations. In the 1990s it began to sponsor annual inter-religious gatherings. In September 2000 a Lisbon summit of 250 leaders of 10 religions from 52 nations was sponsored by Sant'Egidio and the cardinal archbishop of Lisbon. The summit, called Oceans of Peace, agreed that struggles against poverty, war and the death penalty "create zones for inter-religious cooperation without tripping anyone's theological wires".

Every evening in Rome's Santa Maria in Trastevere, the community offers public vespers, drawing large numbers of young Romans and pilgrims who witness the clear connection between liturgy and life.

TOM STRANSKY

SCHISM

THE WORD "SCHISM" comes from the Greek schisma, meaning "split, rent, division". In the New Testament it refers to divisions and quarrels of all kinds which had developed in the church.* Later, the word came to be used solely for divisions of a lasting nature, not over questions of doctrine but because of disagreements over questions of discipline. Schismatics therefore were people who, though still agreeing with dogmas, split away from the church, refusing to obey its hierarchical authorities because of differences of opinion over questions such as the legitimacy of this or that hierarchy, or a particular disciplinary measure, or problems concerning rites or organization (see canon 1 of Basil the Great).

One of the most famous schisms in the ancient church was that created by Donatus (d.355), the bishop of Casae Nigrae, in Numidia, North Africa, against the bishop of Carthage, whom he accused of having surrendered the holy books during the persecutions. Donatus led a schismatic church in opposition to the latter, drawing on the support of the rural Berber population. Attacked by Augustine, Donatism was finally condemned at the council of Carthage (411). Mention may also be made of the schism at Antioch caused by the banishment of the bishop of Antioch, Meletius, and the consecration of Paulinus as bishop against canon law (363).

The church suspends eucharistic fellowship with schismatic groups, but according to canons 10 and 11 of the council of Carthage the priest who creates a schism is liable to excommunication.* Canon 33 of the council of Laodicea forbids prayer with schismatics. However, canon 1 of Basil prescribes that baptism* received among schismatics be recognized.

Other schisms have likewise left their mark on the history of the church. One of these was the schism between the East and the Roman West which culminated in 1054 (see Athenagoras I, Paul VI). As a result of this division, Roman Catholic theology characterizes the Orthodox as schismatics because of their refusal to recognize the universal authority and jurisdiction of the pope. Another noteworthy schism is the great schism in the Western church which divided the Roman Catholic Church from 1378 to 1417, when there were two popes at the same time, one in Rome and one in Avignon; in 1409 there was even a third pope in Pisa before the council of Constance (1414). The election of Pope Martin V (1417) put an end to the division.

One should not forget the schism of the Old Believers (Raskol), which has divided the Russian Orthodox Church since the second half of the 17th century. It was caused by the stubborn opposition provoked by the reforms introduced by Patriarch Nikon, who made changes in the service books and in ritual. The adherents of the old ways were condemned and excommunicated at the great council of Moscow of 1666-67 (condemnations which were lifted at the council of Moscow in 1971). Their movement continued, however, divided into sects, and still counts its followers in the millions.

This last schism highlights the dangers of hasty and abrupt liturgical reforms. It also shows that schisms arising out of disagreements over questions of rite or discipline can in the long run engender heresies* in matters of faith* and doctrine, opening the way for ecclesiological errors and quarrels over the sacraments,* the nature of the church* and even the means of salvation.* Schisms as well as heresies obviously represent serious obstacles to the unity* of the Christian world.

ALEXIS KNIAZEFF

■ 1054-1954, L'Eglise et les Eglises: Neuf siècles de douloureuse séparation entre l'Orient et l'Occident: Etudes et travaux sur l'unité chrétienne offerts à Dom L. Beauduin, 2 vols, Chevetogne, Eds de Chevetogne, 1954-55.

SCHMEMANN, ALEXANDER

B. 13 Sept. 1921, Revel, Estonia; d. 13 Dec. 1983, Crestwood, NY, USA. Professor of church history and liturgical theology at St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary, Crestwood, 1951-83, Schmemann was dean of the seminary, 1962-83. Under his guidance St Vladimir's became the centre of a liturgical and eucharistic revival and was an academic institution much respected in ecumenical circles.

His theological world-view was shaped during his studies at the Orthodox Theological Institute of St Sergius in Paris, 1940-45, where he then became professor of Byzantine church history until 1951. In the 1950s he was vice-chairman of the WCC Youth department and member of the Faith and Order commission. Schmemann lectured as adjunct professor at Union Theological Seminary, General Theological Seminary and Columbia University. He favoured Orthodoxy in the USA and the establishment of the autocephalous Orthodox Church in America in 1970.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ A. Schmemann, Church, World, Mission: Reflections on Orthodoxy in the West, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1979 ■ The Eucharist, Sacrament of the Kingdom, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1988 ■ The Historical Road of Eastern Orthodoxy, New York, Holt, Rinehart & Winston, 1963.

SCHUTZ-MARSAUCHE, ROGER

B. 12 May 1915, Provence, Switzerland. Brother Roger is the founder and prior of the ecumenical community of Taizé,* near Cluny, in France, which today has 90 brothers. In 1940 he went to Taizé alone, and in 1942 he was joined by a few other brothers. In 1949 seven of them took monastic vows. In 1952 Brother Roger wrote the Rule of Taizé. When the Office of Taizé was published ten years later, its careful balance of old and new aroused the attention of many who were concerned for the renewal of Christian worship around the world. In 1958 Brother Roger was received in audience by Pope John XXIII, and he was an observer at the Second Vatican Council. In 1970 he announced a worldwide council of youth (which opened in 1974) and in 1982 led to a "pilgrimage of trust on earth" which includes European meetings (20,000 youth each year in a European capital), intercontinental meetings (Madras, India) and East-West meetings (Yugoslavia). He received the Templeton prize (1974), the peace prize in Germany (1974), and the UNESCO prize for peace education (1988).

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ R. Schutz-Marsauche, Le dynamique du provisoire (ET The Dynamic of the Provisional, London, Mowbray, 1981) ■ Fleurissent les déserts du coeur (ET And Your Deserts Shall Flower, London, Oxford, Mowbray, 1984) ■ Violence du pacifique: Etonnement de l'amour (ET Afire with Love, New York, Crossroad, 1982).

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

IN 1926 THE philosopher Alfred North Whitehead described science and religion* as “the two strongest general forces” that influence human life. Inevitably, then, the ecumenical movement has had an interest in science.

Historians frequently make the case that the development of science owes something to the biblical tradition. Polytheism and animism discourage efforts at unified explanations of nature,* and religions that teach the unreality of the physical world devalue scientific exploration. Belief in divine creation implies a unity and authentic reality to all nature, the presuppositions for most scientific inquiry. Even so, scientific discoveries have often clashed with traditional beliefs and have threatened ecclesiastical authority,* leading to sporadic, sometimes dramatic conflicts between science and theology.

In the ancient and medieval church the clashes were usually not severe. Christians understood that no human language was adequate to the mystery of God and that much of the Bible was to be read symbolically. Scientists were a small elite, and scientific methods had not come to dominate culture.* Platonism diverted human attention from nature (a shadow-world) to the eternal “real” world, and Aristotelianism assumed a teleology in nature that theologians could relate to their understanding of divine creation. So it was not until the great modern advances of science that the problems of relating science and theology became critical for society at large.

Catholicism met the challenge of new scientific cosmologies by condemning Galileo (1633), a condemnation that was revoked by Pope John Paul II in 1992. Learning from that experience, the Vatican did not make a similar mistake with the scientific theory of evolution. Protestantism sometimes rejected evolution, insisting that Gen. 1-3 gave a literal and accurate account of creation* – a belief that still causes conflicts in public education in some parts of the world (see creationism). A quite different Protestant response, typical of some liberal theology, was to make a theology of development and progress out of evolution. Today theologians are engaged in new efforts to relate contemporary scientific cosmologies and evolutionary concepts to Christian belief.

Technology has often been a quite different enterprise from science. Science seeks understanding. Its motivation is both intellectual and aesthetic; it loves a comprehensive and “elegant” theory. It is a work of imagination joined with realism. It traces connections of cause and effect; its methods include observation, development of theories that explain the evidence, and verification of those theories by further observation and experimentation, thus expanding the boundaries of knowledge. Technology seeks to cope with and sometimes control physical nature and society. Its motivation is practical. It is less concerned with grand theories, more concerned with effectiveness. In some cases technology is the application of science; thus the scientific theories of Albert Einstein led to the technology of nuclear energy and weapons. But technology has also preceded science; the lever, the wheel, the first ancient steam engine and the magnifying glass probably came long before the theories that explain them.

In some societies, including the ancient Greek, science was mainly an interest of intellectuals, who disdained physical labour and therefore technology. Both class structure and metaphysics separated theory from practice, science from technology. Christian faith,* remembering the carpenter of Nazareth, drew the two closer. Monasteries, though often unsophisticated intellectually, became the centres for the preservation of scientific knowledge and the development of crafts and technologies. The Benedictine monks have been called the first intellectuals to get dirt under their fingernails.

In the modern world science and technology are interdependent, sometimes almost indistinguishable. Ever since Francis Bacon (1561-1626) declared that “knowledge is power”, the sharp separation between science and technology has been blunted. In pragmatic theories of knowledge, in which all inquiry is problem solving, science and technology are closely akin. Contemporary science often leads to technological innovations; just as often its experimentation depends upon elaborate technological apparatus. Frequently it is funded by government and industry interested in military and economic pay-offs.

Even so, the distinction between science and technology remains important. Science with its understanding of the world presents issues to theology concerning the truth claims of Christian faith. Technology presents issues to ethics,* as its new powers require human direction and evaluation.

ECUMENICAL ATTENTION IN THE 20TH CENTURY

The WCC from its beginnings has taken an interest in the social impact of scientific technologies. The first assembly, meeting in Amsterdam in the aftermath of the second world war (1948), called attention to the relation between technology and modern secularism and to the ways in which technology acquires a momentum of its own that has a powerful effect on society (see secularization). It warned against the technological depersonalization of life and its wasteful exploitation of natural resources. However, delegates from Asia and Africa (a very small minority in the WCC at that time) saw the potential of technology to “lessen the burden of toil and alleviate poverty”. They thought the Europeans and North Americans were overly pessimistic about technology.

The second assembly (Evanston 1954) launched a study project on the “Christian Responsibility towards Areas of Rapid Social Change”, with special attention to Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Middle East. The discussions emphasized political, economic and cultural change, but with constant awareness of the impact of technology on all these. The climax of the project was a conference in Salonika (1959) on “Christian Action in Rapid Social Change: Dilemmas and Opportunities”.

The third assembly (New Delhi 1961) brought major changes in the WCC. The merger of the WCC and the International Missionary Council, along with the entrance of the Russian Orthodox and other churches from Africa, Asia and Latin America, changed the predominantly Western European-North American character of the WCC’s earlier years. The Asian setting influenced the assembly’s concern for the responsible uses of technology.

The years 1962-65 were the years of the Second Vatican Council.* Pope John XXIII, who had authorized the presence of Roman Catholic observers at New Delhi, invited Protestant and Orthodox observers to Vatican II. Roman Catholicism had a strong legacy of papal encyclicals* and addresses dealing with the modern political-economic world, including its technologies. These usually endorsed the benefits of technologies, urged believers to use them in accord with Catholic moral teachings, and warned against the depersonalizing effects of modern social change. If these documents sometimes showed nostalgia for medieval Christendom, Vatican II changed that – above all, in its Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, Gaudium et Spes.

This influential document recognized the importance of industrialization and urbanization in shaping the modern world. It acknowledged the impact of the physical and human sciences upon the understanding of the world and upon human self-knowledge, and it took account of the technology that it saw “transforming the face of the earth”. It addressed issues of marriage* and family,* culture, economic organization, political life, world peace and the community of nations – seeking to understand all these in their scientific as well as their moral aspects. It welcomed science and technology when these are directed towards human dignity and equality, while warning against their dehumanizing effects when ethical issues are neglected.

During Vatican II, the WCC was making plans for a world conference on “Christians in the Technical and Social Revolutions of Our Time” (Geneva 1966). This was the first major WCC conference devoted solely to issues of social ethics. It was in many respects an heir of the Oxford conference of the Life and Work movement (1937), prior to the organization of the WCC. But Oxford had been a conference of church leaders, mostly clergy and mostly from Western Europe and North America. At Geneva a ma-majority of the 420 delegates were laypeople, and a majority came from outside the old geographical nexus. Roman Catholics had prominent roles as speakers and observers.

The conference had a wide impact. Its four preparatory volumes of essays were studied around the world. It was the first global platform for emerging Latin American and African theologies of liberation. Its findings won major attention among member churches and among critics of the WCC.

The delegates, when they addressed the topic of the conference, were more adept at talking about social than technological revolutions. Despite some major addresses on technology, the conference centred its attention on political, social and cultural issues, and it considered technology primarily as a form of power with social impact. Some of the participating scientists objected that their concerns had been neglected, and the report of the conference contained recommendations that the WCC find ways for continuing work involving scientists and technologists.

Following Geneva, the WCC and the Vatican cooperated in the founding of the committee on Society, Development and Peace (SODEPAX*), which for a few years pursued vigorously some of the concerns shared by Vatican II and Geneva. Within the WCC, the department of Church and Society carried out the recommendations for continued work involving cooperation of scientists and technologists with theologians.

This process took an unexpected direction when the issues of ecology leapt into prominence in several parts of the world. The Geneva reports had stated: "The churches should welcome the development of science and technology as an expression of God's creative work. They should also welcome the economic growth and social development which it makes possible." That confidence was balanced by warnings that technological power can be an instrument of injustice. But the new accent, neglected at Geneva, was on the destructive consequences of present technologies and economic development, as they consume unrenewable resources, pollute the environment and endanger human life and ecosystems. Some scientists involved in the programme of the WCC made this point with great power. The fifth assembly of the WCC (Nairobi 1975) endorsed continuing work on the theme, and the central committee adopted a programme emphasis on the struggle for a "Just, Participatory and Sustainable Society".*

Within the WCC there was some resistance to the new theme. To nations suffering poverty, a warning against economic growth seemed to be a message of despair. Others feared that well-intentioned people, weary of strenuous conflicts for justice,* welcomed a turn to a gentler environmental interest. Ecologists answered that if the dream of overcoming the gap between rich and poor by making everybody rich was illusory, the concern for distributive justice was all the more urgent. They also pointed out that existing patterns of economic growth usually widen the gap between rich and poor and that pollution harms the poor far more than the rich. The department of Church and Society, often gaining the cooperation of eminent scientists, sought to define the kinds of economic growth and distribution that are not destructive. It sponsored regional conferences in Africa, Asia and Europe. It gave special attention to problems of energy and justice in a world in which the poor societies that lack fossil fuels are especially disadvantaged. On another front, it arranged international conversations on the new genetics and the ethical issues it presents (see bio-ethics).

In 1979 the WCC convened a world conference on "Faith, Science and the Future" at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (see ecumenical conferences). About half of the 405 delegates (including 91 students) were physical scientists and technologists; the other half were church leaders, theologians, social scientists, people from government and industry. In recognition of the worldwide nature of the issues, the conference heard Buddhists and Muslims, as well as Christian theologians, speak out of the insights of their faith. Other speakers, chosen for their technical competence, included Christians, Jews and agnostics. Two of the ten sections dealt specifically with themes of science and faith, one with science and education, seven with various aspects of technology and Christian ethics.

The major surprise of the conference came when some of the physical scientists asked to change the agenda in order to give more attention to the issue of war and nuclear weapons. Original plans had not given adequate importance to the topic, only because of another WCC programme on militarism.* The scientists argued persuasively that any understanding of contemporary technology is radically incomplete without attention to weapons. One recommendation of the conference was that the WCC sponsor an international hearing on nuclear weapons. That took place in Amsterdam in 1981.

The preparatory book and the two volumes coming out of the MIT conference had wide distribution and influenced theological education and programmes of churches in various nations. Spin-offs from the conference include further programmes in many parts of the world. Some of the themes of the conference entered into the programme of the sixth assembly of the WCC (Vancouver 1983) and the world convocation on justice, peace and the integrity of creation* (Seoul 1990).

CONTINUING ISSUES

Out of this ecumenical history have emerged several issues that continue to engage the churches. Five of them are listed here. In keeping with the historical record, these centre more directly on technology and ethics than on science and theology. The reason is that the issues of science-theology permit extended discussion; the issues of technology-ethics often require urgent decisions. Ecumenical Christianity can choose to move slowly on some theological issues rather than foreclose discussion by premature decisions, but on many ethical issues it must throw its weight into the struggle or stand by and watch others direct the course of history. Even so, all the ethical issues mentioned here have theological grounding and implications.

Humanity within God's creation. The report of Geneva 1966 includes these words: "Christians believe God expects man to exercise dominion over the earth, to name the creatures and to cultivate the garden of the world... Man is both the master and the steward of nature. His dominion over nature, considered as God's creation, is that of a keeper and transformer, not of a conqueror."

The delegates who formulated and adopted those sentences could not guess how great a controversy would soon arise over the concept of human dominion. A few months later medieval historian Lynn White, Jr, delivered an address to the American Association for the Advancement of Science on "The Historical Roots of Our Ecological Crisis". White, himself a Christian and later a participant in the programme of the WCC, charged that Christianity, especially in its Western form, had destroyed the sacral quality of nature and encouraged its predatory exploitation to a degree that now threatened the integrity of nature and of humankind. A little later Arnold Toynbee made similar accusations. But whereas Toynbee advocated a return to a pre-Christian pantheism, White asked for a recovery of the insights of Franciscan Christianity. Others found resources in Eastern Orthodoxy.

At New Delhi in 1961, Joseph Sittler had urged a theological concern for "the realm of nature as a theatre of grace". But other Christian writers were exulting in Christianity's "desacralization" of nature and the secularization of society. There was even bold talk of the "humanization" or "hominization" of the universe. White, without mentioning these writers, took up their challenge and condemned exactly those elements in the Christian tradition that they had acclaimed.

The growth of ecological consciousness has made humanity more aware of its dependence on a nature that it did not create. Geneva 1966 emphasized both dominion and stewardship. Human beings survive and build civilizations by modifying the course of nature; they immobilize or eradicate some forms of life (the polio virus and smallpox bacillus) for the sake of human values. But in stewardship they are caretakers of an earth that was created before them. Furthermore, the mystery of creation extends far beyond human dominion or stewardship, as Job and some of the prophets knew well. The Pleiades and Orion were surely not created for human convenience.

At what point does the human use of nature become both irreverent and destructive to human aims? At what point do new biological sciences including genetic engineering become irreverent intrusions? When does a God-given "dominion" become an arrogant exercise in "playing God"? The ecumenical discussion continues.

Evaluations of technology. A closely related issue is the contrasting evaluations of technology. Some welcome technology as a product of human creativity, a force that liberates people from poverty and drudgery. Others, notably Jacques Ellul, the French lawyer-sociologist-theologian, see it as a dehumanizing power that subjects persons to an impersonal fate that is remarkably similar in all social systems. A third group see it as a neutral force that can be used for good or evil, depending on the purposes of its users or the social system in which it functions. The telephone, for example, is quite indifferent to the good or bad messages it transmits. A fourth group see it as inherently ambivalent, as all power is ambivalent. Power* is not evil; the purpose of much Christian action is the empowerment of people. Yet in a sinful world power is almost inevitably misused (see sin).

Power and inequality. Technology increases some human powers to cope with and make use of nature. But as C.S. Lewis pointed out, the new powers that people win over nature become powers of some people over other people. There are exceptions to that generalization: the victory over smallpox has been a human victory. But most technological advances, obviously in weapons and almost as obviously in economic productivity, enhance the power of some people to dominate other people.

The unequal distribution of technologies accentuates inequality. Research is directed primarily towards the projects of the rich and powerful, only slightly towards the problems of the poor. The international transfer of technologies, even when it purports to help the poor, often serves the interests of wealthy corporations and governments.

Similarly technology enhances the power of elites who understand and control it. The participatory society, often advocated by the WCC, may be frustrated when wise decisions depend on expert skills possessed by a few, who can use those skills for their own advantage.

Technology is a contributor to globalization. The WCC, like the UN, is greatly disturbed by the concentrations of power wrought by globalism, yet – again, like the UN – puzzled by the problems of coping with such power.

High risk. Scientists sometimes estimate that the human race is living in an era of higher risk than at any time since people first established their precarious existence in the face of hostile animals and natural forces. Through the centuries of history, people have exercised new powers in a trial-and-error method. They built upon experiments that succeeded; they abandoned experiments that failed. The new situation is that the failure of some experiments could mean disaster for humankind. The most obvious risk is the use of weapons that could destroy civilization. Less immediate is the risk of changing the climate of the earth through human interventions in the ecosystem. To cease experimentation would be to cease to be human; but rash experimentation is more portentous than in past eons.

The increase in risk comes at a time when political organizations are inadequate to cope with the issues. Acid rain, nuclear radiation, fluorocarbons, atmospheric carbon dioxide and a host of similar concerns have no respect for national boundaries. The unity of humankind,* long a matter of Christian faith, has new programmatic implications for science and technology.

Unprecedented ethical questions. In a world of high technology, individuals and societies face ethical decisions for which there are no direct precedents. The Bible, the theological tradition and the philosophical tradition have no commands: thou shalt (or shalt not) re-arrange DNA, prolong the lives of permanently comatose patients, use nuclear energy, contribute to vast climatic change by burning fossil fuels. The contemporary world must develop new ethical codes to deal with new problems and possibilities. Technology itself does not answer questions about the evaluation and direction of technology. Scientists frequently talk of problems for which there is "no technical fix"; but we must recognize there is likewise "no moral fix" in the sense of simply repeating rules from the past.

In some cases science and technology raise serious questions about the very nature of selfhood. Descartes (1596-1650) saw the human body as a mechanism, with the soul as a discrete entity lodged in the body. This dualism, in the tradition of Plato, contrasted with the Hebrew-Christian belief in the unity of body and soul. Further scientific discoveries tended to undermine it. Twentieth-century discoveries in genetics sometimes led to assertions of biological determinism. The WCC entered into studies of the theological and ethical aspects of genetics with a conference in Zurich, sponsored by Church and Society and by the Christian Medical Commission, in 1973.

Church and Society continued discussions and publications, which in some cases led to statements from the central committee and from world conferences and assemblies. Many member churches took up the subject. The chief issues included the relation of genetic determinism to freedom, warnings against racial and other prejudices in the history of eugenics, and the many ethical problems involved in the exercise of new scientific powers.

The ecumenical movement is developing methods of ethical inquiry in which people of diverse skills (technological, theological, cultural), diverse social situations and diverse ideologies can interact in assessing unprecedented ethical issues. The agenda extends far into the future.

See also globalization, economic; scientific world-view.

ROGER L. SHINN

■ P. Abrecht ed., Faith, Science and the Future: Preparatory Readings for the 1979 Conference of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1978
 ■ P. Abrecht & N. Koshy eds, Before It's Too Late: The Complete Record of the Public Hearing on Nuclear Weapons and Disarmament Organized by the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1983
 ■ C. Birch & P. Abrecht eds, Genetics and the Quality of Life, Oxford, Pergamon, 1975
 ■ R. Conway, Choices at the Heart of Technology: A Christian Perspective, Harrisburg PA, Trinity Press, 1999
 ■ R.L. Heilbroner, An Inquiry into the Human Prospect, Updated and Reconsidered for the 1980s, New York, Norton, 1980
 ■ E.F. Schumacher, Small is Beautiful: Economics As If People Mattered, New York, Harper & Row, 1973
 ■ R.L. Shinn, Forced Options: Social Decisions for the 21st Century, New York, Pilgrim, 1991
 ■ R.L. Shinn & P. Abrecht eds, Faith and Science in an Unjust World: Report of the World Council of Churches' Conference on Faith, Science and the Future, vol. 1: Plenary Presentations, vol. 2: Reports and Recommendations, WCC, 1980.

SCIENTIFIC WORLD-VIEW

THE TERM "scientific world-view" represents an imprecise but influential concept, arising from the modern revolutionary scientific developments originating in western Europe and spreading throughout the world. It is associated with such famous figures as Copernicus (1473-1543), Galileo (1564-1642), Descartes (1596-1650), Newton (1642-1727) and Darwin (1809-82). Their discoveries do not, of themselves, constitute a world-view, but the cultural reverberations of their work have contributed to a widespread and comprehensive understanding of reality.

There is no single scientific world-view, but the more ambitious formulations include some or all of the following propositions: (1) the universe can be understood as a mechanism of matter in motion, acting by strictly causal laws or some combination of causality and chance; (2) accurate understanding requires quantification of evidence; qualitative distinctions can be reduced to quantitative; (3) the earth, rather than being the centre of the universe, is only a satellite of one star within one of innumerable galaxies; (4) geographical and astronomical evidence shows that the earth is billions of years old; (5) the human race is the result of an evolutionary process, operating through random variations of genetic material and survival of the fittest; (6) persons are mechanisms; freedom, soul and responsibility are illusory; (7) many ethical principles, once thought to be immutable, are in fact cultural habits, rooted in particular histories.

Historically, the rise of the scientific world-view had various implications for theology. It presented obvious difficulties for those theologies that understood the Bible as a literal, scientific account of the world and history. But it then took several directions. Deism, popular in the 18th century, accepted God* as the first cause of the universe, but God was now remote and irrelevant to human affairs. Pantheism understood God as equivalent to nature* or (as in Spinoza) the basic rational principle in nature. Atheism* took science to be a refutation of God. Radical agnosticism found the idea of God irrelevant, as in the astronomer LaPlace's reply to Napoleon that he had "no need of that hypothesis". Positivism defined truth in terms of empirical verification and found all propositions about God, metaphysics and ethics to be neither true nor false but meaningless and nonsensical.

The modern scientific world-view is not entirely new. Ancient astronomers had rejected the geocentric view of the solar system. Democritus had taught that the world is constituted of matter and motion, operating deterministically according to causal laws. Epicurus added to the materialism of Democritus a factor of chance, a curious anticipation of modern theories of indeterminacy. But modern scientific world-views involved new comprehensive syntheses, influencing not only intellectual elites but also popular culture.

Theology responded in a variety of ways. Christians showed that exegetes through the ages had rarely interpreted all of scripture as a literal, scientific record. Kantians and neo-Kantians accepted science as an account of phenomena but not of the deeper noumenal reality of selfhood and God, a position akin to Platonic and some Oriental philosophies. Others, accepting the theological significance of science, have held that no world-view can be complete if it ignores such obvious elements of human experience as the ethical, the aesthetic and the religious. They have moved to a revision both of theological traditions and of science – a move helped by scientific developments that emphasize the relational character of all scientific understanding.

A 20th-century controversy about the scientific world-view centred in the work of Rudolf Bultmann, who argued that modern science requires a radical revision (a "demythologizing") of the Bible and traditional doctrine. Accepting a "scientific philosophy", he reinterpreted Christian faith as an expression of the Christian experience of freedom, anxiety and faith, eliminating "objective" and metaphysical interpretations. The Swiss philosopher Karl Jaspers replied that science "does not provide a total world-view" and that much of the scientific worldview is simply "modern scientific superstition".

Recent studies in the history of science emphasize a plurality of scientific world-views, thus relativizing monopolistic views of the past. Most influential of all has been the work of Thomas Kuhn, who has shown that science develops not by strict linear progress but by a series of "scientific revolutions", involving a change of "paradigms" and a reconstruction, often radical, of old knowledge. No paradigm (and consequently no scientific world-view) can claim absolute truth. Some philosophies (e.g. deconstruction and post-modernism) go much further, understanding science to be a matter of ideology or preference, more like changing styles of art than like claims to objective truth. Most practising scientists resist these tendencies in their more radical forms.

Both the Vatican and the WCC have given attention to the implications of science for theology. In general, they have endorsed scientific endeavours and affirmed the verified findings of science, while challenging some aspects of various scientific world-views and asking for further inquiry into others.

See also science and technology.

ROGER L. SHINN

- P. Abrecht ed., Faith, Science and the Future, WCC, 1980
- W.M. Horton, Theism and the Scientific Spirit, New York, Harper, 1933
- T.S. Kuhn, The Structure of Scientific Revolutions, 2nd ed., Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1970
- J. Monod, Chance and Necessity, New York, Knopf, 1971.

SCOTT, EDWARD WALTER

B. 30 April 1919, Edmonton, Canada. Scott became primate of the Anglican Church of Canada in 1971 and from 1975 to 1983 was moderator of the WCC central committee. Educated at the University of British Columbia and the Anglican Theological College in Vancouver, he was active in the Student Christian Movement, of which he was for five years the general secretary at the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg. In 1960 he became director of social service for the diocese of Rupert's Land and priest in charge of Indian work. He was associate secretary of the National Council for Social Services until his election as bishop of Kootenay in 1966. As an active supporter of ecumenical concerns, with pastoral gifts for prayer and reconciliation, he strongly believes that Christians must work across denominational lines on a variety of issues, although in no way denying the right of self-determination.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ E.S. Light ed., Man of Faith, Man of Action: Edward Scott, Toronto, Anglican Book Centre, 1981.

SCRIPTURE

SCRIPTURE is for Christians the Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments. From the viewpoint of the history of religions, the Bible may be compared for content and function with the scriptures* of some other faiths. Within Christianity, scripture is normally taken as the permanent written witness to God's history with the world and humankind, particularly with the elect people of Israel, and more particularly still with Jesus confessed as the Christ, Son of God and Lord – these particularities opening up again to the universal perspective and ultimate prospect of God's kingdom* and the completion of the human calling in it.

In the context of some such broad general agreement, many important issues concerning scripture have been the object of controversy within Christianity: the precise limits of scripture; the understanding of its divine inspiration; the methods of its interpretation; its relation to oral, practical and institutional tradition; its authority and use in the life of the church.

See Bible, its role in the ecumenical movement; canon; exegesis, methods of; hermeneutics; inspiration; New Testament and Christian unity; Old Testament and Christian unity; Tradition and traditions; word of God.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

■ M. Haudel, Die Bibel und die Einheit der Kirchen: Eine Untersuchung der Studien von "Glaube und Kirchenverfassung", Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1993 ■ H.O. Old, The Reading and Preaching of the Scriptures in the Worship of the Christian Church, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1998ff. ■ H.C. Skillrud, J.F. Stafford, D.F. Martensen eds, Scripture and Tradition, Minneapolis, Augsburg Fortress, 1995 ■ G. Tavard, "The Bible in Ecumenism", in OC, 32, 4, 1996.

SCRIPTURES

SCRIPTURES are written texts, believed to be of supernatural revelation and preceded by oral traditions of varying lengths, found in the major historical religions. The scriptures are used in public and private rituals and are interpreted by professional priests or scholars, providing standards of faith. A canon* (or "rule") indicates the books accepted as authoritative.

Christianity is unique in incorporating in its Bible the scriptures of its parent religion, Judaism, as an Old Testament, or covenant, preparatory to the New Testament. It is also unusual in providing detailed accounts of the life of its founder (in the four gospels) in its sacred canon. The earliest Christians were Jews, but the NT was written in Greek, and its authors normally used the Greek Septuagint version of the OT. Partly in response to 2nd-century Marcionism, which rejected the OT and some of the Christian writings which had already gained authority, the church established a NT canon, with the gospels and 13 epistles of Paul as the core; there were doubts for some time, however, about books such as Hebrews and Revelation. Reading of the scriptures has always formed part of public worship, with law and prophets alongside epistle and gospel in the liturgy.* Readings in the West long continued in Latin, even when the modern languages had developed. At the Reformation, many vernacular translations were made, and public and private Bible study flourished. The United Bible Society reported that, in complete or partial form, the Bible was available in the year 2000 in 2261 languages.

Jews usually prefer to speak of the Hebrew Bible, rather than the OT, Hebrew being the language in which all except a few chapters were written. The canon traditionally consists of 24 books, but with sub-division such as the "minor" prophets there is a total of 39. These fall into three sections: torah, "teaching", or "law", also called the Pentateuch, or "five books"; nevi'im, "prophets", including early historical books and major and minor prophets; ketuwim, “writings”, including Psalms, Proverbs, Job and some later history. It is an article of faith among Orthodox Jews that the torah was written by Moses, but liberal Jewish and Christian writers see it as coming from various hands and dates. The written torah was the sole authority for priestly Sadducees, but Pharisees used an oral torah to complement it, which was developed in the Mishnah (“repetition”) and in vast commentaries of the Talmud (“instruction”), revered and studied next in importance to the Bible. The Bible, especially the torah, is read in Hebrew in public worship, with some use of the vernacular today.

The Qur’an (“recitation”) is the basic scripture of Islam, in 114 suras, or chapters. After an opening prayer these are arranged roughly with the longest first (similar to the Jewish arrangement of the prophets or the Christian ordering of the Pauline epistles). The Qur’an is regarded as the very word of God (Allāh), and commentators quote it as “God said”. Fiqh Akbar II, a creed of the 10th century, declared that “our pronouncing, writing and reciting the Qur’an is created, whereas the Qur’an itself is uncreated”. It is believed that the Qur’an was revealed to the prophet Muhammad by the angel Gabriel from A.D. 610 to 632 in Mecca and Medina, that the prophet was illiterate, and that the book was written down later from “scraps of parchment and leather... and the breasts of men”. The Qur’an recognizes that Moses received the Torah from God, David the Zabūr, or Psalms, and Jesus the Injil, or Evangel. Although there are many biblical stories in the Qur’an, it is held that the versions in the Qur’an are perfect and final. Recitation of verses from the Qur’an in Arabic forms the basis of the five ritual daily prayers (salāt) required of all Muslims and used in communal mosque worship, especially Friday prayer. The Qur’an contains religious and moral teachings, but biographies of Muhammad came much later and are not canonical. Next to the Qur’an are Hadith, lengthy “traditions”, which provide guidance for many aspects of life but which are debated today, while the Qur’an remains uncriticized.

The Bahā’is also recognize that previous revelations were given to Moses, Jesus, Zoroaster and Buddha, but by placing their own leaders as prophets after Muhammad, they aroused fierce persecutions from Muslims, and again recently in Iran. Bahā’i scriptures comprise Arabic and Persian writings of the Iranian Bāb (1819-50) and Bahā’ Allāh (1817-92) as verbally inspired revelations, followed by infallible commentaries of “Abd al-Bahā” (1844-1921). Much remains in manuscript, but short selections have been translated into many languages.

Zoroastrianism, from Iran but chiefly now represented by small communities of Parsees in India, had a long tradition of oral texts, but like the Hindus they were loath to use the alien art of writing for sacred purposes. The dates of Zoroaster (Zarathushtra) are debated, perhaps before 1000 B.C., and the Avesta scriptures were set down in a special alphabet about the 5th century A.D. All the Avesta are anonymous except for 17 hymns attributed to Zoroaster himself, called Gāthās (“songs”). The texts have long been employed as mantras (“sacred words”) used in prayers and rituals five times daily. Zand (or Zend) commentaries on the Avesta are secondary. Many of the texts have been translated, but some translations need revision.

Hindu scriptures are vast and amorphous, after the manner of Indian religion itself. Ancient texts were composed and recited by a Brahmin priestly elite but, like the Zoroastrian, not written down for over a millennium, and there were a great many other works. Distinction was made between shruti, or “heard” by sages from gods (i.e. direct revelation), and smriti, or “remembered”, traditional religious and legal teachings. The oldest texts were hymns of the Vedas (“knowledge”) – Rig, Sama, Yajur and Atharva – followed by Brahmanas with priestly rituals and myths. Important philosophical speculations followed in Upanishads (“sessions”), which are Vedānta, or “Veda’s end”. This title is also applied to one of six schools of philosophy which includes great thinkers like Sankara and Rāmānuja, who clinch arguments by quoting Vedic texts as “scripture declares”. Then came two great epic poems, Rāmāyana and Mahābhārata, the latter including the short Bhagavad-Gītā, or “Lord’s Song”, the revelation of Krishna, best known of all translated Hindu texts in the West. Priests performed rituals three times daily, with recitations of mantras, and for other Hindus there are countless texts and hymns for communal and private worship. Vedas and epics are in Sanskrit, and other texts are in many of the Indian languages, small portions of which have been translated into European languages.

The Sikhs, or “disciples” of the Indian Guru Nanak and his successors, have as scriptures the Adi Granth (“first book”) or Guru Granth Sahib (“revered book”). The latter comprises religious teachings in metrical form of the ten Sikh gurus, or “teachers”, the first collection made by the fifth guru Arjan in 1604, and the last recension by the tenth and last guru, Gobind Singh, in 1706. The Adi Granth includes verses of some Hindu and Muslim teachers of comparable outlook, but not from Hindu Vedic scriptures. Lives of the ten gurus are in later, popular hagiographies. A Dasam Granth, “book of the tenth [Guru]”, includes teachings and legends. The Adi Granth is written in Gurmukhi, the script of modern Punjabi; it is chanted in temples by congregations led by musicians and is read in homes daily.

Numerically small but ancient, the Jains of India have extensive canonical scriptures differing between the Shvetāmbara (“white-clad” Jains) and the Digambara (“sky-clad”). The former claim 45 collections, and the Digambara have two older texts and dispute the language and form of the canon. Of the 45 texts, 8 have been translated into European languages. Jain monks and nuns recite texts and engage in study, meditation and physical discipline, while the laity take part in communal worship and pilgrimages.

Buddhism was roughly contemporary with Jainism, also arising in India in the 5th or 6th century B.C. and rejecting Hindu scriptures. Among innumerable schools and texts broad distinction is made between Theravāda, or “doctrine of the elders” (also called Hīnayāna, “small vehicle”, by opponents), and Mahāyāna, or “great vehicle”; these schools roughly correspond to the geographical regions of southern and northern or eastern Asia. The Theravāda canon is in Tripiṭaka (or Tripitaka, i.e. “three baskets”); the first is Vinaya (“discipline”), and the third is Abhi-dhamma (higher “dhamma”, or doctrine of philosophical analysis). The second “basket” is the most important and popular, comprising the Sutta (“texts”), long discourses about the Buddha and other subjects, of many dates, but with no detailed life of Gautama Buddha. Mahāyāna canons, in China, Korea and Japan, include versions of the Tripiṭaka with many other texts from different schools. The most famous is the Lotus Sutra (Saddharmapundarika), which has been called “the gospel of half Asia”, and whose 24th chapter of devotion to a personal lord is recited by Zen and Nichiren adepts even when they reject other scriptures. Tibetan Buddhism has two great canonical collections, translations of Indian works, and an enormous corpus of its own, much untranslated and unpublished.

Buddhism so pervaded Chinese and Japanese life that its scriptures provided texts for many occasions, notably funerals. Of native Chinese writings there was a canon of five so-called Confucian Classics, though the teachings of Confucius were mostly in a short work, the *Analec*s (Lun Yü). The Classics were for centuries the basis of Confucian learning, and examinations on them gave entrance into official positions. After modern revolutions the Little Red Book of Mao Tse-Tung (Zedong) was used with almost religious awe by his followers. A Chinese Taoist canon of sacred texts served for ritual and festal purposes, as well as for exorcisms and alchemy. The Lao Tzu, or Tao Te Ching, inspired thinkers; its short 81 chapters have been widely translated.

Japanese native Shinto had ancient mythology, but it was not written down till the 8th century A.D., and then in Chinese, the Kojiki and Nihongi. These were not canonical scriptures comparable to the Tripiṭaka or Classics, so that in Neo-Shinto in the 19th century attempts were made to canonize not only the oldest annals but also ancient hymns and prayers. New Shinto groups also, such as Tenri-kyo, produced modern scriptures for use in worship, which are widely popular.

In cultures where writing was unknown, there were nevertheless traditional rituals accompanied by oral verses which often dated back centuries, and some have been rescued and preserved in modern studies. To some extent religious art was a form of scripture, representing beliefs and hopes.

Scriptural religions have great advantages: canons of texts, ancient history, and international influence. These factors partly account for the modern success of Christianity and Islam, in particular in Africa, and to a lesser extent of Hindu and Buddhist thought in Europe and America.

See also dialogue, interfaith.

GEOFFREY PARRINDER

■ J. Barr, The Bible in the Modern World, London, SCM Press, 1980 ■ E. Conze, Buddhist Scriptures, Harmondsworth, Penguin, 1959 ■ H. Coward ed., Experiencing Scripture in World Religions, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 2000 ■ J.R. Hinnells ed., A Handbook of Living Religions, Harmondsworth, Penguin, 1984 ■ J.S. Mbiti, The Prayers of African Religion, London, SPCK, 1975 ■ W.M. Watt, Bell's Introduction to the Qur'an, Edinburgh, Edinburgh UP, 1970 ■ R.C. Zaehner, Hindu Scriptures, London, Dent, 1966.

SECTS

THE WORD "SECT" (Latin secta, from sequi, to follow, i.e. a teacher or teaching; a translation of the Greek hairesis, originally a choice – see heresy) has acquired a special meaning and force in Christian language, particularly in the context of ecclesiology. From the outset, although it sometimes meant simply a particular school or party (see Acts 5:17, 24:5, 26:5) without conveying disapproval or stigma, its dominant reference was to a group which either broke off from the church* or formed independently as a separatist body within the traditional Christian world, in opposition to the church.

Sects were accused – and the accusation still clings to the word – of falsifying the gospel, apostasy from the church's faith, separation from the Body of Christ, arrogance, and leading souls astray, even to damnation. In countries where Christianity became dominant, "sectarians" were accused also of endangering the unity of the nation and of undermining prevailing standards. Thus the term is clearly negative. Those who belong to a sect have been written off in church and society, especially in Europe. The accusatory term should no longer be used, however, especially by Christians and churches which consistently advocate freedom of belief, civil religious liberty, and the unrestricted formation of religious groups.

The sociology of religion has tried to employ the term in a neutral sense, e.g. to refer to a relatively small religious group which has split off from a larger one; a new lively community as opposed to an inactive traditional community; a voluntary association of individuals with a personal faith, as opposed to the church as an establishment for salvation into which one has been born (Max Weber, Ernst Troeltsch); an alternative group as opposed not to the church but to society as such (Gerardus van der Leeuw). These sociological attempts, however, remain within the academic sphere. They carry little conviction, because none of these terms can do justice to the variety of phenomena. But above all, one cannot disregard the history of the term; it carries such heavy negative connotations that it cannot again be understood in a neutral sense.

Historians of religion look at secondary formations of religious groups within the sphere of influence of a dominant religion and should choose a general term such as "religious communities". These groups are then differentiated according to their origins, age, size, influence; their relation to the parent religion, to other religious groups, and to the surrounding culture which sustain them; and their effects on individuals and society. In all these points groups may change throughout their history and then must be assessed differently.

A "sect" is not simply removed from the world because of changed terminology. Phenomenologically, one can speak of a sectarian attitude and mentality (Joachim Wach) also within the churches. The marks of such a sectarian mentality are: some traditional articles of faith are so over-emphasized that they squeeze Christ and his gospel out of the central place in the faith; new doctrines and forms of belief, which are beyond the Bible and church tradition, acquire central importance and they become a means of distinguishing the members from all other Christians; the religious and spiritual horizon is narrowed. The sectarians are detached from the world and exclusive, and their group-related self-understanding makes church fellowship impossible and often creates social isolation. Accordingly, the “sectarian” and the “sectarian group” is a type of religious adherence.

In the context of ecumenical ecclesiological studies, the following distinctions should be drawn (allowing for overlaps and constant changes).

(1) Churches in the Christian tradition which have more or less fellowship with each other: the historical churches, those in traditionally Christian countries that have detached themselves from the dominant (often a state) church, and “mission” or “young” churches; (2) Christian denominations and congregations which have separated from the church fellowship or have newly come into existence alongside the churches and live independently or as separatist groups (e.g. Adventist, Apostolic and many Pentecostal communities, African Independent Churches); (3) groups whose approach to faith and whose doctrines and practices are alien to the biblical Christian tradition and in some circumstances are directed against it (e.g. spiritualist and gnostic-esoteric communities and those which believe in a new revelation, as the Latter-Day Saints [Mormons]); (4) syncretistic formations where the non-Christian element predominates (e.g. Christian Science, communities of Christians characterized by anthroposophy) and tends to the establishment of new religions.

Religious groups which originate outside the Christian tradition do not count as “sects” but as offshoots from other religions. In the USA the term “cult” has appeared in the last few decades for those new groups with a high conflict potential which stand outside the mainstream of Christianity and are in fact hostile to the prevailing society and its cultural values. In general, one notices an increasing religious pluralism even in countries with an established Christian tradition, and this trend is obliging the churches to strengthen their efforts for giving a Christian response as they encounter other types of belief.

HANS DIETHER REIMER

■ D.V. Barrett, Sects, Cults and Alternative Religions: A World Survey and Sourcebook, London, Blandford, 1996 ■ K. Hutten, “Seher, Grübler, Enthusiasten”, in Das Buch der traditionellen Sekten und religiösen Sonderbewegungen, Stuttgart, Quell, 1982 ■ J.G. Melton, Encyclopedic Handbook of Cults in America, New York, Garland, 1992 ■ H. Reller, H. Krech, M. Kleiminger eds, Handbuch Religiöse Gemeinschaften, Gütersloh, Gütersloher Verlagshaus Mohn, 2000 ■ M. Tierney, The New Elect: The Church and New Religious Groups, Dublin, Veritas, 1985 ■ H. Turner, Bibliography of New Religious Movements in Primal Societies, 2 vols, Boston, Hall, 1977-78.

SECULARIZATION

THE LATIN WORD saeculum denotes a limited but extended period of time: a human generation, a century (French siècle), or simply an age. It is still so used, e.g. in speaking of the secular appearance of a comet or the secular cooling of the earth.

The word entered Christian vocabulary as the consistent Vulgate translation of the Greek New Testament word aiōn, “age” (sometimes confusingly translated “world”), in all the variety of its meanings. It is this age, created by God (Heb. 1:2), when we marry and are given in marriage (Luke 20:34), in which we are to do good to our neighbours (1 Tim. 6:17), but whose cares can steal our minds from the promise of God (Mark 4:19). It is an age ruled by powers blind to God’s promise in their false wisdom (1 Cor. 2:6-8), to whose values and standards we are not to be conformed (Rom. 12:2) and which will end in the judgment of God (Matt. 24), to be followed by an age to come in which the faithful will have eternal life (Luke 18:30). The saeculum in the NT is the history* which God has created, the time in which God works in judgment and grace.* It is also the history of human sin* and rebellion, of powers that exalt themselves, of wisdom that is ephemeral because it is not rooted in faith* and obedience. But the kingdom to which the faithful look forward, and according to which they live, is also a saeculum, a redeemed, everlasting (aiōnios) age to come, but still an age.

The Vulgate, however, did not so translate. The Greek aiōnios became the Latin aeterna, obscuring its relation to the word “age”. Justification for this translation could be found in Plato’s Timaeus, where aiōn means not time but timelessness, the unchanging reality of true forms, with an eye to which imperfect things of this world have their time (chronos) and decay.

Subtly, never completely but nevertheless dominantly, the saeculum came to be identified with the temporal, and the eternal with the timeless and unchanging. The saeculum was no longer the sphere in which discipleship could be most fully learned and practised; now it was reserved for the religious discipline of the monastery. It was no longer the historical time that lived in expectation of the coming of the Redeemer, realizing the promise of that coming in the events of the present age. Rather, in medieval Christendom, a hierarchical relation developed between secular estates of human life and work, affirmed as God's good creation, and the religious life in the service of the church, whose goal is the eternal contemplation of God.

This distinction is preserved in the Roman Catholic Church to this day. The code of canon law reserves the term "religious" or "consecrated life" for those who "profess the evangelical counsels of chastity, poverty and obedience by vows or other sacred bonds" and who live "in institutes of consecrated life canonically erected by competent church authority" (canon 573). "Secular" clergy serve the church in normal parish situations while still practising a religious discipline. For the rest, secular activities are commended to the laity as their mission (canon 225) and strictly forbidden to clergy as "unbecoming to their state" (canon 285). Secularization is mentioned only once: the unfrocking of a priest for due cause. The Catholic Encyclopedia, however, uses the term also for the removal of property or of functions, in themselves quite secular (lands, schools, hospitals, orphanages et al.), from the control of the (Roman) church.

In Latin America the term has been used in this sense, particularly in the 19th century, when liberal governments, with the support of freemasons, positivists and Protestant minorities, challenged the control of the Roman Catholic Church in the field of education and certain civil functions (e.g. the record of births and the celebration of marriages). This issue was understood by Protestants as a struggle for religious freedom and equal rights for all, and the debate about some still-remaining limitations (chaplaincies, eligibility for some public offices) still produces tension and continues as a subject of dialogue in ecumenical relations.

THE PROCESS

The meaning of "secular" for the present time, however, is determined by two other factors: the mid-20th-century discovery of how deep and broad the process of secularization has become among not only structures and powers of the common life but also methods of thought and ways of perceiving reality, and the theological recovery of the biblical meaning of the word as a context of the work of God and the mission* of the church.*

Dietrich Bonhoeffer described secularization, in a letter from prison in 1944, as a movement "towards the autonomy of man, in which I would include the discovery of the laws by which the world lives and deals with itself in science, social and political matters, art, ethics and religion". The world has reached adulthood; it no longer needs the working hypothesis "God" to make sense of reality and to solve the problems of human life. Secularization is, in the words of an Ecumenical Institute (Bossey) report in 1959, "the withdrawal of areas of life and thought from religious – and finally also from metaphysical – control and the attempt to understand and live in these areas in the terms which they alone offer".

Secularization is not a world-view but a process. Its essence is a change in the method of human thought and action. Total coherence is no longer sought. Various sciences concentrate on specialized areas in which their findings can be experimentally validated. Various technologies aim at the working effectiveness of their operations (see science and technology).

Universal structures of meaning, whether religious or otherwise, are irrelevant to this enterprise. Human beings no longer live in embracing communities that determine their values and judge their actions; rather, they live in the anonymity of the city (Harvey Cox), where they are free to move about, to choose their own associations and the direction of their lives. Even religion,* where accepted, is validated by its usefulness for social coherence (Emile Durkheim), for psychological health or for good human relations.

THE IDEOLOGY

Secularization is a habit of mind and a way of life, a trend of human events, not a philosophy. Not surprisingly, however, it has been accompanied by repeated efforts to give it a world-view which would show its powers and tendencies to be hopeful and liberating and which give them a particular direction (see ideology). These forms of secularist humanism have been many and varied, ranging from idealism to pragmatism to materialism; from economic liberalism to revolutionary Marxism to anarchism. One such philosophy defined by the British writer G.J. Holyoake took the name "secularism". It was a system of ethical principles based on four premises: (1) primary emphasis on the material and cultural improvement of humanity; (2) respect for and search for all truth, from whatever source, which can be tested in experience as leading to human betterment; (3) concern for the improvement of this world and not for another; (4) an independent rational morality.

Utilitarian in its ethics, idealistic in its optimistic view of human nature, and pragmatic in its radical epistemological relativism, Holyoake's secularism was a moral-humanist reaction against the Christianity of his time. It was a good example of the secularism which concerned the Jerusalem conference of the International Missionary Council in 1928, defined there by Rufus Jones as "a way of life and an interpretation of life that include only the natural order of things and that do not find God or a realm of spiritual reality essential for life or thought". The Jerusalem conference treated secularism as one of the religions of the modern world with many positive values – freedom, idealism and devotion to the common good – which needs to find its fulfilment, as do all other religions, in the spirit of Jesus Christ.

But this theology of continuity between humanist ideologies and Christian faith ran counter both to the insights of dialectical theology (Emil Brunner, Karl Barth, Hendrik Kraemer) and to the process of secularization itself. Bonhoeffer recognized that his non-religious colleagues in the struggle against Hitler retained no humanist illusions. Confidence in natural human morality and progress has been undermined by the success of science and technology itself in releasing nuclear energy and in manipulating the human environment. Political economic formulas for human salvation, both socialist and capitalist, have lost credibility by their performance in power. Secularized methods of thought and action produce phenomena that defy all attempts – religious or secularist – to incorporate them into a total system of meaning and hope.

THE THEOLOGY

By what faith and in what hope, then, can secularization be endured without falling into nihilism (Helmut Thielicke) or into a practical polytheism (H.R. Niebuhr)? Some maintain that it is not possible. "Secularization, as religionless neutrality, exists not as an end product but only as a process, that is, only in contrast to Christian religion or in its reflected light. If the latter is lacking, a vacuum arises which sucks in religious or pseudo-religious powers" (Wilhelm Hahn). Barth is ambivalent on the subject. On the one hand, his critique of human religion (Church Dogmatics I/2) and his affirmation of secular inquiry concerning both nature and humanity outside the context of faith, just in so far as it does not erect new world-views (III/2), seem to affirm secularized existence in the context of divine grace. On the other hand, Barth explicitly rejects Bonhoeffer's understanding of humanity as mature in its secularity apart from faith (The Humanity of God).

A clear positive theology of secularization owes its origin to Bonhoeffer and to Friedrich Gogarten. For Bonhoeffer, Christ confronts the world not in its weakness and dependency on religious or other world-views but at the strong points of human health and responsibility. "It is not the religious act that makes the Christian but participation in the sufferings of God in the secular life. That is metanoia, not in the first place thinking about one's own needs, problems, sins and fears, but allowing oneself to be caught up in the way of Jesus Christ." Bonhoeffer is clear that a sinful, godless world must still be brought to repentance and new life in Christ, but the sins of which it must repent are first of all those of its powers and vigour amid the responsibilities where human problems are faced and dealt with. Christ, the ultimate reality of the world, takes form in the world in order that the world, in its penultimate secularity, may move towards its ultimate redemption in him (Ethics).

Gogarten links secularization directly to the faith of the Reformation. Justified by grace alone, the Christian is free to participate in the sonship of Jesus Christ. This participation is the manner of human creatureliness, and with it human beings receive the world to rule over responsibly. In Christ the world is known not in the wholeness of its structure and destiny but historically, in the promise of its participation in God's creative and redemptive work. The church's secular attitude in faith "knows the limits of its reason yet does not give up the question which God has planted in the human mind about the wholeness of all things. It lives in expectant relativity." The scientific technological development of modern times is not only acceptable in God's sight; in its relativity it is called to strive for wholeness under God's blessing, threatened with God's judgment when it erects its own myth or ideology, but affirmed in its secularity.

The ecumenical influence of this theology has been widespread. In 1959 a conference of university teachers at the Ecumenical Institute, Bossey, examined the process of secularization in various disciplines of the university – philosophy, the physical sciences, sociology, and the humanities – in an effort to discern the form of Christian responsibility and theological insight with relation to them. One interesting fruit of this conference was testimony from Japan and from India that secularization is also a phenomenon in those religious contexts as it is most radically in China.

The implications of this fact for the mission of the Christian church are large. They were given full expression by A.T. van Leeuwen in his Christianity in World History (1964). In van Leeuwen's view, the whole of Western and now of world history should be understood in terms of the historicizing impact of Christian mission rooted in the biblical history which preceded it. The rule of structures of being (ontocracies), whether mythological or rationalistic, which understood the world as divided between eternal order and shifting time, has been continually challenged by God's choice of a people with a secular message of redemption and fulfilment for the world. The historical promise of the gospel continually breaks through sacred structures, Christian and non-Christian, which limit human history and hope. It foments revolution against these structures in the name of the promise of God. Western history, and now world history, in van Leeuwen's view, is the story of this interaction. Thus the gospel of the kingdom both judges and inspires secular history with its promise. Cox in his immensely popular Secular City presented the same message in the US. Ecumenical studies in evangelism were preoccupied in the 1960s with the question of the form of the church as witness to the secular promise of God.

Recent events raise questions about van Leeuwen's confident prediction that secularization, challenged and inspired by the gospel, is the wave of the future. Religious revivals of varying intensities have arisen in reaction to the ongoing technological logic and power of the secularizing process. Ideologies have become more popular as rallying cries, even as their power to explain reality disintegrates. Theologically, however, the question bequeathed to us by the NT text itself, properly understood, remains: What is the significance of the saeculum – of this age – as the time and place of God's revelation in Christ? And then, what is its relation to the age to come?

See also church and world, unity of humankind.

CHARLES C. WEST

- D. Bonhoeffer, Widerstand und Ergebung (ET Letters and Papers from Prison, London, SCM Press, 1972) ■ J.F. Childress & D.B. Harned eds, Secularization and the Protestant Prospect, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1970 ■ H. Cox, The Secular City, London, SCM Press, 1965 ■ F. Gogarten, Verhängnis und Hoffnung der Neuzeit (ET Despair and Hope for Our Time, Philadelphia, Pilgrim, 1970) ■ A.T. van Leeuwen, Christianity in World History, London, Edinburgh House, 1964 ■ L. Newbigin, Honest Religion for Secular Man, London, SCM Press, 1966 ■ R.G. Smith, Secular Christianity, London, Collins, 1966 ■ C.C. West, The Meaning of the Secular, Ecumenical Institute, Bossey, Sept. 1959.

SEDOS

THE SERVICE of Documentation and Study facilitates Roman Catholic religious and missionary institutes of men and women in combining their resources for more effective service to the church in its missionary activities. SEDOS was founded after Vatican II* (1966) by superiors general whose congregations are committed to mission work, e.g. Jesuits, Society of Divine Word, Society of African Missions, Franciscan Missionary Sisters, Medical Mission Sisters, Christian Brothers. In 2002, SEDOS included 108 member congregations – 47 of men, 61 of women. The combined total membership is over 250,000. In most cases, the general headquarters of these groups are in Rome, as is the SEDOS secretariat.

SEDOS maintains a documentation library on trends and experiences in mission, holds an annual missionary week, organizes research seminars and study sessions, and collaborates with other research centres and international agencies specializing in missiology and related disciplines. SEDOS and its member communities closely collaborate with the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity* and the WCC's Mission and Evangelism team. The secretariat receives Catholic, Anglican, Protestant and Orthodox mission leaders and specialists who pass through Rome. It publishes the monthly SEDOS (bilingual, English and French). The book Trends in Mission (Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1991) presents SEDOS conference and seminar materials on developments in mission theology and practice.

See also missionary societies, religious communities.

TOM STRANSKY

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST CHURCH

THE SDAC IS the largest Adventist denomination which came out of the early 19th-century advent awakening in North America. Though their immediate roots are found in Millerism and its emphasis on the second coming of Christ, SDAs see themselves as being in apostolic succession with the doctrines and message of the New Testament church and in harmony with the basic principles of the Protestant Reformation.

The SDAC is a conservative Christian movement, largely evangelical in doctrine and professing no creed but the Bible. Nevertheless, SDAs affirm 27 fundamental beliefs, many of which they share with other Christians, such as the Trinity,* salvation by faith in Jesus Christ alone and the unconditional authority of the Bible. They also observe the biblical seventh day of the week as the sabbath. They practise believer's baptism by immersion and include foot washing as part of the communion service (Lord's supper). They also believe in eternal life as the gift of God. The saved receive immortality at the time of the resurrection, which takes place at the second coming of Christ, prior to the millennium (see millennialism). Adventists believe also in the priesthood of Jesus as Intercessor and Judge.

Because the body is the temple of the Holy Spirit, SDAs believe they are to care intelligently for both their spiritual and their physical health. In aiming at the most healthful diet, they abstain from certain foods, alcoholic beverages and other drugs, including tobacco. The modern packaged breakfast-cereal industry owes its origin to the SDAC and its emphasis on health.

In its polity, the SDAC has a blend of representative and congregational forms of government. The local church* determines membership. Several churches in an area form conferences (or missions), several conferences form unions, and the almost 100 unions form the SDA general conference. Between constituency meetings, the church on each level is administered by executive committees, officers and departmental directors.

The conference meets every five years. Delegates (now approximately 2000) come from every part of the world, and observers from Christian World Communions* are invited to attend. This meeting "synthesizes and implements church organization on a world scale" and elects conference and division officers and departmental directors for the ensuing period. Only the sessions can change the general conference constitution and the Church Manual, which includes the fundamental beliefs, standards of church membership and matters regarding the operation of local churches.

According to SDAC statistics for 1999, the adult baptized membership numbered 10.9 million (92% outside of North America) in 47,000 local churches, 490 conferences, just under 6000 schools (elementary through university level), 684 health-care institutions, and organized church work in 204 countries or political areas. To support their worldwide pastoral ministry and evangelistic outreach, SDAs give free-will offerings and practise tithing, although it is not a test of fellowship.

Though the SDAC is not a member of the organized ecumenical movement, it recognizes those church agencies that lift up Christ as a part of the divine plan for the evangelization of the world and holds in high esteem fellow Christians in other communions who are engaged in winning souls for Christ. The SDAC is regularly represented through observers or advisers at WCC and other church meetings. For many years, a Seventh-day Adventist was a member of the WCC Faith and Order* commission in a personal capacity. The SDAC has participated in dialogues with the WCC and various religious bodies and since 1968 has been represented at the conference of secretaries of Christian World Communions.* More recently, the SDAC has been represented at the annual conference of US church leaders. Christian World Communions and various churches have responded to the SDA invitation and sent observers to sessions of the general conference.

Seventh-day Adventists recognize that true religion is based on conscience and conviction. No selfish or traditional tie should hold any church member to one's communion, except the belief that in this way he or she finds true connection to Christ. Because of its understanding of the gospel commission's mandate, the SDAC acknowledges the rights of all religious persuasions to operate without geographical restrictions. The SDAC wishes to preach the "everlasting gospel" to every nation and people in the spirit of Christian courtesy, frankness and fairness.

BERT B. BEACH

B. Beach, Ecumenism – Boon or Bane?, Washington DC, Review & Herald, 1974 ■ W.R. Beach & B.B. Beach, Pattern for Progress: The Role and Function of Church Organization, Washington DC, Review & Herald, 1985 ■ Handbook of Seventh-day Adventist Theology, Washington DC, Review & Herald, 2000 ■ Lutherans and Adventists in Conversation: Report and Papers presented, 1994-1998, Silver Spring MD, General Conference of Seventh-Day Adventists, 2000 ■ Seventh-day Adventist Encyclopedia, Washington, DC, Review & Herald, 1996.

SEXISM

THE TERM "sexism" was introduced into the ecumenical debate mainly through the 1974 consultation in West Berlin on "Sexism in the 1970s: Discrimination against Women". Both before and after that time, women (and men) in the ecumenical movement have addressed the problem of sexism within the churches and the WCC. Sexism, an ideology* of male supremacy and superiority which deprives women of their equal status with men, is defined as discrimination of a person on the basis of sex (as racism* discriminates on the basis of skin colour). Some controversy exists within the women's movement about the inter-relationship of sexism and other forms of oppression like racism or classism (Is sexism more fundamental than racism or classism? How do white middle-class women express solidarity with black poor women?). Sexism, combined with racism or classism, clearly puts women at the lowest end of the social ladder and subjects them to double or triple oppression. Women themselves can also act as agents of oppression of other women.

Sexism is a manifestation of patriarchy, a system in which highest value is given to the father. All others are subordinated to a hierarchical order (roughly, from men down to women, children, slaves, animals and finally nature. Women are seen as weaker than and inferior to men, needing male protection and (esp. spiritual) guidance (i.e. "paternalism").

In a process of growing awareness, women discovered that sexist thinking is created, supported and maintained by law,* culture* and religion.* Sexist thinking is also deeply ingrained in many women's self-perception as helpless, incapable and weak. Feminist scholarship "discovered" that the Bible was written within the patriarchal context of Palestine and the Roman empire. The Judaeo-Christian tradition is accused of, consciously or unconsciously, perpetuating sexism by its symbol systems (e.g. an all-male Trinity: Father, Son and [male] Holy Spirit), its patriarchal structure (headed only by male popes and bishops); its teaching, language, art and so on. All of these elements imply women's inferiority or unworthiness. This critique emerged in a systematic way beginning only in the middle of the 20th century since the time women gained access to learning and teaching theology in the universities and theological colleges.

Sexism has raised several objections to patriarchal theology. The Bible, being itself shaped by patriarchal values, has over the centuries been interpreted exclusively by men, i.e. from a male perspective. Female participation in shaping cult and theology has been marginalized, suppressed, even denied altogether in church history, although the role of women was prominent in the Jesus movement and the early church. From the early church fathers to today, women are presented as possessing less of the image of God than males (note that they were created only from "Adam's rib"), therefore they are non-normative, belonging to the realm of nature or flesh over against the realm of the spirit. Patriarchal theology has blamed women for the first sin and justified their subordination under men as God-given punishment. It has stressed women's bodily "impurity" in menstruation and childbirth and equates women with sexual temptation ("eternal Eve"), while Mariology presents Mary as an unobtainable role model ("Virgin mother").

The church has excluded women from the representation of the divine and of Christ in church leadership and thus perpetuated male superiority and male power. It has barred women's access to the ordained ministry. It has excluded women from the language of liturgy, confessions, hymns and prayers (referring to "men", "fathers", "brotherhood" only) and has encouraged women to be "silent in the church" and rendered them invisible in church history. The church has given women no access to theology and spiritual formation and has discriminated against girls in baptismal rites (in some Orthodox churches a baby boy, but not a baby girl, is laid on the altar). It re-enforces subordination of women through marriage liturgies and has applied Christian values like humility and self-denial mainly to women.

Finally, the church sustains stereotyped role models for women by stressing their subsidiary role as "helpmate", commonly appealing to Martha (Luke 10:38-40).

The most radical critique from post-Christian feminists accuses the churches of being the ideological backbone and stronghold of sexist practices ("If God is male, then the male is God", Mary Daly). Against such accusations and in the interest of restoring the truth of the gospel as expressed in Gal. 3:28 ("there is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male or female; for all of you are one in Christ Jesus"), many programmes and initiatives have emerged within the WCC: the women's forum in the fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975); the "Community of Women and Men in the Church"* study and the Sheffield consultation (1981); the strong participation of women in all areas of the sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983) as drafters, speakers, preachers, leaders, and the pre-assembly women's meeting; the Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women.*

In all these meetings and programmes it was stressed that sexism in the churches needs to be eradicated through (1) advocacy for women's full access and participation in the leadership of the churches; (2) the ordination of women* to the priesthood (which is not accepted mainly by the Orthodox member churches of WCC); (3) elimination of sexist language and practices; (4) re-reading of the Bible and the Tradition from women's perspective; (5) equal opportunities for women in all fields of life (employment and pay, education and health, esp. within the structures of the churches).

The discussion about the extent of sexism in the churches and its abolition, however, has proved to be one of the most controversial issues in the present ecumenical movement. The ordination of the first black woman as Episcopalian bishop (Barbara Harris of the USA in 1989) was welcomed by many women in all denominations worldwide as a historic breakthrough; at the same time, some interpret it as endangering the ecumenical dialogue between Anglicans, Orthodox and Roman Catholics.

Sexism touches deeply the matrix of the churches' existence, but it will not go away by itself. Many women leave the churches, as they see no signs of change. There is the danger that the churches will lose their most faithful members if they do not deal seriously, self-critically and creatively with the challenge.

The Ecumenical Decade process and the team visits to the member churches of the WCC have made visible the many manifestations of sexism both in the church and in society. They have provided a framework for women to take directly to the churches their concerns about some of these expressions of sexism that are still alive today. At the same time it became visible how much women have taken initiatives and given new leadership to their churches. Women are calling for a new church where gender hierarchy will be replaced by a new non-sexist value system where the voices of all will be heard and respected.

See also feminism.

BÄRBEL VON WARTENBERG-POTTER

■ J. Becher ed., Women, Religion and Sexuality, WCC, 1990 ■ E.S. Fiorenza, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction, New York, Crossroad, 1983 ■ D. Hampson, After Christianity, London, SCM Press, 1996 ■ C. Parvey ed., The Community of Women and Men in the Church: The Sheffield Report, WCC, 1983 ■ R. Ruether, Sexism and God Talk: Towards a Feminist Theology, London, SCM Press, 1983 ■ Sexism in the 1970s: Discrimination against Women, WCC, 1975.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

THE TERM "sexual harassment" originated in the USA, where in 1975 the courts were the first to recognize it as a form of sex discrimination. But by now awareness of the extent of sexual harassment in the work-place and in other social contexts has become an issue of concern all over the world. Sexual harassment has been defined as "several kinds of behaviour with a sexual connotation, unsolicited and unwanted, and especially repetitive". It could also include "discrimination on the basis of gender, causing stress or humiliation to the victim". In the early 1990s a brochure entitled "When Christian Solidarity Is Broken" was produced by a WCC staff group of women and men which acknowledged that sexual harassment can take place even in ecumenical gatherings.

The group also drew up a set of guidelines to deal with cases of sexual harassment within the WCC itself.

More recently the concept of "mobbing" has been added, refining the definition further. Mobbing refers to hostile and unethical communication, directed systematically by one or more individuals mainly at one individual, who is pushed into a helpless and defenceless position and held there by means of continual mobbing activities. Because this maltreatment is persistent and long-lasting, it can have serious negative mental, psychosomatic and social effects.

There is also an increasing awareness among churches that clergy abuse in pastoral relationships is another serious and widespread form of sexual harassment prevalent in the churches. The issue became a focal point for action by women's groups in the major churches as they began to recognize the frequency and seriousness of this phenomenon. Churches which have either done extensive studies or adopted statements and policies on sexual harassment include, for example, the United Methodist Church [USA], the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, the Presbyterian Church (USA), the United Church of Canada, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada, the Anglican Church of Canada, the Canadian Council of Churches, the Anglican Church in Aotearoa, New Zealand and Polynesia, the Uniting Church in Australia, the Church of Norway, and the Roman Catholic Church in the Netherlands.

The issue has lent itself more easily to discussion in the churches in North America and Europe than elsewhere. However, women's groups in many countries have successfully lobbied for the enactment of legislation covering sexual harassment in the work-place and in other contexts, so as to ensure legal redress.

In the reports of the team visits to WCC member churches carried out between 1992 and 1995 within the framework of the Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women,* the question of sexual harassment was rarely the subject of spontaneous conversation, even in women's groups. While its existence was recognized, it would appear that the problem is accorded secondary importance when compared to other forms of violence against women which seem to have a more dramatic effect on their lives. As a result of the Decade visits, church leaders in many countries have been challenged to address all forms of violence against women, including sexual harassment, and to see its roots in the unequal power relationships between men and women. The contribution of the WCC process has been on the need to address both the theological underpinnings of the persistence of sexual harassment in church and society and the pastoral and other kinds of responses necessary in dealing both with perpetrators and victims, so as to ensure reconciliation and healing.

JEANNE BECHER and
ARUNA GNANADASON

■ When Christian Solidarity Is Broken: A Pastoral and Educational Brochure Addressing the Issue of Sexual Harrassment, WCC, 1991.

SIMATUPANG, TAHI BONAR

B. 20 Jan. 1920, Sidikalang, Sumatra, Indonesia; d. 1 Jan. 1990. A WCC president, 1975-83, and central and executive committee member, 1968-75, Simatupang was educated at the Dutch royal military academy. After Indonesia's proclamation of independence (1945), he was involved in organizing the war to defend the Republic of Indonesia and later in the peace negotiations with the Netherlands. After early retirement from the post of chief of staff of the armed forces, he was active in the ecumenical movement at regional, national and world levels as, for example, president of the Christian Conference of Asia, 1973-77, and president of the National Council of Churches in Indonesia, 1967-84. For a number of years he wrote regularly for the influential Indonesian newspaper Sinar Harapan. He is the author of numerous books and articles on political, military and ecumenical concerns in Indonesia, some of which have been translated into English, Dutch, German and Japanese.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

SIN

ANTHROPOLOGY (see anthropology, theological) and soteriology (see salvation) are interwoven in the doctrine of sin. It is common Christian teaching that God originally created human beings in his image and likeness. This nature enables them to reveal, but also to betray, their Creator, because it gives them the opportunity of suppressing the distinction between Creator and creature (creation*) and of dangerously identifying themselves with, or mistaking themselves for, God (see Gen. 6:1-4, 11:1-9). The worship of God the Creator turns into self-worship and demonic idolatry. The Bible depicts this mistake as sin, thereby using a vocabulary (hata' and hamartanein) and an imagery that stresses the failing in, and falling short of, one's intention, the missing of the mark. Because human beings in their failing and pride are prevented from establishing the communion with God and one another to which they are originally called, sin can also be defined as the destruction of the totality, the breaking of positive relations – indeed, of the human community – revolt against and violation of covenant,* alienation between God and humankind. To this effect the Old Testament denounces sin as idolatry and interprets it as adultery against Yahweh. The prophets also vehemently condemn social injustice as sin and take sides in the struggle for the weak and poor against the mighty and powerful.

The New Testament continues this line of thought when expounding sin as the human attitude and act directed against Christ and the Holy Spirit* and at the same time emphasizing the failure to exercise love towards one's neighbour as sinful. In the last analysis, sin results in death (Rom. 6:23; see life and death). In short, the Bible as a whole condemns any human approach and any mentality directed against God and humankind as sinful transgression of the boundaries and limits inherent in divine creation and human createdness.

This sin (singular) against God becomes concrete in the sins (plural) against his creatures. The alienation between God and God's creation is, however, part of the human condition, from which we cannot escape (Rom. 3:23). Humankind does not just act sinfully; it is sinful. This teaching is meant when Christian tradition throughout the centuries has spoken of original sin. This doctrine expresses the conviction that sin, though universal, is not necessary, holding human beings, who have committed the breach of solidarity with their Creator and one another, paradoxically responsible in united solidarity of sin and guilt. It prevents us from misinterpreting sinfulness in moralistic terms and qualifies it as having primarily to do with human relation to God and only derivatively with interhuman contacts. It asserts the idea of a free will, inherent in humankind's being created in the image and likeness of God, as the necessary prerequisite for individual and collective responsibility for sin, while at the same time claiming that human beings cannot but be sinful (Rom. 7:18-19), because they fall victim to the temptation to be like God and thus lose the freedom that they were from the beginning destined to enjoy. The free will implies, negatively as it were, the possibility of distorting the likeness with our Creator into its demonic contrast and the potential of orienting ourselves towards the idols, whom we, treacherous to God and ironically enough, serve in an unending faithfulness. We commit adultery with other gods and distrust our own Creator. Thus sin can basically be understood as unbelief.

Because this radical faithlessness draws humankind away from God, the gospel calls it back to communion with God by urgently inviting conversion and promising redemption* and forgiveness of sins. This offer is made possible because Jesus Christ* on the cross took upon himself the guilt of humankind and was punished in its place. In spite of its failure and betrayal, God remained in solidarity with his creation, and his Son's death on the cross brought reconciliation* between God and the world. Christ did what human beings ought to have done – bore the divine condemnation merited by human sin – and thus through dying in their place, he won the righteousness required from them. Through faith* in Jesus Christ humankind now participates in his justice, bestowed upon them and sealed in the sacrament* of baptism.* Through faith, believers have developed from having been instruments of and slaves to sinfulness into becoming instruments of and slaves to righteousness (Rom. 6:12-13). Out of sheer grace* God declares them righteous and accepts them as his sons and daughters; as a consequence, they leave death behind and start to walk in newness of life. The baptized are cleansed of their past sin and are expected to live henceforth in purity of heart, although this teaching does not mean that sinfulness has been totally overcome or that post-baptismal transgressions are unknown.

From the angle of *justification* by faith*, this view of sin seems theologically awkward but is nevertheless an empirical fact. Every human being is simul iustus et peccator, at once righteous and a sinner. This (originally Lutheran) phrase is interpreted in a somewhat different way in the various confessions and even within the Lutheran tradition itself. The Reformation churches normally stress that justification does not only imply the forgiveness of sins but also brings a person into the newness of life. On the one hand, God declares a person to be righteous (forensic, imputative justification); on the other, God makes him or her righteous (effective justification). Justification and sanctification* imply one another, the latter always being the result of and never the prerequisite for the former. Because believers, therefore, are just, they do good works, which, however, can never form the basis for their justification and redemption. People can never be saved on account of their works; without these works, however, they perish (Formula of Concord, Solid Declaration, art. 3).

Justification does not protect the justified person from still committing sins, because his or her righteousness remains a righteousness of another (iustitia aliena) or a righteousness outside of us (iustitia extra nos). Through justification the attitude of a sinful person to God has been, to be sure, totally changed, but the person has not at all changed ontologically (on a Lutheran view) and therefore remains, though totally justified, what he or she ever was, i.e. totally a sinner. Yet Martin Luther himself can also speak about the faithful as partially sinful and partially justified, so that sanctification is seen as an ongoing learning process and the factual situation of the person as not being changed all at once. But from the beginning, Lutheran theology has indisputably tended to over-emphasize the simul iustus et peccator in terms of a paradox indicating that the human person is totally righteous and totally sinful and that post-baptismal sin is inevitable. This view may under unhappy circumstances prepare the way for antinomianism and ethical indifference and thus neglect the importance of good works as the necessary fruits of faith.

This is exactly the point on which Roman Catholic criticism intervenes and attacks. Because the Reformation so strongly underlines the unconditional divine grace as the sole agent of justification, it runs the risk of rejecting the transforming and creative power of that same grace and is exposed to underestimating sanctification. The council of Trent* maintains that when God justifies, sinners not only are declared to be justified but are ontologically changed, so that from now on they are a new creation (2 Cor. 5:17; Gal. 6:15). As such, they are no longer totally sinners, although their righteousness flows from God because of Christ (propter Christum) and in this sense also in the Catholic tradition can be seen as a iustitia aliena. Individuals, however, are still living in the realm of sinfulness and under the impact of original sin. They are prone to sin and hence in the last analysis uncertain of their own salvation and totally thrown upon God's grace, which makes a growth in sanctification possible and allows an interpretation of the justified believer as both righteous and a sinner.

The Western polemic as described here has never really touched the Eastern Orthodox tradition, in which the theological point of departure is taken in the incarnation* rather than in justification. God "became man that we might become divine" (Athanasius, Incarnation 54). God's incarnation is interpreted to imply the deification of humankind (theōsis) and thus the final reconciliation between Creator and creation.

Today the traditional controversy between Rome and the Reformation churches may be said to be overcome to the extent that the Lutheran concern for the promise of God (promissio Dei) and the Catholic interest in the merit according to grace (meritum ex gratia) can be regarded as compatible; but tensions still remain, not least with regard to the understanding of the human person and the radical character of sin (Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue,* Malta report, 26; Justification by Faith [USA Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue], 112; Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, 28-30).

In ecumenical texts of recent decades the issue of sin is mostly debated in a rather traditional manner (e.g. the Leuenberg* agreement [Lutheran-Reformed dialogue*], 10-12; The Presence of Christ in Church and World [Reformed-Roman Catholic dialogue*], 49,87), though there are also quite a few examples of dogmatically and ethically actualizing the reality of original sin that draw conclusions to the sinfulness of unjust, venial and selfish structures and institutions (Dublin report [Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue*], 18, and numerous documents from the socio- and economico-political discussion in the WCC and related bodies). Recent trends such as liberation theology* and political theology* show an unprecedented tendency to give more weight to the issue of structural and institutional sin, as they describe sinful economic, social, political structures.

It can also be maintained that the whole ecumenical movement is nurtured by the basic insight that ecclesiastical and confessional divisions are sinful violations of inalienable Christological principles (see John 17:21; 1 Cor. 1:10-13). This sin of disunity (see unity) demands reconciliation that expresses itself in eucharistic sharing, which in turn represents a constant and radical challenge to "all kinds of injustice, racism, separation and lack of freedom" (Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, E20). Thus all individual and structural sin is overcome by Jesus Christ, giving himself to his followers in the eucharist* as the meal of reconciliation.

PEDER NØRGAARD-HØJEN

- L. Basset, Le pardon originel: De l'abîme du mal au pouvoir de pardonner, Genève, Labor et Fides, 1994
- G. Freund, Sünde im Erbe: Erfahrungsinhalt und Sinn der Erbsündenlehre, Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1979
- C. Gestrich, Die Wiederkehr des Glanzes in der Welt: Die christliche Lehre von der Sünde und ihrer Vergebung in gegenwärtiger Verantwortung (ET The Return of Splendor in the World: The Christian Doctrine of Sin and Forgiveness, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1997)
- S. Kierkegaard, The Concept of Anxiety, E. Hong & H. Hong eds, Princeton, Princeton UP, 1980
- R. Niebuhr, The Nature and Destiny of Man: A Christian Interpretation, New York, Scribner, 1942 ■ W. Pannenberg, Anthropologie in theologischer Perspektive (ET Anthropology in Theological Perspective, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1985) ■ P. Schoonenberg, "Der Mensch in der Sünde", in Mysterium Salutis, vol. 2, Einsiedeln, Benzinger, 1975.

SKYDSGAARD, KRISTEN EJNER

B. 15 Nov. 1902, Fünen, Denmark; d. 9 Feb. 1990, Copenhagen. Skydsgaard was a member of the WCC's commission on Faith and Order, 1952-68, and in 1957 was appointed to the commission of ecumenical research of the Lutheran World Federation* (LWF). Actively involved in the creation of the Institute for Ecumenical Research at Strasbourg, and in its programme for several years, he was vice-president of its board, 1964-74. He was an observer for the LWF at the Second Vatican Council and, as representative of the non-Catholic observers, spoke on the need to examine Christian doctrine in its historical dimension. He participated in the long ecumenical debate on the relation between scripture and Tradition and made a contribution to the Roman Catholic-Protestant theological dialogue. He was also a member of the official group of dialogue between the Lutheran churches and the Roman Catholic Church.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ K.E. Skydsgaard, One in Christ, Philadelphia, Muhlenberg, 1957 ■ K.E. Skydsgaard ed., Konzil und Evangelium, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1962.

SOBORNOST

THE TERM sobornost made its appearance on the ecumenical scene during the 1920s. The closest English equivalent is perhaps "conciliarity"* or "ecumenicity"; the dictionary defines sobornost as "the principle of spiritual unity and religious community based on free commitment to a tradition of catholicity interpreted through ecumenical councils of the Eastern Orthodox church".

In the first flush of the post-revolutionary Russian emigration to Western Europe, there was no reluctance among host nations to accept such an untranslated Russian word. At the Faith and Order* conference of 1927, Sergius Bulgakov (1871-1944) tanta-lized his audience with the thought that "Russian theology expresses the fundamental essence of church unity in a word for which no other language has the equivalent". Sobornost was a neologism born out of the 19th-century Slavophile movement, and in particular out of the writings of Aleksey Khomyakov (1804-60). Khomyakov himself did not necessarily coin the term; it makes its first appearance in print only in a posthumous translation of his Lettre au rédacteur de l'Union chrétienne (1860), and even there only once. The Lettre itself involved a polemical defence of a related term, sobornaia, the medieval Slav translation of "catholic" in the Nicene Creed. It was a translation to which the Russian Jesuit priest Gagarine had taken exception in 1859.

Both Khomyakov and his successors were convinced that sobornaia was not only a correct translation but one that enhanced and enriched the original, proceeding as it did beyond the quantitative aspect of catholicity* and universality to an emphasis on quality, on the idea of a love-inspired "unity in multiplicity". For the root of the Slavonic word (sobor) relates to gathering together, togetherness, mutuality. Furthermore, noted Khomyakov, the root, taken by itself, implies assembly and is the very word for "council". But this meaning in turn points beyond councils and assemblies proper, important as they are. Khomyakov held that the church possesses an essential togetherness over and above any actual gathering; "her very essence consists in the agreement and unity of the spirit and life of all the members who acknowledge her throughout the world". Such can exist even without their "formal reunion".

The abstract noun sobornost therefore pointed beyond the hierarchical and formally conciliar nature of the church.* In 1932, in his work L'Orthodoxie, Bulgakov ventured the translation conciliarité. But he also offered symphonie and unanimité. Such were the ineffable attributes of the body as a whole, whose truths were ultimately guarded by "the totality, by the whole people of the church", terms which Khomyakov had eagerly adapted from the encyclical of the Eastern patriarchs to Pope Pius IX (1848). All the more eagerly did he borrow them, since they were so congruent with the ecclesiology of Johann Möhler (1796-1838), a Roman Catholic theologian whom he had undoubtedly read and admired.

Even when the church did gather in council, however, such unity* should as much or even more abundantly prevail. Conversely, it could be argued that in the absence of a properly constituted council, sobornost might well be at risk, and so the integrity of the body as a whole. Such was the concern of those who prepared for the long-delayed council of the Russian Orthodox Church in the early 1900s. Vladimir Zavitnevich's article of 1905 "On the Restoration of Sobornost in the Russian Church" was one of many to express it. The article was firmly based on Khomyakov, to whom the author devoted an extensive study (1902). At no stage was this restoration nearer or more needed than at the turbulent time of the council itself (1917-18).

The very constitution of this all-important council demonstrated that any serious restoration of sobornost had to involve a re-assertion of the importance of the laity* in Orthodox church life. It was all the more natural for Bulgakov (himself a member of that council) to stress that "the laity, no less than the clergy, has its place and value in the church as a whole" when he came before the Faith and Order conference of 1927.

No doubt this position eased the mind of many a Protestant in his audience, faced with what had been expected to be a highly clericalist body. But the apparent lessening of rigorous canonical standards and demands which the concept of sobornost seemed to herald in debates between Orthodox Russians and their fellow Christians in the nascent ecumenical movement served only intermittently and superficially to further interchurch convergence. The very vagueness of the term could lead so seasoned an ecumenist as Oliver Tomkins to associate it in due course with "charity of the Spirit" as an essential mark of the church ("an idea that is perfectly expressed in the untranslatable Russian word for catholicity, sobornost"); this comment in turn conjured up the vision of an obscure partner to the historical Orthodox church, "a charismatic church in which the Holy Spirit of love constitutes members of those who are outside the canonical church" itself (A Time for Unity, 1964, 36).

In the event, no more than a small and decreasing number of ecumenists were to labour under such illusions, nor did each and every Russian Orthodox theologian help to provoke them. A fertile ground for would-be promoters of sobornost in the furtherance of Christian unity was provided – under the aegis of Bulgakov and the direction of his follower, Nicolas Zernov (1898-1980) – by the Anglican-Orthodox Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius,* founded in 1928. The very journal of the fellowship was renamed Sobornost in 1935.

The subject of its conference in the preceding year had been "The Church of God", which included a paper entitled "Sobornost: The Catholicity of the Church" delivered by Georges Florovsky (1893-1979). The second part of the title was addressed in an exemplary way, but the first part was studiously ignored. Indeed, sobornost was not even mentioned. Thus did Florovsky turn his back on post-Khomyakovian Russian religious thought, the better to address himself instead to a perceived pan-Orthodox tradition and to its patristic base.

In subsequent ecumenical debate Florovsky's bypassing of the use of sobornost generally prevailed. Nevertheless, largely in Russian circles, the term sobornost still commands respect. When he addressed the inter-Orthodox symposium on "Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry" (1985), Archbishop Kirill of Smolensk took it for granted that members of the Orthodox church invariably "maintain the principles of conciliarity (sobornost)". He invoked sobornost to justify the substance and the spirit of the statutes he had drafted for the Russian church in its millennial year (1988).

SERGEI HACKEL

■ S. Bulgakoff, "One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic", Journal of the Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius, 12, 1931 ■ S. Hackel, One Holy Catholic and Apostolic: The Problems and Limitations of Language, London, Anglican & Eastern Churches Assoc., 1989 ■ B. Plank, Katholizität und Sobornost, Würzburg, Augustinus, 1960 ■ N.V. Riasanovsky, "Khomyakov on Sobornost", in Community and Change in Russian and Soviet Thought, E.J. Simmons ed., Cambridge MA, Harvard UP, 1955 ■ T. Sabev, "The Nature and Mission of Councils in the Light of the Theology of Sobornost", ER, 45, 3, 1993.

SOCIAL GOSPEL MOVEMENT

THE SOCIAL GOSPEL movement was a movement in American Protestantism that sought to Christianize social, economic and political institutions as well as the family and individual life. Convinced that the kingdom of God* embraces the whole of human life, social gospel proponents believed that the church's* task is to be the conscience and guide for "the Christian transfiguration of the social order".

Stimulated by ideas from England and Europe, the movement originated in the 1870s. But advocates were unable to arouse the Protestant churches to embrace it broadly until 1907-12, when denominations and the new Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America (1908) endorsed it. This ecumenical body adopted the Social Creed of the Churches (1908), which symbolized Protestantism's commitment to social responsibility and expressed its social conscience. Early emphasis on economic conditions of workers expanded to family life, urban problems and social justice. The most significant impact of this clergy-dominated movement occurred between 1907 and 1917.

Primary leadership was provided by Baptists Walter Rauschenbusch and Shailer Mathews, Congregationalists Washington Gladden and Josiah Strong, Episcopalians W.D.P. Bliss and Richard Ely, Methodists Frank Mason North and Harry Ward, and Presbyterians Charles Stelzle and John McDowell. Gladden has been called the father of the social gospel, but Rauschenbusch became its most famous advocate.

Much of the social gospel's success resulted from its strong ecumenical commitments and cooperation. The Federal Council of the Churches' commission on the church and social service became the social gospel's most active agency, enabling denominational leaders to avoid competition, effectively use limited funds, and develop mutual programmes and publications. By this means the cause exerted influence beyond its actual size, for it never enjoyed more than minority support in the denominations.

Theologically, the social gospel was a product of liberalism before the first world war. Its biblical basis emphasized the Hebrew prophets and the social teachings of Jesus. Inveterately optimistic about human potential and social possibilities, the movement found its "spiritual centre and unity in the idea of the kingdom of God on earth" (Rauschenbusch). Its doctrine of God recognized divine activity in all of creation,* not just in the church, which led proponents to regard reforms advocated even by muckraking journalists and progressive politicians as redemptive. Consequently, social gospel leaders interacted with other movements for reform and social improvement. The two most influential books which represent this theology are Rauschenbusch's Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907) and A Theology for the Social Gospel (1917).

Social gospel theology aroused negative responses from divergent Protestant wings. Fundamentalists* attacked its assumptions that God's kingdom could be attained on earth prior to the millennium and that the church should become directly involved in politics (see millennialism). Neo-orthodox writers argued that the movement had a naive understanding of human nature and social change. With the combined impact of these attacks, the economic depression, and the second world war, the optimism inherent in the cause crumbled. However, a more realistic social action took its place, revised and sustained by permanent boards for social action in denominations and the National Council of Churches of Christ (1950). By such means the basic social responsibility expressed in the social gospel continues to work in the church today.

DONALD K. GORRELL

- D.K. Gorrell, The Age of Social Responsibility: The Social Gospel in the Progressive Era, 1900-1920, Macon GA, Mercer UP, 1988 ■
- R.T. Handy ed., The Social Gospel in America, 1870-1920, New York, Oxford UP, 1966 ■
- W.A. Visser 't Hooft, The Background of the Social Gospel in America, St Louis MO, Bethany, repr. 1962.

SOCIALISM

SOCIALISM, a term of disputed and often imprecise meaning, refers to a socio-economic formation which exists for the benefit of most members of a society, particularly working people. Perhaps the most acceptable characteristic of socialism is the collective ownership of at least the major means of production in a society operated by workers in the interest of the entire society. Another useful approach is to view socialism as an alternative social theory or system to capitalism and exaggerated individualism in which existing class antagonisms would be gradually resolved. Currently a wide range of socialisms have been described, such as utopian, scientific (or Marxist-Leninist or communistic), democratic, nationalist, “really existing”, developed or advanced, Euro-communist, Latin American, Arab, African, religious (Christian), or “socialism with a human face”. Because of the many ideological conflicts, including those among socialists, the term “socialism” has become frequently only a slogan without concrete content.

Both socialism and communism are pre-Marxian concepts upon which a definitive Marxist interpretation was stamped. Pre-Marxian thinkers such as More, Babeuf, Saint-Simon, Fourier, Proudhon, Owen and Weitling criticized the evils of the industrial revolution and laissez-faire capitalism and proposed or organized idealized communities in which the interest of all members of the community would be respected and oppression and exploitation would be removed. These authors were inspired by their understanding of the message and mission of Jesus and considered these socialist projects as the expression of true Christianity of Jesus.

Such schemes were resolutely rejected as utopian socialist by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels. In order to make socialism “scientific” they combated all other interpretations of socialism, which they regarded as unreal, and thus gradually promoted the Marxian understanding of socialism as “the necessary outcome of the struggle between the two historically developed classes – the proletariat and the bourgeoisie” (Engels). The notion that Marxism was an objective, scientific world-view allowed for little discussion not only about the inevitability of socialism but also its constitutive elements. Socialism came to be seen as a transition between capitalism and communism, marked by the state as a revolutionary dictatorship of the proletariat, but in which such conditions would exist that would erode the need for the state. In socialism the distribution of abundant material goods produced by everyone’s unselfish contribution is supposed to correspond to a person’s contribution to society. In communism, consumption would be based entirely on one’s “real” needs. Taking his clues from the experiences of the Paris commune (1870), Marx believed that socialism would bring about the free association of producers, who would take power into their hands by revolutionary, though not necessarily violent, means. It would happen first in the most advanced capitalist countries, where labour is already sufficiently socialized to be able to carry out this take-over effectively.

While Marx believed that religion* would wither away along with many other super-structures of class society, he was not overly concerned about its existence in socialism, though he believed that freedom of religion and separation of church and state* would be features of socialism. The financial support of churches would be based upon the unpressured commitment of believers.

Marx’s relation with his contemporaries, the Christian socialists, was conflictual. Generally he was scornful of Christianity and the churches, and they reciprocated this animosity. The French socialists Lammenais, Blanc and Cabet were all believers and could not accept Marx’s atheism. The socialist divorce with religion arose from Marxist materialist metaphysics, and hence only a small number of Christians espoused socialist ideas and engaged in organizing the working class. They included Friedrich Naumann, Christoph Blumhardt, Hermann Kutter, Leonhard Ragaz, Keir Hardie, the Society of Christian Socialists, the Church Socialist League, and Pope Leo XIII’s support to the organizing of Catholic labour unions. Christian socialists employed a fairly large number of Marxist concepts, with less emphasis on conspiracy and violence, although Marxists rarely adopted Christian insights.

After the death of Marx and Engels, the socialist movement gradually split into two antagonistic movements: democratic socialist and Leninist or Bolshevik. The democratic socialists believed that it was possible to take control of the state apparatus by legal means, namely the ballot, while the Leninists held that power could be wrested from the capitalists only by revolution, such as the great October revolution of 1917.

Unanticipated by Marx and Engels, the first country to become socialist was Russia, a country more feudal than capitalist. Vladimir Ilyich Ulyanov-Lenin was able not only to control the seething dissatisfied masses but also to give Marxism his own stamp, hence "Marxism-Leninism". Originally the Bolsheviks and their sympathizers expected world revolution, but they were later satisfied to hold power in one country, the Soviet Union. This situation lasted until the end of the second world war; since then other countries became socialist. In the Soviet Union the building of socialism entailed central political and economic state monopoly, nationalization of industry, collectivization of agriculture and an increasing grip by the Communist Party not only on political life but also on cultural, educational, recreational and spiritual life. The dictatorship of the proletariat became the dictatorship of the Communist Party.

Under Lenin's successor, Josif Visarionovich Djugashvili-Stalin, the process of concentration of power continued until the dictatorship of the party was replaced by dictatorship of the central committee, then of the politburo, and finally of the general secretary, Stalin himself. The transformation of the Soviet Union into a socialist country was exceedingly bloody, and the demand was made that the socialist movement around the world blindly conform to the dictates from the Kremlin. The state became nearly all-powerful; its government, statist and totalitarian. Ruling was in the name of the working class; however, a new bureaucratic ruling class monopolized power internally and dominated the communist movement internationally.

Not until the 1950s, and in many instances much later, did any Communist Party develop an alternate road into socialism. Although many splinter movements arose within this branch, they were combated relentlessly. Bolsheviks promoted the impression that no other form of socialism was legitimate. In those countries in which a communist take-over was successful, there was at the outset a slavish copying of the USSR model. The Soviet Union, to distinguish itself from other Marxist socialist countries, declared itself to be a country of developed or advanced socialism, even proclaiming that it had reached the communist stage of socialist development. The other countries declared themselves as countries of "really existing socialism".

Only in the 1950s, especially after the death of Stalin, did any alternate roads emerge. The greater diversity was primarily in the form of nationalistic socialism, such as the Titoist mould in Yugoslavia, Chinese Maoism (which later, like Yugoslavia, transformed into a reformist socialism), socialism with a human face during the Prague spring in 1968 in Czechoslovakia, the Polish model, Castroism, and Sandinista socialism in Nicaragua. Under Mikhail Gorbachev, such variants were finally accepted by the Soviet Union, which attempted a restructuring (perestroika) and liberalization, or openness (glasnost), of its own form of socialism. By the late 1980s a large number of socialist countries experienced a profound economic, political, social and ideological crisis which caused a number of unanticipated but profound changes affecting these countries internally and internationally.

The Leninist and Stalinist approach to religion was almost uniformly restrictive and oppressive. Instead of waiting for religion to wither, administrative means were employed to root out religion. Actual religious policies varied from tactical cooperation to greater degrees of toleration or overt manipulation of churches, but the overall strategy and expectation was that religion would die out. Generally it was asserted that religion always plays a reactionary role. Only a small group of humanistic Marxists from socialist countries asserted the usefulness of a dialogue with Christians and other religious people, but only since the 1960s was there a grudging official admission that religion is capable of motivating some people for "progressive" goals. In some socialist countries (e.g. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Hungary and East Germany) a Christian-Marxist dialogue* took place, mostly among a small, but relatively influential, group of intellectuals.

Originally the churches opposed the communist take-over, and many Christians remained in passive opposition. But gradually other forms of relations developed. Christians often became passive objects of the processes of socialization, and some churches attempted to find a non-confrontational niche in socialism. A small but vocal minority of Christians became advocates of socialism and attempted a Marxist-Christian synthesis. The most creative response was the attempt by some Christians to define themselves as a "church in socialism", whereby they sought to be loyal yet critical in their attempt to contribute to building the kind of socialism which respects human and moral values rather than destroys them.

It was different with democratic socialists, and even with the so called Euro-communists (primarily communists of Italy and Spain) in the West. The totalitarian and repressive practices of Leninism, Stalinism and Maoism were rejected, and a commitment was made to preserve and advance the humanistic heritage. Socialistic political parties entered the political arena, sometimes won elections, and influenced their society by establishing policies for the welfare and protection of the rights of workers and of the entire society. They committed themselves to pluralism in society, parliamentary democracy and a mixed economy. This movement took place in nearly all Western European countries.

A number of Christian theologians in the 20th century sharply criticized advanced capitalist forms of human denigration but also distanced themselves from the terror in Marxist-Leninist socialism. The most prominent such critics of the older generation were Walter Rauschenbusch, Karl Barth, Paul Tillich, Reinhold Niebuhr, Jacques Maritain, Emmanuel Mounier, Joseph Hromádka, and former Russian Marxists exiled in the West such as Nicholas Berdyaev, Sergei Bulgakov and Piotr Struve. The theologians most significant in the second half of the century in reacting to socialism were Karl Rahner, Charles West, Jan Milic Lochman, Johannes Metz, Jürgen Moltmann, Giulio Girardi and Dorothee Sölle. In different ways they all took Marxism and socialism seriously and believed it to be a Christian responsibility to espouse the values common to both Christianity and socialism.

The World Council of Churches became concretely involved with the issue of socialism because member churches operated in both socialist and non-socialist countries. But in a more general sense socialism impacted the ecumenical movement on account of its striving for social justice and equality, issues that from the beginning concerned the ecumenical movement. "Christian socialists" participated actively at the Stockholm Life and Work conference in 1925 (see ecumenical conferences, capitalism). Amsterdam 1948 tried to steer an independent course by rejecting "the ideologies of both communism and laissez-faire capitalism", as if "these two extremes were the only alternatives". The notion of "a responsible society"* was offered as a tool of assessing both the values and shortcomings of various social systems. Evanston 1954 deplored the totalitarian practice of communism while also rejecting sterile anti-communism. The Geneva Church and Society conference in 1966, influenced by third-world concerns, was the first to give a positive meaning to "ideology" as a mobilizing force and to raise the revolutionary challenge to the level of a Christian option. The programme on Dialogue with Men of Different Faiths and Ideologies concentrated on inter-religious dialogue. But emphases like "the church and the poor" or the Programme to Combat Racism have raised fundamental issues of economic and social conflict which could not ignore the socialist challenge.

In the late 1960s liberation theology took a favourable attitude towards revolution and socialism. Here a number of theologians such as Gustavo Gutiérrez, Camilo Torres, José Míguez Bonino, José Miranda, Leonardo Boff, Enrique Dussel and Hugo Assman, as well as grassroots movements such as Christians for Socialism, viewed Marxism as a socio-economic analysis which might help the masses of Latin America and the rest of the third world to end the poverty and domination caused by capitalism. Liberation theologians are not uncritical towards Marxism but seek a positive reinterpretation of Marxism which would foster a socialism friendly to religious concerns. While the Cuban socialist experiment is not negligible, greater interest was manifested in the brief experience of building socialism in Chile, and in the Nicaraguan Sandinista socialism.

Other forms of liberation theology exist in the Philippines, Sri Lanka and South Korea, where various attempts are made both independently and under Latin American influence to create Asian liberation theologies. Similarly in Africa (e.g. in Tanzania, Zimbabwe, Senegal and South Africa), some theologians are espousing African socialism. The nature of much of third-world socialism is highly unclear. The rhetoric is often Marxist, but the content is frequently traditional local collectivism coupled with the desire for development and independence.

Socialism is both divisive and unitive for Christians. It is divisive because many Christians clearly favour it and even claim that, of all social systems, it is the most Christian, while others vehemently oppose it. It is unitive because there is a tendency of Christians to collaborate across denominational, theological, and other lines of separation when it comes to working together in supporting or opposing socialism. Either way, socialism is a serious ecumenical concern.

In the second half of 1989, encouraged by the process of democratization and restructuring fostered by Mikhail Gorbachev, a mostly bloodless revolution (except in Romania) took place in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union which affected other socialist countries. The impact of this transformation may be equated with the Bolshevik revolution, which came to be rejected so thoroughly that a new period was ushered in for which there is as yet no better name but "post-Communist". Some trends of that revolution are democratic socialist, but others are frankly anti-socialist. The end result is not entirely discernible, but by the second half of the 1990s Stalinistic communism was dismantled in all but a handful of countries (e.g. North Korea and Cuba), and the idea of multi-party democracy had been accepted in all former communist countries except in China, where the political system of communism continued to function but the economic system underwent major reforms in the direction of a mixed economy.

The greatest changes took place in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe. In those countries a monumental political and economic transformation took place. The Soviet Union was formally dissolved in December 1990, dividing itself along the lines of the former federal states of the USSR. The largest successor state was Russia. In some instances countries were partitioned (Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia). In others extensive, bloody wars were waged (e.g. between Armenia and Azerbaijan; in Chechnya, a federal unit of Russia, with the federal government; in Yugoslavia a series of wars between 1991 and 1995 led to the disintegration of that country), in others to demonstrations and riots (Serbia, Bulgaria, Albania), and in all huge economic displacements followed. The classic features of Marxist-Leninist socialism were abandoned, even by political parties that previously embraced such concepts dogmatically. Most Communist parties collapsed and lost all political impact; others changed their name to a socialist variant and were either freely elected to govern or continued to maintain themselves in power by non-democratic methods. The impact of those monumental changes are not yet clear in the third world, but there too the appeal of socialism became considerably reduced (e.g. in Ethiopia and Nicaragua Marxist-led governments were replaced), but some fringe extremist guerilla groups (e.g. in Peru) continued a violent struggle.

For the churches in former Marxist socialist countries, the changes generally meant that they obtained true religious freedom. Many churches were able to return to social prominence and even considerable social and political influence. In large parts of the former Marxist countries, the major churches and religions became identified again with nationalism – re-establishing an ethno-religious symbiosis characteristic of the pre-Communist period. In a few instances this return to powerful identification between church and nation became a contributive factor for the outbreak of wars and for the attempted repression of smaller religious communities. Yet, in at least some of the countries religious people were in the forefront of the movement for democratization.

The world ecumenical movement is adjusting to these profound transformations of socialism, particularly the transition from communism to post-communism. In several former Communist countries a large number of religious leaders and people became explicitly anti-ecumenical; an era of less, rather than more, cooperation between religious communities characterized the 1990s, while some religious communities relished their ability to re-enter full and unhindered participation in the world ecumenical activities, institutions and programmes. Whether ecumenism or anti-ecumenism will prevail in the short run is not yet clear.

PAUL MOJZES

- M. Buber, Paths in Utopia, London, Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1949 ■ S.N. Bulgakov, Sozialismus im Christentum?, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977 ■ H. Desfosses & J. Levesque eds, Socialism in the Third World, London, Praeger, 1975 ■ L'Eglise et le socialisme, Paris, Nouvelles Editions Latimer, 1972 ■ W.H. Friedland ed., African Socialism, Stanford, Stanford UP, 1964 ■ W. Huber & J. Schwerdtfeger eds, Frieden, Gewalt, Sozialismus, Stuttgart, Klett, 1976 ■ A. Pfeiffer ed., Religiöse Sozialisten, Olten, Walter, 1976 ■ W. Sombart, Sozialismus und soziale Bewegungen (ET Socialism and the Social Movement, London, Dent, 1909) ■ L.P. Wallace, Leo XIII and the Rise of Socialism, Durham NC, Duke UP, 1966.

SOCIETAS OECUMENICA

THE EUROPEAN Society for Ecumenical Research, founded in 1978, comprises Roman Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox members from departments for ecumenical studies at European universities, church-related institutes, and individual theologians in ecumenics. Its meetings, usually every two years, discuss current ecumenical themes and research work being undertaken by its members, and sometimes supplement and deepen ongoing WCC theological programmes. It publishes consultation proceedings and the newsletter Signalia.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

SOCIETY

TO THE DESPAIR of sociologists, the term "society" is variously used in Christian literature on social ethics as synonymous with world, culture,* civilization, community,* political and economic life – a shorthand label for the fabric of social phenomena in general. However, this general use also reveals the broad range of ethical, ideological and historical forces and processes which arouse Christian interest and which draw the churches into encounter with every facet of society, with practically all the social sciences and, increasingly, with the physical and natural sciences.

Since New Testament times, there has been a continuous Christian reflection on issues of society, used in this general sense, as the transcendent claims of the faith* have encountered the historical contingencies and changes of organized society, illustrating what H. Richard Niebuhr called the "enduring problem of Christ and culture". The Christian response has ranged from "Christ against culture", as expressed by 1st- and 2nd-century Christians and the millennialist Christian sects of all ages, to "Christ the Transformer of culture", as interpreted by such diverse theologians and disciples as Augustine of Hippo and the Christian socialists of more recent times.

In his pioneering historical study The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, Ernst Troeltsch concluded that, alongside the extreme, though not uninteresting, social ideas of the Christian sectarians and the Christian mystics, there were only two main historical church teachings about social order: (1) the social philosophy of medieval Catholicism, based on the institutions of family, guild and class, on personal relations of authority and reverence in the relatively simple pre-capitalist economy, and the old solidarities involved in being bound to the soil or linked to some ancient family; (2) the social philosophy of ascetic Protestantism, resulting from a kind of Free church pietistic Calvinism, inwardly related to modern utilitarianism and rationalism, which glorified work as a calling and developed links with political democracy and liberalism; it was able to neutralize the ethically dangerous ideas of modern life (in utilitarianism and liberalism) by the religious ideas of individual and communal responsibility and by heroically "serving the cause of Christ all over the world".

By the 18th century, however, the churches had to face the "entirely new" situation created by the rise of modern science and liberal ideas of the Enlightenment, with its rational secular criticism of the state and other institutions of society. The new situation posed the problem of capitalism* and the new industrial classes it created, rapid technological change and enormous growth in material productivity, the rise of revolutionary social protest movements (esp. Marxism), the growth of giant militaristic and bureaucratic states, the enormous increase in population, the spread of European colonialism and New World outlooks linking up and mobilizing the whole world for the purpose of trade. In these circumstances, the two main types of Christian social teaching were impotent, despite the development of new forms of diakonia.*

Troeltsch's analysis opened the way for a new approach to Christian social thinking, combining the Christian ethical concern for justice and community with the insights of scientific social inquiry. (Troeltsch's impact on non-German-speaking Christianity came only after 1931, when his book was translated into English.) He was extremely critical of the Christian moral idealism which prevailed at the end of the 19th century: "Nowhere does there exist an absolute Christian ethic which only awaits discovery; all that we can do is to learn to control the world situation in its successive phases just as the earlier Christian ethic did in its own way. There is also no absolute ethical transformation of material nature or of human nature; all that does exist is a constant wrestling with the problems which they raise. Thus the Christian ethic of the present day and of the future will also only be an adjustment to the world situation, and it will only desire to achieve that which is practically possible... Only doctrinaire idealists or religious fanatics can fail to recognize these facts" (1013).

CHURCH AND SOCIETY IN THE ECUMENICAL ERA

The first world war and the worldwide economic crisis of the 1930s stirred the Western churches to re-examine their witness to society. An "ecumenical approach" was necessary to overcome the nationalist outlook which dominated Christian political and social thought. Inspired by church leaders like Archbishop Söderblom of Sweden and challenged by social movements like Christianisme social in France, the social gospel in the USA and Christian socialism in the UK, Protestant and Orthodox churches gathered for the first universal Christian conference on Life and Work (Stockholm 1925). This meeting, however, lacked the theological and social insight to analyze developments in the modern world and was unable to resolve theological-ethical differences among its members.

In these years the churches were also baffled by the growth of secularism (see secularization), to which attention had been called in a much-debated paper on "Secular Civilization and the Christian Task", presented by the American philosopher Rufus Jones to the world missionary conference in Jerusalem (1928). He argued that the advance of secular culture, "a fruit of modern science", was the principal world rival of Christian faith.

The second Life and Work conference (Oxford 1937) considered the theme "Church, Community and State". Aided by the theological renewal which had taken place in Western Christianity in the intervening years, it produced creative new approaches to these and other pressing social issues. Theologians like Karl Barth, Reinhold Niebuhr, Emil Brunner, William Temple and Nicolas Berdyaev (and other Russian Orthodox theologians-in-exile in Paris) addressed the social and political crisis from their various theological-ethical perspectives, but all generated new Christian concern for what was happening in society. The Oxford conference was particularly successful in suggesting new approaches in three key areas.

First, in considering the function of the church in society, it provided a new methodology (an approach using so-called middle axioms*) for Christian witness in relation to contemporary social issues, going beyond the affirmation of general ethical principles while avoiding the churches' becoming identified with particular economic and political programmes (Visser 't Hooft & Oldham, 209-10). This method also emphasized the need for the churches to depend less exclusively on clerical leadership and to draw upon their "best lay minds" with knowledge and experience in social affairs. The model continues to have the support of many contemporary social ethicists and moral theologians (Preston).

Second, in its concern for economic order, the conference identified the points at which modern capitalism and communism challenged the Christian understanding of life. In the post-war years, this analysis and understanding became the basis of Christian support for the welfare state* and social democracy.

Third, the conference clarified the principles which should guide Christian thinking about church and state* (see also state), especially in view of "the widespread tendency of the state to control the totality of human life". The conference declared: "Since we believe in the holy God as the source of justice, we do not consider the state as the ultimate source of law but rather as its guarantor. It is not the lord but the servant of justice. There can be for the Christian no ultimate authority but very God" (report, 67).

The second world war interrupted but also intensified Christian reflection on these issues, emphasizing the need in the post-war world for increased social security and social democracy for the populations of modern industrial societies.

CHRISTIANS AND THE CONFLICT BETWEEN CAPITALISM AND COMMUNISM

After the defeat of Hitler the conflict between the capitalist and Communist systems intensified, leading to the cold war (see socialism). This conflict provided the first test of the ecumenical movement – how to help its member churches transcend the rival claims of two self-righteous political-economic systems. At the first assembly (Amsterdam 1948), the newly established WCC addressed this "disorder of society" and proposed the idea of the responsible society* as the criterion by which churches in Communist and non-Communist countries should determine their responsibility in the East-West conflict. This idea was substantially reaffirmed and expanded in a second statement adopted by the second WCC assembly (Evanston 1954), emphasizing the need of churches in all societies to examine critically their ideological assumptions. Evanston said: "Responsible society is not an alternative social political system, but a criterion by which we judge all existing social orders and at the same time a standard to guide us in the specific choices we have to make. Christians are called to live responsibly, to live in response to God's act of redemption in Christ, in any society, even within the most unfavourable social structures." The assembly also stressed the importance of maintaining dialogue between churches in the Communist and non-Communist countries.

"RAPID SOCIAL CHANGE" IN AFRICA, ASIA AND LATIN AMERICA

After the second world war, the churches largely supported the decolonization* process, one that involved revolutionary social change as well as new ethical problems. The concern was how to encourage nation-building and rapid economic and technological development without further weakening the traditional societies and cultures of these lands. In this context it was first suggested that the churches needed a "theology of revolution" (Keith Bridston, 1956) to explain the immense cultural and social consequences of the rapid secularizing-modernizing process which accompanied decolonization and nation-building, a process all the more disturbing because it was so largely guided by Western secular ideas of nation-building, economic development, education and social welfare. Ten years later at the world conference on Church and Society (Geneva 1966), the WCC debated the same term, but on this occasion (as presented by Richard Shaull) insisted that the churches should be more active in promoting a worldwide revolutionary opposition to the capitalist political and economic system being imposed on the new nations by the Western industrial countries, which was leading to new types of colonialism and oppression.

Geneva 1966 was the first genuinely world Christian conference on social issues, including equal numbers of representatives from the so-called first, second and third worlds and a large group of observers from the Roman Catholic Church. The discussion of the theme "Christians in the Technical and Social Revolutions of Our Time" produced many new ideas on economic justice, political responsibility, racism,* the relation of men and women in community, and the problems of rapid technological change. The attempt to define a pluralist approach to the three competing economic systems and ideologies (market economy, mixed economy, and centrally planned economy) did not satisfy those who believed that the basic conflict was between Western capitalism and proposals for a revolutionary new political and economic order in the world.

A follow-up consultation on theology, social ethics and revolution (Zagorsk 1968) confirmed the refusal of the 1966 conference to provide a theological endorsement of a specific revolutionary ideology. However, Christian opinion was increasingly divided on this point, and after the fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968), the new WCC action-oriented programmes on economic development,* racism and problems of rapidly growing cities in the developing countries tended to support proposals for revolutionary change. Throughout this period there was increasing cooperation with Roman Catholic scholars in relation to social questions, and the publication of the constitution by Vatican II* on the Church in the Modern World (1965) showed that the social thought of the WCC and the Roman Catholic Church was on converging lines.

THE SEARCH FOR A NEW ECUMENICAL CONSENSUS ON SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

In the continuing debate about the theology of revolution, re-defined in 1971 by Gustavo Gutiérrez as liberation theology,* its advocates have maintained that earlier ecumenical social thought had been based on the capitalist system and its supporting economic and political rationale. They held that in the new situation of political and social oppression and the need for solidarity with the poor,* the churches should accept the Marxist world-view and its "scientific" explanation of world economic injustice and the need for new economic structures. This view was accepted by many Christian groups throughout the 1970s, as the cultural revolution in China, Vietnam's victory over the USA and the various national revolutions in Southern Africa seemed to provide the criteria and a model for the kind of radical socio-political change needed not only in the third world but also in North America and Western Europe.

This hope for worldwide revolutionary change has seemed less credible since the collapse of Maoism in China and the demise of Soviet-style communism throughout Central and Eastern Europe. Many developing countries, especially in East Asia, have mastered modern technology and free-market methods of production and trading. At the same time, ethnic fragmentation in some post-colonial and post-Communist societies has resulted in repression of minorities, military conflict, attempted genocide and destruction of infrastructure leading to poverty, unemployment and homelessness. Meanwhile, South Africa's post-apartheid experience with the issues of impunity and reconciliation is only beginning to be tested as a possible model for re-building community in shattered societies.

Another factor upsetting the calculations of promoters of change, regardless of their ideologies, has been a new awareness of the limits of world resources and the impact of modern technology on the natural and human environment. Individual churches and the ecumenical movement have expressed concern for issues of faith, science and the future (the theme of the 1979 WCC world conference at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, USA). Yet ecumenical efforts to integrate this concern with the older themes of social justice and social democracy (or participation) proved difficult. A first attempt, the WCC study programme on "Just, Participatory and Sustainable Society" (1976-79), failed to find an agreed theological-ethical basis for such an integration. In accordance with a call from Vancouver 1983, the WCC launched a programme emphasis on "Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation",* which included a 1990 world consultation in Seoul, South Korea. Despite disagreements at Seoul over a theological basis from which to address such concerns, the Pontifical Council on Justice and Peace focused on issues similar to those discussed at Seoul and Canberra, including racism, the world debt crisis and the relationship of such systemic reasons for poverty to the potential for a just and balanced human ecology.*

Following the 1992 United Nations conference on environment and development in Rio de Janeiro, the WCC began to refine the concept of a sustainable society into that of

“just and sustainable communities” nurturing equitable relationships within the human family but also between humanity and the rest of creation. Churches and ecumenical bodies joined a coalition of international organizations, civil society organizations, trade unions and other activists in the Jubilee 2000 movement for a moratorium as a solution to the debt crisis.* Harare incorporated these and other concerns in its call for a more coherent approach to challenges arising from globalization.*

Since 1975, increasing attention has been given to the issue of sexism,* which resulted in the WCC programme on the role of women in church and society as well as the Ecumenical Decade on the Churches in Solidarity with Women* (1988-98). Many churches have participated in the development of feminist theology* and its insights into justice, overcoming violence, community and ecology. The larger implications of women’s programmes for Christian social thought are becoming apparent but have yet to be spelled out in detail and in relation to the range of ecumenical views on specific economic and political systems.

Clearly, for some time it has been difficult for Christians to agree on a common theological and ethical approach to society. The surge of “new theologies” fostered by new social concerns has added to the problem. Theologies of liberation, of neo-liberalism or neo-conservatism, of feminism, of people’s participation, of racial and ethnic justice, of human sexuality, of eco-justice or eco-feminism, theologies claiming to embody traditional dogma – all tend to vie for pride of place. As John Cobb pointed out, all these “theologies of” make claims to be complete theological systems, offering more than Christian ethical doctrines on one particular human or social problem. This helps to explain why the WCC’s efforts since Vancouver to achieve “a vital and coherent” theological basis for ecumenical witness and action in society have met with limited success.

At a time when so many Christian groups are confident that they have the only theological-ethical answer to the horrendous problems of modern society, it may be sobering to recall an observation of an earlier ecumenical prophet, Ernst Lange. Reflecting on a Faith and Order conference (Louvain 1971), Lange made this judgment on the large claims of the churches to work for their own unity and the unity of humankind: “Stored up in the realities of (world social) interdependence is a potential for conflict of such grotesque dimensions that any large claims for the church simply die on our lips” (And Yet It Moves, 95).

Today the main task facing churches in their relation to society may be to encourage these many self-confident social theologies to undertake a more incisive dialogue with each other. Its aim would be to clarify common theological perspectives and more effectively to relate their varying perceptions of peace, justice, social order, and the natural creation and also to clarify methods and strategies Christians may use in the struggle for human betterment and reconciliation.*

See also church and world.

PAUL ABRECHT

- Ans van der Bent, Commitment to God’s World, WCC, 1995
- “Fifty Years of Ecumenical Social Thought”, ER, 40, 2, 1988
- L.S. Mudge, Rethinking the Beloved Community, WCC, 2000
- H.R. Niebuhr, Christ and Culture, New York, Harper, 1951
- D.P. Niles, ed., Between the Flood and the Rainbow, WCC, 1992
- R.L. Petersen ed., Christianity and Civil Society: Theological Education for Public Life, Cambridge MA, Boston Theological Institute, 1995
- K. Raiser, For a Culture of Life, Geneva, WCC, 2002
- K. Raiser, “The World Council of Churches and International Civil Society”, ER, 46, 1, 1994
- E. Troeltsch, Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen (ET The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, London, Allen & Unwin, 1931)
- W.A. Visser ‘t Hooft & J.H. Oldham, The Church and Its Function in Society, London, Allen & Unwin, 1937.

SOCIOLOGY OF ECUMENISM

WHEN THE academic discipline of ecumenics was institutionalized in the form of professorships, lectureships and ecumenical institutes in the 1960s and 1970s, specialists were generally appointed from the disciplines of dogmatics, church history and biblical studies. This history explains why the sociology of ecumenism is still a rather under-developed discipline. Recent developments in the sociology of ecumenism also tend to be overlooked by ecumenists. For example, neither the Classified Catalogue of the Ecumenical Movement (1972) nor the first edition of this dictionary includes an entry on the sociology of ecumenism. Berger's seminal article "A Market Model for the Analysis of Ecumenicity" (1963) is not listed in the WCC catalogue, while Currie's historical-sociological analysis of British Methodism (1968) appears under "Methodist positions in the ecumenical movement". Nevertheless, Robert Towler (a sociologist of religion) rightly insisted in 1974 that "an ideology as strong and persuasive as ecumenism deserves careful study".

The general neglect of the sociology of ecumenism in ecumenical circles can also be attributed to the fact that scholars in this relatively new sub-discipline usually discuss their findings rather with other sociologists. For example, the programmes of the Religious Research Association, the Association for the Sociology of Religion (in the USA) and the sociology of religion section of the British Sociological Association now feature at least some papers on ecumenical issues. Social scientists operating in this field also tend to publish their work in sociological journals, which are not always read by ecumenists trained in (biblical) theology and church history.

There have indeed been some contacts between ecumenists and social scientists. As early as 1929, H. Richard Niebuhr (who was profoundly influenced by the socio-theology of Troeltsch) published The Social Sources of Denominationalism to show that such "sociological factors" as race and social class could well explain the persistent tendency in Protestant churches towards schism and denominationalism. Hence the long debate in the ecumenical movement on "The Non-Theological Factors in the Making and Unmaking of Church Unity" which began in Edinburgh (1937) and continued until 1963 (Montreal). Niebuhr, however, thought that he had overstated his case in 1929, and thus he wrote The Kingdom of God in America (1937). There Niebuhr no longer treats the "non-theological factors" as the independent variable in the ecumenical equation but, rather, "the power of theology". In short, theology is not always an epiphenomenon of the sociological factors. Sociologically speaking, however, it is still not clear whether theological or non-theological factors function as independent or dependent variables in the ecumenical process.

C.H. Dodd reopened this debate during preparations for the meeting of Faith and Order in Lund (1952) with his letter on "Unavowed Motives", which explains why Nils Ehrenström and W.G. Muelder prepared a report on Institutionalism and Church Unity, discussed at Montreal (1963). It is still the only explicitly sociological report ever commissioned by F&O. Between New Delhi (1961) and Uppsala (1968), sociologists such as H.J. Margull organized the project entitled the "Missionary Structure of the Congregation"* at the request of the WCC Department on Studies in Evangelism. Since the 1960s, most of the work in this field (esp. the generation of "market models of ecumenism") has been done in departments of sociology and/or departments of religious studies and is usually reported in sociological publications.

One of the most promising approaches is based upon the theory and practice of historical sociology. It begins with the ideals of the ecumenical pioneers, which gave rise to "unofficial trans-denominational protest movements" (YMCA, YWCA, SCMs, inter-faith peace movements etc.). Some of their members subsequently rose through the ranks of their own denominations, hence the emergence of an "official ecumenical elite" which was able to "officialize" such ecumenical institutions as the IMC and organize the classic ecumenical conferences (F&O and L&W) to which denominations sent officially appointed delegates. Their continuation committees were amalgamated in 1948 (IMC in 1961) in order to "socially construct" the WCC. Meanwhile, the "ecumenical elite" has also socially constructed a worldwide network of councils of churches from the global to the local level, whose "hubs" gradually transformed themselves into ecumenical bureaucracies in the process.

Meanwhile, the application of the Lund principle* (1952) seems to have shifted the focus of ecumenical action from the social movements and international conferences towards ecumenical negotiations (dialogue), and the evaluation of "consensus" texts.

Hence the growing gulf between the “officials” and the “social movements” which Willaime describes in terms of “disjointed ecumenism” (oecuménisme écartelé). In short, the ecumenical process has transformed itself into “a species of ecumenical diplomacy practised by experts”, and the historical phase characterized by “social movements” seems to have ended (ch. 1). Although some ecumenical social movements did become weaker in the 1960s (the Dutch SCM later disbanded), their alleged demise is more apparent than real; ecumenists do not always familiarize themselves with descriptions of (new) ecumenical movements in the sociological journals. Nevertheless, there are signs of a growing lack of communication between the elite and the grassroots. For example, the consensus texts of the elite are not always received at local or intermediate levels (reception*), while officials sometimes refuse to sponsor (new) ecumenical movements such as those concerned for justice, peace and the integrity of creation.

PETER STAPLES

■ J.-P. Willaime ed., Vers de nouveaux oecuménismes: Les paradoxes contemporains de l'oecuménisme: Recherches d'unité et quêtes d'identité, Paris, Cerf, 1989.

SODEPAX

THE JOINT committee on Society, Development and Peace – transcending languages by its acronym SODEPAX – was from 1968 to 1980 the sole co-responsible agency between the Vatican (through its Commission on Justice and Peace, established by Paul VI in 1967) and the WCC (first through the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development, then in 1970 through the more embracing unit on Justice and Service). Jointly announced as “an ecumenical experiment” with three-year mandates, SODEPAX was well supported by the WCC Church and Society conference (1966) and the WCC Uppsala assembly (1968), John XXIII's social encyclicals* on Christianity and social progress (Mater et Magistra, 1961), and on peace (Pacem in Terris, 1963), Paul VI's encyclical on development (Populorum Progressio, 1967), and above all, Vatican II's document on the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes, 1965).

A WCC/RCC-sponsored conference on development* in Beirut (1968) brought together theologians and church leaders from “developed and developing” countries, representatives from international organizations, and leading experts in world politics and economics. The success of this interdisciplinary conference and its widely circulated report were a major impetus to the formation of SODEPAX.

Headquartered in Geneva with competent staff and generous funding from foundations and trusts, SODEPAX quickly responded to the widespread local and national initiatives by helping them to set up their own SODEPAX groups. It launched six programmes: social communication, education for development, mobilization for peace, development research, theological reflection, and working with people of other faiths. It organized several large international conferences, notably on the theology of development (1969), on the communications media in the service of development and peace (1970), on peace and the international community (1970), on the churches' role in the development of Asia (1970) and on peace in Northern Ireland (1973). In 1976 SODEPAX launched a programme of encouraging local and national ecumenical collaboration on the issues of the New International Economic Order, the church and the poor, the environment. Its quarterly Church Alert (1973-80) published the positions of the holy see and the WCC, as well as stimulating articles on development, peace and human rights.

Within a decade SODEPAX became the victim of its own vigorous successes. It needed more staff to respond to demands from so many areas but found less outside funding. The parent bodies were under pressure to bear almost all the costs, at the very time when they were worrying about SODEPAX becoming an almost independent third entity because of the somewhat diffuse character of its programmes and its free style of operation. And SODEPAX was coming up against the limits of the whole relation between the RCC and the WCC – a world-organized church with central authority, and a council of churches which is one step removed from the decision-making structures of the member churches.

By 1980 the two most effective, visible symbols of RCC/WCC collaboration were the full RC participation in Faith and Order and SODEPAX, and the latter even more so because of its close contact within the network of similarly structured national and regional organizations. Many on both sides interpreted the demise of SODEPAX (31 December 1980) as a weakening or even a withdrawal from a shared commitment to active collaboration. On the contrary, the WCC/RCC Joint Working Group* (JWG) emphasized that what "ultimately matters... is the will to work together effectively" and to find realistic, visible, "flexible forms of collaboration on the international as well as on the national and local levels"; for example, in common witness for peace, for the defence of human rights, including the right to religious freedom (JWG fifth report, 1983). But current visible WCC/RCC joint structures have so far failed to replace the original aims, activities and studies of SODEPAX. Even the post-SODEPAX joint consultative group for social thought and action (1982), composed of staff from related offices in Geneva and the Vatican, collapsed in 1989. During the 1990s only regular information exchanges took place between the Vatican Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace and the WCC staff.

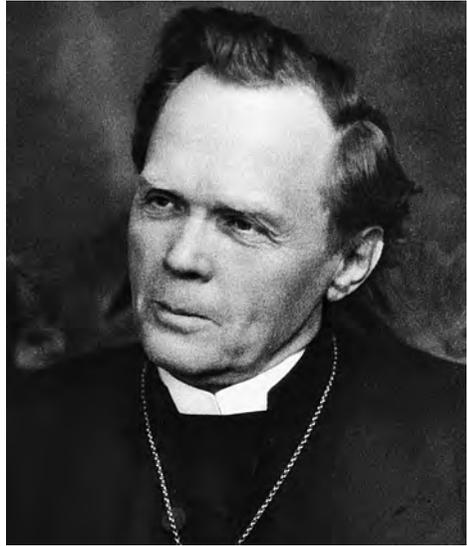

TOM STRANSKY

■ Church Alert, Oct.-Dec. 1980 ■ P. Land, "Sodepax: An Ecumenical Dialogue", ER, 37, 1985 ■ J. Lual, "Sodepax", in Ökumene Lexikon, Frankfurt, Lembeck, 1985 ■ "Social Thought and Action", in Seventh Report of the JWG, Geneva-Rome, WCC, 1998 ■ Vatican Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity, IS, 44, 1980.

SÖDERBLOM, NATHAN

B. 15 Jan. 1866, Trönö, Sweden; d. 12 July 1931, Uppsala. Archbishop of Sweden, historian of religions and pioneer of the 20th-century ecumenical movement, Söderblom did more, according to George Bell, than any other Christian leader or teacher of his time "to unite Orthodox and evangelical churches of all nations and communions in a common fellowship".

Söderblom grew up in a pietistic parsonage, and he remained rooted in its deep revivalist spirit throughout his entire life, even if his scientific investigations and encounter with liberal Protestant theology allowed him to grow far beyond it. After studying theology in Uppsala, Söderblom served as chaplain to the Swedish legation in Paris from 1894 to 1901. There he received a doctorate in theology with a dissertation on ancient Persian religion. He was professor of the history of religion in Uppsala from 1901 to 1914 (and simultaneously in Leipzig from 1912 to 1914). His numerous writings in this field earned him an international reputation.

Involvement in the student movement had brought him early contacts and experiences with Christians from other churches and continents. Already at the age of 24, while attending the 1891 Northfield student conference in the US, Söderblom had written in his diary words that could well stand as the motto for his entire life: "Lord, give me the humility and wisdom to serve the great cause of the free unity of your church."

His surprising choice as archbishop of Uppsala in May 1914 (he was third on the list of three presented to the king) gave him unexpected scope for exercising such responsibility, and this came to expression in the first instance in his repeated initiatives for peace during the first world war. To be sure, his appeal "for peace and for Christian fellowship" at the beginning of the war – signed only by churches in neutral countries – turned out to be as unsuccessful as the three efforts (in 1917 and 1918) to bring church leaders in the belligerent countries together in an international church conference (which also in the end drew participants only from several neutral countries).

Söderblom's renewed efforts after the war at founding an ecumenical council of the churches, which would seek to bring Christian principles to bear on international relations and social, industrial and economic life while deferring consideration of differences of doctrine, issued eventually in the universal Christian conference on Life and Work, held in Stockholm in 1925. The successful preparation and follow-up of this milestone in ecumenical history were due almost exclusively to Söderblom's personal initiatives and surpassing breadth of vision. After Stockholm 1925, it was no longer possible to ignore the fact of common Christian responsibility for humanity living together in peace, freedom and justice.

Although working out the consequences of the Life and Work conference was Söderblom's most urgent priority, he also took part in the parallel Faith and Order* movement. In 1927, at its first world conference in Lausanne, he chaired the important section on "the unity of Christendom and the relation thereto of existing churches".

His life work was given worldwide recognition and honour in 1930 when he was awarded the Nobel peace prize.

See also ecumenical conferences, Life and Work.

HANFRIED KRÜGER

■ C.J. Curtis, Söderblom: Ecumenical Pioneer, Minneapolis, Augsburg, 1967 ■ B. Sundkler, Nathan Söderblom: His Life and Work, Lund, Gleerup, 1968.

SOLIDARITY

IN THE MAIN, two basic conceptions of solidarity can be distinguished in present-day discussions of this term: solidarity as (comprehensive) interdependence and solidarity as covenant* or alliance.

In Roman Catholic social doctrine the term "principle of solidarity" denotes a basic conception of political order* regarded as opposed both to middle-class individualism and to social collectivism, and as emphasizing not only that the individual is dependent on other human beings but also that society exists for people. Opinions are divided as to what importance the principle may still be thought to have for contemporary discussions of social theory and practical politics. While some regard it as serving as a critical corrective, others point to the problems raised by its appeal to neo-scholastic arguments of natural law and its consequently abstract character. On this account, it is said, the principle is not sufficiently relevant to situations of oppression and threat. While this principle of solidarity is based entirely on a conception of solidarity as mutual interdependence, the papal encyclicals of recent years (e.g. Sollicitudo Rei Socialis) increasingly refer also to a conception of solidarity as alliance (with the poor*), though apparently without linking the two conceptions.

In view of the growing awareness of worldwide problems affecting everyone, in particular the nuclear and ecological threats, a concept of universal solidarity is becoming increasingly important, emphasizing general involvement in the sense of global interdependence. This view of solidarity complements an increasingly popular conception of politics that transcends the limits of the nation state, analyzing particular problems in the perspective of wider contexts.

The theory and practice of party or partisan solidarity were promoted in particular by the labour movement. Such solidarity denotes, on the one hand, the coming together of people suffering under the same unjust structure in order to campaign against it and the interest groups defending it and, on the other hand, the practical action of other people who join in active sympathy with the victims and their fight for liberation. Party solidarity has become a major historical driving force, channelled by people's awareness that they themselves can shape their social conditions.

A specific danger of party solidarity is clearly that of pressure or coercion to conform within the group. In situations of conflict, outspoken self-criticism often looks like treason. To that extent, morally reinforced party solidarity needs to be counterbalanced by deliberately cultivated openness and participation.

The phrase solidarity with the poor may be taken to sum up the comprehensive challenge which confronts Christian churches at the present time. At the same time it expresses an outlook strongly influenced by the traditions of party solidarity (solidarity as self-organization by the poor and as a challenge to the churches, esp. those of the first world, to join in and help).

It is theologically explosive to adopt the Old Testament covenant theme, according to which God made an alliance with the poor as a defence against their adversaries, thus assigning the poor a special role in the history of redemption. To stand in solidarity by their side is not merely an expression of a faith already constituted beforehand but concerns the essence of faith,* church* and theology.

This solidarity has a universal tendency because it extends to all who are poor. In a certain sense it even goes beyond normal solidarity, in that the latter envisages the individual in his or her immediate social environment (e.g. in a particular state), whereas solidarity with the poor moves towards a solidarity with those who are outsiders in terms of existing societies.

In a somewhat modified sense solidarity with others means those who are culturally different, especially people of other ethnic groups. This attention to people of other cultures is of recent date in the churches. If in face of the threat from a standardized Western civilization, poor people and people who are different come together, the nature of such a solidarity must not be overlooked. In so far as it includes differences, it possesses an inherent corrective to the pressure for uniformity stemming from party solidarity. The tenacity of cultural difference and its claim to full respect can protect solidarity with the poor from degenerating into a one-dimensional conception of liberation.

See also subsidiarity.

PETER ROTTLÄNDER

- N. Brieskorn ed., Globale Solidarität: Die verschiedenen Kulturen und die eine Welt, Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1997
- B. Cortes, "Seeking a New Society: Resurrection and Solidarity", ER, 46, 3, 1994
- M. Lamb, Solidarity with Victims, New York, Crossroad, 1982
- J.B. Metz, Glaube in Geschichte und Gesellschaft (ET Faith in History and Society, London, Burns & Oates, 1980) ■ O. von Nell-Breuning, Baugesetze der Gesellschaft, rev. ed., Freiburg, Herder, 1990

■ A. Pieris, "A Theology of Liberation in the Asian Churches", Japan Missionary Bulletin, 40, 1986.

SOLOVIEV, VLADIMIR

B. 16 Jan. 1853, Moscow; d. 31 July 1900, Uzkoe, near Moscow. Theologian, philosopher, mystic, poet, journalist and ecumenist, Soloviev thought that the essence of Christianity consisted in the union of God and the human being in the incarnate Word, but that Eastern Orthodoxy neglected the human being, while Western Christianity tended to forget God. He pleaded for the reunion of the Orthodox church and the Roman Catholic Church. In 1889 he published La Russie et l'Église universelle, which met a very hostile reception in Russia, and the holy synod forbade him to write further on religious topics. In 1896 he made a profession of faith, confessed to a Catholic priest and received holy communion. He hoped to see all human beings united religiously in Christianity, which would be in practice a theocracy under the pope, and politically under the czar. Later he became more pessimistic, and more concerned with the problem of evil and of the antichrist.* On his deathbed he received the last rites from a Russian Orthodox priest. Since he believed that Roman Catholicism and Orthodoxy remained mystically united despite their outward separation, he considered intercommunion* justifiable. In his philosophy he was influenced by J. Boehme, F.W.J. Schelling and G.W.F. Hegel. He sought to combine their pantheism with the Christian doctrine of the incarnation.* Dostoyevsky fashioned the character Alyosha in The Brothers Karamazov after Soloviev.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- V. Soloviev, Russia and the Universal Church, London, Bles, 1948
- God, Man and the Church, Cambridge, James Clarke, 1937
- E. Munzer, Solovyeu, Prophet of Russian-Western Unity, London, Hollis & Carter, 1956
- D. Stremoukhoff, Vladimir Soloviev and His Messianic Work, Belmont, Nordland, 1980
- P. Valliere, Modern Russian Theology. Bukharev, Soloviev, Bulgakov: Orthodox Theology in a New Key, Edinburgh, T&T Clark, 2000.

SOUTH AMERICA: ANDEAN REGION

AS A PART OF the vice-royalty of Peru and Chile, the areas that later became Peru, Bolivia and Ecuador were part of the colonial system and the colonial Catholic church. Lima, the capital of the vice-royalty, was an important centre where several synods were held during the colonial period. It was also a see of the Inquisition where a number of foreigners (mostly British and French) were condemned for "Lutheran heresy" (a general term for all suspected of Protestantism). Religious liberty did not exist in the colonial period.

Latin American independence brought continuity with the Catholicism mentioned above. Nevertheless, non-Catholic foreigners enjoyed a measure of tolerance after the different countries gained their emancipation.

The struggle between church and state for control of society is an essential factor in understanding the precarious situation of Protestant communities. The demand for freedom of conscience and freedom of worship by the Protestant religious minorities in Latin America effectively made them the allies of the radical liberalism which was seeking to build a modern Latin America, breaking with the Spanish colonial heritage rather than preserving continuity with it.

One of the main concerns of the Latin American political elites at the start of the 19th century was to link the emerging nation states to the "march of progress" that was underway on the political front. In this context the representatives of the British and American Bible societies were welcomed.

With the protection of liberal governments the Scottish Baptist missionary and educationist James Thomson (1788-1854) introduced the Bible and the educational system devised by Joseph Lancaster to Chile (1821), where he had the backing of President O'Higgins; to Peru (1822), where he had the support of General San Martín himself and where translation of the New Testament into Quechua was started in 1923 and, with the help of the priest Pasoskanki, into Aymara (1824); and to Ecuador (1824). In Bolivia the earliest Bible missionaries arrived by way of the south and from Buenos Aires (1883-98) – José Mongiardino (the first martyr), Francisco Penzotti, Andrés Milne, J.B. Arancet and others (1827-90).

Other Bible teachers and missionary pioneers established a Protestant presence towards the end of the century. When the first pan-American missionary conference took place in Panama in 1916 (see Latin American Council of Churches) Protestant churches had been established in all the Andean countries, but their numbers were still small. The missionary agreement reached at the preparatory meeting for the Panama congress in 1914 was perhaps the first ecumenical decision affecting the churches in this region, for it determined which churches would be present in the different parts of each country.

A policy of bitter polemics and accusations characterized relations with the majority Roman Catholic Church. Intra-Protestant relations soon developed their own problems, and the region suffered from denominational divisions and theological conflicts imported from abroad and from local division owing to leadership conflicts between missionaries and nationals or within each of the two groups. Under the influence of the cooperation committee created by some missionary societies and boards and through the friendship developed among several local leaders, different forms of cooperation and joint action developed, particularly since the 1920s. Subsequently, missionaries established "associations" or "fellowships" for consultation, practical cooperation and sometimes comity agreements.

BOLIVIA

In Bolivia a regional conference was created in 1917, followed by a conference of national evangelical workers in 1935 and an attempt in 1941 to create an evangelical council of Bolivia, inspired by the Panama conference. Some evangelical churches created ANDEB (National Association of Evangelicals in Bolivia) in 1966, which was joined by most Protestant churches in the country.

The Ecumenical Fund for Development, an organization based in Cochabamba, tries to involve lay leaders, concentrating on development and social aid for rural communities. Other ecumenical bodies in La Paz and Cochabamba have offered their services only during periods of military dictatorship (1972-82), for Bolivian churches have generally shown little ecumenical initiative.

In recent years an ecumenical group with the participation of the historical churches has been organized in Bolivia, on the initiative of the bishops conference of Bolivia and the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI), Andean region. One of the tasks of the ecumenical group is to bear witness to the rapprochement among the churches and engage in dialogue with the leadership of ANDEB to find ways of bringing the Protestant churches and the Roman Catholic church closer together. Four Bolivian churches are members of CLAI.

ECUADOR

In the early 1970s three missions – the Evangelical Alliance Mission, the Church of the Brethren and the United Andean Indian Mission – discussed the possibility of forming an Ecuadorian evangelical church with the small local churches founded by them and the independent churches that might wish to join a new national church. The first two missions had links with the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States. Given the tensions existing between some of the older missions and the national personnel working in the local churches founded by them, it was likely that some of these churches and their pastors would join the new national church. The more conservative missions, which have resisted ecumenical efforts, viewed this possibility with concern.

In 1963 some missionaries with HCJB World Radio, in Quito, established the Ecuadorian Evangelical Fraternity (CEE) in order to present a united evangelical front to the government and defend freedom of conscience. The president of the CEE identifies its objectives as (1) promoting the unity of the evangelical churches, (2) developing joint efforts in evangelism and social service, and (3) defending the rights of Evangelicals and human rights in general where these have been violated.

Other such organizations in Ecuador include the Quito Corps of Pastors, which meets every month, attended by an average of 100 pastors, and the Ecumenical Fraternity, founded in April 1997, which brings together Catholic and Protestant church leaders and non-governmental organizations. It aims to promote Christian unity through prayer, Bible study, theological discussions and worship; it also prepares the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.* The Society of Evangelical Theological Education Institutes (SIETE), likewise founded in 1997, groups together all the seminaries in Quito. SIETE serves as a forum to encourage training, exchange of teaching staff, theological development and fellowship.

PERU

The National Council of Churches of Peru was formed in 1940 on the basis of the Evangelical Alliance, testifying to interconfessional unity through its services and its national presence. In recent years it has become a counterpart to the Roman Catholic Church and a partner of civil society in the debate on topics of national interest. One long-standing ecumenical body is the Interconfessional Committee of Religious Leaders, in which the Jewish community and the Roman Catholic Church participate. It also includes some of the Council's member churches and is not in competition with it. The Christian Centre for Social Promotion is perhaps the most active ecumenical organization in the area of human rights and pastoral studies and publications. The Ecumenical Foundation for Peace Education, as part of the human rights committee of Peru, contributes to education for peace through educational programmes and legal actions to defend the affected sectors of society. Four churches in Peru are members of CLAI.

CHILE

The Association of Evangelical Churches of Chile (AIECH) was founded in 1974 "to establish a mechanism for facilitating understanding, exchange and the development of common programmes among the evangelical churches in Chile". The founders of the association were the Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, Lutheran and Anglican Churches, the Protestant Centre and various Pentecostal missions, and UNELAM (Latin American Evangelical Movement for Unity, Andean Region). Although it was the organization most representative of Chilean Protestantism, AIECH did not fulfill the criteria required for an alliance with the dictatorial political power of General Pinochet. It brought together all the churches with an ecumenical tradition that were actively engaged in the defence of human rights from the very beginning of the coup d'état.

A religious body such as AIECH, set up by the churches for a clear and specific purpose – which troubled the government by its critical attitude, even though it did not engage in systematic political opposition – was bound to be excluded from any plans for a permanent body to maintain relations between the minority churches and the military authorities.

Other Evangelical leaders who had supported Pinochet and the military government continued conversations with the political authorities with a view to agreeing on a strategy that would enable continued support. In 1975 the National Evangelical Activities Coordinating Centre (CENCA) was formed “to coordinate relations for the evangelical churches which have subscribed to the document in support of the government among themselves and with the military authority”. CENCA's most important achievement was the creation that year of the Council of Pastors of Chile, with 14 missions supporting the initiative.

In 1984 various evangelical churches representing different currents of the Reformed faith in Chile formally set up the Christian Fraternity of Churches, an ecumenical group that includes the Orthodox church. This organization continues the goals of the now-defunct AIECH, while contributing more clearly to work in defence of human rights. It often opposes positions adopted officially by the Council of Pastors.

Ecumenical seminaries exist in Chile (Evangelical Theological Community), in Peru (Biblical Theological Community), and Bolivia (Andean Higher Ecumenical Institute of Theology). In addition, numerous denominational seminaries often have inter-denominational enrolment and faculty.

After the coup d'état in 1973, there was a variety of evangelical action in opposition to the regime of General Pinochet, and likewise activities in support of human development directed towards the poor and marginalized sectors. These projects are run by various bodies.

Concern about the challenges facing evangelical Christians in Chilean society caused their leaders to form groups to reflect on the current situation. This effort led to the formation in 1983 of the Circle for Evangelical Studies and Reflection.

When democracy was restored in 1990, President Patricio Aylwin invited the different religious expressions to cooperate in the country's reconciliation, with a view to publicizing the “Truth and Reconciliation” report, better known as the Rettig report, which gave an account of the violations of human rights perpetrated under the military dictatorship. This invitation, which revealed evangelical divisions, led to the formation of the Evangelical Organizations Coordination Committee to coordinate their efforts. This body comprises the Council of Pastors, the Christian Fraternity of Churches, pastoral units and independent denominations. This effort for unity played an important part in the promulgation of the new law on religion, passed in October 1999.

CONCLUSIONS

The majority indigenous population in all these countries represents a challenge for the churches with a relatively ecumenical tradition, in that the indigenous religious experience and the ways in which these people then manifest Christian spirituality are contributing to produce new models of community and dialogue with the Christian churches.

The growth of poverty and marginalization as a result of economic “adjustment plans”, the violation of human rights and the escalating violence in some areas (particularly in Peru), together with the growing numerical strength and public visibility of the Protestant churches, represent great challenges and offer opportunities that call for greater ecumenical solidarity and witness to unity from all the churches in this area.

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO, ROLANDO VILLEN A VILLEGAS and VÍCTOR REY

- M. Arias, Periodización Tentativa para el Protestantismo Boliviano, La Paz, Presencia Matutino Nacional, 1975
- J.-P. Bastian, Historia del Protestantismo en América Latina, Mexico City, CUPSA, 1990
- W. Browning, The

West Coast Republics, London, World Dominion, 1930 ■ J.B. Kessler, A Study of the Older Protestant Missions and Churches in Peru and Chile, Goes, Costerbaan & Le Cointre, 1967 ■ M.M. Marzal, The Indian Face of God in Latin America, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1996 ■ W. Padilla, La Iglesia y los Dioses Modernos: Historia del Protestantismo en el Ecuador, Quito, Corporación Económica Nacional, 1989 ■ J. Sepulveda, The Andean Highlands: An Encounter with Two Forms of Christianity, WCC, 1997 ■ C.P. Wagner, The Protestant Movement in Bolivia, Pasadena CA, William Carey, 1970.

SOUTH AMERICA: BRAZIL

THE HISTORY of the ecumenical movement in Brazil has been marked by the pan-Protestant spirit which characterized the modern missionary movement and by the impact made on Brazilian Protestantism by denominationalism,* the conferences of Edinburgh (1910) and Panama (1916), the foundation of the WCC (1948), conservative and fundamentalist propaganda, and the Second Vatican Council (1962-65).

In a way, the reformers laid the foundations of Christian denominationalism by refusing to identify the church with any type of institution, declaring that the church is to be found wherever there are believers and that the continuity of the church in time is equivalent to the continuity of the faithful to the extent that they maintain the true faith. When the various Calvinist tendencies produced in England the Westminster confession of faith and its catechisms (1643-49), those foundations were re-inforced by the thesis of freedom of conscience and of the presence of the individual churches within the universal church. Although this theological position favours both the principle of unity and that of diversity, the development of Protestantism in Brazil, due in large part to North American missions, promoted the strong denominational spirit which characterized Christianity in the US in the 19th century. The principles of strict separation of church and state* and of voluntary association, together with the ecclesiastical traditions of the Old World and the ethnic origins of the waves of immigrants flowing from Europe in the 19th century, tilted the balance towards diversity and predominance of the denominationalist spirit.

As well as denominationalism, however, the missionaries also brought the pan-Protestant spirit developed by Evangelicalism and by the Calvinist heritage, modified in the direction of the Arminianism of the Methodist movement, a fairly common theology strongly influenced by the great revival that occurred in the US in the first part of the 19th century. In consequence, Protestantism in Brazil, although having developed apart from the churches of European origin, maintained a common theological inheritance, which should have promoted the ecumenical spirit. Nevertheless the denominationalist principle prevailed and has had considerable influence on the ecumenical movement in this part of the world.

If denominationalism developed in the US for specific economic and cultural reasons, in Brazil it can be explained only by the fact that the missionaries reproduced their own denominations as a duty imposed by the respective missionary societies which sent and maintained them. In addition, however, the need for strong assertion of identity in face of the dominant religious majority of the country encouraged attachment to specific doctrines and a spirit of opposition to Roman Catholics. In this last respect, a notable paradox resulted from the impact of the congress of Panama (1916) on the Brazilian Protestant mentality. The congress, called in reaction to that of Edinburgh, which had excluded Latin America from its organization, displayed remarkable ecumenical spirit, not only by its pan-Protestantism, but especially by regarding the Roman Catholic Church as Christian and recognizing its evangelizing work in Latin America as legitimate. Thus Protestant evangelism was to go to those areas not reached by the RCC, cooperating with it in the common Christian mission.

The spirit and attitude of the congress, however, produced an irremediable split in Brazilian Protestantism and, though it meant well, compromised the future of the ecumenical movement in Brazil. It did so in the first place by weakening pan-Protestantism itself, for while some people accepted the spirit of the congress, others did not, thus opening up a source of internal distrust. In the second place, it re-inforced anti-Catholicism, producing a sort of united front against the RCC. In fact, most of the Brazilians who had been Catholic found the reasons for their conversion to Protestantism would have been undercut by the attitude of the congress and its followers. The development of the ecumenical movement in Brazil must be understood against this background.

As an expression of reaction against the Edinburgh conference, the conference on missions in Latin America, held in New York in 1913, created the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America, which in turn planned and held the congress of Panama in 1916. In Brazil, the Brazilian committee on cooperation was established for the purpose of encouraging joint Protestant-Catholic theological, Christian and secular educational work, demarcation of missionary territories etc. The committee pushed on with those projects, although some of them, such as the united seminary in Rio de Janeiro, did not manage to survive the denominationalist spirit. Nevertheless the committee, whose activities continued from 1920 to 1932, included the Sunday School Union, the Young Men's Christian Associations, the Evangelical Schools Federation and the above-mentioned seminary. The great leaders of the cooperation movement were the Presbyterian Erasmus Braga (1877-1932), whose ideas were expressed in his book Pan-Americanismo - Aspecto Religioso (Pan-Americanism - its religious aspect), 1917, and his disciple, also a Presbyterian, Epaminondas Melo Amaral (1893-1962), who defended views which openly favoured union in his book Magno Problema (Great problem), 1934. Melo Amaral was the first secretary general of the Evangelical Confederation of Brazil (CEB), which was founded in 1934 as a successor to the Brazilian committee on cooperation.

Besides stimulating internal cooperation by means of congresses, publications and representation of churches in their dealings with government authorities, the CEB maintained international relations with the World's Sunday School Association, the International Missionary Council* and the Stockholm movement (Life and Work*). However, the confederation never had close relations with the WCC, which was taking shape in embryo in those organizations. The confederation undoubtedly paid the price exacted by its inclusion of the hostile forces mentioned earlier, just as it could not represent all Brazilian churches, since the Baptists did not form part of it, while some of the numerous Lutherans joined only later (1958), through the Evangelical Church of Lutheran Confession in Brazil. Although the confederation served Protestantism in Brazil well, it could not survive its own internal ambiguities and the pressures of the changes that were taking place in the churches, both nationally and internationally, and in the early 1960s it began to decline. The lack of representation resulting from the demise of the CEB encouraged the rise of various other associations of churches and institutions expressing the different tendencies found within the ambit of Brazilian Protestantism.

The formation of the WCC polarized these tendencies, chiefly because at a time when the churches were examining their positions in face of a new state of affairs, the preaching against the WCC unleashed by Carl McIntire and his International Council of Christian Churches (ICCC) all over the world, and especially in Brazil in 1949, divided Protestantism in Brazil into three camps in regard to ecumenism: the fundamentalist, radically opposed to it; the conservative, representing a position midway between the WCC and the ICCC; and finally the openly ecumenical, composed of churches that gradually joined the WCC. In practice, however, the three attitudes reduce to two, because churches which opted for the middle position very frequently have assumed attitudes hostile to the ecumenical movement in general and the WCC in particular.

Growing awareness of the socio-political crisis led the CEB to organize its final and perhaps most significant expression of pan-Protestantism. Through its social responsibility of the church sector, in 1962 the confederation held a conference of the northeast in Recife. Under the heading "Christ and the Brazilian Revolutionary Process", Protestant theologians and sociologists presented these on the church's responsibility to a society in profound crisis. For the first time also, non-Protestant sociologists and economists, such as Gilberto Freyre, Celso Furtado and Paulo Singer, were invited to help analyze the current economic situation in Brazil. However, this conference seems to have played a decisive part in the almost total extinction of the CEB, for the conservative wing of the churches came to regard with even greater mistrust any expression of concern for social problems. And so, while pan-Protestantism was disintegrating, a growing radical movement agitated church circles, giving rise to a period of persecutions, exclusions and schisms. Socio-political instability, both continental and national, as well as the constant pressure from conservative and fundamentalist sources, often coming from outside the country through "faith missions", created a marked increase in suspicion and mistrust of the ecumenical movement, which was often regarded as in complicity with socialism.

The Second Vatican Council, with its openness to ecumenical dialogue, re-kindled the old problem of Protestant anti-Catholicism in Brazil, now embittered by propaganda inspired by the ICCC. Those of a more liberal and open tendency (the minority) were favourably impressed by the broader spirit in the RCC. However, these various forces operating in the religious field of Brazilian Protestantism are responsible for divisions, antagonisms and the closed self-centredness of some churches and make the ecumenical journey in Brazil increasingly difficult. An anti-socialist attitude which identifies socialism with atheism still persists, as does a lingering anti-Catholicism, now perhaps as a vestige of the need for Protestant self-identity.

The present situation of ecumenism in Brazil mirrors these conflicts and changes. It is not easy to discern the currents and focal points of ecumenism because of the ambiguous attitudes that some churches have towards it. Some groups (e.g. the Baptists and Congregationalists, not to mention the fundamentalist Presbyterian groups) are openly opposed to ecumenism. There is a perceptible weakening of the pan-Protestant spirit, as well as a change in ecumenical thinking on the part of individuals who, while within the various churches, continue to seek dialogue and fraternal cooperation between the different branches of Christianity.

A residual anti-ecumenism remains, now made more complex because of the political, social, economic and religious changes taking place in the world, which have had repercussions in Brazil. Protestantism in the country came into being and thrived in conflict with Roman Catholicism and later in clashes with atheistic socialism which were inspired by international fundamentalism. However, the changes within the RCC after the Second Vatican Council and the collapse of the existing socialism seem to have robbed mainstream Brazilian Protestantism of its only battle-fronts. This may explain the current indifference of such churches to contemporary historical developments in Brazil.

Ecumenical thought, still alive in Brazil, now seems to have passed to the RCC. At the congress of Panama in 1916, its liberal wing had already declared the need for the absolute centrality of Jesus Christ and his saving work in the preaching of the gospel, for the sake of which all Christians were called to overcome their differences and engage in this common task. The leading voice of this Christological emphasis for Latin America was Erasmus Braga. Two documents from the Second Vatican Council, the Dogmatic Constitution on the Church and the Decree on Ecumenism,* as well as John Paul II's encyclical Ut Unum Sint* (1995), deal in depth with the subject of the unity of Christians in Jesus Christ. The commitment of the RCC expressed in these texts still causes some difficulties for Protestants in general and for Brazilian Protestants in particular. But while the Panama congress was a watershed among Brazilian Protestants, the openness of the Second Vatican Council to non-Catholic Christians has met with only a cool response from them.

Despite RC commitment to dialogue between the confessions, the ecumenical movement, even with this new spirit, has not made much headway. On the contrary, signs point to declining interest, caused by two major factors. First, there are the internal conflicts in mainstream Protestantism, which is increasingly struggling with the great religious changes taking place in Brazil, resulting in a constant loss of members to new churches or religious groups and retreat into denominationalism as a means of strengthening their identity. Second, the acute proliferation of new religious groups of a Christian hue, frequently stigmatized as evangelical sects* – to the considerable discomfort of traditional Evangelicals* – gives rise to a religious fervour which distracts the attention of mainstream Christians and makes growing together and dialogue difficult. A further factor is that Protestants in general have not yet succeeded in coming together in a representative body as broad as the former Evangelical Confederation of Brazil, which could truly represent them in their relations and dialogues with other traditions.

If the divisive element in post-Panama Protestantism was its attitude towards the RCC, which was rejected by Latin American pan-Protestantism, present-day Protestantism is split yet further by the RCC's ecumenical progress. Its presence in interchurch bodies alongside other Christian churches, including Protestant, does help to give legitimacy to the ecumenical spirit, but at the same time it drives other churches away. Thus, because of the long history of anti-Catholicism in Latin America, the Roman Catholic Church continues to be a divisive element in the ecumenical scene. Dialogue and fellowship are thus limited.

Meanwhile, despite these limitations, mention should be made of the work of the National Council of Christian Churches in Brazil (CONIC), founded in 1982, and now with its office in Brasília, which groups the Roman Catholic Church, the Syrian Catholic Orthodox Church of Brazil, the Reformed Christian Church, the Episcopal Church of Brazil, the Evangelical Church of the Lutheran Confession in Brazil, the Methodist Church and the United Presbyterian Church. The council aims at overcoming the historic and doctrinal divisions between the churches by promoting encounters, studies and publications on matters of common concern. An important yearly activity is the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.*

Very similar and closely linked with CONIC is the Fraternity Movement of Christian Churches of São Paulo (MOFIC), of which the same churches are members, with the exception of the Syrian Orthodox Church, but including the Armenian Apostolic Church. The Commission on Ecumenism and Inter-religious Dialogue of the Archdiocese of São Paulo, a Roman Catholic body founded in 1977, works similarly to MOFIC. The Latin American Council of Churches* (CLAI), Brazil region, with only Protestant churches as members, maintains the spirit of pan-Protestantism. Many other ecumenical institutions exist in Brazil dedicated to study, teaching and research.

Despite the institutional conflicts which still persist at the turn of the new millennium, at least two important signs point to possible significant changes in ecumenical dialogue and growth together between the mainstream Christian churches in the future: the common concern about the enthusiastic religious movements which are drifting away from the traditional Christian faith, and agreement on the absolute centrality of Jesus Christ in the work of evangelization. In this regard the conference on world mission and evangelism held in Salvador, Bahia, in 1996 by the WCC under the title "Called to One Hope – the Gospel in Diverse Cultures" should show the churches the way forward in relationships between themselves, with the culture and with the new religious movements.

ANTONIO G. MENDONÇA

- A.G. Mendonça, "A History of Christianity in Brazil: An Interpretive Essay", IRM, 85, 338, 1996
- P.E. Pierson, A Younger Church in Search of Maturity: Presbyterianism in Brazil from 1910 to 1959, San Antonio, Trinity UP, 1974
- D.A. Reilly, História Documental do Protestantismo no Brasil, São Paulo, ASTE, 1984
- J. de Santa Ana, Ecumenismo e Libertação, Petrópolis, Vozes, 1987.

SOUTH AMERICA: RÍO DE LA PLATA REGION

FROM THE 16TH to the 18th century, the religious presence in the Río de la Plata region (encompassing modern Argentina and Uruguay) was exclusively Roman Catholic and was strongly coloured by the intolerance characteristic of the Reformation/Counter-Reformation struggles. The picture began to change in the 19th century, and particularly after the struggles of independence and the birth of the new nations, with the arrival of European and North American Protestants, both those related to economic enterprises and, almost simultaneously, missionaries of the various Protestant churches.

The Protestant presence in the region can be divided into five periods.

1818-67: THE BUILDING OF NATIONAL STATES

This period, characterized by British economic domination, saw the first appearance and development of Protestant work among expatriate groups. Among the first to start work during this period was the British Bible Society, which sent one of its representatives, the educator James Thomson, to visit various Latin American countries and spread the new Lancasterian method of teaching by reading the Bible. He was supported in this venture by liberal governments, which encouraged the setting up of the first public schools using this method.

In Argentina, the first political organizations following independence guaranteed freedom of conscience. In 1825, as part of a trade and friendship treaty between Argentina and Great Britain, freedom of worship was granted for British subjects, the only condition being – as a result of Catholic pressure – that services should be in English and only for English people.

In 1826 the Anglican cathedral was built, in 1829 the Scottish Presbyterian mission was established, and in 1836 Fountain Pitts and John Dempster started the Methodist mission in Buenos Aires and Montevideo. From 1850 to 1860 large groups of Waldensians arrived in Uruguay and were granted land for farming and permanent settlement by the Uruguayan government.

During this period Protestantism had a very limited impact on the religious life of the Río de la Plata. The real challenge came with the start of the second phase.

1867-80: NATIONAL ORGANIZATION

A feature of this period was the strong presence of the American Missionary Society, determined to forge ahead with the proclamation of the gospel linked to a modern vision of society.

The missionary societies received strong support in this enterprise from liberal governments such as those of the Argentinian presidents Bartolomé Mitre and Domingo Faustino Sarmiento, who not only encouraged the Protestant presence but were actively involved with them in various undertakings (e.g. the Society for the Protection of Animals set up by the Methodist pastor John Thompson, of which Sarmiento was president for two years).

In May 1867 Thompson preached for the first time in Spanish in the First Methodist Church of Buenos Aires. In 1869 the Missionary Society set up a base in Montevideo and started its work there among Uruguayans. This effort signalled a fundamental change in the development of Protestantism in the region. What had until then been peaceful coexistence with the Roman Catholic Church now turned into harsh competition in the field of mission and an irreconcilable clash between two conceptions of reality.

1880-1916: CONSOLIDATION OF LIBERALISM IN THE REGION

Continuing and consolidating previous developments, this period witnessed a tactical alliance between triumphant liberalism and Protestantism, accompanying the political and economic expansion of the United States and the American way of life. Liberal governments used Protestantism to curb anti-liberal Catholic efforts for domination, in the hope that the “civilizing” influence of its schools, free thinking and emphasis on individual initiative would be a ferment of development that could only serve their interests.

Against this background, Protestant newspapers began to appear, e.g. El Estandarte Evangélico, the organ of the Methodist Church in Argentina, founded in 1883, or El Evangelista, founded in Uruguay in 1877. Both papers entered the controversy against the clerical and rationalistic ideas of the age. Local Protestant churches took root throughout the country at this time, establishing their presence and witness on a more permanent and continuous footing.

To complete the Protestant picture in the region, the churches already mentioned were joined by the Salvation Army in 1890, Baptists in 1881 in Buenos Aires and 1911 in Montevideo, Free Brethren in 1880 and American Pentecostals in 1909. The foreign-language immigrant communities included Welsh chapels in the south of Argentina (1865), Swiss Reformed (1870), Congregationalists (Volga Deutsch, 1870), and Danish Lutherans (1870).

Besides churches, these groups also set up Protestant schools intended to spread the essential elements of liberal Protestant doctrine. Crandon College in Montevideo opened in 1906, while Ward College was founded in Buenos Aires in 1913 by the Methodists and the Disciples of Christ. Many parish primary schools were also opened in more popular areas. The Anglican pastor and educator William Morris worked in poor districts of Buenos Aires, founding schools and homes as part of this "civilizing" endeavour. In Uruguay, Waldensians and Methodists carried out an early experiment in ecumenical work when they founded the first Protestant institute of secondary education in 1888.

1916-49: NORTH AMERICAN DOMINATION

The pan-American congress in Panama in 1916 set a new course. As a result of a policy of cooperation and "good neighbourliness" between the US and Latin America, the previous spontaneous missionary presence now gave way to a planned and structured continental organization. Initially, this was an attempt to translate the ideal of cooperation between the two Americas in religious terms. To this extent, the Protestantism of this period was, largely involuntarily, a vehicle for promoting the foreign policy of the United States. This factor became a source of tension for Protestant identity in Latin America, since the rather vague national sense of the past had been replaced by a much stronger national consciousness, but the model within the churches continued to be that of the US whose missionaries had formed and educated the church leadership.

This was a period of great numerical growth, including the formation of several ecumenical associations for cooperation in different fields: the fight against alcoholism, Uruguay (1920), the Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Women's Christian Association in Buenos Aires and Montevideo, ecumenical initiatives for work among youth and women, ULAJE (Latin American Union of Protestant Youth), Rosario (1937) and the Student Christian Movement (SCM) in the early 1920s.

Also at this time in both Argentina and Uruguay a dialogue developed between the women of different Protestant denominations and Catholic and Orthodox women, celebrating unity in Christ. In the 1930s the Argentinian and Uruguayan Protestant Women's Leagues were formed.

1949-: POST-WAR AND COLD WAR

Two watershed events in the religious field marked this period – the founding of the World Council of Churches (1948) and the convening of the Second Vatican Council (1962-65). Each helped set the framework for the development of the ecumenical movement in the region during the second half of the 20th century.

The founding of the WCC opened the way for a creative and constructive approach to ecumenical work. A direct result of this initiative in Latin America was the formation in the 1950s of the Latin American Protestant Union (UNELAM), and in the 1970s of the Latin American Council of Churches (CLAI).* The Federation of Protestant Churches of the Río de la Plata, set up in 1939, divided into the Uruguayan Federation of Protestant Churches, formed in 1956, and the Argentine Federation of Protestant Churches in 1958.

Not all the evangelical Protestant churches present in the region are associated with these bodies. Indeed, they may even be a minority in view of the number of churches that have sprung up in recent times. Basically, the membership of the ecumenical bodies set up during this period forms what are usually known as the historical Protestant churches.

From the 1960s onwards, Latin America's overall economic dependence and the marginalization of its people became part of the agenda of the ecumenical movement. In this context, the other important event marking this period was the Second Vatican Council, followed by the Latin American bishops conferences (Medellín* 1969, Pueblo 1978, and Santo Domingo 1992). The council and the conferences opened the way for a hitherto unprecedented dialogue between Protestants and Catholics. Programmes of joint service and common study were planned, giving priority to the things that unite and leaving aside doctrinal differences. Social, political and economic realities began to be used as analytical categories in Bible study, theology and various missionary projects.

Also during this period Protestants developed many social initiatives through a variety of ecumenical organizations. Through the Latin American Ecumenical Coordination Committee, several ecumenical groups were created: Union of Latin American Ecumenical Youth, Student Christian Movement, Evangelical Latin American Commission on Christian Education and Church and Society in Latin America (ISAL), an organism of theological and social reflection which marked a new moment in Protestant theological thought for all Latin America but, during the first years, was centred in the River Plate and Brazil areas. The sociologists and theologians involved – e.g. Richard Shaull, Luis Odell, Leopoldo Niilus, José Míguez Bonino, Ruben Alves, Julio de Santa Ana, Hiber Conteris, Emilio Castro, Jether Pereyra Ramalho and Mauricio López – were ecumenical leaders concerned with the political and social development of the Southern Cone of Latin America. From ISAL later emerged the Urban and Social Mission and Ecumenical Popular Action. The praxis* and reflection which emerged from these organisms can be considered as the first significant expression of the theology of liberation in the Protestant field.

Other ecumenical bodies came into being at this time, several of them with Catholic and Jewish participation, seeking to cover a wide spectrum in the ecumenical field of mission. They deal with Christian education (United Christian Council for Education, 1971), (Protestant Higher Institute of Theological Studies, ISEDET, 1970), human rights (Ecumenical Movement for Human Rights, 1977), refugees and migrants (Argentine Committee for Refugees, 1973), social service (Ecumenical Centre for Social Action, 1974), and Ecumenical Reintegration Service, Uruguay), indigenous people (United Board of Mission, 1964), and popular ministry (Nueva Parroquia Urban Centre, 1971).

The situation of the 1980s in the Río de la Plata countries substantially changed the situation of the various international bodies sponsoring these ecumenical mission and service projects. Local situations too had changed since these projects were first conceived. These two facts marked the beginning of a new stage in ecumenical cooperation which is still in a state of transition. The trend seems to be towards ecumenical undertakings that are not weighed down by a heavy infrastructure and that are also more closely integrated into communities of faith and witness. They therefore operate with a smaller budget and more human resources, thanks to the people connected with these communities who work as volunteers on the projects.

A large number of evangelical churches look with suspicion on the word “ecumenism”, preferring to speak of “interdenominational activities”. In Argentina these churches, the majority of them conservative, banded together to form the Christian Association of Evangelical Churches of the Argentine Republic in 1985, through which they maintain conversations and a few sporadic contacts with the Argentine Federation of Protestant Churches. As to the vast evangelical Pentecostal field, some branches of it belong to ecumenical bodies connected with the WCC, while the majority are grouped together in the Evangelical Pentecostal Confederation.

Three organizations have joined, without losing their own identity, in the National Christian Evangelical Council (CNCE) for the organization of special events, such as a mass meeting of some 200,000 Evangelicals in the centre of Buenos Aires to express their concern for the socio-economic situation of the country.

New opportunities for ecumenical contact exist with non-traditional evangelical sectors, especially the ever-growing Pentecostal groups, which are seeking help and advice from the ecumenical community, particularly concerning theological education and questions of religious freedom.

The CNCE has also actively cooperated in the conversations with the Argentine government in order to provide new legislation which would ensure religious freedom and equality. And since 1995 a new place of encounter has begun between some of the traditional Protestant churches and Pentecostal and theologically conservative churches in the new spaces for prayer, reflection and common action called pastoral councils, which are functioning in most Argentine and Uruguayan cities.

Despite the changes which are bound to take place on the ecumenical scene in the Río de la Plata in the near future, what will remain unchanged is the commitment to a gospel that goes hand in hand with the struggle for justice, the protection of life and dialogue among the different expressions of Christianity and other ideologies, as well as showing forth the grace and solidarity of Jesus Christ in the struggle for freedom of people and peoples.

DANIEL A. BRUNO

■ J.-P. Bastian, Breve Historia del Protestantismo en América Latina, Mexico City, CUPSA, 1986 ■ A. Batlle, "El advenimiento del Protestantismo a América Latina", in E. Dussel, Historia de la Iglesia en América Latina, Barcelona, Nova Terra, 1972, app. 7 ■ V. D'Épinay et al., Las Iglesias del Trasplante, Buenos Aires, CEC, 1970 ■ N. Goodall, The Ecumenical Movement, What It Is and What It Does, London, Oxford UP, 1961 ■ J. Piquinela, "Protestantismo en el Cono Sur: Uruguay", and P. Deiros, "Protestantismo en el Cono Sur: Argentina", in Comisión de Estudios de Historia de la Iglesia en Latinoamericana (CEHILA), Para una Historia de la Evangelización en América Latina, Barcelona, Nova Terra, 1977.

SPIRITUAL ECUMENISM

SPIRITUAL ecumenism arises out of the conflict sensed between the gospel and two phenomena which blossomed fully in the 19th century: the competition in which the missionaries of the various Christian confessions indulged, and their frequently difficult encounters with the local cultures. In his high priestly prayer, Jesus on the eve of his death prayed that his disciples might be one. This unity was not an end in itself but was "so that the world may believe" (John 17:21). Spiritual ecumenism consists in identifying with Jesus' prayer so that through the action of his Spirit he himself can raise up from within each people a reconciled church capable of proclaiming the good news to all.

Spiritual ecumenism was affirmed at the Edinburgh missionary conference in 1910. Historically it takes the form of a refusal to identify the proclamation of the gospel with any one culture.* On the contrary, the Christian life and message are to be incarnated in the various cultures, making use of elements belonging to those cultures. Thus spiritual ecumenism can be understood in practice as an effort of the separated Christians to create "a new unity and communion, not only within the cultures in question but also within the church universal".

Spiritual ecumenism as affirmed from 1910 onwards may thus be defined functionally as a gospel requirement which is prior to practical and theological ecumenism, as expressed in the early conferences of Life and Work (1925) and Faith and Order (1927), and which justifies and coordinates them. It is the foundation on which the WCC was built (1948).

In the Roman Catholic Church spiritual ecumenism has been affirmed since the 1930s, with some forerunners preparing the way for the changes made by Vatican II.* Mention may be made of the priests from Lyons: Paul Couturier, who organized the world Week of Prayer for Christian Unity,* and Jean Monchanin, who went to India in 1938 and founded an ashram there – a place for prayer and encounter for Christian and Hindu forms of spirituality. The fundamental intuition of these two priests was that "union will be the concern of all those who pray". In 1940, a dark year of war, Roger Schutz and Max Thurian established the Taizé community* in Burgundy, in a spirit of fellowship with all who suffer. This community has been one of the first to provide a stable setting for Protestants, Anglicans, Orthodox and Roman Catholics to unite in prayer. With spiritual ecumenism taking root, an ecumenical translation of the Bible became necessary. The French version was completed in 1976 with the support of the Roman Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox leaders and has been distributed since 1977 by the United Bible Societies in a smaller version and with notes, for use of the general public.

The success of common translations of the Bible and of prayer communities like Taizé (which continues to attract many young people from all over the world) shows that spiritual ecumenism answers a real need among many Christians, whether they identify with a church body or not. It enables them to witness in common to their faith, even while the prospect of theological agreement seems to be receding with the crisis of identity from which many churches are suffering. And it makes it possible to combine the duty of evangelism* with respect for religious liberty* and the diversity of cultures. It is a risk and a hope, a reflection of the faith itself.

See also Bible, its role in the ecumenical movement; prayer in the ecumenical movement; spirituality in the ecumenical movement.

RÉGIS LADOUS

SPIRITUALITY IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

THE ECUMENICAL movement, which brings together Christians from diverse confessional and cultural traditions, is also a meeting-place of many different forms of spirituality. Some of these strands (e.g. Orthodox worship life, the monastic tradition, contemplative orders, Reformation spiritualities) have stood the test of time over many centuries. Others (e.g. the “spirituality for combat”, liberation spirituality, feminist spirituality, renewal movements, new communities and the development of lay ministries) have arisen relatively recently.

DEFINING SPIRITUALITY

Against the background of these and other diverse spiritual traditions and disciplines, two questions help us define an ecumenical spirituality: What would characterize the church* if it were indeed one church for the whole world? What kind of lived discipleship would incarnate that vision? If the church is called to be the one church for the whole world, it is inclusive, incarnational, universal, and sent in mission.* Such a renewed church will necessarily enlarge an understanding of Christian discipleship.

Spirituality has come to be seen as a more integrated and integrative dimension of the life of faith* as a result of several influences. A more holistic approach to theology, new emphases in biblical studies, a greater awareness of the need for meditation disciplines, the interface of many religious traditions and cultures, a sense of the needs of separate identities together with a realization of global interconnection and the impetus of many renewal movements have all led to the concept of spirituality as a whole way of life. However, the use of the term to contrast “the things of the spirit” with “material things” persists; in both English and French, the connotation of “devotion”, “piety” or the “inner life” remains. Dogma* and theology are seen as rational and intellectual; spirituality is often taken to refer to their experiential counterparts.

This article builds on a simple definition of spirituality as the endeavour to live in obedience to the gospel – in a word, in discipleship. “Who do you say that I am?” (Matt. 16:15), Jesus asked his first disciples. The lived response to that question is the disciple’s spirituality.

The vocation of the disciple has many dimensions. Obedience demands that Christians discern the voice of the Spirit (see Holy Spirit) in the world, make the gospel live in their own culture,* help in the transformation of the world, find meaning in life’s struggles and participate in the life of exchange that is basic to human existence. The whole of life is to be placed at the disposal of the gospel. Spirituality, then, is the way people take to be Christian, to fulfill their Christian vocation. It embraces ministry and service, relationships, life-style, prayer and response to the political and social environment.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

The relationship between prayer and the birth of the modern ecumenical movement has been well documented. The slow dawning of inner questions relating to discipleship is illustrated in the various prayer movements of the 18th and 19th centuries, which discovered that there must be not only prayer for unity but prayer for unity by people of different traditions praying together. In the early years of the WCC, common worship emerged as an important question (see worship in the ecumenical movement). Work began on a new hymnology that expressed the search for a relevant discipleship (see hymns).

The 1960s were a significant decade for spirituality in the ecumenical movement. By 1961 virtually all of the Orthodox churches had entered the WCC, bringing along their own rich tradition of worship. Many of the third-world churches that joined the WCC in the 1960s brought political questioning of the status quo. At the same time, a wave of secularism in Europe and North America brought attempts inside and outside the church to put greater energies into social issues (see secularization). These forces sharpened what is often called the ecumenical-evangelical divide. At the heart of this tension lie perceptions about the meaning of discipleship and obedience to the gospel (on the one hand, a community which stresses engagement for the world and expresses impatience with what it regards as other-worldly mentalities; on the other, a community which testifies to salvation* by grace* and is committed to leading others to this experience). The hardening and institutionalization of this division is a tragic example of the fragmentation of Christian discipleship.

Contributions of Vatican II* to a renewed church began in the 1960s but are still taking root. Among these are the re-discovery of the Bible as belonging to the people, renewal of worship (see liturgical reforms), updating of religious life and responsibility for social engagement.

By the 1970s many of those engaged in the struggles for social justice were disillusioned, and there was hunger for more spiritual nourishment and undergirding. The charismatic and Pentecostal movements provided healing for individuals but also made their own ecumenical breakthroughs. At the WCC's fifth assembly (Nairobi 1975), where the dominant motif was the struggle of peoples in a broken and divided world, a band of enthusiasts ran a spirituality workshop, in effect a side-show to the main meetings.

In the 1980s the growing search for a more integrated discipleship became a serious concern on the ecumenical agenda. Liberation theology* in Latin America, with its rich blend of worship and struggle, prayer and politics, posed an influential challenge to Western efforts to divide these pairs. After 20 years the Orthodox concern for the centrality of spirituality and worship was at last being heard. The challenge of the evangelical groups continued. The fruits of Vatican II and the vitality of Roman Catholic encounter with other Christians in most parts of the world added to the pressure on mainstream Protestantism to take a fresh look at the quality of its discipleship. The Vancouver assembly of 1983, where worship was central and testimony and prayer invaded the plenary sessions, was a convincing sign of a deeper ecumenical concern for spirituality and a new willingness to put back together what belongs together in the life of the Spirit.

The Vancouver impetus in worship has been followed through in all succeeding WCC world conferences. Mixed teams preparing the worship have culled and created resources which have provided a rich source of nourishment for future occasions. One of the most noted phenomena of the 1990s was a widespread interest in spirituality, which, however, may sometimes be unhealthy, distorted or dangerously misleading. To quote one keen observer of the contemporary scene: "Spirituality can be a dangerous diversion from the living God, from the demands of justice, from engagement with reality. It can be a form of illusion. Today 'spirituality' is marketed as a product, in competition with others. It belongs to the area of 'private life'. Of all the distortions of Christian faith and discipleship, it is individualism which has most deeply penetrated spiritual consciousness... At its very heart the Christian life and identity is a process of incorporation into a new social organism, a new community. Spirituality cannot exist apart from this social context" (Kenneth Leech, The Eye of the Storm, 1992).

ONE, HOLY, CATHOLIC AND APOSTOLIC

We consider here four key dimensions of Christian spirituality.

Spirituality and unity. Unity* is one of the truest and deepest aspirations of humankind. Spirituality is a binding force on the journey towards unity. Jesus' words and example address the way Christians are to live and to relate in the new order he initiated. Holiness and discipleship are not sectarian, not denominationally determined. Christians recognize the mystery of life lived in faith and overcoming the obstacles of sin and selfishness. Christians hear the call to live in obedience, to reconcile the broken fragments of life and of human community. No one person or church has reached the fullness of life in Christ. Spirituality links simple believer and erudite theologian, laity and clergy, various denominational traditions, different religious views of the world, history* and culture.

A church which is one is inclusive. Laity and clergy, women and men, black and white, poor and rich – all find a valued place within it. Ecumenical spirituality calls all to hospitality, to participation, to a sense of partnership in service and in decision making. “No one is outside the church, because there is no longer an outside, because no one is outside the reality of God and the risen Christ” (L. Boff, Church, Charism and Power, 1985).

The call to be holy (see holiness, sanctification). There is a shift in much current understanding of spirituality towards a greater emphasis on the incarnational. Old understandings of holy as “consecrated”, “set apart”, “purified” find new fulfilment in a perception of the God-giveness and potential holiness of all of life (see life and death). The church which celebrates God’s creation in its totality and inter-relatedness will begin to be healed of the splits which have deformed much of Western Christendom – between sexuality and spirituality, public and private spheres, piety and politics, to name a few. New energies are released when old splits are healed. Values and creeds* are incarnated. The church’s new perception of the largeness of God’s purposes sets people free to be disciples in the fullness of their daily lives, not only during Sunday worship. Thus a new integrity and authenticity emerge.

The call to be catholic (see catholicity). Christian discipleship is situated within a church which is both local and universal, which strives to live its obedience locally as well as in relationship to the worldwide church, which recognizes the interconnect-edness of reality, both for good and for ill. “If one member suffers, all suffer together with it; if one member is honoured, all rejoice together with it” (1 Cor. 12:26).

The gospel is always communicated and received in concrete situations. But it is the same gospel and the same Spirit that inspire all to create shalom (peace), to live in the fellowship of faith, hope and love. An ecumenical spirituality immerses people in their local settings, but with a global consciousness and an awareness of the connections which make all mutually dependent. In fact, it enables people to live those connections as they make choices, build relationships, respond to their milieus, enter into mission, hold one another in prayer. The challenge is to believe that the church is essentially in its local expression part of the church universal, and to be faithful to the implications of sharing one faith, one baptism,* one mission. It demands a conversion, a dying to attitudes and traditions that separate and divide.

The call to be apostolic (see apostolicity). The church is sent into all the world. It exists for mission, to fulfill God’s purposes in the world. Discipleship which takes seriously the call to be apostolic will constantly be sensitive to the Holy Spirit’s promptings to go forward into the new and unexpected. Key images are the servant church, the pilgrim church and the prophetic church. Implicit in each is a willingness to be poor, to reach out, to die, to follow the Spirit.

The discerning of this call to be in mission is one in which each part of the church may offer help and mutual correction: solidarity in struggles, mutual intercession, sharing and relief of pain, combat with principalities and powers. The church places itself at the disposal of a God who is co-opted by no political system and contained by no single set of beliefs, the time-scale of whose purposes is beyond our compass. Yet each act of obedience, each martyr’s lonely suffering (see martyrdom), is woven into God’s redemptive activity for the world. To be one, holy and catholic is to be set free and formed to be apostolic.

IMPLICATIONS AND NEW EXPLORATIONS

In the classic arena of spirituality, prayer and worship, there are breakthroughs where risks are being taken that point the way. The context in which praise and thanksgiving are offered, the scope of confession and the extent of commitment are all indications of how ecumenical a person’s or a church’s prayer life has become. Intercession* is a litmus test. The personal and corporate intercession of Christians shows the range of their concern. Many churches still design their prayer calendars to pray only for their own denominational or confessional groupings. The Ecumenical Prayer Cycle* is an appeal for prayers for the world and the church in the world. If its work is to be successful, it must result in the deepening and broadening of prayers of intercession. To pray for one another involves engagement, the offering of something. All worship should connect to life and send people out into life (see liturgy after the Liturgy).

The record of eucharistic inhospitality is still a painful scandal in the ecumenical movement. Many testify today, though, of the rich blessing they have received when breakthroughs have happened. In some parts of the world intercommunion* exists between Protestant and Catholic, but it is still a breach of discipline. In some places the great spiritual centres of the past, the cathedrals, are becoming ecumenical centres, places of pilgrimage for many who had given up on the faith.

Failures in building and living in community are evident in continuing exclusions and excommunications,* separations and divisions, in the alienation of many potentially vital members. But the ecumenical movement is also experiencing a re-discovery of community and of its fruits: covenants,* church base communities,* renewed religious life, ecumenical communities and projects, feminist solidarity, etc. Walls are coming down, sometimes in spite of the attitudes and decisions of the official church.

Today's widespread hunger for a deeper, more integrated way of living manifests itself in different ways: as a questioning of the idols of our times, as an emptiness or lack of meaning, as escapes into self-destructive behaviour, as a search for relevant worship, as a yearning for solidarity and sustenance in the struggle with evil powers and in a commitment to the poor and oppressed.

Related to the search for a meaningful spirituality is the contemporary emphasis on "doing theology", on relating theology to everyday life. Christians who have never had access to formal theology are learning afresh to relate faith to life, worship to work, prayer to action, proclamation to protest, in new creative ways. Theology "by the people" is theology worked out in community. It seeks an active commitment to justice and peace as an integral concern of the theological enterprise.

Some of the springs of this movement are found in basic Christian communities, in Minjung theology, coming out of the biographies of suffering people in Korea, and in African theology, with its use of proverbs, myths and songs as aids in interpreting the Christian message. The growing movement among Roman Catholics worldwide known as We Are the Church is similarly based on the assumptions that the church is the whole people of God, that each person has a ministry, that the agenda of the world has to be taken seriously and that theology is contextual. Such convictions pose radical questions in relation to a living spirituality.

Ecumenical spirituality, therefore, is common discernment of the direction in which the Body of Christ, the church, is being led. It is the common Christian vocation of enfleshing the gospel and cooperating with the Spirit so that through a transforming spirituality the servant church becomes truly one, holy, catholic and apostolic.

See also prayer in the ecumenical movement, spiritual ecumenism.

GWEN CASHMORE and JOAN PULS

- T. Arai & W. Ariarajah, Spirituality in Inter-faith Dialogue, WCC, 1989
- L. Bouyer, La spiritualité du Nouveau Testament et des pères; La spiritualité du moyen âge; La spiritualité orthodoxe, protestante et anglicane (ET A History of Christian Spirituality, 3 vols, New York, Seabury, 1982)
- G. Cashmore & J. Puls, Soundings in Spirituality, Milton Keynes, UK, Ecumenical Spirituality Project, 1995
- Christian Spirituality, vol. 1: Origins to the Twelfth Century, B. McGinn & J. Meyendorff eds; vol. 2: High Middle Ages and Reformation, J. Raitt ed.; vol. 3: Post-Reformation and Modern, L. Dupré & D.E. Saliers eds; New York, Crossroads, 1985-89
- M. Fox ed., Western Spirituality: Historical Roots, Ecumenical Routes, Notre Dame IN, Fides/Claretian, 1979
- C. Jones, E.J. Yarnold & G. Wainwright eds, The Study of Spirituality, New York, Oxford UP, 1986
- Monastic Spirituality: A Spirituality for Our Times, WCC, 1988
- J. Puls, Every Bush Is Burning, WCC, 1985
- N.J. Ryan ed., Christian Spiritual Theology, an Ecumenical Reflection, Melbourne, Dove, 1976
- L. Swidler ed., Ecumenism, the Spirit and Worship, Louvain, Duquesne UP, 1967
- J.R. Tyson ed., Invitation to Christian Spirituality: An Ecumenical Anthology, Oxford Oxford UP, 1999
- With All God's People: The New Ecumenical Prayer Cycle, WCC, 1980.

STATE

IN THE 20TH CENTURY, Christian thinking about the state reflected both the multiplicity of religious traditions and the shaping influence of theological and political movements. Not surprisingly, therefore, the term “state” has no single meaning in theological discourse today. It is used to refer to a particular territory, the administrative apparatus of the society, the government, the nation,* the body politic, the nation state, the polis, or the organization and monopoly of power* or violence* in a given society.

The differences in meaning often reflect cultural and linguistic differences, or the confusions of speaking at times descriptively, at times normatively. The historicity of the concept itself is a factor in the problem of definition. Many writers contend that the term is a fairly modern one, perhaps no earlier in usage than Machiavelli’s early-16th-century reference to lo stato. Dietrich Bonhoeffer, by contrast, sees the origin of the state in pagan antiquity but argues that the concept is foreign to the New Testament, where its place is taken by the concept of government. The dynamic character of the reality to which the term points also invites the blurring of distinctions. Thus Luigi Sturzo speaks of the “trend towards unification in the modern state”, referring thereby to the (totalitarian) tendency of centralizing power to draw all other social and individual realities into itself and re-define them in its image.

Jacques Maritain distinguishes among nation, body politic (or political society), people and state and refers to the last term as “that part of the body politic especially concerned with the maintenance of law, the promotion of the common welfare and public order, and the administration of public affairs. The state is a part which specializes in the interests of the whole.” This distinction and its definition are very useful and are widely shared, but they do not cover all the varying nuances and theological slants and the differences in empirical reference.

THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATIONS

Theological writings on the state are not always theologies of the state. A theological understanding may be implicit rather than explicit, and the method of inquiry non-theological. Aware of the menace of Hitler’s totalitarianism,* the Oxford conference on “Church, Community and State” (1937) addressed the issue directly. The Amsterdam assembly of 1948 addressed it more indirectly through inquiry into the “responsible society”* and comparisons of capitalism* and communism. Subsequent conferences dealt with the state in relation to liberation movements and prospects for a “just, participatory, and sustainable society”* and explored the questions more social-scientifically than theologically. Latin American liberation theology* committed itself methodologically to the priority of social-scientific investigation.

Theological interpretations of the state fall mainly into two types, although a third type has been recognized and advanced in the 20th century by Barth and Bonhoeffer. The state is represented as being grounded either in human nature as created (see creation) or in sin* (see also anthropology, theological). The former view is characteristic of Roman Catholic and Anglo-Catholic interpretations but is also consonant with some liberal Protestant interpretations. The latter view predominates in churches and theologies of the Reformation traditions.

Where the state is understood to be grounded in sin, it is referred to frequently (esp. in the Lutheran tradition) as an “order of preservation”. Its primary function is to serve as a barrier to sin-induced chaos – to maintain order,* enforce the law,* defend against enemies, protect the innocent, punish the wicked. It is also to serve justice,* but “justice” often is defined in terms of provisions of the legal order. With this view of the state, it has been difficult – although certainly not impossible – to expand the notion of justice into a dynamic concept, challenging established orders of privilege and power and requiring the state to take on broader responsibilities for the welfare of all the people (see welfare state). Where the state is understood to be grounded in original human nature, it is recognized as an “order of creation” with functions that include those of order and defence, but within a more flexible and comprehensive concept of “common good”.

In the third type, the state is understood to be grounded in Christ and to have the re-demptive function of assuring time, space and order for the proclamation of the word of justification.* Barth intended this Christological interpretation of the state to provide a theological basis for church criticism of the Nazi state, and both Barth and Bonhoeffer saw it as an alternative to the Lutheran two-kingdoms concept. Neither theologian developed this view into a systematic theology of politics, although in his essay "The Christian Community and the Civil Community" Barth used the analogy of the Trinity as a method for inferring a political ethic for democracy.

Christian theologies of the state in the 20th century were influenced by other considerations in addition to the theories of origin. A principled commitment to the priority of justice in the order of political values yields an activist approach to the role of the state in social transformation. The optimistic understandings of human nature generated by the Enlightenment allow possibilities for popular control of political power and for social change that brush aside the warnings of more negative views of human nature and historical expectation and that promise the engineering of an end to war, poverty and oppression, and the transformation of the state system of international politics into a world society with a democratic government committed to the advancement of the human rights of all peoples. Proletarian movements, informed by Marxist interpretations of society and history, consign the state to the role of instrument of class power and imagine a time prepared by revolution and socialist governance when the state as an administrator of persons will wither away and be replaced by an institution commissioned solely for the administration of things.

Almost all theologies of the state of the 20th century insisted that its functions and authority are merely temporal and that it has no sacramental, sacerdotal, doctrinal or other ecclesiological functions. However, the distinctions between church functions and state functions sometimes are blurred in law and practice where the two institutions are integrated in a religious-political establishment.

FORMS OF THE STATE

Christian political thought in the 20th century generally agreed that no particular form of the state is theologically necessary. Nevertheless, it tended to show a distinct preference for some form of democracy. Most of the major theologians who wrote on political questions – Reinhold Niebuhr, Karl Barth, Emil Brunner, Jacques Maritain, John Courtney Murray, Luigi Sturzo, Jürgen Moltmann and others – argued the case for democracy. Democracy was endorsed also in the encyclical Pacem in Terris of Pope John XXIII. Most ecumenical documents on political issues have been democratic in tendency if not explicit commitment, through their emphases on equality, freedom, participation* and human rights.* The arguments in German theology of the 1930s for an autocratic and hierarchical state grounded in the Volk as a natural order did not survive the collapse of Nazism. Post-war German theology is explicitly democratic in its treatment of political questions.

The principal arguments over the form of the state have pertained to the presuppositions and structure of democracy itself. Democracy could not survive the severe tests put to it by movements and situations of the 20th century with an excessively optimistic view of human nature, a social theory based on contractarian individualism, and a definition of governmental responsibilities limited primarily to protection of life and property. The main thrust of much democratic theologizing therefore was to re-equip the notion of democracy with a view of human nature that acknowledged its sinful and demonic tendencies as well as its capabilities and creativity, with a relational understanding of society as persons-in-community and with an expanded vision of state responsibilities that placed protection of life and property in the context of a more comprehensive commitment to the "general welfare", especially to the welfare of the poor, powerless and oppressed members of the society.

The structural goal of this re-formulation was a state with sufficient power to carry out its expanded responsibilities, yet with constitutional limitations sufficient to restrain the oppressive tendencies of central power. Doubting the possibility of restraining a state with comprehensive welfare and educational functions, Helmut Thielicke argued instead for a minimal state. Some liberationists, rejecting the notion of improvement within the context of the bourgeois state, argue for radical transformation of the property* and political systems and accept the risk of the constitutionally unrestrained power of a revolutionary government (see revolution).

THE AUTHORITY OF THE STATE

Major issues of political authority* include the following five. First, is the authority of governors from God* or the people? Pope Leo XIII (Diuturnum, 1881) stated that elections may designate rulers, but God confers their authority. Protestant writers asked whether a theological prescription (Rom. 13) for an autocratic state could be applied to the modern democratic state and answered that in a democracy the people themselves were the fundamental “governing authorities” (v.1).

Second, the secularization* of politics aggravated the problems posed by popular sovereignty, further attenuated the relevance and viability of the Rom. 13 tradition, encouraged the turn towards non-theological modes of authorization and opened the way to absolutist claims and solutions.

Third, the emergence of totalitarian systems in the third and fourth decades of the century tested the limits of a theologically grounded obligation to obey.

Fourth, revolutionary movements denied the legitimacy of bourgeois and autocratic states but opened questions of the authority of revolutionary leadership and revolutionary governments.

Fifth, the new internationalism called into question the authority of particular nation states without resolving problems of transferring their authority to a world government. Growing economic globalization, on the one side, and the debates about the international right to intervene in cases of flagrant violation of human rights by a state, on the other, are specific instances of this problem.

Thielicke insisted that sovereignty is an essential and constituent attribute of states, that states therefore must be plural and that in consequence it is impossible to conceive of a single world state. Maritain, however, insisted that sovereignty is neither essential to, nor constitutive of, states, that particular states can, should and eventually will transfer their “sovereign” authority to a world political society and that such transfer will manifest the logic of the common good, the principle of subsidiarity* and the perfect society in its process of becoming.

THE PATHOLOGY OF STATES

Far-reaching questions concerning the pathology of states overshadow persistent issues of the corruptive tendencies of politics and power. Totalitarian movements and systems suggest that under the conditions of modernity, states tend inevitably to discard the limits of power, put themselves in the place of God, destroy or absorb all other institutions and thereby make themselves the source and centre of meaning and existence. Liberation theologians argue that the state in capitalist civilization is not a potentially neutral if somewhat corrupt institution but a “national security state” (see national security) – an armed instrument of international capitalism, serving the expansion and consolidation of capitalist power. Both totalitarianism and liberation theory call in question the viability of the liberal democratic state. The conditions which lead to totalitarianism also call in question whatever might replace the liberal democratic state, including any proposed revolutionary successor to the “national security state”.

To establish the terms under which a state can be just, stable and peaceful, it is necessary to probe the perennial questions of human nature and historical expectation. Is it true that “man’s capacity for justice makes democracy possible; man’s inclination to injustice makes democracy necessary” (Niebuhr)? Or is the ambiguity of human nature and politics to be resolved towards radical pessimism or optimism? Also, is it possible to understand the nature of states from the particularity of states, or ultimately only in the context of international society? Finally, does it suffice to understand the state theologically in terms of creation and the fall, or must we not continue the Christological project of Barth and Bonhoeffer, exploring the power, promise and limits of the state in the light of the reconciling work of God in Christ?

See also church and state, fascism, liberty/freedom, society.

■ K. Barth, Against the Stream, London, SCM Press, 1954 ■ K. Barth, Community, State and Church, W. Herberg ed., Garden City NY, Doubleday, 1960 ■ J.C. Bennett, Christians and the State, New York, Scribners, 1958 ■ J. Comblin, The Church and the National Security State, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1979 ■ J.B. Elsh-tain, Meditations on Modern Political Thought: Masculine/Feminine Themes from Luther to Arendt, New York, Praeger, 1986 ■ The Kairos Document: Challenge to the Church, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1986 ■ J. Maritain, Man and the State, Chicago, Univ. of Chicago Press, 1950 ■ R. Niebuhr, The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness, New York, Scribners, 1944 ■ O. O'Donovan, The Desire of the Nations, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1996 ■ G.S. Smith, God and Politics, Phillipsburg NJ, Presbyterian & Reformed Publ., 1989 ■ L. Sturzo, Church and State, Notre Dame IN, Notre Dame UP, 1962 ■ H. Thielicke, Theologische Ethik (ET Theological Ethics, vol. 2: Politics, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1969).

STATUS CONFSSIONIS

THE TERM STATUS CONFSSIONIS (Latin for "situation of confession", referring to a situation requiring the church to act decisively for good against evil) has only recently entered the ecumenical vocabulary with a measure of common acceptance. Derived from Reformation contexts, with their debates over whether traditions and customs were indifferent or essential to the new faith, status confessionis made its way into ecumenical language in connection with the Barmen declaration (1934) and its aftermath, especially in totalitarian situations and with regard to life-killing systems. Dietrich Bonhoeffer mentioned a double test for a status confessionis: "firstly, whether the state is going beyond its own mandate and trespassing on that of the church and, secondly, whether the state falls short of its mandate ('too much' or 'too little' state)". At the WCC Uppsala assembly (1968), W.A. Visser 't Hooft gave a new definition of heresy* which puts Christians into the status confessionis: "Church members who in their practice deny their responsibility for those who are in need are just as much guilty of heresy as those who reject one or the other truth of faith."

The Barmen declaration, with its six short theses, sought to give the church guidance in the critical moments regarding an incipient totalitarianism in Germany, fighting the inroads of the so-called German Christians, who wanted to make the church a tool of the state. Defining this situation as a status confessionis means that this was a moment for the church to confess its faith in the face of idolatrous powers. More recently, apartheid in South Africa has been seen as calling for a similar response. Visser 't Hooft connected apartheid and status confessionis for the first time in 1964. The Lutheran World Federation and the World Alliance of Reformed Churches declared apartheid a heresy (1982), stating that this was not a question on which opinions could differ; the membership of South African Reformed churches supporting the system were therefore suspended pending confession of their guilt (Debrecen 1997). The German Reformed churches used the term with regard to nuclear weapons.

Besides Barmen, Medellín (1968) was the other great 20th-century synod in the church that models compellingly the status confessionis (without using the expression), i.e. the need for confession in the face of the destruction of human life. Confronted by the millions of the world's poor, the Roman Catholic bishops of Latin America at Medellín stressed discipleship as part of the necessary Christian witness, not as a catch phrase but as an attitude that embraces all of life.

Today, subjugation of humanity to the global (capitalist) economy could be considered as a status confessionis in so far as globalization elevates allegiance to its economic goals over any faith concern, and especially as this system deprives two-thirds of humankind of decent living standards while enriching the powerful few. The Debrecen assembly of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches (on the theme "Break the Chains of Injustice!") was outspoken on globalization and its consequences: "We want to affirm the gift of life, the commitment to resistance and the struggle for transformation as being an integral part of reformed faith and confession today."

But the same assembly also stressed the need for speaking of a processus confessionis rather than status confessionis. Every situation is complex and needs careful analysis. Confessing one's faith must arise from a process of education and progressive insight.

See also apartheid; globalization, economic; Medellín.

FREDERICK HERZOG and KLAUSPETER BLASER

■ Called to Witness to the Gospel Today, Geneva, WARC, 1982 ■ U. Duchrow, Global Economy: A Confessional Issue for the Churches, WCC, 1987 ■ A. Lindt, Status Confessionis, Bern, Haupt, 1985 ■ J. Moltmann ed., Bekennende Kirche wagen: Barmen, 1934-1984, Munich, Kaiser, 1984 ■ M. Opočenský ed., Debrecen 1997: Proceedings of the 23rd General Council of the WARC, Geneva, WARC, 1997.

STUDY AS AN ECUMENICAL METHOD

EARLY ON IN THE Life and Work* movement, ecumenical encounters brought forth such a variety of divergent and conflicting views on all subjects that some method and form of organized reflection and research was necessary on those issues, which were dividing Christians into opposing camps.

Already the first Life and Work conference (Stockholm 1925) had emphasized the need for continuing research on social issues, but only in the preparation for its second conference (Oxford 1937) did a systematic rationale for ecumenical study emerge. In a preparatory volume, The Church and Its Function in Society, W.A. Visser 't Hooft and J.H. Oldham presented the need for organized reflection and discussion of the issues facing the churches in the modern world. Oldham, who is generally regarded as the pioneer of the study method, wrote that the church must be seen not only as a community of worship and love but also as "a community of thought". He summed up the method of study in a famous sentence: "In the fulfilment of its task, the church must call to its aid the best minds that it can command." This call includes laity* from all areas of public life, as well as theologians and church leaders.

Critics later challenged this emphasis on "the best minds" as academic and elitist. But Oldham had been careful to point out: "The clearer understanding of the significance of Christian faith for the actual life of our time... is not primarily a matter of scholarship and learning. It is rather the fruit of spiritual insight and understanding, and we must never allow ourselves to forget that the realities of the spiritual world may be hidden from the wise and prudent and revealed to babes." In Oldham's view this qualification does not diminish the need for serious intellectual work by the churches. The church as a community of thought has to broaden its understanding of the organic structure of life, the "law of things", the laws of institutions, the role of the nation and the state, and the sources of social evil.

With Oldham as chairman of its preparatory committee, the 1937 Oxford conference became the first ecumenical "study" conference on social issues, involving large numbers of theologians and laity in preparatory studies and in the conference itself. For the first time the non-Roman Catholic churches addressed, in a substantial way, economic, political and ideological problems.

In view of the Oxford achievements, it is not surprising that the 1938 organizational plan for the new WCC churches included a "study department" as one of its four principal offices. In 1954 it became the Division of Studies, comprising the departments of church and society, evangelism, missionary studies, and the commission on Faith and Order. This office was responsible for study programmes in these fields and for the organization and preparation of the four WCC assemblies between 1948 and 1968 (Amsterdam, Evanston, New Delhi and Uppsala).

The emphasis on study proved particularly helpful in these years as a way of easing churches into the examination of controversial issues which needed ecumenical attention but found no consensus. The 1966 world conference on Church and Society was the most notable of a series of ecumenical study conferences on the urgent social issues facing the churches in this period.

After the fourth WCC assembly (Uppsala 1968) there was increasing tension between the tradition of ecumenical study and a growing demand for ecumenical action. In 1969 the WCC instituted new action programmes to mobilize the member churches for the struggle against racism* and world poverty.* And older WCC sectors were stimulated to become more action-oriented, for example, through the programme on the Cooperation of Women and Men in Church and Society.

The 1972 plan for restructuring the WCC emphasized the need to integrate study and action, without proposing ways to do so. Some action programmes discovered the need to reflect, which led to the formula "action-reflection". This did not resolve the substantial differences of methodology and ideology which underlay the "study-action" debate.

Since 1969, alongside the new action programmes the traditional discipline of ecumenical study continues in such areas as faith and order; justice, peace and creation; and inter-religious relations and dialogue. It has proved its role in such ecumenical programmes as the study of the future of humanity and society in a world increasingly dominated by science and technology. The conflicts and disagreements which confront the churches and the world on the issues of freedom, justice and order would seem to validate a fresh emphasis on imaginative ecumenical study.

PAUL ABRECHT

■ R. Rouse & S. Neill eds, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 1: 1517-1948, London, SPCK, 1954, ch. 12 ■ The Ten Formative Years, 1938-1948: Report to the First WCC Assembly, Amsterdam 1948 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, "Oldham's Method in Abrecht's Hands", ER, 37, 1, 1985 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft & J.H. Oldham, The Church and Its Function in Society, London, Allen & Unwin, 1937, part 3.

STUDY CENTRES

WITHIN ECUMENICAL circles, the term "study centre" refers to ecumenical or denominational centres which are engaging in special areas of research and dialogue particularly from an ecumenical perspective. Their common aim is to assist the churches and congregations in their total task of witness and service in various cultural, social and religious contexts. They should be distinguished from ecumenical institutes in Europe, which are also in a sense study centres but are engaged more in academic research and less in dialogue.

The study centres are often known as dialogue centres or institutes for religion and culture. Most of them concentrate on research and dialogue in areas of religion and culture or on social and cultural analyses for renewal in mission. Some of them also hold conferences and undertake other programmes. Many of them are members of regional associations of so-called lay academies (see academies, lay). Most of these centres publish periodicals in order to share their findings with churches.

In cooperation with the WCC, consultations on the role of study centres were held in Kandy (1967), Hong Kong (1971) and Singapore (1980). A Fellowship of Study Centres was organized in 1980. A world convention of Christian lay centres held in Montreat, North Carolina, USA, in 1993 underscored the renewal of attention to the laity issue within the WCC.

TOSH ARAI

■ Directory of Ecumenical Conference Centres, WCC, 1994 ■ Inter-religio, a periodical magazine of the network of study centres in Eastern Asia, Hong Kong, Christian Study Centre, 1987- ■ The Role of the Study Centres, WCC, 1981.

STUTTGART DECLARATION

LED BY W.A. Visser 't Hooft and the provisional leaders of the Evangelical Church in Germany (bishops and leading representatives of the Confessing Church such as Hans Asmussen, Otto Dibelius, Hanns Lilje, Wilhelm Niesel and Martin Niemöller), an ecumenical delegation met in Stuttgart from 17 to 19 October 1945. The common purpose was to prevent German Protestantism from isolating itself from the other churches and to find ways to help the German people, who had been spiritually, politically and economically shattered. An admission of guilt was expected from the Germans for the crimes that had been committed during the National Socialist regime and had become fully known only in the summer of 1945 (see war guilt). German theologians and church leaders were ready to reflect self-critically on the behaviour of the Protestant church in relation to the temptations of a totalitarian state and to re-examine the church's political responsibilities.

In August 1945 the German Roman Catholic bishops conference had deplored the crimes committed by Germans before and during the war and demanded the punishment of the guilty. The Stuttgart declaration of 18-19 October goes a considerable step further, confessing the church's guilt in the sight of God and humanity: "We accuse ourselves for not witnessing more courageously, for not praying more faithfully, for not believing more joyously and for not loving more ardently."

This confession was also made by people who had been persecuted in the Third Reich or had offered resistance to it, thus admitting their own share of guilt and resisting the temptation to set victims and evil-doers over against each other. They thereby avoided the impossible task of drawing up a balance-sheet of what human beings did to each other. A people's shared suffering also means their shared guilt. It must be stressed that this was a theological conclusion and was not limited to the idea that no one in a state built on injustice can remain innocent.

The Stuttgart declaration applies the formula of the confession of guilt used in public worship to a politically disastrous situation. Both elements – the theological character and the joint responsibility for the future direction to be taken by the German people – constitute a unity, but even at that time that unity met with vigorous resistance. The declaration was misunderstood by some (Germans and others abroad) as a quasi-legal admission of the collective guilt of all Germans. Positively, many church members resisted attempts to use this confession – made to God who judges and reconciles – to criticize earlier political aberrations and newly forming problematic developments.

GERHARD SAUTER

- G. Besier & G. Sauter, Wie Christen ihre Schuld bekennen: Die Stuttgarter Erklärung 1945, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1985
- M. Greschat, Die Schuld der Kirche: Dokumente und Reflexionen zur Stuttgarter Schulderklärung vom 18./19. Oktober 1945, Munich, Kaiser, 1982
- M. Greschat ed., Im Zeichen der Schuld: 40 Jahre Stuttgarter Schuldbekennnis, Neukirchen, Neukirchener, 1985
- J.S. Trojan, "Das Stuttgarter Schuldbekennnis aus mitteleuropäischer Sicht", ÖR, 45, 2, 1996.

SUBSIDIARITY

THE TERM "SUBSIDIARITY" refers to the principle that a central authority should perform only the tasks which existing subordinate or local organizations cannot perform. This principle has played an important part (1) in the social teaching of the Roman Catholic Church, especially in the papal encyclical Quadragesimo Anno (1931); (2) in German Roman Catholic social philosophy and in Christian social sciences, especially where these have a neo-scholastic slant; (3) in the socio-political debates of the 1950s and 1960s in the Federal Republic of Germany, where it was used as the basis for arguments by RC associations and charitable organizations involved in these discussions and where it gained a new relevance; (4) in the political debates of the 1980s in the FRG, where local left-wing groups claimed the right to autonomy and self-assertion against bureaucratic tendencies, the dominance of large-scale social organizations and legal limitations on the responsibility and rights of small, more manageable social units.

The significance of the principle of subsidiarity can be understood only from the context in which it arose – German RC social metaphysics. In that context subsidiarity, along with the principles of the person and of solidarity,* is the third principle for the creation of social order. The other two principles define the right to life of the individual, who is always also linked to the community, and the common good, which represents the content, aim and meaning of human community and is the necessary guarantee of the former right. In subsidiarity, in contrast, we have a principle that goes beyond the person's right to life and stresses individuals' basic, general responsibility for maintaining themselves, achieving their own well-being and developing their natural potential.

In this relative adaptation of the idea of autonomy, subsidiarity as a principle also has a certain affinity to bourgeois liberalism. In terms of this principle, the private initiative of the free person as an economic agent can be regarded as primary, as opposed to the economic activity of the state. Negatively, subsidiarity rejects the authority of social institutions when they supplant or eliminate the individual's responsibility for action, a view that seems to coincide with liberalism.

The fundamental contrast between the two models of order becomes clear when we consider the metaphysical status of subsidiarity as a principle. It is an ontological statement – about what the person fundamentally is and what responsibility can be allotted to the person – but not a description of empirical reality. If individual persons are essentially responsible for themselves, the ethical imperative is always implied that they should actually be in a position to guarantee each other self-fulfilment, or that conditions must be created to that end. Thus subsidiarity as an ontological statement concerning independent human responsibility means that human beings cannot in fact simply be left to themselves in a laissez-faire way. In situations of physical or any other kind of need, when individuals, social groups or classes are actually incapable of providing for themselves, a society must act to help, in order to fulfill the over-riding claim of the right to life.

On the one hand, one's incapacity to be what by nature one should be may be temporarily lost (through illness, inability to work, etc.). If there are personal reasons for this incapacity, then help must be granted in the interests of restoring responsibility. If social structures and mechanisms are responsible for the condition (through unjust distribution of goods, oppression or unemployment), then a society, which is the frame of reference for independence and self-realization, must provide a remedy by transforming itself.

On the other hand, the actual incapacity for independence may be permanent (through disability, old age, etc.). Even when for individuals and groups the discrepancy between the natural right to exercise responsibility and their actual situation remains so serious that outside help is a condition of survival and is necessary for the achievement of the greatest possible well-being of the person, the principle of subsidiarity can never be adduced to justify euthanasia or the like but, rather, lays an obligation on the community to help.

The principle also applies when certain phenomena in highly complex industrial societies are taken into account. In some wealthy societies, for instance, health care may become so technological, bureaucratic and scientific that individual persons or small compact units (such as a village or small town) no longer have access to such care. This real incapacity is not temporary but permanent. In this context the principle of subsidiarity offers a justification for the exercise of responsibility by larger units (e.g. the states of a federal republic).

It has been objected that the principle of subsidiarity is too static to cope with the dynamism of capitalistic industrial societies, that it idealizes rural societies with a low standard of welfare and production and is suitable as a principle of order only where the pace of development is slow. In reply, it may be said that subsidiarity as a principle necessarily requires accurate knowledge of the actual circumstances of human beings and their relationships so that development and change can occur.

The subsidiarity principle likewise assumes that there is an unimpaired, general moral subject who is able to create social order and to react to any demonstrated incapacity of human beings to live with dignity in their own strength. What tells against such an assumption, which is essential to the significance of the subsidiarity principle, are experiences of anonymous and subjectless mechanisms which have catastrophic effects and for which no individual person can be blamed. Also, in the light of experiences which involve an overall destructive agent (say, in the Nazi regime's extermination camps), it is clear that the right of human beings to life clearly is not uniformly accepted and cannot be assumed in the kind of thinking appealing to natural law, which lies behind the principle of subsidiarity.

For these reasons, the reservations against the principle of subsidiarity voiced by Protestant theologians and others gain in force. In an ethic guided by Protestant theology, the standards and norms for social activity, the rights and duties of individuals, are seen as having their basis in God's justifying action towards human beings and in his saving word. In particular, if we insist on the human capacity for guilt in social contexts, and especially where the rights to life are denied, it becomes extremely urgent for RC social proclamation, too, to ask whether socially relevant Christian practice can be clarified and defined exclusively in terms of natural reason and the principles that can be derived from this, or whether, in the light of the actual denial of human rights, Christian praxis must be motivated first and foremost by the content and requirements of faith.

In recent RC discussions of ecclesiology, subsidiarity has also been introduced in a derivative way as a category for help in determining the respective competences of the parish, the diocese, the national bishops conferences, the universal church, and the papacy.

OTTMAR JOHN

- C. Cordes, "Kann evangelische Ethik sich das Subsidiaritätsprinzip, wie es in der Enzyklika 'Quadragesimo anno' gelehrt wird, zu eigen machen?", Zeitschrift für evangelische Ethik, 3, 1959
- F. Klüber, Katholische Soziallehre und demokratischer Sozialismus, 2nd ed., Bonn, 1979
- O. von Nell-Breuning, Gerechtigkeit und Freiheit: Grundzüge der katholischen Soziallehre, Munich, Olzog, 1980.

SUFFERING

HUMAN SUFFERING is an ecumenical theme par excellence. All churches and religions participate in responding to the challenge it presents, and even non-religious ideologies need to deal not only with its causes but with the meaning of unremovable suffering to the human being as well.

The specific contribution of Christian spirituality and theology to the theme occurs within the tension between outrage and acceptance, both voiced most clearly in the book of Job. Throughout the history of the church there is outrage, protest and fighting against avoidable and unnecessary suffering, grounded in "the power of anger in the work of love" (Beverly Harrison), but there is patience, independence and inner freedom as well in those who bear the unbearable burden. Church history shows that mostly one of the two elements prevails in a given historical situation. But if one part of the dialectical tension between outrage and acceptance is completely lost, the other will degenerate as well. A church, for example, that preaches submissiveness and acceptance of God-given suffering to women has betrayed Christ's active and passionate work for freeing and redeeming all of God's children. Social activists, however, if untrained in endurance and lacking revolutionary patience, will tend to break under the burden and easily can become bitter.

These two spiritual-ethical responses are coded in the Christian symbol systems of sin,* cross and the city of God. Christian tradition has offered these interpretative figures in response to the questions that arise with the suffering of the innocent, such as, Is suffering God's will or not? Is God the source of evil as well as of good? Does God permit suffering that comes from other sources? Do we have to choose between God's love and God's omnipotence?

The Judaeo-Christian tradition does not emphasize the tragic, unsolvable depth of suffering that is caused by natural defects or events. It places suffering in its historical context and, starting at the very first mythical narratives of origin, "ethicizes" the question why humankind has to suffer.

SIN

Suffering is the result of separating oneself from God's life-giving love to the other, and it is caused by the lack of care for others. In response to God's question, Cain answered, "Am I my brother's keeper?" (Gen. 4:9), which is a rejection of our connectedness to each other. Sinners tear down the web of life and in separating themselves from the giver of life they inflict suffering on others. Even brutal natural sufferings, such as an earthquake, challenge the community of bystanders and ask them to become the keeper of their siblings. Even more so, brutal sufferings caused by human actions point to the reality of sin. The two-thirds of today's human family who lack adequate food, water, shelter, health care, education and work suffer as the victims of sin – here, an economic world order of injustice. The concept of sin is a key to make us understand human suffering in the light of ecumenical responsibility for the sufferers. It is misused when seen as punishment for those who suffer (see John 9:2). The biblical God asks two questions which belong together: "Where are you?" (Gen. 3:9) and "Where is your brother?" (Gen. 4:9). By denying the second call, we suppress the first one and fall, especially as citizens of the industrialized world, into the normal secular response to human suffering, which is denial and suppression: "Take a pill!" By embracing apathy as one of the prevailing spiritual patterns of white middle-class churches, we avoid listening to both questions of God. The technological avoidance of suffering cuts us off from living. Natural secular persons take suffering not as what they inflict upon others but exclusively as their own shortcomings; we remember our being hurt, not our hurting.

In biblical understanding, suffering follows not from God's good creation but from human freedom misused. The Christian teaching of sin and responsibility maintains the unity of the human family. We are one in Adam and shall be one in Christ (see unity of humankind). This teaching precludes racism,* sexism,* class-divided societies and other forms of structural injustice where some people seem to be children of a lesser God. From an ecumenical perspective the Body of Christ is one. "If one member suffers, all suffer together" (1 Cor. 12:26).

God is not the source of evil, nor does God permit other powers to punish or treat humans in the manner of a sadist. God does not make us suffer but suffers with us. God fighting and suffering for freedom makes us fighting and suffering as well. Not the one who causes suffering but only the one who suffers can answer Job's despair and ours. Living after the holocaust and with the memory of nuclear destruction in Japan, contemporary Jewish and Christian theologians (Abraham Heschel, Hans Jonas, Rabbi Kushner, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, James Cone, most feminists) have shifted the Enlightenment's question of theodicy – How can God Almighty permit evil to happen to "good people"? – to two more modest ones: How can God the co-sufferer abide with those who suffer? And, how long will we permit evil to happen to the poor?

CROSS

The cross of Christ embodies an understanding of human suffering close to God's pain, in which we may participate. The cross, used as a torture instrument by the imperial power, is the ultimate response of this world and its powers to those who fulfill the will of the Father. Christ fulfills God's life-giving will. "I came that they may have life, and have it abundantly" (John 10:10). For that "offence", Christ was sentenced to death. To share life, to make justice come true, to feed the hungry necessarily leads those who try into conflicts with authorities, alienation from friends and family, losses in career, wealth and health, to name just the mild forms of the cross. Persecution for the sake of truth and the kingdom of God* has been in many periods of history a criterion of the church.* In today's liberation struggles, Christians give their lives, risk torture and death, and suffer with Christ "so that we may also be glorified with him" (Rom. 8:17). Those martyrs touch the deepest meaning of human suffering, which is to become "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ" (Rom. 8:17; see 2 Tim. 3:12).

In ecumenical gatherings Christians from the poor countries have reminded those from the "developed" world of the situation of the early Christians in the New Testament, which has many similarities to their own. Being a minority under an imperium of blood and tears, or even being a disempowered majority under repression, seems to be the normal status of the Christian church. Resistance and endurance are to be learned. Even in the first world, the Christian churches, if they commit themselves to Christ's way of sharing life, are to expect more suffering, more discrimination, loss of prestige and income, more conflicts with the state. When we avoid suffering with Christ, we will have to be "the devil's martyrs" (Thomas Münzer), who suffer under the contradictions of necrophilic societies. Suffering with Christ is a call to resistance against the powers of death. Love has its price.

"Rivers of blood may have to flow before we gain our freedom, but it must be our blood" (Martin Luther King, Jr). King insisted on the teaching of Jesus and Gandhi that unearned suffering is redemptive. The willingness to suffer is the utmost expression of human freedom. We then leave the technocratic illusion of a suffering-free life and join Christ's option for justice, peace and the integrity of creation.*

Christian faith is not a complete and perfect ideology* that solves all problems. The mystery of inequity, of nature's cruelty and indifference, is not to be solved on a dogmatic level. We miss Christ's point with our ready-made explanations of the tragic aspects of human life in reducing them to God's master plan of either punishment for the past or education for the present.

CITY OF GOD

The pastoral task is to throw the light of Christ's suffering on the seemingly meaningless pains we have to endure. We need to learn to integrate our losses and pains into God's pain over the world. Outrage and endurance, then, come together. Plunged into the mighty river of justice, we may hand over even our most intimate griefs and pain into the hands of the co-suffering and wait with Christ for the radical transformation of the heavens and the earth. "I will rejoice in Jerusalem and delight in my people" (Isa. 65:19). We understand God's annunciation only when we hear the tears in God's voice. The God who "will wipe every tear from their eyes" (Rev. 21:4) weeps in us.

See also martyrdom; salvation.

DOROTHEE SÖLLE

■ A.A. Boesak, Comfort and Protest: The Apocalypse from a South African Perspective, Edinburgh, St Andrews, 1987 ■ J.C. Becker, Suffering and Hope: The Biblical Vision and the Human Predicament, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1994 ■ J. Bowker, The Problem of Suffering in the Religions of the World, London, Cambridge UP, 1975 ■ R. Crews, Good Lord, Deliver Us: The Praise of God and the Problem of Evil, Akron OH, OSL, 2001 ■ G. Gutiérrez, Hablar de Dios desde el Sufrimiento del Inocente (ET God Talk and the Suffering of the Innocent), Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1987) ■ K. Kitamori, Theology of the Pain of God, Richmond VA, John Knox, 1965 ■ D. Sölle, Suffering, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1975.

SUSTAINABILITY

SUSTAINABILITY became a widely accepted term when in 1987 the UN-sponsored Commission on Environment and Development (the Brundtland commission) promoted the concept of "sustainable development" in its report Our Common Future. Confronted with a worsening of poverty and the continuing deterioration of the ecosystems since the historic Stockholm conference on the human environment (1972), the Brundtland commission proposed an integrated environmental-economic approach, promising a solution for the conflict between environment and development concerns. In 1992 the UN Conference on Environment and Development at Rio de Janeiro gave high prominence to the concept, calling for a global partnership on sustainable development. The UN Commission on Sustainable Development was formed to monitor progress and failure of the follow-up and to prepare for a review of the process at a special session of the UN general assembly in 1997 and again in 2002.

In the ecumenical discussion, the term "sustainable society" was first used in a working group report of the WCC world conference on science and technology for human development, organized by the Subunit on Church and Society in Bucharest (Romania) in 1974. A society will be sustainable only as long as the rate of use of non-renewable resources does not outrun the increase in resources made available through technological innovation, unless the emissions of pollutants are well below the capacity of the ecosystem to absorb them, and unless the need for food is at any time well below the global capacity to supply it.

The group was searching for a positive, pro-active response to the debate on science and technology* and the future of humanity which was sparked by a report of the Club of Rome, published under the title Limits to Growth in 1972. The Club of Rome pointed to the dilemma that development based on economic growth leads to a deteriorating environment for future generations and the depletion of the planet's limited physical resources. But who could or should limit what in a world in which access to resources and technology is so unjustly divided? Considering the imbalance between over-consumption in rich countries and the need for economic growth in poor countries, the Bucharest conference emphasized the social idea of a "sustainable and just society".

The approach chosen by Church and Society, however, concentrated on the conceptual work by experts on the global level and predominantly represented a Northern perspective. This position was criticized by others, who in their contexts were confronted with increasing poverty and the exclusion of the majority of people from decision-making processes. The Nairobi assembly (1975) accepted the concept of a sustainable society as an important addition to ecumenical social thinking, but also strengthened the criticism.

In 1976 the central committee identified the search for a Just, Participatory and Sustainable Society* as a programme emphasis for the WCC. The explicit ethical focus on the necessary link between justice, participation in sustainability and the resulting critique of socio-economic and political practices from a moral point of view carried through in later WCC programmes as well, on Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation* (Vancouver 1983) and “Theology of Life” (since 1994).

A series of Visser ’t Hooft memorial consultations at the Ecumenical Institute, Bossey, on “Sustainable Growth – a Contradiction in Terms?” (1993), “Work in a Sustainable Society” (1995), “Sustainability and Globalization” (1997) and “Democratic Contracts for Sustainable and Caring Societies” (1999) contributed significantly to the understanding of sustainability. The concept of sustainable development is criticized because of the serious set of tensions between the market-based means proposed to achieve sustainable development (e.g. the reform of trade, aid and finance) and the goals.

Sustainability in the context of the WCC’s ongoing work on environmental issues does not mean global economic growth qualified by environmental sensitivity but a primary emphasis on local and regional communities that are economically viable, socially equitable and ecologically renewable (Larry Rasmussen). The social idea of “sustainable community” implies the nurturing of equitable relationships both within the human family and also between humans and the ecological community as a whole in a geospecific place. Earth itself in these locales is part of their very sense of being; it is their habitat, home, oikos (David Hallman).

See also environment/ecology.

MARTIN ROBRA

- Aram I Keshishian, Towards an Ecumenical Ethic for a Responsible Society in a Sustainable Creation, Beirut, s.n., 1994 (partially reprinted from ER, 46, 2, 1994) ■ W. Granberg-Michaelson, Redeeming the Creation, WCC, 1992 ■ D. Hallman, Spiritual Values for Earth Community, WCC, 2000 ■ D. Meadows et al., The Limits to Growth, New York, Universe, 1972 ■ L.S. Mudge & T. Wieser eds, Democratic Contracts for Sustainable and Caring Societies, WCC, 2000 ■ L. Rasmussen, Earth Community, Earth Ethics, WCC, 1996 ■ Report, world conference on “Science and Technology for Human Development”, Bucharest, Romania, June 1974, Anticipation, 19, Nov. 1974 ■ J. de Santa Ana ed., Sustainability and Globalization, WCC, 1998 ■ Sustainable Growth – a Contradiction in Terms?, Geneva, Visser ’t Hooft Endowment Fund, 1993 ■ Work in a Sustainable Society (= ER, 48, 3, 1996) ■ World Commission on Environment and Development, Our Common Future, London, Oxford UP, 1987.

SYNCRETISM

THE TERM “SYNCRETISM” in its negative meaning came into common parlance in the modern ecumenical movement at the meeting of the International Missionary Council* (IMC) at Tambaram, South India, in 1938. Hendrik Kraemer’s Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, the conference study book, defined syncretism as “illegitimate mingling of different religious elements” (203).

Kraemer recognized that, from the standpoint of naturalistic and monistic religions, any mingling of different religions or religious elements is regarded as legitimate. Their approach to all religions is relativistic and pragmatic. But for the “prophetic religion of biblical realism” (210), the reference point is a unique historical revelatory event. Any indiscriminate mixture, amalgamation or harmonization of that revelation* with elements from other religions is illegitimate.

In this theologically negative sense Kraemer rejects as syncretistic the call to Christians by the 1928 Jerusalem meeting of the IMC to appropriate “values” of different religions because, as he puts it, “the argument of value does not coincide in any way whatever with that of truth” (106) and because “every religion is a living, indivisible unity” (135). No part of it – a dogma, a rite, a myth, an institution, a cult – can be separated from the faith-apprehension of the whole. Furthermore, the uniqueness of the Christian revelation in Jesus Christ* does not permit Christians “to consider undiscerningly the glimpses of revelation and the religious institutions of mankind as a preceding and preparatory stage for the full revelation in Christ” (123).

Nor, Kraemer argues, is there theological justification for considering non-Christians like Gandhi, Tagore and others who have as-simulated Christian ideals and ideas as “unbaptized Christians”, as Friedrich Heiler does. Nor, for that matter, is it permissible to consider reforms in other religions under the influence of Christianity as producing “an embryonic Christianity” leading to the church of Christ. William Hocking’s missionary approach in terms of “sharing religious experience” is also regarded as illegitimate. Any approach where a decision for Christ is not taken as marking a radical break with one’s religious past is a denial of biblical realism and is syncretistic (291, 296).

Kraemer, however, speaks of “adaptation” as a positive way of utilizing concepts and practices from other religions to “translate” and “interpret” the gospel of Jesus Christ in the world of non-Christian religions and cultures, and a legitimate way for Christians to relate to elements in other religions. According to Kraemer, “Adaptation in the deepest sense does not mean to assimilate the cardinal facts of the revelation in Christ as much as possible to fundamental religious ideas and tastes of the pre-Christian past, but to express these facts by wrestling with them concretely, and so to present the Christian truth and reveal at the same time the intrinsic inadequacy of man’s religious efforts for the solution of his crucial religious and moral problems” (308). He refers to the ways Paul and John used Jewish and Hellenistic categories of thought to controvert Jewish legalism and Hellenic monism and to express the truth and meaning of the Christian gospel, leading to new embodiments of Christianity.

Western forms of Christianity are the result of similar adaptations. Since they are foreign to Asian and African cultural milieus, “in principle and for reasons of history, new incarnations and adaptations of Christianity in the concrete Asiatic and African settings are natural and legitimate” (313). But Kraemer warns that this practice has always been associated with syncretism. The attempts to use what he calls “foreign tongues” in the past to express the gospel “have served as much to distort and falsify the revelation in Christ as to express it” (327). Some modern enthusiasts for the indigenization of Christianity in non-Western churches, he argues, “mistake cardinal and essential elements of the Christian revelation for cultural idiosyncrasies of the West” (319).

W.A. Visser ’t Hooft, in his book No Other Name: The Choice between Syncretism and Christian Universalism, follows much the same line. He distinguishes between a negative syncretism and a positive approach, which he calls “accommodation” rather than “adaptation” (123). His survey of syncretism covers all history and all continents. It recognizes illegitimate amalgamations of Christianity not only with traditional religions but also with modern paganism finding expression in political ideologies (see ideology).

Syncretism has continued to be a subject of controversy in the ecumenical movement. The argument has not been primarily on the substance of what Kraemer and Visser ’t Hooft were saying, but on the question of whether the fear of syncretism has not stopped the Christian church from entering into relationships with non-Western or modern religions and cultures, which alone can lead to new, legitimate incarnations of Christianity. In fact, as Lesslie Newbigin has commented, at the Tambaram conference of 1938 a red light stopped the traffic between Christianity and other religions; it never turned to green, and so the traffic was halted for a long time. Any attempt at dialogue between Christianity and other religions was frowned upon as syncretistic.

The Faith and Order consultation of the East Asia Christian Conference (Hong Kong 1966) on “Confessing the Faith in Asia” recognized that the Asian churches in the past were too inhibited by an idolatrous absolutization of Western confessional formulations and by a fear of syncretism to venture into confessing Christ in relation to religious renaissance and social revolution in Asia (Asian Christian Theology: Emerging Themes).

This inhibiting fear of syncretism was also evident in the reaction of a section at the WCC Nairobi assembly (1975) to the first report from the group dealing with “Seeking Community: The Common Search of People of Various Faiths, Cultures and Ideologies”. In this context an effort has been made in many centres in the ecumenical movement to affirm that the legitimate and illegitimate relations of Christianity to other religions and quasi-religious ideologies are two possibilities within the same process. There is historical warrant to use the word "syncretism" in its neutral character, accepting the possibility of true and false forms of syncretism.

Peter Latuihamako of Indonesia takes up the history of Balinese Christianity (in whose creation Kraemer played no small part) and says that what we call adaptation, amalgamation and the like seem to stem from the same spiritual source as syncretism. He calls the Christian approach "creative syncretism": "If ultimate Truth is the criterion, then there is no compromise and no syncretism. But still, the incarnation has happened. Logos has become flesh. Jesus Christ has become a fact in history. Is his earthly presence not seen as a kind of syncretism, a peaceful syncretism if you will, or maybe creative syncretism?"

John Carman, who studied a village church in South India, speaks of "a higher syncretism" evident among new converts from Hinduism to Christianity. He writes: "Syncretism may be regarded either as the same person's participation in both Christian and Hindu worship, or, more rarely in India, an attempt to combine the two. Yet there is also what I would like to call a higher syncretism, something close to what Hocking calls 'creative reconception', but not carried on by theologians. It is rather the faith, the ritual forms, and the patterns of living of lay Christians, sometimes new 'converts' to Christianity, who manage to clothe their new faith in the forms of the old, not merely the external language, but also something of the inner intent of the old faith and thereby create a genuine 'Hindu Christianity'" (93).

Among theologians closely related to the WCC in recent times, there is a tradition of defining syncretism as a neutral or even as a very positive process. In Wolfhart Pannenberg's view, the growth in understanding of the biblical figure of God has "actually the form of a syncretic process". In his estimation, "Christianity affords the greatest example of syncretic assimilative power; this religion not only linked itself to Greek philosophy but also inherited the entire religious tradition of the Mediterranean world"

(Basic Questions in Theology). Moltmann characterizes the religion of Israel as itself the product of a syncretic process: "Israel achieved a syncretism between the religion of the nomad and of the Canaanite peasant through historicizing the latter in struggle." The Orthodox theologian Demetrius Constantelos writes: "After all, it was a syncretic approach that won Christianity its followers in the first five centuries."

If an attempt is made to keep the purity of the gospel of Christ through isolation from other religions and secular ideologies, it will lead to a conception of the uniqueness of Christ* which will militate against the universality of Christ. As the Willowbank consultation report of the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization* puts it: "Indeed perhaps the most insidious form of syncretism in the world today is the attempt to mix a privatized gospel of personal forgiveness with a worldly (even demonic) attitude to wealth and power." Raymond Panikkar characterizes Western Christianity as "ancient paganism, or to be more precise, the complex of Hebrew-Hellenic-Greek-Latin-Celtic-modern religions converted to Christ more or less successfully".

Since all conversions are "more or less" and require continued struggle for the transformation of the unconverted elements, any new form of Christianity, like the old, will have to continue to fight within itself against thought-forms and life-practices which betray the universal lordship of Christ. Therefore, the decision for Christ which makes a person or culture or religion Christian is the dominant intention and goal of the conversion process. This is more so in the modern pluralistic world in which we all live with fragments of culture, philosophy and cult drawn from different religious and secular ideological traditions. "All Christians are pagan in parts. More so today. Synthesis is a long way away, it is almost 'eschatological'. Syncretism with a sense of Christian direction is all that we can now realize" (Thomas, 392).

See also dialogue, interfaith; religion.

M.M. THOMAS

■ L. Boff, Church, Charism and Power, London, SCM Press, 1985, ch. 7 ■ J. Carman, "Continuing Tasks in Inter-religious Dialogue", in Living Faiths and the Ecumenical Movement, S.J. Samartha ed., WCC, 1971 ■ D. Elwood ed., Asian Christian Theology: Emerging Themes, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1980 ■ H. Kraemer, Christian Message in a Non-Christian World, London, Edinburgh House, 1947 ■ J. Moltmann, Theology of Hope, London, SCM Press, 1967 ■ R. Panikkar, Christian Revelation and World Religions, London, Burns & Oates, 1967 ■ W. Pannenberg, Grundfragen systematischer Theologie (ET Basic Questions in Theology), vol. 2, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1971 ■ Y. Tesfai, "Ecumenism, Culture and Syncretism", IRM, 84, 332/333, 1995 ■ M.M. Thomas, "The Absoluteness of Jesus Christ and Christ-centred Syncretism", ER, 37, 4, 1985 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, No Other Name: The Choice between Syncretism and Christian Universalism, London, SCM Press, 1964.

SYNDESMOS

SYNDESMOS, the World Fellowship of Orthodox Youth, was founded in 1953 at the initiative of Orthodox involved in the work of the WCC Youth department. Its name is the Greek word for "uniting bond" (used in Eph. 4:3). Syndesmos is a federation of youth movements and theological schools within local Eastern Orthodox churches; the Oriental Orthodox youth* movements form a particular category of federated membership with representation in the administrative board and among the vice presidents. In 2000 it had 127 member movements and schools in 42 countries in Europe, the Middle East, Asia, Africa, North America and Latin America. As the only worldwide Orthodox organization, Syndesmos requires all member movements to be officially endorsed by the local hierarchy.

The problems of "diaspora"* – Orthodox living in countries without traditional Orthodox presence – have always been high on the Syndesmos agenda. It took significant initiatives in foreign mission in the 1950s and again in the early 1980s, and the African region has grown to be a significant one in the fellowship. Orthodox participation in the ecumenical movement was a high priority for Syndesmos in the two first decades and again in the late 1980s, with fraternal relationships developing with the WCC youth network, the World Student Christian Federation,* the Ecumenical Youth Council in Europe, the Middle East Council of Churches* and others.

Several Syndesmos assemblies have taken initiatives to improve international means of communication and information among the Orthodox, and some concrete initiatives have been achieved, including the development of an Orthodox press service, periodicals, directories and an important series of publications. Syndesmos has always been financially dependent on ecumenical support, and severe financial restrictions have required heavy reliance on volunteer work.

The role of laity* in the life of the Orthodox church has been an important topic throughout Syndesmos's existence, but with more focus in recent years on its social and ecclesial implications. Rapprochement and cooperation with Oriental Orthodox youth has been a growing concern since the 1960s, with significant steps taken in recent years. By the time of its 1989 assembly in Boston, Syndesmos had established links of communication and cooperation with movements from all Oriental churches, with Oriental representation in all Syndesmos meetings as a principle. At the 1992 assembly in Moscow, a new category of "federated" membership was created to allow Oriental Orthodox organizations and schools to join Syndesmos on an equal basis with the Eastern Orthodox, still recognizing the fact that full canonical and eucharistic unity had not been achieved on the level of the churches; the federated members are represented in the board of administration and in the executive committee, where their representative is one of the vice presidents.

Although Western European émigré groups were the most active in founding Syndesmos, there has been official Greek, Middle Eastern and Finnish representation from the outset. The role of Greek student movements with pan-Orthodox and ecumenical outlook grew stronger in the late 1950s, with the increasing presence and influence also of the Lebanese and Syrians of the patriarchate of Antioch. As an important area of diaspora, with several youth movements, North Americans became members officially in the 1960s.

With the 1964 amendment of the constitution to include theological schools as full affiliated members, Eastern European churches were able to join, since youth work as such was not permitted in most socialist countries. Their number grew slowly but steadily in the 1980s, as did the participation of youth movements of local dioceses in Greece and North America.

With the changes in the situation of the Orthodox churches in Central and Eastern Europe, Syndesmos has in the 1990s played a significant role in youth movement training and organizing. Seminars on various aspects of youth work and movement-building have been highest on the agenda; without any doubt, Syndesmos has the largest and most effective youth network in the region, connecting effectively with the grassroots.

After a period of reduced activity in the early 1970s, Syndesmos was able to take new initiatives in the late 1970s and through the 1980s in all of the areas mentioned above. Besides general assemblies (usually every three years), Syndesmos has organized international festivals of Orthodox youth, with thematic discussions on current challenges facing the Orthodox church, and four consultations of Orthodox theological schools, including those in Leningrad (1986), in Suprasl, Poland (1989) and in Halki, Constantinople (1994). Dozens of other consultations and exchanges on key issues have also been organized.

In the 1990s the contribution of Orthodox spirituality and theology in the area of ecological concerns became important in the work of Syndesmos. Several workshops, seminars and camps were organized on these themes, e.g., with the monasteries of Mt Athos and Ormylia. New themes of bioethics and sexuality as well as encounter with people of other faiths emerged in Syndesmos programmes towards the end of the 1990s.

The Syndesmos international office is usually hosted by the church and youth movement of the general secretary (1997, Bialystok, Poland), thus giving them a prominent role in the fellowship for that period, providing a strong local base and practical and financial support. Regional offices have also been organized in several parts of the world.

See also Eastern Orthodoxy, Oriental Orthodox churches.

HEIKKI HUTTUNEN

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

TAIZÉ COMMUNITY

THE ECUMENICAL community of Taizé was founded by Brother Roger Schutz in 1940. Alone for two years during the second world war, in the small village of Taizé in eastern France, he gave shelter to political refugees, mainly Jews. In 1949 seven brothers took monastic vows for life. The brothers today number 90 and include Catholics, Anglicans and various Protestants from 25 countries. Some live in small “fraternities” in poor regions. The community lives exclusively from its work and refuses donations. Brother Roger’s aim was to create a monastic community that would be a “parable of communion” among divided Christians.

Taizé is in constant contact with church leaders. Pope John Paul II, Archbishops Ramsey and Runcie, Metropolitan Nikodim of Leningrad and countless pastors and church leaders have visited Taizé. The brothers, as guests of Pope John XXIII (who once said of Taizé: “Ah! that little springtime!”), were present throughout the Second Vatican Council.* They have participated in several assemblies of the WCC and have been associated with the work of WCC commissions.

Since 1958 Taizé has welcomed hundreds of thousands of young people from around the world for weekly meetings. They participate in the community’s common prayer three times each day, study the Christian sources of faith and reflect on inner life and human solidarity. Refusing to create a “movement”, the community encourages participants to return to their local churches and parishes. Taizé is also a place of retreat for many ministers and priests.

In 1982, to stimulate reconciliation and trust in the world, a "pilgrimage of trust on earth" led Taizé not only to the major capitals of Europe but to those in other continents. The European meetings, always prepared with local parishes, bring together each year tens of thousands from both eastern and western Europe, from all denominations. Two Asian meetings were held in Madras, India, and several large gatherings have taken place in North and South America.

BROTHER ÉMILE

■ J.L. Balado, The Story of Taizé, 3rd ed., London, Mowbray, 1988 ■ G. Carey, A Spiritual Journey, London, Cassell, 1993 ■ O. Clément, Taizé: A Meaning to Life, Chicago, GIA, 1997 ■ J. Eck, Religious Facilitation through Intense Liturgical Participation: A Quasi-Experimental Study of Swedish Pilgrims, Lund, Lund University, 2001 ■ K. Spink, A Universal Heart, London, SPCK, 1986.

TAKENAKA, MASAO

B. 1925, Peking. Takenaka has been active in the WCC and the Christian Conference of Asia. He has addressed major ecumenical gatherings, including the WCC's New Delhi assembly in 1961, and lectured on ecumenical topics from an Asian perspective at various universities. A graduate of Doshisha University in 1950, he received a PhD degree in social ethics from Yale University in 1955. He returned to Doshisha in 1962 as professor of Christian ethics and sociology of religion, and held visiting professorships at Union Theological Seminary, New York, 1962-63, Yale University, 1973, and Harvard University, 1981-82. In 1986 he became director of the Centre for American Study at Doshisha University.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ M. Takenaka, Christian Art in Asia, Tokyo, Kyo Bun Kwan, 1975 ■ God Is Rice: Asian Culture and Christian Faith, WCC, 1986 ■ Reconciliation and Renewal in Japan, New York, Friendship, 1967.

TANTUR ECUMENICAL INSTITUTE

LOCATED in Jerusalem, Tantur arose from a compelling suggestion in 1963 to Pope Paul VI from the official Anglican, Protestant and Orthodox observers to the Second Vatican Council: someone, somewhere, should establish an international, intercultural institute where Christian scholars and teachers could experience a community life of prayer, study and dialogue. The main focus would be "Christian reflection on the mystery of salvation as revealed through the sacred scriptures and the teachings of the early, undivided church, and as expressed in the experiences of the diverse Christian communions throughout the ages".

Upon Paul VI's return from the holy land in January 1964, where he had met Ecumenical Patriarch Athenagoras, he decided that Jerusalem should be the place for the centre. "There Christ founded in the Spirit the one, undivided church, and today Christians of all communions, one yet sadly divided, find other 'peoples of the book', Jews and Muslims." The Vatican purchased the Tantur property, and an interconfessional advisory board authorizes the institute's programmes and personnel.

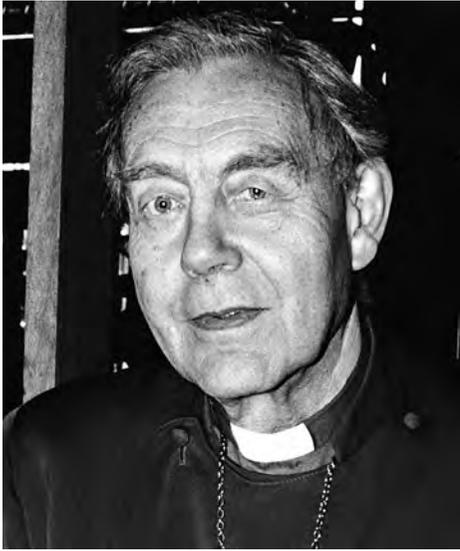

Since Tantur's opening in 1972, over 4000 Christian scholars, teachers, parish clergy and other church workers have participated in its programmes. Besides the programme for young and senior scholars on sabbaticals, three-month sessions in continuing education and spiritual formation are so designed that one can concentrate on biblical studies and field trips in historical geography (the holy land as "the fifth gospel"); biblical spiritualities; the Eastern churches; Jewish and Islamic spiritualities; the bases and practices of ecumenical and inter-religious relations; the social, political and religious situation in the Middle East; and human rights and conflict resolution through creative non-violence.

Located on the southern border between Israel's Jerusalem and the West Bank (Bethlehem), Tantur is called "an oasis of sane discourse" for its many publicized and unpublicized gatherings of Israeli Jews and Muslim and Christian Palestinians.

TOM STRANSKY

TAYLOR, JOHN VERNON

B. 11 Sept. 1914, Cambridge, UK; d. Feb. 2001. Taylor was bishop of Winchester, UK, 1975-85. After studying theology at Oxford, he was warden of Bishop Tucker Theological College, Uganda, from the end of the war until 1954. Then followed a period of international, and especially African, involvement: with the International Missionary Council,* 1956-59; as Africa secretary, then general secretary, of the Church Missionary Society, 1959-74; and as vice-chairman of the Theological Education Fund, 1968-74. He was a speaker at the Ecumenical Institute, Bossey, in 1955 and 1957. Before the IMC-WCC integration he was a delegate to the IMC Ghana assembly in 1958, then to the WCC assemblies in New Delhi 1961 and Uppsala 1968, and to the Bangkok 1973 and Melbourne 1980 world mission conferences.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ J.V. Taylor, Enough Is Enough, 1975 ■ The Go-Between God, 1972 ■ The Growth of the Church of Uganda, 1958 ■ A Matter of Life and Death, 1986 ■ The Primal Vision, 1965, all SCM Press, London ■ Weep Not for Me: Meditations on the Cross and the Resurrection, WCC, 1986.

TEACHING AUTHORITY

IN THE HISTORY of church division, dissent over teaching authority and authoritative teaching has played a prominent role. From its very beginning within the Jewish community of faith, which was characterized in Jesus' time by a pluralism of at least four main teaching traditions, Christianity wrestled with three decisive questions: What is the normative and unifying content of the Christian faith* (the regula fidei) which could guide the re-reading of the Jewish scriptures in light of the Christ-event? Who are the authoritative witnesses and teachers in the new-born communities of the church?* How should the community and its leaders proceed in order to safeguard the content of faith and the way of life according to the gospel of Christ, to unite the church members and the scattered communities within one bond of love, and to guide them in committed confession to that faith amid the challenges of the surrounding world?

The New Testament writings reflect this foundational struggle over the original proclamation (kērygma) of the gospel (euan-gelion), the teaching (didachē) of Jesus and the apostles, the authority (exousia) of the Lord sent forth upon the community, showing it how to speak boldly (parrēsia) and how to give witness even at the risk of one's life (martyria). Amid all the diversity, the NT has given special attention to factors of unity and continuity (homologia), including early confessional formulas, the authority of the Twelve and of the first missionaries like Paul, the collection of reliable gospel narratives and apostolic correspondence, a common sacramental practice of baptism* and the eucharist,* and a common discipline of life (e.g. on marriage,* on public life within the Hellenistic context). The apostles exercised authority also by a practice of excommunication* and reconciliation,* a conciliar form of decision making about divisive issues (Acts 15) and, in a later stage of development, by a more common pattern of ministry and its orderly transmission.

Initially there was no need for formal legitimation of the action of the bearers of the kerygma, as they could speak with the authority and commission of the Lord (see Matt. 28:18-20; Luke 10:19; John 1:12, 18:20; Acts 4:29-31, 9:27, 18:25, 28:31; 2 Cor. 10:8, 13:10), "not like the scribes" (Matt. 7:29), rather like "uneducated and ordinary men" (Acts 4:13), yet "by the Spirit" (Acts 2; 1 Cor. 12:3-11) and "by the name of Jesus" (Acts 4:10), as messengers of the gospel, sent by Christ (Rom. 1:1) and as (eye)witnesses of his life, death and resurrection (Acts 1:21-22).

But already in Paul's writings, and much more in the pastoral epistles and in 2 Peter and Jude, some formal structures of a teaching authority can be discerned: apostolic authority and episcopate (1 Cor. 1:10-17, 4:1-6; 2 Cor. 5-6, 11-12; Acts 15:2,22,28; 1 Pet. 1:1, 5:1-4; 2 Pet. 1:12, 3:1-2; 1 Tim. 1:18, 3:1-13, 4:6-7, 5:21-22, 6:20-21; 2 Tim. 1:11-14, 3:14-17; Titus 1:5-9), a sound deposit of faith (2 Tim. 1:14; Titus 1:9,13, 2:1; Jude 3), an incipient canon* of apostolic writings (2 Tim. 2:14-17; 2 Pet. 1:20-21, 3:15-16), the truth laid down in a rule of faith (1 Tim. 1:15, 2:5-6; 2 Tim. 2:11-13), which must be defended against false teachings and myths (1 Tim. 4:1-7; 2 Tim. 2:15-18; Titus 1:10-16; 2 Pet. 2:1-22, 3:17; Jude 4-8).

This rather early development of a rule of faith, a common discipline of life and common structures of authoritative teaching and decision making was further elaborated during the first four or five centuries. Synods and councils formulated confessions of faith and creeds* and put certain teachings under anathema.* From the middle of the 3rd century, episcopal oversight gained momentum in the local churches. Catechetical schools blossomed in Alexandria and Antioch. Bishops of the apostolic sees (leaders of Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople and Rome being called patriarchs) were consulted in matters of faith and morals, especially the bishop of Rome, in order to protect the unity* and holiness,* the catholicity* and apostolicity* of the church. But we have to wait until the middle ages before a more formal idea of an episcopal magisterium* developed in the West, being from its very beginning in a certain tension with the teaching authority of the theologians, their schools and universities (magisterium doctorum).

From the 8th and 9th centuries, the basis of teaching authority has gradually shifted from charismatic and traditional to legal (Max Weber), from original auctoritas of what was taught to juridical potestas of those who taught (Yves Congar), from its reliability to set forth the true tradition (traditio) to its competence to discern and to decide (discretio) (Karl Morrison), from its role to communicate and proclaim the faith (communicatio fidei) to an office to define the standard formulations of faith (determi- natio fidei) (Odessa report). The teaching authority of the bishops was connected with the civil ideas of investiture, representation and licence and became part of ministerial jurisdiction. This history is the source of the disputes between conciliar and papal jurisdiction (see conciliarity), which lie behind the Western schism, as well as the origins of the theory of papal infallibility* (Tierney). Even the Reformation and Counter-Reformation can be viewed to a large extent as a theological struggle over how to define "hierarchy of authorities" with regard to the teaching of the church. The Protestant reformers re-organized the forms of episcopate and entrusted it to synods and local councils, advised by a college of theological doctores (Henderson). The challenges of the European Enlightenment, the contextual and inculturation problems of the Christian faith in the 20th century and the growing religious pluralism* and Christian denominationalism* have added to the urgency of an ecumenical debate about the authoritative and faithful teaching of the church. A common authoritative teaching today would become possible and credible only if on this matter the controversies and censures from the past could be overcome.

To this end the Accra meeting of the Faith and Order* commission in 1974 started an "ecumenical inquiry" on "the ways in which the various churches decide or define or proclaim basic teaching about Christian faith and morals in the contemporary situation". Reasons given for the study were: the pluralism of authoritative teaching bodies and hermeneutical procedures (see hermeneutics), the crisis in church teaching authority in an era of rapid change, a strong sense of the historicity and contextuality of all church teaching, the challenge of modern linguistic and hermeneutical philosophy and, last but not least, the division of the churches itself, which seems to be caused not only by the content of their teaching but also by the authoritative procedures leading to the reception* of such teaching in various churches. "No church", it was said, "can be satisfied until the fullness of the truth attested by its own authoritative doctrine and promised through its own living teaching office is perceived and appreciated by the whole people of God."

The WCC's assembly at Nairobi in 1975 warmly welcomed the project "How Does the Church Teach Authoritatively Today?" A small consultation in Geneva in 1976 prepared a working paper (One in Christ, 12, 1976), which was followed by reports from Italy, Greece, Holland and East and West Germany. In 1977 a F&O consultation took place in Odessa. It concluded: "As the churches engage in the ecumenical movement, they need to re-examine deliberately their ways and modes of teaching. Consensus and communion in conciliar life can be reached only if the ways of teaching become more and more capable of common decision-making."

The report reflected especially on the divergences and convergences among the various traditions, the varieties of actual situations, the search for new patterns of credibility and the examples of common teaching today within the ecumenical movement.

At the Bangalore plenary meeting of the F&O commission, due attention was paid to the results of the study thus far, but a decision was made to give priority to the content of the apostolic faith before studying at a later date the common ways of making decisions and exercising teaching authority.

By doing so, Bangalore postponed the issue of ecumenical hermeneutics, on which F&O had prepared various studies in the 1960s, such as those on "The Hermeneutical Significance of the Councils" and "The Authority of the Bible". The theme of teaching authority was also left aside in the Lima text on ministry (see Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry*). The importance of the subject was recognized, however, and perhaps even overstated by repeated reminders (Lima 1982, Vancouver 1983, Stavanger 1985, Budapest 1989) that the unity of the church depends on three main elements or conditions: a common understanding of the apostolic faith, full communion in the sacraments* and mutual recognition of ministries, and agreement on common ways of teaching and decision making.

In the responses to the Lima text on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, several churches asked for continuation of the study on decision making and teaching authority. The Budapest meeting of F&O in 1989 decided to include such a study in its overall programme on ecumenical perspectives on ecclesiology. At the fifth world conference of F&O in Santiago de Compostela in 1993, it became clear that the issue implies both hermeneutical and ecclesiological questions. Two parallel series of consultations were set up, resulting in two F&O documents presented to the eighth assembly of the WCC in Harare in 1998: The Nature and Purpose of the Church and A Treasure in Earthen Vessels.

In the former, teaching authority is put under the heading of oversight, or episcopate, in its communal, personal and collegial forms and under the heading of the complementarity of conciliarity and primacy.* The document speaks of the accountability of those who exercise oversight in their communities and of the necessary functions to discern the truth, reckoning with the faith insights of all believers (sensus fidelium). It sadly recognizes in a commentary that no agreement could be reached on common structures of decision making, neither in conciliar nor in primatial forms. In a time of growing differentiation of life-contexts and of post-modern philosophical questioning of universal truth claims, such a result is no surprise. Increasingly, authoritative teaching in any church has met with serious problems of reception. In a pluralist society, the conflict of interpretations requires creative hermeneutical skills and a patient exchange of ideas. To teach and to serve the coherence and mutual confidence of the community of faith demands the sensitive listening of those who decide "what the Spirit is saying to the churches", even through the voices of other churches.

The second F&O document therefore reflects on "a hermeneutics for the unity of the church" and calls the church a "hermeneutical community", a "communion of co-responsible persons". It commented: "All believers, because of their unity with Jesus Christ and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, have the potential to receive God's word, to discern God's will and to proclaim the gospel. Those whose call by God to exercise the ministry of oversight (episcopate) is recognized by the church must enable the people of God to recognize and actualize the gifts that the Holy Spirit has bestowed upon them for the fulfilment of the church's life and mission. This means that the ministry of oversight must include an hermeneutical function" (55). Part of this hermeneutical function is to consult with other churches regarding important questions of faith and discipline, and to consult all levels of their constituency in matters of doctrine, "so that what relates to all should be dealt with by all" (58,61,64). The document concludes: "As an hermeneutical community, the church is called to grow into full koinonia by Spirit-guided discernment of the living Tradition." Though the text recognizes deep differences in organization and reception of oversight and authoritative teaching models in various churches, it is optimistic about a growing "ecumenical tradition" of a coherent, though by no means uniform, interpretation of "the faith of the church through the ages". This faith might be found across confessional boundaries, helped by exegetical exchange, theological dialogue, shared pastoral solutions in comparable contexts and the gradual reception of ecumenical consensus-texts.

The topic of teaching authority has been intensely discussed in some bilateral dialogues* as well. Perhaps over the past 20-30 years they have reached even more results with regard to concrete structures of teaching authority and decision making, especially with regard to conciliar and primatial structures of authority in matters of faith and morals. They have considered the sensitive question of the need for a form of a "Petrine ministry" for the universal church, seen as a communion of communions. First steps were set in a broad range of dialogues in the 1970s and 1980s, e.g. in the Reformed-Roman Catholic conversations reports "The Presence of Christ in Church and World" (1977) and "Towards a Common Understanding of the Church" (1990); in the Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission's Venice (1976) and Windsor (1981) reports on "Authority in the Church"; in the Disciples of Christ-Roman Catholic dialogue "The Church as Communion in Christ" (1992); in the Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue's report "The Ministry in the Church" (1981); in the Methodist-Roman Catholic conversations Denver (1971), Dublin (1976) and Honolulu (1981) reports and their further elaboration in the statements "The Apostolic Tradition" (1991) and "The Word of Life" (1996); and in the Old Catholic-Eastern Orthodox dialogue's report on ecclesiology (Chambésy 1983). In most of those dialogues the issue of the specific claims of the papal magisterium was treated to some extent, though far from resolved.

After the invitation issued in 1995 by Pope John Paul II in his encyclical Ut Unum Sint* to the leaders and theologians of the other churches to seek together with him the forms in which such Petrine ministry of the Roman see might accomplish a service of love recognized by all, various dialogues have tried to go deeper into this historically church-dividing issue. Two ground-breaking theological statements issued from the dialogues of the RCC with Anglicans and with Methodists in 1999 and 2001 respectively: The Gift of Authority and Speaking the Truth in Love (see Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue; Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue). Both not only touch upon formal structures of decision making and authoritative teaching but, drawing upon the scriptures and the creeds, formulate the core content of faith to be taught in communion. These texts, once fully received by the mandating churches, would themselves become a form of ecumenical authoritative teaching. With regard to the ecclesiological setting of those who exercise episcopate, it seems generally accepted, as became clear in the F&O statement on ecclesiology, that it should be done in a communal, personal and collegial way and in communion with the whole church. Preliminary consultation of the sensus fidei within the whole people of God is considered a necessity by Methodists, Anglicans and Roman Catholics alike. And even when a final decision in matters of faith and morals is taken, the reception* by the faithful is important as a sign that they recognize in it "the faith of the church through the ages".

Differences of opinion remain, however, among Roman Catholics, Anglicans and Methodists, with regard to the way clergy, laypeople, men and women, should take part in the task of discerning and determining the truth of the gospel within the authoritative teaching procedures of the church, though there is agreement on their constitutive, Spirit-led role in keeping to the truth which is Christ. In both documents the Roman Catholic dialogue partner is urged to make this constitutive role of lay participants much clearer in its regular synodal and conciliar life. Differences of opinion remain as well over the interpretation of the guaranteed freedom from error, or “infallibility”, claimed by the First Vatican Council for doctrinal definitions ex cathedra by the bishop of Rome. In both cases, the Roman Catholic dialogue partners make clear, as John Paul II has done in Ut Unum Sint, that such freedom from error does not eliminate human frailty and weakness of any particular bishop of Rome, nor does it exclude improved insights and formulations in the future.

Finally, The Gift of Authority makes clear a possible fruitful approach to primacy: “The exigencies of church life call for a specific exercise of episcopate at the service of the whole church. In the pattern found in the New Testament, one of the Twelve is chosen by Jesus to strengthen the others so that they will remain faithful to their mission and in harmony with each other... Historically, the bishop of Rome has exercised such a ministry either for the benefit of the whole church, as when Leo contributed to the council of Chalcedon, or for the benefit of a local church, as when Gregory the Great supported Augustine of Canterbury’s mission and ordering of the English church. This gift has been welcomed and the ministry of these bishops of Rome continues to be celebrated liturgically by Anglicans as well as Roman Catholics... It is this faith which the bishop of Rome in certain circumstances has a duty to discern and make explicit. This form of authoritative teaching has no stronger guarantee from the Spirit than have the solemn definitions of ecumenical councils. The reception of the primacy of the bishop of Rome entails the recognition of this specific ministry of the universal primate. We believe that this is a gift to be received by all the churches” (47).

ANTON HOUTEPEN

■ Y. Congar, “Pour une histoire sémantique du terme ‘magisterium’” and “Bref historique des formes du ‘magistère’ et de ses relations avec les docteurs”, Revue des sciences philosophiques et théologiques, 60, 1976 ■ Faith and Order:

Minutes Accra 1974, WCC, 1974 ■ R.W. Henderson, The Teaching Office in the Reformed Tradition, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1962 ■ “How Does the Church Teach Authoritatively Today?”, ER, 31, 1979 (Odessa report) ■ K.F. Morrison, Tradition and Authority in the Western Church, 300-1140, Princeton NJ, Princeton UP, 1969 ■ Sharing in One Hope: Bangalore 1978, WCC, 1978 ■ F.A. Sullivan, Magisterium: Teaching Authority in the Catholic Church, Dublin, Gill & Macmillan, 1983 ■ B. Tierney, Origins of Papal Infallibility, 1150-1350: A Study on the Concepts of Infallibility, Sovereignty and Tradition in the Middle Ages, Leiden, Brill, 1972 ■ W.A. Visser’t Hooft, Teachers and the Teaching Authorities: The Magistri and the Magisterium, WCC, 2000.

TEMPLE, WILLIAM

B. 15 Oct. 1881, Exeter, UK; d. 26 Oct. 1944, Westgate-on-Sea, Kent. William Temple was the most prominent British ecumenist in the period from the Student Christian Movement (SCM) conference at Matlock in 1908 and the Edinburgh conference of 1910, at which he was a steward, to the creation of the British Council of Churches (BCC) in 1942.

Temple was the son of Beatrice and Frederick Temple, bishop of London, who later (1896-1902) became archbishop of Canterbury. William thus came from the heart of the English establishment. He attended Rugby school and Balliol College, Oxford, where he received first-class honours in classics, ancient history and philosophy. He had the unconscious, effortless superiority of the Balliol scholar but combined this with a winsome humanity and humility, tempered by chronic ill health.

Temple taught philosophy at Queen’s College, Oxford, 1907-10, and was ordained, though not without some doubts from his bishop (Paget) over doctrinal issues. From these early wrestlings stems Temple’s theology expressed in Mens Creatrix, Christus Veritas and Nature, Man and God. Here – Caird was the great influence – is the last theological flowering of Oxford neo-Hegelianism before the era of logical analysis. Temple links matter, life, mind and spirit but insists at the same time on the historicity of the incarnation.* It was this which made Christianity “the most avowedly materialist of all the great religions”, for the coming of the Logos into the created world was seen as the fulfilment of God’s immanence. Rejecting any kenotic theory, Temple did not foresee the difficulties which philosophers and theologians were soon to discover.

Temple quickly put theology into practice as president of the workers’ education association, 1908-24, a lifelong concern for the underprivileged he shared with Frances Anson, whom he married in 1916. After four years as headmaster of Repton school (1910-14), Temple became rector of St James, Piccadilly, London, throwing himself with vigour into the mission of repentance and hope and also the life and liberty movement, which aimed at securing greater self-government for the Church of England. Temple’s hopes were partially fulfilled in the enabling act of 1919, which set up the church assembly.

From a canonry at Westminster, Temple was appointed bishop of Manchester in 1921, then archbishop of York in 1929, becoming archbishop of Canterbury from 1942 to 1944 – arguably the sharpest mind in that see since Anselm, and the most popular archbishop of modern times.

Temple was in the line of Anglican social thinkers running back through the Christian social union to F.D. Maurice. He combined an incarnational theology with an acute social conscience. He was a moderate, if idealistic, radical. Chairmanship of the Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship at Birmingham in 1924 was his first significant ecumenical foray. COPEC foreshadowed much of the thinking which came to legislative fruition in the “welfare state”* (that phrase was popularized by Temple) created by Clement Attlee’s administration, 1945-50. Temple searched for “middle axioms”,* i.e. statements which offer working guidelines between fundamental Christian theological statements and the complexities of both legislation and industrial problems. Christianity and Social Order is a foreshadowing of much social thinking in the era of consensus in Britain from 1945 to 1979. Freedom, fellowship and service were characteristics of the approach to the common good stated in an Anglican form at Malvern in 1941. A stress on corporate sin* was learned from Reinhold Niebuhr.

Temple came into international ecumenical prominence at the Jerusalem missionary conference (1928): as drafter of the conference statement, he revealed extraordinary gifts of penetration and empathy that enabled him to synthesize diverse views. He was prominent at Lausanne in 1927, drafted the final statement at Oxford 1937, and was chairman of the Faith and Order conference at Edinburgh in 1937. It was there by 122 votes to 19 that the plans for a world council of churches were laid. Temple embodied the inevitable link between faith and action, both stemming from the absolute allegiance to Christ as Lord. At the first meeting of the provisional committee at Utrecht on 13 May 1938, Temple was elected chairman. His dream came true, not in 1941 as planned but after the cataclysm of war in 1948. It was in 1942 at his enthronement at Canterbury that Temple pointed to the “worldwide fellowship of Christians” stemming from missions as the “great new fact of our era”.

In England Temple dominated two decades, though disappointed at the follow-up to the Lambeth appeal of 1920 and at the failure of Lambeth 1930 to live up to its promise. Temple himself, though consistently backing the South India negotiations, became rather more “Catholic” on church order but must be given credit for Anglican initiatives, without which there might have been no religion-and-life weeks, unprecedented cooperation with Cardinal Hinsley, or a BCC inaugurated in 1942 with the inevitable sermon from Temple, who became president.

In the world of ecumenical scholarship Temple was a paradox. If his theology became unfashionable in the decades of Hitler and Barth, his devotional writings were widely read. Readings in St John's Gospel helped many, though it was out of key with critical scholarship. Temple also had the ear of students to an extraordinary degree, especially through the SCM, which was a vital ecumenical seedbed for Christian leaders. Many trace the renewal of Christian apologetics among students to the Oxford mission of 1931 led by Temple. His biographer recalls 3000 student voices at that mission whispering the words of the hymn "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross". Perhaps that was his greatest hour. Temple's death was a great shock to a war-stricken nation.

JOHN MUNSEY TURNER

- W. Temple, Christianity and the State, 1928
- Christus Veritas, 1924 ■ Mens Creatrix, 1917
- Nature, Man and God, 1934 ■ Readings in St John's Gospel, 1939, all Macmillan, London
- Christianity and Social Order, Harmondsworth, Shephard-Wolwyn & SPCK, 1942
- F.A. Ironmonger, William Temple, Archbishop of Canterbury: His Life and Letters, London, Oxford UP, 1948
- J. Kent, William Temple, London, Cambridge UP, 1992
- R.H. Preston, A Future of Christian Ethics, London, SCM Press, 1987, ch. 6
- R.H. Preston et al., Archbishop William Temple: Issues in Church and Society Fifty Years On, William Temple Foundation, 1994
- A.M. Ramsey, From Gore to Temple, London, Longmans, 1960
- A.M. Suggate, William Temple and Christian Social Ethics Today, Edinburgh, Clark, 1987
- A. Wilkinson, Christian Socialism: Scott Holland to Tony Blair, London, SCM Press, 1998, ch. 5.

THEOLOGY, AFRICAN

AFRICAN THEOLOGY is the articulation of the Christian faith* by African theologians or Christians who try to understand this faith within the context of their history* and culture,* taking into consideration also the contemporary issues of life. They look at it through reading and understanding of the Bible, reflecting a rich cultural heritage that has evolved over many generations. They celebrate it in their own liturgies and express it through art, drama and song.

The phrase "African theology" is used here to refer to the contemporary developments in theology, although it could also include the impressive theological developments of the early church in North Africa and Egypt by the likes of Augustine of Hippo, Cyprian of Carthage and Athanasius of Alexandria. The ancient church in Ethiopia developed also its own theological tradition.

One of the problems of doing theology in Africa concerns language. Africa has some 2000 languages, not counting dialects, which means that one must use a foreign language, chiefly English or French, to communicate beyond one's own ethnic and language setting. Theologizing in a foreign language imposes limitations. In using an indigenous language that has been exposed to Christianity for perhaps only 50 or 100 years, the theologian faces the question of how far it can fully assimilate, sustain and articulate Christian concepts that have no immediate parallels in indigenous concepts. For example, how does one talk about the Trinity, the incarnation, transubstantiation, or the programme of the WCC on a Just, Participatory and Sustainable Society*?

SOURCES OF THEOLOGY IN AFRICA

The first and foremost source is the Bible, of which there were in 2001 about 660 translations in African languages. The second is Christian heritage, which has come down the centuries through Hebrew, Greek, Roman and later European and American cultures. This heritage has been wrapped in the dresses of those cultures, and it is rich in spirituality, theological concepts, art, music, liturgies, symbols, etc. all of which (depending on their critical use) have a contribution to make to African theology.

The third source is African culture, particularly African religion, world-view and values. African religion is profoundly monotheistic, at many points resembling the religion of the Jewish (Old) Testament, the proverbs and parables of Jesus. It has been the most influential force in shaping the African world-view and is still strong today, coming to the fore especially in times of life crises. African religion is grounded on the conviction that God* exists and is the Creator of all things. Missionaries did not introduce the notion of God to Africans; the main new element in their teaching was the naming of Jesus Christ.* Nevertheless, the religious vocabulary used in the churches, the spirituality of the Christians and the translation of the Bible are all heavily coloured by African religion.

The fourth source is African history, which we primarily divide into pre-colonial, colonial and post-colonial periods. Contemporary history includes rapid social, economic and political change, for better or for worse, with mass media, modern technology and contact with other nations playing increasingly important roles.

MAIN ISSUES IN AFRICAN THEOLOGY

African theology addresses all aspects of the Christian faith, but here we mention only the items which receive the most attention.

African religion and the Christian faith. The encounter between these two began at the very moment the first missionaries preached the gospel in Africa. Is the God described in the Bible the same God who is acknowledged and worshipped in African religion? African theologians themselves generally answer yes, affirming that God's revelation is not limited to the biblical record (see Matt. 5:17; Heb. 1:1-2).

Theologians go on to discuss ways in which the gospel comes to fulfill African religious longing and yearning. In turn, they ask what contributions African religion makes to the life of the church, e.g. in terms of sensitivity to the spiritual realities, harmony with and respect for nature* and creation,* and the evolving of relevant forms of liturgy* and worship. Worship in African tradition utilizes the whole body through singing, dancing, clapping, yelling, shouting and moving rhythmically, so that the entire person (body and spirit) is rejoicing, giving thanks to God and calling upon God.

One of the central points of contact relates to African anthropology, since here the two religious traditions intimately rub shoulders. According to African religion, persons are a creature of God and are in relation to God as child and parent. Many prayers of African religion address God as "Father"/"Mother" and refer to persons as God's children. This concept links persons to God and simultaneously separates them ontologically from God. At the same time, a person is part of creation and therefore finite in power, knowledge and duration of life. Each one depends ultimately on God, whatever one may achieve in life. It is God who creates, sustains and continually saves a person individually and humankind corporately. Each person is in relation with fellow persons and with nature at large. A basic understanding here is: "I am, because we are." This perspective relates horizontally to embrace the family, community and wider circles of human society, and nature at large. It also relates vertically towards God, to embrace the departed, the living, and those yet to be born. People acknowledge two dimensions of existence that dovetail with each other, forming a unity: the visible and the invisible, the physical and the spiritual. People are also aware of a mystical power that derives from God and fills the universe, being variously accessible to people and other creatures.

The growing consensus of African theology is that African religion has said yes to the gospel. The gospel has also said yes to African religion. Consequently, African theology is taking up this inter-religious dialogue seriously. Many theologians have done research in African religion to understand it better and to relate it to the Christian faith, including Harry Sawyerr (Sierra Leone), E. Bolaji Idowu (Nigeria), Engelbert Mveng (Cameroon), Vincent Mulago (Zaire), Gabriel Setiloane (South Africa), A.B.T. Byaruhanga-Akiiki (Uganda) and Joseph N.K. Mugambi (Kenya).

A few theologians, however, consider such a discussion a form of syncretism* to be avoided. Failing to see any continuity between biblical and African religion, they tend to view dialogue with African religion as a return to heathenism.

Christology. African theology is giving an increasing variety of answers to the question of who Jesus Christ is. For example: in the theology of liberation in Southern Africa, Jesus Christ is described as the fighting God, the Liberator who is on the side of the poor* and oppressed. The footprints of Jesus in his suffering appeared during the apartheid era in the torture chambers, imprisonments, beatings and cries of the oppressed. Africans were being driven to the cross of Jesus, to the God who hears the cries of the oppressed, and not to the God of the oppressor.

Some theologians, like Mveng and Anselme Titianma Sanon, see Jesus Christ as the Master of initiation because he has gone through the main stages of life according to African tradition and has survived death, the hardest of them all (see resurrection). Jesus Christ has risen again and therefore has the qualifications to be Friend-Master, to show us the way of life in its fullness and to win our respect, confidence and love.

In different ways in African Christianity, people know Jesus Christ as the great Chief, the Ancestor, the Healer, the One who exorcises troublesome spirits, the One who protects them against magic and sorcery, and the One who enables childless women to bear.

This healing image of Jesus Christ comes out particularly in the African Independent Churches* (AIC), many of which emphasize healing. This movement started in the early 19th century and now is found in almost every African country (10,500 separate AICs in 2001). For various reasons they have separated from historic or mission churches and from one another or have arisen totally autonomously. In general the movement is in reaction to what local Christians perceive as unsatisfactory theology and practices of the historic churches, which have to some extent failed to capture the hearts of Africans.

Women's theology. As they do in all countries of the world, women constitute the majority in the church in Africa. Power, however, is in the hands of men, a form of injustice that African women are beginning to recognize. A shrillness is growing in women's theological voices. Mercy Amba Oduyoye, for example, on the basis of the Genesis creation story, emphasizes creation and the continuity of human life in the womb of the woman. In 1989 the first convocation of the Circle of Concerned African Women Theologians was held in Accra, Ghana, bringing together 65 participants. This has been followed by two further meetings, the first in 1996 in Nairobi on transforming power, and the second in 2002 in Addis Ababa on "Sex, Stigma and HIV/AIDS: African Women Challenging Religion, Culture and Social Practices".

The theology of liberation. This theology was prevalent in Southern Africa during the apartheid* era (up to 1994), where oppression was rampant and the minority European settlers denied Africans their human rights. Among the African theologians of liberation are Desmond Tutu, Simon Maimela, Itumeleng J. Mosala, Zephaniah Kameeta and Takatso A. Mofokeng. The first major book on the subject was published in 1972, which the South African government banned before it could be put on the shelves. A year later it was published in London and New York as Black Theology: The South African Voice, edited by Basil Moore, an Englishman. In this book of essays, one hears the cry of the oppressed "in revolt against the spiritual enslavement of African people... It is a theology of the oppressed, by the oppressed, for the liberation of the oppressed."

The Kairos document* appeared in 1985, produced by a number of theologians, both African and settlers. The document took up the issues of liberation theology and exposed the false theology of the state, which had justified the violence of the racist government against Africans under the guise of keeping law and order. The document identifies God as being on the side of the oppressed people and urges Christians to stand against oppression. South Africa gained majority rule in 1994, with Nelson Mandela as its first African president.

Church and state. The relation between church and state* is a major concern in many areas. For example, in the formerly socialist countries of Ethiopia, Angola and Mozambique, the freedom of the church was to a certain degree curtailed, and the state was committed to an ideology of atheism.* But with the collapse of socialist and communist ideology in these and other countries, religious freedom was restored, and atheism has vanished like dew before the morning sun. In predominantly Muslim countries like Egypt, Sudan and others in the northern one-third of Africa, the church has little freedom, and Christians sometimes live under pressure, if not outright persecution. Large-scale enslavement of African peoples by the Arab immigrants is reported in the Sudan and elsewhere, where also Islamic law (sharia) is enforced upon all inhabitants. Many African countries have been or still are under military regimes. Here too, situations of conflict arise, and churches have sometimes been faced with difficulties, as was the case in Uganda during the regime of Idi Amin (1971-79). Most African Christians, however, live in countries where the state and the church enjoy a high degree of cooperation in various ways, as for example in South Africa today, Zaire, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

Other themes in African theology include biblical studies and hermeneutics, the nature and mission of the church, the liturgical life of the church, Christian art and drama, the ecumenical movement, the church itself and the relation between human life and nature at large.

CONCLUSION

African theology is in its early stage. Much of it is expressed orally, through art, singing, sermons and prayers. Written theology is the privilege of a small number of theologians, who are often forced to write in languages not native to them. But African theology is raising issues which are relevant to the living situation of the church in Africa. At the same time, it is in touch with theologies from other parts of the world.

There was an explosion of Christianity in Africa in the 20th century, and African theology began to take shape in that process of rapid expansion. Whereas there were only 10 million Christians in Africa in 1900 (9% of the total population), by the year 2000 the number had reached some 380 million, or 48% of the total population. Within 100 years the southern two-thirds of Africa became predominantly Christian, while the northern one-third remained predominantly Muslim. Since about 1965, African theology in the form of books and articles has also become much more widespread. Theology is thus at a very exciting period in the history of Christianity in Africa.

See also anthropology, African.

JOHN S. MBITI

■ K. Bediako, Christianity in Africa: The Renewal of a Non-Western Religion, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1995 ■ R. Gibellini ed., Paths of African Theology, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1994 ■ M. Kanyoro & N. Njoroge eds, Groaning in Faith: African Women in the Household of God, Nairobi, Acton, 1996 ■ LWF, Christian Theology and Theological Education in the African Context, Geneva, 1978 ■ J.S. Mbiti, Bible and Theology in African Christianity, Nairobi, Oxford, 1986 ■ T.A. Mofokeng, The Crucified among the Crossbearers, Kampen, Kok, 1983 ■ M.A. Oduyoye, Hearing and Knowing, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1986 ■ J.S. Pobee ed., Exploring Afro-Christology, Bern, Lang, 1992 ■ S. Torres & K. Appiah-Kubi eds, African Theology en Route, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1979.

THEOLOGY, ASIAN

A LIVING theology is one that addresses the questions, aspirations and sufferings of a people in a given situation. When Asian churches begin to relate their theology to their context, there emerges a distinctive Asian theology. In the past the Asian churches, by and large a product of Western missions, were content with repeating, without reflection, the confessions of faith evolved by the Western churches. A creative theology in Asia began to emerge in the 19th century when the churches started relating their faith to the questions and concerns peculiar to Asia. This theological encounter continues as the church faces new problems and challenges.

The relation between Christian faith and the major Asian religions continues to be a dominant theme of Asian theology. The world-views and doctrines of traditional religions exercise a profound influence in moulding the sensibilities of the people of Asia. In the days of aggressive evangelization and colonization, the missionaries were not prepared to see any value in Asian views. Most of them considered the religions in Asia to be discontinuous with Christian faith.

A new awareness of the spiritual values embedded in them surfaced as a result of the objective study of these religions and a closer contact with the followers of these faiths. Still basing their approach on a theological framework that drew a sharp distinction between Christ and religions, the missionary theologians began to interpret Christ as the fulfilment of the deepest yearnings in the religions of Asia. J.N. Farquhar's The Crown of Hinduism (1913) is perhaps the best-known expression of this view. During this period there were bold attempts on the part of Asian theologians to use concepts and doctrines of other faiths for the church's interpretative and apologetic task. The Hindu concept of avatar was used to interpret the Christian doctrine of incarnation,* and that of sat-chit-ananda (being, consciousness, bliss) for explaining the doctrine of the Trinity.* In all these, the superiority of Christian faith was affirmed but with a sympathetic, even if somewhat condescending, view of other faiths.

A new stage was set when Asian theologians like D.T. Niles (1908-70) acknowledged the incognito presence of Christ in Asia's history and religions long before the missionaries came to Asia. A cogent interpretation of this view is provided by P.D. Devanandan (The Gospel and Renascent Hinduism, 1959). Writing on the same theme, M.M. Thomas affirmed a more recognizable presence of Christ in renascent Hinduism, as the title of his influential Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance (1969) suggests.

In other parts of the region writers tried to integrate gospel and culture.* Buddhist experience of nirvana and the reality of the kingdom of God* were brought together by writers in Sri Lanka. Christ assumed a cultural face in China. Chinese Christ was the man who was also the Tao in the writings of Chang I-Ching (b.1871) and Chao Tzu-ch'en (1918-56). For Pandipeddi Chenchiah (1886-1959), an Indian theologian, Christ was the cosmic Christ, whose birth brought a new creative energy into the biosphere. An admirable work of this genre was Kazo Kitamori's Theology of the Pain of God (1946); its main theme of pain (itami) was very familiar to people in Japan, who had suffered much during the war.

Theology at this time emerged from an active interaction between the gospel and the religious philosophies of Asia. Concepts, doctrines and symbols of other religions were used freely and critically by Asian churches to deepen their experiences of Christ and to interpret the Christian faith. With this there was a vigorous search for an Asian face of Christ, dismantling the foreignness of Christianity. Profound was their recognition that the Christ reality was greater than formal Christianity and that the Christ was present but unacknowledged in the religions and cultures of Asia.

A deeper awareness of this position is expressed in attempts at interfaith dialogue which the WCC's dialogue programme has pursued with vigour. A valuable contribution was made by its first director, S.J. Samartha; his attempt, in One Christ, Many Religions (1991), to conceive a revised Christology free of the problems of exclusivism and superiority is perhaps the fruit of a wider search by Christian thinkers in Asia.

The goal of interfaith dialogue should be a renewed community which allows space for different religions and cultural and ethnic identities to flourish. We need to mobilize the humanistic and liberative vision of religions in order to build a just and participatory community. Fundamentalism is the denial of the very essence of religion. At the same time, to ignore the reality of religion in the lives of the poor is to ignore their basic struggle.

A second stream in Asian Christian theology stemmed from the churches' encounter with the socio-political realities of their context. Early beginnings of this emphasis are found in the life and writings of Toyohiko Kagawa (1888-1960) of Japan. He questioned the "spatially extensive evangelism" and attempted to relate the gospel to the social realities of his people, especially to the labour situation in Japan. In reflecting on the experience of colonialism and the freedom movements, many Asian thinkers discovered a vital link between the gospel and the aspirations of their people for a freer and better social and political order. A profound analysis of the Asian revolution from the perspective of the gospel is provided by M.M. Thomas in a number of his writings. According to him, colonization, though ruthless and exploitative, has been the bearer of an ambiguous process of humanization in Asian societies, especially through technology and industry, and liberal ideas of freedom* and justice.* Christ, the promise of a new humanity, he argued, should be confessed as the transforming and judging presence of God.*

The East Asia Christian Conference provided the forum for Asian thinkers to reflect more deeply on the events of the gospel in the social and cultural contexts of Asia. They affirmed that confessing faith in Christ meant constructive participation in revolution and in the building of nations based on justice and freedom. The methodology governing their theology is that of contextualization (see inculturation; theology, contextual). The late Shoki Coe of Taiwan, who contributed significantly to the growth of Asian theology, indicated that this process is a dynamic interaction between the text and the context. Contextual theologians also proposed a critical Asian principle as a method for doing theology in their situation: the principle "seeks to identify what is distinctively Asian and uses this distinctiveness as a critical principle of judgment on matters dealing with the life and mission of the Christian community, theology, and theological education in Asia" (Nacpil). The contextual approach to theology has brought together the religio-cultural and socio-political streams.

In recent years, the theme "people"* has assumed a special significance in the discussions of Asian theology. Korean theologians focused their attention on minjung (see theology, minjung), Indian theologians have responded to the suffering of the dalits, traditionally known as untouchables, who have been oppressed by the caste system, and in many countries there is a new recognition of the rights of indigenous peoples and their search for selfhood. The irruption of people's histories and cultures into Asian consciousness has brought a critique of the elite-oriented theologies and philosophies of religion.

The minjung and other sections of the marginalized (not all of whom are Christians) are the theological actors or subjects of theology in the measure in which they struggle against domination. The place of theology therefore is the human community striving for liberation* and life, in which the Spirit is at work. The theology and spirituality of minjung, dalits and indigenous people expresses itself in their stories – mostly unwritten, articulated in symbols, folk songs, poems, myths, dance and celebration.

The method of doing theology with people's symbols and images holds great promise. Indications are that if this project is pursued, there will emerge a distinct voice in theology that comes out of the deepest yearnings of the people of Asia. Choan-Seng Song of Taiwan has made important contributions in this area, as have Kosuke Koyama and Masao Takenaka.

Even when the end product and the mode of theologizing are new, the presuppositions of this theology may raise a serious challenge to traditional formulations on the scriptures, revelation* and Christology.

The tendency of modern theology is to subsume all the new questions of theology under a framework which can be described as "Christocentric universalism". Too much weight is put on this paradigm. Asian theologians seem to suggest that a Spirit-filled theology that respects the integrity of spiritual vision and values of people in their own tradition and culture has to evolve. The characteristic posture of the Spirit is openness and an ability to transcend limits. The affirmation of solidarity of the poor is the Spirit's creative activity. To discern the Spirit's working, we need "Christic" sensitivity, but it can never be wholly interpreted by Christomonism.

A statement of the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians* poses this challenge in these words: "Could a live historical process and spiritual quest be ruled for ever by fixed texts born of particular limited experiences of one ancient group of people? Is it not the witness of the scriptures that God is present not in books but among the people and in their struggles for justice and dignity?" The same statement concludes: "The task of theology is to recognize the embodiments of the Word in the history of freedom; the passion of Jesus in the struggles of the people; and the resurrection in their growing emancipation and fellowship" (Third World Theologies: Commonalities and Divergences, 1990, 234).

This is people's theology; this is Asian theology.

K.C. ABRAHAM

- P. Aloysius, An Asian Theology of Liberation, New York, Orbis, 1988 ■ M. Amaladoss, Life in Freedom: Liberation Theologies from Asia, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1997 ■ D. Elwood

ed., Asian Christian Theology, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1980 ■ K. Koyama, Mount Fuji and Mount Sinai, London, SCM Press, 1984 ■ E. Nacpil & D. Elwood eds, The Human and the Holy, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1980 ■ S.J. Samartha, One Christ – Many Religions, New York, Orbis, 1990 ■ C.S. Song, Theology from the Womb of Asia, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1986 ■ M. Takenaka, God Is Rice, WCC, 1986.

THEOLOGY, BLACK

BLACK THEOLOGY is the attempt of black people to articulate their faith as Christians out of their experience of material and racial discrimination at the hands of white fellow Christians. Black theology insists on foregrounding the adjective “black” for at least four broad reasons: (1) It highlights the suggestion that Christian theology is seldom a neutral and colour-blind affair, even if this fact is not openly admitted. Many proponents of black theology argue that what often poses as neutral, universal and biblical Christian theology is, in terms of its categories, imagery and consequences, effectively nothing but white theology. (2) Whereas blackness has become the basic imagery of evil and badness, black theology deliberately seeks to embrace rather than flee from this very category and to do so in its own positive terms, thus giving it new life and new meaning. (3) The foregrounding of blackness also implies a challenge to and dissatisfaction with white theology, even though the latter seldom recognizes its own biases. (4) “Black” qualifying theology is not about pigmentation of the skin but is about black experience, out of which the reflection on God’s word emerges. The black experience in practical terms has been synonymous with poverty, ignorance, terror, insult, exploitation by others, relegation to the periphery of humankind. By contrast, “white” is the symbol of lordship, mastery of history and of the gospel, power, being automatic heirs of the chief seats in the great parliament of humanity. The difference between white and black experience is thus of epistemological relevance. Unlike black experience, white experience has been accommodated to, if not co-opted by, the white power structures and ideology with its hallmarks of racism, capitalism, white nationalism (e.g. Afrikaner nationalism) and the ideology of national security.

In so far as these hallmarks of white experience are functional factors of domination, they become a formative factor in the articulation of black consciousness and of black theology. The point to underline is that the elements of the power structure are not only political and social but also theological issues because they relate to the integrity of the gospel, to the credibility of the Christian and church witness in the world and to the confession of Jesus as Christ and Lord. Therefore, four key words of black theology are “idolatry”, “heresy”, “sin” and “blasphemy”, which are used in its analysis of the white power structure. By the same token, there is a truth claim in the black experience which has been described as the epistemological privilege of the poor,* i.e. truth is often suppressed in the context of oppression and may therefore be more accessible to the oppressed.

Black theology is found among blacks of the USA and of Southern Africa, particularly the Republic of South Africa. Its proponents include James H. Cone, Gayraud Wilmore and Cornel West from the USA and Itumeleng J. Mosala, Takatso Mofokeng, Mokgethi Motlhabi, Simon Maimela and Allan Boesak from the Republic of South Africa. The newer generation of black theologians includes Dwight Hopkins and Vincent Winbush in the USA and Tinyiko Maluleke, Daryl Balia and Russel Botman in South Africa.

Black theology suggests an epistemological break with traditional theology. In Western theology it is often assumed that ideas such as revelation, reason, nature and church doctrines are the points of departure. On the contrary, black theology in the tradition of liberation theology chooses for its starting point social relations, particularly the cry of the oppressed. Black theology’s epistemology is from below and is counter-hegemonic, rejecting any assumption that all people, irrespective of experience, can perceive reality in the same way and therefore reflect theologically in the same way. Because social relations have been identified as the starting point of theologizing, social analysis is an important tool of theology. Social analysis is “a mediation between the black experiences and the theological reformulation”, attempting to clarify contrasting experiences. In this regard structural analysis is seen as being fully as important as attitudinal analysis. Structural analysis interprets the black experience with reference to a global structure, which is closely related to European expansion. The black experience is explained in terms of the inter-relation between economy and the symbolic structure of society. Boesak develops this point theologically as follows: "Racism is an ideology of racial domination that incorporates beliefs in the cultural or inherent biological inferiority of a particular ethnos. It uses such beliefs to justify and prescribe unequal treatment of that group. In other words, racism is not merely attitudinal but structural. It is not merely a vague feeling of racial superiority, but a system of domination, furnished with social, political and economic structures of domination" (Black and Reformed, 110-11). In that light repentance must include the structural change of the society so as to overcome the negative black experience, especially racism.*

Some of the emphases in black theology's insisting on perspectives from below have borrowed from the Marxist theory of knowledge even to the point of using Marxist terminology. Unlike Marxism, however, black theology insists on the cultural creativity of the oppressed. Although opponents of black theology criticize it for being simply politics using a vocabulary of religion and theology, it actually addresses a fundamental dysfunction in spiritual life. It promotes speaking responsibly about God in the modern world, social relations based on love and justice, a sense of Christian identity which eschews alienation and upholds true humanness, and making real the gospel of hope, which is threatened by the idols which are death-dealing and oppressive (i.e. political ideologies such as racism, economic theories such as capitalism*).

The emphases of black theology include the following: creation and faith, pointing to the God who created all humanity in his own image and likeness and to the black person's identity in that creation* in the company of fellow believers; and wholeness of life, so that politics, economics and all of human life are seen to be based on relations with God. Because God meets humankind with his gifts, blacks and whites can live in a community in which equality and justice are central values.

The similarity between black theologies from the USA and Southern Africa leads some to suggest that the former influenced the latter or even that the latter derives from the former. Influences may not be denied, but South African black theology is rooted in its own context. Born out of university student politics and racially divided denominational caucuses and seminaries, South African black theology is distinct from its North American counterpart, even as it is influenced by it. In the new century, black theology faces the challenges of the globalization of capital and all its consequences and the ending of the cold war, which provided the context for all liberation theologies, including feminist theology.

See also theology, liberation.

JOHN S. POBEE and TINYIKO MALULEKE

- J.A. Banks & J.D. Grambs, Black Self-Concept, New York, McGraw Hill, 1972
- A. Boesak, Black and Reformed: Apartheid, Liberation and the Calvinist Tradition, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1984
- A. Boesak, Farewell to Innocence, New York, Orbis, 1977
- A. Boesak, The Finger of God, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1982
- J.H. Cone, Black Theology and Black Power, New York, Seabury, 1969
- D. Hopkins, Down, Up and Over: Slave Religion and Black Theology, Minneapolis, Fortress, 2000
- D. Hopkins ed., Black Faith and Public Talk: Critical Essays on James H. Cone's Black Theology and Black Power, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1999
- T.A. Mofokeng, The Crucified among the Crossbearers: Towards Black Christology, Kampen, Kok, 1983
- B. Moore, The Challenge of Black Theology in South Africa, Atlanta, John Knox, 1973
- I.J. Mosala, Biblical Hermeneutics and Black Theology in South Africa, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1989

THEOLOGY BY THE PEOPLE

THE PHRASE "theology by the people" has been associated with the WCC since the Vancouver assembly (1983), which made it a major thrust of the Programme on Theological Education and, to some extent, of the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development. The phrase continues the emphasis of the earlier focus on "ministry by the people of God".

These slogans arise from the re-discovery of the church as the people of God. Based perhaps on Ignatius's often-quoted statement – "Where the bishop is, there is the church" (i.e. the bishop guarantees the harmony of the people of God when they are gathered around him in eucharistic celebration) – an increasing clericalization characterized the church over the centuries. It did not take seriously enough the place of the people – i.e. all who are united to God and one another by faith* and baptism.*

Two recent documents have helped to elevate the idea of the people of God: Lumen Gentium (1964, esp. para. 2), from the Second Vatican Council,* and the WCC's Faith and Order document *Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry** (1982). These documents reflect a new sensitivity to the strand of biblical tradition represented by 1 Pet. 2:9 – that the church is "a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God's own people, in order that you may proclaim the mighty acts of him who called you out of darkness into his marvellous light". All the faithful, not only specialist theologians and the clergy, are called to give an account of the faith and to exercise ministry in God's name on behalf of the world. Thus the equipping of the whole people of God* to exercise ministry has been a particular concern of the ecumenical movement.

There is a continuing debate on who the people are in the phrase "theology by the people". Some have used it in the sense of the whole people of God, i.e. all the baptized, all Christians. Others use "people" to mean the poor, oppressed, marginalized and suffering (see theology, minjung). In Latin America, "people" is used in a still more specialized sense of the ones in whom popular power is constituted and established as the collective will.

Theology has long been the preserve of the specialist. In a scholarly way it articulates the revelation of God and a holistic Christocentric world-view. In the hands of theologians, the revelation of God thus came to be seen as first and foremost a body of doctrines.

The starting point of talk about God, however, should be the gospel, the good news. Theology is not to be erudition for its own sake but a clarifying of the word of God* so that it can be experienced by people as good news. Theology by the people recalls theologians and others to a missiological emphasis. People's hopes and fears must be addressed by theologians, from within a community of faith.

The preposition "by" in this phrase, while not denying that the source of theology is the word of God, suggests that the perceptions, hopes and fears of the ordinary people are also an important factor in the theological task and that the specialist must speak only from the midst of the people, the poor, who seek God's salvation.* We must see that "poor people are the very origin of the theological discussions".

The phrase "theology by the people" carries some assumptions and implications. First, if holy scripture* is the source of revelation, it is also claimed that people's experiences can be a source of revelation. While a relevant and authentic theology may reflect a particular temporal horizon, it must retain the biblical as well as the transcendental dimensions as a framework of reference.

Second, since theology is concerned with good news, it cannot only be an intellectual activity; it must involve a life-style which acts to bring good news to the poor, makes sacrifices on behalf of the poor and the weak, in whom Christ meets people (Matt. 25:31-46). Theological education must foster commitment to the values of the kingdom within its students. The vitality of theology may be judged largely by its relevance to the life and tasks of the people of God.* Theology should seek to motivate the people of God and through them all humanity to be redemptively involved in the world. Those in theological training must thus be involved in the realities of daily life of the people and society in which they live.

Third, people have an ecclesiological significance (see church). The poor are fully part of the Body of Christ and must be respected and given due recognition. Teaching the word of God and encouraging one another become community tasks that always must aim at human transformation. For that very reason dialogue becomes a mark of theology by the people.

Fourth, if the theological task of the church belongs to the whole people of God, then traditional elitist theological education practices are inadequate for the task. Alternate models of theological education are needed, especially theological education by extension.

See also church base communities, poor.

JOHN S. POBEE

■ S. Amirtham & J.S. Pobee eds, Theology by the People, WCC, 1986 ■ E. Cardenal, The Gospel in Solentiname, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1976 ■ F. Castillo, Theologie aus der Praxis des Volkes, Munich, Kaiser, 1978 ■ F.R. Kinsler ed., Ministry by the People, WCC, 1983 ■ Minjung Theology, Singapore, CCA, 1983 ■ Y. Tesfai ed., The Scandal of a Crucified World: Perspectives on the Cross and Suffering, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1994.

THEOLOGY, CONTEXTUAL

MANY PEOPLE have viewed theology as the queen of the sciences, a discipline to be studied with the same methods (philological, historical, psychological, sociological, philosophical, etc.) as any other scientific subject in the humanities. And especially as it has been practised in the North, theology has often been based on a universalism which holds that every human being, from whatever region, class or circumstance, may perceive reality and reflect theologically in the same way.

In recent times there has been some questioning of these assumptions, particularly by theologians from the South, who have challenged the idea of a single, uniform social reality in one place, much less at a universal level. Besides, there is new awareness that theology's formative factors include experience, God's self-exposure (see revelation), scripture,* Tradition,* culture* and reason. Given the diverse facts of experience and culture, there can never be only one theology; any particular theological construct represents the confluence of a number of variables, some of which depend crucially on the life context of those doing the theology. Furthermore, given the Christian task of proclaiming the Christ-event as the good news in a particular context, Christian theology may not start simply from a body of church doctrines, lest it become insensitive to the situation around it, the context from which it speaks. Its point of departure should be the specific social relations, the hopes and fears of people – the particular context into which the gospel must enter. For precisely this reason social analysis is a vital aspect of contextual theology. Liberation theology* of Latin America thus has sometimes used Marxist critique as a tool for social analysis.

The word "context" and its cognates "contextuality" and "contextualization" were thrust into the centre of theological debates by the work of the Theological Education Fund, a service of the WCC's Commission on World Mission and Evangelism. "Context" means the interpenetration of subject and object, signalling the willingness and concern to live with specifics rather than generalities, particulars rather than universals. According to Shoki Coe, "By contextuality we mean the wrestling with God's word in such a way that the power of the incarnation, which is the divine form of contextualization, can enable us to follow his steps to contextualize" (Theological Education, 11, 1974).

Contextual theology, then, represents a declaration for relativities in theology (though not a doctrinaire relativism). Second, it signals that in a Bible study (as in chemistry), the inductive method at best yields probabilities, not necessities. Contextual theology is concerned to bring together faith and life, the Bible and one's respective context and the different ways in which people's context influences their understanding or appreciation of the Bible. Thus contextual theology seeks to direct attention to the task of communicating the gospel in terms of the realities of the cultures with which the church is involved. Collectively, contextual theologies – encompassing cultural theology, ecological theology, feminist theology, liberation theology, narrative theology – are wide-ranging and diverse.

Contextualization has become a slogan of third-world theology, referring to a kind of theology which starts from the problems of the community and attempts to formulate the Christian message accordingly. Contextual theology thus not unexpectedly often reads like a programme, a crusade rather than a gospel.

JOHN S. POBEE

■ R.O. Costa ed., One Faith, Many Cultures: Inculturation, Indigenization and Contextualization, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1988 ■ V. Donovan, Christianity Rediscovered, London, SCM Press, 1982 ■ Learning in Context: The Search for Innovative Patterns in Theological Education, London, New Life, 1973 ■ R. Schreiter, Constructing Local Theologies, London, SCM Press, 1985 ■ R. Schreiter, The New Catholicity: Theology between the Global and the Local, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1997 ■ A. Shorter, Toward a Theology of Inculturation, London, Chapman, 1988.

THEOLOGY, ECUMENICAL

THEOLOGY begins when a believer becomes conscious of his or her faith* and finds it necessary to reflect upon it mainly for reasons of communication. Theology is therefore a necessity for the transmission of the faith, for the sharing of the experience of belief, for the edification of the community of believers.

Within the Christian community, theology has always been present in the preaching of the good news, in the confession of faith and in liturgical prayer. From the very start, one of the main concerns in the Christian community has been maintaining the unity* of the church,* expressed in the confession of the one faith. This unity has always been endangered by the difficult theological problem of announcing the good news of Jesus Christ* in the context of ever-new contemporary challenges. Theology is therefore not only the private reflection of believers upon their individual faith but the concern of the church as a community constantly striving to express its faith in a manner which preserves the shared experience of God by the witnesses of all times from the apostles onward and which guards against deviations affecting the truth of God and the salvation* offered by God.* This expressing and preserving is what councils (see ecumenical councils) sought to achieve. They have thus contributed to the development of an ecclesial theology, a theology belonging to the church.

In their effort to maintain the purity of the apostolic faith (i.e. in doing church theology), Christians have been conscious of acting, thinking, debating and preaching in the light of Christ's words about the "Spirit of truth" who "will guide you into all the truth" (John 16:13; see Holy Spirit). Church history is nevertheless full of examples of failure to achieve unanimity in the one Spirit who testifies to Jesus Christ (John 15:26); as confessions and confessionism developed, theology tended to become defensive and often divisive (see schism).

This divisive character of theology springs from different roots. The most obvious cause is the difficulty which constantly arises among Christians about the interpretation of revelation* as witnessed to by the scriptures and the apostles.

There are also dangers inherent in "private" theology, i.e. an individualistic reflection pursued in isolation from the community of the church. This practice often begets a tendency to single out one aspect of the revealed mystery and to systematize the whole in the light of this over-emphasized aspect. This form of divisiveness is due to the human temptation to substitute one's own private spirit for the Holy Spirit.

Another form of divisive theology springs from the temptation to use theology and the church of God for non-theological ends, such as political domination or imperialism, which arises from the human tendency to self-assertiveness, misuse of power and authoritarianism. This approach tends to substitute the spirit of this world for the Holy Spirit.

Theology also tends to become divisive when it consists in a pious conservatism which misinterprets tradition* to mean a rigid adherence to past formulas, with a total failure to be attentive to history* as a dynamic process. This attitude leads to a blindness to the signs of the times and encourages defensive, if not aggressive, theology. The church in this perspective is seen as free from any responsibility for the world.

The reaction to such theology, however, can be just as divisive in its own tendency to identify theology with the immediate, narrow historical context. This reaction may lead to a Christology which loses sight of the full implications of the incarnation* and the announcement of the coming of the kingdom.* Christ's message becomes purely human or rather humanistic in the negative limiting sense. The transformation of humanity through its assumption by the second person of the Trinity* tends to disappear, and theology becomes yet one more political ideology.*

In so far as the ecumenical movement is a reaction against a passive, complacent or even self-righteous acceptance of divisions among Christians, its ultimate goal is the reunion of all in one eucharistic community – the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church. And because the ecumenical movement necessarily involves theology, it is an invitation to react against all forms of divisive theology and to recover a theology of unity, a theology of the church.

In this context, unity certainly does not mean uniformity. Conciliar unanimity, the unity in the one Spirit, should not be confused with generally imposed conformity. When Paul says that “all of you are one in Christ Jesus”, after stating that “there is no longer Jew or Greek, there is no longer slave or free, there is no longer male and female” (Gal. 3:28), he does not mean that Christians are an indistinct, neutral, sexless company of beings united in a kind of middle-of-the-road compromise, but that the categories enumerated do not represent a limiting characterization of each; they are the expression of a unity in diversity.

Does this mean that ecumenical theology consists simply in placing side by side diverse, sometimes contradictory, if not conflicting, expressions of faith in Jesus Christ and declaring that their coexistence is legitimate? Such a form of pluralism* would not be conducive to the unity in the one Spirit, any more than would authoritarian uniformity. Theology, as a necessary means of communication, especially with a view to re-establishing broken unity, necessarily implies finding out the meaning that each gives to the same words.

After a period of confrontation, of comparing notes, of discovery of each other, Christians in the ecumenical movement have begun to work in a form which tends towards an ecumenical type of theology: in statements such as those produced by bilateral dialogues* (both at an official level and among such less formal parties as the Dombes Group*) or by multilateral work such as the Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* text or the explication of the Nicene Creed* now published in book form by the WCC's Faith and Order commission as Confessing the One Faith (1991).

These statements or texts are attempts to say together what can be said to express agreement or convergence in particular on divisive questions. And in some areas, the progress made in the last 50 years is extraordinary. However, the spirit of suspicion is not dead within the divided Christian communities; behind each word, suspicious readers tend to see the old “heresies”* of the other party or parties. Yet it is not impossible to overcome these historical stumbling blocks and arrive at statements which represent doctrinal agreement and even consensus.*

The difficulties of ecumenical theology lie elsewhere. First of all, it implies taking very seriously the words of the WCC basis* about confessing “Jesus Christ as God and Saviour” and about the churches' vocation to glorify the Trinity.* Taking these words seriously means that the sole criterion for ecumenical theology is God himself, Jesus Christ, image of the Father, bearer of the Spirit who reveals Christ and cries “Abba, Father” in the hearts of all the baptized.

Ecumenical theology implies total humility and intellectual honesty; it implies being prepared to be guided into all truth by the Spirit of truth (see John 16:13). This stance is a permanent crucifixion for the intellect. All philosophical categories are to be used critically, with constant awareness that none can comprehend or circumscribe the fullness of the mystery of Christ. Ecumenical theology implies readiness to be guided into recognizing the presence of the Truth, i.e. Christ himself, in forms of expression which may be unfamiliar or even alien at first sight. This is the purpose of Faith and Order's study on hermeneutics.*

Perhaps the greatest difficulty for ecumenical theology is the fact that, although it may be relatively easy to agree about doctrinal problems in the light of a common acceptance of Jesus Christ as the sole criterion of truth, it is much harder to reach a common mind about the reading of the historical context in which theology and the gospel message, the good news of the kingdom, is to be expressed. Jesus Christ is “the same yesterday and today and forever” (Heb. 13:8), whereas the ethnic, cultural, political and regional conditions are so complex, conflictual and divisive as to represent an almost insuperable obstacle to an intellectually unified view. The permanent temptation is therefore either to be content with the formulations of the past and disregard the concrete conditions of today or to consider only these latter and disregard or reject the past, the formulations of our predecessors.

Ecumenical theology can be neither blind to the variety of contexts of the present world nor deaf to the witnesses of all times to the apostolic faith. It must be a theology of the church, the one church whose unity is as absolute as its diversity, in the image of the Holy Trinity; it must be worked out within the communion of saints* and is therefore no mere intellectual exercise. It implies a permanent intensification of the relation of each one engaged in this process with the one Lord Jesus Christ in the Holy Spirit for the glory of the Father. In other words, it is prayerful and doxological, as well as intellectual. It is a permanent re-discovery of the church as the heart of the world, of creation.* It is a renewed awareness of the church's responsibility for all, in that it exists "for the life of the world" (liturgies of St John Chrysostom and St Basil). For this reason the unity of the church is closely linked with the unity of humankind and no human problem can be disregarded by ecumenical theology.

See also theology in the ecumenical movement.

NICHOLAS LOSSKY

- W.R. Barr ed., Constructive Christian Theology in the Worldwide Church, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1997 ■ Y. Congar, Diversités et communion (ET Diversity and Communion, London, SCM Press, 1984) ■ D. Cunningham et al. eds, Ecumenical Theology in Worship, Doctrine and Life: Essays Presented to Geoffrey Wainwright on His Sixtieth Birthday, New York, Oxford UP, 1999 ■ G.R. Evans, Method in Ecumenical Theology: The Lessons So Far, Cambridge, Cambridge UP, 1996 ■ W.M. Horton, Christian Theology: An Ecumenical Approach, New York, Harper, 1955 ■ J.M. Lochman, Das Glaubensbekenntnis (ET The Faith We Confess: An Ecumenical Approach, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1984) ■ E. Schlink, Ökumenische Dogmatik, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1983 ■ G. Wainwright, Doxology, London, Epworth, 1980.

THEOLOGY, EUROPEAN

THEOLOGY in the years between the two great European wars was largely dominated by concerns arising out of the German intellectual tradition. The war had hastened the decline of liberal Protestantism, with its confidence in the reconcilability of Christ and culture;* and the rise of National Socialism in Germany prompted a strong reaction against any notion of a revelation apart from the word of God* uttered in Jesus and witnessed to in scripture.* This approach, associated above all with the name of Karl Barth, had great influence in all the European Protestant churches, though it certainly did not go without criticism (and had relatively little impact at first in the Anglo-Saxon world). Barth's own involvement in the ecumenical movement also meant that his insights and arguments were influential outside the Reformed tradition: the important Russian emigré theologian Georges Florovsky was able to integrate some of Barth's ideas into the framework of Orthodox thinking, combining Barth's insistence on revelation* with a rather fuller sacramental theology.

Within the ecumenical movement itself, considerable tensions developed during the 1930s between those like Barth and Bonhoeffer who insisted on extremely rigorous standards of theological integrity, appropriate to the apocalyptic dimensions of the German struggle, and English and North American voices, more inclined to pragmatism and the maintenance of dialogue. The dominance of Barthian language and ideas in ecumenical circles is probably most marked in the era immediately after the 1939-45 war, in a period when the rhetoric of divine judgment and human impotence answered a deep need for a theology of corporate repentance.

Barth had derided theologians who admitted a concern with philosophy or with theories of history and culture. Related to, but distinct from, the Barthian influence was the radical New Testament exegesis of Rudolf Bultmann during this period, sharing Barth's scepticism about natural theology and rejecting any attempt to ground Christian faith in history, by using the philosophy of Martin Heidegger as a tool for re-interpreting the Lutheran commitment to justification* by faith alone.

In the post-war years, theologians in Germany began increasingly to challenge the dominance of Barth's anti-philosophical and Bultmann's anti-historical prescriptions, and the face of European theology changed substantially as various writers made attempts to re-claim history and culture. The group associated with the young Wolfhart Pannenberg at Munich in the early 1960s developed a theology in which history, including intelligible history, was itself revelation:* the events of scriptural history were not to be seen as different in kind from other historical happenings, and the rationality of faith required a foundation in such authentic occurrences. Pannenberg went on to produce a very influential essay in Christology (Jesus: God and Man, 1964), and a programmatic study of the foundations of the philosophy of science in relation to Christian theology; and more recently he has written extensively on ethics and on the doctrine of human nature (Anthropology in Theological Perspective, 1983). He has not substantially deviated from his early commitment to a theology which can justify itself in the realm of "public" intellectual discourse, by criteria that are not special to theology alone.

A different path has been followed by Jürgen Moltmann. Closer to Barth, and more particularly to Bonhoeffer, he produced, again in the 1960s, an important book entitled Theology of Hope, conceived as a kind of dialogue with the Marxist philosophy of Ernst Bloch. Christian faith is presented as a living under the judgment of God's future: that judgment is made concrete in our history by the raising of the crucified Jesus from the dead, the sign and promise that God does not let go of the humanly lost, the oppressed and murdered, the despairing, the "godless". This theme is taken up in Moltmann's perhaps most influential book, The Crucified God (1972), where this account of Christian belief and identity is developed in close engagement with the unhealed and unhealable memory of the holocaust. Later works have discussed the theology of the church (The Church in the Power of the Spirit, 1975) and have presented a novel and provocative version of Trinitarian theology, underlining the idea that God's very being is lived out in suffering and the transformation of suffering (Trinity and the Kingdom of God, 1980). Most recently, major studies towards a theology of the material environment have appeared (God in Creation, 1985).

Moltmann has maintained an important dialogue with political trends in Europe and, increasingly, in the third world as well. Although his passionate commitment to the centrality of Jesus in the process of making sense of the human and material world still echoes Barth, his wide-ranging and often speculative engagement with politics and philosophy sets him very definitely apart. He has been – as has Pannenberg – an influential presence in the ecumenical scene; both theologians have manifestly developed in unexpected and fresh directions through their participation in the work of the WCC from time to time, and it is no longer as true as it once was that so-called mainstream European theology is totally indifferent to movements in the rest of the Christian world.

Moltmann represents one flowering of the movement among several of Barth's pupils and followers towards a politically literate and critical theology. Helmut Gollwitzer, one of Barth's most loyal disciples, has been a prophetic voice on many issues in Germany over the last few decades: he and an older associate of Barth's, Ernst Wolf, were prominent in demanding a theological critique of German re-armament in the 1950s and in arguing that the possession of nuclear arms was a matter on which the church should make a "confessional" stand, as it had in opposition to the Third Reich. Gollwitzer has continued to write on the responsibilities of Europe to the poorer nations and on questions of war and peace and has directed several significant pieces of doctoral research into the borderlands of theology and politics.

Other figures in Germany have developed Barth's legacy in rather different ways. Less overtly political have been Eberhard Jüngel's monumental efforts in re-examining the meaning of the word "God"* against the background of the history of European atheism* (God as Mystery of the World, 1965): he shares with Moltmann the conviction that only the theology of the cross can meet atheist charges against an indifferent ruler of the cosmos and is equally prepared to speak of suffering in God, even of death "in God"; but he is less interested in ecclesiology than is Moltmann and has not developed the theology of God's identification with the suffering into a programme of Christian solidarity with the oppressed to the same extent as Moltmann.

Roman Catholic theology in the 20th century in Europe offers a story of enormous upheavals and divergences. In the 1920s and 1930s, there were the beginnings of a new look at the theology of grace,* searching for a more personal and less mechanical understanding. These explorations, however, were conducted more in the sphere of philosophy than in that of theology. The French Jesuit Joseph Maréchal is probably the most important figure here, and his work was to bear fruit by way of its considerable influence on the great Karl Rahner, whose mature writing in the post-war period was one of the major formative elements in the thinking of the Second Vatican Council. Rahner's thought pivots around the conviction that the structure of human being as knowing and loving is intrinsically oriented to the divine, so that God is to be encountered wherever humanity is becoming authentically human. Christ is less the great interruption of the order of the human world than the fulfilment of the human subject's potential for union with God. The possibilities opened up in Rahner's work for dialogue with other faiths and ideologies have been eagerly taken up by a good many Catholic theologians working in non-Christian contexts.

Rahner was also much influenced by the "new theology", or théologie nouvelle,* which developed in France in the post-war years. This represented a re-discovery of early Christian thought, especially the Greek fathers, as a source of theological wisdom more fertile for the 20th century than the rigid categories of medieval scholasticism. Typical of this school (whose leading names were Jean Danilou, Henri de Lubac and Yves Congar) was a profound concern with the church* as an organic, living community, rather than an institution with members and hierarchy standing in a quasi-legal relation. The théologie nouvelle greatly influenced many writers in the Anglican tradition and opened new possibilities for conversation with Eastern Orthodox Christians; the entry of the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) into fuller involvement with international ecumenism, especially through the many bilateral dialogues now in process, owes an incalculable debt to this theological movement.

The two decades following Vatican II saw an increasing variety in Roman Catholic theology in Europe (let alone other continents). Hans Urs von Balthasar produced several multi-volume works setting out an integral vision of theology as the contemplation of the paradoxical beauty of the work of God in Christ crucified; his concerns form a counterweight to those of Rahner, emphasizing the priority of revelation and repentance, as well as the central significance of the aesthetic dimension in religious understanding. Edward Schillebeeckx, after writing important studies on the philosophical foundations of faith, much marked by the critical social philosophy of the Frankfurt school, and immensely influential studies in the theology of the eucharist,* has more recently published substantial books on Christology and some radical essays in the theology of Christian ministry, which have already had great impact outside the RCC itself (where they have been received with some hostility). Hans Küng, author of one of the earliest Catholic studies of Barth, has become well known as a critic of the present practice of papal authority and as a prolific writer on Christian themes for a general educated public. His views on ordained ministry are close to those of Schillebeeckx and have had similar reception inside and outside the Roman Catholic Church.

A fuller account of European theology would need to include more detail on the evolution of Eastern European thought, both Protestant and Orthodox. The experience of churches in a nominally socialist and often anti-religious atmosphere has generated some very different theological priorities and, in particular, the theology of the church as servant, popular in Romania in the 1970s, had an impact on the wider thought and language of the ecumenical movement. In recent years, some of the impetus towards a deeper engagement with the theological issues raised by the nuclear question has come from Eastern European churches, especially in Hungary and the former East Germany. Peace* has become a major concern for many European theologians, and there now exist several international networks to further this discussion. The WCC's 1981 public hearing "Before It's Too Late: The Challenge of Nuclear Disarmament" included some pertinent material (for example, an article by Schillebeeckx on theology and disarmament). A broader discussion has opened out of this in the WCC project on Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation,* picking up the themes which Moltmann and others had begun to treat connected with our theological perception of our belonging in the world, as both creatures and co-creatures. As European politics comes to be more and more attuned to "green" issues, there will be increasing need for this area to be explored by theologians.

A final area of development which must be noted is a growing theological sensitivity in Europe to the complex questions arising from the growth of multicultural social patterns. These questions range from considerations of the theology of work (in connection with the issues of migrant labour) to the urgent issue of racism and the need for a more consistent and far-reaching theological critique, to the problems associated with interfaith dialogue.* It is a time of rapid movement and diversification in European theology; there seems little chance in the foreseeable future of any one systematic perspective emerging as dominant or claiming the kind of authority that was once attached to single names or schools.

See also theology in the ecumenical movement.

ROWAN D. WILLIAMS

■ D. Ford ed., The Modern Theologians, Oxford, Blackwell, 1989 ■ A. Heron, A Century of Protestant Theology, London, Lutterworth, 1980 ■ J.-Y. Lacoste ed., Dictionnaire critique de théologie, Paris, PUF, 1998 ■ R. McBrien, Catholicism, London, Chapman, 1984 ■ A. McGrath, The Making of Modern German Christology, Oxford, Blackwell, 1986 ■ J. Moltmann, N. Wolterstorff, E.T. Charry eds, A Passion for God's Reign: Theology, Christian Learning, and the Christian Self, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1998 ■ K. Rahner, "Aspekte europäischer Theologie", in his Schriften zur Theologie, vol. 15, Zurich, Benziger, 1983.

THEOLOGY, FEMINIST

THE TERM "feminist theology" refers to a way of doing theology which takes seriously the criticism and conclusions of contemporary feminism.* It entails the self-conscious adoption of a critical feminist hermeneutic which is then applied to all the individual disciplines which together compose "theology". Under the heading of feminist theology is to be found work on scripture, church history, doctrine, philosophy of religion and ethics. It is a theological method, then, rather than a branch of theology or area of study. Nor does the term refer simply to theology "done by women", as some women theologians would not consider themselves feminists, nor would they adopt this methodology. Furthermore, if men can be feminists, then men can do feminist theology, in so far as it involves a critique of the patriarchal underpinning of church and theology. The overwhelming majority of feminist theologians, not surprisingly, are women.

While the term "feminist theology" is a modern one, it is by no means a new phenomenon, for women have consistently challenged patriarchal presuppositions about their role and status within the church. In more recent times the work of the 19th-century American feminists Elizabeth Cady Stanton (The Women's Bible) and Matilda Joslyn Gage (Woman, Church and State) can be seen as a precursor to the kind of material being produced by contemporary feminist theologians. The modern movement originated in the US during the 1960s, when scholars such as Mary Daly, Rosemary Radford Ruether and Judith Plaskow found an eager and receptive audience for their work. The development from these beginnings into an ecumenical and worldwide network of systematic scholarship has been rapid, which is no doubt because feminist theology has been experienced by so many Christian women and men to be a liberating force in their lives, enabling them to make sense of their previously un-named sense of unease experienced within their church community.

The ecclesiological dimension of this work has clear implications for the modern ecumenical movement. Not only has received historical tradition about patterns of ministry and leadership been challenged by feminist scholars (and has obvious relevance to the debate within some churches regarding the ordination of women*), but there is also a creative re-visioning of what it is to be church.* While the work of some feminist theologians clearly reflects the concerns of the particular church community to which they belong, the overall tenor of this scholarship is ecumenical. The tendency has been to extend and create networks of shared experience, knowledge and community. This process has involved creative dialogue between women from different socio-political contexts; in the USA between white women and Afro-American women (who are developing what they term “womanist theology”); between Asian and African women and Western women, as well as dialogue between Christian women and women from other religious traditions, as is being encouraged by the WCC’s dialogue programme. Groups such as the women’s commission of the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians* clearly embody the guiding principle of modern ecumenism that “partners in dialogue should be free to define themselves”.

A central concern of feminist theology is the question of the use of language, which involves the twin issues of inclusive language* and, perhaps more critically, the language chosen to present images of God. The recovery of female images of the divine from scripture and tradition has been a first stage. The second is to ask the question why male images and language have been deemed more appropriate. Whereas traditionally Western theology has used philosophy, and liberation theology has used sociology, it may be that feminist theology (in asking psychological questions about human self-understanding) will use psychology as one of its major conceptual tools. Do women and men experience, and make sense of, the world in different ways? If so, do they experience God differently too? Has Christian theology been the record of only male “faith seeking understanding”? What would a doctrine of God based on women’s experience be like? How far would this doctrine conform to what is generally perceived to be traditional Christian theology? And so on. Dealing with such questions leads contemporary feminist theology to be one of the most dynamic and creative fields of scholarship within theology today.

See also women in church and society.

DIANE M. BREWSTER

- C.P. Christ & J. Plaskow eds, Womanspirit Rising: A Feminist Reader in Religion, San Francisco, Harper & Row, 1979
- V. Fabella & M.A. Oduyoye eds, With Passion and Compassion: Third World Women Doing Theology. Reflections from the Women’s Commission of Third World Theologians, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1988
- L. Isherwood and D. McEwan eds, An A to Z of Feminist Theology, Sheffield, Sheffield Academic Press, 1996
- R. Ruether & E. McLaughlin eds, Women of Spirit: Female Leadership in the Jewish and Christian Traditions, New York, Simon & Schuster, 1979
- L.M. Russell & J.S. Clarkson, Dictionary of Feminist Theologies, Louisville, Westminster/John Knox, 1996
- D.F. Sawyer and D. Collier eds, Is There a Future for Feminist Theology?, Sheffield, Sheffield Academic Press, 1999
- E. Schüssler Fiorenza & M. Collins eds, Women: Invisible in Church and Theology (= Concilium, 182), 1985
- U. King, Feminist Theology from the Third World, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1994.

THEOLOGY IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

THEOLOGICAL currents have been quite clearly shaping the ecumenical movement from its beginnings, and the emergence of the movement has been influencing developments in theology. Attempts to clarify the understanding of theology and its specific function in the movement are meagre. With diverse theological traditions and various methods of doing theology, one cannot easily reduce “theology” to a single definition, even a very general one. For the purposes of this article, however, I define “theology” as that human activity by which the Christian community accounts for its faith.*

To unfold this general formula, note that (1) theology is human reflection and must be distinguished from divine revelation;* (2) it takes place in the midst of, and is supported by, a Christian community of faith (see church), to which the theologian remains accountable; (3) it can develop into a specialized, academic discipline, but this form should not be considered the norm; (4) it is related to doctrine (dogma*) but is not bound by it: as a living account, it responds to questions from within and from outside the community; and (5) theology is meaningful only on the basis of a commitment of faith, which is not itself the result of theological argument.

These mainly descriptive, clarifying terms point to a number of critical issues or relationships: the relationship of theology and doctrine/dogma, or the issue of the magisterium (i.e. teaching authority*); the relationship between theology and philosophy/secular sciences, or the issue of methodology; and the relationship between theology and church, or the issue of the freedom and the autonomy of theology.

The ambiguities which have developed around the Christian usage of the term "theology" can be traced to its origins in classical Greece. The Greek compound word theo-logia (lit. God-talk) has carried a double meaning since its emergence in the 5th century before Christ. It refers to (1) the act of religious and cultic proclamation through which the myths about divine reality are being passed on, and (2) the critical, rational reflection about religious talk, subjecting its truth claims to certain basic rules.

The Christian reception* of the term "theology" began to spread from the 3rd and 4th centuries onwards (Origen, Eusebius of Caesarea). It is an expression of the Christian victory over pagan religion and is much less the result of the Hellenization of Christianity. Thus, "theology" is used primarily to refer to proclamation, confession or doxology with regard to God* (God-talk in the literal sense), which is distinguished from oikonomia, i.e. knowledge and teaching about the events of salvation.

The Eastern Orthodox understanding of theology remained close to this patristic tradition. In their view theology is experiential rather than intellectual; it is mystical rather than rational; it is "apophatic", i.e. it respects the inaccessibility of God to human knowledge and therefore speaks of God in negative terms. The appropriate setting for theology in this tradition has remained the monastic community.

The specifically Western, Roman understanding of theology emerged together with the development of the European university and the reception of Aristotelian philosophy (through Thomas Aquinas). Theology now became the methodical exposition of revealed truth through rational argument. Scholastic theology appropriated philosophical categories to unfold the sacred doctrine of the faith. In this tradition, theology and the magisterium have remained closely linked.

The Reformation strove to liberate theology from the rigid, scholastic framework by recovering its existential character and by re-establishing its biblical framework. The specific profile of Protestant theology emerged only in the encounter with the Enlightenment and the rise of secular science and philosophy. Its characteristic features are the distinction between theology and religious praxis (spirituality), the distinction between historical and dogmatic theology, and the strong sense of autonomy vis-a-vis the institutional church. The academic community has become the general context for theological work.

THEOLOGICAL INFLUENCES UPON THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

The theological profile of the ecumenical movement has undergone several significant changes. The period before the first world war was shaped by the theology of the evangelical revival, a dominating, non-intellectual lay theology. The WCC basis,* confessing "the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour", comes out of this tradition and the concern to preserve and affirm the essential evangelical truths over against the spread of religious indifferentism. At the same time, the programme for the Edinburgh world missionary conference (1910) deliberately excluded questions of doctrine or theological issues which could become divisive. This non-denominational attitude is rooted in the affirmation of the Bible as the principal source and norm of Christian faith.

The second phase covered the period up to the years of crisis, 1929-32. It presents a very different profile. Ecumenically, this phase is marked by the emergence of the main branches of the ecumenical movement: the International Missionary Council* (IMC), the World Alliance for Friendship through the Churches,* and the two movements Faith and Order,* Life and Work.* Theologically, this period is shaped by a broad current of liberal theology with a strong sense of social responsibility (the so-called social gospel), on the one hand, and, on the other, by a more conservative, confessional theology of Lutheran or Anglo-Catholic persuasion. Strong tensions erupted between different theological orientations at the conferences of Life and Work at Stockholm (1925) and of the International Missionary Council at Jerusalem (1928). Within this diversity, the influence of liberal Protestantism remained dominant.

The third phase lasted up to the end of the second world war. It bears the mark of the increasing influence of dialectical theology (Karl Barth, Emil Brunner, Paul Tillich and others), known in the USA also as neo-orthodox theology (Reinhold Niebuhr). The main features which influenced the development of the ecumenical movement were the radical criticism of the liberal convictions of the preceding period and the struggle for the independence of theology from cultural patterns by affirming its dependence only on divine revelation through holy scripture.

Joined to this critical theological mood were a renewal of the tradition of Reformation theology, a fresh encounter with Orthodox and particularly with patristic theology through Russian theologians-in-exile (Nicolas Berdyaev, Sergius Bulgakov, Paul Evdokimov and Georges Florovsky) and, in all of this, a re-discovery of the integrity of the church in confrontation with secular ideologies.

Never before had a similar effort to draw academic theologians into ecumenical work been made as that undertaken by J.H. Oldham for the Oxford Life and Work conference in 1937. This conference and those of F&O (1937) and of the IMC (1938) came closest to developing a "recognized theology" of the ecumenical movement.

This close identification of the ecumenical movement with the prevailing theological orientation in theology faculties and seminaries continued through the fourth phase, until the early 1960s. Building on earlier foundations, the profound crisis of the world war was overcome by a re-discovery of the Bible and its relevance in opening up a new understanding of God's purposes in history* ("salvation history"*). Biblical theology became the common framework of orientation, affirming the unity of the Bible as the faithful and uncorrupted witness of God's history of salvation.* Jesus Christ* as the centre of the history of salvation also became the central point of reference for the interpretation of the entire Bible. This Christocentrism was accepted as the undisputed principle of theological orientation in the ecumenical movement, as can be seen in the various intensive theological studies carried out within the WCC during these years.

The years immediately after the war also saw a new departure in Roman Catholic theology, which in fact prepared the ground for the later openings towards the ecumenical movement through Vatican II.* The so-called théologie nouvelle (1945-50), with its centre in France (Yves Congar, Henri de Lubac and others), broke through the limitations of scholasticism and appropriated the re-discovery of patristic theology and of the church (see "theology, new"). The théologie nouvelle built on the earlier RC movements for liturgical and for biblical renewal, as well as on the lay movement (Action catholique, since 1923). The encyclical Humani Generis (1950) put a provisional stop to this advance, but during these years contacts between theologians were established in France, the Netherlands and Germany, and their efforts bore fruit at Vatican II. This council marks the high point of theological influence on the church and the ecumenical movement.

The fifth phase began in the early 1960s. The close relationship between theology, Bible and church began to break up. The "systematic theologies" of Barth, Tillich, Niebuhr and others, which had formed the minds of a whole generation of ecumenical leaders, were slowly losing their dominating influence. Just as the Montreal F&O conference (1963) marked the crisis of "biblical theology", so the 1966 Geneva conference on Church and Society marked the re-discovery of the prophetic tradition of theology by discerning the signs of God's "revolutionary" action in history.

The search for a relevant, living theology (e.g. black, political, liberation) increasingly began to influence the ecumenical agenda. The advocates of an inductive, dialogic way of "doing theology" were challenging classical deductive approaches. Since the early 1970s "contextualization" has become the focus of this new theological orientation in the ecumenical movement (see theology, contextual). Contextualization accepts, but goes beyond, the claim that relevant theology must be rooted in a given historical and cultural setting. "Authentic contextualization always is prophetic" (Shoki Coe). Growing out of a genuine encounter between gospel and culture,* it aims to challenge and transform the given historical situation, guided by the vision of the reign of God. Around these convictions the Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians,* formed in 1976, has begun to influence the ecumenical movement.

While the inculturation* of theology has been promoted mainly by academic theologians, contextualization challenges theology to re-insert itself into the life of the Christian community. Thus, the quest for new ways of doing theology leads to the new discussion about practical ecclesiology – that is, the appropriate community base from which a relevant and living theology can grow and to which it remains accountable. The formula "theology by the people" expresses this new theological consciousness.

While these developments have opened fresh perspectives for theology, the growing diversity which goes along with contextualization has become a challenge, if not a threat, to the inner coherence and unity of the ecumenical movement. While the movement certainly needs the challenge of a critical and prophetic theology which presses for radical renewal and a re-assessment of inherited tradition, it also needs the assurance of a theological coherence which provides for a sense of continuity. Therefore, the call by the 1983 WCC Vancouver assembly for a "vital and coherent theology" remains timely and appropriate.

ECUMENICAL INFLUENCES ON THEOLOGY

Almost a century of the growing ecumenical movement has left its mark on theology – on its self-understanding and its praxis. Four significant themes show the influence of this movement upon theology.

First, all theology must be rooted in the biblical witness. This is not a new criterion for doing theology but has been recognized since the time of patristic theology. For a long time in the Western traditions, however, theology had accepted the constraints of philosophical logic. The ecumenical movement has helped to liberate theology from this captivity. The lively debates about biblical authority, the relationship between scripture* and Tradition, as well as between context and tradition – in short, the whole hermeneutical debate from 1950 to 1980 – makes sense only as long as one accepts the criterion formulated above. Thus, the most notable ecumenical advance in theology has been the broad cooperation between theologians from different traditions in the area of biblical translation and interpretation (e.g. the French Traduction oecuménique de la Bible and the various series of biblical commentaries which are written and published ecumenically).

As the Bible is being liberated from dogmatic captivity, it is being read with new eyes and is beginning to challenge theology. Traditional theology does have a sharpened historical consciousness that the meaning of the Bible is only in the reading, and the reading itself is conditioned by the experience of a given, present reality. But traditional theology has difficulties in responding to the challenges that are emerging from the new readings of the Bible which are taking shape among Christian communities in Asia, Africa and Latin America. What these communities expect from theology is not primarily translation, analysis and interpretation of a biblical text but rather mediation between the biblical story and the life story of peoples today. Reading, in the sense of entering into dialogue with the Bible, is in itself an encounter of life with life. Theological reflection about different readings of the Bible thus becomes a paradigm for the ecumenical dialogue of cultures.

Second, all theology is being shaped by, and is accountable to, the life of the Christian community. There is no entirely autonomous theology. The validity of theology, in the end, depends on its spiritual reception* in the community of faith. A fruit of the ecumenical movement and the inspiration it has provided for the re-discovery of the church is that the inseparable linkage between theology and the church is widely acknowledged. The dynamics of this relationship, however, give rise to passionate discussions within and between the different churches and traditions. The positions range from the classical RC stance, which subjects theology to the magisterium of the church, entrusted to the bishops, together with and under the pope, to the radical Protestant affirmation of the critical task of theology vis-a-vis the church, which presupposes that theology should be free from hierarchical control. There are many positions in between these two extremes; however, each position carries with it an implicit ecclesiology which one should openly acknowledge.

To affirm the linkage between theology and the life of the Christian community is to call in question the current separation of academic theology from spiritual praxis. In fact, one of the crucial ecumenical discoveries is that the first act of theology is doxological.

Third, all theology is contextual; there is no universal theology. This is perhaps the most far-reaching change in the perception of theology which the ecumenical movement has brought about. Over against a tradition of theology which has accepted a metaphysical, timeless framework of universally valid propositions, the ecumenical movement is requiring theology to face up to the radical historicity of human existence. Theology, as a human activity, is subjected to the limitations of space and time. The ecumenical movement makes us recognize that we live in the same space, on the same earth, but not in the same time. A universal theology presupposes simultaneity, which only oppression and domination could achieve.

The affirmation that there is no universal theology seems to undermine one of the very purposes of the ecumenical movement, i.e. to bring about the unity of the church by way of agreements on the essential truths of the Christian faith. To the extent that the intensive theological dialogues between the churches lead to growing agreement, even beyond the essential truth, it becomes apparent that quite a number of the original reasons for separation were non-theological, i.e. contextual. The same is true for those factors which prevent the churches from entering into full communion with one another.

Contextual theology is "local" theology. It is in danger at any time of falling into theological provincialism, of becoming self-sufficient. Confessionalism in theology is the result of an earlier process of contextualization which has turned rigid. The contextual character of theology calls for mutual accountability in dialogue, the proper mode of doing theology in the ecumenical movement, over against the apologetic defensiveness of traditional theology.

Finally, theology belongs to the whole people of God.* With this affirmation the survey has come full cycle. The ecumenical movement began in a setting which was characterized by an evangelical, non-academic understanding of theology; it was far removed both from the cathedral and from the faculty. Some generations later, theology had gained a prominent place in the ecumenical movement, as the theological experts and specialists were put in the centre of the ecumenical discussion. At the same time, the ecumenical movement began to re-discover and affirm the role of laypeople. Meanwhile, there is growing recognition that theology not only arises from the people but belongs to them – not a theology for the people, but a "theology by the people".* There may be agreement that theology is the continuous effort to account for the faith in response to questions and challenges, but the decisive issues then become: Where do the challenges come from? What are valid questions which merit a theological response?

For a long time the questions and challenges which theology took up arose from within the intellectual, academic community. The ecumenical movement has helped in broadening the basis beyond the seminaries, colleges, faculties and professionals. The basis now includes groups and networks which are involved in theological reflection in the context of social and political conflicts. Important as this opening of the traditional understanding of theology may be, it is at best a half-way step towards implementing the programmatic stance of theology by the people.

What, then, is the role of academic theology in the ecumenical movement? It has the indispensable function of working out and enforcing the rules and the criteria which are needed to keep the dialogue between different contextual theologies alive, to keep theological activity authentic. Academic theology is not an end in itself; it is meant to serve and support the theology by the people. The partner and addressee of theological reflection should therefore be much less the non-believing, secular person than the person who is involved in the struggle for human dignity. At this critical point the ecumenical movement most disturbs academic theology.

See also Bible in the ecumenical movement; ideology; theology, ecumenical; Tradition and traditions.

KONRAD RAISER

■ S. Amirtham & J. Pobee eds, Theology by the People: Reflections on Doing Theology in Community, WCC, 1986 ■ C. Van Engen, D.S. Gilliland, P. Pierson eds, The Good News of the Kingdom: Mission Theology for the Third Millennium, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1993 ■ E. Flesseman-van Leer ed., The Bible: Its Authority and Interpretation in the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1980 ■ Groupe des Dombes, Pour la communion des Eglises: L'apport du Groupe des Dombes 1937-1987, Paris, Le Centurion, 1988 ■ A.W.J. Houtepen ed., Ecumenism and Hermeneutics: Findings of the 8th Consultation of Societas Oecumenica Association of Ecumenical Institutes in Europe, Driebergen, 25-31 August 1994, Utrecht-Leiden, Interuniversitair Instituut voor Missiologie en Oecumenica, 1995 ■ J. Míguez Bonino, "The Concern for a Vital and Coherent Theology", ER, 41, 1989 ■ The Humanum Studies: 1969-1975, WCC, 1975 ■ K. Raiser, Ökumene im Übergang (ET Ecumenism in Transition: A Paradigm Shift in the Ecumenical Movement?), WCC, 1991) ■ "Reflections on the Methods of Faith and Order Study", in Minutes Accra, 1974, WCC ■ M. Reuver, F. Solms, G. Huizer eds, The Ecumenical Movement Tomorrow: Suggestions for Approaches and Alternatives, Kampen, Kok, 1993 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, Teachers and the Teaching Authorities: The Magistri and the Magisterium, WCC, 2000.

THEOLOGY, LIBERATION

ALTHOUGH "liberation"* is a correct translation of the biblical vocabulary of salvation*/redemption,* only very recently has it found a significant place in theological vocabulary. Its basic concerns, however, have been present in different forms throughout Christian history. As a general designation, "liberation theology" refers to several contemporary expressions of theology which intend to reflect on the presence and power of God* in the life and struggles of oppressed people (including women and certain races, classes and groups) in the light of God's redemptive purpose manifested in Jesus Christ.*

Liberation theology, trying to be faithful at the same time to God's purpose of a fullness of life that encompasses and integrates economic, political, cultural and spiritual dimensions – in every one of which oppression can and does make itself felt – and paying also attention to the particular conditions of the context, has found expression as feminist, black, African or Asian theologies. The Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians* has given expression both to the basic unity and to the distinctions and has provided a space for a fruitful dialogue and cooperation.

Liberation theology is generally identified with its Latin American expression, which has used this name since Rubem Alves's and Gustavo Gutiérrez's books of 1971 (Gutiérrez's book appeared in 1988 as Theology of Liberation). The origins of this theology in Latin America can be traced to the growing participation of Christian priests, ministers and laypeople in the life and struggles of the large poor majorities to overcome the condition of marginalization, poverty and oppression. Such participation generated a deep spiritual commitment to the poor,* an awareness of the destructive nature of their conditions, an admiration for the solidarity, depth and resourcefulness which these people manifest and a need to understand better the social, economic and political structures which caused such situations.

Theologically, the biblical and theological developments in European theology emphasizing the historical nature of God's revelation* and the relevance of fundamental biblical categories like justice,* shalom and eschatology* for social change influenced some younger theologians. For Roman Catholics, these influences found expression in Vatican II;* for Protestants they were received through the ecumenical movement, specifically, the Church and Society commission of the WCC. Between 1960 and 1980 a number of theological essays explored methodological questions for the articulation of a Latin American liberation theology, including the use of social analysis and therefore the need for an interdisciplinary dialogue with the social sciences (Hugo Assmann, Julio de Santa Ana, Franz Hinkelammert, Joseph Comblin, Juan Luis Segundo), the need for a hermeneutics* in the use of scripture and Tradition (Segundo, Severino Croatto, Pablo Richard), the significance of praxis* both as epistemological instrument and as verification principle (Gutiérrez, Clodovis Boff). But at the same time, certain theological themes demanded particular attention: Christology (Leonardo Boff, Jon Sobrino, Segundo, Raul Vidales), ecclesiology (Segundo, Sobrino, L. Boff), the doctrine of God, particularly the Trinity (Victorio Araya, L. Boff, Ronaldo Muñoz, J. Míguez). The series Teología y Liberación, published until the late 1980s, presented a number of texts that sought to respond more systematically to this need. Biblical scholarship addressing social, economic, ethical and political issues urgent in Latin American life, particularly from an exegetical and hermeneutical perspective, has developed significantly in the last two decades and found expression in the journal Revista de Interpretación Bíblica Latinoamericana, published since 1988.

The expansion of church base communities* throughout Latin America has at the same time fed liberation theology and been an instrument of its propagation. It has also generated a spirituality expressed in song, prayer and liturgical and sacramental renewal which is essential to an understanding of liberation theology.

The Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith has issued two instructions concerning liberation theology. The first warns against the danger of "certain liberation theologies" becoming forms of reductionism or ideologization; the second proposes principles for a right understanding of freedom and liberation. In a letter to Brazilian bishops, Pope John Paul II stated that a theology of liberation is "both necessary and opportune".

Although the WCC has never explicitly discussed liberation theology, the general concern for liberation has been present in different forms and especially in the Nairobi assembly's theme: "Jesus Christ Frees and Unites" (1975). Latin American liberation theology was discussed at the Christian education meeting (Lima 1971), and references to black theology appear in Bangkok 1973 and to feminist theology in Berlin 1974 in a way that is affirmative but not developed. It has nevertheless been implicitly present in such WCC programmes as "The Church and the Poor" and the political ethics consultation of Cyprus (1981) of the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development, in the Human Rights Resources Office for Latin America and in the Programme to Combat Racism.

New developments in liberation theology in the late 1980s and 1990s have included a response to the social, cultural and economic developments related to globalization and the domination of the so-called neo-liberal economies and to the forms of marginalization and personal, family and social instability which it has produced. This response has led to enlarging the interdisciplinary scope of liberation theology (now to include also social psychology, cultural anthropology and micro-economics), to deepening certain theological focuses (the Trinity, ecclesiology and eschatology), as well as to giving greater attention to the deeper religious needs and quest of the people in the "new religious movements".

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO

- C. Boff & L. Boff, Introducing Liberation Theology, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1987
- G. Gutiérrez, A Theology of Liberation, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1988
- L.R. James, Toward an Ecumenical Liberation Theology: A Critical Exploration and Common Dimensions in the Theologies of Juan L. Segundo and Rubem A. Alves, New York, Peter Lang, 2001
- J. Míguez Bonino, Doing Theology in a Revolutionary Situation, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1975
- J. Rieger ed., Liberating the Future: God, Mammon and Theology, Minneapolis, Fortress, 1998.

THEOLOGY, MINJUNG

MINJUNG theology is an indigenous theology of politics and culture* that has developed in South Korea in recent years. "Minjung" is a Korean word for people,* mass, or the masses of people, but it refers specifically to the oppressed vis-a-vis their oppressors, or to the poor* over against the rich and powerful. Thus, minjung theology may mean a theology by the people, for the people, and of the people. It emerged out of Christian concern for and solidarity* with the economically exploited, politically oppressed and socially marginalized peoples in South Korea in the 1970s. It is a theological endeavour by the whole people of God.*

Minjung theology developed out of specific political struggles of Korean Christians. In the 1970s Korea's oppressive military dictatorship silenced nearly all of its political opposition, denying the people their fundamental human rights. In addition, the regime imposed a "development" ideology upon the people, which created a wide gap between the rich and the poor in the country, denied the people's right to form labour unions and created massive poverty in both the industrial urban and rural areas of the nation. Many Korean Christians resisted the dictatorship and the ideology thus imposed, especially student activist groups such as the Korean Student Christian Federation and the Ecumenical Youth Council, as well as the Urban Industrial Mission, Church Women United and the Human Rights Commission of the National Council of Churches. These groups organized Christian movements which entered into solidarity with the urban and rural poor in the struggle for justice and democratization in Korea. Minjung theology is a faith reflection of, by and for the people in their struggle against oppression; it is a political theology of liberation developing from the people's struggle towards and within the kingdom of God.*

Out of the experiences of suffering* and struggle against oppressive powers, and with the eyes of the poor, minjung theologians read and interpret the Bible. For minjung theology, God is working in human history to liberate the suffering people of God. Jesus himself was of the minjung and a friend of the minjung; he suffered, died, and was raised with and for the minjung. Of central importance to minjung theology is this minjung Jesus, who is on the side of the poor and oppressed for their liberation. The gospel and the Jesus-event are interpreted from the perspective of the poor and oppressed, and in turn the Jesus-event interprets the struggles of the minjung. Thus the history of the liberation struggle of the minjung is seen from the perspective of the presence of God in and through the person and work of Jesus.

As minjung theologians struggle with the people for their liberation, they also identify with and reflect upon events in the history of the Korean poor which highlight the peoples' quest for freedom and dignity. One such event was the student revolution of 1960, which toppled the corrupt political regime of President Syngman Rhee. Other events include the independence movement of 1 March 1919 against Japan's harsh imperial rule, and the 1894 Donghak farmers' rebellion against the brutal feudal bureaucracy imposed by the Confucian kingdom of Chosun. In minjung theology, the irrepressible struggle of the people for their liberation in history is viewed as a movement of the Holy Spirit* and a source of power, which names the minjung as the true subjects of history.

In addition to history, minjung theologians also perceive that culture is a source of power for people's liberation. The Korean minjung express and celebrate their life in music, drama and masked dances which are distinct from those of the rulers and the Confucian aristocrats. Particularly they favour the minjung farm dances, where the music is rhythmic and throbbing and where it calls forth dynamic and often frenzied dancing steps and motions, and the minjung mask dance, which gives satirical expression to the people's sublimated grief, anger and frustration (han) over against their oppressors. In attempting to give theological understanding to these various expressions, minjung theologians perceive that they are indigenous forms of "confessing", resistance and empowerment; they are Spirit-infused cultural expressions of the minjung for their liberation from oppression.

Minjung theology, therefore, is an indigenous theology deeply rooted in the culture and religions of the Korean people, and it takes the Bible very seriously. It takes seriously the developments in Latin American liberation theology and uses openly the language of that theology, for example, "God's preferential option for the poor", the hermeneutical "suspicion", and "Jesus the Liberator". In addition, minjung theology follows Latin American liberation theology in its limited use of Marxist analysis of political economics and gives its own critical analysis of the ideologies of militarization and economic development, which are the principal "idols" oppressing the people in contemporary Korea. It has links also with the liberation theologies that have developed in other Asian countries and has had a certain ecumenical impact, chiefly through the work of the Christian Conference of Asia (CCA).*

Minjung theology has made story-telling an indispensable part of its hermeneutics,* and in that sense it differs from Latin American liberation theology. Minjung theologians originated the phrase "socio-biography of the minjung", and they have made the stories of the minjung – their suffering, their han, their struggles against oppressive powers – central to their theological methodology. Minjung theology in this sense is essentially narrative theology; it is a vehicle through which the stories of the joy and the grief, failure and success, laughter and tears of the minjung are faithfully gathered, told and interpreted, as a means for their liberation.

Minjung theology takes seriously the feminist liberation movement; Korean feminist theologians argue that Korean women are the "minjung of minjungs". Minjung theology condemns the sexist exploitation of the poor and the patriarchal systems which discriminate against women, whether in the church or society. It is now being developed in minjung church movements among labourers, the urban poor, and farmers, confessing faith in Jesus Christ who is in solidarity with the people in their daily struggles for economic and political rights against the present oppressive regime.

Minjung theology is in the vanguard of those addressing the tragic division of Korea between the North and the South, the consequence of decisions imposed on the Korean people by super-powers following the second world war. It defines the Korean people forced to live under the present divided structures of government and ideology as minjung. The theologians are active in the movement for peace and re-unification in Korea, and minjung theology articulates a theology of peace and re-unification, of justice and reconciliation.

DAVID KWANG-SUN SUH

■ W.J. Kang, Christ and Caesar in Modern Korea: A History of Christianity and Politics, Albany NY, State Univ. of New York Press, 1997

■ Y.B. Kim, Minjung Theology: People as the Subjects of History, Singapore, CCA, 1981 ■ J.Y. Lee ed., An Emerging Theology in World

Perspective: Commentary on Korean Minjung Theology, Mystic CT, Twenty-third Pubs, 1988

■ S.-B. Lee, A Comparative Study between Minjung Theology and Reformed Theology from a Missiological Perspective, New York, Peter Lang, 1996 ■ C. Moon, A Korean Minjung Theology: An Old Testament Perspective, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1985 ■ D.K. Suh, The Korean Minjung in Christ, Hong Kong, CCA, 1991.

"THEOLOGY, NEW"

THE EXPRESSION théologie nouvelle came into existence in (French) Roman Catholic circles, mainly in the 1940s, in an attempt to discredit the renewal of theological methods using history, exegesis, patristics and liturgy at the expense of a rigid scholastic methodology. The term occasioned a public controversy which developed after the appearance of a book by Henri Bouillard, SJ, entitled Conversion et grâce chez saint Thomas d'Aquin: Etude historique (Conversion and grace in St Thomas Aquinas: A historical study, 1944).

This "new theology" was never an organized movement, even if an article by Jean Daniélou on present trends and religious thought ("Les orientations présentes et la pensée religieuse", Etudes, 1946) has sometimes been represented as a kind of manifesto. The expression appeared in an article by Monsignor Parente in the Osservatore Romano of 9-10 February 1942. This article, entitled "Nuove tendenze teologiche" (New theological trends), condemned criticism of scholastic theology and put such criticism in the same category as modernist trends. Also, an article by M. Cordovani in the Osservatore Romano of 22 March 1940 had prepared the way by its criticism of a supposed "theological renewal" relating to ecclesiology, ecumenism and ethics. These various criticisms came to a head with the publication of the encyclical Humani Generis in 1950, which afforded Réginald Garrigou-Lagrange a further opportunity to write one of his many articles in which he lumped this theology together with modernism, sentimental Romanticism, empiricism, Kantianism, scepticism, Pierre Teilhard de Chardin and even heresy.* This controversy, then, though limited both in time and geographically, clearly epitomized the polemics hurled by the official theologians at the theological renewals of that time.

This controversy was limited to a few main centres: on the one hand, Rome, supported by St Maximin and the Revue thomiste, and on the other, Fourvière and Louvain with certain Jesuits, and Le Saulchoir with some Dominicans. One of the immediate issues was the interpretation of "Thomism", which had been established as an official theology. By showing a development in Thomas's thought on the question of grace,* Bouillard seemed to be relativizing a deductive, narrowly rationalist scholastic method in which the role of the fathers and of scripture was simply to provide a more effective confirmation of a hidebound, authoritative theology. But there was something immoderate in these polemics, and so the main surviving witnesses now tend to play down the arguments of that period, the more so since the theologians who were referred to at the time were to a great extent those who inspired Vatican II (M.-D. Chenu, Bouillard, Henri de Lubac, but also Daniélou and Hans Urs von Balthasar). Also, some prelates, especially the cardinals of Paris and Toulouse, had officially come to their defence in and after 1946. And while Pius XII on 17 and 22 September 1946 had expressly condemned the "new theology" in addresses to the Jesuits and the Dominicans, Monsignor Parente was to rehabilitate them publicly in a speech given at the Urbaniana University in Rome on 11 November 1967.

This controversy, however, still has a highly symbolic significance because it points clearly to the great biblical, patristic, liturgical and historical renewals which were to be legitimized at Vatican II in the Roman Catholic Church. Far from being an argument primarily of the French among themselves (on both sides of the Alps), this discussion indicated the limits of post-Tridentine thinking and Roman Catholic authoritarian centralism both in France and also beyond the Rhine and in Belgium. This centralism was challenged in regard to its methods of justifying theological positions by recourse to the fathers, the liturgy, scripture and the historical method. It is not by chance that Monsignor Parente in 1942, in his criticism of the "new theology", also evoked the name of Johann Adam Möhler, a 19th-century Roman Catholic church historian whose work was published by Yves Congar in the series Unam Sanctam immediately after Chrétiens désunis (Disunited Christians) in 1937, the same year as Chenu's book.

Monsignor Bruno de Solages came to the defence of theological pluralism just at the time when a group of Jesuits, in reply to attacks made on them, wrote in the Recherches de science religieuse of 1946 that the Christian revelation is not first and foremost "the communication of a system of ideas" but "the revelation of a person" and that "the church has always in the past accepted the freedom of theological schools within the same orthodoxy". Certain notes had already been struck which were to be strongly sounded by Vatican II – especially the Constitutions on Revelation, on the Church, and on the Liturgy, the Decree on Ecumenism, and the affirmation of the "hierarchy of truths".*

BERNARD LAURET

- G. Alberigo, M.-D. Chenu, E. Fouilloux, J.-P. Jossua & J. Ladrrière, Une école de théologie: Le Saulchoir, Paris, Cerf, 1985
- A. Avellino Estaban, "Nota bibliográfica sobre la llamada 'Teología Nueva'", Revista española de teología, 1949
- R. Winling, La théologie contemporaine (1945-1980), Paris, Centurion, 1983.

THEOLOGY, NORTH AMERICAN

THE ORIGIN of North American Christianity in the Puritan churches of New England did not predispose it to acquire ecumenical concerns. Yet the simultaneous presence of Spanish Catholicism in Florida and California, French Catholicism in Quebec and Louisiana, Anglicanism in Virginia, Maryland and Canada, and the Society of Friends in Pennsylvania made the encounter of churches and theologies unavoidable in the lands that became the USA and the Dominion of Canada. The major theologian of the 13 colonies, Jonathan Edwards, pursued concerns, such as the beauty of God and his works, that were broader than the Calvinism of his background. The Great Awakening, in which he was active, tended to blur denominational differences under the impact of the Spirit, at least in the churches of the Connecticut valley.

The 19th century was too busy with church expansion and consolidation to favour the theological enterprise. Yet it saw the birth of a wide variety of theological orientations. Between the Unitarianism of New England and the Anglo-Catholicism of the Episcopal Church in Wisconsin (diocese of Fond du Lac), the Mercersburg theology (John Nevin, The Mystical Presence, 1846; Philip Schaff) emphasized "development" as a force in Christian history that could serve as a basis for a "Protestant Catholicism" based on a high view of sacraments. In a different direction the Holiness churches, influenced by the Wesleyan tradition, opened new dimensions by giving a prominent voice to women (Phoebe Palmer). Pastoral concerns led to reflection on social problems even before the social gospel theology of Walter Rauschenbusch offered the possibility of interdenominational convergence in the effort to face the problems of society in the light of the gospel. Meanwhile, liberal theology (Horace Bushnell) tended to remove the accent from formal institutions, thus reducing the churches to denominations (see denominationalism, Holiness movement, social gospel movement, Unitarian Universalism).

Theological writing in Quebec has been overshadowed by French theology, though a few authors have reached an international audience, notably René Latourelle with studies on the theology of revelation (1963) and Bernard Lambert with an analysis of the ecumenical movement (Le problème œcuménique, 1962). In English-speaking areas theological thought has been the most fruitful.

The many-sided background inherited from the 19th century in the USA spawned a variety of ecumenical dimensions in theologies that were open to European influences. While the system of Paul Tillich included a rehabilitation of the "Catholic substance" animated by "the Protestant principle", Reinhold and H. Richard Niebuhr, adapting Barthian thought to the American scene and insisting on the historical conditioning of Christian doctrines, encouraged the growth of a self-critical principle that, in turn, could easily nurture ecumenical thinking. Thus Douglas Horton and Walter Horton (Christian Theology: An Ecumenical Approach, 1955) were consciously oriented to concerns of the wider church beyond denominational boundaries. Arthur Karl Piepkorn affirmed the Catholic dimension of Lutheranism, received from the middle ages, while John Macquarrie (Principles of Christian Theology, 1966) pointed to the catholicity of Anglicanism, and Albert C. Outler drew from John Wesley's thought inspiration and guidance for his active contribution to the ecumenical movement, notably when the nature of Tradition was debated in preparation for the Faith and Order conference of Montreal (1963). The continuing participation of American theologians in Faith and Order* can be illustrated with works of lasting value (J. Robert Nelson, The Realm of Redemption, 1951; Paul Minear, Images of the Church, 1960; Geoffrey Wainwright, Doxology, 1980).

The "death of God" theology (Paul Van Buren, The Secular Meaning of the Gospel, 1963; Thomas Altizer, The Gospel of Christian Atheism, 1966) sparked a crisis in the media. But it had no lasting effect, as alternatives remained alive in the resilience of the churches' traditional teaching, in adaptations of process thought to theology (W. Norman Pittenger, Schubert Ogden, John Cobb), and in critiques of the basic ideas of the "death of God" (Langdon Gilkey, Reaping the Whirlwind, 1977). This crisis may have encouraged an emphasis on theology as a consistent system. Wainwright's Doxology, sub-titled, "a systematic theology", illustrates the interest of theologians in organizing theological coherence around a stable principle – here, the liturgy. Besides Tillich, Macquarrie and Wainwright, one may mention Gordon Kaufman (Systematic Theology: A Historicist Perspective, 1968), Gabriel Fackre (The Christian Story, 1984) and, among Catholics, Frans Jozef van Beeck (God Encountered, 1988-).

Meanwhile, several Orthodox theologians gained a wide audience, notably Georges Florovsky through his patristic writings and his participation in Faith and Order, Alexander Schmemmann through his baptismal and liturgical theology, and John Meyendorff through his presentation of major Orthodox doctrines. Roman Catholic theology, which had been largely dormant in the 19th century, entered the mainstream of American thought with the writings of John Courtney Murray on the theological implications of political democracy, of Gustave Weigel on the ecumenical movement, and of the Canadian Bernard Lonergan on methodology (Insight, 1957; Method in Theology, 1972). David Tracy's work (The Theological Imagination, 1981) emphasizes theology as public and academic discourse. Avery Dulles's proposal that the theologies of revelation* and of the church* may be seen in terms of "models" opens a way to approach many questions in ecumenical dialogues.

New theological accents testify to the growing fruitfulness of North American thought. Black theology (James Cone, A Black Theology of Liberation, 1970) stresses the ties of Christianity with ethnic experience and culture. Feminist theology (Elizabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her, 1983; Elizabeth Johnson, She Who Is, 1992) retrieves neglected aspects of the Tradition, in light of which it puts forward tentative reconstructions. Generally, North American theology has been predominantly speculative and systematic, yet also with an important historical emphasis (Jaroslav Pelikan, The Christian Tradition: A History of the Development of Doctrine, 1971-89). The participation of North American theologians in bilateral dialogues between churches has been significant. The dialogue "Lutherans and Catholics in Conversation", with its nine common statements, has become a model of ecumenical method.

GEORGE H. TAVARD

■ R. Hütter, "After Dogmatics? Beobachtungen zur evangelischen Systematischen Theologie in den USA und in Deutschland an der Jahrhundertsschwelle", Theologische Literaturzeitung, 125, 11, 2000 ■ R.W. Jenson, America's Theologian: A Recommendation of Jonathan Edwards, New York, Oxford UP, 1988 ■ P.M. Minus, The Catholic Rediscovery of Protestantism, New York, Paulist, 1976 ■ H.R. Niebuhr, The Kingdom of God in America, New York, Willet, Clark, 1937 ■ G.H. Tvard, The Catholic Approach to Protestantism, New York, Harper, 1955 ■ M.G. Toulouse ed., Makers of Christian Theology in America, Nashville TN, Abingdon 1997 ■ V.A. Yzermans ed., American Participation in the Second Vatican Council, New York, Sheed & Ward, 1967.

THEOLOGY OF RELIGIONS

THE THEOLOGY of religions involves the attempt, by Christian theologians, to reflect upon the meaning and significance of non-Christian religious beliefs and practices from the standpoint of Christian revelation. This theological discipline, which has emerged since Vatican II* among Catholics and Protestants alike, should not be confused with the "history of religions" (Religionsgeschichte) or the "philosophy of religion". It differs from the latter two approaches by virtue of its explicit dependence upon God's revelation in Christ as the decisive framework in which religious "data" are interpreted.

Questions discussed under this rubric include the following: What conditions must obtain for adherents of other religions to experience salvation (as it is understood within the Christian faith)? For example, must they express explicit faith in Christ? Are non-Christian religions to be viewed simply as expressions of "unbelief", or is it possible that they play some hidden role in God's plan of salvation* for humankind? What theological explanation can be offered of the phenomenon of human religiosity? To what end, and on what basis, should Christians enter into dialogue with adherents of other religions? Finally, to what extent can one draw upon elements of non-Christian religious traditions in building indigenous churches in missionary contexts?

Much of the debate regarding a Christian theology of religions has been shaped by the exclusivist-inclusivist-pluralist typology. "Exclusivism" has been associated with the position that salvation can be found only through the person and work of Jesus Christ and that saving grace* is not mediated through the teachings and practices of other religions. (Exclusivists, however, are divided regarding the necessity of explicit faith in Christ as a condition for salvation. Some prefer to take an agnostic stance on this question.) "Inclusivism" generally denotes the view that salvation extends beyond the witness of the church and that non-Christian religions play some positive role in God's plan for humanity. (Inclusivists, however, are divided on the question of whether non-Christian religions, qua religions, constitute channels through which salvation is mediated.) As an interpretation of religion, “pluralism”* denotes the viewpoint that all religions are culturally conditioned, yet authentic, responses to a largely unknown divine ultimate Reality (cf. John Hick).

Although the exclusivist-inclusivist-pluralist typology framed this discussion for almost two decades, three important limitations beset it. First, the typology focuses almost exclusively on soteriology to the neglect of other important questions. Second, as emerging proposals have become increasingly complex, its explanatory power has diminished. Finally, as Gavin D’Costa has noted, this typology implicitly veils the fact that every interpretation of religion is “exclusive” in that it offers a “tradition-specific” account of other religions (The Meeting of Religions, 22). D’Costa claims that the idea of a “neutral” interpretation of religion is simply an Enlightenment myth.

RECENT PROPOSALS

In his book, Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism, the Belgian Jesuit Jacques Dupuis argues that the “two hands” of God, the Word and the Spirit, are universally present and active in non-Christian religions. As a result of the Spirit’s inspiration, “revelation” can be encountered in the sacred writings of non-Christian religions. For example, sacred scriptures such as the Qur’an can be viewed as containing the “word of God” (245). Building upon the foundation of Karl Rahner, Dupuis claims that non-Christian religions constitute “channels of salvation” through which efficacious grace is mediated to their adherents. For example, the worship of images may constitute a means of grace for Hindus: “[T]he worship of sacred images can be the sacramental sign in and through which the devotee responds to the offer of divine grace; it can mediate secretly the grace offered by God in Jesus Christ and express the human response to God’s gratuitous gift in him” (303). Dupuis’ views have come under the scrutiny of Roman Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

Mark Heim, a Protestant theologian, outlines a very different proposal in The Depth of the Riches: A Trinitarian Theology of Religious Ends. He suggests that the debate over the theology of religions has proceeded upon the “largely undefended assumption that there is and can only be one religious end, one actual religious fulfillment” (17). This assumption, he claims, must be rejected. Heim suggests that while Christians will experience “salvation” (communion with the Triune God), adherents of other religions may experience other positive “ends” which are not “salvation”. For example, while a Christian may experience communion with God, a Buddhist may experience nirvana. These various “religious ends” are all, in fact, rooted in an encounter with the Triune God, whether so named or not: “I contend that distinctive religious ends sought and realized in other religious traditions are grounded in apprehension of and connection with specific dimensions of the divine life of the Triune God” (9). According to Heim, the divine life of the Triune God generates three “dimensions”. Multiple religious ends obtain as a result of an intensified “relation” with one of these dimensions: “The presence of the Triune God in creation in such varied dimensions has the perplexing effect of allowing persons to form various and even contradictory visions of God. These then can become moulds within which to construe the entire human relation with God. These form the basis for a variety of religious ends, marked by an intensification of a particular kind of relation with an aspect of the divine life” (289).

Writing from a Pentecostal-charismatic perspective, Amos Yong has outlined a “pneumatological” theology of religions. The metaphysical foundation for his proposal is the universal divine presence of the Spirit in the world. Yong claims that Pentecostals and charismatics must learn to “discern” the Spirit’s presence in other religions by employing a “pneumatological imagination”. This does not entail the affirmation that the Spirit inspires every form of religious experience. Indeed, a proper Pentecostal theology of religions must be able to account not only for the “transformative” nature of religious experience but also the negative element produced by “spiritually destructive fields of force symbolized by divine absence or the demonic” (Discerning the Spirit(s), 312). To this end, Yong outlines a “three-tiered process” for discerning the activity of the Spirit in other religions. The first element is “phenomenological-experiential”, the second component is “moral-ethical” and the third is “theological-soteriological” (250). Although “discerning the Spirit(s)” is a complex affair, responsible Christians must engage in it.

Finally, from an Evangelical perspective, Harold Netland claims that the phenomenon of human religiosity must be viewed against the backdrop of the biblical themes of creation, revelation, sin and redemption. On the one hand, every human being possesses, no matter how limited and distorted, an awareness of God. Thus, “We can think of religions as displaying, in varying degrees, a rudimentary awareness of God’s reality through creation and general revelation” (Encountering Religious Pluralism, 333). As a result, one should not be surprised to encounter elements of truth in other religions; nor should one be surprised by similarities in moral teaching among religions. On the other hand, religions are not merely “benign” expressions of humanity reaching out to God. Every aspect of human life, including the religious dimension, has been corrupted by sin. Thus, a paradox exists: created in the image of God, human beings long for a relationship with God; however, as sinners they rebel against God and hide. “While a religion can be a way of reaching out to God, it can also be a means of hiding from him” (332). Because of sin, every human being stands under God’s judgment. The only remedy for this problem is the atoning work of Christ on the cross. Thus, Jesus Christ is the only Saviour for all humankind, including adherents of other religions. This is why the gospel, by nature, has a missionary orientation. Those who turn to God in faith and repentance experience salvation. God’s love and mercy extends to people everywhere, including adherents of other religions. Rather than dogmatically speculating about the fate of the unevangelized, the church should place its trust in a holy and righteous God who treats all people justly as it graciously proclaims Christ as the way, the truth and the life.

Clearly, differences in constructive proposals are, to a large degree, shaped both by differing methodological assumptions regarding the hermeneutic relation(s) of biblical teaching and religious “data” as well as differing theological assumptions. One’s understanding of anthropology, ecclesiology, soteriology and doctrine of God* deeply influences the content of specific proposals. Recently the doctrine of the Trinity* has played an increasing role as several theologians have attempted to employ this doctrine, albeit variously understood, as the constitutive basis for a Christian theology of religions.

See also dialogue, interfaith; mission; uniqueness of Christ.

KEITH E. JOHNSON

- G. D’Costa, The Meeting of Religions and the Trinity, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 2000
- M. Dhavamony, Christian Theology of Religions: A Systematic Reflection on the Christian Understanding of World Religions, Bern, Peter Lang, 1998
- J. Dupuis, Toward a Christian Theology of Religious Pluralism, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1997
- S.M. Heim, The Depth of the Riches: A Trinitarian Theology of Religious Ends, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 2001
- J. Hick, A Christian Theology of Religions: The Rainbow of Faiths, Louisville KY, Westminster John Knox, 1995
- H. Netland, Encountering Religious Pluralism: The Challenge to Christian Faith and Mission, Downers Grove IL, InterVarsity, 2001
- A. Yong, Discerning the Spirit(s): A Pentecostal-Charismatic Contribution to a Christian Theology of Religions, Sheffield, Sheffield Academic Press, 2000.

THEOLOGY, PACIFIC

PACIFIC THEOLOGY is a contextual theology growing out of the Pacific soil and waters; it is concerned to bring the gospel of Jesus Christ to bear on contemporary sociological, political, environmental and religious events as well as on the future of the region. It seeks to put faith,* gospel and religion in the local Pacific soil and context so that these may exist meaningfully in the local climate.

For 150 years the Pacific has been described as a mission field – missionaries came from the North to “the ends of the earth”, the periphery of the world, to proclaim the good news. They came with such theology as they knew in their context, a theological construct conditioned by their history, culture and circumstances. Now Pacific islands are independent nations, and the churches are autonomous. Missionary trends have changed; the Pacific is no longer the periphery for “sending churches” to evangelize, and foreign missionaries are no longer the major personnel; now Pacific islanders are missionaries to themselves. Since the Pacific islanders can never be like the Western missionaries, Pacific churches desire that the revelation* of God in the history* and cultures of peoples shall also be good news in the history and culture* of the Pacific region.

The effectiveness of Christ’s birth in Bethlehem, his crucifixion at Calvary and the descent of the Spirit at Pentecost* in Jerusalem was immediate and simultaneous to every part and every people of the world. Indeed, the good news was present in the Pacific before the missionaries’ arrival. The missionaries from the North came to enable the Pacific to re-discover and name what was already there. Pacific theology then illustrates, in the light of the gospel and from the Pacific history, culture and customs, what God is like and is doing in revelation and salvation.*

In going about this task, they follow the principle of what Christ did, using his environment (e.g. animals of Palestine, mustard seed, fish, farmers) to contextualize the ecumenicity and catholicity* of the gospel. Pacific theology uses the ever-present environment of coconut, kava, betel nuts, hibiscus, orchids, yams and taro – Pacific delicacies – to articulate the good news of Jesus Christ, hence such designations of Pacific theology as betel nut theology (in Papua New Guinea) or coconut theology (in Fiji and Tonga). These are varieties in a genus. They may be limited in so far as the symbols are from a regional context, but the applied theology is universal and ecumenical.

Pacific life is characterized by celebration. The life-cycle of birth, puberty, marriage and death is marked by feasting and celebration, which also re-furbishes the sense of community. A community is so by virtue of the cooperation of its members, inclusiveness of the extended family, sharing and caring, particularly for the aged. Characteristic of Pacific theology are the emphases on solidarity and unity, very much the opposite of the individualism of Western theology.

Two statements of coconut theology with regard to Christology and eucharist* should illustrate Pacific theology. The coconut is the key Christological image because the coconut is the life of the Pacific. The tree has many potentialities as drink and food, its branches for shelter, housing and fuel, its raffia for mats. To drink it is to draw nourishment by “kissing” it. It falls from the tree only in the fullness of life. Thus the image of the coconut encapsules biblical Christology: the virgin birth and the incarnation* are in the coconut. The full potential of new life is in the coconut, and when it is ready (fullness) the new life breaks through its sprouts and is rooted in the soil, growing towards heaven. The glimpses of death and resurrection* are also present because “a seed must die in order to live”. At the final end, the world powers forced him to the earth’s womb, intending to keep him there with the Roman seal and to say “the end has come”. But instead of the expected end, the shell cracked and the resurrection took place; a new full-grown coconut came to its own.

In the earliest eucharistic celebration Jesus used unleavened bread and wine, very common elements in his society. In the Pacific these elements are not only expensive and difficult to acquire but also very foreign. To use coconut for eucharistic celebration is more relevant because it is to bring the common and the familiar into the orbit of the Holy Spirit in the ritual act. Besides, the coconut is both drink and food from the same fruit, even as the blood and flesh are from the one and same body of Christ.

With other third-world theologies, Pacific theology claims that the eternal word of God* seeks an encounter with every people as they are and that no group may be assimilated to another group. Pacific theology is the symbol that the islanders have taken their place among the “great multitude that no one could count, from every nation, from all tribes and peoples and languages, standing before the throne and before the Lamb... They cried out in a loud voice, saying, ‘Salvation belongs to our God who is seated upon the throne, and to the Lamb!’” (Rev. 7:9-10).

Pacific theology is in the process of creation, and most of it is in oral form. It is a reality which can be ignored only to the detriment of the fullness of the ecumenical movement.

SIONE 'AMANAKI HAVEA

■ C. Forman, The Island Churches of the Pacific, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1982 ■ J. Garrett, To Live among the Stars, WCC, 1982 ■ Where Nets Were Cast: Christianity in Oceania since World War II, Suva, Institute of Pacific Studies, 1998 ■ J.D. May ed., Living Theology in Melanesia: A Reader, Goroka, Papua New Guinea, Melanesian Institute for Pastoral and Socio-Economic Service, 1985 ■ D. Munro & A. Thornley, The Covenant Makers: Islander Missionaries in the Pacific, Suva, Pacific Theological College, 1996 ■ G.W. Trompf, The Gospel Is Not Western, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1987.

THEOLOGY, POLITICAL

POLITICAL THEOLOGY AROSE in Europe in the 1960s and 1970s in reaction to the privatizing tendencies in existentialist interpretations of Christianity that emphasized personal encounter as the appropriate framework within which to understand the Christian gospel. Political theology sought to make clear the public nature of the eschatological message. What is promised is not just a new self-understanding for the individual but a new society. Even when addressing the individual, the fact remains that the person is embedded in a social milieu which must be addressed at the same time, if one is to speak to the real situation, for human existence is by nature political. Moreover, the God of the Bible is not "apolitical" (Jürgen Moltmann), a neutral observer of the human situation, but a partisan in the struggle against the forces of injustice. It follows that there is no apolitical theology. A theology which is not calling for change is in effect legitimating the status quo, whether it intends to or not.

Discernable in the thought of the leading representatives of political theology, Johann Metz and Jürgen Moltmann, is the influence of the Frankfurt school of critical sociology (Jürgen Habermas, Max Horkheimer, Theodor Adorno) and the philosopher Ernst Bloch's exploration of utopian thinking. Political theology does not seek to "mix religion and politics" but disavows the alliances of the past between the political order and the church in which theology served to legitimate and give divine sanction to those in power. Instead, political theology calls for the church to function in a consistently critical mode, analyzing existing conditions by the plumbline of the kingdom of God* and the "dangerous memory" (Metz) emerging out of the Hebrew-Christian past of the suffering of the people, on the one hand, and the intervention of God to free them, on the other. God's self-identification with those who suffer poses a permanent threat to all attempts to link God with the forces of wealth and power. This insight parallels the "preferential option for the poor" in Latin American theology.

Political theology grounds its critical stance in the divine commandment prohibiting idolatry and in the hope for justice* conveyed by the eschatological promise of the kingdom of God. The first supplies the "secularizing" impulse in political theology, its critical examination of political and ideological loyalties to determine whether they are claiming for themselves a devotion that belongs to God alone. The second, the vision of the kingdom, makes the theory-praxis dialectic an integral part of the position. Every historical realization is questioned in the light of that which still remains to be actualized.

The consistently critical stance has caused objections to be raised by Latin American theologians. While acknowledging their own indebtedness to political theology and the kinship they share, Latin Americans complain that an approach which only critiques ignores the necessity in the practical world to form alliances and to be committed to concrete, less-than-perfect alternatives in order to achieve proximate justice. Theology must take the risk of being partisan (José Míguez Bonino), rather than simply the critic, if it is to mobilize the disenfranchised to secure their rights. From the Latin American perspective, therefore, political theology's revolutionary critique looks more like a Cartesian revolution of systematic doubt than a practical one (Juan Luis Segundo), a theoretical principle and method that assure the thinker a position above the fray rather than committing one to the movements that bring about change.

Political theologians counter that theology responds to the concrete situation in which it finds itself. In the social democracies of Europe, where there is hope for change through normal political processes, criticism of existing conditions may be the most important contribution the church can make. In other contexts, where fundamental changes are required before justice is a possibility, commitment to a single political alternative may be necessary. Theology's goal in either case is to make clear God's identification with the disenfranchised, who have no one to speak for them, and to bring about the reforms necessary to ensure their full participation in society.

See also theology, liberation.

THEODORE RUNYON

- R. Chopp, The Praxis of Suffering, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1986 ■ J. Metz, Glaube in Geschichte und Gesellschaft (ET Faith in History and Society, New York, Seabury, 1980) ■ J. Moltmann, On Human Dignity, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1984 ■ A. Rasmussen, The Church as Polis: From Political Theology to Theological Politics as Exemplified by Jürgen Moltmann and Stanley Hauerwas, Lund, Lund UP, 1994 ■ S.B. Scharper, Redeeming the Time: A Political Theology of the Environment, New York, Continuum, 1998 ■ K. Srisang ed., Perspectives on Political Ethics, WCC, 1983 ■ S. Wiedenhofer, Politische Theologie – Politische Ethik, Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1976.

THEOLOGY, PUBLIC

THE TERM "public theology" first appeared in English in an analysis of the contributions of Reinhold Niebuhr by Martin Marty (1974), but it points towards a wider and deeper strand of theological reflection rooted in the interaction of biblical insight, philosophical analysis, historical discernment and social formation. In America, Martin Luther King, Jr, later became a model of public theology in its activist mode, re-invigorating a tradition, obscured temporarily by notions of inevitable secularization, that the clergy are "public intellectuals". This form of discourse seeks to offer an interpretation of the common life and to provide the moral and spiritual vision to guide it, and it claims that theology is indispensable to both tasks.

The idea also appeared in German theology, especially as introduced by Wolfgang Huber, as the issues of the relationship of church preaching to public discourse was debated in the European context in the face of the powerful influence of Karl Barth and a number of ongoing discussions of the Bar-men declaration and the lingering influence of the political theologies of, for example, Carl Schmitt on the right and Ernst Bloch on the left. From these sources "public theology" has come to signal the idea, not only that the theologian and pastor may address public matters, but in fact that they must do so, since the inner architecture of civil society always has moral and spiritual dimensions that demand attention and guidance.

The roots of such views are found in the prophets, in Jesus' preaching and teaching, and in Paul's encounters at the Acropolis. Augustine's City of God, Thomas Aquinas's writings on justice and the reformers' teachings about "orders of creation", "vocation", "covenant" and the relationship of law and gospel, and more recent developments such as Abraham Kuyper's theology of the "spheres", Ernst Troeltsch's quest for a "Christian social philosophy" and Walter Rauschenbusch's "theology for the social gospel" variously anticipate and influence contemporary developments. All presume that "theology", while always related to personal faith, particular faith communities and concrete social conditions, is at its most profound levels neither contextually determined nor an unwarranted claim about the way things are and ought to be. Public theology differs from liberation theology,* with which it otherwise shares a concern for social justice, for it resists contextualism and the use of Marxist analysis, both of which it views as reductionistic and frequently subversive of justice and truth.

The term was developed also by others. John Courtney Murray and David Tracy, for example, connected the idea to Roman Catholic teachings in the social encyclicals, from Rerum Novarum on labour by Pope Leo XIII, through Quadragesimo Anno on the ideas of subsidiarity and of solidarity by Pius XI and Pacem in Terris by John XXIII, all of which anticipated aspects of Vatican II and contemporary statements by recent popes to the UN on racism, war, human rights and more recent thought about pluralism. Tracy points out that although many today turn to human experience to find a basis for common morality and meaning, experience turns out to be even more pluralistic than doctrine and provides no means to interpret itself. Various modes of public discourse are needed to discern its meanings.

Public theologians, especially in the face of current global trends, have identified a variety of publics. They can be discovered by posing a series of questions. First, the religious public can be identified by this question: What can and should be preached and taught among those who seek faithful living and thinking according to the most holy, and thus the most comprehensive, righteous and enduring reality to which humans can point? Christians will, of course, have a ready answer, but it will have to be tested by inter-religious encounter.

Second is the political public. The question here is: What is the best vision of, and the motivation for, the just use of power, so that the common life can flourish? Public theology, in other words, not only must make sense in the faith community, it must show that it can help shape viable government, precisely because it sees the public of "civil society" as prior to any regime or "republic". It differs from political theology in so far as the latter sees politics as the comprehending institution rather than as a necessary, dependent and limited one. Public theology thus allies itself with a social theory of politics rather than a political theory of society.

Third is the academic public, found by asking: What claims can best be called true or valid because they can best withstand critical analysis and offer convincing arguments or evidence in the face of informed scrutiny? This question implies that public theology can learn from philosophy, science and the professions, and has something to contribute to them.

To these publics we must add the economic: What modes of production, finance, exchange and distribution best allow us, worldwide, to create plenty, to relieve want and drudgery, and to enable the material well-being of humanity? Furthermore, today many issues of family life, of the relations between males and females, parents and children, and nuclear and extended patterns of obligation are of public concern, for traditional guidelines are under strain or seen as problematic. Thus, what patterns of morality, relationship and care can best guide those who seek to embody love rightly and well in publicly recognized bonds of matrimony?

There are objections to public theology. Some argue that theology has nothing essential to do with these publics. Some say that theology is essentially personal, not social. Others say that it is and should be an articulation of revelation or of the faith of a particular believing community. Public theology may draw from such dogmatic and confessional emphases, but it also has an apologetic emphasis. While revelation* and faith* are gifts of God, not all claims about them are of equal validity or can shape public discourse. Public theologians hold that it is not only possible but necessary to assess them as to whether they accord with the most universal understandings of holiness, justice, truth, creativity and love we can know.

Disagreement over this matter has, however, led to two wings of public theology. One is more deeply indebted to the fideist definitions of theology and has allied itself to recent forms of "post-modern" thought, for both groups doubt that any universalistic arguments about such matters can be sustained. This wing calls upon believers boldly to proclaim what can only be known "through the eyes of faith", for in public life everyone else is also presenting views that are based on unverified convictions. Believers claim a place at the table of incommensurable discourses on the grounds of inevitable pluralism and the justice of fair access.

A second wing argues that the purported break-up of meaning is overstated and that the capacity of humans to learn each other's languages and to engage in meaningful debate about such matters as human rights, sound ecology, fair trade, good technology, quality medicine and just law suggests a deeper substratum of ecumenical commonality. While some speak of "natural law", others speak of "common grace" that allows the claims of theology to be understood and assessed – even by those who do not share in a particular faith. This wing holds that we can, and are obligated to, "give an account of the faith that is within us”, in part because it is necessary for the well-being of the neighbour and in part to test our own myopia.

Public theologians differ on the interpretation of “modernity”. This Western development did not entirely deny that religion could be a powerful force in people’s lives, but it doubted that theological matters could be reasonably defended and were necessary for civil society.* Some saw them as the source of conflict. They were relegated to the private sphere of preferences and were denied a public role. Science, philosophy and politics were thought to have firm foundations and thus to be sufficient for interpreting and guiding civil society.

Public theologians agree among themselves that this view is mistaken, but the fideist wing tends to hold that science, philosophy and politics are governed as much by subjective, irrational “preferences” as is theology, while the apologetic wing tends to think that modernity has valid aspects but in fact has misunderstood its own foundations. Modern science, philosophy and politics are, in this view, more profoundly based on universally valid, reasonable, theological bases than they acknowledge. Indeed, they often irrationally obscure or deny those bases. The decisive task of an ecumenical public theology would therefore be to uncover and recast them for today in order to interpret and to guide our “post-modern”, emerging global civilization.

See also theology, political.

MAX L. STACKHOUSE

■ R. Benne, The Paradoxical Vision: A Public Theology for the Twenty-first Century, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1995 ■ W. Huber, Kirche und Öffentlichkeit, Munich, Chr. Kaiser, 1973 ■ W. Huber et al. eds, Öffentliche Theologie, Gütersloh, Chr. Kaiser, 1991-2000 ■ M. Marty, “Reinhold Niebuhr: Public Theology and the American Experience”, Journal of Religion, 54, 1974 ■ M.L. Stackhouse, Public Theology and Political Economy, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1986 ■ M.L. Stackhouse et al., God and Globalization, vols 1, 2 & 3, Harrisburg PA, Trinity, 2000 and 2001 ■ M.L. Stackhouse, P. Berger, D. McCann et al., Christian Social Ethics in a Global Era, Nashville TN, Abingdon, 1996 ■ R. Thiemann, Constructing a Public Theology, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1992 ■ D. Tracy, Analogical Imagination: Christian Theology and the Culture of Pluralism, New York, Crossroad, 1981.

THEOTOKOS

THE GREEK term theotokos means “God-bearer”, and it was given officially to Mary the mother of Jesus by the ecumenical council of Ephesus in 431. The expression is, however, older. It appears in a papyrus from the end of the 3rd century, and it was used for Mary very frequently throughout the 4th century.

Christians at that time were very much aware that this expression was fundamental to discussion of the incarnation* of the second person of the Trinity.* It was to culminate in the Chalcedonian formula in 451: “Jesus, very God and very man” (see Chalcedon), contrasting with the philosophy of the first few centuries, for which the incarnation of God remained a scandal. If a woman gives birth to God, does that make her his mother? “When the fullness of time had come, God sent his Son, born of woman” (Gal. 4:4).

Polemics at Ephesus were lively. Nestorius proposed the expression Christotokos (Christ-bearer), but the council adopted theotokos (she who brings God into the world) as its formula, for Mary gives birth to Jesus of Nazareth, the Son of God. “The child to be born will be holy; he will be called the Son of God” (Luke 1:35). It is Mary, a woman like all other women, but a virgin chosen by God, who writes the divine Word into the human family tree.

This designation was joyfully welcomed by the church and has remained a title uniting the majority of Christians up to the present. In the 16th century, even though Calvin refused to use the word, Luther and Zwingli for their part continued to mark the Marian feasts (the annunciation, visitation, incarnation, presentation and dormition) by sermons stressing Mary’s unique place in the history of the human race: “Let Mary be held in honour and the Lord be worshipped!”

The Orthodox church remained faithful to the doctrinal judgments of the ecumenical councils; in hymnology and iconography moderate veneration of the theotokos continued.

In the last few centuries, however, Christian tradition in the West developed extremely polarized positions. On the Protestant side, the churches of the Reformation like to speak of Mary as an "example of humility, prayer and faith" for believers; "the woman" in the book of Revelation represents the church. On the Catholic side, the Roman dogmas of 1854 and 1950 laid down as an essential affirmation "the immaculate conception of Mary" by her parents, and her "assumption" instead of her dormition.

For some decades, thanks to the breadth and openness of ecumenical dialogue, we have been able to tell each other where the differences between us lie and to ask each other how Mary, whom the angel called "full of grace", is to be venerated without that veneration becoming worship of the "queen of heaven" as a supposed co-mediatrix alongside Jesus. Today the expression theotokos may help the church to re-discover the true place for Mary, who sang the Magnificat.*

See also Mary in the ecumenical movement.

ELISABETH PONTOPIPIDAN

- B. Bobrinskoy, Le mystère de la Trinité, Paris, Cerf, 1986 ■ A. Dumas & F. Dumas, Marie de Nazareth, Geneva, Labor & Fides, 1989 ■ J. Feiner & L. Vischer, Neues Glaubensbuch: Der gemeinsame christliche Glaube (ET The Common Catechism, London, Search, 1975) ■ Groupe des Dombes, Marie dans le dessein de Dieu et la communion des saints, part 1: Dans l'histoire et l'écriture; part 2: Controverse et conversion, Paris, Bayard/Le Centurion, 1999 ■ V. Lossky, Théologie mystique de l'Eglise d'Orient (ET The Mystical Theology of the Eastern Church, London, Clarke, 1957) ■ G. Miegge, La Vergine Maria (ET The Virgin Mary, Philadelphia, Westminster, 1955).

THIRD WORLD

THE TERM "third world" is generally understood as synonymous with developing nations (a term that itself merits definition). "Third world" is used more commonly than either "first world" or "second world"; more recently the term "fourth world" also has come into use.

The first world usually denotes the leading industrialized countries mainly of Western Europe and the USA and other countries of comparable economic development. The second world refers to the rest of the industrializing nations, mainly the former Soviet Union and countries of Eastern European. The third world is the rest of the world, in particular, the developing countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America. Used as such, the term appears widely both in the media and in academic circles.

The term "third world" was first used in 1952 by the French economist and demographer Alfred Sauvy in an essay on "Trois mondes, une planète" (Three worlds, one planet). The concept reflected the idea that several continents had been excluded from power in the world. The term has come to suggest that this very exclusion has generated a set of common characterizations in the historical experiences of the people of Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Middle East. This concept of the third world as an excluded world gave it more currency than "first world" and "second world".

The expression "third world" became part of the development* debate, especially in the 1960s when the rich countries began to be called developed countries, and the poor countries, backward or under-developed. The first world became the rich nations, the second the industrialized or industrializing, centrally directed socialist countries. The term "fourth world" was added only much later to denote the least developed and chronically poor countries. The so-called theory of dependence,* developed in the 1960s by people like Samir Amin in Africa and A. Gunder Frank, O. Sunkel, Celso Furtado and others in Latin America, saw underdevelopment as a process related to the development of the "central countries". The third world, therefore, can also be seen as the dependent "periphery" of an integrated "international division of labour".

The countries which have been held to compose the third world exhibit tremendous differences – historically, politically, culturally and economically. But it can still be maintained that they also have enough in common historically, and potentially culturally or economically, to include them in a common analytical category which contrasts them qualitatively with other countries.

The term "third world" still best encapsulates a particular way of analyzing the world which is relevant even after the end of the cold war and the demise of the former “second world”. Globalization, characterized by exclusion and marginalization of vast sections of people and countries, has in a way made the term “third world” even more significant.

The WCC has given major attention to the issues of the third world since the late 1960s. The expansion in the membership of the Council, especially in the 1960s, with a large number of churches from developing nations, a preferential option for the poor* and an action-oriented approach to issues naturally made the Council deeply involved in the third world.

In the Roman Catholic Church, Paul VI's Populorum Progressio (1967) is the first document devoted to this issue, although John XXIII had already called attention to the condition of under-developed peoples. The joint WCC/RCC SODEPAX* commission (1968-80) worked extensively on this theme, underlined again in John Paul II's Sollicitudo Rei Socialis (1987).

See also globalization, economic; poverty; social encyclicals, papal.

NINAN KOSHY

■ British Churches and the Third World, London, BCC, 1979 ■ T. Draisma, Underdevelopment Continued?, Rotterdam, Ecumenical Research Exchange, 1984 ■ A. Gilmore, Aid Matters: A Book of Cries, Questions and Prayers, London, SCM Press, 1998 ■ K.B. Hadjor, Dictionary of Third World Terms, London, Penguin, 1993 ■ N. Harris, The End of the Third World, Harmondsworth, UK, Penguin, 1990 ■ International Third World Studies Journal and Review, pub. since 1989 ■ V. Samuel, Evangelism and the Poor: A Third World Study Guide, Bangalore, Partnership in Mission-Asia, 1983 ■ W.R. Schmidt ed., Catalysing Hope for Justice: Essays in Honour of C.I. Ity, Singapore, CCA, 1987 ■ P. Worsley, The Three Worlds: Culture and Development, London, Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1984.

THOMAS, M.M. (Madathilparampil Mammen)

B. 15 May 1916, Kerala, India; d. 3 Dec. 1996, Madras. “M.M.”, a pioneering Asian ecumenical thinker and layman, active in the ecumenical movement for many years, was moderator of the WCC central committee, 1968-75. Secretary and later vice-chairman of the World Student Christian Federation,* 1947-53, he was also chairman of the working committee of the WCC's Department on Church and Society and of the world conference on Church and Society at Geneva in 1966. At the WCC's assemblies in New Delhi 1961 and Uppsala 1968 he was a main speaker.

Thomas helped to organize and spoke at the world Christian youth conferences – Oslo 1947, Kottayam 1952 and Lausanne 1960. In Asia, he organized a series of ecumenical study conferences on social questions, which provided the basis for social reflections during the early years of the East Asia Christian Conference: Bangkok 1949, Lucknow 1953 and Kuala Lumpur 1959. He was secretary of the Youth Christian Council of Action, Kerala, and afterwards youth secretary of his own church, the Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar, and later director of the Christian Institute for the Study of Religion and Society in Bangalore, 1962-75.

He studied for a year at Union Theological Seminary in New York on a WCC fellowship, and was later visiting professor at Union, at Princeton Theological Seminary, and at Perkins School of Theology. He has lectured extensively in North America, Europe and Asia on Christianity and social problems and on the dialogue between Christianity and other faiths. In 1990 he was appointed governor of Nagaland in India.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ M.M. Thomas, The Acknowledged Christ of the Indian Renaissance, London, SCM Press, 1970 ■ The Christian Response to the Asian Revolution, London, SCM Press, 1966 ■ My Ecumenical Journey, Trivandrum, Ecumenical Publ., 1990 ■ Risking Christ for Christ's Sake, WCC, 1987 ■ Salvation and Humanisation, Bangalore, Christian Institute, 1971 ■ K.C. Abraham, Christian Witness in Society: A Tribute to M.M. Thomas, Bangalore, Board of Theological Education, Senate of Serampore College, 1998 ■ T.M. Philip, The Encounter between Theology and Ideology: An Exploration into the Communicative Theology of M.M. Thomas, Madras, CLS, 1986 ■ H.T. Wolters, Theology of Prophetic Participation: M.M. Thomas' Concept of Salvation and the Collective Struggle for Fuller Humanity in India, Delhi, ISPCK, 1996.

THURIAN, MAX

B. 16 Aug. 1921. Geneva, Switzerland; d. 15 Aug. 1996, Geneva. At age 21, in the midst of theological studies, Thurian met Roger Schutz who was seeking companions for an experiment in an ecumenical monastic community which he was founding in eastern France – Taizé.* Of the Reformed church, he became one of its first members, and the community theologian and liturgist. From 1949 his ecumenical study and research served the WCC commission on Faith and Order.* From 1970 on he was instrumental in preparing the document on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry,* adopted by the WCC in 1982, and afterwards edited the six volumes of official church responses: Churches Respond to BEM (WCC, 1986-89).

Well aware of Taizé's exemplary ecumenical influence, the former Vatican nuncio to France (1944-53), Pope John XXIII, personally invited Brothers Roger and Max to participate as observers at Vatican II.*

In 1987 he discreetly professed full communion with the Roman Catholic Church, and was ordained a priest of the diocese of Naples. Remaining a faithful brother of Taizé, he continued on occasion quietly to guide ecumenical prayer groups in Geneva and gatherings of young people at Taizé, and to contribute to the studies of the international theological commission, of which he was a member, in the Roman curia.*

TOM STRANSKY

■ M. Thurian, La liturgia, contemplazione del mistero, Bologna, Dehoniane, 1997 ■ Mariage et célibat (ET Marriage and Celibacy, London, SCM Press, 1959) ■ Marie, mère du Seigneur, figure de l'Eglise (ET, Mary, Mother of the Lord, London, Faith, 1963) ■ Le mystère de l'eucharistie (ET The Mystery of the Eucharist, London, Mowbray, 1983) ■ L'unité visible des chrétiens et la tradition (ET Visible Unity and Tradition, Baltimore, Helicon, 1962) ■ M. Thurian ed., Ecumenical Perspectives on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry, WCC, 1983 ■ M. Thurian & G. Wainwright eds, Baptism and Eucharist: Ecumenical Convergence in Celebration, WCC, 1983.

TING, K.H. (Ding Guangxun)

B. 29 Sept. 1915, Shanghai. Ting has been principal of Nanjing Theological Seminary since 1953. From 1981 to 1997 he was president of the China Christian Council and the National Three-Self Movement. Ordained in 1942, he moved to Canada in 1946 to become mission secretary for the Student Christian Movement. After obtaining an MA from Union Theological Seminary in New York, he moved to Geneva as mission secretary for the World Student Christian Federation, 1948-51. Returning to China, he became general secretary of the Christian Literature Society, Shanghai, 1952-53, before going to Nanjing. He was consecrated bishop of Chekiang in 1955. As well as his responsibilities at Nanjing, he was made a member of the standing committee of the National People's Congress in 1983, president of the Amity Foundation in 1986 and vice-moderator of the National People's Consultative Conference in 1989.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- K.H. Ting, Christian Witness in China, Kyoto, Doshisha UP, 1985
- The Study of the Bible, Shanghai, CCC, 1982
- R.L. Whitehead ed., No Longer Strangers: Selected Writings of Bishop K.H. Ting, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1989
- J. & P. Wickeri, A Chinese Contribution to Ecumenical Theology: Selected Writings of Bishop K.H. Ting, WCC, 2002.

TOMKINS, OLIVER S.

B. 9 June 1908, Hankow, China ; d. 29 Oct. 1992, Esher, UK Anglican theologian and bishop of Bristol, UK, from 1953 to 1975, Tomkins was associate general secretary of the WCC, in charge of its London office, 1945-53. His close involvement with the WCC continued in a number of ways: as assistant secretary of the Faith and Order* continuation committee, 1945-48; secretary of the commission on Faith and Order, 1948-53; chairman of the Faith and Order working committee, 1953-67; member of the central committee, 1968-75; and member of the Roman Catholic-WCC Joint Working Group,* 1968-75. He helped to draft the basis of what became the Toronto statement.* He was active in the British Student Christian Movement and in the World Student Christian Federation.*

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- O.S. Tomkins, The Church in the Purpose of God, London, SCM Press, 1950
- A Time for Unity, London, SCM Press, 1964
- A. Hastings, Oliver Tomkins: The Ecumenical Enterprise, 1908-1992, London, SPCK, 2001.

TORONTO STATEMENT

THE TORONTO statement, whose proper title is "The Church, the Churches, and the World Council of Churches", was received by the meeting of the central committee of the WCC gathered at Toronto in 1950. It carries an explanatory sub-title: "The Ecclesiological Significance of the World Council of Churches". In retrospect, to attempt so comprehensive a statement on so potentially divisive a subject so soon after the first assembly in Amsterdam in 1948 may seem to be both foolhardy and courageous. Subsequent ecumenical history has shown that the risk was worth taking.

That the ecclesiological question had to be faced so soon after Amsterdam was the result of critical and fundamental questioning of the implications of Council membership for the member churches' concepts of the nature of the church* and of what it meant to relate to churches with concepts which differed on ecclesiology. Among the questioners, interestingly enough, were some Roman Catholic ecumenists. In September 1949 a group of ten WCC representatives met with a like number of Roman Catholics at the Istina centre in Paris. This meeting helped the WCC leaders to realize that, even at this early stage, it was essential to try to define more clearly what the WCC was and what it was not. The Istina meeting was an important stage in the preparation of the Toronto statement. Oliver Tomkins of Great Britain was then secretary of the Faith and Order* commission, and he, together with W.A. Visser 't Hooft, drafted a statement on the ecclesiological significance of the WCC and sent it to theologians for comment. Out of this consultative process came the draft of the Toronto statement.

CONTENT

The statement, as finally agreed, begins by quoting the Amsterdam resolution on "the authority of the Council" and goes on to indicate that a further statement is needed, both to prevent misunderstandings and to indicate the provisional nature of any

WCC utterance. In the light of this declared intention, the statement begins with a series of five disclaimers headed "What the World Council Is Not", followed by eight assumptions which, it is claimed, underlie the WCC. The disclaimers have proved particularly significant in the history of the WCC as providing sufficient safeguards to encourage membership applications by churches for whom ecclesiology is the crucial test of relationship. The five disclaimers are as follows: (1) the WCC is not and must never become a super-church; (2) the purpose of the WCC is not to negotiate unions between churches, which can be done only by the churches themselves acting on their own initiative; (3) the WCC cannot and should not be based on any one particular conception of the church (i.e. it does not prejudge the ecclesiological problem); (4) membership of the WCC does not imply that a church treats its own conceptions of the church as merely relative; (5) membership of the WCC does not imply the acceptance of a specific doctrine concerning the nature of church unity.

The positive assumptions underlying the WCC speak of belief that all relationships must be based upon the headship of Christ, belief in the New Testament view that the church is one, recognition that membership of the church of Christ is more inclusive than any one church body, recognition that in churches other than one's own there are elements of the true church, a willingness to consult together to learn the will of Christ, an acceptance of a solidarity to assist each other, a resolve to enter into spiritual relationship for the purpose of mutual instruction, help and renewal.

One assumption requires fuller quotation, as it provoked lively and difficult debate in its drafting and final reception and carries with it ecclesiological implications for the WCC. It states: "The member churches of the World Council consider the relationship of other churches to the holy catholic church which the creeds profess as a subject for mutual consideration. Nevertheless, membership does not imply that each church must regard the other member churches as churches in the true and full sense of the word."

The commentary immediately following goes on: "There is a place in the WCC both for those churches which recognize other churches as churches in the full and true sense, and for those who do not." The debate on that fourth assumption and the following commentary has been described by Visser 't Hooft as "one of the most heated we have ever had in the World Council". It reflected the different presuppositions of the founding fathers of the Council. One group assumed that the churches in membership gave full and unreserved recognition to each other. Others believed that membership did not mean that any church had to give up its convictions about the nature of the church, but rather that each member church was ready to enter into relations of fellowship and dialogue with other churches, in the hope that they would lead to full recognition and full unity. If the first group had had its way, membership of the Council would have become virtually impossible for those holding the second view. Far more was at stake than sentences in a document. The Orthodox churches, in particular, regarded the other churches as essentially incomplete. Others acknowledged that they did not consider their own church as a full, true and complete church and were not afraid of being told the same thing by others. As the statement was finally received at Toronto, it reflects the very originality of the WCC in that it sought to create a fellowship between churches who were not yet able to give full recognition to each other.

BEYOND TORONTO

There is little doubt that at Toronto in 1950 the WCC so early in its life was at a crisis point. But it proved to be a "crisis unto life". From then on, the member churches recognized not only that they had a deep discernment of the differences between them but also that they had to live with them and work through them as the Holy Spirit led them on into deeper relationships. Unity was developing through admitted and acknowledged diversity. The existence of the Toronto statement has enabled a number of churches to become members of the WCC. Vitaly Borovoy has commented on the statement: "For the Orthodox it is the great charter of the WCC." It has also facilitated developing relationships between the RCC and the Council.

Not surprisingly, since 1950 the ecclesiological issue relating to membership has been handled cautiously by the Council. The New Delhi assembly in 1961 confirmed the statement but pleaded for further clarification of the issues raised, even as it affirmed, "We learn what the Council is by living together." But hopes for theological reflection on the meaning of that life remained, on the whole, unfulfilled. The world Faith and Order conference at Montreal in 1963 asked again that the WCC should devote further attention to the question of its ecclesiology. The fourth assembly at Uppsala (1968) spoke of the Council as a fellowship of churches seeking to express catholicity. By the time of the Nairobi assembly in 1975, the concept of the Council as "a conciliar fellowship of local churches which are themselves truly united" had developed. But the meaning of "conciliar" was and is still awaiting clear and agreed definition. The Vancouver assembly in 1983 sought to develop the perspective of such conciliar fellowship by considering practical steps in the churches' life and relations with one another. In 1991 the seventh assembly at Canberra adopted a statement on "The Unity of the Church as Koinonia: Gift and Calling" which emphasized again the call to the divided church to repent and renew its own life and witness as it seeks to manifest visibly in unity the communion which God intends with him and with each other.

In 1997, after a lengthy consultative process, the central committee adopted a statement, "Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the WCC". This sought to spell out the implications and experience of the churches as they have been together in the WCC, and noted the changed situation since the Toronto statement was drawn up. The focus of the statement is on the fellowship of the WCC, rather than on its institutional structure and on the common calling which the churches seek to fulfill in and through the Council.

At the present time, the Toronto statement still remains as basic. It has rightly been described as more of a milestone than a stumbling block. It has served the churches well for 50 years. It remains still generally relevant, though many feel it needs revision.

Any revision can now be undertaken in the light of having walked together for two generations and of convergence and growing consensus on issues which are, at root, ecclesiological. These issues include baptism, eucharist and ministry; mission in Christ's way; justice, peace and the integrity of creation. The statement, however, is historically rooted in the situation of the churches of the 1950s. Rather than attempting a revision, it is now suggested, the better way of recovering the ecumenical memory as an aid to ecumenical progress is to combine an explanatory memorandum on the basis of the WCC with the publication of the entire Toronto statement, to which can be added a commentary in the style of BEM, incorporating the change and positive developments that have taken place since 1950.

See also World Council of Churches.

MORRIS WEST

■ Text of the Toronto statement in W.A. Visser 't Hooft, The Genesis and Formation of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1982

■ T. Best & G. Gassmann eds., On the Way to Fuller Koinonia: World Conference on Faith and Order, WCC, 1994 ■ V. Borovoy, "The Ecclesiastical Significance of the WCC: The Legacy and Promise of Toronto", ER, 30, 3-4, 1988 ■ A. Bronkhorst, "Die Toronto-Erklärung nach 36 Jahren", ÖR, 36, 2, 1987

■ H.E. Fey ed., The Ecumenical Advance: A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 2: 1948-1968, London, SPCK, 1970 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, Memoirs, London, SCM Press, 1973.

TORTURE

PRACTISED in nearly half of the countries of the world, torture today has become more scientific and hence more destructive. At the same time, it has never been so universally denounced as it is today. The struggle against torture is in the forefront of human rights* questions.

Christian communities have not always had the same attitude to torture. Early Christians were persecuted for their refusal to accept the divine claims of political powers. Later on, however, in new conditions, Christians allowed torture, or at least acquiesced in its practice, from positions of influence in political relationships and organizations. During the Inquisition in Europe, the conquest of America and the era of colonial expansion, torture was widely practised.

Used to obtain confessions and to increase the punishment of criminals, methods of torture often become methods of governing, as political authorities terrorize entire populations by systematically resorting to torture to suppress all kinds of dissent. Physical suffering caused by beating, weapons, electric shock, rape and sexual brutality, the inhuman treatment of children, mock executions, forced labour, the use of drugs and psychologically destructive procedures, sensual deprivation and destabilizing prison routines, harassment and perpetual menace are all so many acts of cruelty aimed at breaking the free will of the victim and sometimes of an entire population.

The diversity and universality of the methods of torture practised today contrast with the unanimity of its prohibition. Article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, the international pact on human rights of 1966, the 1984 international convention (UN) against torture, the European and inter-American conventions on human rights, the African charter, and numerous national laws absolutely forbid the practice of torture. An international committee against torture (UN) examines cases and appeals; a recorder files an annual report denouncing torture at the Commission on Human Rights; the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture invites a group of acknowledged experts to visit places of detention so that states can install mechanisms designed to prevent torture in places of high risk.

The pressure exerted by non-governmental organizations* often brings the facts to light, protects victims by publicizing their cases, and shows states that the practice of torture can undermine their international standing. People from all parts of the world write letters to support a victim. Public attention has to a large extent shattered the isolation and silence that torturers need to hold and break their victims. Individuals are no longer alone but know that others are working for them. At the same time, the torturers have discovered that they too are being watched and must eventually account for their actions.

Torture can be prevented by educating the public about human rights and by providing special training for law enforcement agents in every country. A network of solidarity is needed to unite the numerous anti-torture groups to make their efforts more effective.

The theological undergirding of the struggle against torture is not difficult to find: the dignity of the human person, the reality of our common humanity, God's universal concern for men and women, Christ's presence in the "little ones" that suffer – all these truths speak clearly against all abuse of the human person. With regard to torture, Pope John Paul II said to the International Committee of the Red Cross (1982): "From their childhood Christians hear the story of Christ's passion. The memory of Jesus stripped naked, beaten, derided, nailed to the cross, should make them refuse to see similar treatment meted out to other human beings. The disciples of Christ reject, spontaneously and absolutely, any recourse to such means which nothing on earth can justify and which destroy the dignity of both the tortured and the torturer."

In 1977 the WCC gave expression to its permanent concern on this question: "Torture is endemic, breeds in the dark, in silence. We call upon the churches to bring its existence into the open, to break the silence, to reveal the persons and structures of our societies which are responsible for this most dehumanizing of all violations of human rights." The WCC has initiated specific programmes in which churches could be involved. Many Christians have joined non-confessional organizations such as Action of Christians for the Abolition of Torture, created in France in 1974, or Amnesty International.*

The flare-up of the phenomenon of torture reveals a profound sickness that has stricken humanity. Torture is indeed the product of several causes. The economic injustice that characterizes some countries leads all too easily to reactions of violence and repression. When the personalization of power is pushed to the limit, the dictator feels justified in torturing those who do not submit. Similarly, when ideologies leave no place for mystery, for humankind's higher state, they become totalitarian and crushing.

Deviants become easy prey for those who impose their singular and total truth. Christian churches themselves learned this sad lesson: when they transformed faith in Jesus Christ into an ideology at the service of a temporal power, they justified the use of torture.

GUY AURENCHE

■ G. Aurenche, Avocat de l'espérance, Paris, Centurion, 1994 ■ W.T. Cavanaugh, Torture and Eucharist: Theology, Politics and the Body of Christ, Oxford, OUP, 1998 ■ A. Jacques, L'interdit: La torture en procès, Paris, Cerf, 1993 ■ The Tortured, Torturers and Christian Hope, Paris, FIACAT, 1990.

TOTALITARIANISM

TOTALITARIANISM as a form of government that denies individual freedom and that subordinates all aspects of personal and social life to the authority of a centralized government has existed in various forms throughout history. In modern times Benito Mussolini used the term "totalitarianism" (totalitario) to define the fascist project (see fascism): "All within the state, none outside the state, none against the state." Mussolini's Italy, Stalin's Soviet Union and Hitler's Germany have usually been seen as typical forms of totalitarianism.

The basic characteristics are easily recognized: a strong central rule that controls all aspects of life through coercion and repression, usually exempt from all legal or political control, the control or suppression of social institutions and political organizations (political parties, trade unions, religious, social, cultural and even sports institutions), and the attempt to replace or subordinate all relations of allegiance (family, friendship, religious loyalty) to the ties of loyalty and obedience to the state. The economy usually rests in the hands of the governing elite, allegedly for the sake of the superior end, frequently simply for the profit and enjoyment of its members.

Totalitarianism can be distinguished from dictatorship, despotism and tyranny by two characteristics. On the one hand, it usually eliminates all existing political institutions, laws and traditions and replaces them with new ones. On the other hand, it claims that this step is taken in pursuit of some absolute goal, such as national expansion, racial purity or theocratic rule. All opposition must be eliminated at whatever cost. Usually some group, internal or external to the country, is denounced as the main enemy (the Jews in Nazi Germany is a paramount example) and targeted for destruction. In these circumstances large-scale and organized violence is permissible and often necessary. Government is exercised by an elite, conceived of as possessing superior intelligence, moral integrity and willpower and sometimes claiming divine sanction.

Totalitarianism has been repeatedly condemned as an ideology* by most Christian churches (see Confessing Church), although groups of Christians and even churches have sometimes supported such governments and even tried to justify them theologically. Although religio-political fundamentalisms (see Fundamentalists), present so commonly today in Christian, Muslim and other religious movements and regimes, have other specific characteristics, their political and social policies link them very closely to totalitarianism.

The WCC has emphatically rejected totalitarianism ever since the Oxford conference (1937). The word had been used by J.H. Oldham in a preparatory document, and Oxford took over his definition of it as "the widespread tendency of the state to control the totality of human life in its individual and social aspects, combined with the tendency to attribute absolute value to the state, the national community or the dominant class". The theological rejection of such claims is based on the affirmation of the sovereignty of God and on the understanding of what it is to be human. Totalitarianism becomes a species of idolatry by claiming for the state, the nation or the race an absolute allegiance that is owed to God alone; it reduces the person,* created in the image of God, to a mere particle in a total whole; and it prevents the participation of people in the building of society, thus denying a fundamental right of all human beings and a demand that God makes of them.

Amsterdam 1948 confirms the rejection of totalitarianism and opposes to it the idea of "responsible society", further developed in Evanston (1954) as a criterion to oppose some absolute claims of both communism and liberal capitalism. Since Nairobi 1975, the critique of "economic domination" at both national and international levels and more recently the rejection of the totalitarian claims of neo-liberal economics to represent the only alternative and the final stage of economic development have been often expressed in ecumenical statements and initiatives.

See also globalization, economic.

JOSÉ MÍGUEZ BONINO

TOURISM

ECUMENICAL concern about tourism grows out of the recognition that its effect on the economies, cultures and life-styles of third-world countries involves a crucial issue of justice* and development.* WCC attention to tourism emerged in the late 1960s in the context of a Department on the Laity study of "Changing Concepts of Work and Leisure". Following a 1969 conference on leisure-tourism in Tutzing, Federal Republic of Germany, the issue was studied under the rubric of "Participation in Change", one of five major WCC programmes between the fourth and fifth assemblies. Visits to the Middle East assessed the impact of leisure travel on Arab-Jewish relations. A chaplaincy at the Munich Olympics (1972) sought to evaluate the effect of such sporting occasions on personal and international relationships.

In the early 1970s a conference in Nairobi explored tourism in East Africa. Black Africans in the tourist business pointed out that almost all the profits from tourism went to white tour operators and their partners in Europe, with minimal spin-off for the country that provided the surf, sand, scenery and service. Out of this conference came an experiment in responsible tourism. Canadians, on a two-week visit to East Africa, could spend one week as they chose, then, for the other week, they worked alongside counterparts engaged in the same trade or profession. Tourism was the subject of one of the five preparatory consultations that led to the founding of the Caribbean Conference of Churches in 1973. Researchers gathered advertisements for Caribbean tourism in North American periodicals; in every case, black people were shown serving whites.

In Asia, concerns expressed at ecumenical workshops in Penang, Malaysia, in 1974 and in Manila in 1980 led in 1982 to the formation of the Ecumenical Coalition on Third World Tourism (ECTWT), with its headquarters in Bangkok. Its member organizations – both Roman Catholic and groups related to the WCC – are from Africa, Asia, the Caribbean, Latin America, the Middle East and the Pacific. ECTWT has links with the European Ecumenical Network on Third World Tourism (TEN) and the Center for Responsible Tourism in San Anselmo, California.

ECTWT cooperates with organizations in destination countries that challenge tourist policies and practices and encourage codes of tourist ethics and alternative forms of tourism. International industry promotions have been used as occasions to present dissenting views that expose political and economic imperialism, racism,* sexism* and human rights* abuses in the tourism industry.

In seeking to call attention to the injustices of the tourism industry, ecumenical programmes have investigated the role of the transnational corporations* controlling travel and resort facilities and the collaboration with them by third-world governments. Foreign currency earned by a tourist-destination country is about 15% of the travel, hotel and entertainment costs. Little technology or management skill is transferred. Environmental destruction often accompanies resort construction. Loss of fishing rights and farming areas aggravates the drift to city squatter areas.

The ecumenical programmes seek to defend the rights of those who suffer human rights abuses, cultural desecration, loss of livelihood and destruction of life-style. People are encouraged to express and to organize themselves in resort areas. A particular concern is sex tourism, including child prostitution (see prostitution, child), which may enslave children as young as three years old. Ecumenical programmes have highlighted the evils of prostitution, the threat of AIDS* and other sexually transmitted diseases, the link with drugs and the exploitation of "bar hostesses" in conditions of virtual slavery. Other programmes focus on alternative approaches to tourism which enable tourists to see the actual life-style and cultural traditions of people and to avoid the debasement of “cultural performances” for tourists, dependence on foreign hedonism to make a living and inculcation of servile attitudes and consumer values.

National and international groups have also studied the theological basis of ecumenical concern for tourism, e.g. seeing travel as a pilgrimage of humble discovery of the human face of God in the peoples, maximizing the inter-relationship of people. They have emphasized that humanity’s creation in the image of God implies the preciousness of human life and the importance of human relations. Liberational approaches to theology have helped to focus on victims of tourism so as to arouse new consciousness and point to new structures for more just relationships.

IAN FRASER and HARVEY PERKINS

- I.M. Fraser, Leisure-Tourism: Threat and Promise, WCC, 1970 ■ R. O’Grady, Third World Stopover: The Tourism Debate, WCC, 1981 ■ J. Seifert-Granzin & D.S. Jesupatham, Tourism at the Crossroads: Challenges to Developing Countries by the New World Trade Order, Bangalore, Equations, 1999 ■ Tourism: An Ecumenical Concern, Bangkok, ECTWT, 1988.

TRADITION AND TRADITIONS

“TRADITION” is used in a variety of senses, some wide-ranging and others more restricted. (1) In an inclusive sense it designates the whole of Christian faith* and practice – not only doctrinal teaching but worship, norms of behaviour, living experience, sanctity – as handed down within the church* from Christ and the apostles to the present day. Understood in this comprehensive way, Tradition is not to be contrasted with holy scripture* but seen as including it; scripture exists within Tradition. (2) In a narrower sense Tradition may be distinguished from scripture and taken to mean the teaching and practice of the church, not explicitly recorded in the words of the Bible, but handed down from the beginning within the Christian community. (3) More narrowly still – especially when used in the plural, “traditions” – the term may refer, often in a pejorative sense, to a belief or custom which cannot claim any divine or apostolic origin.

Although different Christian bodies differ widely in their estimate of Tradition in sense (2), it is obvious that no religious body could exist without some kind of tradition. Even the decision to dispense altogether with Tradition and to rely solely on the authority of scripture would itself constitute a tradition.

TRADITION IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

The key passages occur in 1 Cor. “I received from the Lord”, says Paul, “what I also handed on to you, that the Lord Jesus on the night when he was betrayed took a loaf bread” (11:23). Here the noun “tradition” (paradosis) does not occur, but Paul uses the related verb paradidonai, “hand on”. Two points are noteworthy in this text: Tradition is regarded as derived from Christ (cf. Gal. 1:12), and it is directly connected with the institution and celebration of holy communion. This second point acquires particular significance when seen in the context of contemporary “eucharistic ecclesiology”. The church, in the view of many present-day Roman Catholic and Orthodox theologians, is essentially a sacramental organism, which becomes itself through the celebration of the eucharist;* and so Tradition is best understood not primarily as a collection of facts and propositions, whether recorded in writing or preserved orally, but rather in terms of a communal action and a living presence. Tradition means the eucharistic Christ; to live within the Tradition signifies above all to “eat this bread and drink the cup”, proclaiming the Lord’s death “until he comes” (1 Cor. 11:26).

Paul also links Tradition not just with the eucharist but more broadly with the total ministry of Christ. After stating, “I handed on to you... what I in turn had received”, he goes on to refer to Christ’s death “for our sins” and, more particularly, to his resurrection* (1 Cor. 15:3-4). But Tradition in the Pauline writings can also carry a much more restricted meaning, denoting a custom such as the veiling of the head by women during prayer (1 Cor. 11:2,5-6).

While in these passages the word “tradition” and its cognates bear a favourable sense, elsewhere in the NT the attitude is more ambivalent. Paul, for instance, refers to the “traditions of my ancestors” (Gal. 1:14), i.e. Jewish customs which he himself observes but which he does not consider obligatory upon all believers. Elsewhere he makes an emphatic contrast between the truth which is “according to Christ” and mere “human tradition”, which is to be rejected (Col. 2:8). In the synoptic gospels Jesus draws a similar distinction between the “tradition of the elders” and the “commandment of God”, and he accuses the scribes and Pharisees of “making void the word of God through your tradition that you have handed on” (Mark 7:5-13).

The NT attitude towards Tradition and traditions is therefore one of critical discernment. Traditions must be continually tested; as the Russian Orthodox theologian Vladimir Lossky (1903-58) observes, Tradition represents “the critical spirit of the church”. Seen in this way, Tradition is not only a protective, conservative principle but primarily the principle of growth and regeneration. Christians do not remain “in” the tradition simply through passive inertia or mechanical repetition. There must be an unceasing effort to discriminate between “Tradition” and “traditions”, between the essential gospel of salvation in Christ and what is simply accidental and historically conditioned. “The Lord said, I am truth. He did not say, I am custom” (council of Carthage, A.D. 257).

TRADITION IN THE EARLY CHURCH

Since, so far as we know, Christ did not commit his teachings to writing, the church depended at first entirely on oral tradition. After the composition of the books of the NT, oral traditions continued for a time to circulate in the Christian community and are cited by 2nd-century authors such as Papias and Hegesippus, but from A.D. 200 onwards little use is made of these unwritten traditions. The Gnostic appeal to a secret tradition independent of the recognized scriptures was firmly rejected by Irenaeus (d. c.200), who insisted that the Christian faith is based on the Bible and on the public teaching, in full agreement with the Bible, which is handed down by the succession of bishops in each Christian centre. Clement of Alexandria (d. c.215) appealed like the Gnostics to esoteric tradition, but here Origen (d. c.254) adopted a significantly different standpoint, holding that all tradition must be based ultimately on the Old and New Testaments. Writers in the late 2nd and early 3rd centuries, such as Irenaeus, Tertullian, Origen, Hippolytus and Novatian, refer to a summary of Christian teaching which they term the “canon” or “rule of faith” (regula fidei), but the contents of this canon turn out to be entirely biblical; it is regarded, not as something supplementary to the Bible, but as identical with scripture and confirmed by it (see canon). The same is true of the primitive baptismal creeds* and of later conciliar statements of faith such as the Nicene Creed* (381) and the Chalcedonian definition (451); these again are intended simply as re-affirmations of the fundamental biblical message concerning Christ.

One of the most explicit patristic statements concerning unwritten Tradition occurs in Basil of Caesarea (d.379): “Some things we have from written teaching, and others we have received handed down to us in a mystery from the tradition of the apostles. Both forms of tradition have the same value for piety” (On the Holy Spirit 27.66). This passage has sometimes been used to support a “two-source” theory of divine revelation. When Basil goes on, however, to give examples of the things “handed down to us in a mystery”, these involve not points of doctrinal teaching but various practices in Christian worship such as the sign of the cross, turning to the east during prayer, the invocation (epiclesis*) over the gifts at the eucharist, and threefold immersion in baptism, all of which he considers apostolic in origin, although not explicitly mentioned in scripture. Thus for Basil unwritten Tradition, while important for liturgical prayer, does not seem to represent a second source of doctrine, independent of the Bible. In this text, as in 1 Cor. 11:23, we note the connection between Tradition and the eucharist.

For patristic authors in general, then, Tradition does not constitute a supplementary source of information about Christ alongside scripture, but it denotes simply the manner in which scripture is interpreted and lived by successive generations within the church.

THE REFORMATION DEBATE

The relationship between scripture and Tradition (in sense 2) has figured prominently in controversy between Roman Catholics and Protestants since the 16th century. The council of Trent (session 4, 8 April 1546) drew a distinction between "written books" (libri scripti) and "unwritten traditions" (sine scripto traditiones). It was probably not the intention of the bishops at Trent to commit themselves specifically to a "two-source" doctrine, whereby revelation is handed on partly in scripture and partly in living oral tradition, but this was in fact the prevailing view among the Roman Catholic theologians from Trent until Vatican II. Tradition was usually treated as distinct from scripture, and it was held that teachings not contained in the Bible may be gathered from Tradition alone. On such a view Tradition becomes something added to the biblical testimony, so that scripture and Tradition form two parallel and complementary elements that together make up a larger whole, the totality of revealed truth.

"Two-source" language, similar to that employed by Roman Catholics, frequently occurs in Orthodox texts from the 17th century onwards. The statement in the Orthodox confession of Peter of Moghila (1643) is typical: "The articles of faith have received their authority and approbation partly from holy scripture and partly from ecclesiastical Tradition... The dogmas of the church are of two kinds, some being committed to writing... and the others handed down orally" (1.5).

On the Protestant side, the Reformers carefully distinguished between apostolic and post-apostolic Tradition, accepting the first as divine revelation,* while regarding the second as human teaching, to be received only if it agrees with the Bible. Scripture was proclaimed as the sole and final test by which all traditions were to be judged. The principle of Tradition was not denied, but its applications were rigorously submitted to the sovereign criterion of scripture, and any notion of two parallel "sources" of revealed truth was repudiated. Thus the Westminster confession of faith (Presbyterian: 1646) states that "all things necessary... for man's salvation" are to be found "expressly set down in scripture", or else may be deduced from it, "unto which nothing at any time is to be added, whether by new revelations of the Spirit or traditions of men" (1.6). But approval is then given to such traditional statements of faith as the Nicene Creed and the Chalcedonian definition. The Lutheran Augsburg confession (1530) and formula of Concord (1576), while affirming the primacy of scripture, similarly endorse the ancient creeds (the Apostles', the Nicene and the Athanasian), together with the other conciliar decisions that have the "unanimous consent" of the undivided church.

The same position is adopted in the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England (1562). Here it is stated as a basic principle: "Holy scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation" (art. 6). The "three creeds" are to be received, since they agree with scripture (art. 8), but the decisions of "general councils" do not possess authority unless "it may be declared that they be taken out of holy scripture" (art. 21); "traditions" may be changed (art. 34). Tradition is thus accepted, on the Protestant and Anglican view, only in so far as it represents the true interpretation of scripture, and it can never constitute a parallel authority, independent of scripture or supplementary to it.

In modern ecumenical discussions concerning Tradition, the 16th-century categories with their sharp polarity have been largely superseded. The "two-source" language, while still found occasionally in Roman Catholic authors, is no longer generally prevalent. Tradition is now commonly understood, by Catholics and Orthodox alike, in an inclusive manner (sense 1 rather than sense 2); there is, in other words, one source and not two, so that Tradition and scripture must be always taken together and never treated separately. Many Anglicans and Protestants today are willing to recognize the need for Tradition, viewed in this comprehensive way, so long as the primacy of scripture is safeguarded.

In the context of multilateral ecumenism, the statement on "Scripture, Tradition and traditions" made by the fourth world conference on Faith and Order at Montreal 1963 marked an incipient convergence: "We exist as Christians by the Tradition of the gospel (the paradosis of the kerygma) testified in scripture, transmitted in and by the church through the power of the Holy Spirit.

Tradition taken in this sense is actualized in the preaching of the word, in the administration of the sacraments and worship, in Christian teaching and theology, and in mission and witness to Christ by lives of the members of the church." Yet Montreal could as yet do no more than recognize the hermeneutical problem of the relation between scripture and authoritative ecclesial traditions or between those traditions and Tradition (i.e. the transmission of the gospel as a whole, including scripture). Montreal offered no criteria but simply asked questions: "How can we distinguish between traditions embodying the true Tradition and merely human traditions? How can we overcome the situation in which we all read scripture in the light of our own traditions? Does not the ecumenical situation demand that we search for the Tradition by re-examining our own particular traditions?" The Montreal convergence made the production of Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* possible. But the unresolved questions re-emerge in the responses of the churches to BEM, particularly in connection with the first question put by the Lima document: How far can your church "recognize in this text the faith of the church through the ages?" (see BEM, 1982-90: Report on the Process and Responses, WCC, 1990, 131-42).

The shift in Roman Catholic opinion was strikingly apparent at Vatican II* (1962-65). In the original draft of the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, the first chapter was entitled "Two Sources of Revelation", but such language was eliminated from the final version. While "sacred Tradition and sacred scripture" continue to be mentioned as coordinate elements, the integral connection between the two is constantly emphasized: together they "form one sacred deposit of the word of God" (para. 10). But the constitution also specifies: "It is not from sacred scripture alone that the church draws her certainty about everything which has been revealed" (para. 9). While this statement is bound to prove disturbing to Protestants, it does not exclude the opinion, held in fact by many at the Council, that all revelation is indeed contained in scripture, albeit at times only in an obscure and implicit fashion. Since Vatican II most Catholic theologians have taken the view that Tradition and scripture, while different in form, are identical in content, so that Tradition is only formally, but not materially, independent of scripture. But this position is not actually stated in the constitution on revelation; Vatican II deliberately left the question open.

In its Decree on Ecumenism Vatican II invoked the important concept of "an order or hierarchy of truths" (para. 11), which makes possible a more flexible approach towards the nature of Tradition (see hierarchy of truths). Certain elements in Tradition are nearer than others to the central message of salvation; Tradition is not to be viewed in strictly monolithic terms. Whereas at Vatican I (1869-70) Tradition was closely associated with the pronouncements of the magisterium,* after Vatican II increasing emphasis has been placed on the role of the sensus fidelium, the conscience or consciousness of the people of God as a whole, in preserving and expressing Tradition (see consensus fidelium). This understanding too has served to re-inforce a more inclusive and flexible understanding of Tradition.

The developing ecumenical convergence on Tradition and scripture is evident in the agreed statement adopted by the Anglican-Orthodox joint doctrinal commission at Moscow in 1976. Here Tradition is taken in a comprehensive sense: it is "the entire life of the church in the Holy Spirit" (para. 10). Interdependence is stressed: "Any disjunction between scripture and Tradition such as would treat them as two separate 'sources of revelation' must be rejected. The two are correlative... Holy Tradition completes holy scripture in the sense that it safeguards the integrity of the biblical message" (para. 9). The primacy of scripture is asserted, but in qualified terms: scripture is styled, not "the only criterion", but "the main criterion whereby the church tests traditions" (para. 9). The Moscow statement concludes with some optimism that the agreement reached on scripture and Tradition "offers to our churches a solid basis for closer rapprochement" (para. 12).

Yet difficulties remain. A notable instance is the belief in the bodily assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, proclaimed as a dogma* by the Roman Catholic Church in 1950. On the Protestant side it can be objected that the assumption is nowhere mentioned in the NT, either directly or indirectly, while the earliest specific references to it in ecclesiastical authors do not occur before the late 4th century. In what sense, then, can the doctrine be regarded as present, even in an obscure fashion, within scripture or apostolic Tradition?* For this very reason the 1950 definition has also aroused misgivings among the Orthodox. While affirming the assumption in their liturgical worship, they feel that because of the absence of early evidence it should not, and indeed cannot, be proclaimed as a dogma. In Lossky's words, it is a mystery "which the church keeps in the hidden depths of her inner consciousness... not so much an object of faith as a foundation of hope".

LIVING TRADITION

Recent writing on Tradition is marked by a strong preference for dynamic rather than static categories. Tradition is not so much a "deposit of doctrine" as a shared style of living, not primarily an accumulation of documents and testimonies but the life of Christ and the Holy Spirit in the church. For the French Catholic Yves Congar, Tradition is "the church's life in the communion of faith and worship... the setting in which the Catholic sense is fostered and finds expression"; for the Romanian Orthodox Dumitru Staniloae it is "not a sum of propositions learned by heart, but a lived experience". In any contemporary discussion of the topic, what needs to be said first of all is that the only true Tradition is living, critical and creative, formed by the union of human freedom with the grace* of the Holy Spirit.*

However, this vision of Tradition as dynamic and developing is by no means exclusively modern. Gregory of Nazianzus (329-89), for instance, envisages a progressive revelation in three main stages: "The Old Testament preached the Father clearly, but the Son only in an obscure manner. The New Testament revealed the Son, but did no more than hint at the godhead of the Holy Spirit. Today the Spirit dwells among us, manifesting himself to us more and more clearly." So, "by gradual additions and ascents, advancing from glory to glory", the people of God grows in its apprehension of the truth (Ora- tion 31.26-27). Significantly Gregory uses the words "more and more" of the Spirit's self-disclosure; the Paraclete's manifestation is not completed at Pentecost,* but it develops with an ever-increasing clarity in the continuing life of the church.

A dynamic understanding of Tradition was re-affirmed during the 19th century in Catholic Germany by Johann Möhler and the Tübingen school, and in Orthodox Russia by Aleksey Khomyakov. Möhler described Tradition as "the living gospel... this vital, spiritual force, which we inherit from our fathers and which is perpetuated in the church". Cardinal Newman discussed the subject more systematically in his seminal Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine (1845). His views, although never officially adopted by the Roman Catholic Church, have proved widely influential and received at least partial confirmation in the Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation at Vatican II: "This Tradition which comes from the apostles develops in the church with the help of the Holy Spirit. For there is a growth in understanding of the realities and the words that have been handed down" (para. 8). But many Orthodox, while wholeheartedly endorsing a dynamic view of Tradition, are unhappy about the phrase "development of doctrine", preferring to speak rather of a "development in the expression of doctrine".

As living and dynamic, Tradition is essentially communal. It is transmitted not by isolated individuals but by persons* in relation – by the total ecclesial community, especially when gathered for the celebration of the eucharist. While, in the Catholic and Orthodox view, the apostolic succession of bishops plays a central role in the transmission of Tradition, it is handed down equally through the succession – which also may be termed "apostolic" – of holy men and women in the church, through what Symeon the New Theologian (959-1022) called the "golden chain" of the saints extending from Christ to our own day. Tradition involves the transmission not just of doctrine but of sanctity and spirituality. And alongside the bishops and the saints, all the baptized without exception are active and responsible guardians of Tradition. In the words of Paulinus of Nola (d.431): "Let us hang upon the lips of all the faithful, for the Spirit of God breathes upon every one of them.”

While Tradition is indeed the dynamic movement of God in history,* it is to be seen also in a metahistorical or eschatological perspective. It is not so much a long line stretched out in time as the gathering of time itself into God's eternity, the irruption into this present age of the eschaton, or age to come (see eschatology).

KALLISTOS WARE

■ Anglican-Orthodox Dialogue: The Moscow Agreed Statement, London, 1977 ■ Commission on Faith and Order, The Report of the Theological Commission on Tradition and Traditions, WCC, 1963 ■ Y. Congar, La Tradition et les traditions (ET Tradition and Traditions: An Historical and Theological Essay, London, Burns & Oates, 1966) ■ R.P.C. Hanson, Tradition in the Early Church, London, SCM Press, 1962 ■ D.T. Irvin, Christian Histories, Christian Traditioning: Rendering Accounts, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1998 ■ V. Lossky, “Tradition and traditions”, in In the Image and Likeness of God, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1974 ■ P.C. Rodger & L. Vischer eds, The Fourth World Conference on Faith and Order: Montreal 1963, London, SCM Press, 1964, 50-61 ■ J.E. Thiel, Senses of Tradition: Continuity and Development in Catholic Faith, New York, Oxford UP, 2000.

TRANSNATIONAL CORPORATIONS

CORPORATIONS with activities in one or more foreign countries have existed for a long time. After the second world war, however, when transnational corporations (TNCs) expanded at an unprecedented rate, a strong interest in the phenomenon developed.

According to the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), TNCs are at the core of the process of globalization. In 1997 the world's 100 largest non-financial TNCs together held $1.8 trillion in foreign assets, sold products worth $2.1 trillion abroad and employed some 6 million persons in their foreign affiliates. Almost all of these corporations are from the rich Triad countries (European Union, Japan and United States). The trend towards the liberalization of regulatory regimes for foreign direct investments is creating ever more favourable conditions for TNCs, while mergers and acquisitions are leading to an increasing concentration of economic power in the corporate world.

An important concern for the ecumenical movement is the fact that corporate concentration and power are rising at a more rapid pace than the capacity of individual governments and the international community to monitor, regulate and control TNC activities. The conference on “Church, Community and State” (Oxford 1937) noted: “The earlier stage of competitive capitalism has been gradually replaced by a monopolistic stage, and this economic change has brought with it corresponding political consequences.” The original ideal of modern democracy has therefore become increasingly difficult to achieve, since “centres of economic power have been formed which are not responsible to any organ of the community and which in practice constitute something in the nature of a tyranny over the lives of masses of men”.

In 1955 the WCC central committee identified the need for critical study and evaluation of the impact of private trade and enterprise in the “economically underdeveloped nations” of the world. Concern about the effects of TNC activities in developing countries was also expressed at the meeting of SODEPAX* in Montreal, 1969. Although a SODEPAX meeting in Beirut one year earlier had expressed optimism about the beneficial effects of TNCs, the Montreal meeting noted that the Beirut report did not give adequate attention to certain questions regarding the ambiguity of private investment in the under-developed countries. It predicted that international corporations would control an enormously increased productive capacity within the next decade, hence the need for international regulation and study of the circumstances under which private investment would lead to a net gain in welfare.

Criticism of the exploitative nature of TNCs and the need for effective control over their power also came during the assembly of the WCC Commission on World Mission and Evangelism in Bangkok 1973, and at the WCC conference on science and technology for human development in Bucharest 1974. The criticism culminated in a sharp statement of the fifth WCC assembly in Nairobi, 1975: “TNCs are a typical example of the ways in which capitalist forces in the international and national sphere join together to oppress the poor and keep them under domination.”

It was recommended that a study programme on TNCs be initiated. The WCC executive committee in Zurich (1978) approved a number of guidelines for this programme, which was to help raise awareness through action and reflection and to be undertaken from a perspective of solidarity with victims of TNC operations. A report on the lessons learned through the TNC programme was given to the WCC central committee in 1982.

Reactions of churches to the phenomenon of TNCs are diverse. Some churches have publicly denounced specific TNC activities, e.g. their operations in apartheid South Africa, the irresponsible promotion of baby food, and other socially and environmentally harmful activities. Certain churches are actively promoting codes of conduct for TNCs, and yet others have been involved in boycott campaigns against certain TNCs. The consensus view is that TNCs should be rendered more accountable to society and their power constrained and controlled.

Roman Catholic social teaching has mentioned TNCs only infrequently. However, in an apostolic letter to Cardinal Maurice Roy in 1971, Pope Paul VI mentioned multinational corporations, “which by the concentration and flexibility of their means can conduct autonomous strategies which are largely independent of the national political powers and therefore not subject to control from the point of view of the common good. By extending their activities, these private organizations can lead to a new and abusive form of economic domination on the social, cultural and even political level. The excessive concentration of means and powers that Pope Pius XI already condemned on the fortieth anniversary of Reverum Novarum is taking on a new and very real image.”

ROB VAN DRIMMELEN

- Churches and the Transnational Corporations: An Ecumenical Programme, WCC, 1983
- I.J.M. Razu, Transnational Corporations as Agents of Dehumanisation in Asia, Delhi, ISPCK; 1999
- World Investment Report, New York-Geneva, UN, annual.

TRENT, COUNCIL OF

THE COUNCIL of Trent (1545-63) was the first of the three modern Roman Catholic councils, named after the imperial city of Charles V in the Italian Alps. The general council is noted for its response to the Protestant Reformation.

Already in the late 1400s, strong clerical and lay leaders were beginning to cry out for a council to reform the Western church “in head and members”. Disagreement on the agenda and participation (esp. the selection of political delegations) and opposition by vested interests of papal courts, powerful bishops, emperor and king kept the reformist pleas but a dream. Even Rome’s fifth Lateran council (1512-17), with only a few besides Italian prelates present, produced superficial decrees. Finally, spurred by the influential growth and influence of the Protestants and by pressure from Charles V, Pope Paul III (1534-49) was able in 1544 to convoke the council with three stated goals: the healing of the schism* in the West, the reform of the church, and a Christian coalition against the European encroachment of the Ottoman Turks of Islam.

Because of political upheavals, poor attendance and outbreaks of disease, the council had three separate periods and 25 sessions through four papacies. The first period (1545-48) gave the Catholic answer to the Protestant principle “faith alone, grace alone, scripture alone”. The council listed the books of the Old and New Testament canon,* declared the Latin Vulgate the authentic version for church teaching, insisted on the appropriate role of Tradition,* addressed original sin* and justification,* and maintained seven sacraments.* The second period (1551-52) failed to have the intended Lutheran representation, with equal voice and vote. By the word “council”, the two sides meant different assemblies, and Trent could not serve both. The session defined the eucharist,* with the real presence of Christ described by transubstantiation, and clarified the sacraments of penance* and the anointing of the dying. The third session (1562-63) gave reasons for denying the chalice to the laity, explained the eucharist as the sacrifice of Christ, and declared the priesthood* to be truly a sacrament.

Although the reform of church practices was dividing the council fathers, Trent legislated seminary training for all priests; moral and intellectual qualifications for cardinals, bishops and priests; norms for admission in religious orders; and the prohibition of clandestine weddings, with procedures for valid marriages. Within a decade of the council's close, the popes published new editions of the breviary (1568) and the Roman missal (1570), a general catechism or manual of Catholic instruction for parish clergy (1566), and a revised edition of the Vulgate Bible (1597).

As an answer to the Protestant Reformation, Trent had limited success. The council distinguished essential elements of the faith* from theological opinions and made room for the continued debate of those opinions. It tried to understand the various Protestant confessions first-hand, and unlike previous councils it did not condemn persons but only errors (see anathemas). It initiated a certain number of serious ecclesiastical reforms. But the council of Trent failed to heal the schism within the Western church between Catholics and Protestants. In hindsight, one sees that both sides had limited visions of what should be entailed in a true church reformation of teaching and practice.

Trent gave birth to what is called Counter-Reformation Catholicism. The church leaders and theologians of the next four centuries became far less irenic in spirit and acts than Trent itself had displayed and intended.

TOM STRANSKY

■ O. Chadwick, The Reformation, London, Penguin, 1972 ■ H. Jedin, Geschichte des Konzils von Trient (ET History of the Council of Trent, 2 vols, London, Nelson, 1957-60) ■ N.P. Tanner ed., Decrees of the Ecumenical Councils, London, Sheed & Ward, 1990, vol. 2 for complete texts of decrees.

TRINITY

ALTHOUGH there is no developed or systematic doctrine of the Holy Trinity in the Bible, yet the holy scriptures, especially the New Testament, bear witness to the self-revealing mystery of God the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit as distinct and yet inseparable persons acting for the life, salvation* and glorification of all humanity and of all creation.* In this respect, all the individual biblical references to God,* the Creator of heaven and earth, to his eternal Word and his eternal Spirit, from the beginning of the book of Genesis till the end of the book of Revelation, find their coherence and focus in the mystery of the incarnation* of Jesus Christ* (1 Tim. 3:16) and in its ultimate goal: the participation of the whole creation in God's kingdom* (Rev. 21:1-3). The mystery of the cross of Christ and of his resurrection* is the window and light through which the church* experiences the mystery of the divine Trinity as eternal love and sees the inner coherence and unity of the otherwise apparently diverse biblical witnesses related to the mystery of the Triune God.

Shortly before his crucifixion, the incarnate Word of God gives account to his eternal Father of his mission in the world, saying that he revealed to his disciples the very name of God, i.e. Father, and the eternal love of the Father for his only begotten Son (John 17:6-26, also 1:14), with whom the Father shares the same glory before the existence of the world (John 17:5). It is for the Father's eternal Son and through him that the world was created (John 1:1-3; Col. 1:15-20) and the church comes into existence (John 17:9-26; Eph. 2:19-22, 4:9-16; Col. 1:17-18). The very purpose of the Son's incarnation was to reveal to the world not only the love of God for his eternal Son but also God's love for the whole creation, and to inaugurate its participation in the eternal life of God (John 3:16), liberating the world from sin* and death (Matt. 26:28; John 6:51-58; 1 Cor. 15:20,26). The incarnate Son reveals also the identity of the Holy Spirit* as an eternal person distinct not only from the Father, from whom he proceeds, but also from the Son, to whom he bears witness (John 14:26, 15:26). The Father and the Holy Spirit not only confirm the very identity of Jesus Christ as being the only begotten, eternal Son of the Father, upon whom rests the Holy Spirit (Matt. 3:16-17 and par.; John 1:29-34), but they are also united with the Son, cooperating permanently with him, being present in him even in or since the very moment of the Son's incarnation, although the Son alone became man (Luke 1:35).

This differentiated yet indivisible action of the three distinct and inseparable divine persons revealed through the mystery of the incarnation of Christ is in fact present in the whole economy of salvation and consequently in the whole life of the church, pointing to the kingdom of God as being the kingdom of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit. This life and activity of the Holy Trinity is an eternal and perfect communion* of love, a permanent movement of mutual and fully free self-offering of each person* to the others and of all of them to the world (John 10:17-18, 17:4; Phil. 2:6-11; Heb. 9:14). The Trinitarian revelation shows that ultimately the truth, life and unity in God are identical with koinonia*/communion.

The Father and the Son sent the Spirit into the world (Luke 4:18) in order that the Son may reveal to the world the love of the Father for it and the future action of the Spirit, who by his personal dwelling in the believers enables them to participate in the eternal love and glory which unite the Father and the Son (John 14:15-26, 15:26, 16:14-15). It is precisely by the dwelling of the Holy Spirit in those who believe in Christ that they can truly confess Jesus Christ as Lord (1 Cor. 12:3) and call God "Abba, Father" (Rom. 8:15-16), for the Spirit alone knows and declares all that the Father possesses and has given to the Son (John 16:13-15).

There is no confusion or subordination among the persons of the Holy Trinity but only mutual self-giving, each person glorifying the others. In fact the unity of the Trinitarian life lies in the movement of perfect mutual self-giving. This Trinitarian unity affirms the communion and distinctiveness of the persons.

The fact that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father (John 15:26) and rests upon the Son or is received by the Son from the Father (John 1:32; Luke 4:18; Acts 2:32-33) allows him to be called the Spirit of God the Father (1 Cor. 2:12, 3:16) and the Spirit of his Son or the Spirit of Christ (Gal. 4:6; Rom. 8:9). Since the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father, he is called the Spirit of God, but he is also called the Spirit of the Son, since he is received by the Son and sent by the Son from the Father, or by the Father in the name of Christ and at the request of Christ (John 14:26, 15:26). Being in a distinct manner the Spirit of the Father and the Spirit of Christ, the one Holy Spirit bears witness to the other two distinct persons in their irreducible distinctiveness: the Father and the Son.

At the same time, the Holy Spirit enables those who believe in Christ to be baptized in the koinonia of the one body of Christ, while preserving their unique identity (1 Cor. 12:13) and helping them to have access to the Father (Eph. 2:18) and to live within the world as adopted sons and daughters of the Father, receiving the same glorious gifts which the risen Jesus Christ received from the Father (Rom. 8:14-18). These gifts of the Father are communicated by the Spirit to those who believe in Christ in order that they may become like his Son, so that the Son should be the firstborn among many brothers and sisters (Rom. 8:29). Those who receive the Holy Spirit know the love of the Father as the Son knows it (John 17:25). In this way the Holy Spirit builds up church life and unity* through the participation of human beings in the life and koinonia of the Holy Trinity. Therefore all sacramental life of the church is accomplished through the action of the Holy Spirit and bears witness to the saving presence of the kingdom of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit within the world, thus preparing believers to long for the revelation of the glorious freedom of the children of God, for which in fact the whole creation is longing (Rom. 8:18-25).

For this reason, the apostolic church early identified baptism* with sharing in the mystery of the cross and resurrection of Christ (Rom. 6:3-4) and in the eternal Trinitarian communion of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:19). The same church experienced in the whole ecclesial celebration both the distinctiveness and the indivisibility of the divine Trinitarian love for humankind (2 Cor. 13:13: "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God and the communion of the Holy Spirit"). To early Christians, this experience of the living presence of the Holy Trinity in church life was so deep and self-evident that they could easily grasp the fact that "the church is full of Trinity" (Origen).

THE TRINITY IN CHURCH HISTORY

The fact that the sharing in the Trinitarian communion of life and love was the cen-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

tre and focus of the new life of the Christians is particularly attested by the baptismal creeds* and rituals of the church but also by its whole sacramental and liturgical life in the first millennium after Christ (and esp. in the Eastern and Oriental churches). The Christological and pneumatological controversies of the 4th and 5th centuries were in fact a challenge for the church to express and defend in more conceptual ways the permanently lived mystery of the divine Triune communion revealed in Christ and communicated by the Spirit to the church.

The doctrine of the Trinity as formulated by the fathers of the church in the Nicene* (325) and Constantinopolitan (381) Creeds and in the Chalcedonian council (451; see Chalcedon) was in fact a great effort to preserve the unity of God, not as an abstract arithmetical or quantitative kind of unity which makes of God an eternal solitude, but precisely the Trinitarian unity as the eternal, indivisible and life-giving communion of the three consubstantial, equal and yet distinct persons, avoiding any separation, confusion and subordination among them. It is precisely the uniqueness of the Trinitarian unity that crucifies the human discursive (or linear) way of thinking.

The dogmatic formula of the council held in Chalcedon in 451 ("one person in two natures") is not primarily an explanation of the mystery of the incarnation of Christ but rather an effort to preserve the fullness of the divine-human communion accomplished and revealed in Christ, in which humanity fully and eternally participates in the life of the Trinity, without confusion or separation between God and humanity. In fact the Chalcedon formula protects the faith of the apostolic church, which recognized and confessed the risen Christ as being at the same time the only begotten Son of God (John 1:14) and "the firstborn among many brethren" (Rom. 8:29 RSV). To Greek philosophy or any human way of thought which is inclined to confound or separate God and humanity in order to obtain artificial unity, the church, inspired by the Spirit of truth (John 15:26) and of communion (2 Cor. 13:13) and faithful to the revelation, opposed a real and authentic theology, i.e. that of the saving and deifying communion.

The Trinitarian unity as mutual self-giving and total sharing of life, love and glory, accomplished through the mutual dwelling of each person in the others (perichoresis), becomes both the supreme model and the ultimate source of church unity (John 17:21-23) and points to the final unity in the glorious kingdom of God, when all of creation will be renewed and united in God (Rev. 21:1-4). In the light of this unity revealed by Christ to his disciples and communicated to the church by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, the fathers of the church took the mysterious plural of the book of Genesis – "Let us make humankind in our image, according to our likeness" (1:26) – as a project of God which anticipates the eschatological unity of all humankind in God. In this respect the patristic doctrine of the Trinity, as expressed in the formulas of the ecumenical councils* and in the sacramental life of the patristic church, has a permanent ecumenical significance precisely because it bears witness to the living apostolic faith that continues throughout the centuries, representing in itself a praise directed to the Trinitarian communion present in the church catholic universal.

THE TRINITY IN THE MODERN ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

The understanding of the Trinity, after many centuries of ecclesiastical polemics and theological controversies, offers a new climate and basis for re-discovering the mystery of the Holy Trinity as the source, model and goal of Christian unity and as the basis for a deep renewal of Christian theology and spirituality. Although the doctrine of the Trinity has not yet been the object of an organized and systematic ecumenical reflection, the ecumenical interest in a common understanding of the centrality of the mystery of the Holy Trinity for the life of the church, and particularly for Christian unity, can be detected in many significant ecumenical events.

Particularly at the demand of the Eastern churches, the Christocentric affirmation of the Amsterdam basis (1948; see WCC, basis of), i.e. "a fellowship of churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour", was placed at New Delhi 1961 into a Trinitarian setting: "to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit". The ecumenical vision of unity formulated at New Delhi is also marked by a Trinitarian perspective: "The love of the Father and Son in the unity of the Holy Spirit is the source and goal of the unity which the Triune God wills for all men and creation... The reality of this unity was made manifest at Pentecost in the gift of the Holy Spirit, through whom we know in this present age the first-fruits of that perfect union of the Son with his Father, which will be known in its fullness only when all things are consummated by Christ in his glory."

This Trinitarian perspective concerning the unity of God and church unity also marked to a certain extent the efforts of the Second Vatican Council* (1962-65) in its teaching on revelation and the mystery of the church. At the same time, the Faith and Order* conference in Montreal (1963) displayed interest in a Trinitarian perspective in its understanding of worship as a "service to God the Father by men redeemed by his Son, who are continually finding new life in the power of the Holy Spirit". Later, when the "conciliar fellowship" model of unity was discussed at the fifth assembly of the WCC (Nairobi 1975), it also appeared necessary to place the deep theological and spiritual understanding of conciliarity in a Trinitarian setting.

Furthermore, the study of the F&O commission on the ecumenical significance of the so-called filioque* controversy ended in 1979 with the recommendation that the meaning of faith in God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, be more fully explored "so that the Holy Trinity may be seen as the foundation of Christian life and experience". Another study of the F&O commission, namely the project "Towards an Ecumenical Explanation of the Apostolic Faith as Expressed in the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed (381)", has been to a certain extent an ecumenical effort to understand the apostolic faith in the Holy Trinity in the light of contemporary challenges (human responsibility for the integrity of creation, women's emancipation in church and society, dialogue with people of other living faiths, etc.). Again, in their evaluation of the Lima document on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry,* many churches expressed their appreciation of the fact that baptism and eucharist are approached in BEM from a Trinitarian perspective.

At the same time, an increasing interest in deeper ecumenical understanding of the significance of the faith in the Holy Trinity for church unity and life in the world is also displayed in many bilateral dialogues. Some examples are the Orthodox-Roman Catholic international dialogue with its first theme "The Mystery of the Church and of the Eucharist in the Light of the Mystery of the Holy Trinity" (1980-82), or the Orthodox-Reformed and Anglican-Orthodox dialogues in which common agreement on the faith in the Holy Trinity appears as a necessary presupposition for a common vision of church unity.

To promote an ecumenical ecclesiology of communion based on an ecumenical reflection on the very nature of the church appears today to be one of the most urgent ecumenical tasks. It calls all churches to rediscover together that the mystery of the Holy Trinity is the very heart of any authentic Christian theology and spirituality. Since, from the Christian point of view, the unity that really matters is a saving and liberating divine-human communion, the ecumenical prayers and theological efforts, and the practical actions have a lasting value when they help us recover the early Christian experience according to which the "church is full of Trinity" amid a creation that is ultimately moving towards the glorious reign of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

See also Anglican-Orthodox dialogue, Orthodox-Reformed dialogue, Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue.

DANIEL CIOBOTEA

- B. Bobrinskoy, Le mystère de la Trinité (ET The Mystery of the Trinity, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1999) ■ L. Boff, La Trinidad, la Sociedad y la Liberación (ET Trinity and Society, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1988) ■ British Council of Churches, The Forgotten Trinity, (1) report of study commission, (2) study guide, London, BCC, 1989 ■ W. Kasper, Der Gott Jesu Christi (ET The God of Jesus Christ, New York, Crossroad, 1984) ■ H.-G. Link ed., One God, One Lord, One Spirit: On the Explanation of the Apostolic Faith Today, WCC, 1988 ■ J. Moltmann, Trinität und Reich Gottes (ET The Trinity and the Kingdom of God, London, SCM Press, 1981) ■ J. L. Segundo, Nuestra Idea de Dios (ET Our Idea of God, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1974) ■ J. Thompson, Modern Trinitarian Perspectives, New York, Oxford UP, 1994 ■ T.F. Torrance, The Christian Doctrine of God: One Being, Three Persons, Edinburgh, Clark, 1996 ■ T.F. Torrance, The Trinitarian Faith: The Evangelical Theology of the Ancient Catholic Church, Edinburgh, Clark, 1988 ■ T.F. Torrance, Trinitarian Perspectives: Towards Doctrinal Agreement, Edinburgh, Clark, 1994 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, "The Basis: Its History and Significance", ER, 38, 2, 1985 ■ G. Wainwright, "The Ecumenical Rediscovery of the Trinity", OC, 34, 2, 1998 ■ J. Zizioulas, Being as Communion, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1985.

TUTU, DESMOND MPILO

B. 7 Oct. 1931, Klerksdorp, Transvaal, South Africa. Tutu, recipient of the 1984 Nobel peace prize and known worldwide for his efforts against apartheid in South Africa, chaired the Truth and Reconciliation Commission 1995-98. He was general secretary of the South African Council of Churches, 1978-85, and in 1987 became president of the All Africa Conference of Churches. He received his theological education at St Peter's Theological College, Rosettenville, Johannesburg, and was ordained an Anglican priest in 1961. A member of the chaplaincy staff of the University of Fort Hare, 1967-69, he then became lecturer in the department of theology of the University of Botswana, Lesotho and Swaziland, 1970-72. After a period in England as assistant director of the Theological Education Fund of the WCC, 1972-75, he returned to serve his church in South Africa in several major positions: as dean of Johannesburg, 1975-76, bishop of Lesotho, 1976-78, bishop of Johannesburg, 1985-86, and archbishop of Cape Town, 1986-96. He was a speaker at the WCC assembly in Vancouver 1983.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ D.M. Tutu, Crying in the Wilderness, London, Mowbray, 1982 ■ Hope and Suffering, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1984 ■ E. Adler, Desmond Tutu, Berlin, Union, 1983 ■ S. Du Boulay, Tutu: Voice of the Voiceless, Harmondsworth, UK, Penguin, 1989.

TYPOI

THE NOTION of typoi, or types (singular typos), adopted from sociology, has been used in ecumenical research to describe the various particular forms that Christian communities or churches may assume within the visible fellowship of the one church.* Some writers have spoken of "typologies" within a single ecclesial allegiance (Bernard Lambert, 1962, Emmanuel Lanne, 1967), but the notion of typos really caught on after an address given by Cardinal Johannes Willebrands in 1972. On the basis of two Vatican II* texts (Unitatis Redintegratio 14 and Lumen Gentium 23) concerning the different forms which the churches of the East and the West had from the start given to their ecclesial life within the communion* of the one, undivided church, Willebrands offered this description of a typos: "Where there is a long coherent tradition commanding men's love and loyalty, creating and sustaining a harmonious and organic whole of complementary elements, each of which supports and strengthens the other, you have the reality of a typos." He went on to indicate certain distinctive elements of a typos: a theological method and approach, a liturgical expression, a spiritual and devotional tradition, a canonical discipline.

Whereas the components of universal communion must be the same in all the churches, i.e. communion in the faith,* sacraments* and ministry,* the characteristic elements of the typoi vary from one church to the other. According to the Vatican II Decree on Ecumenism,* this variety of forms, subsequently called typoi, contributes to "giving ever richer expression to the authentic catholicity and apostolicity of the church". The idea of typoi described by Willebrands was taken up in the Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue* (Facing Unity, 1984, nos 42-43) as one of the models for unity in diversity. The Methodist-Roman Catholic Towards a Statement on the Church (1986) lists it as one "model of organic unity in the koinonia of the one Body of Christ": the notion of typos "implies that within the one church in which there is basic agreement in faith, doctrine and structure essential for mission, there is room for various 'ecclesial traditions', each characterized by a particular style of theology, worship, spirituality and discipline".

See also unity, models of.

EMMANUEL LANNE

■ P.A. Crow, Jr, "Ecumenics as Reflections on Models of Christian Unity", ER, 39, 1987, esp. pp.400-401 ■ J. Willebrands, address in Cambridge, England, Jan. 1972, in Documents on Anglican/Roman Catholic Relations, vol. 1, Washington DC, US Catholic Conference, 1976.

U

UNA SANCTA

THE LATIN words una sancta serve as an abbreviation for the four “marks” attributed to the church* in the Nicene Creed (381): “We believe in one [unam], holy [sanctam], catholic and apostolic church.” The una sancta is thus the church as understood in the ancient professions of faith, almost all of which mention it after their article about the Holy Spirit.* Christian faith in the Triune God (see Trinity) entails also belief in God’s saving deeds, one of which is the founding of the church as the Body of Christ (Rom. 12:4-5; 1 Cor. 12:12-27; Eph. 1:22-23) and as the dwelling place of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 3:16-17; 2 Cor. 6:16). The church is thus an effect of God’s saving action. For patristic authors, this reality was symbolized in the blood (representing the eucharist*) and water (representing baptism*) which flowed from the pierced side of Jesus as he hung on the cross (Augustine, Enarratio in Psalmum 138, 2; John Chrysostom, Catecheses 3,16-19).

This inter-relation has been re-affirmed in ecumenical dialogues: “Christians believe and confess with the creed that there is an indissoluble link between the work of God in Jesus Christ through the Holy Spirit and the reality of the church. This is the testimony of the scriptures” (Faith and Order, Confessing the One Faith, 1991, 216; see also Old Catholic-Orthodox dialogue; Ecclésiology, 1977, III/1, 1-19; and ARCIC II, The Church as Communion, 1990, 25-41). Nevertheless, the church remains human and imperfect. The unity,* holiness,* catholicity* and apostolicity* of the church are gifts which are actualized within the community on its pilgrim journey through time, but which will reach their perfection only in the eschatological reign of God.

In one of his commentaries on the creed, Augustine notes that the church must be understood as existing both “in heaven and on earth” (Enchiridion de fide, spe et caritate 15,56). As such, the una sancta is more extensive than simply the visible church on earth; it includes also those “in heaven”, and thus all of the just who have been saved in Christ from the beginning of time (ecclesia ab Abel). Christian communities relate the una sancta to the historical, visible church in different ways. The Catholic bishops at Vatican II, for example, claimed that the one, holy, catholic, apostolic church “subsists in” the Catholic church, but that many of its elements are also present in other communities (Lumen Gentium 8). Other churches would perhaps identify the una sancta with their own visible community, or deny that it can be so identified with any visible community. The WCC Canberra statement (1991) relates the ecumenical movement to the una sancta, when it states: “The goal of the search for full communion is realized when all the churches are able to recognize in one another the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church in its fullness” (“The Unity of the Church as Koinonia: Gift and Calling”, 2.1).

WILLIAM HENN

■ Y. Congar, L'Église une, sainte, catholique et apostolique, Paris, Cerf, 1970 ■ H. Schütte, “Die Kirche als eine, heilige, katholische und apostolische,” in idem, Kirche im ökumenischen Verständnis, Paderborn, Bonifatius, 1991, 89-123 ■ F.A. Sullivan, The Church We Believe In: One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic, New York, Paulist, 1988.

UNA SANCTA MOVEMENT

THE USM COMES from the ecumenical awakening in Germany during the National Socialist period (1933-45) and after the second world war. Both Roman Catholic and Protestant ministers and laity participated.

Among the earlier currents of the ecumenical movement, the specific ecclesiological, spiritual and dialogical efforts of USM in Germany were part of the stream which stressed the overcoming of confessional divisions by restoring and renewing in the historical form of each church that which the ancient creed characterized as being una (one) and sancta (holy) in its essence (see unity, holiness, catholicity). Anglicans in the 19th century found this emphasis in the Oxford movement, which later influenced the “united but not absorbed churches” formula of the aborted Malines conversations between Anglicans and Roman Catholics in the 1920s. The re-awakening of una sancta* understanding is already expressed in the 1937 world conference of Faith and Order* (Edinburgh) and of Life and Work* (Oxford), when Archbishop Nathan Söderblom of Sweden called for “evangelical catholicity”. And the Hochkirchliche Vereinigung (High Church Union) was emerging in German Protestantism, seeking to restore in the Lutheran church the catholicity of the early undivided church of the creeds, governance and liturgies.

Some Roman Catholic attempts prepared the way for the USM by various movements for church renewal after the first world war, together with a critical awareness of the inadequate nature of catholicity* in terms of the gospel within the actual history of the RCC. Bonn theologian Arnold Rademacher and Paul Simon, dean of Paderborn cathedral, became spokesmen for a “catholicity not constricted by a narrow idea of catholicism” in an effort to promote the “corporate” reunion of the churches. They were in fact supporting Yves Congar, a French Dominican, who in his 1937 Chrétiens désunis claimed: “That... which the separation of our brethren has... realized and actualized” outside the “visible borders” of the Roman Catholic Church “is a loss... to its actual and effective Catholicity.” At the same time, the church historian Joseph Lortz was revising the traditionally harsh RC interpretation of the Reformation* and of Martin Luther’s person and chief concerns.

Max Josef Metzger (1887-1944), a German priest, tapped this increasing readiness for ecumenism. Already in 1920 he was committed to peace among the nations and in society and peace among the Christian confessions, and he began to communicate his convictions in addresses and short articles and in personal contacts, especially with Protestant pacifists in Europe. Metzger secured Vatican permission to be an unofficial observer at the first world conference on Faith and Order (Lausanne 1927), where he was moved by the common prayer of the participants. In 1928 he established the House of Christ the King and the Society of Christ the King at Meitingen-bei-Augsburg. This society was the focal point of the USM, initially called the Una Sancta Fraternity to express the re-awakened self-awareness of "fraternity in Christ across all barriers". In 1939 Metzger organized the first Meitingen ecumenical dialogue.

The USM tasks were to break down misunderstandings and prejudices, to create awareness of common elements in the faith, to test in open encounter and discussion between Roman Catholics and Protestants how far differences might be reconciled, but above all to join in common prayer and to provide a sign of "hope against all hope". After a mock trial by the Nazi people's court for his unswerving convictions, Metzger was executed for high treason on 17 April 1944.

The experiences which German Protestants and Catholics shared in the period of National Socialism, the upheaval in the redistribution of the German population after the war, and the resulting increase in the number of interconfessional marriages brought about a new atmosphere of coexistence. In many places new Una Sancta circles were founded. In 1946 at the Benedictine abbey of Niederalteich, a Una Sancta meeting centre (since 1962, the ecumenical institute) was established, and the abbot, Emmanuel Heufelder, led regular encounters between Roman Catholic and Protestant Christians. The journal Una Sancta developed out of USM circulars.

But the USM was also exposed to negative criticism: among the Protestants, that it was disguised Catholic proselytism; among the Catholics, that it promoted religious indifferentism. A 1948 Vatican monitum, or warning, about RC participation in ecumenical conferences and services, and Vatican Radio commentary that this warning should be a safeguard against an uninhibited growth of the USM, sharpened the negative tone against the USM. Later instruction by the Vatican in December 1949 was more positive in encouraging ecumenical gatherings, but under strictly defined conditions. The success of the Una Sancta event at the world eucharistic congress of 1960 in Munich, however, made clear how far the ecumenical idea had caught the imagination of the Roman Catholic grassroots on the eve of the Second Vatican Council.

After Vatican II (1962-65),* Christians with USM experience were especially valuable members of new ecumenical bodies in Germany. Soon tensions arose, though, between the official ecumenical leaders of the churches and those who daily gave ecumenical witness in their daily lives (e.g. those in mixed marriages* and teachers in schools). To give voice to these grassroots ecumenical experiences in Germany, the USM led in founding the Arbeitsgemeinschaft ökumenischer Kreise (Council of Ecumenical Groups) in 1969.

See Roman Catholic Church and pre-Vatican II ecumenism.

GERHARD VOSS

- K. Kienzler ed., Max Joseph Metzger: Christuszeuge in einer zerrissenen Welt, Freiburg, Herder, 1991
- M. Laros, Schöpferischer Friede der Konfessionen: Die USB, ihr Ziel und ihre Arbeit, Recklinghausen, Paulus, 1950
- L. Swidler, Bloodwitness for Peace and Unity: Life of M.J. Metzger, Denville NJ, Dimension, 1977
- L. Swidler, Ecumenical Vanguard: The History of the Una Sancta Movement, Pittsburgh, Duquesne UP, 1966.

UNEMPLOYMENT

MASS UNEMPLOYMENT became a serious issue in the North after the industrial revolution, when the relative importance of agriculture and other forms of self-employment declined. The depression of the 1930s triggered worldwide concern about the welfare implications of widespread unemployment. The United Nations charter acknowledges such concern, as it calls on governments to take action to promote the achievement of full employment. The Universal Declaration on Human Rights states that "everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work, and to protection against unemployment" (art. 23).

Northern unemployment rates have been high in most of the rich countries of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development since the 1970s. In Central and Eastern Europe, unemployment ballooned after the reforms which started in 1990, and many Southern countries also experience high unemployment and under-employment rates, especially in urban areas.

There is, however, no single universally accepted definition of unemployment. National statistics are not uniform and cannot easily be compared or added. Besides definitional problems, there is the difficulty of measuring under-employment, work done in the so-called informal sector, and clandestine employment.

At present, unemployment is high and growing, particularly in industrial countries, where unemployment affected 35 million people in 1996. In Eastern Europe and the countries of the former Soviet Union, where people were long accustomed to secure and full employment, unemployment skyrocketed since the start of reforms in 1990. Official unemployment statistics in most Southern countries have limited meaning but also there, unemployment problems are acute, especially in urban areas.

The results of unemployment are distributed very unequally among population groups. Hardest hit are the disabled, those who suffer ill health, younger and older workers, women and ethnic minorities.

The issue of unemployment has been on the agenda of the modern ecumenical movement since its beginning. The Anglican Conference on Christian Politics, Economics and Citizenship (COPEC), held in England in 1924 at the initiative primarily of William Temple, called unemployment morally unacceptable and urged that the causes be removed. The COPEC was organized in preparation for the universal Christian conference on Life and Work,* held in Stockholm in 1925, which also spoke about the "tremendous question of unemployment". The message of the conference was sent to the workers in the world "in the name of the Son of Man, the Carpenter of Nazareth". The Life and Work movement established the International Christian Social Institute in Geneva and developed close links with the International Labour Office. Its first major research project was a study of unemployment, a widespread problem during the great depression. A series of national study conferences was organized leading up to an international conference in Basel, which resulted in a pressing appeal to the churches to combat unemployment and to alleviate the distress of those most deeply afflicted.

The great depression also influenced the world conference on "Church, Community and State", which took place in Oxford in 1937. The conference report speaks about unemployment sapping people's strength of body, mind and spirit, and it points to the progressive mechanization of industry, which has periodically thrown large numbers of workers into long periods of unemployment. The threat of unemployment "produces a feeling of extreme insecurity in the minds of masses of the people. Unemployment, especially when prolonged, tends to create in the mind of the unemployed person a sense of uselessness, or even of being a nuisance, and to empty his life of any meaning. This situation cannot be met by measures of unemployment assistance, because it is the lack of significant activity which tends to destroy his human self-respect."

Probably because of the relatively high employment levels after the second world war, the issue of unemployment then received less ecumenical attention. This situation changed when the world economy plunged into a deep recession beginning in 1979. The WCC Sub-unit on Church and Society and the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development organized consultations and published reports on the issue of unemployment as seen from a global perspective. Many WCC member churches and related ecumenical bodies put the issue high on their agendas, organized consultations, published reports and suggested policies to combat rising unemployment.

Most of the churches' activities in this field were based on the conviction that involuntary unemployment is a basic injustice against each person and family suffering from it, that it is an obstacle to the fulfilment of Christian vocation,* and that work is both a right and a need of all persons. However, less attention has been given to the concept of work* as such.

Roman Catholic social teaching has strongly addressed labour issues and the rights of workers. In Gaudium et Spes (1965) and "The Church and Human Rights" (Pontifical Commission Iustitia et Pax, 1974), work is regarded both as a duty and as a right. Pope John Paul II's encyclical Laborem Exercens (1981) stresses the centrality of "suitable employment for all who are capable of it". According to John Paul II: "The opposite of a just and right situation... is unemployment, which in all cases is an evil, and which when it reaches a certain level can become a real social disaster." The pope also stressed "the principle of the priority of labour over capital", stating that "capital, the whole collection of means of production, remains a mere instrument" (see social encyclicals, papal).

The US bishops' "Pastoral Letter on Catholic Social Teaching and the US Economy" (1986) stated bluntly that "people have a right to employment". According to the bishops, "Work with adequate pay for all who seek it is the primary means for achieving basic justice in our society."

Many church statements and studies emphasize the negative social consequences of unemployment – exclusion, social isolation, family breakdown, increase in crime, mounting racism and xenophobia. Reference is often made to the paradox that there is high unemployment while many tasks remain undone, e.g. in the field of care for people in need and for the environment, and that much work is not paid, recognized or counted. Increasing doubt is expressed about the validity of the traditional view that urges economic growth as the solution to unemployment. Indeed, many church pronouncements recognize that the very concept of work and employment needs to be fundamentally re-thought.

ROB VAN DRIMMELEN

- Advisory Group on Economic Matters, Labour, Employment and Unemployment: An Ecumenical Reappraisal, WCC, 1987
- H. Davis & D. Gosling eds, Will the Future Work? Values for Emerging Patterns of Work and Employment, WCC, 1985
- D. Koelega, Unemployment: Work for the Churches, Driebergen, MCKS, 1986
- Unemployment: A Case Study on Contemporary Christian Social Responsibility, Geneva, LWF, 1984
- L. Vischer, Arbeit in

der Krise: Theologische Orientierungen, Neukirchen-Vluyn, Neukirchener Verlag, 1996

- Work in a Sustainable Society (= ER, 48, 3, 1996).

UNIAPAC

THE UNION internationale des associations patronales catholiques (UNIAPAC = which changed its meaning in 1962 to International Christian Union of Business Executives) comprises 26 national associations of Christian business people and managers, principally in western Europe and Latin America, but also in Africa and Asia. Founded in Rome in 1931 by a small group of Roman Catholic Belgian, French and Dutch employers, it expanded and in 1962 became an ecumenical association. The network is committed to studying and spreading the ethical principles of Christian social teaching in economic and social life, particularly at the level of business and management.

From its general secretariat in Brussels, UNIAPAC issues occasional socio-economic papers on, for example, Latin American business investments, the ethical climate in companies, integration of young people into business, the churches and transnational corporations,* and ethical approaches to the international debt question (see debt crisis).

TOM STRANSKY

UNIATES, UNIATISM

THE TERMS "Uniates" and "Uniatism" were originally derived from the act of union which a group of Orthodox in the Ukraine and Poland signed at Brest-Litovsk in 1596 establishing their unity with Rome. These terms, used mainly by the Orthodox who are opposed to this union, have come to include all Eastern-rite Catholics and have a definitely derogatory connotation, resented by those they are applied to.

See Eastern Catholic churches, Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue.

NICHOLAS LOSSKY

- "Balamand Document: Uniatism, Method of Union of the Past, and the Present Search for Full Communion", IS, 83, 2, 1993
- J. Borelli, J.E. Erickson eds, The Quest for Unity: Ortho- dox and Catholics in Dialogue: Documents of the Joint International Commission and Official Dialogues in the United States 1965-1995, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary, 1996 ■ "Les Eglises orientales catholiques et l'oecuménisme, II: Aspects ecclésiologiques du thème" (= IR, 65, 3, 1992).

UNION, ORGANIC

AS THE BODY of Christ, the church* is an organism "joined and knit together by every ligament with which it is equipped as each part is working properly" (Eph. 4:16). Its unity* is therefore properly described as organic. All churches accept and use this biblical language with reference to their own inner life. The debate about organic union arises when churches seeking closer unity have differing views of the way in which unity and diversity are related to each other in the Body of Christ. Churches with similar polities have had little difficulty in entering into organic union. Scores of such intraconfessional unions took place in the 20th century.

The world missionary conference (Edinburgh 1910) debated the respective merits of organic and federal types of union and found strengths and weaknesses in both. Some delegates, notably Charles Brent, Episcopal bishop of the Philippines, were convinced that practical cooperation was not enough and that only a united church could offer a credible invitation to adherents of the great religions of the East. From his initiative came the first call for a world conference on Faith and Order,* and at the initial meeting of those churches which had responded to the call (New York 1913) it was agreed that "while organic unity is the ideal which all Christians should have in their thoughts and prayers", the immediate task was not to propose such unity but to explore patiently the reasons for disunity.

It was no accident that this initiative came from Anglican sources. The movement for cooperation in missions had been, prior to 1910, an affair of Protestant churches of an evangelical persuasion, with the assumption that the questions of faith and order which divided their churches were of small account compared to the task of evangelism.* Anglicans of a Catholic churchmanship could not accept this assumption. As far back as 1870, the American Episcopalian W.R. Huntington had proposed a plan for organic union among the American churches on the basis of what was to become the Chicago-Lambeth Quadrilateral:* scripture,* the ancient creeds,* the sacraments* of baptism* and eucharist,* and the historic episcopate (see episcopacy). In the country of its origin this vision was to be swept aside by the federal ideas which led to the creation of a council of churches (see federalism), but it provided the basis for the appeal to all Christian people issued by the Lambeth conference of 1920. The vision offered in this appeal was of "an outward, visible and united society, holding one faith, having its own recognized officers, using God-given means of grace, and inspiring all its members to the worldwide service of the kingdom of God".

This appeal and Anglican initiatives flowing from it occupied centre stage in unity discussions for the next 40 years. Its proposal of the historic episcopate as the visible centre around which unity could be restored was both its strength and the stone of stumbling for churches not episcopally ordered.

When the first world conference on F&O met in Lausanne in 1927, the only section which was not able to produce a report acceptable to the whole conference was section 7 on the unity of Christendom and the relation thereto of existing churches. Anglican members of the conference held that the report gave too much emphasis to cooperation in practical tasks and not enough to unity in faith and order. The second F&O conference (Edinburgh 1937) discussed the issue under the three headings: cooperative action, intercommunion,* and corporate union. The last is described as "the final goal" but also as the most difficult.

The formation of the WCC in 1948 created a new situation in which it became immediately necessary to assure member churches (esp. the Orthodox) that by joining the Council they had not committed themselves to any particular conception of union. This assurance was given in the Toronto statement* of the central committee (1950), which affirmed that the Council was a forum for the discussion of this question but did not prejudice the outcome. In the following decade there was intense discussion of the nature of the unity we seek, leading to the formulation of the New Delhi statement of 1961 (see unity of "all in each place"). This statement does not use the term but expresses what has generally been understood as organic union. At no point before or after this statement has the WCC committed itself so explicitly to the goal of organic union.

But by the time this statement was made, changes were afoot which would alter the terms of debate. At New Delhi the Orthodox churches of the Eastern bloc, hitherto outside the Council, became full members exercising increasing influence in all its thinking. None of these had been involved in discussion of organic union with non-Orthodox churches. At the same time the Second Vatican Council* brought the Roman Catholic Church for the first time into full participation in the discussions of faith and order. Its immense influence, and its character as a single supra-national church, shifted the focus away from local moves for organic union and towards the relations of the World Confessional Families with Rome and with one another. The suggestion of Cardinal Willebrands that the aim should not be organic union but rather the coexistence of different "types" of church life was widely canvassed (see typoi).

In the ensuing years, while intraconfessional unions of an organic type continued to occur, the only area in which the Lambeth appeal led to organic union between episcopal and non-episcopal churches was the Indian sub-continent. Numerous attempts in other parts of the world failed. And (perhaps partly because of wider political changes) the Anglican communion no longer played the leading role in initiating moves for union which it had played earlier in the century. Moreover, movements in biblical scholarship eroded the assumption which lay behind the Lambeth appeal, namely that our task is to restore an original organic unity which has been lost. Much New Testament scholarship claims to show that such unity did not exist in the primitive church. And meanwhile the growth of para-church organizations and of church base communities* in many parts of the world has strengthened the tendency to bypass the issues of faith and order which divide the great communions and to concentrate on practical issues of peace* and justice.* Organic union does not appear urgent.

It would seem, however, that as long as churches continue to use and to cherish the language of scripture about the Body of Christ, the issue of organic union can never be ignored. The periodic conferences of united and uniting churches* continue to bear witness to the fruitfulness of unions among churches of different polities. However difficult the way, it is hard to believe that anything can be the final goal except the organic unity of one body. But, as Stephen Neill remarks at the end of his survey of unions achieved and contemplated: "The final and terrible difficulty is that churches cannot unite unless they are willing to die" (HI-I, 495).

See also unity, models of; unity, ways to.

LESLIE NEWBIGIN

- J. Borrelli, J.H. Erickson eds, The Quest for Unity: Orthodox and Catholics in Dialogue: Documents of the Joint International Commission and Official Dialogues in the United States 1965-1995, Crestwood NY, St Vladimir's Seminary Press, 1996
- G. Gassmann, Konzeptionen der Einheit in der Bewegung für Glauben und Kirchenverfassung, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979.

UNIQUENESS OF CHRIST

IF JESUS CHRIST* is not unique, then it must be that either the Word of God has become personally incarnate in others also (which would be a highly unusual position in Christian thinking), or else Jesus himself is something less than the incarnation of the second person of the Trinity* (an opinion which would be definitely heretical). Some seek to evade the ontological problem by denying that the (divine) salvation* of humankind requires such a "metaphysical" basis, or by softening the question of uniqueness to one of degree rather than kind, a relative rather than an absolute matter.

Of those who question that Jesus Christ is "the Saviour of the world" (John 4:42; or "the Light of the world", "the Life of the world", "the Hope of the world", to cite the attributions made at several WCC assemblies*), while still holding to the possibility of human salvation, the most radical are those who consider that salvation may come by other routes (whether such routes pluralistically include the way of Christ or Christ is excluded in favour of another path). While, by definition, no Christian can espouse the second possibility (the denial of any saving value to Christ), some who claim to be Christian theologians have recently argued for the first, namely that Christ is (simply, and perhaps not even pre-eminently) one access to salvation (e.g. see Hick & Knitter). Evangelism,* if practised at all, will not have much urgency in this perspective. The problem, however, is whether salvation means the same thing when the saviours are different, and whether different saviours mean different “gods” (see God). In 2000 the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, in the declaration Dominus Iesus signed by the Cardinal Prefect Joseph Ratzinger and ratified by Pope John Paul II, found it necessary to remind bishops, theologians and faithful of the Catholic doctrine concerning Jesus Christ as the sole Saviour of the world – doing so in the face of “relativistic attitudes towards truth” and the failure to distinguish between the revealed faith of Christianity and other religious aspirations.

Hitherto Christians have held that human salvation depends in some way on Christ. From the beginning of Christianity, Christians have had to face the question concerning people who lived before the time of Jesus. With regard to the righteous in ancient Israel, the answer was reached quite quickly: they had believed in the same God, who would later reveal himself in the incarnation* of the Son and the pentecostal gift of the Spirit. Abraham’s faith was reckoned to him for righteousness (Rom. 4:3); Abraham and Isaiah had “seen” Christ’s “day” and his “glory” (John 8:56, 12:41). With regard to the pagans, Justin Martyr held that the good Greeks who had lived “according to the Logos” (which “enlightens every one”, John 1:9) were Christians avant la lettre (Apology 1.46). Perhaps the same principle can be applied, even in the Christian era, to those who never hear Christ preached. For pagans, according to Paul, “what the law requires written on their hearts” (Rom. 2:15), and they may “do by nature what the law requires” (2:14 RSV), and in the divine judgment there will be “glory and honour and peace for everyone who does good” (2:10; see also 2:16; 2 Cor. 5:10). By virtue of the Logos (which became personally incarnate in Jesus Christ, John 1:14) or the law (for, according to Justin Martyr, Christ himself was the fulfilment of the promise of “an eternal law and a new covenant for the whole world”, Dialogue with Trypho, 43, cf. 11,51,122; see already 1 Cor. 1:30), a reference to Christ is here maintained.

A modern version of this position is the “anonymous Christians” of Karl Rahner. Although those so designated may reject the designation for various reasons (e.g. considering it to be “Christian imperialism”), some such accounting seems from a Christian standpoint to be both necessary (“No one comes to the Father except through me”, John 14:6; see also Matt. 11:27) and possible (“And I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all people to myself”, John 12:32), if salvation is already to be found outside the historic Christian community; it allows Christians to discern, rejoice in, and be grateful for “signs of Christ” beyond the bounds of the institutional church. Thus M.M. Thomas envisages a “koinonia in Christ” that includes not only those who acknowledge “the person of Jesus as the Messiah” but also, at different levels, “people of different faiths inwardly being renewed by their acknowledgment of the ultimacy of the pattern of suffering servanthood as exemplified by the crucified Jesus” and, even more broadly, people engaged in “the power-political struggle for new societies and a world community based on secular or religious anthropologies informed by the agape of the cross” (Risking Christ, 119). Ontologically, this view would seem to imply the saving presence of Christ among and with all such people. Or if a similar vision is phrased in terms of the Spirit, then it will be remembered that in Christian teaching the Holy Spirit is never separated from the Son – who was incarnate in Jesus Christ. In such a perspective, evangelism will be seen as the effort to bring people to an explicit faith in Christ and a deliberate discipleship to him.

Other Christians remain doubtful about the notion of “anonymous Christians” or a vision such as that of Thomas. They will appeal to Acts 4:12: “There is salvation in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved" (RSV), and see this "name" to require confession that "Jesus is Lord" (Rom. 10:8-13) to the point of receiving baptism* in the Triune name (Matt. 28:19-20; Mark 16:15-16). The preaching of the gospel will then be regarded as an act of rescue towards those who are otherwise perishing (Rom. 10:14-17; John 3:18,36).

Doxologically, Christians have always affirmed the uniqueness of Christ in a strong sense, attributing the gift of salvation to him and ascribing him universal significance, all in closest association with the Father and the Holy Spirit. In what appears to be liturgical language, all things are said to be made "through him" and "for him" (John 1:1-3,14; 1 Cor. 8:6; Col. 1:15-20; Heb. 1:1-3). Because he has been given "all authority in heaven and on earth", he can instruct his followers to "make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Matt. 28:18-19). An early hymn looks to the time when "at the name of Jesus every knee [will] bend, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:10-11). A "great multitude... from every nation, from all tribes and peoples and languages" will cry: "Salvation belongs to our God who is seated upon the throne, and to the Lamb" (Rev. 7:9-10). Meanwhile, God's blessings descend, and our prayers ascend, "through Jesus Christ our Lord", while "Father, Son and Holy Spirit" are worshipped and glorified together. The doctrinal account of this doxology is given in the dogma* of the Trinity, which is epistemologically grounded in the history of Jesus (incarnation, life, death, resurrection, exaltation), which itself rests ontologically on the reality of the Triune God.

How, or whether, all will finally, by God's grace* and with God's help, be saved is not yet given to human knowledge (see universalism).

See also dialogue, interfaith; mission; redemption; revelation.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

■ R.F. Berkey, S.A. Edwards eds, Christology in Dialogue, Cleveland, Pilgrim, 1993 ■ G. D'Costa ed., Christian Uniqueness Reconsidered:

The Myth of a Pluralistic Theology of Religions, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1990 ■ J. Hick & P.F. Knitter eds, The Myth of Christian Uniqueness, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1987 ■ G. Moran, Uniqueness: Problem or Paradox in Jewish and Christian Traditions, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1992 ■ L. Newbigin, "The Christian Faith and the World Religions", in Keeping the Faith, G. Wainwright ed., Philadelphia, Fortress, 1988 ■ L. Newbigin, The Gospel in a Pluralist Society, WCC, 1989 ■ J. Ries, Les chrétiens parmi les religions: Des Actes des Apôtres à Vatican II, Paris, Desclée, 1987 ■ M.M. Thomas, Risking Christ for Christ's Sake, WCC, 1987 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, No Other Name: The Choice between Syncretism and Christian Universalism, London, SCM Press, 1963.

UNITARIAN UNIVERSALISM

UNITARIAN Universalism fuses two religious traditions: the Unitarian, which derives its name from its belief in the unity of God (as contrasted with a Trinitarian view), and the Universalist, which holds to the doctrine of universal salvation,* in the conviction that a loving God could never condemn human beings to the fires of hell (see universalism).

Unitarianism traces its roots to On the Errors of the Trinity, written in 1531 by the 20-year-old Michael Servetus, who found no sound basis in scripture for the doctrine of the Trinity.* (Servetus was burned at the stake in Calvin's Geneva in 1553.) Unitarian ideas, including the belief that Jesus saved human beings not by dying for them but by setting an example for them to follow, were spread widely throughout Poland by Faustus Socinus (1539-1604) and the so-called Polish Brethren. As an organized movement, however, Unitarianism first received official recognition in 1569 when the only Unitarian king in history, John Sigismund (1540-71) of Transylvania, issued an act of religious tolerance and freedom of conscience.

The first Unitarian congregation in England was formed in 1774 by Theophilus Lindsey, and in the USA in 1782 by James Freeman. But the movement in the USA did not become organized and coherent until after William Ellery Channing had preached his Baltimore sermon "Unitarian Christianity" in 1819; to traditional Unitarian views he added a rational approach to the interpretation of scripture and opposition to the Calvinist doctrine of original sin.* The following years witnessed the division of New England Congregationalism into Trinitarian and Unitarian branches. The American Unitarian Association was founded in 1825.

While universalist views of salvation had spread widely in England in the late 17th and early 18th centuries, universalism as an organized movement was principally a US phenomenon, founded by John Murray. In his Treatise on Atonement (1805) Hosea Ballou taught a Unitarian view of God and argued that the Bible ought to be interpreted in the light of reason. The Universalist Church of America traces its formal beginnings to 1793.

A growing commonality of belief resulted in the formal institutional merger of the two North American movements in 1961 with the formation of the Unitarian Universalist Association* – a creedless denomination which encourages its members to seek religious truth out of their own reflection and experience. While Unitarian (Universalism) is found in its largest numbers in North America, Unitarians who still practise their faith are in Romania (80,000), India (9000), Great Britain (8000) and in smaller groups in over 20 other countries.

Unitarian (Universalism) teaches tolerance and respect for other religious viewpoints. Unitarians were the founders in 1901 of the oldest continuing international interfaith organization in the world, now known as the International Association for Religious Freedom.*

WILLIAM F. SCHULZ

■ J.L. Adams, On Being Human Religiously, Boston, Beacon, 1976 ■ J. Buehrens & F. Church, Our Chosen Faith, Boston, Beacon, 1989 ■ D. Robinson, The Unitarians and the Universalists, Westport CT, Greenwood Press, 1985.

UNITARIAN UNIVERSALIST ASSOCIATION

THE UUA RESULTED from a 1961 merger between the American Unitarian Association (1825) and the Universalist Church of America (1793). It consists of over 1000 congregations with about 215,000 members, located principally in the US and Canada.

While not permitted on doctrinal grounds to be a member of the WCC or national councils of churches, the UUA works closely with those and other ecumenical and interfaith bodies on social justice issues and is a founding member of the International Association for Religious Freedom.*

UUA headquarters are in Boston. It produces the bimonthly Journal of the UUA (Beacon).

WILLIAM F. SCHULZ

UNITED AND UNITING CHURCHES

IN BROADEST definition, united churches are national or regional churches (as distinguished from union parishes or congregations) formed by the union of two or more previously separated denominations. These may be churches within the same confessional family, such as the United Methodist Church (USA) or churches from different confessional traditions, such as the Church of South India (CSI), which in 1947 brought together Anglican, Methodist, Reformed and Congregationalist streams. While intraconfessional unions can be both ecumenically significant and difficult to achieve, it is the transconfessional churches that have attracted most ecumenical attention; this article focuses on these.

There is no typical united church, but the following characteristics generally hold true. First, united churches have achieved “organic” or structural union (see union, organic) in the sense that they can make common decisions of faith and order,* mission* and the use of their own resources. This distinguishes them from relationships of “full communion” between still-separate churches (see communion). Second, they are worshipping faith communities, with their own patterns of authorized ministry (see ministry in the church). This distinguishes them from councils or federations of churches (see councils of churches, federalism). Next, they seek to give theological expression to the gospel in the context more of the present ecumenical movement than of inherited confessions. Fourth, while they certainly do not abandon the vision of universal Christian fellowship, they are committed to manifest the unity* of the church* in their particular nation, region or culture* (e.g. the United Church of Christ in the Philippines or the Church of North India). Finally, their self-understanding is, to a considerable extent, shaped by an intentional act of “uniting” through which a new churchly identity has been assumed.

Beyond this, united churches manifest great diversity. Most are the result of decades of negotiation and planning, but others came quickly into being, e.g. the United Church of Christ in Japan (Kyodan), formed as a result of governmental mandate in 1941. A few are episcopally ordered (see episcopacy), usually because Anglicans have been involved in the union; others have a basically connectional polity, having been formed by the union of Reformed (Presbyterian), Methodist, Congregationalist, Disciples, Baptist or Brethren churches (see church order). In most cases, the confessional identities of the negotiating churches are superseded by the identity of the united body (though distinctive ways of worship or confessions of faith from the parent traditions may well be preserved), but others (e.g. the Church of Christ in Zaire) understand themselves as united while allowing the previous denominations to continue as identifiable communities within the new church structure.

Most churches which think of themselves as united are products of the 20th-century ecumenical movement; the Evangelical Church of the Union (EKU), however, which stems from early-19th-century efforts in Prussia to heal the division between Lutherans and Calvinists, is a central participant in gatherings of united churches. The majority of united churches have originated since the second world war in formerly colonized nations where confessional divisions have little historical significance and where the need for a common Christian witness is intensely felt (see colonialism). The first major union of the modern ecumenical movement, however, was that of the United Church of Canada in 1925.

The difficulty with definition also makes it hard to determine the precise number of united churches. According to the “Survey of Church Union Negotiations”, compiled by the WCC’s Faith and Order staff and published biennially in The Ecumenical Review, more than 20 transconfessional united churches, representing more than 65 former church bodies, have come into existence since the second world war, and several of these (e.g. the United Protestant Church of Belgium, the United Reformed Church in the United Kingdom and the United Church of Jamaica and the Cayman Islands) have undertaken more than one union process.

Advocates of church union often defend their vision with various arguments. First, the New Testament speaks positively of the church in different places (e.g. Rome or Corinth) but not of different “types” (e.g. Apollos or Paul [1 Cor. 1]). Second, confessional labels seem to undermine the Christian claim to be a reconciled and reconciling people (see reconciliation) and thus damage the churches’ witness to Christ, especially in places where Christians are a minority. Third, for unity to be meaningful, it must make a difference to the way Christians live their lives in local communities; it must find visible, structured embodiment through which Christians take direct, active responsibility for one another. Fourth, united churches, by avoiding duplication and competition, are better stewards of resources; they are also able to bring these resources to bear on new issues of witness and service in a concentrated way. Fifth, those who have undergone union generally testify that, while painful, it has led to enrichment and renewal. They would agree with these sentences from the WCC’s New Delhi assembly (1961): “The achievement of unity will involve nothing less than a death and rebirth of many forms of church life as we have known them. We believe that nothing less costly can finally suffice.”

United churches may be called “uniting” in the sense that they generally view themselves as but a stage in the process of seeking the unity of “all in each place”.* At least one united church, the Uniting Church in Australia, has incorporated this understanding into its name. The term “uniting churches” is also used, however, with reference to churches that are currently participating in conversations which intend church union.

Church-union committees often report that questions of polity (esp. the reconciliation of ministries) and the fear of losing a sense of ecclesial identity are the most stubborn obstacles to union. The socio-political context can also be a very important factor. A proposed union of Anglican, Methodist and Presbyterian churches in Nigeria was postponed in 1965 due to legal challenges. Two months after postponement, a military coup overthrew the civilian government and led to civil war and the abandonment of plans for a united church. In Sri Lanka, decades of careful preparation were left unfulfilled by litigation and ethnic violence.

RECENT TRENDS

The creation of united churches through structured, "organic" union was, for much of this century, a favoured strategy for ecumenical advance. The New Delhi assembly, which spoke of the unity we seek as a "fully committed fellowship" of "all in each place", contributed to an unprecedented surge in union activity. Between 1965 and 1972, united churches were born in Zambia, Jamaica and Grand Cayman, Madagascar, Ecuador, Papua New Guinea and the Solomon Islands, Belgium, North India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Zaire and Great Britain.

During this same period, however, mounting criticism was directed against the idea of church union. Many church leaders, especially in developing countries (where the call to united churches had been so prominent), began to argue that overcoming confessional differences through corporate union should not be their primary agenda. The major challenges before the church, they maintained, are political and social injustice or threats to peace; and the deepest source of division between Christians is not their denominational identity but their differing responses to such issues. The tremendous effort expended on uniting would thus be better spent on the struggles against racism* or hunger or nuclear weapons.

The 1960s also marked the official entry of the Roman Catholic Church into the ecumenical movement. This development quickly transformed discussions about what unity entails and how it is to be realized. The idea of union which develops a new identity among churches in various regional or national settings is at odds with Roman Catholic ecclesiology. Far preferable, from the RC perspective, are "bilateral dialogues" (see dialogue, bilateral), which seek the reconciliation of theological differences between globally organized Christian World Communions* (CWCs, e.g. the Lutheran World Federation). These conversations, far from undermining confessional identity, have tended to strengthen it. They have also helped to shift the ecumenical spotlight away from national-level church union.

Such challenges have contributed to several new developments in the search for church union. Union negotiations are increasingly unwilling to talk about unity across doctrinal and structural barriers apart from issues which divide the human community (e.g. racial discrimination or poverty). It is now widely affirmed that inclusive community and greater sensitivity to the needs of mission are not simply the byproducts of union. As authentic marks of what it means to be the church, they must be central to the uniting process itself.

There is broad agreement that visible unity must be realized "in stages". Several union efforts (e.g. the Commission of the Covenanted Churches in Wales and the Consultation on Church Union* [COCU, USA]) have established or are trying to establish "covenants" (involving such agreements as the mutual recognition of members, mutual recognition or reconciliation of ministries, regular eucharistic sharing and common mission) as a way of moving towards deeper fellowship (see covenanting). Church union, in other words, is viewed not as an all-or-nothing, one-time achievement but as a process of gradual growth that allows the churches to strengthen their commitment to each other through interim steps. There seems to be less preconceived adherence to a particular "model" of union (e.g. "the CSI plan") than in the past. The COCU, for example, in its 1988 text (Churches in Covenant Communion), speaks of its proposed covenant as an expression of unity in its own right (though one which must deepen and expand) and not simply an interim stage.

In line with the previous point, churches in various parts of the world are now exploring other models while yet identifying themselves with the basic vision of united churches. A good example is the joint council of the Church of North India, the Church of South India, and the Mar Thoma Church. For some time these churches have had relationships of full communion.* The current joint council seeks to give visible expression to the churches' "organic oneness" while still maintaining certain of their distinguishing features, such as liturgical language (see denominationalism). In Italy the Waldensians and Methodists refer to their covenant as a united church, although both keep their specific identities. In 1984, the 54 member denominations of the Council of Churches in Indonesia redefined their relationship under a new name – the Communion of Churches in Indonesia. Unity, they contended, will not come by the negotiations of official representatives but gradually through the common will and actions of "all the church members of all levels... and in all places".

This quotation indicates a fourth trend: less interest in developing national plans of union and more attention to building relationships at the grassroots level. This trend is consistent with recent ecumenical emphasis on unity as koinonia. Indeed, in such places as England and New Zealand "local ecumenical partnerships"* (united or cooperating parishes) seem to be exerting the greatest pressure for church unity.

United churches and church union negotiations are attempting to relate their work and vision more deliberately to the wider ecumenical picture, including the bilateral conversations between CWCs and the multilateral efforts of F&O (e.g. Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry). Recent meetings of united churches speak frequently of the dangers of a competitive ecumenism which polarizes the search for unity (e.g. union with Protestants or closer relations with Rome, international theological dialogues or national union conversations).

Many of these developments have received focused attention at a series of F&O consultations which involve representatives from united and uniting churches around the world. Six such meetings between 1967 and 1995 exchanged information, sought solutions to common problems, lifted up the vision of church union and strengthened relations between these churches (the seventh is scheduled for September 2002). Of particular interest is the relationship of Kirchengemeinschaft ("full communion", involving mutual recognition and accountability) between the Evangelical Church of the Union in Germany and the United Church of Christ in the US.

ECUMENICAL SIGNIFICANCE

The debate between united churches and the CWCs is a useful framework for describing the contribution of united churches to the wider ecumenical movement. For example, the CWCs acknowledge the importance of unity "in each place", yet they tend to emphasize that the church is a universal fellowship which transcends national and cultural boundaries. On the other hand, united churches affirm that unity must be "in all places", yet they see their task as witnessing to the need for a visible, embodied fellowship in each particular location. They remind the ecumenical movement that the church can manifest catholicity by its ability to give common witness in a variety of cultural settings.

The CWCs frequently stress the historical continuity of the church's faith and life, especially as this finds expression in the various confessional traditions. Advocates for church union insist that, while continuity is important, the presently divided church will also need to be transformed if it is to show forth more fully its given unity in Christ. They remind the ecumenical movement that the search for unity is never without cost.

The bilateral dialogues carried on by CWCs emphasize the need for extensive theological consensus as a prerequisite for consideration of structured commitment between church families. United churches, while by no means ignoring the importance of theological work, have stressed that the building of trust and commitment through structural forms of interaction is at least as essential to the search for unity as theological agreement. They remind the ecumenical movement that one must not minimize "non-theological factors", such as fear of change and institutional inertia. These churches also affirm that unity grows as much after union as before it. As a result, many united churches leave the development of constitutions, statements of faith and worship materials to the period after the new church is inaugurated.

United churches may be the place where the ecumenical vision of Christ's one Body is most concretely tested and experienced. Visible unity often seems, at best, like a distant goal. Yet every week millions of Christians, once divided at the Lord's table, break bread together within communities that have made a deliberate decision to grow beyond past separations. This can be an important sign of hope.

See local church; unity, models of; unity, ways to.

MICHAEL KINNAMON

- T.F. Best ed., Built Together: The Present Vocation of United and Uniting Churches (Eph. 2:22). The Sixth International Consultation of United and Uniting Churches, WCC, 1996
- T.F. Best ed., Living Today towards Visible Unity: The Fifth International Consultation of United and Uniting Churches, WCC, 1988
- M. Kinnamon ed., Unity: In Each Place... In All Places: United Churches and the Christian World Communions, WCC, 1983
- M. Kinnamon & T.F. Best eds, Called to Be One in Christ: United Churches and the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1985
- "Sixth International Consultation", ER, 47, 4, 1995
- "Survey of Church Union Negotiations", ER, 1954 and every 2-3 years
- D. Robinson, "Conversion and Identity: The United Churches: Origins, Progress, Relationships", ER, 47, 4, 1995.

UNITED NATIONS

THE UNITED Nations was established in 1945 "to maintain international peace and security", "to develop friendly relations among nations", "to achieve international cooperation in solving international problems" and for "promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms".

Before the first world war the system for limiting international conflict and avoiding war consisted mainly of certain generally accepted principles of international law, supported by certain understandings as to spheres of influence and by alliances to maintain balances of power, as a means of discouraging any nation from dominating the world. The system broke down with the first world war, and at the end of the war the League of Nations was established. The basic concept of the league was that its members should be protected by collective action from aggression. The number of league members varied. At the beginning, in 1920, it included 42 states, and in 1939 there were 58 members. In the 20 years of the league's activity, events did not fulfill expectations. The support its members gave to the league was halting and reluctant, and certain states, dissatisfied with the post-war arrangements, were determined to destroy it.

During the second world war it was realized that a universal organization dealing with collective security after the war could no longer be the League of Nations. The charter for the United Nations was drawn up by the representatives of 50 countries at the UN Conference on International Organization, which met at San Francisco from 25 April to 26 June 1945. The UN officially came into existence on 24 October 1945, when the charter had been ratified by China, France, the USSR, the UK and the USA and by a majority of other signatories at the conference. As of 2000 it had a membership of 189 nations.

The principal organs of the UN are the general assembly, the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council, the Trusteeship Council, the International Court of Justice, and the secretariat. The general assembly is the main deliberative organ, the only one composed of all the UN member states. The Security Council's task is to promote international peace and security. The Economic and Social Council promotes world cooperation on economic, social, cultural and humanitarian problems. The Trusteeship Council has supervised the UN Trust Territories through the administering authorities to promote the political, economic, social and educational advancement of the inhabitants towards self-government or independence. The International Court of Justice is the principal judicial organ of the UN.

The secretariat consists of the secretary-general and the staff. The secretary-general is the chief administrative officer of the organization, elected for a five-year term by the general assembly on the recommendation of the Security Council.

The Security Council has five permanent members: People's Republic of China, France, Russia, the UK and the USA. The remaining ten members are elected by the general assembly for two-year periods.

The original UN charter has remained unchanged. It thus largely reflects perceptions about international relations which pre-date the second world war and the nuclear age and does not adequately represent the realities today. However, any attempt to change the charter will likely face enormous difficulties.

The constraints the charter itself puts on the UN in fulfilling its mandate should be taken into account in assessing its achievements and failures. Of fundamental importance is the doctrine of national sovereignty, for "the organization is based on the principle of sovereign equality of all its members" (art. 2). The doctrine of national sovereignty is reflected in several provisions of the charter, e.g. "the domestic jurisdiction provision" in article 2 and the inadequate provisions regarding the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice and the enforcement of its judgments. Closely related is the tendency on the part of the major powers – who are also members of the Security Council – to protect and expand their spheres of influences. Any improvement in relations among the major powers thus greatly enhances the capacity of the UN to fulfill its mandate.

To its credit, the UN has helped to keep peace in many conflicts and has successfully resolved disputes in some important instances. Its efforts at peace-keeping have been more successful than those for peace-making. The secretary-general establishes and maintains channels of contact and negotiations with states, thus providing for eventual settlements of disputes. There are many failures and evident inadequacies in the system of the UN and its functioning.

The accomplishments of the UN in humanitarian, development and cultural fields are commendable. UN bodies and agencies like the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, the UN Children's Fund, the UN Development Programme, the Food and Agriculture Organization, the UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization and the World Health Organization have made substantial contributions in alleviating human suffering and in laying the foundations for development in many countries.

Notwithstanding the substantial achievements, the UN system must become stronger in anticipating and responding to major humanitarian issues.

One of the important objectives of the UN is to promote respect for, and to address fundamental violations of, human rights. The Commission on Human Rights is the main forum where member states consider the practical application of the charter, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the instruments codified through the organization. Non-governmental organizations play an important role in providing information to the commission on violations of human rights in different parts of the world. The Centre for Human Rights is the principal secretariat organ in charge of following up matters related to human rights.

Work on human rights focuses primarily on the responsibility of states. A major breakthrough occurred in July 1998 when the statute of the International Criminal Court was adopted, providing for the first time jurisdiction over individual persons for the most serious international crimes (esp. genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and crimes of aggression). The court will be established in The Hague when 60 states have ratified the statute. By mid-2001, a total of 139 states had signed it, and 35 ratified.

The UN provides several venues for the promotion of disarmament. It is a unique public forum for the articulation and debate of proposals of disarmament before the world community. It provides a practical negotiating forum in the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva. The UN also has the capacity to monitor or manage arms-limitation agreements.

With the end of the cold war easing long years of deadlock on security issues, the Security Council operates closer to the intention of the charter than at any time in history and has been active in a number of trouble spots. However, there is strong criticism of the dominant role played by the United States in the Security Council.

In the recent past the UN has taken action in a number of situations that might be described as internal conflicts of member countries. Actions with regard to northern Iraq, the former Yugoslavia, Somalia and Cambodia, though of different character, have raised critical questions about the role of the international community in internal conflicts and the expanding jurisdiction of the UN.

The WCC's Commission of the Churches on International Affairs, which has consultative status with the Economic and Social Council of the UN (and with all major specialized agencies), represents the WCC in the UN system.

The WCC has supported the UN from the very beginning. Secretary-general Dag Hammarskjöld addressed the second assembly of the WCC (Evanston 1954). On the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the UN, the central committee (1985) re-affirmed support for the UN "as the principal organization of the world community in defence of the common good of humankind". As a non-member state, the Vatican has a permanent observer status at the UN.

NINAN KOSHY

■ Basic Facts about the United Nations, New York, UN, 2001 ■ Everyone's United Nations, New York, UN, 1986 ■ N. Koshy, Churches in the World of Nations, WCC, 1994 ■ A. Parsons, From Cold War to Hot Peace: UN Interventions, 1947-1995, London, Penguin, 1995 ■ K. Raiser, "The United Nations and the WCC: Rights and Justice", ER, 47, 3, 1995 ■ The UN in Its Second Half-Century, report of the independent working group on the future of the UN, New York, 1995.

UNITY

CHRISTIANS confess the church* as "one, holy, catholic and apostolic" (Nicene Creed,* 381). Even where this creed is not in official use, the oneness of the church of Jesus Christ is affirmed. Thus the unity of the church, while it is a goal yet to be realized in history,* has as its essential presupposition the already-given oneness of the church. The ecumenical task, then, is to manifest this oneness, to make it visible and effective.

Both this indicative and this imperative are grounded in biblical witness. The New Testament writings refer in a great variety of ways and images to the oneness or unity of the church as one of the fundamental characteristics of its nature and mission (see also New Testament and Christian unity, images of the church). This unity, as well as the very being of the church, is grounded in and reflects the unity of the Trinity.* As there is only one God,* one Lord (see Jesus Christ, uniqueness of Christ), one Holy Spirit* and one communion* among them, there can be only one church: the one people of God,* the one Body of Christ, the one temple of the Holy Spirit. This God-given unity is constantly sustained by the proclamation of the one gospel, the celebration of the one baptism* as incorporation into the one body, and the eucharistic communion (see eucharist) with Christ in the Holy Spirit and with one another. It becomes visible in the koinonia* within and between Christian communities, in their confession of the same faith,* in spiritual and sacramental fellowship, in mutual love, in the common service of the multiple gifts of the Spirit given to all, in the upbuilding of each community and of their communion with each other through a common apostolic ministry (see ministry in the church). It becomes effective in the world through common service (see diakonia) and witness* in continuing the mission of Christ. These basic lines of the biblical witness were expressed not as a theoretical system but in direct relation to the emerging early Christian community, and they are often formulated as exhortations and challenges addressed to communities whose internal unity or whose bond of unity among them was threatened from within or outside.

THE STRUGGLE FOR UNITY

From NT times church history has been deeply marked by the tension between the confession of the given oneness of the church of Jesus Christ and the historical reality of division within Christianity (see schism). The implications of these divisions for the oneness of the church of Christ as confessed in the creed have been and still are interpreted differently by the different Christian traditions. Some claim that the one church is preserved in their own tradition, others have seen in the divided Christian traditions "branches" of the one tree, while yet others have come to the recognition that the divisions break up the Body of Christ and are therefore to be regarded as sinful (see sin). Yet, whatever the explanations, there was a growing general recognition before, and even more so after, the turn of the 20th century that a divided Christianity is a counter-witness against the confession of the one church and thus contradicts the gift, will and prayer of Jesus Christ. This recognition brought about the modern ecumenical movement, which sought to reverse church history from a history of division to a movement towards unity.

With the establishment of the WCC in 1948, the aspirations and efforts for unity received a new and effective instrument. Accordingly, the first constitutional function of the WCC is "to call the churches to the goal of visible unity in one faith and in one eucharistic fellowship expressed in worship and in common life in Christ, and to advance towards that unity in order that the world may believe". This commitment finds its central expression in the work of the WCC commission on Faith and Order,* with the understanding that all the diverse activities of the WCC should help the churches effectively to live out their already-existing fellowship and to move on towards full visible unity. Since 1948 the WCC has helped churches to enter into radically changed relationships with each other, to reach agreements and convergences in basic issues of faith and order, and to develop forms of solidarity, cooperation and common witness.* With the official entry of the Roman Catholic Church into the ecumenical movement at the time of the Second Vatican Council,* the efforts for unity have been decisively broadened and now include all major Christian traditions.

CONCEPTS AND MODELS OF UNITY

Already in the early stages of the F&O movement, discussion of particular church-dividing issues inevitably raised questions like: What are the constitutive elements of the unity we seek? How much (and in what form) is agreement necessary in such elements? How much diversity is possible and legitimate? In what form is unity to be expressed? Some Protestants emphasized the already-existing spiritual unity as a sufficient basis for mutual respect and for cooperation in mission and service. Others went one step further and pleaded for general agreement on some basic convictions of faith as a basis for forming federations of churches (see federalism). Anglicans and some others consistently argued for the goal of organic or corporate unity/union (see union, organic), which would be realized in the coming together of hitherto independent churches in one, united church.

The concept of organic unity received a certain pre-eminence in the F&O movement and in the work of the WCC after 1948. This theme is clearly seen in the way the 1961 assembly in New Delhi formulated for the first time the goal of unity: "We believe that the unity which is both God's will and his gift to his church is being made visible as all in each place who are baptized into Jesus Christ and confess him as Lord and Saviour are brought by the Holy Spirit into one fully committed fellowship, holding the one apostolic faith, preaching the one gospel, breaking the one bread, joining in common prayer, and having a corporate life reaching out in witness and service to all, and who at the same time are united with the whole Christian fellowship in all places and all ages in such wise that ministry and members are accepted by all, and that all can act and speak together as occasion requires for the tasks to which God calls his people."

The 1968 assembly in Uppsala further developed this concept by emphasizing its universal and conciliar dimension and by the call to the churches "to work for the time when a genuinely universal council may once more speak for all Christians and lead the way into the future". The 1975 Nairobi assembly re-affirmed the basic statement of New Delhi and combined it with the Uppsala emphasis on the conciliar and universal dimension of unity: "The one church is to be envisioned as a conciliar fellowship of local churches which are themselves truly united. In this conciliar fellowship each local church possesses, in communion with the others, the fullness of catholicity, witnesses to the apostolic faith, and therefore recognizes the others as belonging to the same church of Christ and guided by the same Spirit... Each church aims at maintaining sustained and sustaining relationships with her sister churches, expressed in conciliar gatherings whenever required for the fulfilment of their common calling." This concept of a conciliar fellowship met with wide approval in all Christian traditions.

At the time of the Nairobi assembly, the bilateral dialogues* between Christian World Communions* were already increasing in number, and in their context the question of the goal of unity was also raised. Because worldwide communions were undertaking these dialogues, the significance of entire confessional traditions in searching for and expressing unity was given more attention than the work of multilateral dialogues.* Accordingly, concepts of unity like "unity in reconciled diversity", full communion between "sister churches"* and "a communion of communions" were developed which seek to preserve (changed and reconciled) confessional identities as an element of future structures of church unity. Here the idea of a union, a merger of churches leading to a united church, is no longer seen as the only structural expression of organic unity. But in their description of the essential conditions of unity, these new concepts agree fully with the perspectives expressed in the New Delhi and Nairobi statements, including the idea of a "conciliar fellowship".

These perspectives were further developed within the framework both of salvation history and of ecumenical history in the statement of the 1991 Canberra assembly on "The Unity of the Church as Koinonia: Gift and Calling". It affirms: "The unity of the church to which we are called is a koinonia given and expressed in the common confession of the apostolic faith; a common sacramental life entered by the one baptism and celebrated together in one eucharistic fellowship; a common life in which members and ministries are mutually recognized and reconciled; and a common mission witnessing to the gospel of God's grace to all people and serving the whole of creation. The goal of the search for full communion is realized when all the churches are able to recognize in one another the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church in its fullness. This full communion will be expressed on the local and the universal levels through conciliar forms of life and action."

REALIZATIONS OF UNITY

Ecumenical language has long used the expression of an already-existing, though imperfect, fellowship between the churches to indicate that the churches are on their way from division to unity. This fellowship is expressed in new relationships with one another, forms of common prayer and worship, convergence on dividing theological differences, common witness and service. The WCC and the regional, national and local councils of churches* are both expressions and instruments of this already-existing fellowship. But there are also more direct expressions of unity or steps towards it.

Churches of the same confession in a particular country have united. Different denominations have come together to form united churches, e.g. the United Church of Canada as early as 1925, the Church of South India (1947), the Churches of North India and Pakistan (1970), the United Reformed Church in the United Kingdom (1972), the Uniting Church in Australia (1977). Lutheran, United and Reformed churches in Europe have declared full church fellowship (Leuenberg agreement 1973; see Leuenberg Church Fellowship). Methodist churches in the former East and West Germany agreed with their Lutheran, United and Reformed partners to establish sacramental fellowship and forms of cooperation (see Lutheran-Methodist dialogue). One of the most significant recent ecumenical events was the establishment in 1996 of full communion, on the basis of the Porvoo* common statement, between the four Anglican churches in Great Britain and Ireland and the Lutheran churches in Estonia, Finland, Iceland, Lithuania, Norway and Sweden. In the USA and Canada, Anglicans and Lutherans have moved from "interim eucharistic sharing" to full communion (see Anglican-Lutheran dialogue). In fact, most Reformation and Free churches practise today, whether officially declared or generally permitted, what is called eucharistic hospitality (see communion, intercommunion). All these forms manifest a commitment to move beyond mutual respect and friendly coexistence.

METHODS AND COMMON ORIENTATIONS

In ecumenical endeavours one of the fundamental and continuing questions has been whether theological dialogue or common missionary and social action leads the churches into unity. Today many are agreed that this is not a true alternative, since efforts for unity require a comprehensive approach involving both the doctrine and the life of the churches. Another question where differences remain concerns the degree of consensus* or convergence required for unity and the forms in which agreement should be expressed – whether by mutual recognition that each already holds the same faith or by new consensus texts. All agree that theological agreements and convergences need to be “received” by the churches on all levels of their life in order to facilitate steps towards unity (see reception). The spiritual dimension of unity (prayer, sharing in each other’s joys and sufferings) is affirmed by all, and the role of so-called non-theological factors in facilitating or preventing closer fellowship is also generally recognized. There is also general agreement that the goal of visible unity, however defined structurally, can be reached only by intermediary steps and forms on the way.

Among the common fundamental orientations which have emerged in the course of ecumenical history, the following are of special importance. First, the unity confessed in the creed and to be manifested by the churches is not merely a spiritual, invisible reality but must be visible. Sacramental communion is one basic element of this visibility, but there must also be additional forms of visible and effective expression. Second, unity is not to be regarded as uniformity but must allow for a diversity of theological expressions and forms of ecclesiastical life. Positive heritages of different Christian traditions should be preserved, and the “rootedness” of churches in various social and cultural contexts must be respected. Third, unity can be achieved only through renewal* of the life of the churches. Such renewal is necessary in order to overcome antagonistic positions and constitutes at the same time an enrichment of thinking and life. Fourth, unity is not aimed at for its own sake but in order that the world might believe, i.e. for the sake of the salvation and renewal of all humanity according to God’s purpose. Finally, all forms of unity are provisional. They are first-fruits of that eschatological fulfilment when God will unite and complete all things in the perfect communion of his heavenly banquet (see eschatology).

See also apostolicity; catholicity; holiness; united and uniting churches; unity, models of; unity of “all in each place”; unity, ways to.

GÜNTHER GASSMANN

- G. Gassmann & H. Meyer, The Unity of the Church: Requirements and Structures, Geneva, LWF, 1983
- G. Gassmann, J.A. Radano eds, The Unity of the Church as Koinonia: A Study Document Requested by the JWG between the Roman Catholic Church and the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1993
- M. Hurley, Christian Unity: An Ecumenical Second Spring?, Dublin, Veritas, 1998
- H. Meyer, Ökumenische Zielvorstellungen, Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1966
- C. Podmore ed., Community, Unity, Communion: Essays in Honour of Mary Tanner, London, Church House Publ., 1998
- C.S. Song ed., Growing Together into Unity, Madras, CLS, 1978
- G. Wainwright, The Ecumenical Moment: Crisis and Opportunity for the Church, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1983
- What Unity Requires, WCC, 1976.

UNITY, MODELS OF

MODELS OF unity are statements of the nature and form of the full visible unity* of the church* which is the final goal of the ecumenical movement. The term is normally used of the classic visions of church unity associated either with the united churches and the multilateral discussions of the Faith and Order* commission of the WCC (organic union, conciliar fellowship) or with the bilateral discussions of the Christian World Communions* (reconciled diversity,* communion of communions). Without claiming the precision and predictive power of their mathematical or scientific counterparts, these models have fostered discussion among the churches and focused the issues, options and fundamental choices facing them in their search for visible unity.

The various models should not be regarded as competitive; their value is in helping the ecumenical movement define a form of unity which enables all Christians, in their proper diversity, to experience themselves (and to appear to the world) as belonging to the one Body of Christ, and which enables them to speak and act as one on issues of faith* and life.

Organic unity, the historical goal of the F&O movement, envisions “a church so united [that] the ultimate loyalty of every member would be given to the whole body and not to any part of it”. This unity would be that “of a living organism, with the diversity characteristic of the members of a healthy body” (Edinburgh 1937). The third WCC assembly (New Delhi 1961) emphasized that the institutional price of such unity would “involve nothing less than a death or rebirth of many forms of church life as we have known them”. This choice has meant the end of denominational identities (see denominationalism) and the creation, in their stead, of new “local” (i.e. national or other such) churches expressing the fullness of Christ’s body in that place. Though no such local union has yet encompassed all churches in any one place, this vision has been most fully embodied in the more than 60 united churches which have come into being over the past two centuries, in all regions of the world.

Conciliar fellowship, defined at the fifth WCC assembly (Nairobi 1975, drawing upon F&O discussions at Salamanca 1973), is not itself a model but a vision of how organic unity might be realized among the various local united churches. Though separated by “space, culture or time”, they would periodically express their unity through “councils of representatives of all the local churches at various geographical levels” (see conciliarity). In this view, legitimate Christian diversity is not based on historical factors (e.g. confessional and denominational divisions) but is rooted in the cultural and geographical diversity of the whole people of God* and arises from the indigenization of the gospel in the diverse regions and cultures of the world.

Reconciled diversity begins from “the legitimacy of the (present) confessional differences and therefore the need to preserve them”, though not as ends in themselves but as “points of reference” within a larger Christian identity. Thus, as stated at the Lutheran World Federation* (LWF) sixth assembly (Dar es Salaam 1977), these differences and unique confessional identities are not “simply preserved and maintained unaltered” but “lose their divisive character and are reconciled to each other”. Furthermore, a church so united would be “ordered in all its components in conciliar structures and actions” (LWF seventh assembly, Budapest 1984).

In the communion of communions, proposed in 1970 by Cardinal Willebrands, secretary of the Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity* of the Roman Catholic Church, the confessions would continue within the framework of a larger ecclesial allegiance (with a common dogma,* sacraments,* and basic ordering of ministry*), each confession (with its characteristic expression of theological emphasis and method, discipline, liturgical life, and spirituality) embodying a distinctive typos (see typoi) of the one faith: “the confessions should be the form and expression of ecumenicity” (Karl Rahner and Heinrich Fries). The bishop of Rome would exercise within the one church a unique ministry in the service of unity.

Thus the various models embody important differences in the approach to unity, particularly in the role which they foresee, in a future united church, for the present confessional and denominational identities.

The discussion of models is presently being broadened and deepened significantly through several developments. One is reflection on the term “koinonia” (communion, community, fellowship), which emerged from the bilateral discussions and gained prominence through the fifth world conference on Faith and Order (whose theme was “Towards Koinonia in Faith, Life and Witness”) in 1993. Koinonia is not itself a model of unity but a biblical term evoking the special quality of relationship meant to obtain among Christians and the churches and pointing to the intimate, mutually sustaining and challenging bonds – both spiritual and material – linking them within, and to, the one Body of Christ. As such, the notion of koinonia has enriched our understanding of all models of unity.

A related development has been the increasing importance of the concept of mutual accountability. This reflects the churches’ growing acceptance of their responsibility to and for one another as partners within the one ecumenical movement, and their awareness that actions taken – even on “internal” matters – by each church affect all other churches, and the ecumenical situation overall. Relationships among the churches have also been influenced by work on ecclesiology and ethics, with its insistence that ecumenical engagement in ethical reflection (and, where appropriate, action) is intrinsic to the church. Thus "recognition" among churches implies not only shared faith, mutually accepted sacramental practise, ministry, etc. but also some degree of common witness before, and shared service in, the world.

Two additional, related factors are contributing to the discussion on models. First, recent calls for a unity "in solidarity" (Jon Sobrino and J.H. Pico) and a unity "marked by shared suffering" (Paul Crow) are challenging all models to remember that church union is not an end in itself; each model must be judged as to how well it enables and empowers the church in its mission,* witness* and service (see diakonia) in the world. Second, it is increasingly recognized that the form of unity must be such as to encourage the renewal* of the church's life and enable the proper participation of all the people of God, at all levels, especially the local congregation (see local church). Otherwise, as stated at the fifth international consultation of united and uniting churches* (Potsdam 1987), "union without renewal only continues the sin of division – not institutional division, but divisions between Christians (now within one church) of different races, economic levels, sexes".

The models remain fundamental to our reflection on the nature of the unity we seek. Indeed, many of the other approaches to the search for visible unity (e.g. the discussion of "full communion" or the notion of "steps" towards unity) may be regarded as explorations of the meaning and implications of one or another model. Thus further work on models of unity is essential, with five related areas requiring special attention: (1) the structural form of a future united church, including the inter-relation of the various levels of its life (congregational, national, regional, global; it is striking that all models envision some type of conciliar structure, but no model is sufficiently clear about its form); (2) the nature of authority* within the future one church and how authority will be exercised for the maintenance of unity (the question of authority awaits adequate discussion in the ecumenical movement); (3) the proper balance between unity and diversity within a future united church (here it should be remembered that the word "organic" in organic unity was intended to guard precisely the rich diversity of Christian faith and church life); (4) new ecumenical thought on the nature of the church, particularly the concept of koinonia* (communion*); (5) the relationship between the visible unity of the church and the renewal of its worship, life, witness, mission and service.

See also union, organic; unity, ways to.

THOMAS F. BEST

- T.F. Best ed., Built Together: The Present Vocation of United and Uniting Churches, WCC, 1996
- T.F. Best & M. Robra eds, Ecclesiology and Ethics, WCC, 1997
- P. Crow, Jr, "Reflections on Models of Christian Unity", in Living Today towards Visible Unity, T.F. Best ed., WCC, 1988
- H. Fries & K. Rahner, Einigung der Kirchen – reale Möglichkeit (ET Unity of the Churches: An Actual Possibility, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1985)
- G. Kelly, Recognition: Advancing Ecumenical Thinking, New York, Lang, 1996
- H. Meyer, That All May Be One: Perceptions and Models of Ecumenicity, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1999
- The Nature and Purpose of the Church, WCC, 1998
- L. Newbigin, "What Is 'a Local Church Truly United'?", in In Each Place: Towards a Fellowship of Local Churches Truly United, WCC, 1977
- "The Understanding of Koinonia and Its Implications", WCC, 1998
- "The Unity of the Church as Koinonia: Gift and Calling", in *On the Way to Fuller Koinonia: Official Report of the Fifth World Conference on Faith and Order*, T.F. Best & G. Gassmann eds, WCC, 1994
- What Kind of Unity?, WCC, 1974.

UNITY OF "ALL IN EACH PLACE"

AT THE FIRST WCC assembly in Amsterdam (1948), provision was made for meetings of the World Confessional Families but not for representatives of united churches (see united and uniting churches). The latter met apart from the assembly. The assembly's report did not discuss local unity except for a brief commendation of the "courage and enterprise" which had inspired "some notable unions" of churches (The Universal Church in God's Design, 125).

Immediately following the first assembly there was sharp debate about the ecclesiological significance of the formation of the WCC. Did it commit the member churches to specific models of unity* (see unity, models of)? Would it press churches to unite? Would it become a "super-church"? At the meeting of the central committee in Toronto (1950), these questions were squarely faced, and a statement was issued which has remained determinative of subsequent development (see Toronto statement). Membership in the WCC committed churches to the quest for unity but did not imply acceptance of any particular model of unity. There were in fact many different models on offer – reintegration into the Orthodox church, organic union* on the lines suggested by the Lambeth Quadrilateral,* a federal relationship between the World Confessional Families (see federalism), and for some the WCC itself represented the desirable form of unity. The WCC could not espouse any of these models but continued to show interest in local unions of churches by regularly publishing surveys of such unions or plans for unity in many parts of the world.

The Lund Faith and Order conference (1952) and the Evanston assembly (1954) followed their predecessors in omitting discussion of the local schemes of union from their agenda, but after each of these meetings there were unofficial consultations of representatives of united and uniting churches in which leading personalities in the WCC participated. The representatives at Lund of younger churches involved in united or uniting churches felt obliged to counter the suggestion that their eagerness for unity might be "mistaken for a by-product of Asian nationalism" (Lund report, 130). But in the debates which centred on the Toronto statement, it was made clear that, while the WCC could not propose the acceptance of a particular model of unity as a condition of membership, member churches, if serious in their quest for unity, could not remain permanently uncommitted to one model or another. In a lecture at the time of the Evanston assembly, the writer of this article affirmed that "the proper form of the church's unity" required "first that it must be such that all who are in Christ in any place are, in that place, visibly one fellowship; and secondly that it must be such that each local community is so ordered and so related to the whole that its fellowship with all Christ's people everywhere, and with all who have gone before and will come after, is made clear" (published in The Journal of Religion, 35, 1, 1955).

These phrases were to be further refined in the following five years. The impetus to do so came partly from a conference of North American churches on "The Nature of the Unity We Seek", partly from a WCC central committee request for F&O comment on the Toronto statement and partly from the appointment of a committee on the future of F&O. In 1958 that committee presented a report advocating a "churchly" model of unity, in contrast to a model which appeared to call only for cooperation. The next year the F&O working committee submitted to the central committee a report which contained the following sentences: "We believe that the unity which is both God's will and his gift to his church is one which brings all in each place who confess Christ Jesus as Lord into a fully committed fellowship with one another through one baptism into him, preaching the same gospel and breaking the one bread, and having a corporate life reaching out in witness and service to all; and which at the same time unites them with the whole Christian fellowship in all places and all ages in such wise that ministries and members are acknowledged by all and that all can act and speak together as occasion requires for the tasks to which God calls the church."

After further discussion this statement was adopted by the third assembly in New Delhi with small modifications – one of which was to remove the semicolon which divided the "local" and "universal" parts. In spite of this attempt to hold the two parts of the statement together, it was the "local" emphasis which captured attention. The fourth world conference on F&O at Montreal (1963) gave much attention to the local church.* It affirmed that "the proving ground of unity is the local church" (80) but was concerned that new forms of the local church might in fact be forms of schism.* It was no doubt by inadvertence that the Montreal report put a comma at the crucial point from which a semicolon had been removed!

It followed that the fourth assembly at Uppsala (1968) thought it necessary to recover a balance which had been tipped one way. It emphasized the global dimension of unity and expressed the hope that "the members of the WCC, committed to each other, should work for a time when a genuinely universal council may once more speak for all Christians" (The Uppsala Report, 17).

This vision of a "genuinely universal council" was taken up at the next meeting of the F&O commission (Louvain 1971). In a statement entitled "Conciliarity and the Future of the Ecumenical Movement", a vision of unity was sketched in the form of a "conciliar fellowship of churches". Certain factors favoured this shift of emphasis. Movements for local organic union which had seemed promising ten years earlier were faltering. The growing role of the Orthodox churches in the life of the WCC was giving wider recognition to the role of ecumenical councils* in the history of the church. And, most importantly, the massive presence of the Roman Catholic Church in the ecumenical movement from the 1960s onwards had shifted emphasis from local schemes of union to bilateral dialogues* between world confessions. It was obvious that the RCC as a single world communion should find its partners in the World Confessional Families, which thus assumed a much more prominent role than in the preceding decades. "Conciliar fellowship" seemed to be a more attractive (and less costly) way to unity than the sometimes traumatic experiences of organic unions, in which churches surrendered their separate existence to form new bodies. By the middle of the decade a WCC publication was able to list almost fifty of these bilateral conversations between world confessional bodies (Confessions in Dialogue, 1975).

The relation between these two approaches to unity was discussed at a conference in Salamanca (1973), and its findings were taken up by the fifth assembly at Nairobi in the same year: "The one church is to be envisaged as a conciliar fellowship of local churches which are themselves truly united. In this conciliar fellowship, each local church possesses, in communion with the others, the fullness of catholicity, witnesses to the same apostolic faith, and therefore recognizes the others as belonging to the same church of Christ and guided by the same Spirit" (Breaking Barriers: Nairobi, 1975, 60).

The acceptance of this formulation led naturally to the question: What is a "local church... truly united"? At New Delhi it had been recognized that the word "place" did not have a simple unambiguous denotation. It affirmed that the unity among Christians "must be found in each school where they study, in each office or factory where they work, and in each congregation where they worship" and, furthermore, that "place" may imply not only local communities but also wider geographical areas such as states, provinces or nations (The New Delhi Report, 118). A consultation called by the WCC in 1976 sought to clarify the issues. It noted that by using the term "place" for all levels of the church's life, the third assembly (New Delhi) avoided a clear definition. It affirmed that "the church cannot even be conceived apart from the reality of places" (In Each Place: Towards a Fellowship of Local Churches Truly United, 4).

It considered the missionary obligation to relate the gospel to the specificity of particular groups in changing situations and affirmed that "a place is not merely a geographical area which can be identified on the map. It has temporal dimension as well" (5). It attempted a definition of the term "local church" as follows: "The term refers to an area where Christians can easily meet and form one committed fellowship in witness and service. Every local church will normally gather in one eucharistic service. The conditions of the area may be such that there is need for several separate services. Even then it must be made evident that these communities understand themselves as one eucharistic fellowship" (8). Common language is widely recognized as legitimate grounds for forming a distinct congregation. But "is it proper to recognize distinct eucharistic assemblies in the same area on the basis of distinct language, race, culture and other factors?... There is no agreed answer to these questions" (9-10). It is agreed, however, that in the course of its missionary outreach into new cultural groups, "as a provisional measure, there must be room for the formation of a congregation within [the] receiving cul-

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

ture, speaking its language and sharing its style of life, through which the full riches of that culture may be brought into the life of the universal church" (10). In a final section, which suggests the direction for the future, the consultation noted that "in many places small groups and fellowships have grown around common concerns and interests" and that in many cases "their commitment to the unity of the church leads them to anticipate the communion of the future" (11). These discussions about the nature of "local unity" need to be continued.

The sixth assembly (Vancouver 1983) re-affirmed the Nairobi statement and sought to develop it further through a search for a common understanding of the apostolic faith, through mutual recognition of baptism, eucharist and ministry (see Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry) and through common ways of decision making. The WCC has also sponsored consultations of united and uniting churches by themselves, and with the Christian World Communions,* including the Roman Catholic Church and representatives of the Orthodox churches.

See also church; conciliarity; eucharist; unity, ways to.

LESLIE NEWBIGIN

■ E. Benignus, All in Each Place, Cincinnati, Forward Movement, 1966 ■ W.B. Blakemore, "All in Each Place", MS, 3, 2, 1963-64 ■ A.H. Dammers, All in Each Place, London, BCC, 1964 ■ M.B. Handspicker, "All in Each Place", Study Encounter, 1, 79, 1965 ■ M. Kinnamon ed., Unity in Each Place... in All Places...: United Churches and the Christian World Communions, WCC, 1983 ■ J.E.L. Newbigin, F. Kaan, R. Beaupère & J. Zizioulas, In Each Place: Towards a Fellowship of Local Churches Truly United, WCC, 1977.

UNITY OF HUMANKIND

ALTHOUGH THE concern to relate church unity* and social problems characterized 20th-century ecumenism from the start, the phrase "the unity of humankind" became an explicit theme in ecumenical discussions in the early 1960s. The thrust of this discussion has been the attempt to discern how divisions in the human community are becoming problems of church unity today, and likewise how the quest for church unity might be a sign of promise for the healing of these broken human communities as well.

Vatican II's* concept of the sacramentality of the church ("the church is a kind of sacrament or sign of intimate union with God, and of the unity of all mankind") provided a powerful impulse for developing this theme. That insight then became the basis for the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World, addressed to "the whole of humanity". The parallel development in the WCC echoes Vatican II with an eschatological accent: "The church is bold in speaking of itself as the sign of the coming unity of mankind" (Uppsala 1968).

Faith and Order* launched a major local, regional and international study on "The Unity of the Church and the Unity of Mankind" and built much of its programme at Louvain (1971) around an attempt "to view our historic theme of church unity in a new context, specifically in the context of human, not simply denominational divisions". It thus considered the struggle for justice,* encounters with living faiths, the struggle against racism,* issues of the disabled in society and church, and differences in culture.* And a concern developed that the method of such studies should not be simply "contextualization" but "intercontextualization", whereby the two contexts reciprocally provide the interpretative frame for each other. Subsequent discussion revealed large problems about anthropology (see anthropology, theological), ambiguity in the notion of "the unity of mankind", the comparability of "the two unities", and the abstractness of the perspective from which such "unities" could be discussed, among others.

Accra (1974) attempted to clarify the language of the theme: "human inter-relatedness" refers to an inescapable fact of modern global life (e.g. air travel) which has both positive and negative aspects. "The just interdependence of free people" refers to the kind of utopian visions of human community which animate movements of liberation; "the unity of humankind", in contrast, is a theological term for the eschatological promise of the coming kingdom of God.*

The first phase of studies reached its provisional conclusion in a comprehensive report entitled Unity in Today's World (1978). A powerful impulse for renewed study soon came from the Sheffield conference on “The Community of Women and Men in the Church” (1981). And in 1982 at Lima, F&O launched a major study on “The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community”. This study concentrates on explicating “the church as mystery and prophetic sign”; on probing two specific major problems as issues of church unity: the community of women and men, and the search for justice; and on promoting a considerable number of local study groups around the world. A comprehensive progress report was approved by F&O in 1989 for publication in 1990 and submission to the WCC’s Canberra assembly (1991). The specific subject does not appear after that date, but the concerns which originated it can be detected in the study on ecclesiology and ethics* and in the church as koinonia, understood as an ecclesiological approach in which “the understanding of unity in terms of koinonia, the Trinitarian understanding of ecclesiology, the theological location of the unity of the church within God’s purpose for the whole of creation” establish the inseparable relation between the twofold concern of Faith and Order.

Although Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* has been more noticed by the churches, this 20-year study of church unity and human community has been most closely followed by the central organs of the WCC, for this study addresses as no other the constitutive concerns which brought the WCC into being and the question about the unity of the ecumenical movement itself.

See also disability, universalism.

JOHN DESCHNER

- T.F. Best ed., Beyond Unity-in-Tension: Unity, Renewal and the Community of Women and Men, WCC, 1988
- Church and World: The Unity of the Church and the Renewal of Human Community, WCC, 1990
- Faith and Order, Louvain 1971: Study Reports and Documents, WCC, 1971
- M. Kinnamon ed., Towards Visible Unity: Commission on Faith and Order, Lima 1982, 2 vols, WCC, 1982
- G. Limouris ed., Church, Kingdom, World: The Church as Mystery and Prophetic Sign, WCC, 1986
- G. Müller-Fahrenholz, Unity in Today’s World: The Faith and Order Studies on “Unity of the Church – Unity of Humankind”, WCC, 1978
- G. Ruppell, Einheit ist unteilbar: Die

Menschheit und ihre Einheit als Thema in der ökumenischen Diskussion zwischen 1910 und 1983, Rothenburg, Ernst Lange Institut für Ökumenische Studien, 1992.

UNITY, WAYS TO

WAYS TO UNITY are the various processes and practical steps through which the churches seek that full visible unity* of the church* which is the final goal of the ecumenical movement. Effective ways to unity are rooted in the conviction that, because God wills the church to be one, it is the state of church union which is normal, and the present state of church division abnormal and requiring correction. The sharing of this conviction with others – however separated by differences of confession and conscience – in common prayer and commitment to overcome all that divides us is “spiritual ecumenism”.* Nurtured in personal contacts and through programmes such as the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity,* this is the source and power of all the more visible and practical ways to unity.

The various ways to unity differ principally in their estimation of (1) the specific elements of Christian faith* and practice upon which agreement is required for unity, and (2) the degree of agreement (which may be different for differing aspects of the church’s faith and life) necessary for unity to be achieved.

The most dramatic “way” to unity is unity itself, an approach exemplified by the united churches. Their constituent denominations, on the basis of “sufficient” agreement on essentials of the apostolic faith and on sacramental practice (esp. the areas of baptism,* eucharist* and ministry*), have committed themselves to common decision making and mutual accountability within a single unified structure. Considerable diversity may remain, for example, in the form of baptismal practice, within congregations or from one congregation to another. Through experience of, and continuing dialogue about, such differences, the church grows in its common faith and life more effectively, it feels, than had the union been postponed until full agreement in all areas had been reached. The united churches have experienced this process as a dying to old confessional identities and a re-birth to a new and richer identity: “No schemes of union have come about,” said D.T. Niles about the Church of South India in a memorable comment; “the churches have united.”

Structural unions continue to be formed (e.g. in Jamaica in 1992, South Africa in 1994 and 1999, and the UK in 2000, with several other union plans currently underway). There is, however, a growing tendency for churches negotiating structural union to emphasize more immediately realizable goals, which include intensive sharing in worship, parish life and witness (as in the “partnership” between the Disciples of Christ and the United Church of Christ), or finding new ways, short of structural union, of manifesting the bonds between them (as in Churches Uniting in Christ, formed in January 2002 as the successor to the consultation on Church Union,* fostering the common confession and life of member churches in the US), or the remarkable proposal of 1997 for an “ecumenical bishop” put forward by the Commission of the [five] Covenanted Churches in Wales).

A complementary approach to the search for unity aims at achieving a state of “full communion” among existing churches. As they overcome theological and historical issues which have divided them, specific groups of churches move by “steps” and “stages” towards unity. Their unity is “visible” not through their incorporation within a single ecclesial body but as they “live out” their agreement on fundamentals of faith and practice, mutual recognition of their membership and ministries (or indeed full interchangeability of their ministries, as in the Porvoo* agreement between the Anglican churches of Britain and Ireland and most of the Nordic and Baltic Lutheran churches), and their commitment to common witness* and mission.*

Another approach understands full agreement in faith as a necessary precondition of union. This way to unity lies through slow, patient work towards full common understanding in matters of faith and practice; until such an understanding exists, any thought of institutional union is considered premature. In particular, sharing in sacramental life must be the fruit of unity rather than a means towards it (see intercommunion). In the Roman Catholic view, “the common celebration of the eucharist must be the sign of an already-existing ecclesial unity” (Swiss bishops’ statement, Einsiedeln, June 1986); for the Orthodox, “intercommunion must be considered as the crowning act of real and true reunion which has already been fully achieved by fundamental agreement in the realm of faith and order and is not to be regarded as an instrument for reunion” (statement by the representative of the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople to the second world conference on F&O, Edinburgh 1937).

Where churches bear a burden of bitter historical conflict, the way to unity must lie through a “reconciliation of memories”, a process exemplified in the Leuenberg agreement reached in 1973 between Reformation churches (Lutheran and Reformed) in Europe (see Leuenberg Church Fellowship). Despite “the condemnations pronounced [against each other] by the Reformation confessions of faith” in the areas of the Lord’s supper, Christology, and predestination, the agreement affirms that, in their present common understanding of the gospel, these churches consider that these ancient accusations and actions “are no longer an obstacle to church fellowship”. Some differences still persist among the churches, but they are not judged to have divisive force, and thus a state of pulpit and altar fellowship can be declared.

The healing power of this approach lies in its courageous facing of past wounds. Often this step frees the churches to transcend the theological language of their ancient disputes – language formulated precisely to distinguish one church from others, if not to prove them heretical – and to discover new language adequate to their present common convictions.

An effective and widespread way to unity is participation by churches in the life of councils at the city, national, regional and global levels (see councils of churches). Councils provide opportunities for common programming in mission, witness and service (see diakonia) and accustom the churches to working together rather than apart or in competition. In councils, the bilateral dialogues* between pairs of churches or confessional families can be set in a much wider, multilateral framework, and insights can be tested and enriched by the experiences and convictions of many churches (see dialogue, multi-lateral). Such reflection on issues of faith, paralleling the work of the F&O commission of the WCC, is increasingly pursued in councils at city, national and regional levels.

While the councils cannot be confused with their member churches, there is a growing awareness that they fulfill some ecclesial functions. In reflecting, sharing, speaking and acting together, the churches within councils experience themselves, as described at the global gathering of national councils of churches in Geneva in 1986, as “both instruments and signs of unity”, expressing a growing koinonia of confession, of worship and of common witness and action.

Clearly no single way to unity is sufficient in and of itself; it is the responsibility of Christians to pursue the search for visible unity through all ways open to them, and with all the energy and ingenuity at their command.

See also unity, models of; union, organic.

THOMAS F. BEST

- T.F. Best ed., Built Together: The Present Vocation of United and Uniting Churches (Eph. 2:22). The Sixth International Consultation of United and Uniting Churches, WCC, 1996
- T.F. Best, ed., Instruments of Unity: National Councils of Churches within the One Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1988
- “Ecumenism at the National Level: The Hong Kong Consultation [of NCCs]” (= ER, 45, 3, 1993)
- R. Girault, Construire l’Eglise une: nouveaux chemins oecuméniques, Paris, Desclée de Brouwer, 1990
- J. Hotchkin, “The Ecumenical Movement’s Third Stage”, Origins, 25, 21, 1995
- M. Kinnamon, Truth and Community: Diversity and Its Limits in the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 1988
- H. Meyer & L. Vischer eds, Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, WCC, 1984
- S.C. Neill, “Plans of Union and Reunion, 1910-1948”, in HI-II
- “Survey of Church Union Negotiations”, every two years in ER
- O. Tjørhom, “The Porvoo Statement: A Possible Ecumenical Breakthrough?”, ER, 46, 1, 1994
- L. Vischer, “Drawn and Held Together by the Reconciling Power of Christ”, in What Kind of Unity?, WCC, 1974.

UNIVERSALISM

IN ITS STRONGEST sense, “universalism” designates the view that all intelligent, moral creatures (angels, humans, devils) will certainly be saved in the end. In 543 the emperor-theologian Justinian anathematized the view that the punishment of devils and the wicked is only temporary, so that they would be included in a final “restoration of all things”, and such an apokatastasis appears to have been part of the “Origenism” subsequently condemned at the second ecumenical council of Constantinople in 553. Continuing proponents of universalism appeal to God’s love, power, patience and mercy. In the 20th century, such prominent figures as Karl Barth and Hans Urs von Balthasar have stopped only just short of the universalistic conclusions implicit in certain tendencies in their theology. Since so many humans appear to die in their sins and unbelief, universalism seems to imply opportunity for repentance and conversion after death.

All opponents of universalism hold that it does not take seriously enough moral evil and sin: “Deeds that cry out to heaven also cry out for hell” (Peter Berger). Some opponents of universalism think that it does not respect the freedom* humans have to reject God, but others hold that such a view of human freedom impugns God’s sovereignty and that the biblical hell will be peopled by those whom God has “passed over” for salvation* and deliberately predestined to condemnation.

A middling view notes that God “desires everyone to be saved” (1 Tim. 2:4) but reckons that, while God will continue resourcefully to elicit an opening to himself and to others, the self-closure of the sinner to love and life (cor in se incurvatum, “the heart turned in upon itself”) may finally entail self-extinction. Thus there would be no subject left to endure an eternal hell.

In a weaker sense, universalism denotes the global scope of the activity of the one true God,* the God of Israel and of Jesus Christ.* (Linguistic clarity might be furthered if “universality” could be used instead of “universalism” in this case.) Echoing the ancient promise that all the families of the earth would find blessing in Abraham (Gen. 12:3), later prophets proclaim that, after judgment, the survivors of the nations will turn to the Lord, the Sovereign of all creation and history, and join in the salvation granted to the remnant of Israel (e.g. see Isa. 25:6-9, 45:1-25; Zech. 14:1-21). According to the New Testament, the risen Christ sends his apostles to “make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (Matt. 28:19), and missionary witness to him will be borne “in Jerusalem, in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth” (Acts 1:8). The universality of the Christian mission is grounded in the “mystery” of God, i.e. the divine design, long hidden but now revealed in Jesus Christ, to include both Jews and Gentiles in salvation (Rom. 16:25-27; Eph. 1:9-10, 3:1-6; Col. 1:24-28; 1 Tim. 3:16).

Christian theologians have differed as to whether salvation is to be enjoyed only by those with explicit and confessed faith in Christ (see Mark 16:15-16; John 3:16-18,36; Acts 4:12; Rom. 10:8-21), or whether also by those who follow Christ “anonymously”, by virtue of the “law written in their hearts” (see Rom. 2:14-16; 2 Cor. 5:10), or whether salvation is possible even without reference to Christ at all (but this position would run counter to John 14:6 and 12:32).

Whether discussion involves universalism in the stronger or in the weaker sense, many would recognize the wisdom of the Lutheran Paul Althaus (1888-1966): “What believers hope for themselves in their own assurance of faith, they hope also for all their fellow humans. The grace which has been directed towards believers is not grounded in a preference for their own persons; rather it is unconditioned, groundless grace. Therefore they may not think of it as other than comprehensive.”

See also salvation, salvation history, uniqueness of Christ.

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

- B.E. Daley, “Apokatastasis and ‘Honorable Silence’ in the Eschatology of Maximus the Confessor”, in Maximus Confessor, F. Heinzer & C. Schönborn eds, Fribourg, Editions universitaires, 1982
- D.J. Krieger, The New Universalism: Foundations for a Global Theology, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1991
- G. Müller, Apokatastasis pantōn: A Bibliography, Basel, Missionsbuchhandlung, 1969.

URBAN RURAL MISSION

THE CONCERNS and issues surrounding the dual problems of industrialization and urbanization have their roots in the industrial revolution of the late 18th and 19th centuries. As people were increasingly dehumanized and made poor, the churches’ responses were sporadic. These varied individual and local initiatives, some with global impact, could be viewed as the antecedents of Urban Rural Mission. Better known among these initiatives were the Mission populaire in France (1871), Sheffield Industrial Mission (1944), the International Missionary Council’s Urban Africa project, based in the copper belt of what is now Zambia (1958), and the first Asian Conference on Industrial Evangelism, Manila (1958).

At the third assembly of the WCC in New Delhi, India (1961, at which the International Missionary Council merged with the WCC), considerable attention was given to the concerns, issues and consequences surrounding industrialization and urbanization. Programmatic responsibilities for these concerns within the WCC were assigned to the newly formed Division of World Mission and Evangelism (DWME, later to become the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism [CWME]). Shortly after the world mission conference in Mexico City (1963), an informal group met to discuss urban industrial evangelism. There was recognition of the many efforts around the world, and the DWME realized “that these efforts need coordination and cross-fertilization leading to a common approach and that all members of the WCC should engage actively at the front line of this work”. Thus the first meeting of the DWME advisory group on urban and industrial mission, which later became known simply as urban industrial mission (UIM), gave a formal name, structure and methodology to this aspect of WCC’s commitment to mission. Its essential goal was “to involve the total church in all continents in the ecumenical task of urban industrial evangelism”. Flexibility and a decentralized form of cooperation, with a minimum of organization at the top, were to be among the guiding principles. By 1966, with perspectives from the churches of Asia, the question of securing social justice was prominently on the agenda. In UIM’s first major public document, “Becoming Operational in a World of Cities: A Strategy for Urban and Industrial Mission” (presented to and adopted by WCC's fourth assembly at Uppsala, 1968), there was a strong call for the churches to "involve themselves more deeply with the new groups – the new poor, the workers, the new marginal groups – and become a servant church among them".

The concern of the churches and missionary agencies for rural societies, leading to their separate and diverse activities on behalf of those societies, also came on the WCC agenda at Uppsala in 1968. The concern was given an ecumenical dimension in view of the rapid social and economic changes which were adversely affecting rural communities. Consequently the DWME was requested to "consider ways in which member churches and councils can be assisted in mission to the world's rapidly changing rural societies". An office for Rural Agricultural Mission (RAM) was established within DWME in 1973. RAM's mandate was "to stimulate member churches to pay particular attention to rural areas; to facilitate ecumenical cooperation in the prosecution of rural mission, to encourage regional/local groups that will be responsible for training animators; to encourage churches to re-examine and re-construct their lay and ministerial training schemes and programmes with a proper orientation towards rural mission; and to select one or two places for an experiment in intensive integrated rural mission".

In 1978, after consistent pressure from the continents of the South to bridge the apparent gap between "urban" and "rural", the CWME decided to merge its UIM with the RAM offices into Urban Rural Mission (URM). It was agreed that UIM's preferred style of attempting to respond to local initiatives provided a useful basis for work with rural communities. Over the years through UIM activities, staff travel, meetings and conferences, a fellowship of people committed to the struggles for justice and dignity grew at local, national, regional and global levels.

The 1970s and 1980s were a period of growth in URM, especially as people responded to the challenges of militarization, violence, suppression of democratic processes and the denial of human rights. Marginalization and poverty became an everyday reality as governments, the political elite, establishment structures, multinational corporations and countries of the North began to increase their control over almost every aspect of life. People's movements to resist unjust structures, to struggle for peace, justice and community, and to network in efforts to build a more healthy and sustainable society grew throughout the world. In many places URM played a significant part in this process. URM encouraged biblical and theological reflection and articulation, particularly through listening to the people's stories and re-reading the Bible in the specific context of struggle, resistance, liberation and freedom.

Throughout this period the primary method employed in URM's commitment to local action was community organizing for empowerment of the victims of oppression and marginalization, enabling them to participate in the decision-making processes which affect their lives. A special report "A URM Perspective on Mission" (1986) affirmed that the mission of God is the proclamation of life, that all mission starts with people, takes politics seriously, is about reflection and action, and is essentially about social transformation in the perspective of the kingdom. A celebration in Manila in 1987 brought together about 120 community organizers from all regions of the world to mark the 25th anniversary of URM concerns within WCC.

WCC restructuring in the 1990s placed URM within the programme for Community and Justice in Mission, then the staff team on Mission and Evangelism, but the network continues to refer to itself as Urban Rural Mission.

The programme's mandate is "to work for the understanding and practice of the churches' mission as including solidarity with the poor and marginalized". In the context of a world of increasing dehumanization, in which the community is ever more fragmented and whole populations continue to be ever more marginalized or denied identity and human rights, this solidarity is seen as imperative.

URM thus encourages, assists and supports the churches in an understanding of the meaning and challenges of mission today; facilitates the education, empowerment and renewal of the people of God for mission; and enables the building up and strengthening of national, regional and global networks of mutual sharing, solidarity and support.

URM works in six regions (Asia, Africa, Europe, Latin America, Middle East and North America), and plans, activities, budgets and progress are reviewed by regional contact groups which work with ecumenical bodies, member churches and people's movements. Initiatives are also developing in the Caribbean and Central America. Each region is organized differently and is accountable to the global URM family. The role of the WCC-URM office is essentially to coordinate and enable the URM movement.

URM priorities include leadership development, training for community organizing, building up a forum for sharing and providing space, a voice and identity for excluded people, and developing links and networks for exchange. It is also concerned to nurture relations with churches, ecumenical agencies, non-governmental organizations, people's movements and people of other faiths as appropriate, and to influence the churches' mission thinking and practice with socio-cultural analysis, biblical and theological reflection and missiological studies that support community action for social transformation.

All this effort should support people's struggles for justice and self-empowerment, especially slum-dwellers, women and children, industrial and rural workers, labour movements, migrant workers, and the victims of racism, militarism and other forms of oppression. Strengthening the regional capacity to plan, implement and evaluate their activities is important as regions cope with new challenges, limited resources and the need to revitalize the movement.

DALEEP MUKARJI and KWAME LABI

■ Celebration and Challenge: URM '87, Manila, April 1-6, 1987, WCC, 1987 ■ Commission on World Mission and Evangelism, People of God: The Church? An URM Perspective, WCC, 1990 ■ H. Lewin comp., A Community of Clowns: Testimonies of People in Urban Rural Mission, WCC, 1987 ■ WCC-Urban Rural Mission, Renewing the Challenge: A WCC-URM Consultation, WCC, 1992.

UT UNUM SINT

SIGNED BY Pope John Paul II on Ascension Day 1995, this encyclical* re-affirms, following Vatican II,* the "irrevocable commitment" of the Roman Catholic Church to ecumenism as "an organic part of her life and work". Personal (at times even anecdotal) in style, passionate in tone, and pastoral in aim, the papal letter expresses gratitude and joy at what has so far been achieved in the ecumenical movement and calls for continued conversion – individual and communal, at all levels – to the cause and participation in the process of renewal. The key word is "dialogue".*

Christian unity* is seen as the proper outcome of Christ's reconciling death on behalf of humankind. The unity for which Christ prayed among his disciples is essential to the church* and intrinsic to the credibility of evangelization amid a needy world. The witness of the martyrs, united across confessional divisions in the "selfless offering of their lives for the kingdom of God", is exemplary. The everyday path is by way of repentance (for wrongs mutually committed), prayer (esp. in common), reciprocal visitation, study (of shared faith and remaining differences) and cooperation (in mission and service to human need).

Since the search is for "communion in truth", doctrine is of "fundamental importance". Grounded in love, dialogue is not simply "an exchange of ideas" but also "an exchange of gifts". It presupposes respect between the partners and a desire for reconciliation, and it includes an examination of conscience by each. The "common quest for truth" requires fairness, clarity, humility and charity. Sensitivity to different formulations can make "surprising discoveries possible" that enrich the apprehension of revealed truth. Examination of disagreements should have "two essential points of reference: sacred scripture and the great Tradition of the church".

In a survey of "the fruits of dialogue" over the previous 30 years, the pope enumerates the recognition of "other Christians" as "brothers and sisters" linked by baptism* and faith* in the one Lord, "solidarity in the service of humanity" (with special mention of the WCC), "ecumenical translations of the Bible", convergence in liturgical and sacramental reform and renewal (with special mention of Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry)*, and “growth of communion” (even though the expressions of this remain limited and vary among the several partners). Then the pope rehearses the progress made in the Roman Catholic Church’s particular dialogues with the “churches of the East” (both the Orthodox,* which are insistently called “sister churches”,* and the Oriental Orthodox,* whose patriarchs are also “brothers”), and with “other churches and ecclesial communities in the West” (acknowledged as the initiators of the modern ecumenical movement).

In contemplating the road ahead, the pope foresees a “continuing and deepening dialogue” on the way to “full visible unity among all the baptized”, “that full communion in the one, holy, catholic and apostolic church which will be expressed in the common celebration of the eucharist”. Reception* of the interim results of dialogue requires a critical analysis and testing for consistency with the apostolic tradition.* Five areas are listed where further work remains to be done towards “a true consensus of faith”: (1) “the relationship between sacred scripture, as the highest authority in matters of faith, and sacred Tradition, as indispensable to the interpretation of the word of God” (a formulation of the issue entirely in line with developments on the matter in Faith and Order* since Montreal 1963); (2) “the eucharist, as the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, an offering of praise to the Father, the sacrificial memorial and real presence of Christ and the sanctifying outpouring of the Holy Spirit” (again a vision consistent with the eucharistic section of Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry); (3) “ordination, as a sacrament, to the threefold ministry of the episcopate, presbyterate and diaconate”; (4) “the magisterium of the church, entrusted to the pope and the bishops in communion with him, understood as a responsibility and an authority exercised in the name of Christ for teaching and safeguarding the faith”; (5) “the Virgin Mary, as mother of God and icon of the church, the spiritual mother who intercedes for Christ’s disciples and for all humanity”.

Having already recognized that “certain features of the Christian mystery have at times been more effectively emphasized” in other communities than the Roman Catholic Church (para. 14), the pope repeats that “the talents of each must be developed for the utility and the advantage of all” (87). It is now (88-97) that the pope returns to “the ministry of unity of the bishop of Rome” (in the service of which he places this very encyclical). Declaring “the Catholic church’s conviction that in the ministry of the bishop of Rome she has preserved, in fidelity to the apostolic Tradition and the faith of the fathers, the visible sign and guarantor of unity”, John Paul II acknowledges that this ministry “constitutes a difficulty for most other Christians, whose memory is marked by certain painful recollections”. Yet he notes that the matter is being studied again in both bilateral and multilateral dialogues and – given “the real but imperfect communion existing between us” – humbly invites “church leaders and their theologians” to “a patient and fraternal dialogue” concerning the exercise of this “necessary” ministry.

Early ecumenical response to the encyclical was strongly positive, both for its forthright advocacy of the cause of unity and for the invitation to dialogue on the “Petrine” ministry (the latter doubtless helped by the widespread informal appreciation of John Paul II’s own playing of the role of universal pastor and teacher). Theologically, attention has been given to the nuances of the ecclesiology stated or implied in the encyclical: when, for example, it affirms that “the one church of Christ is effectively present” in “other Christian communities” through “elements of sanctification and truth”, may this new phrasing be seen as one more step by Rome away from an “ecumenism of return”? Or again: the official response of the United Reformed Church in the United Kingdom notes that, in regard to the magisterium* of the church and to the Virgin Mary (the fourth and fifth of the pope’s topics for further study), “the current teaching of the Roman Catholic Church... has been developed in isolation from those other churches and ecclesial communities with which the Roman Catholic Church acknowledges a real but imperfect communion. This must have implications for what can be regarded as the starting point for continuing dialogue.”

GEOFFREY WAINWRIGHT

■ C.E. Braaten & R.W. Jenson eds, Church Unity and the Papal Office: An Ecumenical Di- alogue on John Paul II's Encyclical "Ut Unum Sint", Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 2001 ■ J.F. Puglisi ed., Petrine Ministry and the Unity of the Church, Collegeville MN, Liturgical Press, 1999 ■ "Ut Unum Sint: A Response from Faith and Order", ER, 50, 2, 1998.

VATICAN COUNCILS I & II

ST PETER'S basilica within Vatican City witnessed the 20th (Vatican I) and 21st (Vatican II) of the general councils which the Roman Catholic Church (RCC) customarily enumerates in its long history.

VATICAN I (1869-70)

In June 1868 Pius IX (pope 1846-78) formally convoked a council of bishops, abbot-presidents, and generals of male religious orders. It would, he intended, be a bulwark against the principles and ideologies of the Enlightenment and the French revolution (1789), which were corroding the Christian religion, specifically rationalism, materialism and atheism.

In September 1868 the pope invited also the patriarchs of the Armenian, Coptic, Syrian and Greek Orthodox churches. Because of the invitation's wording, all declined. A public papal appeal to "Protestants and all non-Catholics" to return to the only true fold also received resentful refusals. During the Council itself, 774 Council fathers participated, mostly European in birth. The number was double that of the previous council, Trent* (1545-63).

The preparatory committees had prepared 51 drafts (schemata) of proposed decrees, but the Council discussed only six and promulgated only two dogmatic documents: Dei Filius: God the Creator, the human possibility of knowing God and the human need for revelation,* and the nature of faith* and its relation to reason; and Pastor Aeternus: the institution, continuation and extent of the papal primacy* of the bishop of Rome, and the extent and limits of papal infallibility.* The latter statement re-cast two later chapters of the lengthy draft on the church (the entire draft had never been discussed). Because of the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian war in July 1870 and the Italian occupation of the papal states in September, Pius IX abruptly suspended Vatican I in October.

VATICAN II (1962-65)

During the 90 years after Vatican I, every area of personal and communal experience was changing – social, cultural and scientific, economic and political, intellectual and psychological. In both positive and negative responses to these changes, biblical, liturgical, missionary and ecclesiological renewal* movements were becoming steady but hesitant streams in the RCC, especially after the second world war. Although encouraged by Pius XII (pope 1939-58) through lengthy papal encyclicals,* such movements needed more affirming integration.

Three months into his papacy, on 25 January 1959, John XXIII announced his intention to convoke “an ecumenical council for the universal church”. The pope gradually clarified his intention and hopes: the Council would be a means of spiritual and apostolic renewal, an updating (aggiornamento) of the church in modern times, and a service to the unity of the church. The Council would not be a “re-union” gathering of all Christian churches but a Catholic event.

During 1959-60 the Vatican solicited “wishes and desires” for the Council agenda from more than 2800 bishops, 156 superiors general of male religious communities, 62 theological and canonical faculties of Catholic universities, and the Roman curia.* The collated results of 9520 pages in 15 volumes were handed over to 11 commissions, which began to shape drafts into 119 booklets. These 119 had been whittled down to 20 projects by the time the Council fathers assembled for the first session in October 1962.

One of the preparatory drafting groups was Pope John’s newly created Secretariat (now Pontifical Council*) for Promoting Christian Unity. It was responsible also for negotiations with other Christian World Communions* to delegate official observers to the Council’s public and closed sessions.

From October 1962 to December 1965, the bishops (from 2100 to 2540 at any one time) gathered for debate during four long autumn sessions – 168 plenary working meetings and 10 public assemblies during 36 weeks, with continuous re-drafting between and during each yearly session. Also participating were from 200 to 400 invited theologians and other experts (periti).

With one-fifth of the bishops from Latin America, and over one-third from the local churches of Asia, Africa and Oceania, Vatican II marked the transition of the RCC to a worldwide body. The majority of RCs were no longer found in the northern Atlantic regions. Unlike Vatican I, Vatican II did not hear Europe as the all-controlling voice. In plenary debate only Latin was used.

In his opening address to the bishops, John XXIII set the pastoral tone which pervaded the deliberations. He chided “those prophets of doom who are always forecasting disaster, as though the end of the world were at hand”. God is leading us “to a new order of human relations” in a world which expects “a step forward towards doctrinal penetration and the formation of conscience”. This new step must be “in conformity with ancient doctrine”, but “the deposit of faith is one thing, the way it is expressed is another”. The church demonstrates the validity of its teaching not by condemnation or severity but with “the medicine of mercy”. The pope emphasized the church’s duty to work actively for “the full visible unity in truth” among all Christians in a “fullness of charity” which should extend also to non-Christians.

Present at the first session was the first group of 38 delegated observers from almost all the Christian confessional families. By the Council’s end, 186 had participated for longer or shorter periods. Their most active presence, including their suggestions to the drafters, became a fact and a symbol of RC ecumenical need.

John XXIII died on 3 June 1963, after the first session; by canon law, the Council was suspended. His successor, Paul VI (1963-78), quickly announced that Vatican II would continue according to the spirit and direction of John XXIII. The last three sessions produced 16 statements. With over 100,000 Latin words, this body of material far outstripped all previous general councils in its wide-ranging agenda. The themes included divine revelation, the church, the liturgy, bishops' pastoral office, the ministry and life of priests, priestly formation, the laity, Christian education, religious life, Eastern Catholic churches, the church in the modern world, missionary activity, ecumenism, non-Christian religions, religious freedom, and the communications media.

Vatican II used the church as the fulcrum or vital centre around which all aggiornamento themes organized themselves. The result was the two key documents, identified by their opening Latin words: the Church (Lumen Gentium) and the Church in the Modern World (Gaudium et Spes). But the other 14 statements also throw light on the RC understanding in the 1960s of what God, in Christ and through the Spirit, has promised to do and is doing in the midst of humanity through God's pilgrim people.

Without taking account of the debates and resolutions of Vatican II, it is impossible to understand the modern RCC. The church's current consensus and its dissents – its confidence and its hesitations in theology, pastoral and missionary activities, social and political involvements, ecumenical and inter-religious concerns, and understanding of its own structures – are a result of the Vatican II deliberations and of the subsequent debates about what they meant and intended.

TOM STRANSKY

- G. Alberigo, History of Vatican II, vols 1-5, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 1995- ■ C. Butler, The Vatican Council, 1869-70, Westminster MD, Newman, 1962 ■ M.T. Fattori & A. Melloni eds, Experience, Organisations and Bodies at Vatican II: Proceedings of the Bologna Conference, December 1996, Leuven, Bibliothek van de Faculteit Godgeleerdheid, 1999 ■ A. Flannery ed., Vatican II: The Conciliar and Post-conciliar Documents, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1992 ■ A. Hastings ed., Modern Catholicism: Vatican II and After, London, SPCK, 1991 ■ R. Latourelle ed., Vatican II: Assessment and Perspectives Twenty-five Years After, New York, Paulist, 1989 ■ J. Miller ed., Vatican II: An Interfaith Appraisal, Notre Dame IN, Univ. of Notre Dame Press, 1966 ■ The Unam Sanctam series of texts and commentaries, Paris Cerf, 1967-, e.g. no. 64, Points de vue de théologiens protestants ■ L. Vischer, N. Nissiotis & A.F. Carrillo de Albornoz, in ER, 18, 1966.

VIOLENCE AND NON-VIOLENCE

THE NEED for clearer understanding of the churches' responsibility in an often violent world helped shape the early years of the modern ecumenical movement. It gave rise to the Life and Work* movement and inspired the formation of other Christian organizations, international in membership and ecumenical in vision, in the period between the two world wars.

Prior to 1960, however, the moral dilemma of violence was considered almost exclusively in terms of international conflict between sovereign states (see state). No easy consensus was forthcoming. "Can war now be an act of justice?" asked the WCC's founding assembly in 1948, concluding reluctantly that "we cannot answer this question unanimously" (see just war). Its second assembly (1954) affirmed that Christians should search for new approaches to peace,* "taking into account both Christian pacifism as a mode of witness and the conviction of Christians that in certain circumstances military action is justifiable".

Against this background, in which Christian pacifism* played a significant but not predominant role, the churches in the 1960s were drawn into serious reflection on violence as a reality in the struggle for social justice. Hints of the new discussion appeared at the WCC's third assembly in New Delhi (1961), which went on record exhorting those in power to refrain from using violence and to avoid provoking it. In a carefully phrased statement, the 1966 world conference on Church and Society asked "whether the violence which sheds blood in planned revolutions may not be a lesser evil than the violence which, though bloodless, condemns whole populations to perennial despair". Rejecting the view that absolute non-violence is binding on all Christians, it warned nevertheless against the evils inherent in any resort to arms and said violence could be justified only as an ultimate recourse.

During this period, Roman Catholic documents began to comment on the same issue. Emerging from Vatican II,* Gaudium et Spes praised those who renounced the use of violence in the movement for social justice. In 1967, Populorum Progressio noted the "temptation to violence" and warned that revolutionary uprisings generally produce far more harm than good. This emphasis has continued, in Vatican teaching, to the present.

The WCC's fourth assembly (1968) was painfully aware of the violence issue. Martin Luther King, scheduled to preach at the opening service, had been assassinated three months previously, and the assembly's dominant concern for justice sharpened the question of how social change should be advanced. A resolution of the assembly, encouraging churches to bring King's example to the attention of their members, asked the WCC's central committee to promote the study of non-violent methods of achieving social change.

Unprecedented debate on the subject was catalyzed within and beyond the churches when, in September 1970, the WCC executive committee approved a first set of grants from the special fund of the new Programme to Combat Racism,* some of which were to support humanitarian projects of liberation movements engaged in armed struggle in Southern Africa. A notable aspect of the ensuing controversy was the way in which many pacifists felt able to give full endorsement to the WCC's action, while the strongest objections were raised within traditionally non-pacifist churches. Another element complicating the debate was the confusion of meanings associated with terms such as "violence", "power",* "force", "non-violence" and "revolution",* particularly when discussion ranged across different cultural, linguistic and ideological lines.

Meeting a few months later, the central committee (Addis Ababa 1971) pointed out that the grants should be seen not as the WCC identifying itself with any political movement but as tangible support for the cause of racial justice. The Council, it added, could "not pass judgment on those victims of racism who are driven to violence as the only way left to them". In a related action, the department on Church and Society was asked to undertake a study aimed at furthering the churches' reflection on the ethical dilemmas posed by violence and non-violence in the struggles for justice and peace, and contributing to the search for strategies of action that might minimize the sum total of violence in conflict situations.

The two-year study project engaged people from a wide spectrum of viewpoints and experience: theologians from historic peace churches and leaders of denominations in the "just-war" tradition, activists involved in armed struggle and experts in non-violent strategies and tactics, sociologists and local pastors, biblical scholars and authorities on constitutional law – all of them from extraordinarily diverse local situations. It included a consultation at Cardiff, Wales (1971), to explore the potential of non-violent strategies, and culminated in a major report entitled Violence, Nonviolence and the Struggle for Social Justice that was presented to the central committee in 1973. After debating the matter at length and appending some comments of its own, the central committee commended the statement to the churches for study, comment and action.

The statement attracted considerable interest from the media and was well received by member churches. As it remains the most substantial piece of work the WCC has done on this subject, its main points are worth noting.

After observing that the problem of Christian responsibility in a world of force and violence is as old as the church itself, the document speaks of Christian hope* and the promise of the kingdom* as the context within which the church must try to elaborate guidelines for its social thought. The statement, in carefully crafted words, offered just such guidance. "We believe that for our time, the goal of social change is a society in which all the people participate in the fruits and the decision-making processes, in which the centres of power are limited and accountable, in which human rights are truly affirmed for all, and which acts responsibly towards the whole human community of mankind, and towards coming generations. Such a society would not be the kingdom of God, but it might reflect within the conditions of our time that subjection of the powers of this world to the service of justice and love, which reflect God's purposes for man."

Under God, governments have a legitimate and necessary function to restrain private power, assure human rights* and serve the public good. To this end they use force governed by law.* All human powers, however, are tempted to misuse and exceed their authority. No wielder of power is perfect, and a government may become so tyrannical and so hostile to its own people that citizens feel obliged to try to overthrow it. Then, says the statement, the goal should be not the destruction of the enemy but a more just social order in which contending groups are reconciled and enabled to participate in decisions affecting the community as a whole.

Without taking a stance itself, the document lists three distinct points of view about methods of resisting oppression. The first understands non-violent action as the only way consistent with obedience to Jesus Christ. The second sees violent resistance as a Christian duty in extreme circumstances, constrained by criteria similar to those traditionally applied to assessing a just war. "Not only must the cause be just and all other possibilities exhausted, but also there must be reasonable expectation that violent resistance will attain the ends desired, the methods must be just and there must be a positive understanding of the order which will be established after the violence succeeds." The third point of view recognizes violence as a seemingly unavoidable element in certain situations in which non-violence simply does not appear to present itself as an option.

While unable to reduce the three viewpoints to agreement, the statement goes on to register several important convictions on which there was consensus. It identifies some forms of violence in which Christians may not participate and which the churches must condemn: "Violent causes – the conquest of one people by another or the deliberate oppression of one class or race by another – which offend divine justice... Violent means of struggle – torture in all forms, the holding of innocent hostages and the deliberate or indiscriminate killing of non-combatants for example – which destroy the soul of the perpetrator as surely as the life and health of the victim."

It calls the churches and action groups to give more attention to the techniques of non-violence. "There are vast possibilities for preventing violence and bloodshed and for mitigating violent conflicts already in progress, by the systematic use of forms of struggle which aim at the conversion and not the destruction of the opponent and which use means which do not foreclose the possibility of a positive relationship with him. Non-violent action represents relatively unexplored territory..."

It challenges widely held misunderstandings of non-violence. "Non-violent action is highly political. It may be extremely controversial. It is not free of the compromise and ambiguity which accompany any attempt to embody a love-based ethic in a world of power and counter-power, and it is not necessarily bloodless. Moreover, most struggles for freedom – and most government actions – have been, as a matter of fact, mixtures of violent and non-violent action."

With a warning that Christians should be wary of handing out gratuitous advice on behaviour to people living in distant and different situations, the document notes that those near the top of the world's socio-economic pyramid must be particularly sensitive to the limitation their affluence places on their giving moral counsel to others less well placed.

Sharp questions are posed to all parties in the debate: those prepared to use violence, advocates of principled non-violence, those who by whatever means work to bring down an existing power structure, the defenders of institutions that are under challenge, and Christians in countries where government is relatively responsive to pressures for change. Yet the most important question, says the statement, is raised not by any one of these groups to any other but by all of them together to the whole church, which is challenged to become wiser and more courageous in translating its commitment to Jesus Christ into effective engagement in the struggle for social justice.

A decade later, in preparation for the WCC's sixth assembly, the 1973 statement was reviewed at a small consultation held at Corrymeela, Northern Ireland. Its report, Violence, Nonviolence and Civil Conflict, affirms the main thrust of the earlier work but notes a major change in the international scene and highlights significant shifts in the ecumenical debate.

In many places, says the Corrymeela document, optimism about the struggle for justice and peace has turned into something approaching despair. "For the churches, the question becomes how to articulate the gospel in such a way that we may be delivered both from the illusion of facile optimism and the paralysis of faithless pessimism.” Both pacifism and the just-war theory are feeling their inadequacies in the developing ecumenical debates about militarism,* weapons of mass destruction and revolutionary conflict. Indeed, the violence/non-violence dichotomy of the 1973 statement now seems a trifle simplistic, suggesting instead a broader focus on the variety of ways power is exercised and the constructive possibilities inherent in each.

The inauguration of the Justice, Peace and Integrity of Creation* process following the Vancouver assembly (1983) led to a renewed focus on questions of peace and non-violence, especially as they related to justice, not least in contexts of conflict.

But it was not until the Harare assembly (1998) that there was a clear focus to this commitment to the search for a new understanding of violence and non-violence. The assembly approved the Decade to Overcome Violence: Churches Seeking Reconciliation and Peace (2001-10), asking Christians to wrestle further with the recurring dilemma: What does it mean to be the church in the midst of violence, and how can the churches help create a culture of non-violence? The WCC committed itself to commission studies, facilitate campaigns against the perpetrators and instruments of violence, initiate education processes that seek to uphold the value and dignity of human life, encourage innovation in liturgy and biblical and theological reflection, and build networks of individuals, initiatives and movements for peace and non-violence.

See also violence, domestic; violence, religious roots of.

DAVID GILL

- S. Eskidjian, Overcome Violence: A Programme of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1997
- M. Kässmann, Overcoming Violence: The Challenge to the Churches in All Places, WCC, 2000
- Theological Perspectives on Violence and Nonviolence: A Study Process, WCC, 1998
- Violence, Nonviolence and Civil Conflict, WCC, 1983
- “Violence, Nonviolence and the Struggle for Social Justice”, ER, 25, 4, 1973
- Why Violence? Why Not Peace?, study guide, WCC, 2002
- W. Wink ed., Peace

Is the Way: Writings on Nonviolence from the Fellowship of Reconciliation, Maryknoll NY, Orbis, 2000.

VIOLENCE, DOMESTIC

GLOBALLY, domestic violence continues to be the most hidden form of violence. Still considered to be private and personal, most often there is a hesitancy on the part of family and community to interfere in what happens in the private sphere of the home. In 1993 the United Nations produced a resource manual entitled Strategies for Confronting Domestic Violence, where the term “domestic violence” is used to describe “incidents of physical and sexual violations, such as punching, choking, stabbing, throwing boiling water or acid or setting on fire, the result of which can range from bruising to killing; what may often start out as apparently minor attacks can escalate both in intensity and frequency”. Women have included in the definition psychological and mental violence, which can consist of repeated verbal abuse, harassment, confinement, and deprivation of physical, financial and personal resources. So the term “domestic violence” has come to include both physical and mental assault, primarily of women by husbands or partners.

Women’s movements around the world have brought to public consciousness the extent and intensity of this problem. Women’s refuge or crisis centres have long provided a safe space for women and children who need to be temporarily removed from a violent household. In many countries, because of the pressure exerted by the women’s movement, laws exist that protect women against domestic violence; the legal term “wife assault” is sometimes used.

The overwhelming majority of victims or survivors of domestic violence are women, though it is estimated that about 5% of those affected by domestic violence are men. Women have also been known to retaliate violently against the pain they experience and even to kill their partners when the violence gets unbearable. In some countries women are lobbying for such responses to be legally recognized as acts of self-defence.

It is difficult to estimate the actual extent of the violence in households around the world. Communities typically deny the problem, fearing that if it is revealed a family name will suffer. In many cases the women themselves do not wish to speak about it because of the humiliation of acknowledging openly the way they have been treated. Few official records are kept, as often in police stations domestic violence is trivialized; in many places the family resorts to various forms of pressure, including financial persuasion, to ensure that the first information reports given in police stations are manipulated.

The church has tended to remain silent on this issue, apart from an occasional reference to the problem, or by supporting a women's refuge. Several major denominations, particularly in the USA, Canada and Australia, have developed resource materials and handbooks describing practical, pastoral responses to support survivors of domestic violence. Some churches in other parts of the world have dealt with specific forms of violence in the domestic sphere, but by and large the church too has tended to treat domestic violence as personal and private, particularly in a bid to safeguard the sanctity of the Christian family and church marriage. However, women in Christian homes may face the same kind of abuse as any woman faces, and increasingly such women have begun to speak out. The WCC project of team visits to all member churches, in the context of the Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women,* has recorded the voices of women speaking out against domestic violence in all regions of the world.

Particularly difficult for women to comprehend is the religious sanction given to the violence. The church, for instance, has sometimes used the theology of the cross and suffering as legitimizing the agony women experience. Women are admonished, sometimes by clergy, to see it as a salvation experience and keep silent and forgive the abuser as Christ did in the face of his ultimate sacrifice on the cross. But the silence is being broken in all regions of the world, a sign of hope that domestic violence will ultimately be overcome.

See also violence and non-violence; violence, religious roots of.

ARUNA GNANADASON

- A. Gnanadason, No Longer a Secret, WCC, 1993
- A. Gnanadason, M. Kanyoro & L.A. McSpadden eds, Women, Violence and Non-violent Change, WCC, 1996
- N. Nason-Clark, The Battered Wife: How Christians Confront Family Violence, Louisville KY, Westminster John Knox, 1997.

VIOLENCE, RELIGIOUS ROOTS OF

ALL RELIGIONS claim to offer salvation. The offer of it, however, especially when accompanied by zeal, has sometimes produced intolerance and violence. Jesus of Nazareth, whose preaching of the gospel of the kingdom ultimately grew into the Christian church, became a victim of violence from religious leaders of his day, leading to his crucifixion as a rebel and impostor (Matt. 27:63).

In the 4th century A.D., when Christianity was imperialized, this story of violence rooted in religion continued, not only against non-Christians but also against other Christians, thus sundering the una sancta.* Emperor Constantine I (306-37), though proclaiming Christianity religio licita, tended more and more between 330 and 337 to suppress paganism, only stopping short of uprooting the imperial cult for fear of eroding popular loyalty. His suppression of centres of pagan cults included the robbery of treasures to enrich Christian churches in the "second Rome" he was building and the demolition of pagan temples.

Constantine also began to act in matters inside the church, suppressing heretics and schismatics and seeking to enforce unity among Christians because, as he saw it, the unity and well-being of the empire depended on the concord in common faith and worship of all citizens of the empire. These policies of suppression and enforced unity were continued by emperors and secular powers throughout the middle ages, as also were the trials and executions of supposed heretics or dissidents directly by the church or by reliance on the secular authorities. The crusades* are another expression of violence in which political, economic and religious factors were involved but that was justified on religious grounds.

The story of violence with its roots in religion seems unending. Ulster (Northern Ireland) is today synonymous with sectarian violence between Catholics and Protestants. The present crisis of a violent Roman Catholic-Protestant schism has its beginnings in the battle of the Boyne (1690) at which the Dutch king William of Orange defeated the Roman Catholic king James II. Roman Catholicism is predominant in the south (Eire), and Protestantism in the north (Ulster). The Protestants in the north are the Unionist Party, a name signifying their wish to be united with Great Britain, and the Roman Catholics in the south are the Republicans, who want a separate political identity. Though ostensibly the clash between the Roman Catholics and Protestants, it needs to be seen as the politicization or ideologization of Christian faith. In the process the una sancta is broken.

Yugoslavia too has in the 1990s been through a tunnel experience of violence in which religion was a factor, and has been notorious for ethnic cleansing. Croatia is predominantly Roman Catholic, Serbia mainly Orthodox, and Bosnia-Herzegovina mainly Muslim. Tensions arising out of ethnic identities and political interests were fuelled by conflicting religious orientations, leading to brutal wars, massacres and migration. The Conference of European Churches called a meeting at the Ecumenical Institute, Bossey, Switzerland, in an attempt to mediate dialogue between the religions in Yugoslavia, at which the Orthodox patriarch made a very significant statement: "But the soldiers do not listen to us [church leaders]." This declaration could indicate that the avowals of defending "Christian civilization" against the Muslims were merely a cover for "demonizing the opposition".

Africa too has many stories of religion as a factor in violence. In South Africa the apartheid* regime and its allies, which included the church, inflicted much violence on the coloured and blacks in the name of defending "Christian civilization". The National Party, which implemented the ideology of apartheid, had its roots in the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk. Theological legitimization was provided for segregation, separate development for different colours of peoples and even violence against the blacks. All this was done for the sake of the Christian faith. But in reality, the faith had been ideologized.

Sudan also continues to experience violence in the name of religion. In November 1995 a joint pastoral letter by the Roman Catholic bishops of Sudan reported a policy of genocide by the Sudanese government in an attempt to transform the religiously and ethnically plural Sudan into an Arab, Islamic state. The Islamic government in the north initiated a military offensive against civilians in southern Sudan and Nubia mountains, enslaving women, men and children, and forcing Christians and animists in the south to convert to Islam. In this aggressive attempt to achieve religious homogeneity, the rich diversity of cultures, languages, communities, and religious and ethnic identities that characterizes Sudan was destroyed.

In the violent conflicts in Central America during the 1970s and 1980s and in the dictatorships of the Southern American countries in the same period, cases of human rights violations, torture and murder were justified as the defence of the Christian faith. Some extreme religious groups, and in some cases the church authorities, provided the needed legitimization for these acts of violence. The racial acts of violence against blacks in the south of the United States had religious justification, which may persist even now in some areas.

However, most churches and ecumenical bodies have denounced and clearly rejected such religious justification of violence, turning instead to defend and support its victims.

The root cause of religiously inspired violence is using faith to support an ideology. For example, words like "Christendom", "Christian civilization" and "fundamentalism" often mask an ideology of power which rejects religious pluralism. Each society needs to renounce certain myths that support such ideologies, such as the doctrine of national security, the equating of Christianity with democracy and the counterposing of democracy and socialism. In religiously plural societies, the ideologies of government must foster the wholeness of peoples, primarily their freedom of conscience and expression.

Also, Christians could look at mission as calling peoples to their true humanity in God's own image. The WCC consultation on dialogue, held in Chiang Mai in 1977, proposed a revised understanding of mission as the building of a community of communities. This thought has found its way into the WCC's Guidelines on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies. Such revision of the understanding and model of mission is urgent in dealing with a pluralistic society (see pluralism).

The ecumenical task, then, is to explore broadly what it means to be human, to teach and encourage a culture of magnanimity and hospitality in a context of pluralism, and to empathize deliberately with past opponents as a first step in dialogue and searching together for a common humanity.

JOHN S. POBEE and DEENABANDHU MANCHALA

- R.S. Appleby, The Ambivalence of the Sacred: Religion, Violence, and Reconciliation, Lanham MD, Rowman & Littlefield, 2000
- W. Beuken, K.-J. Kuschel, Religions as a Source of Violence, London, SCM Press, 1997
- B. Hagen, Non-Violence in the World Religions: Vision and Reality, London, SCM Press, 2000
- J. Galtung, "Violence, Peace and Peace Research", Journal of Peace Research, 6, 2, 1969
- J. de Gruchy & C. Villa-Vicencio eds, Apartheid Is a Heresy, Cape Town, David Philip, 1983
- Human Relations and the South African Scene in Light of Scripture: A Report, Cape Town, Dutch Reformed Church, 1974
- Reconciliation: Gift of God and Source of New Life, CCBC/CEC, 1995
- J. Witte Jr ed., Christianity and Democracy in Global Context, Boulder CA, Westview, 1993.

VISCHER, LUKAS

B. 23 Nov. 1926, Basel, Switzerland. From 1961 Vischer was research secretary of the secretariat of the WCC's commission on Faith and Order,* then its director 1965-79. As a WCC observer he followed the four sessions of the Second Vatican Council,* and became later the co-secretary of the Joint Working Group between the WCC and the Roman Catholic Church. He initiated and promoted various study projects, in particular the efforts leading to the three agreed texts on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.* He studied history and theology at the universities of Basel, Strasbourg, Göttingen and Oxford and received a D.theol. from the university of Basel in 1952. Ordained to the ministry in 1950, Vischer became pastor of the Reformed church in Herblingen, an industrial town near Schaffhausen. From 1980 to 1992 he served as director of the ecumenical institute of the Swiss Protestant Federation and taught ecumenical theology at the theological faculty of the university of Bern. He was moderator of the theological department of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches,* 1982-89. Ecological themes have become his primary concern.

PAULINE WEBB

- L. Vischer, Überlegungen nach dem Vatikanischen Konzil, Zurich, EVZ, 1966
- Ye Are Baptized, WCC, 1961
- ed., A Documentary History of the Faith and Order Movement, 1927-63, St Louis MO, Bethany, 1963
- ed., Histoire du christianisme en Suisse: une perspective oecuménique, Genève, Labor et Fides, 1995
- J.-J. Bauswein & L. Vischer eds, The Reformed Family Worldwide: A Survey of Reformed Churches, Theological Schools, and International Organizations, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1999
- C. Birch & L. Vischer eds, Living with the Animals: The Community of God's Creatures, WCC, 1997
- L. Vischer & J. Feiner, The Common Catechism, London, Search, 1975.

VISSEER 'T HOOFT, WILLEM ADOLF

B. 20 Sept. 1900, Haarlem, Netherlands; d. 4 July 1985, Geneva. Visseer 't Hooft was the first general secretary of the WCC (1948-66) and a leading figure in the 20th-century ecumenical movement. Like many others, he had his formative ecumenical experience in the Student Christian Movement (see World

Student Christian Federation). As chairman of the relief committee of the Netherlands student organization during his student years in Leiden, he attended several ecumenical conferences in Europe. In 1924, after finishing his theological examinations, he accepted a position on the Geneva staff of the world committee for the YMCA.* His introduction to the wider ecumenical movement came the following year, when the YMCA named him an alternate delegate to the Stockholm Life and Work* conference (where he was the youngest participant).

During the 1926 YMCA world conference in Helsinki, he served as personal assistant to John R. Mott – learning, he wrote later, “the art of running a complicated world conference”. The previous year, during a visit to the US with Mott to prepare for the Helsinki conference, he had become interested in the social gospel movement,* and in 1928 he wrote a critical study of it as his Leiden doctoral dissertation. Though trained in theology and subsequently ordained a minister in the National Protestant Church of Geneva and the Netherlands Reformed Church (his own background was in the smaller Remonstrant Brotherhood Church in Holland), Visser 't Hooft never considered himself a theologian; and he described his own writings on theological subjects as “interpretations across confessional and linguistic frontiers of thoughts which I have picked up from the theological pathfinders”.

Appointed general secretary of the World Student Christian Federation in 1932, Visser 't Hooft made his first trip to Asia in 1933 to help organize Christian students there. He attended both of the 1937 global ecumenical conferences where it was decided to form a world council of churches – the Oxford Life and Work meeting as part of the steering group, and the Edinburgh Faith and Order conference as a member of the executive committee. At the 1938 meeting in Utrecht, where the WCC was formed, he was named general secretary of its provisional committee. At its first assembly (Amsterdam 1948) he assumed the general secretaryship, continuing in that post until his retirement in 1966.

Visser 't Hooft chaired the steering committee for the world conference of Christian youth (Amsterdam 1939), the last major international ecumenical event before the war. After the war broke out, he worked actively from Geneva to assist refugees from Nazi Germany and maintain liaison between churches in occupied territories and the outside world.

Beginning in 1948, his tenure as WCC general secretary (in an organization for which there were, as he said, no precedents) involved him in endless travel around the world, making a vast number of personal contacts, lecturing and speaking on behalf of the Council and attending hundreds of meetings large and small.

He himself described the job as one of administration (coping with a rapidly expanding programme and budget), policy-making (helping the churches to find better ways to define and fulfill their “common calling”), liaison (between the WCC's staff and its member churches and governing bodies), “external affairs” (building relations with non-member churches, especially Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholic and African churches, and with intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations), interpretation (including editorship of The Ecumenical Review, weekly meetings with the department of information and annual lectures to the graduate school at Bossey*) and serving as chief of a large staff of men and women from many different national and confessional backgrounds.

Central to all this activity was Visser 't Hooft's unwavering commitment to the unity* of the church.* “The ultimate aim of the movement”, he once observed, “is not dialogue, but true unity. Our Lord did not pray ‘that they may all enter into conversation with one another’; he prayed that they all may be one.” This did not mean building something which had not existed before: “all ecumenism that is worthy of the name is a movement of concentration, a return to the sources, or still better a return to the centre. The ecumenical movement is Christocentric, otherwise it cannot exist at all.” Critical of “underground” and “private” ecumenism, he stressed the importance of linking the movement to enduring manifestations of the church through the ages.

Following his retirement, the WCC's fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968) elected him honorary president. Visser 't Hooft remained in Geneva, which had made him an honorary citizen, staying active in the WCC until the 1980s, contributing to debates in nearly every meeting of the central and executive committees. Until shortly before his death he was a regular visitor to the ecumenical centre, where he was often joined in conversations by WCC staff and others over afternoon tea.

Concluding his Memoirs with a reflection on how the ecumenical scene of the 1970s differed from that of the early days, Visser 't Hooft affirmed what he described as a shift in orientation from a certain "institutional preoccupation" to service to all of humanity. "When the World Council gives high priority to the issues of worldwide development, or when it takes very concrete steps in the fight against racism, it is certainly not denying the mandate which it has received. When we study the problems of church unity in the light of the unity of mankind, we are not changing our course altogether, but seeking to bring together two dimensions which had always been there but which had not been sufficiently related to each other." At the same time, he insisted that the church's task was more than "the agenda of the world", for "if the church is the church of Jesus Christ, it knows only one destination: the kingdom of God. And all human goals must be critically analyzed in the light of the information which we have received about the nature of that kingdom and the road that leads towards it."

Visser 't Hooft, who had suffered from emphysema for several years, died in Geneva in July 1985. Three days earlier he had given a radio interview to a German journalist and had completed the second draft of a long survey of WCC-Roman Catholic relations since the 1920s.

The recipient of numerous awards and honorary degrees from around the world during his life-time, he received a vast number of tributes at the time of his death – not only from leaders of WCC member churches and ecumenical organizations but also from the pope and the queen of the Netherlands. Five Festschriften were published in Visser 't Hooft's honour, the first on his 60th birthday. His own literary output was staggering – including an estimated 50,000 letters.

Among the more than 1500 items to appear under his name in printed or duplicated form were some 15 books in several languages. His 1973 Memoirs and his 1982 Genesis and Formation of the WCC are invaluable sources of information about the origins of the ecumenical movement.

A close associate on the WCC staff during Visser 't Hooft's tenure has written of his personal energy – which "characterized everything from his entry into a room, to conversation, to his ultimate commitment, always expressed by the words 'calling' and 'common calling'" – and his capacity of discernment. "He did not engage in long analyses, nor did he listen to them patiently. His mind grasped the essential point – whether of world historical developments, proposed departmental programmes, or drifts in the central committee or the life of the member churches – with immediate clarity and penetration. It was a capacity that made him unable to suffer fools gladly."

Another person who worked with him for many years wrote after his death that without Visser 't Hooft's "combination of gifts the WCC might never have existed. No other person in the leadership of those days possessed the acumen, imagination, statesmanship, experience, daring, energy and languages necessary to bring it into being."

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- W.A. Visser 't Hooft, The Genesis and Formation of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1982
- Memoirs, WCC, 1973
- No Other Name: The Choice between Syncretism and Christian Universalism, London, SCM Press, 1963
- The Pressure of Our Common Calling, New York, Doubleday, 1959
- A. van der Bent, Voices of Unity: Essays in Honour of Willem Adolf Visser 't Hooft on the Occasion of his 80th Birthday, WCC, 1981
- A. van der Bent, Willem Adolf Visser 't Hooft, 1900-1905: Fisherman of the Ecumenical Movement, WCC, 2000
- A.M. Chirgwin, These I Have Known: William Temple, William Paton, W.A. Visser 't Hooft, Martin Niemöller, London, Missionary Society, 1964
- J. Maury, W.A. Visser 't Hooft: pionnier de l'oecuménisme Genève-Rome: textes (préfaces du Cardinal Roger Etcheagaray et du pasteur Konrad Raiser), Paris, Cerf, 2001
- J.R. Nelson ed., No Man Is Alien: Essays on the Unity of Mankind, Leiden, Brill, 1971
- Willem Visser 't Hooft, Eugene Carson Blake (= ER, 38, 2, 1986).

VOCATION

CHRISTIAN doctrine teaches that God* takes the initiative in calling people to faith* and glory. Humans themselves have not decided that it would be good to enjoy eternal life; they have been called to a life of glory by a God who freely desires to share everlasting life and love. The vocation of every human being is the attainment of life with God (see salvation).

Besides consistently holding that God takes the initiative, Christian doctrine also maintains that God's call reaches us through Jesus Christ.* Jesus comes at the appointed time and preaches conversion and the kingdom: "The kingdom of God is at hand; repent, and believe in the gospel!" (Mark 1:15 RSV). Those who hear the good news and have a change of heart enter the realm of God and look forward to eternal glory.

The New Testament speaks of a salvation that is for everyone: "God our Saviour... desires everyone to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. 2:3-4). This passage seems to imply that everyone is called, that everyone has a heavenly vocation. But other passages seem to narrow the call to eternal life, including the following: "Those whom [God] foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son, in order that he might be the firstborn within a large family. And those whom he predestined he also called; and those whom he called he also justified; and those whom he justified he also glorified" (Rom. 8:29-30).

Augustine, Calvin and Luther understood this and similar passages in terms of a special election on the part of God. In inscrutable freedom God chooses some to receive the effective grace of Christ and so to attain eternal glory; others are not elected and do not receive the power of conversion.* Today almost all churches in their contemporary statements agree that God does not appoint some persons for glory and others for damnation. The call and the power of conversion are present for everyone, but the individual is able to thwart the call.

The scriptures bear witness to the call to individuals such as Abraham, Jeremiah, John the Baptist and Paul. They were called to perform a task. The same may be said of Jesus; he was called for a mission, and his commitment to the kingdom became clear in his baptism and preaching.

All Christian believers are called to holiness and perfection, but not all are called to the same ministries. The Holy Spirit* provides an abundance of gifts, and believers become recipients of multiple charisms* and ministries (e.g. teaching, administering, encouraging and consoling).

All churches recognize the need for a variety of ministries, but they do not agree about how the ministries are ordered or arranged (see ministry in the church, church order). They recognize that all believers are called to perform tasks in the church, but they differ in their understanding of the variety, performance, dignity and rank of the ministries. Many churches, for example, distribute most of the ministerial tasks to the offices of bishop, priest and deacon. Other churches exclude or minimize these offices in favour of a more general priesthood or at least a less distinctive office of service.

All believers are called to a life of conversion and holiness* (see sanctification) which includes discipline of the body and of the mind, self-sacrifice, generosity, etc. The NT churches promoted a life of poverty, self-giving and prayer (see Acts 2:42-47). In the late 3rd century and the beginning of the 4th, some Christians desired to live the Christian life more intensely by following what came to be called the monastic movement. It involved a life alone or in community, the discipline of celibacy, prayer, simplicity, common use of goods and obedience to a spiritual master. Anthony of Egypt stands as the foundational figure; he heard the call of the gospel (Matt. 19:21), took it quite literally, gave away his property, and went into the desert to pray and to lead an ascetic life.

The church, especially the medieval church, acknowledged and was marked by the monastic and religious life. But its promotion also had the effect in many circles of downgrading the regular Christian life of ordinary labour and marriage. The 16th-century reformers were generally critical of the religious life and discouraged or forbade it in their churches, emphasizing instead the goodness of the daily life of labour and marriage. Today one notes again an interest in monastic and religious orders in the Reformation traditions, e.g. the community of Taizé* and the Anglican Benedictines. Vatican II* (1962-65) both maintained the special place of religious life in the church and generally emphasized the goodness of the created world and the labours that sustain human life.

The churches today cannot avoid the global quest for liberty and equality as they consider their vocation as a whole. The quest affects the understanding of God's call, which must not appear arbitrarily or capriciously selective, and it must go out to all peoples; in some way or other, the call must be received by everyone, preferably through the church but in other ways as well (the call of conscience,* the call of equal rights etc.).

The quest also affects the understanding of the people who are called to be one people of God;* they are called to holiness in Jesus Christ. Distinctions in tasks and ministries are appropriate, but access to the love of God (to a divine vocation) is present for all. God calls people, one and all, to conversion, holiness of life, and the joy of everlasting glory.

JEROME THEISEN

- G.R. Preece, The Viability of the Vocation Tradition in Trinitarian, Credal and Reformed Perspective: The Threefold Call, Lewiston NY, Edwin Mellen, 1998 ■ K. Raiser, "That the World May Believe: The Missionary Vocation as the Necessary Horizon for Ecumenism", IRM, 88, 350, 1999 ■ A. Ravestein, "The Beneficent Appeal: The Other Side of Vocation", IRM, 89, 355, 2000.

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

W

WAR GUILT

AFTER THE SECOND world war the leaders of the Protestant church in Germany made the confession that Christians in Germany had been implicated in the crimes committed by the National Socialist government, including the second world war (Stuttgart declaration,* 18-19 October 1945). The declaration acknowledges their guilt in relation to God. "We accuse ourselves for not witnessing more courageously, for not praying more faithfully, for not believing more joyously and for not loving more ardently." The confession was made in the presence of delegates of the WCC, which was in process of formation. This was a helpful step for re-integrating the Germans into the ecumenical communion. There were no comparable acknowledgments of guilt in the victorious countries, although Visser 't Hooft and other church leaders had suggested taking into account the fact that many nations share guilt in a case of total war.

Discussion of the church's role in the war continued. There were declarations in Hungary deploring political errors of the church (esp. its commitment to nationalism) and demanding a new course in politics as well. Similarly, leaders of the Confessing Church* in West Germany, the Bruderrat, suggested a new political approach to reconciliation and social justice (Darmstädter Wort 1947). In 1948 anonymous voices in Czechoslovakia blamed the political impotence of the government on the moral and spiritual weakness that had already been manifested in the expulsion of Germans in 1945; the church had been implicated in this lack of resistance to inhumanity. In 1966 the synod of the Protestant church in Germany declared that the whole German people were liable for the consequences of the war. Praying for God's forgiveness of sin, the church hoped for reconciliation with the nations of the Eastern bloc.

At least two Japanese churches have made similar statements. The United Church of Japan issued its "Confession of Responsibility for World War II" in 1967, and the Japan Baptist Convention adopted a "Statement on War Responsibility" at its 42nd annual meeting in 1988.

In these confessions of guilt, every church also claimed to speak for its own nation. The confessions thus became a political sermon, even if they were not overtly pursuing political purposes. Here we find a mixture of the recognition of guilt, which calls us to repentance, and the discernment of wrong developments and faults, which demands a new beginning and a new course. The horror of the second world war, with its terror and destruction of moral values, prompts the question whether war as war is always sin,* justifiable under no circumstances.

The notion of war guilt poses an ongoing question: Is it possible to pinpoint completely the sin which leads to war? In the 20th century the League of Nations and the United Nations organizations were established to determine and to condemn such actions as lead to war beyond any national interest. Since The Hague peace conferences (1899 and 1907) there have been efforts to appoint international courts of arbitration, which are intended to make moral judgments of military conflicts. But often the protection of the struggle for human rights* and human values (freedom and justice) are given as valid reasons for military interventions. It is often difficult to distinguish such justification from the mere will to have power.*

GERHARD SAUTER

- K. Koyama, "Father, Forgive...", ER, 47, 3, 1995
- H.-G. Link, "Ein neuer Anfang: die Stuttgarter Erklärung in ökumenischer Sicht", ÖR, 34, 1985
- J.S. Trojan, "Das Stuttgarter Schuldbekenntnis aus mitteleuropäischer Sicht", ÖR, 45, 2, 1996.

WEBER, HANS-RUEDIGER

B. 21 March 1923, Ruchwil, Switzerland. Weber was director of the WCC department on the laity, 1955-61, associate director and professor at the Ecumenical Institute, Bossey,* 1961-71, and director of biblical studies at the WCC, 1971-88. After ordination in the Swiss Reformed Church in 1947, he served as a missionary in Central Celebes and East Java; he obtained a doctorate in theology from the university of Geneva in 1966. After retirement from the WCC in 1988, he taught at the Pacific Theological College in Suva, Fiji.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- H.-R. Weber, The Book That Reads Me: A Handbook for Bible Study Enablers, WCC, 1995
- Experiments with Bible Study, WCC, 1981
- Immanuel, WCC, 1984
- A Laboratory for Ecumenical Life: The Story of Bossey, 1946-1996, WCC, 1996
- The Militant Ministry, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1963
- On a Friday Noon, WCC, 1979
- Power: Focus for a Biblical Theology, WCC, 1989.

WEDEL, CYNTHIA CLARK

B. 26 Aug. 1908, Dearborn, MI, USA; d. 24 Aug. 1986, Alexandria, VA. Wedel was a president of the WCC, 1975-83. Associate general secretary of the National Council of the Churches of Christ (NCCC) 1960-69, she became president, 1969-72, as well as director of the Centre for a Voluntary Society, and executive director of the Church Executive Development Board until her retirement in 1973. President of Church Women United, 1955-58, she was moderator of the NCCC broadcasting and film commission from 1955 to 1960. Wedel was an observer at the Second Vatican Council and was also a member of the WCC commission on the cooperation of men and women in church, family and society, 1952-61, and of the committee on the laity, 1961-68. She held a PhD in psychology from George Washington University, Washington, DC.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

WEEK OF PRAYER FOR CHRISTIAN UNITY

A WIDELY observed annual programme of ecumenical prayer, the WPCU is celebrated 18-25 January (more rarely at Pentecost* or, in the southern hemisphere, in July). Sometimes called simply "Prayer for Unity" to emphasize that the search for unity is intrinsic to the whole of the Christian life, it is based on the conviction that common prayer is fundamental to the search for the visible unity* of Christ's church. As one of the oldest and most enduring institutionalized expressions of "spiritual ecumenism" it is independent of, and complementary to, other widely observed programmes of prayer (such as the World Day of Prayer*).

Churches and revival movements had issued calls for prayer for unity since at least the 18th century. The WPCU originated with Anglican (later Roman Catholic) Paul Wattson's proposal in 1908 for a "church unity octave", held between the feasts of the Confession of St Peter (18 Jan.) and the conversion of St Paul (25 Jan.). Roman Catholic in orientation, this event was broadened by Abbé Paul Couturier's call in 1935 for a Universal Week of Prayer for Unity, a unity to be achieved "as Christ wishes and by the means which he desires". Since 1926 the Faith and Order* movement (involving Protestants and Orthodox) had published "Suggestions for an Octave of Prayer for Christian Unity", celebrated around Pentecost. From about 1957 a common WPCU text was prepared through informal cooperation between the WCC F&O commission and the Roman Catholic ecumenical agency Unité chrétienne (Lyons, France). Since 1966 the WPCU has been a joint project of the F&O commission and the Pontifical Council (formerly Secretariat) for Promoting Christian Unity* of the Roman Catholic Church.

The WPCU text for each year is developed by an international Protestant, Orthodox and Roman Catholic team of liturgists, biblical scholars, pastors and communicators working from draft materials prepared (since 1974) by a local ecumenical group. Each year's theme is based upon a biblical text; e.g. "we have this treasure in clay jars: 2 Cor 4:7" (2003, based on material from Argentina). The text (produced in English and French) includes an ecumenical service of the word (the most widely used part of the material); biblical readings, commentary and prayer intentions for each of the eight days of the observance; additional prayers and music from the local group; an account of the local ecumenical situation; and suggestions for activities on behalf of unity throughout the year.

The WPCU text is distributed through WCC member churches and Roman Catholic bishops conferences, as well as national councils of churches* and other ecumenical bodies, with local adaptation of the material strongly encouraged. The material is translated into many languages worldwide. Observances of the week are organized locally by churches or councils of churches or other ecumenical bodies. It is estimated that many millions of persons participate annually in WPCU observances throughout the world.

See also prayer in the ecumenical movement.

THOMAS F. BEST

- T.F. Best, "The Week of Prayer for Christian Unity: Promise and Problems", Ecumenical Trends, 14, 1, 1985
- D. Heller, "The Soul of the Ecumenical Movement: The History and Significance of the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity", ER, 50, 3, 1998
- H.-M. Steckel, "Gebetswoche für die Einheit der Christen", in Ökumene Lexikon, H. Krüger, W. Löser & W. Müller-Römheld eds, Frankfurt, Otto Lembeck-Josef Knecht, 1987
- J. Willebrands, "Prayer for Christian Unity", Ecumenical Trends, 17, 1, 1988.

WELFARE STATE

THE TERM "welfare state" is used to describe the acceptance by a nation state of collective responsibility for the well-being of all of its members. From its central financial resources, the state* provides services to meet the welfare needs of individuals or families.

The antecedents of the welfare state are to be found in the political philosophies and economic doctrines which emerged in some developed countries in the 19th century. It was realized that many people were confronting economic or social hardship which they could not overcome alone. Often the example and influence of Christians and the churches led to a greater public awareness of human needs and of how they could be met, which was based on the recognition that the extent of social need was greater than voluntary effort could provide.

By the early 20th century the scale of economic growth in some developed countries made it possible for the state to direct financial support to alleviate hardship. Help was made available to the very poor, the sick or the unemployed in the form of payments for social security or social assistance. By the 1920s many countries, with either centralized or federal structures, had begun to develop a range of inter-related public welfare services paid for primarily by taxation.

Such developments were affirmed by William Temple (1941) when he said: "In place of the conception of the power state we are led to that of the welfare state." In the UK, as elsewhere, the intentions of the social policy which provided the legislative basis for the welfare state were (1) to support or compensate those who were disadvantaged, (2) to help all people to achieve their personal potential, and (3) to create a social environment which offered communal benefits and helped eliminate sources of tension within communities.

These services, whether administered nationally or locally, typically made provision for social security, health, education, personal social services and housing. In some countries, employment and training services were also seen as welfare provision. Together, these major services constitute the components of a welfare state, ideally intended to be comprehensive in scope and as a bulwark against poverty and deprivation.

In communist and socialist countries the state assumed a central and directive role in the provision of welfare services. In other countries private (commercial) provision, e.g. in health or education, has coexisted with public welfare services. Furthermore, in many nations there has been a significant non-governmental sector, sometimes with governmental financial support, of which churches and religious organizations form an essential part.

The welfare state was originally based upon assumptions of consistent economic growth. It is argued that welfare expenditure in many countries is now very high, which itself has placed limits on economic development. When financial resources are limited, services cannot respond to any increase in demand, and they may have to be provided increasingly on a selective basis, with selection often through means-testing, which is now under challenge as a method of budgetary control.

In recent decades there has been public concern about the effectiveness of the welfare state. From the political right the promotion of welfare rights and entitlements has been questioned, and welfare-dependency alleged. The high cost and perceived bureaucratization of the system have been criticized. New emphasis has been placed by politicians upon the moral responsibility of individual citizens to care for themselves and their families. It is claimed that the welfare state represents a form of social engineering. State involvement in welfare should therefore be restricted to those in greatest need, within clearly defined priorities.

From the left it is affirmed that the continuing problems of poverty,* unemployment,* ill-health and inadequate housing require policies and programmes that are reformist and radical rather than ameliorative: they must actually tackle the causes of disadvantage and deprivation. Political, demographic, social and cultural changes raise questions about the basis of policy formulation and accountability within the welfare state.

Hence, there are contrasted sets of values: those tending towards individualism, free enterprise and market systems; and those emphasizing mutuality, equality and collective security. Debate now centres on whether the state should itself be the institution which provides welfare services on an extensive basis out of general taxation or general levies. If not, what residual role should it play if individual initiatives, family self-help or non-governmental services break down? The problem that faces countries which created a welfare state is whether to sustain a major programme of public welfare services and, if so, how to pay for it. One view is that, because of the prevalence of market capitalism,* some kind of social market system for welfare is almost inevitable. However, if a mixture of governmental, private and non-governmental welfare services emerges, it is important to ensure that citizens will gain access to the choice thus afforded. Everyone should be able to participate within a caring society by contributing and by receiving.

Individual Christians may be at any point in their country's political spectrum. Churches also take various stances on matters of national social policy, based on their beliefs, traditions and the social structure of which they are a part. Within a formalized welfare state or the mixed welfare society, they will expect to perform a serving role and an interpretative one, seeking to influence the course of social and economic policy, in a manner that makes known God's purpose for his creation.

The WCC, in view of its social concerns, was naturally favourably inclined towards the welfare-state policy. Although it seldom refers to it explicitly, the discussions of the "responsible society"* in the early 1960s tend to favour this conception of the role of the state. In the New Delhi (1961) assembly this notion appears in a more explicit way. However, some criticism developed in the late 1960s concerning the limitation of its perspective to the national scene (Evanston 1954 already called for a shift from "a social state" to a "social world" understanding of welfare, and this perspective dominated Uppsala 1968). The Geneva conference on Church and Society (1966) criticized the reformist perspective. At the Montreux consultation (1970) Samuel Parmar summarized the distinction between the WCC and the welfare-state approach to the question of development and social justice, indicating that the latter, "based on enlightened self-interest of owning classes", is "essentially a class doctrine, though considerably tamed and civilized by the increasing role played by the state in assuring a more equitable sharing of wealth".

Within all the developed economies the trend has been to more private, as distinct from public, provision in most fields of welfare, especially personal pensions and health insurance. Churches have protested that this trend inevitably promotes individualism and thereby selfishness, and that it aggravates social division and the exclusion of a large number of people and families from a sense of belonging in society. The crises of the welfare state which began in the 1980s and current developments in the globalization of economies have deepened this discussion within the ecumenical movement.

See also globalization, economic.

RAYMOND T. CLARKE

■ D. Mieth & M. Vidal eds, Outside the Market No Salvation?, London, SCM Press, 1997.

WILLEBRANDS, JOHANNES

B. 4 Sept. 1909, Bovenkarspel, Netherlands. Willebrands was secretary of John XXIII's newly created Secretariat (from 1989, Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity* (SPCU, 1960), and its president, succeeding Cardinal Augustine Bea, from 1969 to 1989.

With a doctorate in philosophy in Mussolini's Rome (1937), Willebrands, a young Dutch priest, returned for pastoral work in the centre of Amsterdam before teaching philosophy at Warmond. In the crucible of his nation's suffering during the Nazi occupation, he broke out of his previously sheltered Catholic milieu. With Protestants who were also in the underground movement, he experienced the fundamental unity of Christians and their common need to preserve the integrity of a defenceless country. After the war he became president (1946) of the St Willibrord association for ecumenical work in the Netherlands. In 1952 he crossed West and East European borders to enlist members for the Catholic Conference for Ecumenical Questions* which he directed. Many members later were among the bishops and official experts at Vatican II (1962-65).*

In the preparations for Vatican II, Willebrands initiated SPCU contacts with representatives of churches, international church bodies and Jewish organizations. Already in the 1950s he had been a frequent visitor to the WCC in Geneva, and he became a close colleague of fellow countryman W.A. Visser 't Hooft, its general secretary. Willebrands was the primary church diplomat in the negotiations for Catholic observers at the WCC New Delhi assembly (1961), and for Orthodox, Anglican and Protestant delegated observers at Vatican II. During the council, his theological acumen, ecumenical experience and low-keyed direction became critical in the SPCU's drafting of the debated documents on ecumenism, on religious freedom, on the relation of the church to non-Christian religions, and (co-drafting) on divine revelation.

After the Council, Willebrands helped to set up the whole range of official bilateral dialogues with other Christian communions, and he co-chaired the Joint RCC/WCC Working Group.* The cardinal (1969) president then became doubly burdened without complaint. The Catholic church in the Netherlands was in the turmoil of bitter divisions, also among its bishops. To try to facilitate reconciliation, in 1975 Paul VI sent Willebrands to Utrecht as its primate-archbishop and as the chairman of the bishops conference, while he still remained the SPCU president. John Paul II brought relief by naming his Utrecht successor in 1983, and the cardinal returned to Rome until his retiring as president in late 1989.

From 1980 to 1987 Willebrands co-chaired the international Orthodox-RCC dialogue.* And from 1974 he was the first president also of the Vatican commission for religious relations with the Jews.

Respect for him among a wide variety of people came from his quiet honesty, speaking blunt truth in unfeigned charity, fairly synthesizing consensus and lack of it, allowing others to be themselves, and always conveying realistic hopes.

TOM STRANSKY

■ J. Willebrands, Church and Jewish People, New York, Paulist, 1992 ■ Mandatum Unitatis, Paderborn, Bonifatius, 1989 ■ Oecuménisme et problèmes actuels, Paris, Cerf, 1969 ■ His biography and key addresses and sermons in IS, 101, 1999.

WILSON, LOIS MIRIAM

B. 4 Aug. 1927, Winnipeg, Canada. A president of the WCC, 1983-91, Wilson was president of the Canadian Council of Churches, 1976-79, and moderator of the United Church of Canada, 1980-82, the first woman in both positions. She has been associated with the work of the WCC in several areas. Ordained a minister of the United Church of Canada in 1965, she shared pastorates with her husband in Ontario, 1965-80. She was visiting lecturer on mission and evangelism in several theological colleges in Canada, and at the Ecumenical Christian Centre in Bangalore in 1975. Wilson has done extensive work in voluntary sectors such as Amnesty International* and has promoted interfaith dialogue* on the local level.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ L.M. Wilson, Like a Mighty River, Winfield BC, Wood Lake, 1981.

WITNESS

THE WCC'S NEW DELHI assembly (1961) considered witness, together with unity* and service (see diakonia), as the primary concerns of the ecumenical movement. In the attempt to clarify missiological vocabulary in its ecumenical setting, "witness" has come to mean the total evangelizing presence and manifestation of the church (see evangelism).

The most original New Testament usage of witness (martyria) is in the gospel of John (RSV). The incarnation* of the Word relates to the revelation* and knowledge of God.* "For this I was born, and for this I have come into the world, to bear witness to the truth" (18:37). Jesus speaks the words of God with authority* because "he who comes from above... bears witness to what he has seen and heard" (3:31-32): "we speak of what we know, and bear witness to what we have seen" (3:11). Jesus as the Word incarnate speaks out of his communion* with God, and therefore through him the disciples hear directly the word of God: "I have manifested thy name to the men... Now they know that everything that thou hast given me is from thee; for I have given them the words which thou gavest me, and they have received them and know in truth that I came from thee; and they have believed that thou didst send me" (17:6-8).

JESUS CHRIST, THE FAITHFUL WITNESS

Indeed, the heart of the NT is Jesus Christ,* the unique and decisive witness of God, "the faithful and true witness" (Rev. 3:14), "who in his testimony before Pontius Pilate made the good confession" (1 Tim. 6:13); he sealed the new covenant with his blood (see Heb. 9:24-28) by becoming "obedient to the point of death – even death on a cross" (Phil. 2:8). The faith,* glory, thanksgiving and worship of the church converge in front of the throne and in front of the Lamb (Rev. 7). The Lamb is given glory because he has been slain (Rev. 5:9). The relationship between cross and resurrection,* suffering servant and eschatological glory, is fundamental to the whole NT.

The witness of Christ – who sums up in his person the testimony borne by all prophets of the Old Testament and by all God's messengers – is the foundation of the church, which at Pentecost* bears witness to the resurrection. Any speculation about the essential role of martyrdom* in the mission of the church, without recognizing Jesus Christ as the one witness of God, has no biblical foundation.

In common biblical use, "witness" refers to bearing testimony to the world, proclaiming and making known that Jesus Christ is the Saviour and Lord of all humankind and of all creation.* Jesus Christ himself commissioned the disciples to be his witnesses (Acts 1:8). The Holy Spirit* comes upon the faithful and makes them witnesses of Christ. The epistles describe some of the ways in which the early Christians testified to the resurrection of Christ. There are certain essential dimensions of the Christian witness: we have an apostolic-missionary commission (Matt. 28:19-20); without love, such a witness is only "a noisy gong or a clanging cymbal" (1 Cor. 13:1); in bearing this witness, Christians are committing themselves to the diaconal service of others, for it is the good news of God they are bringing (Acts 13:32-33); the kingdom of God,* whose coming they have to proclaim in word and deed, consists in "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom. 14:17); witness includes the work of reconciliation* of people with God coming together under the one Head, who is Christ (Eph. 1:10); the church must be ready to witness also before the principalities and powers of this world (Eph. 6:12; see also Rom. 8:38-39); the Christian witness draws its power and nourishment from the word and sacrament.

EUCHARIST AS AN ACT OF WITNESS

For the apostolic community the celebration of the eucharist* is a proclamation of the Lord's death until he comes (1 Cor. 11:26). "Especially in difficult circumstances, the very celebration of the eucharist can constitute an act of witness. In 'impossible' situations, it proclaims that God alone creates a saving future. When it cries 'maranatha', the eucharistic community is calling for the overthrow of all that is opposed to God; it is praying for the final coming of God's kingdom: 'Let grace come: let this world pass away' (Didache 10). This hoped-for future is already prefigured in the fact that the eucharistic community itself includes pardoned sinners, reconciled adversaries, and the desperate restored to life: all are welcomed by the Lord at his table of justice, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit (cf. Rom. 14:17)" (Sharing in One Hope, 198).

CLOUD OF WITNESSES (HEB. 12:1)

The book of Revelation was written to increase the hope* and determination of the church in a period of disturbance and bitter persecution. Thus, the book emphasizes the martyrs, those faithful disciples who live in conformity with the Lord to the point of death. They "had been slain for the word of God and for the witness they had borne" (Rev. 6:9 RSV).

In the post-apostolic period Christians defended the gospel and established the church by the witness of their whole life; in certain circumstances, others bore this witness to the point of surrendering their lives in martyrs' deaths. Church tradition holds that most of the apostles were martyred. At the beginning of the 2nd century, Ignatius of Antioch considered that his martyrdom would "grind" him into one bread with Christ. New local churches often followed where the first evangelists or disciples had suffered martyrdom. Liturgical altars were built over the tomb of martyrs. "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church," wrote Tertullian.

Indeed, the ancient church venerated the Christian martyr as a strong witness to the living God and to the coming of his kingdom. But it never absolutized those "prophetic" acts and attitudes, recognizing instead a diversity of choices and possibilities. Christians are called to bear witness also through their active daily involvement in the world.

The witness of the monastic life takes up again in the church the witness of the martyrs of the early centuries. By striving to be unattached to worldly possessions or to family and to be available for God and one's fellow human beings, the monk or nun bears witness to the eschaton inside the church and thus exercises a truly prophetic ministry in showing forth the gospel's way of the kingdom (see religious communities).

COMMON WITNESS

The witness of the community as a whole has the same value and quality as the confession of those who followed the path of Christ in difficult or dangerous situations. But that witness has been undermined by the historical divisions among Christians and the churches. They are called nevertheless to give common witness* to those divine gifts which they already share.

Common Christian witness cannot replace the theological debate searching for the unity in a common faith, but it can help Christians to realize, through their unity in evangelism and mission,* the visibility of their incomplete universality. Common witness therefore gives a possibility of having a vision of catholicity* and of detecting a possible historical and pastoral universality in the midst of the existing doctrinal and ecclesiological divisions.

ION BRIA

■ I. Bria, The Liturgy after the Liturgy, WCC, 1996 ■ JWG, "The Challenge of Proselytism and the Calling to Common Witness: A Study Document of the JWG between the Roman Catholic Church and the WCC", ER, 48, 2, 1996 ■ G. Lemopoulos, You Shall Be My Witnesses: Mission Stories from the Eastern and Oriental Orthodox Churches, Katerini, Tertios, 1993 ■ Sharing in One Hope: Bangalore, 1978, WCC, 1978 ■ WCC, Common Witness, 1982 ■ WCC, Mission and Evangelism: An Ecumenical Affirmation, 1981.

WOMEN IN CHURCH AND SOCIETY

IT COULD BE argued that the first ecumenical encounter was the meeting between Adam and Eve. The man had to learn how to live with another human being like but unlike himself, without whom he could not survive in one household of diversity and unity. The affirmations of scripture that both male and female are made in the image of God and that in Christ both are incorporated into the one Body, the church, form the basis of the fundamental Christian conviction that men and women are of equal worth and have complementary and essential contributions to make within the life of the whole community.

In the church, the leading role in priesthood,* liturgy, policy-making and scholarship has in almost all denominations traditionally been reserved to men. But there is a long history throughout the church of the lay ministry of women (see laity), of women in religious orders, diaconates (see diakonia) and missionary service, and of the strength of women's movements within congregational life. In secular society, the 20th century was one of accelerating change for women. Profound questioning of their traditionally subordinate role led to a struggle for their full rights as citizens, for equal opportunities in employment and for a fuller partnership with men in all aspects of family and community affairs.

By the beginning of the 20th century such movements as the Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA),* the Women's World Day of Prayer,* the various auxiliaries for the support of women missionaries and sisterhood movements were pioneering ecumenical relations across denominations. At the 1910 international missionary conference, though the representation of women was very small indeed, the issue of women's work came on the agenda; and a study on "The Place of Women in the Church in the Mission Field" published in 1923 carried the recommendation: "What we ask is that the church keep pace with the other agencies that are according to woman a new status and new opportunities for development and achievement. The church, because of her own conservatism and lack of vision, is allowing trained, talented, spiritual women to slip away from her into other lines of activity."

By the time the WCC was in process of formation, the international network of women drawn together through the YWCA was already conducting research into the place of women in the church throughout the world. Through that work the WCC was itself encouraged to give systematic attention to evaluating the worldwide ministry of women, in a study which became the subject of one of the addresses at the first assembly in Amsterdam (1948). The address was given by Kathleen Bliss, whose subsequent book The Service and Status of Women in the Churches was a well-documented account of the work of women in all the major denominations except the Roman Catholic Church. It became the formative resource book for the permanent commission set up by the Amsterdam assembly on the life and work of women in the church. Speaking of its mandate, W.A. Visser 't Hooft commented: "The significance of this commission must be regarded in the light of the ecumenical movement, which seeks to foster the wholeness of the church and to work for its renewal. Unless women are given more responsibility in the life of their local churches, that renewal cannot be achieved. The work of the commission may meet with some nervousness. People may fear that we are going to make an onslaught on the whole tradition of some churches or interfere with their life. The commission will need an immense amount of tact in getting its ideas across."

Those diplomatic words proved prophetic. In the second half of the century the concern about women's participation in the whole life of the church, including holy orders, became a focus of ecumenical controversy. But parallel to that debate has been the growing awareness of the distinctive gifts of women, of feminist insights in theology and liturgy and of the mutual enrichment that comes through full partnership in ministry and service in both family and community.

The emphasis on partnership was echoed in the new title adopted by the Evanston assembly (1954) for the department dealing with what had been thought of as women's concerns within the WCC. It was now to be called the department on the cooperation of men and women in church and society. Madeleine Barot, the department's first executive secretary, developed relations with secular organizations, such as the United Nations, which were also increasingly concerned about the status of women. At the same time, she emphasized the need for the churches to reflect theologically on the status accorded to women within their own traditions. In a 1955 article in The Ecumenical Review, she appealed for a blending of male and female spiritual insights which would result in a theology to which women could more fully respond.

A subsequent theological consultation was held at Herrenalb, Federal Republic of Germany, in 1956 which examined in detail the question of the relationship between the sexes as reflecting a divinely ordained order. An important paper by André Dumas explored the concept of mutual submission in the context of common obedience to the authority* of the kingdom of God.* A further consultation, sponsored jointly with the department on the laity, recognized closer cooperation between men and women as an essential part of the renewal of the church and of the whole laos, the people of God.*

At the foundation of the All Africa Conference of Churches* in 1963, the women of the churches were invited to a preliminary gathering to prepare for their full participation in the new ecumenical body, an invitation they accepted with alacrity. In Asia, immediately preceding the New Delhi assembly (1961), a consultation was held in Madras on "Changing Patterns of Men/Women Relationships", which prepared the way for the enlargement of the women's department's mandate to include questions specifically relating to family life.

Within the Roman Catholic Church, women's responsibilities have traditionally been most frequently discussed in the context of family* life. The Second Vatican Council* made scarcely any other specific references to the work of women, except in the final drafting of the documents concerning the lay apostolate, which included the sentence: "Since in our times women have an ever more active share in the whole life of society, it is very important that they participate more widely also in the various forms of the church's apostolate." One of the chief advisers to the Vatican on the lay apostolate, Thomas Stransky, strongly recommended the formation of a women's ecumenical liaison group so as to create a network between Catholic, Orthodox and Protestant women. At a consultation in Taizé in 1967 on "The Christian Woman: Co-Artisan in a Changing Society", Lydia Symons, a Dutch Roman Catholic professor of theology, stressed that the church's vocation in humanizing the world requires full cooperation between male and female: "Above all, we need a form of spiritual care which will help women to live as adults in Christ, liberated from all subjugation to obsolete structures which have been maintained too long in many church circles."

The women's ecumenical liaison group was given personal encouragement by Pope Paul VI, who, in an audience with its representatives, stressed "the importance of women not only in the home, but in society generally and in the church". But the structure of the group was to prove short-lived, as the Vatican became more cautious about the creation of joint bodies developing an identity of their own. The official mandate of the group came to an end after only four years. The participation of Roman Catholic women in WCC consultations on all matters relating to women has continued on an informal and personal basis ever since.

Shortly before the Uppsala assembly (1968) Barot's indefatigable leadership of the department on the cooperation of men and women in church and society came to an end, and her place was briefly taken by Rena Karefa Smart of Sierra Leone and then for over a decade by Brigalia Bam of South Africa. At Uppsala attention was specifically directed to the low level of representation of women within the official delegation of the churches (less than 9%). It became apparent that the sexual discrimination endemic in society prevailed in the church too. The new word coming into vogue to describe such discrimination was "sexism",* a word used in the title of an all-women's consultation held by the WCC in Berlin in 1974 to prepare the churches to participate fully in the International Year for Women, designated by the UN in 1975, a year which expanded into a decade as concerns about the injustice, poverty and abuse of which many women were victims throughout the world became urgent matters for the international agenda.

The Berlin consultation on "Sexism in the 1970s" gave a dynamic impetus to the women who later attended the WCC assembly in Nairobi (1975), where for the first time a whole plenary session was given to the concerns of women. It was resolved to pursue issues of social justice* as they concerned women and to undertake further theological exploration and biblical studies in the light of feminine insights and experience. The resulting recommendations led to the launching of a new worldwide study process on "The Community of Women and Men in the Church", under the joint guidance of Faith and Order* and the Sub-unit on Women in Church and Society. The study was given a full-time director, Constance Parvey, an advisory committee and a four-year mandate. The preliminary study material had an unprecedented popular reception, involving more local groups in discussion and response than any other study initiated by the WCC. The responses were collated and formed the basis of an international conference held in 1981 in Sheffield, England, a conference whose message to the churches proved to be both controversial in its challenge to the long tradition of male domination and formative in its encouragement to both women and men to seek the mutual enrichment coming through fuller partnership.

In that same year Pope John Paul II addressed an apostolic exhortation on the theme of the community of the family, in which he spoke specifically of the many forms of degradation and discrimination from which women suffer and the high esteem Jesus always showed towards women and the responsibilities he entrusted to them. The pope underlined the equal dignity and responsibility of women with men, which, he said, fully justifies women's access to public functions. He went on to say, however, "The true advancement of women requires that clear recognition be given to the value of their maternal and family role, by comparison with all other public roles and all other professions."

The question of women's equal opportunity and participation* in all spheres of life had by this time become a frequent matter of debate in both secular and ecclesiastical circles. The sixth assembly of the WCC at Vancouver (1983) gave clear evidence that the process begun by the community study had prompted widespread concern for fuller representation of women in all the deliberative councils of the churches and for women's voices to be heard on all the major issues. Under the leadership of Bärbel von Wartenberg, who had succeeded Brigalia Bam as director of the women's desk, a conference for women was held preparatory to the assembly. During the assembly itself 12 of the speakers in main plenary sessions were women, and the worship, debates and whole corporate life were all influenced by the lively participation of women. In the official policy-making bodies elected by the assembly, the proportion of women elected rose to 29%.

The sixth assembly resolved that still further emphasis must be given to the needs and the contribution of women. It was decided by the central committee of 1987 that there should be a special decade during which the churches would demonstrate their solidarity with women. The decade was launched on Easter day 1988, under the leadership of WCC women's desk director Anna Karin Hammar. Its focus was on empowering women at all levels to participate more fully in the decisions that affect their destiny, to be partners with men in shaping the lives of their families and their societies and to be equipped for ministry in the churches in the full fellowship of the people of God.

The seventh assembly affirmed that a truly renewed community of women and men would be one in which the gifts of all groups of people would be valued. It is a community united by baptism, which shares differently but equally in the gifts of the Holy Spirit. Churches throughout the world today are being enriched by new and renewed ministries of women. Nevertheless, the report recognized that serious differences continue to exist between the churches on the question of the nature of these ministries, differences which could become a serious hindrance to unity, and it called on the Faith and Order commission to address in particular the ecclesiological questions raised by the debate about women's ministry. Churches were meanwhile encouraged to continue to focus on the Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women and to seek ways in which the rich variety of gifts and leadership among women might be channelled into all the assemblies, commissions and committees of the WCC.

The Decade culminated in a festival of celebration immediately preceding the WCC's eighth assembly at Harare in 1998. The festival addressed a letter to the assembly, calling on the churches to include women more fully in the life, liturgy and leadership of the church, and to expose and denounce as sin all violence against women.

Since the eighth assembly a process has been launched to bring before the churches insights from women's perspectives on new ways of "being church" which shall make for fuller partnership in the future.

See also anthropology, theological; community of women and men in the church; Ecumenical Decade of the Churches in Solidarity with Women; feminism; ordination of women; theology, feminist.

PAULINE WEBB

- W. Ariarajah, Did I Betray the Gospel?, WCC, 1995
- K. Bliss, The Service and Status of Women in the Churches, London, SCM Press, 1952
- J. Crawford & M. Kinnamon eds, In God's Image, WCC, 1983
- K. Kari-doyanes Fitzgerald ed., Orthodox Women Speak, WCC, 2000
- S. Herzel, A Voice for Women, WCC, 1981
- M. Oduyoye, Who Will Roll the Stone Away?, WCC, 1990
- On Being Church: Women's Voices and Visions (= ER, 53, 1, 2001)
- C.F. Parvey ed., The Community of Women and Men in the Church, WCC, 1981
- G. Paterson, Still Flowing: Women, God and Church, WCC, 1999
- E. Raiser & B. Robra eds, With Love and With Passion: Women's Life and Work in the Worldwide Church, WCC, 2001
- W. Robins ed., Through the Eyes of a Woman: Bible Studies on the Experience of Women, rev. ed., WCC, 1995 ■ Sexism in the 1970s, WCC, 1974 ■ B. Thompson, A Chance to Change: Women and Men in the Church, WCC, 1982 ■ P. Webb, She Flies Beyond, WCC, 1994.

WORD OF GOD

GOD* ACTS through his word, which is not only a means of communication and instruction but also a creative power (Gen. 1; John 1:3). Through his word God created the universe; through the preaching of Jesus (see Jesus Christ) the kingdom of God* came into this world; and through the Holy Spirit* this word is at work today. God does not carry out any fundamental work without his word, and without it nothing can be identified as coming from God.

BIBLICAL DATA

The Old Testament emphasizes the power of the word of God. God “spoke, and it came to be; he commanded, and it stood firm” (Ps. 33:9). The word that “goes out from my mouth... shall not return to me empty, but it shall accomplish that which I purpose, and succeed in the thing for which I sent it” (Isa. 55:11). It is fulfilled in creation,* salvation history,* the law* and prophecy.* The history of Israel is understood as election and salvation by and under the word of God. The decalogue is called the ten words (Ex. 34:28 lit.), and Deuteronomy identifies the law with the word spoken (Deut. 4:2, 15:15, 28:14). In the word of the prophet, God himself speaks to his people.* The dynamic character of the word is accompanied and given emphasis by the meaningful acts of the prophet. The word proclaims the devastating judgment which follows from the people’s unfaithfulness (Isa. 1-3; Amos 1-9; Hos. 4) and then the new life and re-establishment of the covenant,* the sign of God’s faithfulness (Ezek. 37; Jer. 31:31-34; Isa. 54). These various forms of the word of God complement and interpenetrate each other. They express God’s revelation* in the law and in history* and show the difference between God and idols (Isa. 41:4).

In the New Testament the use of the term “word of God” corresponds to what we find in the OT and means both scripture* and God’s self-communication in the Holy Spirit. The word of God involves more than a form of knowledge. It effects salvation when it is received in faith.* It is the word of life (Phil. 2:16), of salvation (Acts 13:26), of reconciliation* (2 Cor. 5:18-21) and of truth (Eph. 1:13) and is “living and active, sharper than any two-edged sword” (Heb. 4:12). “Word of God” thus becomes a synonym for “gospel”.

What is new in the NT lies in the close link there is between the word of God and the person of Jesus. In the synoptic gospels the word of God is the saving message of God which Jesus proclaims and with which he identifies himself; the proclamation of the kingdom of God and what Jesus does are one and the same reality (Luke 17:21). The word of God is the message of salvation effected in Jesus Christ. For John’s gospel, Jesus is the logos, and logos defines the actual person of Jesus (John 1:1-14). Because he is the word of God by which God has been expressing his will since the beginning of the world, the words, life and works of Jesus reveal him as the source of true life and as the final and saving word of God for humanity (see uniqueness of Christ).

From the NT period onwards, the question of the authority and interpretation of the OT has been raised. This problem sets Jesus over against the Pharisees (Mark 2:23-28, 3:1-6; Matt. 5:21-48; see also the parable of the sower, Mark 4:1-9). Paul states this problem in the form of the dialectical relationship of law and gospel. The OT law is holy, just and good (Rom. 7:12), but it cannot be imposed on gentile Christians (Gal. 1-4). The law cannot purchase justification in the presence of God, nor can it purchase salvation. It enables us only to become aware of sin (Rom. 3:20, 8:2). In and by the cross of Jesus Christ, the law has itself been abolished (Gal. 3). Jesus Christ is the fulfilment and the end of the law (Rom. 10:4). This gospel of Jesus Christ is the sole source of life (see life and death), the word which sanctifies and regenerates (1 Tim. 4:5; 1 Pet. 1:23). Paul and the young Christian church emphasize that the power of the word of God lies in its proclamation (Rom. 10:17; Eph. 6:17). The ministry entrusted with spreading this word is a divine institution (Matt. 28:18-20; Acts 20:24; 2 Cor. 5:18-20). In the word of the apostle, the word of God lets itself be heard and acts (1 Thess. 2:13). The word of those who are sent is the word of Jesus Christ, who is the sender (Luke 10:16; Rom. 10:15-16; Titus 1:2-3; see apostolicity).

HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENTS

The ancient church, in its opposition to Gnosticism and the movement of "enthusiasm" (Montanism), first narrowed down the idea of the word of God through the identification of holy scripture (the canon*) and the word of God (revelation). But there was also an expansion of its meaning. In the East the Greek understanding of the logos (reason) was set alongside the logos Christology. Origen insisted on the unity of the word of God in the flesh, in scripture, in the eucharist* and in reason. The literal and moral interpretations of scripture must be supplemented by the spiritual meaning derived from the logos. This view remained essential for the Orthodox churches, which emphasize the complementary nature of real inspiration* (God as the author of the scriptures) and of passive inspiration (internal illumination of the reader's mind for true knowledge of the word of God).

The West separates more clearly the word of God (kerygma and logos) and the revelation of God in reason (Tertullian, Cyprian), while seeking not to restrict the word of God to scripture. For Augustine, God is the eternal Word who gives himself to us in the sacrament* as the visible word and in the written and proclaimed word as an audible sacrament. To discover the fullness of the word of God in scripture, the latter must be interpreted in a fourfold way: literal or historical meaning, allegorical or doctrinal meaning, tropological or moral meaning, and anagogical or eschatological meaning (Augustine, John Cassian). The correctness of the interpretation of scripture as the word of God is protected through its being linked to the church* and to the dogmatic decisions (see dogma) of the councils of the church (see ecumenical councils).

The middle ages took up again the great Augustinian options while again restricting the word of God to scripture. It stressed the need for the dogma and Tradition of the church as a guarantee for the interpretation of scripture as the authentic word of God (Vincent of Lérins, Gregory the Great). Scholastic theology regarded holy scripture and Tradition as norms of the revelation and of the word of God (Anselm of Canterbury, Thomas Aquinas). In response to the Reformation, the council of Trent* (1545-63) specified that scripture and the traditions are dictated by Christ or the Holy Spirit (DS 1501) and that scripture cannot be interpreted contrary to the doctrinal tradition of the church (DS 1507).

For the 16th-century Reformation and especially for Martin Luther, understanding the word of God is central to theology. Scripture is the only true basis for faith (sola scriptura, norma normans non normata – scripture alone, the criterion which sets the criteria and is not itself subject to a criterion) and is its own interpreter. Under the working of the Holy Spirit, scripture becomes the word of God when it is proclaimed and interpreted in the light of the cross and resurrection of Jesus Christ, the basis of the sinner's justification* before God. The word of God is also given in the sacraments, which like scripture are means of salvation.* The word of God comes to us as a summons and judgment (law) and as a liberating and creative word (gospel). John Calvin insists on the "internal witness of the Holy Spirit", which makes scripture the word of God.

By its stress on the literal inspiration of scripture, Protestant orthodoxy (16th-17th centuries) identifies scripture and the word of God. But the word of God goes beyond scripture as such, as the eternal word of God (see Trinity), the incarnate word of God (Christology), the preached word of God (preaching) and the visible word of God (sacrament). This literalist view of inspiration was criticized in the Enlightenment, in pietism and by Friedrich Schleiermacher, with their view that the word of God is at work also in human experience.

In the 20th century, the Reformation concern was taken up again and developed in the theology of the word of God put forward by Karl Barth. He called for a return to the witness of scripture and rejected any other basis for faith. The presupposition for every theology lay in the fact that God has spoken. The written word of God cannot be verified either by historical research or by human experience. Human knowledge of God is based on the revelation of the Trinitarian God. By analogy with the Trinity the word of God comes in a threefold form as the revealed word of God, the written word of God and the proclaimed word of God. This word of God is simultaneously the communication, work and mystery of God. It is one and is given definitively in Jesus Christ. Exegesis must show "how the words relate to the word in the words" (see exegetis, methods of).

In Roman Catholic theology a new slant is given by Vatican II* and its Dogmatic Constitution on Divine Revelation, Dei Verbum (DV). Vatican I's statement that the magisterium of the church is the positive norm for scripture, which is therefore subordinate to it (DS 3007), is no longer used. Scripture "firmly, faithfully and without error" teaches the truth of God, the word of God which "shines forth in Christ, who is himself both the mediator and the sum total of revelation" (DV 11 and 2). The word of the church is the proclamation of the word of God as the word of scripture. The magisterium and doctrinal tradition of the church are fundamental but come from "the same divine well-spring" (DV 9); the witness of scripture is normative for the later tradition (DV 10,24).

THEOLOGICAL AND ECUMENICAL ISSUES

The ecumenical dialogues of the last few decades have revealed significant convergences among the various Christian families in their understanding of the word of God.

The Montreal conference (Faith and Order 1963) made it possible to have a common re-definition of the relation between scripture and Tradition. The word of God which has to be passed on is itself the Tradition (with a capital T), "God's revelation and self-giving in Christ, present in the life of the church" (Montreal, 45-46), of which holy scripture is the written form (50). Tradition (with a small t) is the transmission of the Tradition: "tradition can be a faithful transmission of the gospel, but also a distortion of it" (48). And finally, traditions (plural) "are the expressions and manifestations in diverse historical forms of the one truth and reality which is Christ" (47).

The bilateral dialogues* took up this convergence, which for the transmission of the word of God stresses the role of Tradition and the normative nature of the biblical witness (see Anglican-Orthodox dialogue, Moscow, 1976, 24-42; Reformed-Roman Catholic dialogue, "The Presence of Christ", 1977, 24-42; Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue, Malta, 1972, 14-25, and "Ways to Community", 1980, 62-65; Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue, Honolulu, 1981, 34; all in GinA-I). The question still open is that of the criterion for the faithfulness of the tradition and traditions to the Tradition, especially the role of the church and its magisterium* for determining what is the word of God (Anglican-Roman Catholic, Authority II, 1981, 23-33, in GinA-I).

A corollary of this convergence is the distinction (though not separation) between holy scripture and the word of God. The word of God is fully attested in scripture, which is essential for the church (Baptist-Reformed 1977, 1-3; ARCIC 1981, E1.2), but it cannot be reduced to scripture (Reformed-Roman Catholic 1977, 27). Under the influence of the Holy Spirit, scripture itself must become the word of God, the gospel, in which is transmitted the salvation God gives to the world in Jesus Christ. Out of this distinction arises the task of interpreting scripture, which no external datum can guarantee. "Neither the sola scriptura nor formal references to the authoritativeness of the magisterial office are sufficient. The primary criterion is the Holy Spirit making the Christ-event into a saving action" (Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue, Malta, 18).

This broader understanding of the word of God finds expression in the word-sacrament relationship, even if more dialogue is called for with a view to the exact definition of the sacrament. Word and sacrament cannot be set against each other (Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue, Dublin, 1976, 54-58, in GinA-I); by them God approaches human beings and gives his salvation. Following Vatican II (DV 21 and Sacrosanctum Concilium 7), Roman Catholicism insists on the efficacy of preaching and the unity in the sacrament of word and sign and accords a dominant role to the sacrament of the eucharist (Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue, Munich, 1981, 1-6; see also BEM,* E1). For the Lutheran, Anglican, Methodist and Reformed traditions, salvation is fully offered in the word of God whether in the form of preaching or in that of the sacraments (see Augustine). The separating character of the difference between Roman Catholics and these Protestants has here been overcome. Resolution is still needed, however, for certain traditions which consider the word of God to be given in the preaching and hearing of scripture, the sacrament being more a response of the believer and of the community to the word of God.

The question of extending the term "word of God" to cover other things besides preaching and sacraments remains more difficult. What is the value of what we find in nature? Of the order of creation? Of the witness of other religions? Can the word of God be discerned there as law? As gospel? Different traditions give different answers, and so far these questions have not been central in the dialogues. A reflection on the word of God and revelation, and on law and gospel, is necessary with regard to the ethical issues of the moment.

All the traditions agree in saying that the word of God, the gift of salvation, must be proclaimed throughout the world (Matt. 28:19-20; 1 Pet. 2:9-12). The word of God calls on Christians to display signs of love (Acts 6:1-6; 1 Thess. 4:9-10). The church lives on the promise that God himself is working in his world, which never goes forth without a response (Isa. 55:11).

See also Bible in the ecumenical movement; hermeneutics; nature; teaching authority; Tradition and traditions.

ANDRÉ BIRMELE

- K. Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik I/1-2 (ET Church Dogmatics, I/1 and I/2, Edinburgh, Clark, 1936 and 1956) ■ A. Birmelé, Le salut en Jésus Christ dans les dialogues œcuméniques, Paris, Cerf, 1986 ■ G. Ebeling, The Word of God and Tradition: Historical Studies Interpreting the Divisions of Christianity, Philadelphia, Fortress, 1968 ■ G. Ebeling, Wort und Glaube (ET Word and Faith, London, SCM Press, 1963) ■ A. Flannery ed., "Dei Verbum", in Vatican Council II: The Conciliar and Post Conciliar Documents, rev. ed., Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1992 ■ Joint Commission between the Roman Catholic Church and the World Methodist Council, The Word of Life: A Statement on Revelation and Faith, Lake Junaluska NC, 1996 ■ E. Lohse, "Deus dixit – Wort Gottes im Zeugnis des Alten Testaments und Neuen Testaments", in Die Einheit

des Neuen Testaments, 2nd ed., Göttingen, Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1976 ■ P. Lyons ed., Parola e sacramento, Rome, S. Anselmo, 1997 ■ H. Meyer & L. Vischer eds, Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level, WCC, 1984 ■ G. Wainwright, "Word and Sacrament in the Churches' Responses to the Lima Text", OC, 24, 1988.

WORK

TWO DIMENSIONS of work are revealed in Genesis. Work is a joyful task, a divinely appointed stewardship of the earth; and work is a punishment for sin,* a painful duty, a heavy burden. Christian theology must take both aspects seriously.

Since the Bible was produced in an agricultural society, the biblical texts respect manual labour. Today certain writers have been critical of the creation story because in it humans are appointed "to subdue" the earth and exercise "dominion" over the animals. These writers claim that since the Bible presents humans as exploiters of the natural environment, Christianity is partially to blame for the present ecological crisis. Yet since Genesis was written for an agricultural people, possibly a people just settling down after a nomadic existence, subduing the earth and exercising dominion referred to ploughing, sowing and harvesting, and the taming of animals. Responsible for the ecological crisis is the maximization of production, derived from the logic of industrial capitalism.*

In the Bible, manual work was honourable. By contrast, the Greek intellectual tradition, originating in a society based on slave labour, despised manual work. Labour was assigned to women and slaves. Man, or the free male citizen, was defined as an intellectual being. This cultural current has influenced Christian thought.

Writing in a feudal society, Thomas Aquinas praised work as a source of personal satisfaction and service to the community. The church had ritual blessings for fields, stables, tools and workshops. Yet even for Thomas, it was the rational soul that represented the image of God in human beings. Thus thinking and contemplating was the most honoured human engagement.

In the Reformation, work came to be looked upon as obedience to God, as a discipline and an achievement. This new ethos corresponded to the economic needs of the emerging modern society. Still, the modern philosophies continued to define humans in terms of their rationality. The Enlightenment thinkers, members of the bourgeoisie, had little respect for peasants and workers.

Karl Marx revolutionized philosophical thinking on labour.* He defined the human being as worker. Humans differed from the animal world because they alone had to produce the conditions of their survival (food, housing, clothing, etc.) by labour. Marx recognized the two aspects of labour specified in the Bible, distinguishing “creative labour”, defined as the way of human self-realization, from “alienated labour”, brought about by the exploitation inflicted on slaves, serfs and, in modern times, the working class.

In the bourgeois age, Christian theologians were slow to recognize the need for a theology of work. Only in recent decades have Protestants and Catholics seriously wrestled with this issue.

A good number of theologians, in critical dialogue with Marxism, have defined human beings created by God as workers and stewards. An early study is J.H. Oldham’s Work in Modern Society (1950), written for the WCC. Laborem Exercens (1981) developed a detailed theology of work (see social encyclicals, papal). Humans produce their world (the “objective dimension” of labour), and in doing so, they also realize their own potentialities (the “subjective dimension” of labour). The subjective dimension, human self-realization, has priority over the objects produced. Labour becomes alienated whenever the subjective dimension is subordinated to purely objective concerns.

Thus workers are meant to be “the subjects” of production. They are entitled to participate in the decisions regarding the organization of labour and the use of the product of their hands. Laborem Exercens argues that in capitalism and in communism, workers are excluded from these decisions and hence have become “objects” of production. Since justice* demands that workers be the subject of production, workers are destined to become the co-owners of the giant workbenches at which they labour.

Following this theology of work, many churches have denounced unemployment* as a social evil and called for public policies of full employment. Yet defining humans as workers has been seriously questioned by other churches. They say that since unemployment is becoming a permanent feature of automated, computerized society, Christians should define the human essence and human dignity independently of work and on the political level demand a guaranteed annual income for all.

Ecologically concerned Christians have also questioned a theology that defines humans as workers. Since the ecological crisis is produced by the maximizing impulse of capitalism, reflected to some extent even in the formerly socialist countries, the urgent task now is to scale down industrial production. Defining humans as workers, these Christians argue, only supports the present orientation towards industrial growth.

Another question in regard to the theology that defines humans as workers is raised by some Christians living in non-Western cultures. Is Western-style hard work really necessary? Is it human? In warm climates, they argue, human needs are quite limited; they could be met by a modest economy that relies on relatively simple tools and does not demand constant labour. Should the whole globe become Westernized? Or is there to be room for alternative cultures, based on subsistence economies, where people live lives that are materially modest yet culturally and spiritually rich?

GREGORY BAUM

- Christians in the Technical and Social Revolutions of Our Time, WCC, 1967, pp.62-64
- Dilemmas and Opportunities, WCC, 1959, pp.81-84
- C.-H. Grenholm, Protestant Work Ethics: A Study of Work Ethical Theories in Contemporary Protestant Theology, Uppsala, Uppsala Univ., 1993
- J. de Santa Ana, Towards a Church of the Poor, WCC, 1982
- M. Volf, Zukunft der Arbeit – Arbeit der Zukunft, Munich, Kaiser, 1988
- F. Wilson, “Reflections on Work in a Sustainable Society”, ER, 48, 3, 1996.

WORLD ALLIANCE FOR PROMOTING INTERNATIONAL FRIENDSHIP THROUGH THE CHURCHES

IN THE EARLY 1900s several church leaders were convinced of the need to apply Christian principles to international relations, to promote mutual understanding between nations and to develop and strengthen international law. Two members of the British parliament, Quaker J. Allen Baker and Anglican Willoughby H. Dickinson, were prompted by the two peace conferences at The Hague (1899 and 1907) to promote peaceful relations between the churches in Great Britain and Germany by a large-scale exchange of visits between church representatives. A German church delegation, led by Friedrich Siegmund-Schultze, visited England in 1908, and the next year an English delegation went to Germany. Both delegations included Roman Catholic clergy and laity.

Charles S. Macfarland, general secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ (USA, 1908), also played an important role in work for closer understanding between the US and European churches. In 1914, Protestant, Roman Catholic and Jewish organizations founded the Church Peace Union. A gift of $2 million from the industrialist Andrew Carnegie served to finance most of the activities of the future World Alliance (WA).

The first world war erupted on 1 August 1914, and the very next day in Constance, Switzerland, the WA was founded; only Christians were members. On 3 August the delegates quickly left for their homes, but Christians had formed an association for peace among the nations – an ecumenical pioneer movement to face international problems. The WA post-war conference in 1919 (The Hague) helped lead to the first conference on Life and Work* (Stockholm 1925). The WA would function through national councils in the USA, Canada, India, Japan and several European countries.

A 1929 peace conference of 500 delegates at Prague climaxed WA history. The delegates held that it was “a paramount duty of the Christian church to strive for the mental and moral disarmament of the people in all countries and to lead them at the same time to insist upon a rapid and universal reduction of armaments and the adoption of methods of arbitration and mediation in the settlement of all international disputes”. The WA further encouraged the churches to support wholeheartedly the League of Nations.

From 1931 to 1937 the WA and the Universal Christian Council for Life and Work were closely related through common offices in Geneva, a joint general secretary, joint youth work, and a common bulletin (The Churches in Action). However, it decided in 1938 to remain “an autonomous movement which serves the churches” and not join Faith and Order,* and Life and Work, in forming the WCC.

During the second world war most WA national councils in Europe were dissolved, and the Church Peace Union stopped its financial support of WA. Post-war attempts to re-establish it internationally proved unsuccessful; the primary disagreement was whether the organization should be solely Christian or interfaith. Meanwhile, in 1946 the International Missionary Council* and the WCC in process of formation created the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs. This continues to be the ecumenical agency within the WCC for advocating peaceful resolution of conflicts, disarmament and international reconciliation.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

- H. Dam, Der Weltbund für Freundschaftsarbeit der Kirchen 1914-1948: Eine ökumenische Friedensorganisation, Frankfurt, Lembeck, 2001
- C.S. Macfarland, Pioneers for Peace through Religion, New York, Revell, 1946
- R. Rouse & S.C. Neill eds, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 1: 1517-1948, London, SPCK, 1954.

WORLD ALLIANCE OF REFORMED CHURCHES

In 1970 THE WARC was formed through the merger of two older Reformed bodies, the Alliance of Reformed Churches throughout the World holding the Presbyterian System, founded in 1875 in London, and the International Congregational Council, which had first met in 1891, also in London. In 2002 the WARC included 215 Congregational, Presbyterian, Reformed and United churches in 107 countries, with an estimated 70 million plus communicant members. Three-quarters of these churches are in Africa, Asia and Latin America; many are minority churches.

Early attempts of the Presbyterian alliance to formulate a single confession for its member churches foundered on the rock of liberal-conservative conflict, and the WARC remains a federation of churches without a common confession. In 1982, however, it declared a status confessionis* on racism and apartheid and suspended two white South African churches from membership; the suspension of the Dutch Reformed Church was lifted conditionally in 1997.

The Reformed tradition generally sees every church as a particular expression of the one universal church of Jesus Christ; each community of faith contributes to the life of the whole (see Reformed/Presbyterian churches).

Through its "mission and unity" programme, the WARC promotes the unity of Reformed churches. The WARC fully supports the growth of the WCC, participates in annual conversations with other Christian World Communions,* and since the late 1960s has organized bilateral and multilateral dialogues with Christians of other traditions and people of other faiths (see Disciples-Reformed, Lutheran-Reformed, Methodist-Reformed, Orthodox-Reformed, Reformed-Roman Catholic dialogues).

In 1877 the Presbyterian alliance, then composed primarily of North American and Anglo-Saxon churches, defended the rights of Native Americans in the USA. Ever since, the WARC in both its branches has repeatedly expressed its commitment to human rights. In 1987 it was the first ecumenical organization openly to protest human rights violations by the Romanian government. It has been involved in efforts to re-unite Korea and in the struggle for democratization in such countries as Malawi, South Africa and Taiwan.

The WARC promotes the full partnership of women and men in church and society, since 1992 through its "programme to affirm, challenge and transform" (PACT) and since 1997 through a department of partnership.

A major contribution of the Reformed tradition to Christianity has often been its deep interest in theological reflection. In 1983, with its study on covenanting for peace and justice, the alliance initiated the WCC programme on Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation.* Studies in the 1990s focused on Christian community in a changing society, Christian-Muslim relationships, the challenge of the emerging ecclesiologies to church renewal, and Reformed faith and economic justice. On this last subject, the 23rd general council in Debrecen, Hungary, in 1997 mandated the alliance to begin a processus confessionis, a "committed process of progressive recognition, education and confession within all WARC member churches at all levels regarding economic injustice and ecological destruction".

A further concern in the 1990s was Reformed identity, which today is broad and somewhat blurred. WARC membership now ranges from John Calvin's Consistoire of Geneva to the Uniting Church of Australia and the united churches of North and South India. Some churches are guided by one or more early Reformed confessions, while others revise their confessions as they believe the times and the Holy Spirit dictate. While most of the member churches would agree that scripture is the final authority on matters of faith and practice, their interpretations of scripture range from the literalist to the liberal.

Such pluralism also incorporates wide cultural and contextual differences, further complicated by many member churches being minorities, not only religiously but also culturally and ethnically. The challenges which the alliance faces to celebrate diversity and unity, particularly in a world where political and economic realities preclude stability and are rife with injustice, demands of the WARC much flexibility as well as a firm grip of the Reformed dictum: ecclesia reformata sed semper reformanda (the church reformed but always being reformed).

PÁRAIC RÉAMONN

- J.-J. Bauswein & L. Vischer eds, The Reformed Family Worldwide, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1999
- D.K. McKim, Encyclopedia of the Reformed Faith, Louisville KY, Westminster John Knox, 1992
- E. Perret, World Alliance of Reformed Churches General Index 1875-1992, Geneva, WARC, 1994
- M. Pradervand, A Century of Service: A History of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches 1875-1975, Edinburgh, St Andrew, 1975
- P. Réamon ed., Introducing the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, Geneva, WARC, 1999 (also in French and German)
- A.P.F. Sell, A Reformed, Catholic Evangelical Theology: The Contribution of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches 1875-1982, Eugene OR, Wipf & Stock, 1998.

WORLD ALLIANCE OF YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATIONS

THE FIRST association known as the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) was founded in London in 1844 by 22-year-old George Williams to provide young men with a Christian atmosphere for spiritual and educational development, especially through Bible classes and prayer meetings. The movement rapidly spread to different countries of the British empire. The first North American branch was in Montreal in 1850, and the second in 1851 in Boston. Similar associations began to flourish on the European continent. Two of their main characteristics were mission at home and overseas and a will to move towards greater unity among Christians.

Jean-Henri Dunant in Geneva (later the founder of the Red Cross) and others had pressed for a world movement of the YMCAs, and in 1855 the first world conference was held in Paris. It adopted what has become known as the Paris basis, which sets out the fundamental principle of the world alliance: "The Young Men's Christian Associations seek to unite those young men who, regarding Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour according to the holy scriptures, desire to be his disciples in their faith and in their life, and to associate their efforts for the extension of his kingdom among young men."

Under the Paris rules only active members of evangelical Protestant churches were eligible for YMCA membership; this rule was re-affirmed in 1914 but relaxed in the 1920s. Nevertheless, the formula of the Paris basis to bring together those who regard "Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour according to the holy scriptures" was later used as a basis for the World Young Women's Christian Associations* (1894), the World Student Christian Federation* (1895), and the WCC (1948) (see WCC, basis of). YMCA leaders helped to shape the events after the 1910 Edinburgh mission conference, which led to the WCC formation and founding.

After the first world war the YMCA extended its work to Eastern Europe and reached agreements with leaders of the Eastern Orthodox churches. After the second world war, the World Alliance continued its contacts with the Orthodox churches through the ecumenical patriarch of Constantinople.

During the same period, important YMCA developments took place also in countries that were predominantly Roman Catholic. Work with prisoners of war during the second world war presented many opportunities for service to Catholics. In 1950 the alliance held a world consultation which involved Protestants, Eastern Orthodox, Roman Catholics and Copts from 27 countries, for whom this truly ecumenical fellowship was an "encouraging indication that Christians of the three confessions are drawing closer together" (C.P. Shedd).

In 1962 a consultation on ecumenical policy and practice for lay Christian movements was held jointly by the World Alliance of YMCAs and the World YWCA. The introduction to its report states that "it was one of the rare occasions in recent times when members of Orthodox, Protestant and Roman Catholic churches – both laymen and women and members of the clergy – have been privileged to join informally and intimately in prayer, Bible study and discussion on questions of ecumenical policy".

The Second Vatican Council opened new opportunities in the area of the YMCA's relationship with the Roman Catholic Church. During the Council and its aftermath, Frank Willis often travelled to Rome as a representative of the World Alliance and maintained friendly contacts with the staff of the Vatican Secretariat (now Pontifical Council) for Promoting Christian Unity (SPCU). In 1970 the YMCA special commission to re-evaluate the Paris basis had as one of the consultants Basil Meeking, a SPCU staff member.

Since then, YMCA contacts and working relationships have been developed not only with the SPCU but also with the Vatican offices for the laity, for inter-religious dialogue, and for justice and peace. Two consultations have been held between world alliance and SPCU representatives (1984, 1989). Catholic representatives have participated at local, national and regional levels in YMCA events concerning human rights and inter-faith dialogue.

The over 26 million YMCA members in 96 countries represent almost all Christian confessions and denominations and in some places include also people of other faiths or none. Particularly at local levels the YMCA works with, besides its members, millions more people of different social and cultural origins. Recently the YMCA has increasingly sought to address some of the inter-related core issues which affect all peoples, such as justice* and development,* peace* and human rights.* This initiative is based on the conviction that involvement in these issues is an integral part of the Christian character of the YMCA.

In the late 1980s, the world YMCA, as a lay organization in the context of contemporary social realities, was involved in searching for a deeper understanding of its Christian mission, through action-oriented studies related to justice and peace. There were also concentrated efforts to deepen understanding of the YMCA's ecumenical task in a climate of religious pluralism and secularization. The world council of YMCAs in Frechen, Germany, in 1998 adopted "Challenge 21", a new statement of mission.

ERIKA TYSOE-DÜLKEN

- C. Binfield, This Has Been Tomorrow: The World Alliance of YMCAs since 1955, Geneva, YMCA, 1991
- "Challenge 21", in Report of the 14th World Council of YMCAs, July 1998
- C.P. Shedd, History of the World Alliance of YMCAs, London, SPCK, 1955
- IS, 61, 1986, and 69, 1989.

WORLD ASSOCIATION FOR CHRISTIAN COMMUNICATION

THE ORIGINS of the WACC go back to 1950, to a meeting in Chichester, England, of Christian broadcasters from many of the national broadcasting corporations of Europe. The meeting was organized by Francis House, with the help of Edwin Robertson, at that time head of religious broadcasting at the BBC. Bishop George Bell of Chichester had encouraged him to organize an informal international conference on Christian broadcasting. That first meeting led to a statement of aims and methods of Christian broadcasting. The following years saw European agencies meeting with missionary societies from the US, which culminated in the World Committee for Christian Broadcasting, founded in Königstein, Federal Republic of Germany, in 1956.

In 1963 a new constitution was drawn up at a meeting in Limuru, Kenya, setting the ground rules for a new World Association for Christian Broadcasting (WACB). Five years later, in 1968, another group, the Coordinating Committee for Christian Broadcasting, merged with the WACB in Oslo, to form the WACC. Its concerns now included all forms of media to proclaim the gospel and its relevance to life and the promotion of a just society.

The WACC continued to develop and to cooperate with other organizations involved in Christian communication. In 1975 the Agency for Christian Literature Development (ACLD), a programme of the Commission on World Mission and Evangelism (CWME) of the WCC, was merged with the WACC in order, according to its new constitution, "to make more effective their common witness through the media of mass communication" (see Christian literature). Developing out of the CWME-sponsored Christian Literature Fund, the ACLD aimed to provide literature which would be addressed to people in their total environment, speaking in the idiom of contemporary society.

Combining print media with electronic media determined to a large extent both the work and structure of the new organization. Apart from providing fellowship among Christian communicators, the WACC's main task became the development and evaluation of projects, particularly in the third world. Around 150 projects are supported every year, such as audiovisuals, video, radio, book publishing, news services, communication education, journalism, music and others. The WACC's project work is mainly in sectors of society which have limited resources.

During the 1970s, however, there was a great deal of debate on the problems of international communication, most of which was spurred on by the non-aligned movement and communication specialists working for non-governmental organizations. This discussion resulted in the call for a new international information order, which greatly influenced the "new WACC". In parallel, the WACC closely followed the international discussions on the relationship between communication and socio-economic development.

The WACC promotes its policies and principles through studies (e.g. theology and communication, women's issues), training and publications: a quarterly journal, Media Development, offers articles on topics of interest in the area of communication, and Action, a monthly newsletter, carries news of events and trends in communication worldwide, with an occasional supplement Communication Resource. The WACC also sponsors the publication of books by subsidizing researchers and authors, especially from the third world.

The majority of members and almost all the partner organizations which support the WACC are deeply rooted in the ecumenical movement as it has developed in the Protestant and Orthodox families of churches. It is primarily these churches which have provided the vision and inspiration for the WACC throughout the various phases in its history. For this reason, the WACC has given priority to ecumenical work. It seeks to maintain close contacts with the WCC and denominational families at the international level, like the Lutheran World Federation. Likewise, the WACC emphasizes close ecumenical relationships on the regional and local levels. The WACC has a long tradition of close relationships with Roman Catholic institutions at various levels, such as UNDA (International Catholic Association for Radio and Television), OCIC (International Catholic Organization for Cinema and Audiovisual), UCIP (Union catholique internationale de la presse), CSCC (Centre for the Study of Communication and Culture) and CMC (Catholic Media Council).

Speakers and writers of other faiths have sometimes participated in the WACC's forum work, giving new insights and contributing to dialogue in the sphere of international communication. The WACC has made a provision in its guidelines for applicants to the small-projects fund "whose work reflects Christian values" and who wish to address themselves to "crucial issues facing people and communities", while expressing "an ecumenical vision that recognizes the oneness of all people regardless of race, sex or religion". This ecumenical openness with respect to people of other faiths also applies to secular groups which share the WACC's understanding of communication.

The WACC is organized in eight regions which determine the composition of its governing body, the central committee. Each region establishes its own priorities and work structure in order to meet the needs each defines. World headquarters are in London. The WACC currently comprises more than 800 corporate (e.g. church agencies and communication institutions) and individual members.

Four major international events were organized by the WACC in recent years. The first world congress (Manila 1989) considered the theme "Communication for Community", and the second (Puebla, Mexico, 1995) "Communication for Human Dignity". With the cooperation of Isis International and the International Women's Tribune Centre (IWTC), an international women's conference was held in Bangkok (1994) with the theme "Women Empowering Communication", as part of an increasing emphasis in the programme on women. The 2001 congress in the Netherlands addressed the theme "Communication: From Confrontation to Reconciliation". The findings of these international events – all attended by denominational and ecumenical communication officers, communication professionals, academics and grassroots practitioners – and the input of the regions provided the basic material for the WACC's five-year programme.

Praxis and reflection have shaped the profile of the WACC over the years. The understanding of communication and the churches' mission in it have been the basis for the WACC's self-criticism as well as the incentive to renewal and greater commitment. The WACC's main policy statement, "The Christian Principles of Communication", expresses the common Christian witness in the service of a participatory, liberating and prophetic communication that creates community and supports and develops culture.

CARLOS A. VALLE

- P. Lee ed., Communication and Reconciliation: Challenges Facing the 21st Century, WCC, 2001
- P. Lee ed., The World Association for Christian Communication 1975-2000: A Labour of Love, WACC, 2000
- WACC, Statements on Communication by the WACC, rev. ed., London, WACC, 1995.

WORLD CONFERENCE ON RELIGION AND PEACE

THE FIRST WORLD conference on religion and peace was held in Kyoto, Japan, in 1970, culminating several years of preparation. Already in 1961 some senior religious leaders from the world's major religious traditions initiated a number of international exploratory journeys to promote sponsorship of a "religious summit" which would address the need for actions on behalf of peace.* Religious communities that gave early support to the conference included the Baha'i; Mahayana and Teravada Buddhism; Orthodox, Protestant, and Roman Catholic Christianity; Confucianism; several streams of Hinduism; some communities of indigenous spiritualities; Shiite and Sunni traditions of Islam; Jainism; Reform Judaism; some of the New Religions; Shintoism; Sikhism; and Zoroastrianism.

The WCRP mandate is to promote the establishment of national and regional bodies of the WCRP and to initiate an inter-religious engagement with international and intergovernmental partners in a programmatic pursuit of multireligious dialogue and actions for peace. The WCRP has individual or institutional membership in over 100 countries and 35 national chapters. It enjoys consultative status with the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) of the United Nations, with UNESCO and with UNICEF.

World assemblies have been held at Louvain/Leuven, Belgium (1974), Princeton, New Jersey, USA (1979), Nairobi, Kenya (1984), Melbourne, Australia (1989), Riva del Garda, Italy (1994) and Amman, Jordan (1999).

The organization attracts funding from individual donors, religious communities, international development organizations and philanthropic foundations, as well as from governments in Nordic countries of Europe and the USA.

The WCRP engages itself through its chapters on every continent, and often in cooperation with governments and civil society, in conflict transformation and reconciliation, human rights and responsibilities, the child and the family, development and ecology, disarmament and security, and peace education.

The WCRP has been especially active in monitoring issues of disarmament and human rights. It is engaged in various inter-religiously funded humanitarian projects, such as among Vietnamese boat people (1976-78), Khmer refugees (1979-81) and victims of drought in Africa; in international multireligious initiatives in situations of conflict, including Sri Lanka, South Africa and Lebanon; as well as direct involvement in conflict transformation in the former Yugoslavia, the Horn of Africa and Sierra Leone. The involvement of the WCRP in organizing interfaith events related to the UN summits, the earth summit, the social summit and others confirms the commitment to strengthen the contribution of religious traditions as instruments for peace and reconciliation in world society.

HANS UCKO

- J.-C. Basset, Le dialogue interreligieux: Chance ou déchéance de la foi, Paris, Cerf, 1996
- H. Jack, WCRP: A History of the World Conference on Religion and Peace, New York, WCRP, 1993.

WORLD COUNCIL OF CHRISTIAN EDUCATION

IN 1889 MORE THAN 900 Sunday school leaders registered for the first convention of what soon became the World Sunday School Association. More than 400 came from Great Britain and Ireland, and almost an equal number from the US and Canada. These leaders represented a lay movement (only 54 of the North Americans at the convention were ordained ministers) that had originated in England around 1780 to provide some elementary schooling for urban youngsters, who were increasingly present and troublesome in the cities. The movement spread rapidly to North America and, mostly through the Free churches, into much of Europe.

What started as a school to teach reading, writing and arithmetic to wayward children soon developed into a school for the churches. It became an evangelistic activity to bring children into contact with the church and the Christian message. It also provided nurture that substituted for and complemented religious training in the home and gradually included more and more children of church members.

Missionaries from "sending churches", chiefly in Great Britain and North America, developed Sunday schools which in many lands served as forerunners of formal education systems that developed later. Sunday schools constituted a major strategy of the world missionary movement. It is claimed that “Jesus Loves Me”, the “song of the Sunday school”, became the best-known hymn throughout the Christian world.

The Sunday school depended on lay volunteer teachers who used curriculum materials produced by church or religious agency publishers. It provided a significant place for the leadership of women. In many places it offered classes for adults. The official church organizations often gained control of the movement, although its identification with children and women continued to limit its stature within many churches.

In the late 1940s the change of name to World Council of Christian Education (WCCE) symbolized its expansion into youth activities and other field services. Reports of its work in different nations were made to its regular world meetings. From 1889 to 1958 the WCCE sponsored 14 world conventions, all but the first two registering more than 1000 delegates; they were held in London (1889 and 1898), St Louis, Jerusalem, Rome, Washington, Zurich, Tokyo (1920 and 1958), Glasgow, Los Angeles, Rio de Janeiro, Oslo and Toronto. World assemblies and institutes followed until the final assembly in 1971 in Peru, when years of cooperative work, frustrating relationships and negotiations led to a vote to integrate with the WCC. General responsibility for continuing its work was lodged in the newly established Office of Education of the WCC.

WILLIAM B. KENNEDY

■ W.B. Kennedy, The Shaping of Protestant Education: An Interpretation of the Sunday School and the Development of Protestant Educational Strategy in the United States, 1789-1960, New York, Association Press, 1966

■ G.E. Knoff, The World Sunday School Movement: The Story of a Broadening Mission, New York, Seabury, 1979.

WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES

THIS ENTRY deals with the origins, the basis, nature, purpose and functions, the organization and finances of the WCC. Several other entries deal with the developments in ecumenical thinking and activities which the WCC has initiated and fostered through its programmes and personnel.

ORIGINS

The WCC was constituted at the first assembly (Amsterdam) on 23 August 1948. It became the most visible international expression of varied streams of ecumenical life in the 20th century. Two of these streams – Life and Work* (L&W) and Faith and Order* (F&O) – merged at the first assembly. A third stream – the missionary movement, as organized in the International Missionary Council* (IMC) – was integrated at the 1961 third assembly (New Delhi). And a fourth stream – Christian education – entered with the 1971 merging of the World Council of Christian Education.*

Each of these movements is wider than any of its structured expressions, including the WCC fellowship of churches. “Applied” or “practical” Christianity, for example, had been institutionalized not only in the L&W movement but also in the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches* (1914). Some world missionary bodies, such as the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization,* still carry out many of the original evangelism aims of the IMC. The WCC youth department could never replace the YMCAs,* the YWCAs,* or the World Student Christian Federation.* And no one would claim that F&O can gather and focus the whole bewildering variety of biblical/theological thinking.

In 1920, the Church of Constantinople (the Orthodox Ecumenical Patriarchate) became the first church to appeal publicly for a permanent organ of fellowship and cooperation of “all the churches” – a “League of Churches” (koinōnia tōn ekklesiōn) similar to the proposal after the first world war for a League of Nations (koinōnia tōn ethnōn). Also calling for the same in the 1920s were church leaders such as Archbishop Nathan Söderblom (Sweden), a founder of L&W (1925), Bishop Charles Brent, a founder of F&O (1927), and J.H. Oldham (UK), a founder of the IMC (1921).

In July 1937, on the eve of the world conferences of L&W at Oxford and of F&O at Edinburgh, representatives of the two movements met in London. They decided to bring the two together and to set up a fully representative assembly of the willing churches. The proposed new organization “shall have no power to legislate for the churches or to commit them to action without their consent; but if it is to be effective, it must deserve and win the respect of the churches in such measure that the people of greatest influence in the life of the churches may be willing to give time and thought to its work”. Also involved should be laypeople who hold “posts of responsibility and influence in the secular world”, and “a first-class intelligence staff”. S. McCrea Cavert (USA) suggested the name “World Council of Churches”.

Both Oxford and Edinburgh accepted the proposal and each appointed seven members to a committee of 14, which met in Utrecht in May 1938 and in turn created a provisional committee responsible for the WCC “in process of formation”. William Temple (archbishop of York, later of Canterbury) was named chairman, and W.A. Visser ’t Hooft (Netherlands) general secretary. The provisional committee established a solid foundation for the WCC by resolving constitutional questions concerning its basis, authority and structure. In October–November 1938, it sent out formal invitations to 196 churches, and Temple wrote a personal letter to the Vatican secretary of state.

At Tambaram (India) in 1938, the IMC expressed interest in the WCC plan but decided to continue as a separate body. A number of missionary societies in its constituency did not want to come under the control of the churches, and there was fear that the churches of North America and Europe would not give to the younger churches elsewhere the place they deserved. Nevertheless, the IMC helped facilitate the eventual entrance of these churches into the WCC, “associated” with it in 1948, and eventually integrated in 1961.

In 1939 the provisional committee planned the first WCC assembly for August 1941, but the world war intervened, and the period of formation lasted for another decade. Between 1940 and 1946, the provisional committee could not function normally through its responsible committees, but its members and others did gather in the USA, England and Switzerland. Under the leadership of Visser ’t Hooft in Geneva during the war, several activities contributed to the supra-national witness of the church: chaplaincy service, work among prisoners of war, assistance to Jews and other refugees, relay of information to the churches, and the preparation through contact with Christian leaders on all sides for post-war reconciliation and interchurch aid.

After the war the provisional committee met in Geneva (1946) and at Buck Hills, Pennsylvania (1947). The committee could affirm that the tragic war experience increased the churches’ determination to manifest their fellowship of reconciliation. By 1948, 90 churches had accepted the invitation to join the WCC.

Second thoughts on representation and WCC membership* resulted in careful regard for numerical size and adequate confessional and geographical representation. The principal membership requirement was agreement with the basis upon which the council would be formed; other requirements specified the autonomy of a church, its stability and appropriate size and its good relationship to other churches.

Although some favoured a council composed primarily of national councils of churches or of world confessional families (e.g. Lutherans, Orthodox, Baptists), the argument prevailed that the WCC should be in direct contact with national churches and thus would comprise the individual denominations at the national level, for instance the Methodist Church of Great Britain, the Methodist Episcopal Church, USA, the Methodist Church of Southern Africa, etc. World confessional bodies, national councils of churches and international ecumenical organizations could be invited to send representatives to the first assembly but would have non-voting observer status.

Even with this arrangement, there was the danger that the WCC would be governed by majority votes in assemblies of an ever-increasing number of churches representing very unequal memberships. Could this “numerical democracy” not lead to the lukewarmness or even the defection of one of the large “core” church families, e.g. the Orthodox, the Lutherans, the Anglicans? The question began to emerge as the number of member churches increased steadily, and was a major issue raised by the Orthodox at the eighth assembly in Harare in 1998.

When the inaugural assembly convened on 22 August 1948, its 147 churches from 44 countries represented in some way all confessional families within the Christian world, except the Roman Catholic Church (see RCC and pre-Vatican II ecumenism). On the next day the assembly accepted the constitution of the WCC, and the newly organized fellowship of churches issued its message: "Christ has made us his own, and he is not divided. In seeking him we find one another. Here at Amsterdam we have committed ourselves afresh to him, and have covenanted with one another in constituting the World Council of Churches. We intend to stay together."

Amsterdam defined the WCC tasks in a general way in its constitution and more specifically in its decisions concerning policies, programmes and budget. The assembly authorized the WCC to make common pronouncements to the churches and to the world, but clearly defined the nature and limits of such pronouncements.

BASIS

The 1948 inaugural assembly declared: "The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour" (see WCC, basis of). Soon this formulation gave rise to requests for a clearer definition of the Christ-centredness of the churches' common calling, a more explicit expression of the Trinitarian faith and a specific reference to the holy scriptures. The resulting reformulation, adopted by the third assembly (New Delhi 1961), still stands: "a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures, and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit."

Less than a confession of Christian faith and more than a formula, the basis serves as a point of reference for WCC members, a source or ground of coherence. Since the WCC is not itself a church, it passes no judgment upon the sincerity or firmness with which member churches accept the basis or upon the seriousness with which they take their membership. Thus, the basis itself comes under William Temple's formula:

"Any authority the Council will have consists in the weight which it carries with the churches by its own wisdom."

NATURE AND PURPOSE

In 1948 the member churches understood that the WCC was not a church above them, certainly not the church universal or incipient "world church". They understood the Council to be an instrument whereby the churches bear witness together in their common allegiance to Jesus Christ, search for that unity which Christ wills for his one and only church, and cooperate in matters which require common statements and actions. The assembly acknowledged Visser 't Hooft's description of the WCC: "an emergency solution, a stage on the road,... a fellowship which seeks to express that unity in Christ already given to us and to prepare the way for a much fuller and much deeper expression of that unity".

What was not clear in 1948 was how this spiritual nature of the fellowship should relate to member churches' understanding of the nature and limits of the WCC, and to their understanding of their ecclesial relation to other members. In short, did membership of a church in the WCC have any implications for the "self-understanding" or ecclesiological position of that church?

To clarify this position, the WCC central committee in 1950 adopted the Toronto statement* on the church, the churches and the World Council of Churches. It was forged in "a debate of considerable intensity" (Visser 't Hooft), even though its contents "defined a starting point, and not the way or the goal" (Lesslie Newbigin). According to this statement, the WCC "is not and must never become a super-church". It "cannot and should not be based on any one particular conception of the church". Membership does not "imply that a church treats its own conception of the church as merely relative" or accepts a "specific doctrine concerning the nature of church unity". Nevertheless, the common witness of the members "must be based on the common recognition that Christ is the divine head of the body", which, "on the basis of the New Testament", is the one church of Christ. Membership of the one church of Christ "is more inclusive" than the membership in one's own church body, but it “does not imply that each church must regard the other member churches as churches in the true and full sense of the word”. Yet common WCC membership implies in practice that the churches “should recognize their solidarity with each other, render assistance to each other in case of need, and refrain from such actions as are incompatible with brotherly relationships”.

While debates still continue on the status of both the basis and the Toronto statement, the functions and purposes of the WCC and its organs are changing, in statement and in fact. The present list of functions, approved in 1983 by the sixth assembly (Vancouver), reveals far less neutrality in the ecclesiological understandings of the churches than an impartial reading of the basis and of the Toronto statement would suggest, even if the functions are not binding upon the member churches.

A clear example of this shift is from the vague WCC purpose (1948) “to carry out the work of the world movements for Faith and Order and Life and Work” to the much more specific purpose in the present constitution (Harare 1998): the churches “call one another to visible unity in one faith and in one eucharistic fellowship, expressed in worship and common life in Christ, through witness and service to the world, and to advance towards that unity in order that the world may believe”. It would be hard to describe these changes as harmonious with Toronto’s conclusion that “membership does not imply the acceptance of a specific doctrine concerning the nature of church unity”. The churches may now be taking for granted what they might not have in 1948. Or are their representatives at assemblies only being swept up into verbal approvals while in fact their constituents back home hold different self-understandings?

This question itself may support the judgment that in many ways the Toronto statement is out of date. Many of its affirmations about what the WCC is not or about what WCC membership does not imply are indeed still valid and need re-affirmation. But can one expect a 1950 “emergency solution”, crafted in the nervousness of an infant taking its first steps, to do justice to the collective ecumenical and missionary experience of the churches in six continents over more than 50 years?

The present questions about the WCC’s identity and role in the ecumenical movement do not simply repeat those of 1950. What do the churches today see as the present status of the one ecumenical movement and its future? How “one” is it? What are the visions or images that are functionally alive in the member churches when one says “ecumenism”? Are the visions and images the same in non-member churches? What is the basis for a “common calling” of the churches and their members to a “common vision”, and how “common” is it? Who is excluded? What are the criteria for evaluating the development, standstills and setbacks of the ecumenical movement in the churches since 1948? Is the WCC the natural framework and context of witness in fellowship for the member churches, in particular in congregational thinking and acting? If not, why not?

The pressure of such questions prompted the WCC, in anticipation of its 50th anniversary, to undertake the most honest comprehensive examination ever of the ecumenical movement, the churches and the WCC. Adopted by the central committee in 1997 and commended for study to the member churches, the policy statement “Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the WCC” (CUV) was presented to the 1998 Harare assembly which agreed on the following: (1) The member churches do not yet dare to speak of full consensus about a “common” understanding or a “common” vision: “towards” remains an honest preposition. It indicates “an ongoing journey of self-reflection on the nature and purpose of the ecumenical movement in general, and of the WCC’s vocation in particular”. (2) The renewal of the WCC cannot come about simply by re-arranging the general structures, the programmes and the Geneva office. Nevertheless, one should not rest in comfortable “institutional captivity”. The WCC does need “changes in structure, style and ethos” (see criticism of the ecumenical movement and of the WCC). (3) The core of what the WCC is meant to be is the fellowship of the churches, not the organization or the institution.

While reflection on the common understanding and vision was going on, the Orthodox churches, in a statement made at Salonika in April 1998, formulated several sharp questions regarding their participation and membership which had become increasingly serious for them. Harare responded by setting up the Special Commission on Orthodox Participation in the WCC, a parity body with equal numbers of representatives of Orthodox and other member churches. Many of the Orthodox concerns are now appreciated by other members as well. The quest is for more than “negotiated structural compromises”.

ORGANIZATION

Amsterdam defined the WCC tasks in its constitution and in its decisions concerning policies and programmes. WCC programmes are a service in the name of the member churches and a service to all the churches, members or not. The WCC discharges its legislative and executive functions through the assembly, the central committee and the executive committee, and through the officers and subordinate bodies of the general secretariat.

The assembly (see WCC assemblies) is the supreme legislative body which determines WCC policies and reviews their implementation in its programmes. Ordinarily meeting at seven-year intervals, it is composed of voting delegates elected by the member churches. It elects no more than eight WCC presidents for the presidium and, from the delegates, it elects not more than 150 members of the central committee.

The central committee allocates the assembly seats to the member churches on the basis of numerical size, confessional representation and geographical distribution. The following table indicates the growing participation in the assemblies.

Assembly	Delegates	Churches
1. Amsterdam 1948	351	147
2. Evanston 1954	502	161
3. New Delhi 1961	577	197
4. Uppsala 1968	704	235
5. Nairobi 1975	676	285
6. Vancouver 1983	847	301
7. Canberra 1991	842	317
8. Harare 1998	966	336

The rapid decolonization* of the post-war world began in Asia with India and Pakistan becoming independent in 1947, and among majority-ruled states in sub-Saharan Africa with Ghana's independence in 1957. The subsequent growth of the national churches and the rise of indigenous clerical and lay leadership within them, and the increased number of Orthodox churches, are reflected in the regional representation at the assemblies. In 1948 the large majority of the 351 delegates of the 147 churches were in fact Western European and North American. At Harare 1998 the regional breakdown of the 966 delegates was much more balanced, demonstrating that the WCC has become a truly global body present in all major regions and cultures of the world. This geographical spread indicates a shift that is affecting the ecumenical movement as a whole. The traditional centre, which in 1948 embraced the areas of the North Atlantic, Eastern Europe and the Mediterranean, is fading in its dominant influence over those centres in the southern hemisphere – Africa, Asia, the Caribbean, Latin America and Oceania.

As both a geographical and a historical re-positioning, these areas are becoming the new centres of theological articulations, personal and social ethical stances, spiritualities, church disciplines, artistic expressions and interchurch cooperation in common witness. As R.D. Paul of the Church of South India said to the churches of the West at the 1954 Evanston assembly: “You have taught us how to think, but now that we are mature, we are trying to think the message of Christianity out for ourselves. We can now be trusted to look after our own affairs. We have become your partner in the great mission of the church to the world.” Whether in the WCC assemblies or in its programmes, all voices have begun to receive an equal hearing. No one ecumenical story is privileged. The ecumenical movement has become polycentric. Nevertheless, the “contexts”, no matter what their variety, still have the theatre of God's one church in God's one world as the context.

The more recent strong recommendations and negotiations (not always successful with some churches) to have an adequate cross-section of men and women, adults and youth, clergy and lay have produced changes in the composition of recent assemblies:

Assembly	Percentage of delegates who were
	Women	Under 30	Lay
Uppsala 1968	9	4	25
Nairobi 1975	22	9	42
Vancouver 1983	30	13	46
Canberra 1991	35	11	46
Harare 1998	35	13	42

The delegates form the core of an assembly but do not by themselves shape the milieu. Even at Amsterdam, far more numerous than the delegates were alternates, WCC staff and co-opted staff, consultants, accredited visitors, media representatives, and youth delegates and stewards (two traditional breeding grounds for ecumenical leaders: William Temple had been a steward at Edinburgh in 1910, and Philip Potter, later WCC general secretary, was a youth delegate at Amsterdam).

Also growing is the number of other participants: delegated observers and observers from non-member churches and organizations (289 at Harare, including 23 Roman Catholics); delegated representatives from Christian World Communions* and national and regional councils of churches; invited guests (of the 44 at Harare, 9 were Buddhist, Hindu, Jewish, Muslim and Sikh).

The central committee is the main continuation body between assemblies. Meeting every 12-18 months, it implements assembly policies by approving and reviewing programmes and determining priorities among them, adopts the budget and secures financial support, and elects the 14-16 non-ex-officio members of the executive committee (which normally meets twice a year). The central committee has grown from 90 members in 1948 to the present 150. The executive committee now has 24 members.

The general secretary is elected by the central committee and is accountable to it. He or she is the chief WCC executive and heads the staff comprising those who conduct the continuing operations. The following have served in this capacity: W.A. Visser 't Hooft (1948-66), Eugene Carson Blake (1966-72), Philip A. Potter (1972-84), Emilio Castro (1985-92), and Konrad Raiser (1993-).

STRUCTURES

For some committed ecumenists, since the 1950s there has been too much preoccupation with structures in the churches and in the ecumenical movement, at first both reasonable and proper but over the years becoming "dangerously neurotic" (Max Warren, 1976). Most take for granted that effectiveness in church life, as in the world of business, requires that scarcely a decade passes without important organizational changes. Others judge that in fact the predominant Western "business management model" for churches and the WCC has hurt and dimmed more than fostered and expressed their nature and tasks. All agree there is no "right and perfect" WCC as an organization and that any decisions about structures, old or new, should be pragmatic.

The 1948 Amsterdam assembly set up 12 departments, on paper somewhat disparate and uneven, but in fact closely supervised and evaluated by the general secretariat. The number of the executive/programme staff was less than the authorized 36 until the Evanston assembly (1954). Several churches had made available the services of their own paid people to strengthen the staff for shorter or longer periods of time.

The experience of the first six years showed the necessity of more effective coordination of the various departments. Evanston provided the WCC with four divisions, each with departments: (1) studies – faith and order, church and society, evangelism and missionary studies; (2) ecumenical action – youth, laity, men and women in church and society, Ecumenical Institute; (3) interchurch aid/refugees and international affairs; and (4) information. This model continued through the New Delhi assembly (1961). The IMC-WCC integration in itself had brought about sufficient alterations. The large Eastern European Orthodox churches of USSR, Romania, Bulgaria and Poland had just become members. More drastic changes would not be wise.

The Uppsala assembly (1968) authorized re-organization for "simplification and coordination". Effective in 1972, it tried to reflect the WCC's main constitutional functions in three flexible administrative units with broad mandates: faith and witness, justice and service, and education and renewal. The units would overcome the noticeable separation between study and action and would encourage greater participation by various segments of the WCC constituency through sub-units with specific programmes. Each unit had a committee of members from the central committee and from the governing bodies of the various sub-units. This overall structure remained in place, with some further adjustments, after the Canberra assembly in 1991.

After the Harare assembly, a new internal organization came into effect, based on the insights gained through the CUV process. The Council now has four "clusters", each made up of several teams: (1) relations (teams: church and ecumenical relations, inter-religious relations and dialogue, international relations, and regional relations and resource sharing); (2) issues and themes (education and ecumenical formation, faith and order, justice, peace and creation, mission and evangelism); (3) communication (public information, publications and documentation); (4) finance, services and administration.

Since the Nairobi assembly, WCC programmes have revealed a vast extension of activities with a large breadth of concerns and interests. The operational teams have a variety of histories, methods of work, even ways of receiving funding. The focus of some units is quite distinct; for others there is considerable overlap in the issues or constituencies. Few programmes have had built-in clauses for termination. Few can expect more staff and funding, even if new interest groups should ask for new programmes.

FINANCES

The financial situation of the WCC is symptomatic of the strengths and weaknesses of programmes and church relationships, but it also mirrors world financial trends such as recessions, debt crises and inflation. The same factors also affect the member churches and donor agencies. Wide fluctuations in exchange rates of other major currencies against the Swiss franc (in which the WCC keeps its accounts) create problems, since even when churches increase their giving from one year to the next, the value of this income in Swiss francs may in fact decline.

Where does the money come from? The total income for 2001 was Sfr.47,091,000. About 95% came from member churches, their mission and aid agencies, individuals and governments; the rest came from investments, property rentals, publications, etc.; 55% of membership fees (2001, Sfr.7.1 million) were from Europe and 31% from North America. Although only a small percentage of the total income came from churches in other regions, some of these contributed more per capita than did larger and wealthier churches. Churches are to make annual contributions "commensurate with their resources". Yet some of the members take no financial responsibility for the WCC, neglecting to pay the prescribed minimum membership fee of Sfr.1000.

The WCC receives money both to cover its operating budget and to be channelled to ecumenical programmes and projects around the world. The income for the WCC is either "undesignated" for the WCC's flexible use or "designated" for specific unit programmes. The "undesignated" portion of total funds is steadily declining, from 30% in 1981 to 15% in 2001.

Where does the WCC's budget go? The total of expenditures for 2001 was Sfr.58,588,000. The most expensive item in this operating budget was the payroll for total staff. In order to improve financial equilibrium, there had been a major reduction in staff from 369 people in 1990 to 201 in 2001. The 2001 payroll was Sfr.21.2 million.

No matter how diligently the WCC tries to increase income and decrease costs, its long-term projected general income and its careful stewardship will be more and more necessary considerations in setting priorities for support of limited programmes and competent salaried personnel. One can no longer reasonably expect, or demand, the WCC to carry out a sweeping ecumenical agenda.

RELATIONSHIPS

Structure charts and budget sheets do not in themselves capture the new or growing demands for effective functioning of relationships between the WCC and member churches, non-member churches and groups, and other ecumenical bodies. Pertinent facts include the following. Membership has more than doubled since Amsterdam, from 147 churches to 342 in 2002. National Christian councils in association or "working relations" with the WCC now total over 100.

Regional councils or conferences, non-existent in 1948, have been established in Africa (1963), Asia (1959), the Caribbean (1973), Europe (1964), Latin America (1982), the Middle East (1974), and the Pacific (1966).

The structures of Christian World Communions* have become more active, with larger scopes, as have other international organizations, such as the YMCAs, YWCAs, WSCF, and United Bible Societies. The Roman Catholic Church, though not a member, has active representation in nearly all WCC programmatic activities (see Joint Working Group). The RCC is a full member of over 60 national councils and of the Caribbean, Middle East, and Pacific regional conferences, and it has close working relations with the other national and regional councils.

The fastest-growing churches are in the conservative evangelical and Pentecostal families (see Evangelicals, Pentecostals). Most of these groups are not WCC members. Some are in dialogue with the WCC, others are explicitly anti-WCC or strangers to it (see evangelical ecumenical concerns). The Harare assembly authorized the formation of a joint consultative group with Pentecostals, which became operational in 2000.

This scenario of relationships requires “an open and safe ecumenical space” (K. Raiser) in which all willing partners in the one ecumenical movement can participate equally. This calls for a wider tent, an extended table, a more intentional, sustaining inclusive networking of member and non-member churches and their agencies, the Christian World Communions, regional and national conferences and councils of churches, and international ecumenical organizations with their specific focuses. In the post-Harare period discussion has developed around the so-called “forum proposal” which aims at establishing such a space for dialogue. There is a legitimate concern that this should not lead to a merger into one more world church bureaucracy or, worse, a substitute for the ecumenical accountability and responsibility of ongoing membership in the WCC.

Another recent development is the formation of several autonomous agencies dealing with certain areas of ecumenical work, in which the WCC participates along with other ecumenical partners and churches. Examples are Action by Churches Together (ACT) for ecumenical response to emergency situations, Ecumenical News International (ENI) and the Ecumenical Advocacy Alliance (EAA). To each of these bodies the WCC has delegated tasks for which it used to assume direct programme responsibility in the past.

The numerical increase and geographical spread of the WCC's constituency in the widest sense does not in itself answer the question: What is the quality of fellowship? A greater cross-section of the churches' life is found in the representative participation in the work and decisions of the WCC constitutional bodies. Yet there are demands for greater involvement of more member churches in creating and reviewing WCC policies and programmes. There are also calls for “more deliberate use of staff travel and church visits, in order to listen to the needs and concerns of the churches, to share in their life, and to represent the Council as a whole and interpret its programmes and concerns” (central committee, 1989). Yet for all this, there is less money and fewer staff.

The member churches themselves vary widely in their own structures and personnel to receive WCC services – ranging from one person handling all communication for the WCC to the efficient communication within the appropriate constituency of a church and its follow-up by responsible study and action. Those churches that are seriously committed to the WCC are also ecumenically engaged in local and regional activities or in organized fellowships and bilateral dialogues; they often find too much on their ecumenical plates to digest. An overload of WCC programmes in service to the churches could thus be contributing to the headache of reception,* i.e., the process of disciplined digestion and ownership at all levels of the churches' life, thought and practice.

The very success of the WCC in carrying out its various purposes over more than five decades has uncovered failures and weaknesses in both the WCC and member churches. The WCC is a servant to the churches who call each other to solidarity in mutual accountability regarding ecumenical goals and means. In the first decades of the new millennium, the focus of ecumenical activity most likely will not be directed primarily on the WCC but on the churches themselves.

TOM STRANSKY

■ And So Set Up Signs... The WCC's First 40 Years, WCC, 1988 ■ Commemorating Amsterdam 1948 (= ER, 40, 3-4, 1988) ■ H.E. Fey ed., The Ecumenical Advance: A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 2: 1948-1968, London, SPCK, 1970 ■ Financial Report 2001, WCC ■ D. Kessler ed., Together on the Way: The Harare Report, WCC, 1999 ■ "Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the WCC", articles on the draft in ER, 50, 3, 1998; final text, 51, 1, 1999 ■ M. VanElderen & M. Conway, Introducing the World Council of Churches, WCC, 2001 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, The Genesis and Formation of the World Council of Churches, WCC, 1982.

WCC ASSEMBLIES

CONSTITUTIONALLY, an assembly – held approximately every seven years – is the “supreme legislative body” of the World Council of Churches. Delegates are appointed by member churches, with the number to which each church is entitled determined by size (every member church may send at least one delegate). Allowance is made in the allocation of delegates for balancing confessional, cultural and geographical representation.

Member churches are urged to select their assembly delegates in a way that will ensure good distribution of church officials, parish ministers and laity, men and women and persons under the age of 30. Moreover, to improve balance or provide special knowledge and experience, up to 15% of the delegates may be persons proposed by the WCC central committee, which then asks their churches to name them as additional delegates.

Also present at each assembly is a wide range of non-voting advisers, representatives and observers from non-member churches or other ecumenical organizations and guests (including, since the fifth assembly, persons of other faiths). An assembly usually draws several hundred press and media persons, many of whom are ecumenically involved clergy and laity; and in recent assemblies, extensive programmes have been arranged for visitors, including local people.

At the most recent assembly (Harare 1998), a new feature was the “padare”, the Zimbabwe Shona word for a village meeting place to which anyone may bring concerns for public discussion. Some 400 open forums were offered on subjects ranging from single causes (e.g. violence against women, interchurch marriages, debt relief) to faith and order issues and the performing arts.

Assemblies are too large and infrequent to make detailed decisions: close to 5000 people were present at Harare. Rather, they look at the wider ecumenical picture: evaluating what the WCC has done since the previous assembly, seeking a common assessment of current issues demanding ecumenical attention and specifying broadly what the Council should focus on until the next assembly. They elect the WCC presidents and, from among delegates present, members of the central committee.

The assembly has become primarily the unique international intercultural forum or “ecumenical space” of communal worship and celebration, education, shared experiences and renewed ecumenical commitment, and of “owning” the WCC as instrumental servant of the one ecumenical movement in its diverse expressions within the hospitable household of faith. For this reason, despite the preparatory staff time and energy, and increasing costs, voices to eliminate the assembly have never won out in discussions of WCC structural reforms. Everyone agrees that the assembly as an event gives the opportunity for the WCC to reconstitute itself, and for the member churches to improve relations and communication among themselves.

This entry offers a brief overview of each of the WCC's eight assemblies.

---

First assembly: “Man's Disorder and God's Design”; Amsterdam, Netherlands, 22 August to 4 September 1948; 351 delegates, from 147 member churches.

Sections: (1) the universal church in God's design, (2) the church's witness to God's design, (3) the church and the disorder of society, (4) the church and the international order.

Central committee moderator: George Bell; vice-moderator: Franklin Clark Fry; presidium: Marc Boegner, Geoffrey Fisher, T.C. Chao (from 1951 Sarah Chakko), G. Bromley Oxnam, Germanos of Thyateira (from 1951 Athenagoras of Thyateira), Erling Eidem (from 1950 Eivind Berggrav); honorary president: John R. Mott.

The WCC's first assembly marked the assumption by the churches of responsibility for the ecumenical movement, as its message made clear: "Here at Amsterdam we have... covenanted with one another in constituting this World Council of Churches. We intend to stay together." Those constituting this world body, however, were largely from North America and Western Europe – only 30 of the founding churches came from Africa, Asia (including 5 from China) and Latin America. Although the term "younger churches" was often used for the latter bodies, they in fact included some of the oldest (Church of Ethiopia and Orthodox Syrian Church of Malabar); and among Western churches were some of the youngest (Old Catholic Church and Salvation Army).

Amsterdam said clearly that the churches had decided to come together in accordance with the will of the Lord of the church. Where this common way would lead them could not be foreseen. "We acknowledge", the report of section 1 emphasized, "that he is powerfully at work amongst us to lead us further to goals which we but dimly discern."

The first assembly adopted the WCC constitution (revised at successive assemblies), laid down conditions for membership, outlined programmes, discussed relationships with other ecumenical bodies and addressed a message to the churches – a practice repeated by succeeding assemblies. The "nature of the Council", defined in an assembly statement, would be further elaborated on by the statement "The Church, the Churches and the World Council of Churches", adopted by the central committee at Toronto in 1950 (see Toronto statement).

Section 2 expressed the indissoluble connection between unity* and inner renewal: "As Christ purifies us by his Spirit we shall find that we are drawn together and that there is no gain in unity unless it is unity in truth and holiness." Evangelism* was seen as the common task of all the churches, and the present day as "the beginning of a new epoch of missionary enterprise". Mission* and evangelism belong together and condition one another; and the distinction between "Christian" and "non-Christian" nations must be discarded. The question of the training of the laity* was examined by a special committee, which took as its starting point the experience of the already established Ecumenical Institute at Bossey.*

In section 3 emerged the ecumenical concept of the "responsible society",* as opposed to both laissez-faire capitalism and totalitarian communism. "Each has made promises which it could not redeem. Communist ideology puts the emphasis upon economic justice, and promises that freedom will come automatically after the completion of the revolution. Capitalism puts the emphasis upon freedom, and promises that justice will follow as a byproduct of free enterprise; that, too, is an ideology which has been proved false. It is the responsibility of Christians to seek new, creative solutions which never allow either justice or freedom to destroy the other." It was also agreed that since "no civilization, however 'Christian'", can escape the radical judgment of the Word of God, none is to be accepted uncritically.

Section 4 was able to encompass such divergent views as those of the Czech theologian Josef L. Hromádka and John Foster Dulles (later US secretary of state). While this showed the strength of the fellowship in the newly formed Council, it also put that strength to its first test. Two points in this section were significant for the future: (1) rejection in principle of war as "contrary to the will of God", but inability to endorse such rejection unanimously; (2) concern that every kind of tyranny and imperialism calls for opposition, struggle and efforts to secure basic human liberties for all, especially religious freedom.

---

Second assembly: "Christ – the Hope of the World"; Evanston, IL, USA, 15 to 31 August 1954; 502 delegates, from 161 member churches.

Sections: (1) our oneness in Christ and our disunity as churches, (2) the mission of the church to those outside her life, (3) the responsible society in a world perspective, (4) Christians in the struggle for world community, (5) the churches amid racial and ethnic tensions, (6) the laity: the Christian in his vocation.

Central committee moderator: Franklin Clark Fry; vice-moderator: Ernest Payne; presidium: John Baillie, Sante Uberto Barbieri, Otto Dibelius, Juhanon Mar Thoma, Michael (from 1959 Iakovos), Henry Knox Sherill; honorary presidents: John R. Mott (d.1955) and George Bell.

If “staying together” was the motto of the Amsterdam assembly, Evanston’s was “growing together”. A deep sense of belonging together enabled the assembly to tackle its extremely difficult and controversial theological theme. A previously published report on the main theme, on which two dozen eminent theologians had worked for three years, acknowledged “sharp differences in theological viewpoint” in the discussions. The concept of Christian hope* among European churches tended to be eschatological, whereas North American churches stressed hope for the here and now. A reference to the hope of Israel (Rom. 9-11) introduced a discordant note and was omitted after a heated debate; many did not wish to recognize that the Jewish people occupy a special place in the history of salvation.

Evanston defined more clearly than Amsterdam the phrase “responsible society”. It did not indicate “an alternative social or political system” but “a criterion by which we judge all existing social orders, and at the same time a standard to guide us in the specific choices we have to make”. Like Amsterdam, Evanston addressed itself to “The Church in Relation to Communist-Non-Communist Tension”. Priority in sections 3 and 4 went to “social and economic problems in the economically underdeveloped regions”, a question to which the WCC was giving increasing attention. The assembly affirmed responsibility for Christian peace and justice and urged governments to ban all weapons of mass destruction and abstain from aggression. There were statements on religious liberty* and “intergroup relations”, insisting on racial equality. Continuing the Amsterdam discussion, Evanston stressed even more strongly the missionary task of the laity, which “bridges the gulf between the church and the world” and “stands at the very outposts of the kingdom of God”.

The so-called younger churches (except those in China, which had suspended their WCC participation in the wake of the Korean war) were much better represented than at the first assembly. Their presence was felt in many ways, especially in their impatience with the disunity of the churches. The accent on the missionary dimension of the churches’ task, so characteristic of Amsterdam, was missing at Evanston. But the assembly did show that the Council was centred on the word of God, theologically alert and becoming better equipped to help the churches to discover their common heritage.

---

Third assembly: “Jesus Christ – the Light of the World”; New Delhi, India, 19 November to 5 December 1961; 577 delegates, from 197 member churches.

Sections: (1) witness, (2) service, (3) unity.

Central committee moderator: Franklin Clark Fry; vice-moderators: Ernest Payne and J. Russell Chandran (1966-68); presidium: A. Michael Ramsey, Francis Ibiyam, Iakovos, David G. Moses, Martin Niemöller, Charles C. Parlin; honorary president: Joseph H. Oldham.

New Delhi’s theme was again Christocentric, but the discussion now included the issue of other world religions. The theme, however, was not given the same prominence as at previous assemblies, and served mainly as a sort of guiding principle. The International Missionary Council* was integrated into the WCC, becoming the Division on World Mission and Evangelism. The assembly approved an extension of the WCC basis* by adding the phrase “according to the scriptures”, and the Trinitarian formula.

Of the 23 churches welcomed into WCC membership at New Delhi, 11 were African, 5 Asian and 2 South American. Only 5 were from Europe and North America. Two Pentecostal churches from Chile formed a bridge to evangelical churches. The presence of the large Orthodox churches from Eastern Europe was regarded as an opportunity to ensure “a real spiritual dialogue” between Eastern and Western churches. “If we accept this opportunity our ecumenical task will not become easier, but we shall surely be greatly enriched.” Out of the estimated 400 million Christians who belong to WCC member churches today, almost 140 million are Orthodox.

Section 1 faced the theological problem of understanding other religions in the light of Jesus Christ (a still-unresolved problem). Another issue was how to distinguish Christian service from mere philanthropy. Discussion in section 2 of the problems of political, economic and social change was largely oriented to the third world. In section 3, the unity of the church was conceived as “one fully committed fellowship, holding the one apostolic faith, preaching the one gospel, breaking the one bread, joining in common prayer, and having a corporate life reaching out in witness and service to all and who at the same time are united with the whole Christian fellowship in all places and all ages...”

New Delhi took a renewed stand on religious liberty, adopted a resolution on anti-semitism, clarified the churches’ views on the international crisis and issued a message to Christians in South Africa and an “Appeal to All Governments and Peoples”. The WCC had by now assumed increased responsibility for relief to people in distress, refugees and victims of catastrophes all over the world. In Amsterdam the churches committed themselves to stay together; in Evanston they affirmed their intention to grow together; and now they were eager to assume new tasks together.

---

Fourth assembly: “Behold, I Make All Things New”; Uppsala, Sweden, 4 to 20 July 1968; 704 delegates, from 235 member churches.

Sections: (1) the Holy Spirit and the catholicity of the church, (2) renewal in mission, (3) world economic and social development, (4) towards justice and peace in international affairs, (5) worship, (6) towards new styles of living.

Central committee moderator: M.M. Thomas; vice-moderators: Pauline Webb and Metropolitan Meliton; presidium: Patriarch German, Hanns Lilje, Daniel T. Niles, Kiyoko Takeda Cho, Ernest A. Payne, John Coventry Smith, Alphaeus H. Zulu; honorary presidents: Joseph Oldham and W.A. Visser ‘t Hooft.

Uppsala, the WCC’s most activist and politically oriented assembly, can be seen as ending an era in the ecumenical movement and marking a new beginning. Typifying this was the vigorous presence of youth,* whose demonstrations made it clear that they were not satisfied with the role given them at the assembly.

Uppsala set the unity and catholicity* of the church squarely within the sphere of God’s activity in history. Stating that “the church is bold in speaking of itself as the sign of the coming unity of mankind”, the assembly admitted that secular “instruments of conciliation and unification... often seem more effective than the church itself”. Therefore, “churches need a new openness to the world in its aspirations, its achievements, its restlessness and its despair”. All church structures, from local to world level, must be examined to see whether they enable the church and its members to be in mission. More dialogue with the world and more effective proclamation of the good news are equally needed. For the first time the idea of “a genuinely universal council”, able to speak for all Christians, was articulated.

In his assembly address the Jesuit Roberto Tucci referred to the possibility of the Roman Catholic Church joining the WCC – a challenge that was seriously discussed in the following years. Closer WCC relations with national and regional councils of churches was also high on the agenda.

The reality that the rich were becoming richer and the poor poorer dominated Uppsala’s socio-political and economic discussions. The assembly recommended that the churches set aside 1% of their total income for development aid and appeal to their governments to invest the same percentage of their gross national product. The central issue in development is the criterion of the human. Public opinion must be persuaded to support deep changes in both developed and developing nations.

Uppsala's discussion of worship* called on Christians to be open to learn from the practices of worship of other Christians. Describing worship as "ethical and social in nature" and thus "orientated towards the social injustices and divisions of mankind", the assembly specified that segregation by race or class in Christian worship must be rejected. It recommended "that all churches consider seriously the desirability of adopting the early Christian tradition of celebrating the eucharist every Sunday".

The assembly also grappled with how Christians make faithful ethical decisions. Social and cultural differences make a single style of Christian life impossible. Refusing to choose between "contextualism" and "rules", the gathering pressed for the position that individual moral choices can be made only in Christian community which is held together by biblical insight and the communion table.

In the wake of Uppsala several new programmes were added to the WCC: the Programme to Combat Racism* (PCR), the Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development, the Christian Medical Commission, Dialogue with People of Living Faiths and Ideologies, and the Sub-unit on Education. Unit II, Justice and Service, became from 1971 onwards the largest unit in the Council.

---

Fifth assembly: "Jesus Christ Frees and Unites"; Nairobi, Kenya, 23 November to 10 December 1975; 676 delegates, from 285 member churches.

Sections: (1) confessing Christ today, (2) what unity requires, (3) seeking community, (4) education for liberation and community, (5) structures of injustice and struggles for liberation, (6) human development.

Central committee moderator: Edward W. Scott; vice-moderators: Jean Skuse and Karekin Sarkissian; presidium: Annie R. Jigge, José Míguez Bonino, Nikodim (from 1979 Ilja II of Georgia), T.B. Simatupang, Olof Sundby, Cynthia Wedel; honorary president: W.A. Visser 't Hooft.

Nairobi has been described as an assembly of consolidation, providing theological undergirding for much that surfaced in Uppsala. It declared that faith in the Triune God and socio-political engagement, conversion to Jesus Christ and active participation in changing economic and social structures belong together and condition one another.

Among contentious discussions was that of interfaith dialogue:* the section report on this subject was referred back for reconsideration before a plenary vote. Some delegates in the West thought the report was weak and susceptible to interpretation as a spiritual compromise. Asian representatives, on the other hand, stressed that dialogue in no way diminishes full commitment to one's own faith. Far from leading to syncretism, it safeguards against it.

Debate on evangelism related spirituality* to involvement. As unity requires a commonly accepted goal, a fuller understanding of the context and companionship in struggle and hope, section 1 asked the churches to respond to the three agreed statements on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry* (BEM), compiled by the commission on Faith and Order.

The assembly resisted efforts to weaken the PCR and its special fund, but strove to understand this commitment to action on behalf of the oppressed in a more deeply theological way. The search for a "just, participatory and sustainable society"* became a major theme. Programmes on faith, science and technology,* militarism* and disarmament,* ecology and human survival, the role of women in church and society, and renewal and congregational life received a new emphasis. Concern for sharing of resources entered ecumenical discussions.

The assembly's programme guidelines committee approved four "programme thrusts" until the next assembly: (1) expression and communication of our faith in the Triune God; (2) search for a just, participatory and sustainable society; (3) unity of the church and renewal of human community; (4) education and renewal in search of true community.

---

Sixth assembly: "Jesus Christ – the Life of the World"; Vancouver, Canada, 24 July to 10 August 1983; 847 delegates, from 301 member churches.

Issue groups: (1) witnessing in a divided world, (2) taking steps towards unity, (3) moving towards participation, (4) healing and sharing life in community, (5) confronting threats to peace and survival, (6) struggling for justice and human dignity, (7) learning in community, (8) communicating credibly.

Central committee moderator: Heinz Joachim Held; vice-moderators: Chrysostomos of Myra and Sylvia Talbot; presidium: Nita Barrow, Marga Bührig, Paulos Gregorius, Johannes W. Hempel, Ignatius IV, W.P. Khotso Makhulu, Lois M. Wilson; honorary president: W.A. Visser 't Hooft (d. 1985).

At Vancouver, some observers said, Amsterdam and Uppsala appeared to come to terms with each other. It was a "re-integrated" assembly. Great emphasis in this most representative gathering in ecumenical history fell on participation,* and up to 4500 people a day took part one way or another in the assembly. Of voting delegates more than 30% were women, more than 13% youth (under 30) and more than 46% laypeople. Leadership by women was prominent as never before. Canada's cultures and concerns made a strong impact on the gathering.

Daily worship services in a large tent drew thousands of people. The celebration of the eucharist according to an order of worship (the Lima liturgy*) reflecting the Faith and Order convergence statements on BEM was a memorable event, as was the night-long vigil to mark the anniversary of the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Churches were requested to respond officially to the BEM document by the end of 1986. The assembly received the fifth report of the WCC-RCC Joint Working Group,* with an outline of future work. In evangelism, wide attention was drawn to Christian witness in the contexts of culture, worship, the poor, children and religious pluralism.

On Christian education, the assembly pressed member churches "to take seriously the ecumenical dimension of learning and include it in all educational activities and programmes". In emphasizing the central importance of language and culture in ecumenical education, the assembly urged churches to experiment with alternative forms of communication.

menical education, the assembly urged churches to experiment with alternative forms of communication.

A recommended WCC priority was the engagement of member churches "in a conciliar process of mutual commitment (covenant) to justice, peace and the integrity of all creation", whose foundations were "confessing Christ as the life of the world and Christian resistance to the demonic powers of death in racism, sexism, caste oppression, economic exploitation, militarism, violations of human rights, and the misuse of science and technology".

---

Seventh assembly: "Come, Holy Spirit – Renew the Whole Creation"; Canberra, Australia, 7 to 20 February 1991; 842 delegates, from 317 member churches.

Sections/sub-themes: (1) Giver of life – sustain your creation!, (2) Spirit of truth – set us free!, (3) Spirit of unity – reconcile your people!, (4) Holy Spirit – transform and sanctify us!

Central committee moderator: Aram Keshishian; vice-moderators: Soritua Nababan and Nélide Ritchie; presidium: Anne-Marie Aagaard, Vinton Anderson, Leslie Boseto, Priyanka Mendis, Parthenios of Alexandria, Eunice Santana, Shenouda of Alexandria, Aaron Tolen.

As at Vancouver, delegates from member churches made up only about a fifth of those present in Canberra; other participants included 10 guests from other faiths, about 1500 visitors and over 200 observers from non-member bodies.

In two respects Canberra's theme was a departure from earlier assemblies: its formulation as a prayer and its reference to the Holy Spirit. The theme was at the heart of daily and special worship services, carefully prepared to draw on the rich variety of traditions in the WCC. But frequent remarks in assembly sessions showed that while the pneumatological emphasis opens up new perspectives in relating theology and experience, it can also kindle controversy. Many argued the need for discernment and for maintaining the link between Jesus Christ and the Holy Spirit.

War in the Gulf broke out just three weeks before the assembly began. Discussion about a statement on the war revealed the deep differences within the WCC over classic questions about the justifiability of war. The way the Gulf war overshadowed consideration of other situations of conflict and oppression in the world highlighted growing tension within the ecumenical family between global and local concerns.

The venue gave a high profile to indigenous people, especially Aboriginal Australians. An assembly statement committed the WCC to support and monitor “a treaty process” between Aborigines and the Australian government, and called on churches to “return land unjustly taken” from the Aborigines.

Despite significant ecumenical theological convergence in recent years, assembly discussions and worship made clear that eucharist, ordained ministry and views about the nature of the church remained painful stumbling blocks to full communion. An open letter from Orthodox participants insisted that the WCC’s main aim must be restoration of church unity, and asked that faith and order be given greater prominence. But obstacles to unity were also manifest in pleas that certain groups must be better represented within WCC structures. In particular, member church delegations fell considerably short of the target of 20% youth. Even more than at previous assemblies, trying to achieve all mandated “balances” on governing bodies led to sometimes bitter debate.

Christians from mainland China attended a WCC assembly for the first time in over 30 years, and the China Christian Council (seen as a united church in the process of formation, rather than as a council of churches) was one of seven churches welcomed as new members. Another milestone was the presence of observers from the (white) Dutch Reformed Church in South Africa (NGK), a first since it left the council in the 1960s.

---

Eighth assembly: “Turn to God – Rejoice in Hope”; Harare, Zimbabwe, 3-14 December 1998; 966 delegates, from 336 member churches.

Hearings, phase I, based on four programme units from Canberra to Harare: unity and renewal; churches in mission – health, education, witness; justice, peace and creation; sharing and service; work of the general secretariat, including church and ecumenical relations, inter-religious relations, communication, the Ecumenical Institute at Bossey, and Finance.

Hearings, phase II, themes and issues: unity, justice and peace, moving together, learning, witness, and solidarity.

Central committee moderator: Aram I, Catholicos of Cilicia; vice-moderators: Marion S. Best and Sophia O.A. Adinyira; Presidium: Agnes Abuom, Kathryn Bannister, Jabez Bryce, Chrysostomos of Ephesus, Moon Kyu Kang, Federico J. Pagura, Eberhardt Renz, Zakka I Iwas Mar Ignatius.

Harare was the 50th anniversary assembly of the WCC. For almost two weeks, delegates reflected about where the WCC member churches had been together and how that history might shape the future. They were helped to do this through a policy statement, “Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the World Council of Churches”, commended by the central committee. In light of all this, delegates made decisions to chart the course of ecumenical life through the WCC into the 21st century. They concluded with a “Journey to Jubilee” recalling fifty years of life together, followed by a service of recommitment.

The assembly, the largest in WCC history with about 5000 attendees, included 966 voting delegates: 367 women, 599 men – 525 of whom were ordained – and 134 youth; 46 guests attended, including eight people from other faiths and a four-member delegation from North Korean churches, the first time churches from that country had been present. The Roman Catholic Church was represented by 23 delegated observers. This was the second assembly held on the African continent. Even the most staid attendees found themselves moving to the African rhythms during worship, and sights, sounds and tastes of Africa infused the event. A Shona stone spirit sculpture interpreting the assembly theme became the unofficial logo. One plenary focused on the daunting challenges faced by Zimbabwe and many countries in the region – large numbers of people infected by the AIDS virus, high unemployment, weakening currency and escalating inflation, corruption among government leaders, political disquiet. This information became a backdrop for assembly actions concerning child soldiers, third-world debt, human rights and globalization.

Harare also marked the conclusion of the Ecumenical Decade – Churches in Solidarity with Women, calling attention to the impact of violence “on women and children who are the innocent victims of war, conflict situations and domestic violence”.

A totally new feature was the padare, which means “meeting place” in the Shona tradition. The WCC borrowed this concept, and provided over four hundred spaces for sharing and reflection about sometimes-tender topics that were not necessarily on the official assembly agenda.

Roiling under the surface were a number of doctrinal and ecclesial concerns raised at the Canberra assembly by Orthodox churches – concerns shared by some other WCC member churches as well. The issues were addressed forthrightly by the moderator and the general secretary in their reports, and a Special Commission was created to deal systemically with issues that had been articulated by the Orthodox during a May 1998 consultation in Salonika. These actions helped defuse some tensions.

This was an assembly that reflected a more seasoned, mature, chastened ecumenical movement, still clear (at least in the official texts) on the goal of visible Christian unity, but sobered by the challenges and reminded of the churches’ dependence on God in the face of them.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT and DIANE KESSLER

■ Assembly reports, WCC ■ H.E. Fey ed., The Ecumenical Advance: A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 2: 1948-1968, London, SPCK, 1970, for extensive bibliographies on the first six assemblies of the WCC.

WCC, BASIS OF

ACCORDING TO the WCC constitution, “agreement with the basis upon which the Council is founded” is a precondition for membership. Adopted by the inaugural assembly (Amsterdam, 1948), the original basis read simply, “The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour.” It had been formulated at a meeting in Utrecht in 1938 of the committee of 14 appointed by the Life and Work* (L&W) and Faith and Order* (F&O) conferences.

“Fellowship of churches” had by 1948 become part of ecumenical terminology. The 1920 encyclical of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople had proposed “a koinonia of churches”. Although the English word “fellowship” lacks the rich biblical nuances of the Greek original, it does affirm the reality of a unity that is “given” and “previous”, and not just constituted by human decisions, and implicitly rejects the WCC as a potential “super-church”.

“Which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour”, some claim, finds its source in the 1855 basis of the YMCAs,* and later of the World Young Women’s Christian Association* (1894) and of the World Student Christian Federation.* More directly, invitations to the first world conference of F&O were addressed to churches “which accept our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour”.

Some in both liberal and conservative circles expressed dissatisfaction with “Jesus Christ as God and Saviour”. Unitarians and the Society of Friends did not want to be committed to a definite doctrinal formula. To the more orthodox the phrase did not adequately affirm the humanity of Christ. It has “a heretical flavour which would have led to its rejection by any one of the ecumenical councils” (William Adams Brown).

In his 1938 explanatory memorandum on the WCC constitution, William Temple, who had chaired the Utrecht meeting, drew out the two main implications of the basis as formulated. First, the fact that the WCC is a fellowship, not a federation, of churches means that it cannot exercise any constitutional authority over the member churches. Second, the Council stands on faith in Jesus Christ as God and Saviour – in essence “an affirmation of the incarnation and the atonement”. But the basis is “not a credal test to judge churches or persons”; the churches will have freedom to interpret that faith in their own way.

From Utrecht on, some have argued against any basis. It could introduce an element of ecclesiastical judgmentalism and so corrode the koinonia. Others would prefer the Nicene* or Apostles* Creed as the basis.

Although the Amsterdam assembly viewed the basis as “adequate for the present purposes” of the WCC, it endorsed the need “for clarification or amplification of the Christian faith” within the Christological framework which the assembly had affirmed. A later study by the central committee concluded that there was no need to change the basis, though it was necessary to explain its meaning and also make clear that the incarnation* and the Trinity* were implicit in it. Accordingly the second assembly (Evanston 1954) accepted a description of the purpose and function of the basis: “less than a confession” but “much more than a mere formula or agreement”. The basis showed the nature of ecumenical fellowship, provided an overall orientation for the Council’s work, and indicated the general range of fellowship which the member churches sought to establish.

After Evanston another study led the central committee to present a new basis at the third assembly (New Delhi, 1961); it was adopted with 383 votes in favour, 36 against and 7 abstentions. It reads: “The World Council of Churches is a fellowship of churches which confess the Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour according to the scriptures and therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling to the glory of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit.”

The re-formulated basis incorporates five changes. “Confess”, versus the earlier “accept”, suggests commitment and emphasizes the experience of togetherness in fellowship. “The”, not “our”, with “Lord Jesus Christ” is less restrictive and points to the universality of Christ’s lordship. “According to the scriptures” to an extent meets the criticism that the earlier version tended towards Docetism or mono-physitism and, at the same time, affirms the place of the Bible in the ecumenical fellowship. “And therefore seek to fulfill together their common calling” adds a dimension of dynamism to the understanding of fellowship and also underlines the ontological priority of what God in Christ has already accomplished. The final doxological formula sets the Christocentric affirmation in a Trinitarian setting, makes the basis totally acceptable to the Orthodox and adds a celebrative element to the fact of and aspiration for unity.

Most of the assembly delegates who took part in the discussion were of the opinion that the new basis was in full agreement with the Trinitarian doctrine as formulated by the first two ecumenical councils* and in the Nicene Creed, and that it made more explicit the evangelical and scriptural rationale of the ecumenical movement. But there were also critical voices. They feared that, in going beyond the essential Christological criterion for membership, the WCC was moving in the direction of confessionism, or that any expansion would set a precedent for still further additions until the basis became “a burdensome doctrinal statement”. Other critics imagined that the new basis would block any future revision and leave uncorrected “the one-sided monophysite character of the original basis”.

The 1961 basis has endured. It continues to sufficiently define the WCC’s nature. But the one sentence and each of its key expressions are not static abstractions. They are coloured by the horizons which over 50 years of reflective experience have developed: the Lord Jesus Christ as Lord and Saviour, the scriptures as understood, prayed and witnessed, the fellowship of churches and their common calling, even the glory of the Triune God. None of these realities is quite experienced and understood as it had been by the fledgling member churches in 1948. In fact, this developmental continuity creates a “basis beyond the Basis”, evidenced in the central committee’s lengthy policy statement proposed to the eighth assembly (Harare, 1998): “Towards a Common Understanding and Vision of the WCC.”

T.K. THOMAS

■ H.E. Fey ed., The Ecumenical Advance: A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 2: 1948-1968, London, SPCK, 1970, ch. 2 ■ W. Theurer, Die trinitarische Basis des Ökumenischen Rates der Kirchen, Frankfurt, Gerhard Kaffke, 1967 ■ “The WCC Basis” (= ER, 37, 2, 1985).

WCC, MEMBERSHIP OF

CHURCHES WHICH agree with the WCC basis are eligible to apply for WCC membership. Applications may be approved at an assembly by two-thirds of the member churches or, between assemblies, by two-thirds of the central committee (unless objection from one-third of the member churches is received within six months).

A prospective member must evidence "sustained independent life and organization" and "constructive ecumenical relations" with other churches in its country, which normally means membership of the national council of churches. Ordinarily, member churches must have at least 25,000 members. Churches with at least 10,000 members may be associate members, eligible to participate in all WCC activities but not to vote in the assembly. Associate membership is also open to churches which – for reasons approved by the central committee – prefer this status.

WCC rules state that becoming a member signifies a church's "faithfulness to the basis of the Council, fellowship in the Council, participation in the life and work of the Council and commitment to the ecumenical movement as integral to the mission of the church". These responsibilities are further specified in the rules. Member churches are expected to send delegates to the assembly, inform the WCC of situations in their own life which warrant the attention and solidarity of the ecumenical family, pursue and encourage ecumenical commitment at all levels of their church's life, interpret the work of the WCC and ecumenical movement among their members, and participate in the activities and programmes of the Council. Each member church is to make "an annual contribution to the general budget of the Council" in an amount "agreed upon in consultation between the church and the Council", normally a minimum of SFr.1000. The WCC constitution and rules make no provision for suspending or removing churches from membership.

HISTORY AND STATISTICS

In Amsterdam in 1948 representatives of 147 churches, mostly European and North American, constituted the WCC. By each subsequent assembly the number had increased – 161 at Evanston (1954), 197 at New Delhi (1961), 235 at Uppsala (1968), 285 at Nairobi (1975), 301 at Vancouver (1983), 317 at Canberra (1991), and 336 at Harare (1998). The churches come from about 100 countries all over the world.

Relatively few churches have withdrawn. In 1960 three white South African churches left the WCC in the aftermath of the condemnation of apartheid* by the declaration of a WCC-sponsored meeting in Cottesloe,* outside Johannesburg. Later, the Presbyterian Church of Ireland and the Salvation Army withdrew; both objected to grants from the Programme to Combat Racism* to armed liberation movements in Southern Africa, although the Salvation Army also noted the difference between its organization and that of most member churches and has remained an active participant in a number of WCC activities. Four Chinese churches were founding members, but there was little WCC contact with China after the Korean War (1950-53). In the mid-1980s, after Chinese Protestants entered a "post-denominational" period after the cultural revolution, they began to renew their contacts with the WCC, and in 1991 the Canberra assembly received the China Christian Council as a member church. Following the end of the USSR, the All-Union Council of Evangelical Christians-Baptists, which had been a federation of Baptist, Pentecostal and other evangelical bodies in various Soviet republics, ceased to exist, and its successor bodies did not remain in WCC membership. In the context of growing expressions of concern during the 1990s among Eastern Orthodox member churches about the direction of the WCC, two of these churches – in Bulgaria and in Georgia – decided to leave the WCC; until then, all the autocephalous churches of the Eastern Orthodox family had been members of the Council.

The number of member churches has sometimes dropped because of a union of two or more member churches, potentially creating discontent if the newly united church is allowed fewer delegates than its constituting churches were. In other cases member churches whose origins were in mission during the colonial period have divided into two or more nationally organized churches, thus increasing the total number of WCC members.

Churches calculate their own membership on different bases, ranging from those which count only adult confirmed members to those which include all inhabitants of their country except persons who explicitly indicate otherwise. The WCC does not maintain membership statistics, and it is impossible to give precise figures for how many people are members of WCC churches. Commonly used numbers range from 350 to 450 million.

MEMBERSHIP ISSUES

The WCC faces various interesting issues of membership within (and without) its fellowship.

National churches as the "building block". Nearly all of the member churches are organized bodies of local parishes or congregations, usually within the boundaries of a single nation, where they exist alongside other similar organizations of local congregations. They are often described as denominations, although not all of them would accept this designation.

In the original draft for a WCC constitution, prepared in Utrecht in 1938, representation of the churches was based on a regional principle, with an exception made for Orthodox churches. A counter-proposal made in 1945 by Lutheran churches in the US suggested instead a structure based on world confessional families. In the end, the argument prevailed that it was essential for the WCC, as a body without its own canonical authority, to be in direct touch with the national churches, which was the principle adopted by the Amsterdam assembly. In turn, the WCC takes account of confessional and regional representation in its governing bodies. Moreover, national councils of churches, regional ecumenical organizations, Christian World Communions* and international ecumenical organizations recognized by the central committee as being in working relations with the WCC are normally invited to send non-voting representatives to assemblies and central committee meetings.

WCC regulations and Orthodox canon law make it likely that new member churches will be Protestant, thus reducing the proportion of the Orthodox voice in the WCC and (some have argued) in effect rewarding the Protestant tradition for the schismatic and divisive tendencies which the WCC is intended to overcome. To help counter this factor, the WCC ensures a certain percentage of seats to Orthodox representatives.

Roman Catholic membership. The first WCC assembly after the Second Vatican Council* (Uppsala 1968) entertained strong hopes of RC membership. In 1969 Pope Paul VI said the membership question "contains serious theological and pastoral implications. It thus requires profound study and commits us to a way that... could be long and difficult." A 1972 report on membership from the WCC/RCC Joint Working Group* concluded that there were no insuperable theological, ecclesiological or canonical objections to membership. But the holy see made a prudential judgment not to apply "in the near future".

Were the RCC to apply, two difficulties would be considerable, if not insuperable. Given that representation on WCC governing bodies must give "due regard" to size and that there are perhaps twice as many Roman Catholics as members of all the WCC member churches combined, the consequences for achieving balanced representation would be enormous.

Moreover, since the RCC understands itself as a family of local churches with and under the bishop of Rome – "a universal fellowship with a universal mission and structure" – RC representation would come from both the holy see and the local churches. What would happen if within the RCC there was public dissent among the RC episcopal, clerical and lay representations, and between some of them and the contingent of the holy see, especially on important ecclesiological and personal and social ethical issues?

Although not a member, the RCC does participate in various ways in almost all WCC programmes.

Other non-member churches. The limited nature of WCC authority enables it easily to involve a range of people from non-member churches in its conferences and consultations, studies and other activities. Some judge, however, that many small national churches, particularly those in a minority situation, are unfairly excluded from the benefits of belonging to the WCC because they do not have enough members to be eligible for it. Others note that the WCC does not take sufficient account of the interests of diaspora Christians – those in a smaller ecclesiastical jurisdiction of a church with its headquarters in another country.

A more wide-ranging challenge is raised by statistical projections of the growth of independent, Pentecostal and Evangelical churches outside the WCC's membership; most have little or no knowledge of or contact with the WCC or are in principle against the WCC. According to some observers, fewer than half of the non-Roman Catholic and non-Orthodox Christians in the world are now members of WCC churches; this imbalance has serious implications for the understanding of the WCC as an instrument of the worldwide ecumenical movement.

MARLIN VANELDEREN

■ T. Stransky, "RC Membership in the WCC", ER, 20, 1968 ■ W.A. Visser 't Hooft, The Genesis and Formation of the WCC, WCC, 1982, ch. 18 ■ WCC/RCC Joint Working Group, "Patterns of Relationships", ER, 24, 1972.

WORLD DAY OF PRAYER

THE WORLD DAY of Prayer (WDP) is a worldwide movement of Christian women of many traditions in 170 countries who welcome all people to observe a common day of prayer on the first Friday of March. It is an ecumenical movement that brings together women of various races, cultures and traditions in closer fellowship, understanding and action throughout the year. WDP national/regional committees disburse most of the WDP offering in support of women's projects and Christian literature worldwide.

The origins of WDP date back to the 19th century when Christian women of the United States and Canada initiated a variety of cooperative activities in support of women's involvement in mission at home and in other parts of the world that related to various areas. Concern for women and children motivated women in 1861 and thereafter, despite opposition from all-male mission boards, to found numerous women's boards for foreign and home missions whereby they could work directly with and for women and children.

The role of prayer in mission work led to annual days and weeks of prayer. In 1887 Presbyterian women called for a day of prayer for home missions, and Methodist women called for a week of prayer and self-denial for foreign missions. A Baptist day of prayer for foreign missions began in 1891. In 1895 a day of corporate intercessions for mission was initiated by the Women's Auxiliary of the Anglican Church of Canada. By 1897 the women of six denominations formed a joint committee for a united day of prayer for home missions. In 1912 the Women's Boards of Foreign Missions called for a united day of prayer for foreign missions. Overall, women were organizing interdenominational structures that were effective and cooperative.

After the devastation of the first world war, women renewed efforts for peace and unity and, beginning on 20 February 1920, the first Friday of Lent was established as a joint day of prayer for missions. In the second half of 1926, women of North America distributed the worship service to many countries and partners in mission. The response worldwide was enthusiastic and 4 March 1927 was the first World Day of Prayer.

In 1928 the WDP committee reported: "The circle of prayer has expanded literally around the world. We have learned the great lesson of praying with, rather than for, our sisters of other races and nations, thus enriching our experience and releasing the power which must be ours if we are to accomplish tasks entrusted to us."

There was new growth after the second world war because of women's commitment to reconciliation and ecumenism. In 1969 the World Union of Catholic Women's Organizations decided to forgo their worldwide day of prayer in order to encourage maximum participation in WDP. Today, women of Orthodox traditions also participate widely in WDP.

The annual theme for the WDP worship service and the country of its writing are selected at the quadrennial meeting of the WDP International Committee (WDPIC). The WDP committee selected develops a common worship on the theme determined at the international meeting.

Through preparation and participation in the worship service, millions of people learn how their sisters in other countries understand the biblical passages in their context. They listen to their concerns and move to solidarity with them. Thus the richness of the Christian faith grows deeper and broader in an international, ecumenical expression.

The worldwide growth of the movement called for international involvement in planning and responsibility for WDP. An International Committee was formed in 1968 and has met every four years since.

EILEEN KING

■ H. Hiller, Ökumene der Frauen, Anfänge und frühe Geschichte der Weltgebetstagsbewegung in den USA, weltweit und in Deutschland, WDP Committee, Germany ■ WDPIC, annual journal since 1975 ■ WDPIC quadrennial report for 1995.

WORLD EVANGELICAL FELLOWSHIP

THE WEF BEGAN to bring together several Evangelical persons and groups after the second world war. A number of European Evangelicals had been linked since 1846 by the World's Evangelical Alliance,* but the alliance was limited to a loose affiliation of regional fellowships, based on membership of individuals rather than ecclesial units.

US Evangelicals formed the National Association of Evangelicals in 1943. It was their response to the overseas national churches which had resulted from US conservative evangelical missions and that now sought support in an international network of like-minded Christians.

In August 1951, in response to a call for an international convention of Evangelicals in the Netherlands, 91 participants from 21 countries formed the World Evangelical Fellowship. The WEF statement of faith echoes the Evangelical Alliance statement of 1846, except for the addition of "infallible" in the article on the divinely inspired scripture and a reference to Christ's "personal return in power and glory". In objection to WEF use of "infallible", in 1952 the European Evangelical Alliance was organized. Only in 1968 did the European Evangelical community join the WEF.

From the outset the WEF took a low profile; it encouraged Evangelicals of other nations without pressing for their membership. By the mid-1970s, when the WEF began to enjoy the service of full-time general directors, there were about 50 member nations. As of 2000 the WEF counted 108 national and regional Evangelical fellowships, 70% of them from the second and third worlds. Several internationally constituted commissions spearhead WEF programmes. Consultations and general assemblies and various publications give voice to the concerns of the WEF's worldwide constituencies. In 1992, the WEF appointed as its executive secretary Jun Vencer of the Philippines, the first from the non-Western world.

Two persistent issues on the WEF agenda – which also occupied the founders of the Evangelical Alliance – are theological liberalism and unreformed Catholicism. Contacts in the late 1970s by WEF leaders with Roman Catholic representatives were not well received by some WEF members (see Evangelical-RC relations). In some parts of the world, Evangelicals judge that Roman Catholicism has been little affected by the reforms of Vatican II or by the biblical/charismatic renewal movement. The breach created was healed only by the 1986 adoption of a WEF position paper which was very critical of traditional Catholicism.

A 1989 consultation on evangelism* involved representatives of the WEF, the Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization,* and the WCC. The WEF took issue with an Ecumenical Press Service report that "what unites us is greater than what divides us". Divergent stances on the uniqueness* and finality of Jesus Christ* for salvation,* on the role of interfaith dialogue,* and on the doctrine of inspiration* continue to be sources of tension between the WEF and the WCC. Nevertheless, in 1995 (Venice) and 1998 (Jerusalem), a small group of WEF and Catholic theologians and biblical scholars met at least to clarify their communalities, differences and open questions.

Noting the loss of focus on world evangelization because of the integration of the International Missionary Council* in the WCC, the WEF's sixth general assembly (1974) created a missions commission. The commission seeks to promote greater world mission, particularly by supporting emerging third-world missions, and to facilitate cooperation between mission agencies and associations.

The eleventh general assembly in May 2001 voted to change the name of the WEF to World Evangelical Alliance from January 2002, "to reflect Evangelicals' growing desire to be more pro-active, inclusive and engaged with the world around them”.

See also evangelical missions, Evangelicals.

ROBERT T. COOTE

WORLD METHODIST COUNCIL

IN 1881 SOME 400 delegates from 30 Methodist bodies, primarily British and North American but including some mission-related churches, attended the first ecumenical Methodist conference in London. The conference met every ten years. In 1951 the eighth conference strongly supported the new WCC (1948) and changed its name to World Methodist Council (WMC), “in view of the wider use of ‘ecumenical’ in connection with the WCC”. The WMC would meet every five years.

The WMC is now (2001) a worldwide association of 79 member churches; 9 are united churches with some roots in the Wesleyan tradition. It embraces 38 million full members (i.e. baptized, confirmed and in good standing) among a total Methodist community of about 75 million (including young children and adult sympathizers).

The policy-making body is a 500-member council of persons appointed by member churches. The WMC has no legislative authority over the churches but tries to serve them and harmonize their witness and activities. It surveys programmes, transacts business, and convenes the quinquennial world Methodist conference, an inspirational gathering which draws thousands of people from 130 countries; the 18th conference was held in Brighton, England, in 2001.

The WMC urges member churches to be involved in union negotiations and in councils of churches at every level. It is almost always represented at WCC meetings, and its general secretary participates in annual conferences of secretaries of Christian World Communions.* The WMC co-sponsors international bilateral dialogues: Methodist-Roman Catholic (1967),* Methodist-Reformed (1985),* Lutheran-Methodist (1977)* and Anglican-Methodist (1992).* In 1995 a Methodist-Orthodox joint preparatory commission recommended that an international dialogue be inaugurated, and explorations are continuing.

The general secretariat is at Lake Junaluska, North Carolina, USA, and a secretary is based at the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva. WMC publications include conference and council proceedings, a handbook of information, reports of bilateral dialogues, and its international World Parish.

RALPH C. YOUNG

■ WMC Handbook of Information 2002-2006, Lake Junaluska NC, WMC, 2002.

WORLD STUDENT CHRISTIAN FEDERATION

THE WSCF, A FEDERATION of national student Christian movements (SCMs) active in over 60 countries on all six continents, celebrated its centennial in 1995. At the time of its founding it was a primary pioneer of the modern missionary and ecumenical movement. It encouraged and inspired students in the late 19th and early 20th centuries to engage actively in the work of spreading the gospel by committed discipleship. It provided a forum for students to meet and work closely with those of other national and denominational backgrounds. Its ecumenical vision and commitment emphasized the importance of mutual communication, cooperation and challenge with the mainline institutional churches. The WSCF worked for unity in the church and in the world.

The WSCF was founded in 1895 at Vadstena, Sweden, by students and student leaders representing SCMs from ten North American and European countries. They were brought together by John R. Mott, a leader in the US Young Men's Christian Associations. He recognized in the universities “strategic points” for Christian world mission. For the next 25 years Mott, with other pioneers such as Karl Fries from Sweden and Ruth Rouse from Great Britain, devoted his energies, first as general secretary (1895-1920) of the federation and then as its chair (1920-28), to the building up of student Christian movements in all parts of the world and to making the WSCF into a unifying and supporting force for these movements.

The history of the federation has several major periods. The founding period, up to the outbreak of the war in 1914, was marked by a tremendous growth of Christian student groups. Upon leaving the founders' meeting in 1895, Mott embarked on a world tour through southern Europe, the Middle East and Asia. His journey led to the establishment of student Christian groups in many of the places he visited, and within a few years he could report the existence of Christian groups in over 900 universities, colleges and other student centres. By 1913 this number had grown to more than 2000 groups with over 150,000 members around the world.

The outbreak of the war in 1914, however, introduced a period of crisis and test for this worldwide fellowship. The movements, especially in Europe, did not escape the strong nationalism that developed in their respective countries. Tensions became apparent during the first post-war general committee meeting in 1920, where some delegates raised the question, "Do we believe in the same Christ?" Two years later in Peking the general committee failed for the first time to reach a consensus on a major topic: the Christian attitude towards war.

During the period 1929-39 intense theological work was carried on under the leadership of Francis P. Miller (chair), W.A. Visser 't Hooft (general secretary), Suzanne de Diétrich and Pierre Maury. Some of the issues which determined the federation's programmes for the succeeding decades were the international and the ecumenical task of the federation, the federation and the church, the role of the Bible, of Bible study and of worship, and the understanding of mission and evangelism.

In the period following the second world war up to the late 1960s, the emphasis was placed on the task of Christians in the academic community and on their political responsibility. In addition, an extensive programme of study and teaching – the largest project ever undertaken by the federation – focused on "The Life and Mission of the Church".

A new period was ushered in in 1968 when the general committee decided on a major structural change – the WSCF was to be divided into six regions: Africa, Asia-Pacific, Europe, Latin America, the Middle East and North America, with responsibility for programmes in their respective regions and power to nominate representatives to the executive committee. The head office in Geneva became the inter-regional office. This decentralization reflected the new concern for self-determination and for relevance to the political and social contexts (e.g. nation-building in Asia, radical democracy in Europe, revolutionary change in Latin America).

On the international level, the federation elaborated an understanding of the Christian witness within the struggle for liberation. Of special concern was the increase in women's leadership within the federation. In 1986 the general secretariat was restructured to include two co-secretaries general (one woman and one man). Women's programmes were established in most regions, and since 1981 women's pre-assemblies precede general assemblies. The inter-regional office is housed within the Ecumenical Centre in Geneva. Regional offices are based in Nairobi, Hong Kong, Amsterdam, Quito and Beirut (the North American regional structure is currently in abeyance).

The following major aspects of this centennial history can be identified:

Mission. The federation was born as students responded to the challenge to participate in the "evangelization of the world in this generation". Along with the Student Volunteer Movement for Christian Mission, it was the main training ground for leaders in the missionary movement. When Mott organized the first world missionary conference in Edinburgh (1910) which led to the formation of the International Missionary Council,* many of the persons he called upon came from the ranks of the WSCF.

Ecumenicity. From its inception the federation has called students to mission and unity and to testify to their oneness in Christ across all differences of confession, nationality, race and gender. In this respect the history of the modern ecumenical movement up to the formation of the World Council of Churches (1948) is almost synonymous with that of the WSCF, and many of the leaders in the early WCC had developed their ecumenical understanding and commitment in the federation. One of the early achievements, due especially to the pioneering work of Ruth Rouse, was the establishment of Orthodox student groups in Eastern Europe and their integration into the life of the federation. Not everyone accepted this commitment to openness. Already in 1910 a group of students in Great Britain broke away from the SCM and formed the Inter-Varsity Fellowship, and in 1947 the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students* was formed.

The role of the Bible and of Bible study. From the very beginning, Bible study has occupied a central place in the activities of the SCMs and the federation. In the early days it was virtually the only activity. But the views on the Bible and the ways to study it were constantly debated. In the 1930s Bible study became a major preoccupation under the influence of the theology developed by Karl Barth. Suzanne de Diétrich gave major leadership in this area, and her books on the Bible were widely used during the years after the second world war both in the movements and in the churches. The prominence of Bible study in the meetings of the WCC and other ecumenical gatherings owes much to de Diétrich's work. During the 1970s, Bible study was influenced by the emphasis on contextualization. Biblical texts were examined to determine the social and cultural context of their origin, as well as the contemporary context in which they were to be interpreted.

Mutual assistance. The first world war had decimated the student population in Europe, and many of the survivors were homeless and without any means. In 1920 the WSCF founded European Student Relief. During four years students from 42 nations provided over $500,000 for assistance to fellow students in 19 countries. The assistance programme has continued under various names (International Student Service, World University Service) into the 21st century and has served as an expression of solidarity between movements. It also promoted cooperation with other international student movements both religious and secular. Today the Mutual Assistance Programme is principally designed for movement building.

Education. Universities and other institutes of higher education have always been the primary locus of the student Christian movements. In the late 1920s and the 1930s, the university was perceived to be in crisis because of the lack of spiritual orientation among both teachers and students, as well as its captivity to economic and ideological forces. The federation, through its publications, provided analysis of the situation in the universities and guidance for confronting the ideological currents of fascism, national socialism and communism. After the second world war, the "university question" was a top programme priority for many years. Extensive work developed among university teachers, leading in the 1960s to a comprehensive understanding of "Christian presence in the academic world". In the same period, the WSCF started work in secondary schools. The student protests in 1968 in favour of democratization and participation initially provided the ground for a radical critique of the university. The reforms introduced as a result of the protests were reversed in the 1980s as the student population turned increasingly conservative, preoccupied with jobs and security, unwilling to be challenged by questions about the basic purpose of the academic enterprise.

Faith and politics. Issues of social, racial and economic justice were raised at an early stage in the meetings of the WSCF, although the federation as a whole avoided taking positions on concrete issues out of concern that controversy might endanger the fellowship. Only after 1945 did the federation start to take more explicit stands on issues of justice and peace. In the years 1960-68 considerable activity was developed by the political commission of the WSCF in order to help students to discover new forms of political action. Several movements were heavily involved with radical political groups; Christian students in Brazil, South Korea, Philippines, El Salvador and Sri Lanka suffered arrest, imprisonment and sometimes death. In the 1980s many students, especially in the third world, had to live under militarized and repressive regimes and were disillusioned when hopes for justice faded. Providing solidarity and mobilizing support was therefore one of the key challenges facing the WSCF worldwide.

The WSCF as a world community. When it started, the WSCF was the only intentionally international student organization. By the end of the 1920s the breadth of its membership was still unique in that it included, besides North America and Western Europe, movements in Eastern Europe and throughout Asia-Pacific (groups from Latin America and Africa joined after the second world war). Already in 1907 a major meeting was held in Tokyo, and a conference and general committee meeting was held in Peking in 1922 with 500 Chinese participants besides the international participation. From 1922 onwards, for the next 20 years, the staff included a Chinese member, T.Z. Koo, the organizer of the Peking meeting.

Because of this international outlook the federation notably preserved an independent perspective during the cold-war period, following the second world war until the late 1980s, and maintained contacts across ideological lines. The division into regions in the 1970s provided a wider base. More movements joined, but this development did not enhance the international outlook. On the contrary, as a result of the emphasis on regional identity, most discussions in the meetings of the WSCF became exchanges between regional viewpoints rather than attempts to elaborate a worldwide perspective. As the federation enters the second century of its history, the transcending of regionalism in favour of a truly ecumenical international community constitutes one of its major tasks.

THOMAS WIESER

- E. Adler ed., Memoirs and Diaries 1895-1990: WSCF, WSCF Inter-regional Office, 1994
- S. de Diétrich, Cinquante ans d'histoire (ET Fifty Years of History, Geneva, WSCF, 1993)
- C.H. Hopkins, John R. Mott: A Biography, Grand Rapids MI, Eerdmans, 1979
- P.A. Potter & T. Wieser, Seeking and Serving the Truth: The First Hundred Years of the WSCF, WCC, 1997
- R. Rouse, The World's Student Christian Federation: History of the First Thirty Years, London, SCM Press, 1948
- R. Rouse & S.C. Neill eds, A History of the Ecumenical Movement, vol. 1: 1517-1948, London, SPCK, 1954
- T. Wieser ed., Bible and Theology in the Federation: A Report, Geneva, WSCF, 1995
- W.A. Visser 't Hooft, Memoirs, London, SCM Press, 1973.

WORLD VISION INTERNATIONAL

WV IS AN INTERNATIONAL Christian relief and development organization working with the poor to promote human transformation, seek justice, and bear witness to the message of the gospel. Established in 1950 to care for Asian orphans, WV has grown to embrace the larger issues of emergency relief, community development and advocacy for the poor in its mission to help children and their families build sustainable futures. With the assistance of WV, local communities define and address their needs for food, shelter, health care and education, as well as spiritual and other human needs. This holistic, integrated approach, called an "area development programme", has become the standard for WV's work. The objective is to build strong, healthy communities that can sustain themselves. WV also responds to humanitarian emergencies caused by natural disaster or war.

In the half century since its founding by Robert Pierce, an American evangelist, WV has grown into one of the world's largest Christian relief and development organizations. In 2000, WV raised $886 million in cash and goods from private and public donors for programmes in 89 countries. Through these programmes, approximately 11,500 staff members – 96 percent of them based in their own nations – assisted some 75 million people. Whenever possible, WV joins with communities, churches, governments, and other aid agencies to deliver services more effectively and efficiently.

WV focuses on children because it considers them the best measure of the social health of a community and the greatest hope for tomorrow. Its work is made possible through the contributions of more than 1.2 million child sponsors, the gifts of other private donors, the help of thousands of volunteers and staff, and support from businesses, churches, institutions, and government and international agencies. About half of WV's operations are funded through child sponsorship, in which private donors pledge a certain amount each month to support children in specific community projects.

WV functions as a partnership of 85 interdependent national entities. Each has its own board or advisory council to oversee its operations. A common mission statement and shared core values bind the partnership. A 24-member international board, with representatives from 19 nations, governs the partnership. The international board, which meets twice a year, appoints the partnership's senior officers, approves strategic plans and budgets, and determines international policy. National boards govern at the national level. An international council, comprising international board members and national board delegates representing all national offices, meets every three years to discuss partnership issues.

The World Vision partnership offices, located in Geneva, Bangkok, Nairobi, Vienna, Los Angeles and San José, Costa Rica, coordinate the strategic and global operations of the organization and represent WV in the international arena. WV has consultative status with the UN Economic and Social Council, UNICEF, the UN High Commission on Refugees, the World Health Organization, and the International Labour Organization. It is a member of the International Council of Voluntary Agencies and, since 1997, has been recognized by the World Council of Churches as an international ecumenical organization. WV is also a member of international coalitions and committees dealing with issues such as landmines, child rights, status of women, child soldiers and the control of small arms.

World Vision believes that God, in the person of Jesus Christ, offers hope of renewal, restoration and reconciliation. It partners with all Christian churches in fulfilling the mission of Christ to serve the poor and suffering while witnessing to the good news of the gospel. At the same time, WV is respectful of other faiths. It does not engage in proselytism or religious coercion. Its programmes and services are available to all those in need regardless of race, gender, ethnicity, nationality or religion.

DEAN R. HIRSCH

WORLD YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION

THE YWCA WAS A Christian response in the mid-19th century to the radically altered social conditions caused by the industrial revolution, especially the massive shifts of rural populations to cities and the exploitation of the poor and working-class women, men and children. The YWCA of Great Britain attributes its origins to two sources: the prayer unions of Emma Roberts, which regularly gathered groups of young women for prayer and support; and the network of homes and institutions under the patronage of Lady Kinnaird. The first YWCA residence for young Christian working women was established in London in 1855.

The movement spread rapidly. For example, by 1858 in the USA YWCA residences had been established to provide companionship, Bible study and discussion. In 1894 there were similar movements in France, Germany, Norway, Switzerland and Sweden. In 1898 the World YWCA adopted as a basis of affiliation one similar to the 1855 Paris basis of the YMCA:* "to unite those young women who regard Jesus Christ as their God and Saviour according to the holy scriptures... and desire to associate their efforts for the extension of God's kingdom among all young women by such means as are in accordance with the word of God". Headquartered in London, it held its first world conference in 1898, with 326 delegates attending.

Inspired by the missionary fervour of the time, the YWCA recruited missionaries for the churches and sent many YWCA leaders to develop work in Asia, Africa, South America and Eastern Europe. Many YWCA leaders came out of the Student Christian movement (see World Student Christian Federation), which was also internationally oriented.

Although the World YWCA was not exclusively Protestant, in many countries it was thought to be so. Leadership in predominantly Eastern Orthodox countries (Russia, Bulgaria etc.) or in Roman Catholic environments (Latin America, Philippines) or where Protestants were a small minority of the Christians (Middle East) urged the YWCA to state clearly its position for its work with non-Protestant Christians. In 1928 the World Association faced a serious division by adopting an ecumenical policy which admitted Roman Catholics to membership; in response, the YWCAs of Finland and South Africa withdrew from the World YWCA. That same year Pope Pius XI's Mortalium Animos warned Roman Catholics against participation in "pan-Christian" activities, and YWCA Catholic leaders thereafter found themselves often in conflict with their church authorities (see RCC and pre-Vatican II ecumenism).

Especially after the first world war, YWCA programmes developed a new emphasis on social action, e.g. in urging national associations to support the standards for working women that had been adopted by the International Labour Conference.

In 1930, following discussions with the World Alliance of YMCAs and the World Student Christian Federation, the World YWCA moved its headquarters to Geneva. This location re-inforced its image as an international, interconfessional movement. In 1939 a world conference on Christian youth, co-organized by the World Alliance of YMCAs, the WSCF, the World YWCA and the churches, brought together 1500 young people from 70 countries, many of whom became leaders in the ecumenical movement after the second world war.

At the 1955 YWCA world council meeting in Beirut, the constitution was revised. A main function of the World YWCA was declared to be bringing together "members of different Christian traditions into a worldwide fellowship through which they may grow as Christians, participating in the life and worship of their church and expressing their faith by word and deed". A preamble was added which stated that "unity among Christians is the will of God" and expressed the association's desire "as a lay movement to make a contribution towards that unity".

Working in 101 countries, the World YWCA has a federated structure of 85 national affiliates which in turn coordinate thousands of local branches or associations. It has consultative status with the United Nations and its specialized agencies and co-operates with many ecumenical and non-governmental organizations.

World YWCA-sponsored programmes have helped women obtain the skills to generate much-needed income, to improve the health and nutrition of their families, and to help build a solid base for their children's educational growth. Generations of women have been trained by YWCA programmes to gain skills and confidence needed to assume leadership roles within their communities, and many have emerged as prominent leaders in their countries in the struggle for women's rights, peace, and development with justice for all.

See also women in church and society.

ELAINE HESSE STEEL and KATHERINE STRONG

- A. Rice, A History of the World's Young Women's Christian Association, New York, Women's Press, 1947
- C. Seymour-Jones, Journey of Faith: The History of the World YWCA, 1945-1994, Geneva, World YWCA, 1994
- M.S. Sims, The Natural History of a Social Institution: The Young Women's Christian Association, New York, Women's Press, 1936.

WORLD'S EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE

IN AUGUST 1846, SOME 800 evangelicals from Britain, Europe and North America, representing a variety of Protestant traditions, met in London to form the Evangelical Alliance. (The British branch was incorporated decades later as the World's Evangelical Alliance.) Based on membership of individuals rather than of churches, the Evangelical Alliance was "the first society formed with a definite view to Christian unity" (Stephen Neill). The founders identified a core of evangelical belief which includes: the inspiration and authority of scripture, the unity and Triune nature of the godhead, the fall-ness of human nature, the incarnation and atonement of Jesus Christ, justification by faith alone, and resurrection and final judgment.

When the American delegates in 1846 balked at barring slave-holders from membership, the Evangelical Alliance's founders dropped the quest for an international organization and settled for loosely affiliated national fellowships. Units quickly formed in England, Canada, India, Sweden and Turkey. Later Spain, Portugal and the USA were added.

The alliance strongly encouraged cooperative missionary work and facilitated "comity" and "non-interference" agreements among mission groups. The Evangelical Alliance annual week of prayer became, at the urging of missionaries in India, the Universal Week of Prayer. The periodical Evangelical Christendom articulated Evangelical Alliance concerns for more than a century, notably world mission and solidarity with Christians who were suffering persecution. The alliance sponsored several missionary conferences, which were precursors to the 1910 world conference in Edinburgh.

In the USA, due to tensions over the social gospel, theological liberalism, and the drive towards institutional unity (realized in the Federal Council of Churches in 1908), the US alliance movement ceased to function after 1900. The British and several European alliances have continued. When evangelical forces began to coalesce in the USA in the 1940s, the historic alliance network was ready to give birth to the World Evangelical Fellowship.*

ROBERT T. COOTE

WORSHIP IN THE ECUMENICAL MOVEMENT

THE SUBJECT OF worship has been on the agenda of the ecumenical movement since its beginnings, although it did not really come to the fore until the concurrently growing liturgical movement* had also gained strength among the divided churches. Both movements show a near-parallel development; Vatican II* recognized them respectively as “movements of the Holy Spirit through his church” and as “the work of grace of the Holy Spirit”.

WAYS OF WORSHIP

References to worship in the report of the first world conference on Faith and Order* at Lausanne in 1927 are more or less incidental. The report of the second world conference on F&O (Edinburgh 1937), however, suggested a study of patterns of worship characteristic of different churches. A theological commission on worship began to study the relevance of worship for the divided churches. Not until 1951 did the commission publish its report, together with selected papers, as Ways of Worship. The material provided the basis for discussion at the third world conference on F&O (Lund 1952).

The work of the theological commission on worship is the first definite indication of the impact of the liturgical movement on the ecumenical movement. Although in the end this liturgical renewal would contribute significantly to the striving towards unity, early WCC documents tend to see worship as the focal point of existing divisions. This perspective is probably due to the widely differing liturgical traditions then represented by the member churches.

In Lund ecumenical reflections on worship concentrated on the fact that in worship “disunity becomes explicit and the sense of separation most acute”. The conference maintained: “In worship we meet the problem, nay, rather the sin of the disunion of the church in its sharpest form.” This judgment is not surprising in light of the commission’s primarily descriptive and comparative work. Since worship was explicitly on the agenda of an ecumenical discussion for the first time, a basic overview of the different patterns of worship in the churches was necessary. Part 1 of Ways of Worship therefore described and compared “The Elements of Liturgy”, and part 2 dealt slightly more theologically with the “Inner Meaning of Word and Sacrament”. In both sections, members of the different churches outlined the essential features of the worship of their own community. The aim was not so much to attempt a common approach but to describe actual patterns of worship in the churches. Part 3 treated “Liturgy and Devotion”, concentrating on the question of Mariology. (The 1950 promulgation of the Roman Catholic dogma of the Assumption of Mary influenced the agenda here.)

The report of the commission reflected, ecumenically and theologically, on the different contributions. On the one hand, it tried to sketch important distinctions, such as eucharist-centred versus preaching-centred worship, and, on the other hand, to assess the unifying impact of the liturgical movement. The report mentioned especially the growing sense of the corporate aspect of worship, the re-discovery of its sacramental character and the return to primitive patterns of worship.

All in all, Ways of Worship, with its basically descriptive and comparative orientation, was a necessary starting point for the ecumenical discussions about the nature of worship. Lund explicitly recognized that the commission’s work “has strengthened the conviction that worship, no less than Faith and Order, is essential to the being of the church”.

Lund 1952 was a first attempt to formulate both the existing agreement and the unsolved problems regarding the meaning and practice of worship. The formulation of agreement appropriately and convincingly begins with the Trinitarian basis (see Trinity) and pneumatological context (see Holy Spirit) of worship. "We worship one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, the Triune God, by whose Spirit all true worship is inspired and unto whom all Christian worship is offered." The agreed statements which follow concern questions that are anthropological (worship involves the whole person), liturgical (a drawing together of the common elements observed in Ways of Worship), sacramental (the appreciation of both word and sacrament*) and ecclesiological (worship always takes place within the communion of saints*). Also mentioned is a theme that would be stressed repeatedly in subsequent ecumenical documents on worship: "However we view the church's worship, we are unanimous that its setting is the church's mission to the world." The section on unsolved problems takes up more specific questions (e.g. the precise relationship between word and sacrament and the place in worship of saints and the departed).

Lund's recommendations to the churches emphasize unity* as the aim of all the studies on different patterns of worship. Some recommendations re-appear in later documents, indicating that in the meantime the member churches have not taken them seriously enough.

THEOLOGICAL APPROACHES: MONTREAL AND UPPSALA

This worship commission, working between Lund and Montreal (1963), consisted of three regional sections: Europe, East Asia and North America. Each had quite different approaches. The European section left behind the method of comparative study and concentrated on the theology of worship in the Bible ("creation and worship", "redemption and worship", "new creation and worship"). This starting point yielded a definitely Christocentric understanding of the nature of worship: "Jesus Christ as the culmination of the mighty saving acts of God forms the living centre of all worship." The biblical approach also drew attention to the genuine variety of types of worship in the New Testament (e.g. sacraments, preaching of the word, prayers), but they were not systematized or evaluated as different forms over against each other. This variety may suggest the possibility of a unity among the different patterns of worship existing today.

The East Asian section concentrated on understanding worship as a response to God's creative and redemptive activity and on the indigenization of worship – the first time that an Asian report was included in such a theological commission on worship. It soon became clear, especially at the Uppsala assembly (1968), how important the insights and correctives from this Asian perspective were for ecumenical reflection on worship.

The North American section had a dual focus: the matrix of worship in the scriptures and the matrix of worship in contemporary North American churches. The group came to a parallel conclusion to that of the European section: a purely descriptive and comparative approach to the question of worship does not sufficiently advance the unity of the church; liturgical questions must be seen within the wider context of biblical and systematic issues.

The fourth F&O world conference (Montreal 1963) reacted to the above work of the theological commission on worship. Its report, Worship and the Oneness of Christ's Church, shifted from the differing patterns of worship to a firm commitment to unity in and through worship. This conclusion was a shift in the evaluation of the place of worship itself. While Lund had maintained that worship is no less essential to the church's life than faith and order, Montreal called worship "the central and determinative act of the church's life" and pressed for the study of worship as one of the main tasks facing the ecumenical dialogue. Some fundamental agreements are enumerated. As in Lund, the Trinitarian perspective is the starting point of the interpretation of the nature of worship: "Christian worship is... a service to God the Father by men [and women] redeemed by his Son, who are continually finding new life in the power of the Holy Spirit." The next point of agreement is the ecclesiological aspect, not the anthropological one as in Lund: "Worship... is an act formative of Christian community..., an act... which represents the one, catholic church.” This statement clearly recognized the fundamental ecclesiological relevance of worship. The importance given here to worship as a fundamental act of the being of the church* exceeds anything said about worship before.

Other aspects of worship often stressed are the interdependence of public liturgy and private devotion, the links of worship with creation* and the new creation, the Christocentric groundings of baptism* and the eucharist,* and the eschatological perspective of worship (see eschatology). Special sections of the report were devoted to worship, mission and indigenization, and Christian worship in the world today. The last point foreshadows the central concern of subsequent ecumenical debates on worship. The focus shifts from examining different patterns of worship in the churches and its underlying essence and unity to considering the crisis of worship in the modern world, with “authenticity” as the new key word. The mandate from Montreal, however, still concentrated on the newly discovered importance of worship in the ecumenical dialogue and the need for “a fresh approach... to the relation between theology and worship, so that,... as a definite step beyond current practice, our entire theological work may be informed by a fresh sensitivity to the demands and problems of Christian worship”. It soon became obvious that this vital concern was not maintained. The whole discussion narrowed down to specific problems of worship, losing sight of the importance of worship for theological work as a whole.

THE CRISIS OF WORSHIP TODAY

After Montreal, the subject of worship was important enough to constitute one of the six sections at the WCC's fourth assembly (Uppsala 1968). Of the Uppsala report on worship, one of its contributors has written: “I do not see how one could fail to be disappointed on reading the report” – especially after Montreal, one might add. (The challenge to see positively the fact of a WCC assembly officially treating worship, over against the “respectable obscurity” of F&O, does not seem convincing in the light of how little was achieved.) Several factors were responsible for this disappointment. Because of the general theme of the Uppsala assembly, “Behold, I Make All Things New”, the working group for the section on worship had to focus on the current theological crisis in the life of the church, i.e. the problems connected with the secularization* debate.

The section's original title was “The Worship of God in a Secular Age”. This wording was criticized both by the churches in countries where secularization was not the main problem facing the churches and their worship and by the Orthodox churches, who feared that worship was being surrendered to secularization. In the end, a very limited agreed statement was published as a “starting point”. It bears few traces of the former agreed statements concerning the Trinitarian and ecclesiological essence of worship and concentrates instead on the crisis of worship and the positive and negative possibilities of secularization. Lengthy justifications of worship are repudiated: “Worship needs no more justification than does love.” Recommendations to the churches are included under the cautious title “Helping People to Worship”, but they do not go beyond anything already said before. Despite its overall disappointing character, one positive thing seems worth pointing out: behind the emphasis on the need for authentic worship in a secular age lies the important conviction of the fundamental link between liturgy and life, a subject to be stressed in most subsequent documents on worship.

A 1969 F&O consultation in Geneva took up the subject of worship again, very much within the perspectives set by the 1968 assembly. Although its title was “Worship in a Secular Age”, the report dropped the reference to secularization, since this term did not seem universally applicable. The report was simply called Worship Today, a fitting characterization of the content if the stress is put on the word “today”. The consultation agreed to begin with an analysis of the present situation and then to face the question whether authentic worship was still possible under the analyzed circumstances. The answers were as varied as the analyses. Equally divergent opinions became apparent in facing liturgical reforms;* merely changed forms of worship cannot resolve the crisis of worship.

The Uppsala report on worship and Worship Today constitute a significant shift from the fairly continuous line of development evident in the earlier ecumenical documents on worship. One cannot deny that the two reports faced very real (and by no means solved) problems, but one may ask whether they would not have gained – especially as far as their lasting interest is concerned – from greater continuity with former ecumenical thinking on worship.

After these reports of the late 1960s, the ecumenical movement had difficulties in picking up the lines and expressing itself on worship again for almost three decades.

But the fifth F&O conference at Santiago de Compostela (1993) urged renewed attention to the inter-relation between worship and the search for unity. A F&O consultation at Ditchingham, England, in 1994 was the response. Called “Towards Koinonia in Worship”, the consultation and its report put worship firmly on the agenda of ecumenical reflection again. Ditchingham focused on four central points: the notion of a basic shared ordo (i.e. ordering of the fundamental elements of Christian worship), inculturation as a powerful force of local unity, ways of worship which already prove to be loci of unity, and worship as an intrinsic and essential dimension of the theological work of F&O. With this focus, Ditchingham managed to bridge the gap to the prior ecumenical reflection on worship.

Liturgical reforms. Up until 1994, ecumenical reflection on worship had been overtaken by the ecumenical convergence in worship patterns, which has taken place largely as a result of thoroughgoing liturgical reforms among the divided churches. One of the most remarkable liturgical reforms is certainly that within the Roman Catholic Church. Even if its liturgical renewal was not initiated as an ecumenical enterprise, the ecumenical ramifications were quickly perceived as considerable. The uniformity, rubricism and centralization which characterized Roman Catholic worship after the liturgical reforms of the council of Trent* set it apart from the worship patterns of many other Christian communities. But the Second Vatican Council reforms returned to earlier (and common!) liturgical patterns. The change in the liturgical language from Latin to the vernacular, the clearer structure of the liturgical rites, the more prominent place given to the scriptures and the sermon, the emphasis on an active participation of the laity, the eucharistic celebrations facing the people, the openness to liturgical inculturation (see culture) – all these characteristics of the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy and the subsequent liturgical reforms brought about a much greater affinity between worship patterns of the divided churches. Protestant liturgical reforms also based largely on a return to common origins have supported this ecumenical convergence. The programmatic beginning of the Constitution on the Liturgy has found a fulfilment: “It is the goal of this most sacred Council... to nurture whatever can contribute to the unity of all who believe in Christ” (1).

Confessions in dialogue. In 1972 a survey of bilateral conversations among World Confessional Families was published under the title Confessions in Dialogue. It included a section on “Worship and Bilateral Dialogue”. Rather than theoretical reflections or agreed statements, this section is a series of observations, by persons involved in bilateral dialogues,* about worship as a topic and matrix in these conversations. Most contributors stressed the importance of a worshipping fellowship during the conversations. One very attractive notion is that of the bilateral dialogues as a continuous act of thanksgiving. But one contributor also admitted that there had not been much worship in his group at all.

Theologically, the most interesting contribution is undoubtedly Edmund Schlink’s. He makes clear the methodological significance of worship for ecumenical conversations. He argues that dogmatic and canonical statements of different churches cannot simply be compared in order to reach agreement. Instead, they may have to be translated back into the elementary functions of church life and worship, where they have their true source and meaning. Schlink’s suggestion, if taken seriously, would have important consequences for the basis and form of any emerging consensus* among the churches. For good reason, however, in the context of these important reflections on worship and ecumenical dialogue, the following sentence also occurs: “The centrality of worship in Christian life and consequently also in the search for unity is an inalienable ecumenical conviction – though perhaps honoured more with the lips than in acts.” Confessions in Dialogue confirms this statement in both directions.

“The Worship of the Congregation”. In 1978 the WCC Sub-unit on Renewal and Congregational Life held a workshop in Crete on “The Worship of the Congregation”. Its report in a way reunites the threads of earlier WCC documents on worship and the problems and challenges faced during the debates on secularization. Although there is no affirmation of the Trinitarian perspective of worship, its Christocentric, pneumatological, ecclesiological and eschatological aspects are clearly stated. Important is the repeated emphasis on the connection between liturgy and life, and a definition which sees worship as something larger than what takes place in church: “The new temple is the Body of Christ, and wherever one encounters another in the power of the Spirit of the risen Christ, there true worship takes place.” The report further deals with questions of faithfulness and creativity, worship and culture (with a positive, anthropologically justified emphasis on symbols) and worship and social engagement. It is interesting to note that the report speaks not only of the challenges which today’s world implies for worship but also of the “radical challenges” brought by worship to today’s world – clearly an important re-adjustment after the one-sided focus of the secularization debate.

The Lima liturgy.* The eucharistic liturgy prepared for the plenary session of the F&O commission meeting in Lima in 1982 and its subsequent (and unexpected) enthusiastic reception have indicated a deep-felt need for a liturgical expression paralleling any emerging doctrinal agreement, even if since then the need to go “beyond Lima” has been emphasized (see Best and Heller, Eucharistic Worship). In any case, the task which some people seem to have considered solved with the eucharistic text of Lima is still before us: to give the emerging doctrinal agreement liturgical expression(s) (see lex orandi, lex credendi).

The celebration of the Lima liturgy was one of the high points of both the sixth assembly of the WCC in Vancouver (1983) and the seventh assembly in Canberra (1991). Perhaps in these assemblies, reflection on worship was overtaken by the actual experience of worship by the participants. One feature worth particular mention, characteristic of thinking about and acting in worship since the fifth assembly in Nairobi in 1975, is the greater appreciation and use of indigenous material in the liturgy (such as hymns,* lyrics, vestments, gestures, art), and of women-identified prayers, songs and other liturgical texts. There is a growing awareness not only of the liturgical richness of other denominational traditions but also of other cultural-linguistic communities. Although the question of liturgical indigenization has been part of the ecumenical reflections on worship ever since Montreal, it is now being faced with heightened enthusiasm and urgency.

CONCLUSION

Montreal (1963) and the consequent decision to put the subject of worship on the agenda for the Uppsala assembly of the WCC (1968) were the peak points of ecumenical interest in the question of the nature of worship. Afterwards, the crisis of worship seemed more fascinating and threatening than did the privilege of worship. Then, in the 1970s and 1980s, discussion of the nature of worship was swallowed up by the all-absorbing work on Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.*

The subject of worship is, however, re-asserting itself as part of the ecumenical agenda, as the Ditchingham consultation proves. Fortunately, the ecumenical movement does not have to start over from the beginning. Fundamental and important ground has already been covered by the WCC documents, and some basic agreements have been reached, which are foundations to be built upon. A worthwhile aim to strive for seems to be the statement made by one of the contributors to Confessions in Dialogue: “Doxology is at the beginning and at the end of all striving for unity. It also accompanies it at every stage of the way.”

See also liturgical texts, common; liturgy; prayer in the ecumenical movement; spirituality in the ecumenical movement.

■ T. Best & D. Heller eds, Eucharistic Worship in Ecumenical Contexts: The Lima Liturgy – and Beyond, WCC, 1998 ■ T. Best & D. Heller eds, So We Believe, So We Pray: Towards Koinonia in Worship, WCC, 1995 ■ J. Crawford, “The WCC as a Fellowship of Worship and Prayer”, ER, 50, 3, 1998 ■ P. Edwall, E. Hayman & W.D. Maxwell eds, Ways of Worship: The Report of the Theological Commission on Faith and Order, London, SCM Press, 1951 ■ “Soli Deo Gloria”, Studia Liturgica, 26, 2, 1996 ■ G. Wainwright, Worship with One Accord: Where Liturgy and Ecumenism Embrace, New York, Oxford UP, 1997 ■ “Worship and Secularization”, Studia Liturgica, 7, 2-3, 1970 ■ “Worship and the Oneness of Christ’s Church”, in The Fourth World Conference on Faith and Order at Montreal, P.C. Rodger & L. Vischer eds, London, SCM Press, 1964.

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

Y

YOUTH

THE PRESENCE of young people in the history of the ecumenical movement is apparent in such institutions as the Young Men's Christian Associations* (YMCA), the Young Women's Christian Association* (YWCA), the World Student Christian Federation* (WSCF), the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches,* the Life and Work* movement and youth activities of various confessional bodies. Less visible has been the participation of youth in the initiation and development of the ecumenical movement at various levels of church life. Cross-denominational relationships and common witness started in many communities, towns and nations through encounters of young people in the churches for Bible study, discussion, entertainment or sports.

“Youth” has a different meaning in different cultures. For example, in the USA youth is often equated with adolescence, and thus describes mainly teenagers, while in many African countries some assert that as long as one is young at heart one can still be described as a youth. Thus, while setting age limits can be arbitrary, there is no way to avoid it. Over the years the ecumenical movement has come to see youth as persons between the ages of 15 and 30 (or in some cases, 35).

At the global level, one can trace the development of youth participation in the ecumenical movement in a number of ways, of which four stand out: (1) through landmark events; (2) through the life and activities of a number of youth ecumenical organizations; (3) through the participation of young people in a number of major ecumenical institutions (e.g., the WCC and regional ecumenical bodies); (4) through the engagement of youth in issues that affect the communities in which they live.

YOUTH ECUMENICAL ORGANIZATIONS

Throughout the history of Christianity, gatherings of young people have been educational events for the church. Young people acting out of their faith convictions have contributed significantly to secular historical changes. These convictions have led them to fight slavery and, later, to support civil rights movements in countries where oppression was practised on the basis of colour and race.

In the 19th century the formation of the YMCA and the YWCA, and later the WSCE, sparked a new dimension in the ecumenical youth movement. At the same time, in evangelical circles young people were gathered in organizations which crossed denominational lines, such as the Scripture Union and national fellowships aligned with the International Fellowship of Evangelical Students.*

Through the involvement of Orthodox youth in the life and work of the WCC youth programmes, a new organization, *Syndesmos** – the world federation of Orthodox youth – emerged. Orthodox youth have worked together to impact their communities, and through Syndesmos they have collaborated with other youth ecumenical organizations. Youth are also heard and seen participating in confessional bodies such as the World Alliance of Reformed Churches* (WARC) and the Lutheran World Federation* (LWF). All these associations have been means through which young people have expressed their resistance to merely acquiescing in the status quo.

LANDMARK YOUTH EVENTS

The first landmark event specifically for youth in the ecumenical movement was the world conference of Christian youth in Amsterdam in 1939 under the theme “Christus Victor”, aimed at mobilizing mostly European youth as a visibly united Christian community witnessing around the world. The conference was organized by what became known as the World Christian Youth Commission (WCYC).

Soon after the second world war, the visible signs of an emerging WCC included something of what later became its youth department. This emerging movement together with the WCYC organized the second world conference of Christian youth in Oslo in 1947. The focus of this post-war event was reconciliation and solidarity.

Soon after came the first assembly of the WCC in Amsterdam in 1948. In a meeting attended mainly by European middle-aged men, the youth delegation brought a refreshing change: it was more inclusive of women, as well as people from the Southern hemisphere. At the third world conference of Christian youth at Kottayam, Travancore, India, in 1952, a renewed emphasis on regional youth work emerged.

Thereafter, a number of major events took place under the auspices of the WCC in collaboration with youth ecumenical organizations. Following the Evanston assembly in 1954, the integration of youth in the life and mission* of the church became the theme for WCC youth work. Work camps, voluntary service and world youth projects continued as forms of ecumenical education and service, but concern was expressed that so many young people left the church after confirmation and that youth participating in ecumenical activities often felt out of place in their churches. Already in 1957 the rapid and radical changes in society were cited as partially responsible for this situation. Consultations were held on baptism* and confirmation,* holy communion and other Faith and Order concerns, including one which challenged the member churches on their rules of communion discipline and their effect on ecumenical gatherings (see church discipline, intercommunion).

Youth participation in the WCC assemblies gradually increased, especially between the fourth in Uppsala (1968) and the eighth in Harare (1998). Assemblies of various confessional and regional bodies show a similar increase. In addition, special youth gatherings have been held immediately prior to the assemblies.

By the early 1980s, young people were showing a clear preference against holding large events unless they were made part of the process and encouraged to respond to the issues of the day. They sought “critical participation" rather than mere integration into church structures.

In 1993, the ecumenical global gathering of youth and students in Brazil (EGGYS) brought together young people from the networks of the WCC, the regional bodies, the WSCF, the YMCAs, the YWCA, Syndesmos, the Catholic youth organization Young Catholic Students and the youth programmes of the WARC and the LWF, among others. This was the first time Protestant, Orthodox and Catholic youth had all attended such a large gathering.

The strength of the youth movement was evident in the collaborative work of the many youth ecumenical organizations in the process towards EGGYS. Such collaboration was expected to continue in the nations and regions from which the participants came.

THE ECUMENICAL YOUTH MOVEMENT IN THE REGIONS

Young people have been active ecumenically in their own social contexts and sometimes in their national contexts for a long time, yet this phenomenon has been little documented.

Beginning in the 1950s, the WCC enabled training courses in ecumenical work camps in Africa. In the late 1950s, the emerging All Africa Conference of Churches* (AACC) highlighted the situation of youth caught between two civilizations (their own and that of their colonizers). The first All Africa Christian youth assembly in 1962 called for church structures and worship to reflect current needs and African styles. Once the AACC was firmly established, it set up a youth commission and for many years concentrated on efforts to further development and to eradicate colonialism and racism. In the 1990s, the youth desk focused on building a culture of peace on the continent, a theme chosen by young people against the backdrop of the many ethnic and political conflicts in which they have been both victims and used as perpetrators. The continental youth gatherings in Africa – for example, Douala (1984) and Kinshasa (1989) – have largely been collaborative efforts between the AACC, the WSCF and other ecumenical bodies.

Asian youth have been eager to discuss the tasks confronting them as Christians in their nations. The East Asia Christian Conference appointed a youth secretary in 1961 to succeed the World Council of Christian Education (WCCE) Asia youth secretary; publications, ecumenical work camps and training institutes helped build up a regional movement and special attention has been given in recent years to the needs of rural youth. The first Asian Christian youth assembly in the Philippines (1965) introduced a new generation of leadership to the ecumenical movement. The 1984 Asian youth assembly was sponsored by the Christian Conference of Asia* (CCA), the WSCF and the International Movement of Catholic Students. The CCA became the first regional ecumenical body to make available the position of youth president.

Latin Americans who attended the Amsterdam conference in 1939 formed the Union of Latin American Evangelical Youth (ULAJE), which held regional conferences beginning in 1941 and ran work camps and training courses as part of its programme. An ecumenical team of youth leaders visited 13 countries in 1956-57. As ecumenical relations became more open, contacts among the churches and with the WCC became closer; ULAJE became the Union of Latin American Ecumenical Youth, with Roman Catholic participation, in 1970. Its priorities have been community organization for rural and urban youth and participation in the process of people's liberation.

In the Middle East, ecumenical work camps have brought together Orthodox and Protestants. A secretary for youth and student work coordinated programmes for the WCC and WSCF. The youth department of the Middle East Council of Churches has emphasized concern for regional political issues and the identity of youth vis-a-vis their own churches, other Christian communities and nations.

In North America interdenominational youth work began in the 1930s. The activities of the united Christian Youth Movement paralleled those of interdenominational student movements. The North American ecumenical youth assembly (Ann Arbor, Michigan, 1961) challenged especially the situation of the churches on that continent. North American initiatives were responsible for the development of world youth projects and ecumenical work-camp programmes. Ecumenical youth work in the region has depended on the denominations and national councils of churches, since there is no regional structure, and in the 1980s Young Christians for Global Justice was formed as one of the means of filling this void. A 1987 North American consultation of ecumenical groups and denominational youth bodies expressed new commitment to ecumenical co-operation.

In Europe the annual consultations of ecumenical youth leaders begun by the WCC in 1947 led to the formation of the Ecumenical Youth Council in Europe (EYCE) in 1968, which has worked closely with the WCC, the WSCF, the Conference of European Churches* and other European youth and church organizations, and it serves as a forum for dialogue and encounter. Quadrennial conferences sponsored by the EYCE were significant encounters for youth from churches in Eastern and Western Europe. Since 1960, ecumenical youth have consistently challenged the selfish materialism and consumerism of people in Europe and the leadership of adults. Even during the cold-war period, official representatives from Eastern European churches and from Roman Catholic youth movements were present at EYCE-organized ecumenical gatherings.

Regional youth work started late in the Caribbean and the Pacific, but in both areas the regional conferences of churches are addressing youth concerns. Caribbean emphasis has been on self-reliance and self-development and the struggle against racism and cultural deprivation. The Pacific Conference of Churches is especially concerned about a nuclear-free Pacific and the ambiguities of tourism. A Pacific youth convention was held in January 1980.

ENGAGEMENT IN ISSUES THAT IMPACT COMMUNITIES

Youth engagement in issues that have an impact on life in their communities had already begun in the 19th century. As one example, the formation of the YMCA and YWCA was largely a response to the social situation in Great Britain in the middle of the century. In addition to catering for spiritual and educational needs, group homes were established for young Christian workers.

Through various major social upheavals, young people's ecumenical organizations sought to make their actions relevant to the social realities. Thus, by the time the WCC came into being, the young people's gathering in Oslo in 1947 had already expressed serious concern about reconstruction in Europe following the war.

At all levels of activity, young people have constantly demonstrated that engagement in the issues of the day is a part of the ecumenical call. They have challenged both church and secular leaders regarding leadership models that have destroyed rather than enhanced life and community well-being.

The period between the New Delhi and Uppsala assemblies of the WCC (1961-68) was marked by dramatic developments in the ecumenical movement, in society and especially among young people. The emergence of third-world nations and churches, the internationalization of economic-justice issues, the war in Vietnam, the US civil rights movement, the youth and student revolts against accepted value systems, the new relationship of the Roman Catholic church to the ecumenical movement – all had consequences for church youth work. Youth-led movements replaced adult-led organizations; churches had to re-think what they were doing “for” youth.

Some of the issues that have engaged young people in recent years include: challenging church and state to build a more inclusive community in which young and old, women and men, are part of decision making and implementation; the economic crises in which many countries find themselves, with the resultant unemployment; the Jubilee campaign to “drop the debt” of the poorer nations; the military equipment of nations at the expense of attention to health, education and agriculture; and the evils of racism, apartheid and sexism.

While these are issues dealt with by other movements, they have often been raised in a unique and dramatic way by young people. The last push against apartheid* in South Africa was due to an initiative by young people. The world will long remember the massacre of the innocent children of Soweto whose only crime was to stand for the truth against the evil of the apartheid system. The ecumenical youth council of Korea has worked alongside student movements in the democratization process since the 1970s. Many have suffered in prison as a result of their stand for justice and a more inclusive Korean community. They have also raised their voices over the division of the Korean peninsula.

Youth have also been at the forefront in raising environmental and economic issues. Young people in various regions have expressed their concern about economic injustice and the environment.

Youth engagement in the ecumenical movement has mostly been through concrete activities, not just empty words. Older generations may experience this involvement as threatening, and they have a tendency to condemn youth without trying to discern the importance of such actions for the whole community. Though certain communities find it difficult to include young people in authentic ways in all levels of activity, where they have opened the doors to youth participation, they have benefited greatly.

At the beginning of the 21st century, it is clear that ecumenically engaged youth have been an asset to their communities and a strong force for transformation. Where they have been listened to and given space to contribute, both church and society have experienced signs of new life.

SETRI NYOMI

- A.J. van der Bent, From Generation to Generation, WCC, 1986
- D. Devadas, Ecumenism and Youth, WCC, 1995
- A. van den Heuvel ed., The New Creation and the New Generation: A Forum for Youth Workers, New York, Friendship, 1965
- D. McNeil ed., Work, Pray and Sweat: The Stewards Programme of the WCC, WCC, 1997
- Risk, vols 1-13, WCC, 1965-77
- "Youth and God's World", in Work Book for the Assembly Committees, Uppsala, 1968, WCC, 1968.

A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
J
K
L
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W
X
Y
Z

ZERNOV, NICOLAS

B. 9 Oct. 1898, Moscow; d. 25 Aug. 1980, Oxford, UK. Greatly influential in analyzing and evaluating the ecumenical relations between East and West Europe, Zernov was an advocate of ecumenism in the Orthodox churches. He was secretary of the Russian Student Christian Movement in exile, 1925-32, and honorary area secretary of the youth commission of the World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches* and the Life and Work* movement, with the Orthodox countries as his special field, 1934-39. Secretary of the Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius, 1934-47, and lecturer at the school of Slavonic studies in London, 1936-39, he was also professor of Eastern Orthodox culture at the university of Oxford, 1947, and later was associated with an Orthodox college in Kerala, India, 1953-54.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ N. Zernov, Moscow, the Third Rome, 3rd ed., London, SPCK, 1944 ■ The Reintegration of the Church: A Study in Intercommunion, London, SCM Press, 1952 ■ The Russians and Their Church, London, SPCK, 1945 ■ Sunset Years, London, Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius, 1983.

ZULU, ALPHAEUS HAMILTON

B. 29 June 1905, Nqutu, KwaZulu, South Africa; d. 29 Feb. 1988, Ulundi, KwaZulu. Zulu was a president of the WCC, 1968-75, and a member of the executive committee of the Christian Council of South Africa, 1945-58, of the South African Institute of Race Relations, 1943-84, and of the African National Congress (ANC), 1942-60. He was director of the KwaZulu Development Corporation, 1978-85, and chairman, 1981-85. In 1939 Zulu entered St Peter's Anglican theological college in Johannesburg and was ordained a priest in 1942. He was appointed assistant curate at St Faith's mission in Durban in 1940, where he stayed for the next 20 years. In 1960 he was consecrated assistant bishop of St John's diocese in the Transkei, and in 1968 he became bishop of the Transkei. His spiritual mentor was Albert Luthuli, with whom he developed a strong fellowship. He refused to condone any form of violence. His decision to break with the ANC in 1975 and to accept office as national chairman of Inkhata ye Nkululeko Yesizwe (arm of the freedom of a nation) and to remain a member of the national council led to much rejection and criticism. He had a profound influence on the life and work of his people and devoted all his energies and talents to promoting a spirit of self-help and self-reliance in all aspects of their life.

ANS J. VAN DER BENT

■ A.H. Zulu, "The Dilemma of the Black South African", Study Encounter, 9, 3, 1973.

INDEX OF NAMES

- Abrecht, Paul 350
Addai, Mar 70
Aggrey, James K. 389
Ainslie, Peter 334
Althusser, Louis 563
Amin Dada, Idi 9
Amissa, S.H. 18
Ariarajah, S. Wesley 496
Araya, Victorio 913
Assmann, Hugo 617
A'teeq, Naim 670
Athenagoras I 21, 20, 208, 342, 346, 745
Azariah, V.S. 806
- Balthasar, Hans Urs von 1113
Barot, Madeleine 209, 1209
Barth, Karl 37, 38, 39, 124, 146, 153,
192, 238, 286, 812, 920, 963, 983,
1033, 1075, 1213
Bartholomew 392
Bea, Augustin 124, 150, 151
Beauduin, Lambert 167, 695
Bell, George A. Kennedy 125, 239
Bellah, Robert N. 210
Bellamine, Robert F.H. 567
Benenson, Peter 19
Bennett, Dennis 165
Bennett, John 981
Berdyaev, Nicholas 990
Berggrav, Eivind 239
Bethge, Eberhard 124
Bévenot, Maurice 151
Bidawid, Raphael 71
Bilheimer, Robert S. 255
Bjorkquist, Manfred 3
Boegner, Marc 209, 239
Böhme, Jakob 107
Boesak, Allan 1106
Boff, Leonardo 194, 616
Bonhoeffer, Dietrich 105, 173, 192, 239,
612, 920, 1032, 1075, 1077
Borovoy, Vitaly 92
Bouyer, Louis 153
Boyer, Charles 158
Brent, Charles H. 361
- Brown, W.A. 501
Brunner, Emil 811, 983-84
Bulgakov, Sergius 872
Bultmann, Rudolf 516, 1026
- Camara, Helder 195, 877
Camus, Albert 73
Cardenal, Ernesto 515, 877
Carillo de Albornoz, A.F. 221
Carman, John 1087
Carter, Jimmy 118
Cassidy, Edward I. 34
Castro, Emilio 156, 587
Cavert, Samuel McCrea 596
Cavert, Twila McCrea 234
Chao, T.C. 159, 312
Chikane, Frank 640
Chung, Hyun-Kyung 496
Clément, Olivier 736
Cobb, John 1053
Coe, Shoki 1108, 1118
Coffin, William Sloane 645
Coggan, Donald 172
Collins, John 305
Congar, Yves M.J. 151, 683
Couturier, Paul-I. 503
Cragg, A. Kenneth 313
Crespy, Georges 735
Cullmann, Oscar 134
Cuttat, Jacques-Albert 520
- Dallière, Louis 164
Daniélou, Jean 314, 888
D'Costa, Gavin 1127
Dartey, David 10
Davidson, Randall T. 29, 104
Davis, J. Merle 361
Demant, V.A. 505
Devandandan, Paul D. 520
Diétrich, Suzanne de 4, 99, 108, 126
Dimitrios I 102, 342, 345
Dinkha, Mar 70
Dinkha, Mar IV 70, 161, 208
Dodd, Charles H. 240, 403
Dostoevski, Fyodor 107

- Downing, F. Gerald 985
 Du Plessis, David J. 67, 165, 901
 Duff, Edward 810
 Dulles, Avery 154, 178, 581, 985
 Dulles, John F. 213, 423
 Dumont, Pierre 167
 Duprey, Pierre 151
 Duquoc, Christian 194

 Ehrenström, Nils 92
 Englezakis, Benedict 514
 Esquivel, Julia 157
 Everett, W.J. 734

 Farmer, H.H. 312
 Feiner, Johannes 151
 Feuerbach, L. 73
 Fischer, Balthasar 151
 Flessemann-van Leer, Ellen 517
 Foucault, Michel 564
 Fraser, Ian 194
 Freire, Paolo 384, 388

 Gadamer, Hans-Georg 319
 Gandhi, Mahatma 146
 Gardavsky, Vitezslav 74
 Gassmann, Günther 92
 Geiselman, J.R. 134
 Gillet, Lev 470
 Girardet, Giorgio 656
 Gitari, David 467
 Gogarten, Friedrich 1034
 Gollwitzer, Helmut 173, 1112
 Graaf, Johannes de 223
 Graham, W.F. (Billy) 99, 446
 Gramsci, A. 211
 Gregorios, Paulos Mar (Verghese, Paul) 29
 Grenholm, C.-H. 407, 810
 Gutiérrez, Gustavo 192, 297, 913, 922, 924-25, 985

 Hahn, Wilhelm 1033
 Hamer, Jérôme 151
 Harnack, Adolf von 45
 Harper, Michael 165
 Havel, Vaclav 464
 Headlam, A.C. 105
 Heckel, Theodor 903
 Heim, Mark 1172
 Heuvel, Albert van den 226, 921
 Hick, John 1127
 Hill, Henry 29
 Himmelfarb, Gertrude 916
 Hoedemaker, Bert 92

 Hoekendijk, J.C. 178, 202, 364, 780
 Hogg, A.G. 312
 Holyoake, G.J. 1033
 Hopko, Thomas 514
 Houtepen, Anton 92
 Hromádka, Josef L. 172-73, 213, 423

 Ibiam, Francis Akanu 17-18
 Ignatius Zakka I Iwas 208
 Isaac, Jules 42
 Itty, C.I. 301
 Iwand, Hans J. 173

 Jaspers, Karl 1026
 Jeremias, Joachim 403
 John (Zizioulas) of Pergamon 31, 92, 538
 John XXIII 102, 104, 241, 342, 516, 663,
     911, 979, 1188
 John Paul II 34, 69, 70, 82, 104, 117, 161,
     208, 223, 230, 231, 254, 316, 330,
     345, 479, 663, 668, 855, 934, 1140,
     1159
 Jones, Rufus 1033
 Jüngel, Eberhard 493, 1004, 1112-13
 Jung, Kim Dae 60

 Kafity, Samir 29
 Kant, Immanuel 107
 Kasper, Walter 908
 Kelly, J.N.D. 51, 72
 Khodr, Georges 538
 King, Martin Luther, Jr 99, 877, 1083
 Kjellen, Rudolf 809
 Kraemer, Hendrik 4, 126, 286, 312, 658, 920, 1086
 Küng, Hans 1113
 Kuhn, Thomas 1026

 Lange, Ernst 1053
 Lanne, Emmanuel 92, 151
 Larrain, D. 195
 Lash, Nicholas 515
 Latuihamako, Peter 1087
 Laubach, Frank C. 172
 Leeuwen, A.T. van 1034
 Lefebvre, Marcel 486, 993
 Leo XIII 33, 103, 454
 Lewis, C.S. 1024
 Lialine, Clément 167
 Lietzmann, Hans 45
 Lindbeck, George A. 526
 Löwith, Karl 524
 Lortz, Joseph 964
 Lubac, Henri de 192, 888

- Maistre, J. de 809
 Mandela, Nelson 44
 Mannheim, Karl 564
 Maritain, Jacques 1074, 1076
 Marr, Wilhelm 40
 Marx, Karl 40
 Maurice, F.D. 569
 Maurry, Pierre 101
 Mbiti, John S. 126
 McClain, George 655
 McDonnell, Kilian 539
 McGavran, Donald A. 202
 McIntire, Carl 67
 Mead, Margaret 464
 Mercier, Désiré J. 33, 103
 Merton, Thomas 129, 975
 Metz, Johann B. 192
 Metzger, Max Joseph 1156-57
 Meyer, Harding 92
 Míguez Bonino, J. 192, 540
 Mishan, E.J. 506
 Mobutu, Joseph D. 9
 Möhler, J.A. 567
 Moeller, Charles 151
 Moltmann, Jürgen 192, 494, 1087,
 1112
 Monod, Wilfred 806
 Moran Mor Abdulla II 29
 Mott, John R. 256, 525
 Munby, D.L. 505
- Nasrin, Taslima 62
 Neill, Stephen C. 1161
 Netland, Harold 1128
 Newbiggin, James E.L. 254
 Newman, John Henry 52, 250, 1147
 Niebuhr, H. Richard 286, 294, 1054
 Niebuhr, Reinhold 106, 656, 919, 988
 Niemöller, Martin 238-39
 Nietzsche, Friedrich 40, 73, 107
 Nissiotis, Nikos A. 92, 126, 535, 858
 Nkrumah, Kwame 9, 86
 Nolde, O. Frederick 550, 830
- Ockenga, Harold J. 445
 Oduyoye, Mercy A. 287
 Oldham, Joseph H. 263, 350, 354, 659,
 687, 761, 784, 1078, 1141
 Oppenheimer, Helen 735, 736
- Pangrazio, Andrea 225
 Panikkar, Raymond 1087
 Pannenberg, Wolfhart 984-85, 1087, 1112
 Parmar, Samuel 299, 1205
- Parvey, Constance F. 234
 Patterson, Morgan 98
 Paul VI 2, 11, 21, 33, 75, 121, 177, 208,
 224, 226, 230, 242, 346, 375, 479,
 995, 1149
 Paul, R.D. 1227
 Payne, Ernest A. 99
 Pesch, Otto H. 965
 Pieris, Aloysius 615
 Pius IX 2
 Pius XI 102, 167, 659
 Pius XII 56, 224, 468, 567
 Pobebe, John S. 616
 Pospisil, Bohuslav 172
 Potter, Philip A. 228, 329, 447, 473, 645, 939
- Rahner, Karl 37, 151, 192, 314, 494, 985-
 86, 1113
 Raiser, Konrad 44, 624
 Ramsey, A. Michael 30, 33, 75
 Ratzinger, Joseph 515
 Rauschenbusch, Walter 99
 Ricoeur, Paul 516
 Romero y Galdames, Oscar A. 156
 Rostow, Walter 298
 Rousseau, Olivier 167
 Ruether, Rosemary R. 136
 Runcie, Robert 29, 34, 322
 Rupp, Gordon 105
- Samartha, Stanley J. 538-39
 Sanneh, Lamin 497
 Santa Ana, Julio de 916
 Sartre, Jean-Paul 38, 73
 Schaff, Philip 256, 835
 Schillebeeckx, Edward 735, 1113
 Schleiermacher, Friedrich 491, 1010
 Schlink, Edmund 682, 1253
 Schmemmann, Alexander 322
 Schnackenburg, Rudolf 1002
 Schönfeld, Hans 105, 125
 Schulz, H.J. 682
 Schumacher, E.F. 506
 Schweitzer, Albert 403 455
 Segundo, Juan L. 192
 Setiloane, Gabriel 615
 Shenouda III 161
 Shimun XXIII 70
 Simatupang, T.B. 988
 Sivanandan, A. 954
 Smith, Nico 11
 Sobrino, Jon 616, 913
 Söderblom, Nathan 104, 360, 691

- Stuhlmacher, Peter 516
Sturzo, Luigi 1074
- Tawney, R.H. 505
Temple, William 855, 1225
Theissen, Gerd 194
Thielicke, Helmut 1075, 1076
Thijssen, Frans 151
Thils, Gustav 151
Thomas, David 734
Thomas, M.M. 615, 1162
Thurian, Max 92
Tillard, Jean-Marie R. 92
Tillich, Paul 286, 567, 811, 951-52
Timiadis, Emilianos 92
Ting, K.H. 57, 58
Torres, Camilo 877
Toynbee, Arnold J. 1023
Troeltsch, Ernst 1050
Tutu, Desmond M. 44, 348
- Ugolnik, Anthony 515
Unnik, Willem C. van 323
- Vischer, Lukas 92, 317, 583
- Visser 't Hoofft, Willem A. 101, 103, 105, 108, 125, 213, 239, 266, 350, 630,
692, 1077, 1086, 1209
Vogel, Heinrich 173
- Wagner, Günter 92
Wainwright, Geoffrey 92, 516
Wattson, Paul J.F. 158
Webb, Pauline 473
Weber, Hans-Ruedi 664
Weiss, Johannes 403
Westerhoff, J.-H. 466
White, Lynn, Jr 272, 1023
Willebrands, Johannes G.M. 150, 151,
230, 1154
Williams, George H. 475
Williams, Rowan 743
Wimber, John 164
Wolf, Ernst 173, 1112
Wurm, Theophil 3
- Yoder, John H. 517
Yong, Amos 1127-28
- Zernov, Nicolas 470
Zimmerman, Thomas F. 67

ABBREVIATIONS

In most cases, the full form of an abbreviation is spelled out in each article in which it appears. The following abbreviations are those most widely used in the articles as well as those commonly used in English texts and bibliographies. Some titles in bibliographies have been shortened in order to save space.

AACC	All Africa Conference of Churches
app., apps	appendix(es)
ARCIC	Anglican-Roman Catholic International Commission
art., arts	article(s)
b.	born
BBC	British Broadcasting Corporation
BCC	British Council of Churches
c.	circa , about
CBC	church base community
CCA	Christian Conference of Asia
CCC	Caribbean Conference of Churches
CCIA	Commission of the Churches on International Affairs
CCPD	Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development
CEC	Conference of European Churches
CELAM	Latin American bishops' conference
cf.	confer , compare
ch., chs	chapter(s)
CICARWS	Commission of the Churches on Inter-church Aid, Refugee and World Service
CLAI	Latin American Council of Churches
CLS	Christian Literature Society
CMC	Christian Medical Commission
COCU	Consultation on Church Union (USA)
comm.	commentary
comp., comps	compiler(s)
CWCs	Christian World Communions
CWM	Council for World Mission
CWME	Commission on World Mission and Evangelism
d.	died
ed., eds	editor(s), edition(s)
e.g.	exempli gratia , for example
esp.	especially
ET	English translation
et al.	et alii , and others
etc.	et cetera , and so forth
FAO	Food and Agriculture Organization
F&O	Faith and Order
FRG	Federal Republic of Germany
GDR	German Democratic Republic

GNP	gross national product
hom.	homily
ibid.	ibidem , in the same place
i.e.	id est , that is
ILO	International Labour Organization
IMC	International Missionary Council
IOM	International Organization for Migration
JPIC	Justice, Peace and the Integrity of Creation
JWG	Joint Working Group
lit.	literally
L&W	Life and Work
LWF	Lutheran World Federation
LXX	Septuagint
MECC	Middle East Council of Churches
MIT	Massachusetts Institute of Technology
n., nn.	note(s)
NCCUSA	National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA
NEB	New English Bible
NGO	non-governmental organization
no., nos	number(s)
NT	New Testament
OT	Old Testament
p., pp.	page(s)
par.	parallel(s)
para., paras	paragraph(s)
PCC	Pacific Conference of Churches
PcPCU	Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity
PCR	Programme to Combat Racism
PhD	doctoral degree
PTE	Programme on Theological Education
RC	Roman Catholic, Roman Catholicism
RCC	Roman Catholic Church
RCL	Renewal and Congregational Life
repr.	reprinted
rev.	revised
RSV	Revised Standard Version
SCM	Student Christian Movement
sec., secs	section(s)
SODEPAX	Committee on Society, Development and Peace
SPCK	Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge
TNCs	transnational corporations
UK	United Kingdom
UN	United Nations
UNCTAD	United Nations Conference on Trade and Development
UNESCO	United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization
UNICEF	United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund
UNEP	United Nations Environment Programme
UNHCR	United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees
UNDP	United Nations Development Programme
univ.	university
UP	University Press
US, USA	United States of America
USSR	Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
v., vv	verse(s)

vol., vols	volume(s)
WARC	World Alliance of Reformed Churches
WCC	World Council of Churches
WCFs	World Confessional Families
WHO	World Health Organization
WMC	World Methodist Council
WSCF	World Student Christian Federation
YMCA	Young Men's Christian Associations
YWCA	Young Women's Christian Association

BOOKS AND JOURNALS

BEM	Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry , Geneva, WCC, 1982 (individual sections referred to as B12, E2, M31 comm., etc.)
Con	Concilium , London, SCM
DS	H. Denzinger, Enchiridion Symbolorum , 37th ed., Freiburg, Herder, 1991
ER	The Ecumenical Review , Geneva, WCC
GinA-I	Growth in Agreement: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level , H. Meyer & L. Vischer eds, Geneva, WCC, 1984
GinA-II	Growth in Agreement II: Reports and Agreed Statements of Ecumenical Conversations on a World Level 1982-1998 , J. Gros, H. Meyer and W.G. Rusch eds, Geneva, WCC, 2000
HI-I	A History of the Ecumenical Movement. Vol. I, 1517-1948 , R. Rouse & S.C. Neill eds, London, SPCK, 1954
HI-II	A History of the Ecumenical Movement. Vol. II, The Ecumenical Advance, 1948-1968 , H.E. Fey ed., London, SPCK, 1970
IBMR	International Bulletin of Missionary Research , Ventnor NJ, Overseas Ministry Study Centre
IR	Irenikon: Revue des moines de Chevetogne , Chevetogne, Editions de Chevetogne
IRM	International Review of Mission , Geneva, WCC
IS	Information Service , Vatican City, Roman Catholic Church, Council for the Laity
JES	Journal of Ecumenical Studies , Philadelphia, Temple University
JTS	Journal of Theological Studies , Oxford, Clarendon
MIS	Missionalia , Pretoria, Southern African Missiological Society
MS	Mid-Stream: An Ecumenical Journal , Indianapolis, Council on Christian Unity of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)
OC	One in Christ: A Catholic Ecumenical Review , Turvey, UK, Vita et Pax Foundation
ÖR	Ökumenische Rundschau , Frankfurt am Main, Otto Lembeck

BOOKS OF THE BIBLE

Gen.	Judg.	1 Chron.	Ps.	Lam.
Ex.	Ruth	2 Chron.	Prov.	Ezek.
Lev.	1 Sam.	Ezra	Eccles.	Dan.
Num.	2 Sam.	Nehemiah	S. of S.	Hos.
Deut.	1 Kings	Esth.	Isa.	Joel
Josh.	2 Kings	Job	Jer.	Amos

Obad.	Nahum	Hag.
Jonah	Hab.	Zech.
Micah	Zeph.	Mal.
Matt.	Eph.	Heb.
Mark	Phil.	James
Luke	Col.	1 Pet.
John	1 Thess.	2 Pet.
Acts	2 Thess.	1 John
Rom.	1 Tim.	2 John
1 Cor.	2 Tim.	John
2 Cor.	Titus	Jude
Gal.	Philemon	Rev.

STATES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

AK	Alaska	MS	Mississippi
AL	Alabama	MT	Montana
AR	Arkansas	NC	North Carolina
AZ	Arizona	ND	North Dakota
CA	California	NE	Nebraska
CO	Colorado	NH	New Hampshire
CT	Connecticut	NJ	New Jersey
DC	District of Columbia	NM	New Mexico
DE	Delaware	NV	Nevada
FL	Florida	NY	New York
GA	Georgia	OH	Ohio
HI	Hawaii	OK	Oklahoma
IA	Iowa	OR	Oregon
ID	Idaho	PA	Pennsylvania
IL	Illinois	RI	Rhode Island
IN	Indiana	SC	South Carolina
KS	Kansas	SD	South Dakota
KY	Kentucky	TN	Tennessee
LA	Louisiana	TX	Texas
MA	Massachusetts	UT	Utah
MD	Maryland	VA	Virginia
ME	Maine	VT	Vermont
MI	Michigan	WA	Washington
MN	Minnesota	WV	West Virginia
MO	Missouri	WY	Wyoming

CONTRIBUTORS

K.C. Abraham (Church of South India) was director of the South Asia Theological Research Institute, Bangalore, India. Caste; liberation; theology, Asian.

Paul Abrecht (American Baptist Churches in the USA) was on the staff of the WCC from 1949 to 1983, and was director of the Sub-unit on Church and Society from 1972 on. Bennett, John; cold war; growth, limits to; life and work; society; study as an ecumenical method.

†Elisabeth Adler (Evangelical Church in Berlin-Brandenburg) was director of the Lay Academy of Berlin-Brandenburg, Germany. Laity.

A.M. Allchin (Church of England) is honorary professor in the University of Wales, Bangor, and honorary canon of Canterbury cathedral, UK. Communion of saints; incarnation.

Horace T. Allen, Jr (Presbyterian Church (USA)) is professor of worship at Boston University School of Theology, USA. Liturgical texts, common.

Gerald H. Anderson (United Methodist Church) was director of the Overseas Ministries Study Center, New Haven, CT, USA, and editor of the International Bulletin of Missionary Research. Moratorium.

Tosh Arai (United Church of Christ in Japan), former secretary for lay and study centres in the WCC Sub-unit on Renewal and Congregational Life, is executive director of the Nippon Christian Academy, Tokyo, Japan. Asia: Northeast; Christian Conference of Asia; study centres.

S. Wesley Ariarajah (Methodist Church of Sri Lanka), former director of the WCC Dialogue sub-unit and then deputy general secretary, is professor of ecumenical theology at Drew University, Madison, NJ, USA. Dialogue, interfaith; marriage, interfaith.

Guy Aurenche (Roman Catholic) is president of the international Action of Christians for the Abolition of Torture, Paris, France. Torture.

†E. Theodore Bachmann (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) was secretary for publications with the Lutheran World Federation in Geneva, Switzerland, from 1973 to 1978. Lutheranism.

Eileen Barker is professor of sociology with special reference to the study of religion at the London School of Economics, University of London, UK. New religious movements.

Paul Merritt Bassett (Church of the Nazarene) is professor of the history of Christianity at the Nazarene Theological Seminary, Kansas City, MO, USA. Evangelicals; Holiness movement.

Heli Bathija (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Geneva) is medical officer in the department of reproductive health and research, World Health Organization, Geneva, Switzerland. Birth control.

Gregory Baum (Roman Catholic) is professor emeritus of the faculty of religious studies, McGill University, Montreal, Canada. Work.

Bert B. Beach (Seventh-day Adventist Church) was former director of the council on inter-church relations, General Conference of Seventh-day Adventists, Washington, DC, USA. Seventh-day Adventist Church.

René Beaupère (Roman Catholic) is director of the Centre Saint-Irénée, Lyons, France. Centre Saint-Irénée; marriage, mixed.

Jeanne Becher (Episcopal Church [USA]) was assistant to the general secretary of the WCC. Sexual harassment.

Ulrich Becker (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Hanover), former director of the WCC Sub-unit on Education, is professor emeritus of theology and religious education of the University of Hanover, Germany. Catechesis; children; ecumenical learning.

Huibert van Beek (Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches) is coordinator of the team on Church and Ecumenical Relations of the WCC. Ecumenical sharing of resources.

Pierre Beffa (Roman Catholic) is director of the library at the Ecumenical Centre, Geneva, Switzerland. Bibliographies.

Christoph Benn (Evangelical Church in Germany) is head of the department for health policy and studies of the German Institute for Medical Mission, Tübingen, Germany. AIDS.

†John C. Bennett (United Church of Christ) was president of Union Theological Seminary, New York, USA. Cold war.

†Ans van der Bent (United Church of Christ [USA]) was on the staff of the WCC as director of the library from 1963 to 1986, then as ecumenical research officer from 1986 to 1989. Bibliographies; several biographies; Ecumenical Association of African Theologians; ecumenical conferences; Marxist-Christian dialogue; Societas Oecumenica; World Alliance for Promoting International Friendship through the Churches; WCC assemblies.

Teresa Berger (Roman Catholic) is associate professor of ecumenical theology at Duke University Divinity School, Durham, NC, USA. Catechism; Lima liturgy; liturgical movement; worship in the ecumenical movement.

Thomas F. Best (Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)) is an executive secretary in the WCC team on Faith and Order. Councils of churches: local, national, regional; local ecumenical partnerships; unity, models of; unity, ways to; Week of Prayer for Christian Unity.

Charles Birch (Uniting Church in Australia), a fellow of the Australian Academy of Science, is professor emeritus of biology, University of Sydney, Australia. Faith and science.

André Birmelé (Evangelical Church of the Augsburg Confession Alsace and Lorraine) is research professor at the Institute for Ecumenical Research, Strasbourg, France, and professor at the faculty of theology at Strasbourg University. Word of God.

†Alain Blancy (Reformed Church of France), associate director of the Ecumenical Institute, Bossey, from 1971 to 1981, was co-president of the Groupe des Dombes. Reformed-Roman Catholic dialogue.

†Klauspeter Blaser (Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches) was professor of systematic and practical theology at the University of Lausanne, Switzerland. Confessing Church; status confessionis.

†Kathleen Bliss (Church of England) was involved throughout her life in ecumenical work, and in the WCC from its founding. She was a member of the WCC central committee from 1954 to 1961. Oldham, Joseph Houldsworth.

Boris Bobrinskoy (Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) is dean of the Orthodox Theological Institute of St Sergius, Paris, France. Holy Spirit.

Clodovis Boff (Roman Catholic) is professor of systematic theology at the Franciscan Theological Institute of Petropolis and the Faculty of Theology in Sao Paulo, Brazil. Church base communities.

John Boonstra (United Church of Christ), former director of Frontier Internship in Mission, Geneva, Switzerland, is executive minister of the Washington Association of Churches, Seattle, WA, USA. Frontier Internship in Mission.

Gunnel Borgegård (Church of Sweden) is director of the Nordic Ecumenical Council, Uppsala, Sweden. Europe: Northern – coordinator.

Frans Bouwen (Roman Catholic) is editor of Proche-Orient chrétien, Jerusalem, and a member of the plenary commission of the WCC Faith and Order. Churches, sister; Eastern Catholic churches; ecumenical councils.

Theo van Boven (Netherlands Reformed Church) is professor emeritus of international law of the University of Maastricht, Netherlands. International law; minorities.

Diane M. Brewster (Religious Society of Friends) taught feminist theology at the Centre for Extra-Mural Studies, Birkbeck College, University of London, England. Theology, feminist.

†Ion Bria (Romanian Orthodox Church) was executive director of the WCC Programme Unit on Unity and Renewal. East-West confrontation; liturgy after the Liturgy; mysticism; saints; witness.

Martien E. Brinkman (Reformed Churches in the Netherlands) is professor of ecumenical theology at the Free University, Amsterdam, Netherlands. Justification.

Johannes Brosseder (Roman Catholic) is professor of systematic theology at the University of Cologne, Germany. Grace.

Stuart E. Brown (Anglican Church of Canada), former executive secretary for Christian-Muslim relations in the WCC Sub-unit on Dialogue with People of Living Faiths, is now general secretary of the Joint Christian Ministry in West Africa, based in Garoua, Cameroon. Muslim-Christian dialogue; North America: Canada.

Daniel A. Bruno (Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina) is Protestant coordinator in Argentina of the Centre for the Study of Church History in Latin America. South America: Río de la Plata region.

Colin Buchanan (Church of England) is bishop of Woolwich in the diocese of Southwark, London, UK. Anglican communion; Anglican Consultative Council; Lambeth Quadrilateral.

Carnegie Samuel Calian (Presbyterian Church (USA)) is president and professor of theology at Pittsburgh Theological Seminary, PA, USA. Orthodox-Reformed dialogue.

Kathleen Cann (Church of England), former archivist of the United Bible Societies, now works in the manuscripts department of Cambridge University Library, Cambridge, UK. Bible Societies.

John B. Carden (Church of England) was a missionary in Pakistan and later served as a priest in the diocese of Jerusalem. He was editor of the 1989 edition of the ecumenical prayer cycle. Ecumenical Prayer Cycle; prayer in the ecumenical movement.

Jennifer Mary Carpenter (Methodist Church of Great Britain) is rural officer-consultant of the United Reformed-Methodist churches. Church buildings, shared use of.

Michael G. Cartwright (United Methodist Church) is associate professor of philosophy and religion, and director of the Lantz Center for Christian Vocations at the University of Indianapolis, IN, USA. Hermeneutics.

Gwen Cashmore (Church of England) was director of the WCC Sub-unit on Renewal and Congregational Life from 1983 to 1986. Spirituality in the ecumenical movement.

Emilio Castro (Evangelical Methodist Church in Uruguay) was general secretary of the WCC from 1984 to 1992. Evangelism.

Daniel Ciobotea (Romanian Orthodox Church), former lecturer at the Ecumenical Institute of Bossey, is archbishop of Iasi and metropolitan of Moldavia and Bukovina. Trinity.

Emmanuel Clapsis (Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of North and South America/Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) is professor of dogmatic theology at Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology, Brookline, MA, USA. Eschatology.

Raymond T. Clarke (United Reformed Church in the UK) chaired the United Reformed Church's national Forward Planning Group. Welfare state.

Olivier Clément (Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) is professor of theology at the Orthodox Theological Institute of St Sergius, Paris, France. Athenagoras I.

Paul De Clerck (Roman Catholic) is director of the Higher Institute of Liturgy, Paris, France, and chief editor of the liturgical periodical La Maison-Dieu. Penance and reconciliation.

Paul Rowntree Clifford (Baptist Union of Great Britain) was president of the Selly Oak Colleges, Birmingham, UK. Labour.

Aldo Comba (Waldensian Church, Italy) was director of the Ecumenical Church Loan Fund (now Oikocredit) in Geneva, Switzerland. Europe: Southern.

Martin Conway (Church of England) was president of the Selly Oak Colleges, Birmingham, UK. Bonhoeffer, Dietrich; local ecumenical obedience; Neill, Stephen Charles.

Robert T. Coote (American Baptist Churches in the USA) was assistant to the director for research and planning of the Overseas Ministries Study Center, New Haven, CT, USA. Campus Crusade for Christ; evangelical missions; International Fellowship of Evangelical Students; Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship; Lausanne Committee for World Evangelization; Lausanne covenant; World Evangelical Fellowship; World's Evangelical Alliance.

Martin H. Cressey (United Reformed Church), a retired minister, was principal of Westminster College, Cambridge, UK. Baptist-Reformed dialogue; Reformed/Presbyterian churches.

Rowan D. Crews, Jr (United Methodist Church) is associate professor of religion at Columbia College, SC, USA. Life and death; martyrdom; resurrection.

Paul A. Crow, Jr (Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)) was president of the Council on Christian Unity of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ), Indianapolis, IN, USA. Covenanting; Disciples-Russian Orthodox dialogue; North America: USA.

L.A. Cupit (American Baptist Churches in the USA) is director of study and research at the Baptist World Alliance, Falls Church, VA, USA. Anglican-Baptist conversations.

Alfred Hounsell Dammers (Church of England) was dean of Bristol, UK, and founder of the Life-style Movement. Life-style.

Rex Davis (Church of England) is a sub-dean of Lincoln Cathedral, UK. Renewal.

Volkmar Deile (Evangelical Church in Berlin-Brandenburg), former general secretary of Amnesty International for Germany, is delegate of the German Kirchentag for 2003. Amnesty International.

Paul R. Dekar (Canadian Baptist Federation) is Niswonger professor of evangelism and mission at Memphis Theological Seminary, TN, USA. Nation.

†John Deschner (United Methodist Church) was Lehman professor of Christian doctrine of the Southern Methodist University, Dallas, TX, USA, and a moderator of the WCC commission on Faith and Order. Hope; unity of humankind.

Clara María Díaz (Roman Catholic) is general secretary of the Catholic Biblical Federation, Stuttgart, Germany. Catholic Biblical Federation.

Richard D.N. Dickinson (United Church of Christ) was president of Christian Theological Seminary, Indianapolis, IN, USA. Development; poverty.

Eskil Dickmeiss (Evangelical Lutheran Church in Denmark) is information officer of his church. Europe: Northern – Denmark.

Edmond Doogue (Anglican Church in Australia), former editor of ENI, is now editor for the Rolex Awards for Enterprise, Geneva, Switzerland. Ecumenical News International.

†Thomas H. Dorris (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) was editor of the WCC Ecumenical Press Service. Ecumenical News International.

Rob van Drimmelen (Reformed Churches in the Netherlands), a former executive secretary in the WCC Programme Unit on Justice, Peace and Creation, is general secretary of the Association of Protestant Development Organizations in Europe, Brussels, Belgium. Food crisis/hunger; investment; transnational corporations; unemployment.

Ulrich Duchrow (Evangelical Church of Baden) is professor of ecumenical and social theology at the University of Heidelberg, Germany. Justice.

Avery Cardinal Dulles (Roman Catholic) is Laurence J. McGinley professor of religion and society at Fordham University, Bronx, NY, USA. Communion; images of the church.

†André Dumas (Reformed Church of France) was professor of philosophy and ethics at the Protestant Faculty of Theology, Paris, France. Birth control; marriage.

Alf Dumont (United Church of Canada) is minister at St John's United Church Pastoral Charge, Alliston, Ontario, Canada. Indigenous peoples.

Donald F. Durnbaugh (Church of the Brethren) is archivist at Juniata College, Huntingdon, PA, USA. First and radical Reformation churches; historic peace churches.

Suzanne Eck (Roman Catholic) is a Dominican sister at Orbe, France. Asceticism.

Peter Elvy (Church of England) is a pastor in Chelsea, London, UK, and media consultant to the Jerusalem Trust. Radio.

Brother Emile (Roman Catholic) is a member of the Taizé community, France. Taizé community.

Kaj Engström (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland) was director of the Swedish Ecumenical Institute, Sigtuna, Sweden, and is now vicar of a parish in Helsinki. Europe: Northern.

Dwain C. Epps (Presbyterian Church (USA)) was coordinator for international affairs of the WCC. International law; non-governmental organizations; religious liberty.

Philippe Fanchette (Roman Catholic) was executive secretary for adult basic education in the WCC sub-unit on Education. Education, adult.

Sven-Bernhard Fast (Church of Sweden) is ecumenical officer of his church. Europe: Northern – Sweden.

Vivienne Faull (Church of England) is canon pastor of Coventry cathedral, UK. Inclusive language.

Elizabeth G. Ferris (Religious Society of Friends) is programme executive for international relations with the WCC. Asylum; migration; refugees.

John Fife (Presbyterian Church (USA)) is pastor of a Presbyterian church in Tucson, AZ, USA, and a leading figure in the US sanctuary movement. Sanctuary.

†Balthasar Fischer (Roman Catholic) was vice president of the Liturgical Institute, Trier, Germany, and professor of liturgy of the University of Trier. Liturgical reforms.

Eugene J. Fisher (Roman Catholic) is associate director of the Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, National Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, DC, USA. Israel and the church.

Thomas FitzGerald (Greek Orthodox Archdiocese of America/Ecumenical Patriarchate), former director of the WCC Programme Unit on Unity and Renewal, is professor of church history and historical theology at Holy Cross Greek Orthodox School of Theology, Brookline, MA, USA. Encyclicals, Orthodox.

Joseph A. Fitzmyer (Roman Catholic) is professor emeritus of biblical studies of the Catholic University of America, Washington, DC, USA. Exegesis, methods of.

William T. Flynn (Roman Catholic) is lecturer in the Centre for Medieval Studies at the University of Leeds, UK. Church music.

William F. Fore (United Methodist Church) was executive director for communication of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA, and visiting professor at United Theological College, Bangalore, India. Electronic church.

Charles W. Forman (Presbyterian Church (USA)) is professor emeritus of missions of Yale University Divinity School, New Haven, CT, USA. Pacific; Pacific Conference of Churches.

Duncan B. Forrester (Church of Scotland) is professor emeritus of Christian ethics and practical theology at New College, University of Edinburgh, Scotland. Ecclesiology and ethics.

Roger T. Forster is the leader of Ichthus Christian Fellowship house-church movement in Great Britain. House church.

Ian Fraser (Church of Scotland) is research consultant to Action of Churches Together in Scotland. Tourism.

Dean Freiday (Religious Society of Friends) is a member of the Christian and interfaith relations committee of Friends General Conference, Philadelphia, PA, USA. Friends/Quakers.

Paul R. Fries (Reformed Church in America) is professor of foundational and constructive theology and dean of the seminary at New Brunswick Theological Seminary, NJ, USA. Lutheran-Reformed dialogue.

Arne Fritzson (Mission Covenant Church of Sweden), a pastor of his church, is a member of the WCC Ecumenical Disability Advocates Network reference group. Disability.

Francis Frost (Roman Catholic), former lecturer at the Ecumenical Institute of Bossey, was a member of the mixed commission for bilateral dialogue between the World Methodist Council and the Roman Catholic Church. Methodism.

Raymond Fung (Hong Kong Baptist Convention), former secretary for evangelism in the WCC Commission on World Mission and Evangelism, is an interpreter with the Hong Kong Government Official Language Agency. Asia: China; house church.

Helio Gallardo (Chile) is professor of sociology at the University of Costa Rica. Civil society.

E. Clinton Gardner (United Methodist Church) is professor emeritus of Christian ethics of Candler School of Theology, of Emory University, Atlanta, GA, USA. Abortion.

Günther Gassmann (Evangelical Lutheran Church of North Elbia) was director of the WCC Sub-unit on Faith and Order. Faith and Order; unity.

†Hans Gensichen (Evangelical Church in Baden) was professor of the history of religions and missiology at the University of Heidelberg, Germany. Pluralism.

K.M. George (Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church), former lecturer at the Ecumenical Institute of Bossey, is principal of the Orthodox Theological Seminary, Kottayam, India. Oriental Orthodox-Orthodox dialogue.

David Gill (Uniting Church in Australia), a member of the Joint Working Group between the RCC and the WCC, was general secretary of the National Council of Churches in Australia, Sydney, Australia. Violence and non-violence.

Robin Gill (Church of England) is Michael Ramsey professor of modern theology at the University of Kent, Canterbury, UK. Euthanasia.

Aruna Gnanadason (Church of South India) is an executive secretary in the WCC Sub-unit on Women. Ecumenical Decade: Churches in Solidarity with Women ; sexual harassment; violence, domestic.

Donald K. Gorrell (United Methodist Church) is professor emeritus of church history of the United Theological Seminary, Dayton, OH, USA. Social gospel movement.

Gerard Granados (Roman Catholic) is general secretary of the Caribbean Conference of Churches. Caribbean Conference of Churches.

Niels Henrik Gregersen (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Denmark) is research professor in theology and science at the University of Aarhus, Denmark. Providence.

†Paulos Mar Gregorios (Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church) was metropolitan of his church for Delhi and the North, and head of the Delhi Orthodox Centre, New Delhi, India. Nature.

Carl-Henric Grenholm (Church of Sweden) is professor of ethics at Uppsala University, Sweden, and a member of his church's central board. Responsible society.

†Aloys Cardinal Grillmeier (Roman Catholic) was professor of dogmatics and the history of dogma of the Jesuit Faculty of Philosophy and Theology, Frankfurt, Germany. Chalcedon.

Jeffrey Gros (Roman Catholic) is associate director of the Secretariat for Ecumenical and Inter-religious Affairs of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, DC, USA. Creeds.

John de Gruchy (United Congregational Church of Southern Africa) is Robert Selby Taylor professor of Christian studies and director of the Graduate School in Humanities at the University of Cape Town, South Africa. Oppression, ecumenical consequences of.

Franz Gschwandtner (Roman Catholic) is general secretary of the Pro Oriente Institute, Vienna, Austria. Pro Oriente.

Robin Gurney (Methodist Church of Great Britain) was secretary for information and communication of the Conference of European Churches, Geneva, Switzerland. Conference of European Churches.

Charles W. Gusmer (Roman Catholic), former professor of sacramental theology and liturgy at the Immaculate Conception Seminary, Seton Hall University, South Orange, NJ, is now pastor of St Catherine of Siena Church, Cedar Grove, NJ, USA. Anointing of the sick.

John Habgood (Church of England) was archbishop of York, UK. Nature.

Sergei Hackel (Russian Orthodox Church) is editor of religious programmes of the Russian service, BBC World Service. Sobornost.

Theresia Hainthaler (Roman Catholic) is research worker at the institute for the history of dogma and the councils, the Jesuit Faculty of Philosophy and Theology, Frankfurt, Germany. Chalcedon.

Douglas John Hall (United Church of Canada) is professor emeritus of Christian theology of McGill University, Montreal, Canada. Creation.

David G. Hallman (United Church of Canada) is programme officer for energy and environment of his church in Toronto, and climate change programme coordinator of the WCC. Environment/ecology.

Carlos E. Ham (Presbyterian Reformed Church in Cuba) is programme executive for evangelism in the Mission and Evangelism team of the WCC. Caribbean.

Bryan Hamlin (United Church of Christ) is New England director for MRA-Initiatives of Change. Moral Rearmament (Initiatives of Change).

Béla Harmati (Lutheran Church in Hungary) is bishop of the south province of his church, Hungary. Civil religion; property.

Richard Harries (Church of England) is bishop of Oxford, UK, and chairman of the Council of Christians and Jews. Jewish-Christian dialogue.

Elizabeth J. Harris (Methodist Church of Great Britain) is secretary for interfaith relations of her church, London, UK. Buddhist-Christian dialogue.

Susannah Harris-Wilson (Episcopal Church, USA) is adjunct professor of English and theatre arts at Community College of Philadelphia, PA, USA. Chakko, Sarah.

Dorothy Harvey (Presbyterian Church of New Zealand), an ordained minister, has been on the staff of the Christian Conference of Asia and the World Council of Churches. Participation.

Josine Hautfenne (Roman Catholic) is secretary general of the International Ecumenical Fellowship, Brussels, Belgium. International Ecumenical Fellowship.

†Sione 'Amanaki Havea (Methodist Church in Tonga) was president of his church. Theology, Pacific.

William Henn (Roman Catholic) is professor of ecclesiology, ecumenism and theological methodology at Gregorian University, Rome, Italy. Una sancta.

Patrick Henry (Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)) is executive director of the Institute for Ecumenical and Cultural Research, Collegetown, MN, USA. Institute for Ecumenical and Cultural Research.

Alasdair Heron (Reformed Church in North-Western Germany and Bavaria) is professor of Reformed theology at the University of Erlangen, Germany. Filioque.

†Frederick Herzog (United Church of Christ) was professor of systematic theology at Duke University, Durham, NC, USA. Poor; status confessionis.

Paul G. Hiebert (Mennonite Church) is professor of anthropology and mission and associate dean of academic doctorates at Trinity Evangelical Divinity School, Deerfield, IL, USA. Anthropology, cultural.

Henry Hill (Anglican Church of Canada) was a bishop of his church and founder of the scholarship of St Basil the Great for interchange between the Anglican Church of Canada and the Oriental Orthodox churches. Anglican-Oriental Orthodox dialogue.

David Hilton (United Methodist Church, USA), a physician and former associate director of the WCC Christian Medical Commission, is international consultant on faith and health. Healing, health, health care.

E. Glenn Hinson (Southern Baptist Convention) is professor of spirituality and John Loftis professor of church history at the Baptist Theological Seminary, Richmond, VA, USA. Church order.

Dean R. Hirsch (Conservative Congregational Christian Conference (USA)) is international president of World Vision International. World Vision International.

Norman A. Hjelm (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) was director of both the department of communications of the Lutheran World Federation, Geneva, Switzerland, and of Faith and Order, National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA, New York. Lutheran World Federation.

Peter Hocken (Roman Catholic) is chaplain to the Roman Catholic bishop of Northampton, UK. Charismatic movement; Pentecostal-Roman Catholic dialogue; Pentecostals.

Libertus A. Hoedemaker (Netherlands Reformed Church) is professor emeritus of missiology and Christian ethics of the State University of Groningen, Netherlands. Church and world; local church.

David R. Holeton (Anglican Church of Canada) was professor of liturgics at Trinity College, Toronto, Canada. Chrismation; confirmation.

Gertruida van Hoogevest (Netherlands Reformed Church) was coordinator of the WCC's refugee service from 1975 to 1986. Refugees.

Robert Hotz (Ukrainian Greek Catholic Church) is director of Ostreferat, an independent organization of the Jesuits in Switzerland for information about Russia and Eastern Slavonic States, Zurich. Sacrament(s).

François Houtart (Roman Catholic) is professor emeritus of the Catholic University of Louvain, Belgium, and director of the Tricontinental Centre at Louvain la Neuve. Colonialism.

Richard L. Van Houten (Christian Reformed Church in North America) is general secretary of the Reformed Ecumenical Council, Grand Rapids, MI, USA. Reformed Ecumenical Council.

Anton Houtepen (Roman Catholic) is director of the Interuniversity Institute for Missiological and Ecumenical Research, Utrecht, and professor of ecumenics at the University of Utrecht, Netherlands. Common confession; faith; reception; teaching authority.

George R. Hunsberger (Presbyterian Church (USA)) is professor of missiology at Western Theological Seminary, Holland, MI, USA, and coordinator of the Gospel and Our Culture Network in North America. Gospel and culture.

Heikki Huttunen (Orthodox Church of Finland), director of the WCC Sub-unit on Youth from 1985 to 1989, is a parish priest of his church in Helsinki, Finland. Syndesmos.

C.I. Itty (Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church) was from 1970 to 1979 director of the WCC Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development, and from 1979 to 1986 consultant of the UN Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific. Just, participatory and sustainable society.

Heikki Jääskeläinen (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Finland) is secretary to the archbishop of Finland. Europe: Northern – Finland.

André Jacques (Reformed Church of France) was secretary for migration in the WCC Commission on Inter-church Aid, Refugee and World Service. Barot, Madeleine; CIMADE; migration.

Riad Jarjour (National Evangelical Synod of Syria and Lebanon) is general secretary of the Middle East Council of Churches. Middle East Council of Churches.

Willie J. Jennings (Independent Bermuda Baptist) is associate dean of academic programmes and assistant research professor of systematic theology and black church studies at Duke University Divinity School, Durham, NC, USA. Person; reconciliation.

Clement John (Church of Pakistan) is programme executive for international relations with the WCC. Asia: China; Asia: Northeast; Asia: Southeast.

Ottmar John (Roman Catholic) is responsible for issues of pastoral care with the German Bishops Conference in Bonn, Germany. Subsidiarity.

Keith E. Johnson (Baptist General Conference) is an ordained campus minister whose research at Duke University, Durham, NC, USA, centres on the theological interface of Christianity and other religions. Theology of religions.

Muhungi Kanyoro (Evangelical Lutheran Church in Kenya) is director of the Ecumenical Church Loan Fund, based in Geneva, Switzerland. Ecumenical Church Loan Fund.

Jonah Katoneene (Church of the Province of Uganda) is general secretary of the Association of Christian Lay Centres in Africa, Harare, Zimbabwe. Laity.

Lynda Katsuno (Anglican Church of Canada), a musician, liturgist and theologian, was WCC special adviser on issues of disabilities. Disability.

William B. Kennedy (Presbyterian Church (USA)) is professor emeritus of practical theology of Union Theological Seminary, New York, USA. World Council of Christian Education.

Eileen King (Roman Catholic) is executive director of the World Day of Prayer International Committee, New York, USA. World Day of Prayer.

Michael Kinnamon (Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)) is Allen and Dottie Miller professor of mission and peace at Eden Seminary, St Louis, MO, USA. Consultation on Church Union; united and uniting churches.

Aloys Klein (Roman Catholic) is director emeritus of the Johann-Adam-Möhler Institute for Ecumenics, Paderborn, Germany, and professor emeritus of the theological faculty of Paderborn. Institute for Ecumenics.

Klaus K. Klostermaier (Roman Catholic) is distinguished professor emeritus of the department of religion of the University of Manitoba, Canada. Hindu-Christian dialogue.

†Alexis Kniazeff (Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) was rector of the Orthodox Theological Institute of St Sergius, Paris, France. Apostasy; heresy; schism.

Ninan Koshy (Church of South India) was director of the WCC Commission of the Churches on International Affairs from 1981 to 1991. Militarism/militarization; religious liberty; third world; United Nations.

Hanfried Krüger (Evangelical Church in Germany) is professor emeritus of ecumenics of the University of Mainz, Germany. Söderblom, Nathan.

Ulrich Kühn (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Saxony) is professor emeritus of the theological faculty of the University of Leipzig, Germany. Salvation.

Manoj Kurian (Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church [Malaysia]) is programme executive for health and healing with the WCC. Healing, health, health care.

Kwame Labi (Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Alexandria and All Africa [Ghana]) is programme executive for community and justice in mission with the WCC. Family; urban rural mission.

Régis Ladous (Roman Catholic) is professor of modern history at the University of Lyons III, France. Spiritual ecumenism.

†Thomas A. Langford (United Methodist Church) was professor of theology and provost of Duke University, Durham, NC, USA. Lutheran-Methodist dialogue.

Emmanuel Lanne (Roman Catholic) is a monk at the Benedictine monastery of Chevetogne, Belgium, and a member of the WCC commission on Faith and Order. Apostles' Creed; apostolic tradition; baptism; conciliarity; typoi.

Bernard Lauret (Roman Catholic) is on the staff of Editions du Cerf publishing house, Paris, France. "Theology, new".

Hervé Legrand (Roman Catholic) was director of the Higher Institute of Ecumenical Studies, and is now professor emeritus of the Catholic Institute of Paris, France. Assyrian Church of the East; divorce.

Yorgo Lemopoulos (Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) is deputy general secretary of the WCC. Bartholomew.

Peter L'Huillier (Orthodox Church in America) is archbishop of New York, and professor of canon law at St Vladimir's Seminary, Crestwood, NY, USA. Economy (oikonomia); excommunication.

Wolfgang Lienemann (Evangelical Reformed Church of Basel) is professor of ethics at the Protestant Theological Seminary, University of Bern, Switzerland. Conscience.

Gennadios Limouris (Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) is metropolitan of Sassima. Constantinople, first council of; Nicea; Nicene Creed.

George Lindbeck (Evangelical Lutheran Church of America) is Pitkin professor emeritus of historical theology of Yale University, New Haven, CT, USA. Dogma.

Jan Milic Lochman (Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches) is professor emeritus of systematic theology of the University of Basel, Switzerland. Atheism.

Paul Löffler (Evangelical Church of Hessen and Nassau) was director of the Board of Mission and Ecumenical Relations of his church in Frankfurt, Germany. Conversion; proselytism.

Bradley J. Longfield (Presbyterian Church (USA)) is dean and professor of church history at the University of Dubuque Theological Seminary, IA, USA. Creationism.

Sergio M.P. Lopes (Methodist Church in Brazil) is director of the Centre for Philosophy and Theology of the Methodist University of Piracicaba, Brazil. Latin American Council of Churches.

Werner Löser (Roman Catholic) is professor of dogmatics at the Jesuit Faculty of Philosophy and Theology, Frankfurt, Germany. European unity.

André Lossky (Orthodox) is professor of liturgical theology at the Orthodox Theological Institute of St Sergius, Paris, France. Epiclesis.

Nicholas Lossky, editor. Eastern Orthodoxy; icon/image; Lossky, Vladimir; Meyendorff, John; Orthodoxy; theology, ecumenical; Uniates, Uniatism.

Denton Lotz (American Baptist Churches in the USA/Southern Baptist Convention) is general secretary of the Baptist World Alliance with headquarters in McLean, VA, USA. Baptist-Orthodox relations; Baptist World Alliance; Baptists.

Joseph A. Loya (Roman Catholic) is associate professor in the department of theology and religious studies at Villanova University, PA, USA. North American Academy of Ecumenists.

Gert van Maanen (Netherlands Reformed Church) was general manager of the Ecumenical Development Cooperative Society, Amersfoort, Netherlands. Oikokredit.

Frank D. Macchia (Assemblies of God) is associate professor of theology at Vanguard University, Costa Mesa, CA, USA, and senior editor of Pneuma: The Journal of the Society for Pentecostal Studies. Pentecostal-Reformed dialogue.

Steven G. Mackie (Church of Scotland) was lecturer in practical theology and Christian ethics at the University of St Andrews, Scotland. Church as institution.

Duncan MacLaren (Roman Catholic) is secretary general of Caritas Internationalis. Caritas Internationalis.

John Macquarrie (Church of England) is Lady Margaret professor emeritus of divinity of Oxford University, England. Anthropology, theological.

Jorge E. Maldonado (Evangelical Covenant Church [USA]), a former executive secretary in the WCC programme on family education, is president of the Hispanic Centre for Theological Studies, Bell Gardens, CA, USA. Family; marriage.

Tinyiko Sam Maluleke (Evangelical Presbyterian Church in South Africa) is professor and dean of the faculty of theology and religious studies at the University of South Africa, Pretoria, South Africa. Theology, black.

Deenabhandu Manchala (United Evangelical Lutheran Churches in India) is programme executive for peace concerns with the WCC. Violence, religious roots of.

†Jonathan M. Mann (Jewish) was director of the International AIDS Centre and François-Xavier Bagnoud professor for health and human rights at Harvard School of Public Health, Cambridge, MA, USA. AIDS.

Alwyn Marriage, former director of Feed the Minds, Guildford, UK, is general secretary of the United Society for Christian Literature. Christian literature.

Daniel F. Martensen (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) is director of the department for ecumenical affairs and assistant to the presiding bishop of his church in Chicago, IL, USA. Lutheran-Orthodox dialogue.

James B. Martin-Schramm (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) is assistant professor of religion in the religion and philosophy department at Luther College in Decorah, IA, USA. Population.

Jacques Matthey (Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches) is coordinator of the WCC team on Mission and Evangelism. Mission.

Melanie A. May (Church of the Brethren) is vice president of academic life and dean of the faculty, and professor of theology, at Colgate Rochester Divinity School, Rochester, NY, USA. Brethren; community of women and men in the church; feminism.

Roy H. May, Jr (United Methodist Church) is professor of Christian ethics at the Latin American Biblical University, San José, Costa Rica. Globalization, economic.

Jean Mayland (Church of England) is coordinating secretary for church life of Churches Together in Britain and Ireland, London, UK. Europe: Western.

Ali A. Mazrui (Muslim) is Albert Schweitzer professor in the humanities at the State University of New York at Binghamton; Ibn Khaldun professor-at-large at the School of Islamic and Social Sciences, Leesburg, VA; and senior scholar in Africana studies at Cornell University, Ithaca, NY, USA. Decolonization.

John S. Mbiti (Anglican Church of the Province of Kenya), director of the Ecumenical Institute, Bossey, from 1974 to 1978, teaches the science of mission and extra-European theology at the University of Bern, and was a pastor of a local parish in Switzerland until retirement. Indigenous religions; theology, African.

Richard P. McBrien (Roman Catholic) is Crowley-O'Brien-Walter professor of theology at the University of Notre Dame, IN, USA. Roman Catholic Church.

Kevin McDonald (Roman Catholic), former co-secretary of the Anglican Roman Catholic International Commission, is bishop of Northampton, UK. Anglican-Roman Catholic dialogue.

†Roger Mehl (Reformed Church of Alsace and Lorraine) was professor of ethics and sociology of Protestantism of the faculty of Protestant theology, University of Social Sciences, Strasbourg, France. Law; Protestantism.

Antonio G. Mendonça (Independent Presbyterian Church of Brazil) is professor of the sociology of Protestantism at the Methodist University of São Paulo, Brazil. South America: Brazil.

†John Meyendorff (Orthodox Church in America) was dean of St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary, Crestwood, NY, USA, and professor at Fordham University, Bronx, NY, USA. He was moderator of the WCC Faith and Order commission from 1971 to 1975. Patristics.

Paul Meyendorff (Orthodox Church in America) is Alexander Schmemmann professor of liturgical theology at St Vladimir's Orthodox Theological Seminary, Crestwood, NY, USA. Liturgy.

Harding Meyer (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Hanover) was research professor at the Institute for Ecumenical Research, Strasbourg, France. Dialogue, bilateral; reconciled diversity.

José Míguez Bonino, editor. Conflict; ethics; fascism; imperialism; land; Medellín; middle axioms; national security; natural law; praxis; South America: Andean region; theology, liberation; totalitarianism.

Larry Miller (Evangelical Mennonite Churches in France) is general secretary of the Mennonite World Conference, Strasbourg, France. Mennonite World Conference; Mennonites.

Tarek Mitri (Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Antioch and All the East) is programme executive for Christian-Muslim relations and dialogue and coordinator of the WCC team on inter-religious relations and dialogue. Middle East.

Gerald F. Moede (United Methodist Church), now a pastor in Wisconsin, was general secretary of the Consultation on Church Union, Princeton, NJ, USA. Consultation on Church Union.

Paul Mojzes (United Methodist Church) is academic dean and professor of religious studies at Rosemont College, PA, USA, editor of Religion in Eastern Europe, and co-editor of the Journal of Ecumenical Studies. Socialism.

Elisabeth Moltmann-Wendel (Evangelical Church in Württemberg), living in Germany, is a writer on the church and feminist theology. Feminism.

Cyris Moon (Presbyterian Church of Korea), former lecturer at the Ecumenical Institute of Bossey, is professor of Old Testament at San Francisco Theological Seminary, CA, USA. People.

Lewis S. Mudge (Presbyterian Church (USA)) was dean of San Francisco Theological Seminary, CA, USA. Ministry in the church.

Daleep Mukarji (Church of North India), former executive secretary for urban rural mission in the WCC Programme Unit on Churches in Mission: Health, Education, Witness, is director of Christian Aid, London, UK. Urban rural mission.

Geiko Müller-Fahrenholz (Evangelical Church of Bremen) is an ecumenical consultant and writer from Germany. History; prophecy; salvation history.

†Walter Müller-Römheld (Evangelical Church of Germany) was director of the publishing house Verlag Otto Lembeck, Frankfurt, Germany. Diétrich, Suzanne de.

†Roland E. Murphy (Roman Catholic) is G.W. Ivey professor emeritus of biblical studies of Duke University, Durham, NC, USA. Old Testament and Christian unity.

Owen Nankivell (Methodist Church of Great Britain) is director of the Hinksey Centre (Christian concerns for public issues), Torquay, UK. Capitalism.

Luca Negro (Evangelical Baptist Union of Italy) is secretary for communications and information with the Conference of European Churches, Geneva, Switzerland. Europe: Southern.

J. Robert Nelson (United Methodist Church) was director of the institute of religion of Texas Medical Center, Houston, TX, USA, and dean of theology at Boston University and Vanderbilt University, Nashville, TN. Bio-ethics.

Richard John Neuhaus (Roman Catholic) is director of the Institute on Religion and Public Life, New York, USA. Hartford appeal.

Peter Neuner (Roman Catholic) is professor of dogmatics and ecumenical theology at the Catholic Faculty of Theology, University of Munich, Germany. Anathemas; dialogue, intrafaith.

†Lesslie Newbigin (United Reformed Church in the UK) was for many years a missionary and bishop in the Church of South India, and director of the International Missionary Council from 1959 to 1961. Niles, Daniel Thambyrajah; union, organic; unity of "all in each place".

Leopoldo Niilus (United Evangelical Lutheran Church of Argentina) was representative of the Middle East Council of Churches at the Ecumenical Centre, Geneva, Switzerland, and is a former director of international ecumenical relations of the MECC. Middle East Council of Churches.

D. Preman Niles (United Reformed Church in the UK) was general secretary of the Council for World Mission, London, UK. Justice, peace and the integrity of creation.

Ingrid Vad Nilsen (Church of Norway) was general secretary of the Christian Council of Norway. Europe: Northern – Norway.

Peder Nørgaard-Højen (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Denmark) is professor of dogmatics and ecumenical theology at the University of Copenhagen, Denmark. Sin.

Roger Nunn (Baptist Union of Great Britain) was a field officer of Churches Together in England, and editor of the CTE bulletin Pilgrim Post. Local ecumenical partnerships.

Setri Nyomi (Evangelical Presbyterian Church, Ghana) is general secretary of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. Youth.

Ronald O'Grady (Associated Churches of Christ in New Zealand), former associate general secretary of the Christian Conference of Asia, is a founder and honorary president of ECPAT (End Child Prostitution in Asian Tourism). Prostitution, child.

Daniel Olivier (Roman Catholic) was professor of Luther studies at the Catholic Institute, Paris, France. Holiness; sanctification.

Milan Opočenský (Evangelical Church of Czech Brethren), professor emeritus of Charles University Prague, was general secretary of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, Geneva, Switzerland. Christian Peace Conference; Europe: Central and Eastern.

†Raymond Oppenheim (Church of Aotearoa New Zealand) was vicar of Lower Hutt, diocese of Wellington, Aotearoa New Zealand. Aotearoa New Zealand.

Helen Oppenheimer (Church of England) is a writer on Christian ethics and has been a member of various Church of England commissions on marriage. Ethics, sexual.

Levi V. Oración (United Church of Christ), former executive secretary for theological studies in the WCC Sub-unit on the Churches' Participation in Development, is a pastor of his church in Covina, CA, USA. Asia: Southeast; people.

Nicolas Ossorguine (Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) is professor of liturgy at the Orthodox Theological Institute of St Sergius, Paris, France. Church calendar.

Geevarghese Mar Osthathios (Malankara Orthodox Syrian Church) is metropolitan of Niranam and teaches at the Orthodox Theological Seminary, Kottayam, India. Oriental Orthodox churches.

Martin Parmentier (Old Catholic Church of the Netherlands) is canon of the chapter of Utrecht and professor of systematic and ecumenical theology at the Old Catholic Theological Faculty of the University of Bern, Switzerland. Old Catholic Church; Old Catholic-Orthodox dialogue.

Geoffrey Parrinder (Methodist Church of Great Britain) is professor emeritus of the comparative study of religions and fellow of King's College, London, UK. Scriptures.

Harvey Perkins (Uniting Church in Australia) served both the WCC and the CCA in the area of development and service. Tourism.

William A. Perkins (Episcopal Church [USA]) spent several periods on the staff of the WCC, the last as executive secretary for the administration of the WCC seventh assembly at Canberra. International Christian Youth Exchange.

Arturo Piedra (Federation of Evangelical Churches in Costa Rica) is professor of church history at the Latin American Biblical Seminary, San José, Costa Rica. Central America.

Barney Pityana (Church of the Province of Southern Africa – Anglican), director of the WCC Programme to Combat Racism from 1988 to 1992, is vice-chancellor of the University of South Africa, Pretoria. Racism.

John S. Pobee, editor. Africa; African Instituted (Independent) Churches; All Africa Conference of Churches; Ecumenical Association of Third World Theologians; education and renewal; Gatu, John; Ibiam, Francis Akanu; International Association for Mission Studies; Jiagge, Annie; Matthews, Zachariah Keodirelang; polygamy; redemption; theology, black; theology by the people; theology, contextual; violence, religious roots of.

Elisabeth Pontoppidan (Reformed Church of France) was prioress of the Community of Pomeyrol, St-Etienne-du-Gres, France. Theotokos.

†Maria Teresa Porcile Santiso (Roman Catholic) was professor of biblical theology and Mariology at the Theological Institute of Uruguay, Montevideo, Uruguay. Magnificat.

Philip A. Potter (Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas) was WCC general secretary from 1972 to 1984. Covenant; mission.

David N. Power (Roman Catholic) is professor emeritus of systematic theology of the Catholic University of America, Washington, DC, USA. Episcopacy; ordination; presbyterate; priesthood.

James F. Puglisi (Roman Catholic) is director of the Centro Pro Unione, Rome, Italy. Centro Pro Unione.

Joan Puls (Roman Catholic) is president of the School Sisters of St Francis in Milwaukee, WI, USA. Spirituality in the ecumenical movement.

John A. Radano (Roman Catholic) is bureau chief of the western section, Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity, Vatican City. Baptist-Roman Catholic international conversations.

Konrad Raiser (Evangelical Church in Germany) is general secretary of the WCC. Holy Spirit in ecumenical thought; international order; oikoumene; theology in the ecumenical movement.

Páraic Réamonn (Church of Scotland) is executive secretary for communication in the World Alliance of Reformed Churches, Geneva, Switzerland. World Alliance of Reformed Churches.

Ruth Reardon (Roman Catholic) is co-president of the Association of Interchurch Families, London, UK. Association of Interchurch Families.

†Hans Diether Reimer (Evangelical Church in Germany) was a theologian at the Protestant Central Agency for Religious and Ideological Issues, Stuttgart, Germany. Sects.

Víctor Rey (Evangelical Baptist Church of Chile) is a pastor of his church. South America: Andean region.

Russell E. Richey (United Methodist Church) is dean of Candler School of Theology, Emory University, Atlanta, GA. Denominationalism.

Cecil M. Robeck, Jr (Assemblies of God) is professor of church history and ecumenics at Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, CA, USA. Assemblies of God; charism(ata); Pentecostal World Conference.

Ronald G. Roberson (Roman Catholic) is associate director of the Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs, National Conference of Catholic Bishops, Washington, DC, USA. Assyrian Church of the East-Roman Catholic dialogue; Oriental Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue; Orthodox-Roman Catholic dialogue.

Earl Robinson (Salvation Army) is colonel at the Salvation Army headquarters, office for spiritual life development and international external relations, Maple Ridge, BC, Canada. Salvation Army.

Martin Robra (Evangelical Church in Germany) is WCC programme executive for ethics and ecology. Sustainability.

Violeta Rocha Areas (Nazaren Church in Nicaragua) is pastor of her church, dean of the Evangelical Theological Faculty in Managua, Nicaragua, and president of the Latino-american and Caribbean Ecumenical Education Community. Central America.

Jean Rogues (Roman Catholic) was professor of ecumenical theology and director at the Higher Institute for Ecumenical Studies of the Catholic Institute of Paris, France. Laity/ clergy.

Michael Root (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) is research professor for systematic theology at Trinity Lutheran Seminary, Columbus, OH, USA. Lutheran-Roman Catholic dialogue.

Susan H. Ross was interim coordinator of the international secretariat of the International Fellowship of Reconciliation, Alkmaar, Netherlands. International Fellowship of Reconciliation.

Peter Rottländer (Roman Catholic) works in theological research at Misereor, Aachen, Germany. Solidarity.

Theodore Runyon (United Methodist Church) was professor of systematic theology at Candler School of Theology, Emory University, Atlanta, GA, USA. Theology, political.

William G. Rusch (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America) was director of the Commission on Faith and Order, National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA, New York, USA. Athanasian Creed; Baptist-Lutheran dialogue.

Dafne Sabanes Plou (Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina) is a free-lance journalist specializing in church and society issues. Latin American Council of Churches.

Saïd Elias Saïd (Roman Catholic Church, France, and Maronite Church of Saïda, Lebanon) is Maronite patriarchal vicar in France. Canon law.

Julio H. de Santa Ana (Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches) is professor at the Ecumenical Institute, Bossey, Geneva, Switzerland. Debt crisis; dependence; economics.

Gerhard Sauter (Evangelical Church in the Rhineland) was professor of systematic theology and director of the Ecumenical Institute, Faculty of Protestant Theology, University of Bonn, Germany. Stuttgart declaration; war guilt.

Ursula Schoen-Gieseke (Evangelical Church in the Rhineland) is a pastor of her church and works at the Institute for Social-diaconal Research, University of Heidelberg, Germany. People of God.

William F. Schulz, former president of the Unitarian Universalist Association of Congregations, is executive director of Amnesty International, USA. International Association for Religious Freedom; Unitarian Universalism; Unitarian Universalist Association.

Marilia Schüller (Methodist Church in Brazil) is programme executive for combating racism with the WCC. Racism.

Juan Schwindt (Evangelical Church of the River Plate) is general secretary of his church, Argentina. Latin American Council of Churches.

Alan P.F. Sell (Presbyterian Church of Wales) was professor of Christian doctrine and philosophy of religion at the United Theological College, Aberystwyth, within the Aberystwyth and Lampeter School of Theology of the University of Wales, UK. Anglican-Reformed dialogue; congregationalism.

Bernard Sesboüé (Roman Catholic) is professor of theology at the Faculty of Theology of Centre-Sèvres, Paris, France. Authority; Groupe des Dombes.

Norman Shanks (Church of Scotland) was leader of the Iona community. Iona community.

Wilbert R. Shenk (Mennonite Church) is professor of mission history and contemporary culture at Fuller Theological Seminary, Pasadena, CA, USA. Church growth.

Roger L. Shinn (United Church of Christ) is Reinhold Niebuhr professor emeritus of social ethics of Union Theological Seminary, New York, USA. Revolution; science and technology; scientific world-view.

†Werner Simpfendorfer (Evangelical Church in Württemberg) was executive secretary of the Ecumenical Association of Academies and Laity Centres in Europe, Bad Boll, Germany. Academies, lay.

†Jean Sindab (Progressive National Baptist Convention) was director for environmental and economic justice/hunger concerns at the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the USA, New York. Indigenous peoples.

Baldwin Sjollem (Netherlands Reformed Church) was the first director of the WCC Programme to Combat Racism, from 1970 to 1981, then coordinator of the anti-apartheid programme of the International Labour Organization. Land; Programme to Combat Racism.

Jean Skuse (Uniting Church in Australia) was general secretary of the Australian Council of Churches. Australia.

D.J. Smit (Uniting Reformed Church of Southern Africa) is professor of systematic theology at the University of Stellenbosch, South Africa. Inspiration; kairos documents; kingdom of God; liberty/freedom; order.

D. Moody Smith (United Methodist Church) is George Washington Ivey professor emeritus of New Testament of Duke University, Durham, NC, USA. New Testament and Christian unity.

Dorothee Sölle (Evangelical Lutheran Church of North Elbia) is a theologian and writer living in Hamburg, Germany, and was visiting professor of systematic theology at Union Theological Seminary, New York, USA, until 1987. Suffering.

Choan-Seng Song (Presbyterian Church in Taiwan) is professor of theology and Asian cultures, Pacific School of Religion, Berkeley, CA, USA, and president of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches. Culture.

Pablo Sosa (Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina) is professor emeritus of music and liturgy at the Higher Evangelical Institute of Theological Studies (ISEDET), Buenos Aires, Argentina. Hymns.

Sara Speicher (Church of the Brethren) is team coordinator of the WCC Public Information team, and communications officer for the WCC Cluster on Relations. Historic peace churches.

Marc Spindler (Netherlands Reformed Church) is professor emeritus of missiology and ecumenics of the University of Leiden and the University of Utrecht, Netherlands. Diaspora; migrant churches.

Max L. Stackhouse (United Church of Christ) is Stephen Colwell professor of Christian ethics at Princeton Theological Seminary, NJ, USA. Church and state; homosexuality; theology, public.

Peter Staples (Church of England) was senior lecturer in contemporary church history and ecumenics at the University of Utrecht, Netherlands. Apostolicity; catholicity; sociology of ecumenism.

Elaine Hesse Steel (Church of England), former general secretary of the World YWCA, Geneva, Switzerland, is director general of the United World Colleges (International), in the UK. World Young Women's Christian Association.

David Steinmetz (United Methodist Church) is A.R. Kearns professor of the history of Christianity at Duke University, Durham, NC, USA. Reformation.

Tom Stransky, editor. Antichrist; Bea, Augustin; Beauduin, Lambert; Bilheimer, Robert; Catholic Conference for Ecumenical Questions; Chevetogne; Christian World Communions; collegiality; common witness; Congar, Yves; Couturier, Paul-Irénée; criticism of the ecumenical movement and of the WCC; crusades; Day, Dorothy; Decree on Ecumenism; Duprey, Pierre; Ecumenical Directories; encyclicals; encyclicals, Roman Catholic; encyclicals, Roman Catholic social; Focolare movement; Friends World Committee for Consultation; fundamentalists; Graham, Billy; hierarchy of truths; International Missionary Council; Jerusalem; John XXIII; John Paul II; Joint Working Group; Küng, Hans; millennialism; missio Dei; missionary societies; Moeller, Charles; Nissiotis, Nikos; Paul VI; Pax Christi International; Pax Romana; Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity; religious communities; Roman Catholic Church and pre-Vatican II ecumenism; Roman curia; Romero y Galdames, Oscar Arnulfo; Sant'Egidio community; SEDOS; SODEPAX; Tantur Ecumenical Institute; Thurian, Max; Trent, council of; UNIAPAC; Vatican Councils I and II; Willebrands, Johannes; World Council of Churches.

Katherine Strong (United Church of Christ) was a staff member of the World YWCA. World Young Women's Christian Association.

David Kwang-sun Suh (Presbyterian Church of Korea) is visiting professor of Asian theology at Drew University Theological School, Madison, NJ, USA, and professor emeritus of theology of Ewha Women's University, Seoul, Korea. Theology, minjung.

Theo Sundermeier (Evangelical Church of Baden) is professor of comparative religion and missiology at the University of Heidelberg, Germany. Religion.

Masao Takenaka (United Church of Christ in Japan) was professor at Seiwa College, Japan. Art in the ecumenical movement.

Mary Tanner (Church of England), moderator of the WCC commission on Faith and Order from 1991 to 1998, was general secretary of the Council for Christian Unity, Church of England, London, UK. Anglican-Moravian conversations; ordination of women.

George H. Tavard (Roman Catholic) is professor emeritus of the Methodist Theological School, Delaware, OH, USA. Theology, North American.

Michael Taylor (Baptist Union of Great Britain) is professor of social theology at the University of Birmingham, UK. Interchurch aid.

†Jerome Theisen (Roman Catholic), former abbot of St John's, Collegeville, MN, USA, was abbot primate of the worldwide Benedictines. Vocation.

Elizabeth Theokritoff (Russian Orthodox Church) is a translator and lecturer, and was former secretary of the Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius, London, UK. Fellowship of St Alban and St Sergius.

†M.M. Thomas (Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar), moderator of the WCC central committee from 1968 to 1975, was governor of the state of Nagaland in India. Nation; syncretism.

†T.K. Thomas (Mar Thoma Syrian Church of Malabar) was publications editor in the WCC department of communication. Christian Conference of Asia; Mar Thoma Church; WCC, basis of.

Betty Thompson (United Methodist Church) was communications executive for her church, and interim director of communication for the National Council of the Churches of Christ, New York, USA. Lacey, Janet.

David M. Thompson (United Reformed Church in the UK) is lecturer in modern church history and director of the Centre for Advanced Religious and Theological Studies, University of Cambridge, UK. Disciples-Reformed dialogue.

Sigurdur Arni Thordarson (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Iceland) is secretary of theology and society of his church. Europe: Northern – Iceland.

Bernard Thorogood (Uniting Church in Australia) was general secretary of the Council for World Mission and of the United Reformed Church in the UK. Newbigin, James Edward Lesslie.

†Max Thurian (Roman Catholic) was canon of the cathedral of Naples, Italy. Baptism, Eucharist and Ministry.

†J.-M.R. Tillard (Roman Catholic) was professor at the Dominican Faculty of Theology, Ottawa, Canada. Consensus fidelium; Disciples-Roman Catholic dialogue; infallibility/indefectibility; koinonia; primacy.

†Oliver S. Tomkins (Church of England) was bishop of Bristol, UK. Mott, John R.

Philippe Toxé (Roman Catholic) is lecturer in the faculty of canon law at the University of Tours, France. Divorce.

Kern Robert Trembath (Episcopal Church [USA]) was assistant chairman of the department of theology, University of Notre Dame, IN, USA. Revelation.

Theo Tschuy (Swiss Methodist Church), former Latin America secretary with the WCC and associate general secretary of the joint WCC-Roman Catholic programme SODEPAX, is a member of the annual conference of his church. Ethnic conflict.

Georges Tsesis (Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) was permanent representative of the Ecumenical Patriarchate to the WCC, Geneva, Switzerland. Chambésy; pan-Orthodox conferences.

John Munsey Turner (Methodist Church of Great Britain) was lecturer in church history at Queen's College, Birmingham, and at the University of Manchester, UK. Bell, G.K.A.; Paton, William; Temple, William.

†Rita Crowley Turner (Roman Catholic) was a writer and broadcaster in England. Mary in the ecumenical movement.

David Tustin (Church of England), former suffragan bishop of Grimsby, is honorary assistant bishop in the diocese of Lincoln and co-chair of the Anglican-Lutheran International Working Group, UK. Anglican-Lutheran dialogue; Porvoo communion.

Erika Tysoe-Dulken (Evangelical Church in Germany) was secretary for communication at the World Alliance of YMCAs, Geneva, Switzerland. World Alliance of Young Men's Christian Associations.

Hans Ucko (Church of Sweden) is WCC programme executive for Christian-Jewish and inter-religious relations. Antisemitism; World Conference on Religion and Peace.

Carlos A. Valle (Evangelical Methodist Church of Argentina) was general secretary of the World Association for Christian Communication, London, UK. World Association for Christian Communication.

George Vandervelde (Christian Reformed Church in North America) is professor of systematic theology at the Institute for Christian Studies, Toronto, Canada, and co-chair of the World Evangelical Fellowship-Roman Catholic Consultation. Evangelical ecumenical concerns; Evangelical-Roman Catholic relations.

†Marlin VanElderen (Christian Reformed Church in North America) was executive editor at the WCC. Life-style; Moravians; WCC, membership of.

Charles Villa-Vicencio (Methodist Church of Southern Africa) is executive director of the Institute for Justice and Reconciliation, Rondebosch, South Africa. Apartheid; Cottesloe; just war; Kairos document; Rustenburg declaration.

Rolando Villena Villegas (Evangelical Methodist Church in Bolivia) was secretary for the Andean region of the Latin American Council of Churches, based in La Paz, Bolivia. South America: Andean region.

Lukas Vischer (Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches), director of the WCC Sub-unit on Faith and Order from 1966 to 1979, is professor emeritus of ecumenical theology of the University of Bern, Switzerland. Consensus.

Gerhard Voss (Roman Catholic) is director of the Ecumenical Institute, Niederaltaich Abbey, Germany. Una Sancta movement.

Geoffrey Wainwright, editor. Anglican-Methodist dialogue; canon; Christmas; church; church discipline; dialogue, multilateral; Easter; eucharist; federalism; God; intercommunion; Leuenberg Church Fellowship; lex orandi, lex credendi; magisterium; Methodist-Orthodox relations; Methodist-Reformed dialogue; Methodist-Roman Catholic dialogue; Pentecost; scripture; uniqueness of Christ; universalism; Ut Unum Sint.

John Waliggo (Roman Catholic) is executive secretary of the Justice and Peace National Catholic Commission and a member of the Uganda Human Rights Commission. Inculturation.

Andrew Walls (Methodist Church of Great Britain) is honorary professor at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, and curator of collections, Centre for the Study of Christianity in the Non-Western World. He is director of the Scottish Institute of Missionary Studies of the University of Aberdeen. Missiology.

Kallistos Ware (Orthodox Church, Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople) is titular bishop of Diokleia, assistant bishop in the Archdiocese of Thyateira and Great Britain, and was Spalding lecturer in Eastern Orthodox studies at the University of Oxford, UK. Ethnicity; Tradition and traditions.

Bärbel von Wartenberg-Potter (Evangelical Church in Germany), director of the WCC Sub-unit on Women in Church and Society from 1980 to 1985, is bishop of the North Elbian Evangelical Lutheran Church in Lübeck, Germany. Sexism.

Pauline Webb, editor. Communication; intercession; Potter, Philip; Raiser, Konrad; Vischer, Lukas; women in church and society.

Hans-Ruedi Weber (Federation of Swiss Protestant Churches) was WCC director of biblical studies from 1971 to 1988, then visiting lecturer at Pacific Theological College, Suva, Fiji, until 1990. Bible, its role in the ecumenical movement; Bossey, Ecumenical Institute of.

Theodore R. Weber (United Methodist Church) is professor emeritus of social ethics of Candler School of Theology, Emory University, Atlanta, GA, USA. State.

John B. Webster (Church of England) is Lady Margaret professor of divinity at the University of Oxford, UK. Ministry, threefold.

Erich Weingärtner (Evangelical Lutheran Church in America), former executive secretary in the WCC Commission of the Churches on International Affairs, is human security fellow at the Centre for International Security Studies, York University, Toronto, Canada. Human rights.

Robert K. Welsh (Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)) is president of the Council on Christian Unity of his church in Indianapolis, IN, USA. Disciples of Christ.

Dietrich Werner (Evangelical Lutheran Church of Oldenburg) is director of studies at the Christian Jensen College, North Elbian Centre for World Mission, Breklum, Germany. Eccumenical conferences; Humanum; Humanum Studies; "missionary structure of the congregation".

Charles C. West (Presbyterian Church (USA)) is professor emeritus of Christian ethics of Princeton Theological Seminary, NJ, USA. Power; secularization.

†Morris West (Baptist Union of Great Britain) was principal of Bristol Baptist College, and special lecturer in theology at the University of Bristol, UK. Lund principle; Toronto statement.

Vítor Westhelle (Evangelical Church of Lutheran Confession in Brazil) is professor of systematic theology at the Lutheran School of Theology, Chicago, IL, USA. Ideology.

Teresa J. White (Church of England) is administrator and editor of Distinctive Diaconate News and Distinctive News of Women in Ministry, and English language editor of Diakonia News. Diaconate; diakonia.

Thomas Wieser (Swiss Protestant Church Federation) was a staff member of the WCC Commission on World Mission and Evangelism. World Student Christian Federation.

†Glen Garfield Williams (Baptist Union of Great Britain) was general secretary of the Conference of European Churches from 1967 to 1987. Conference of European Churches.

Monrelle Williams (Church in the Province of the West Indies) was general secretary of the Caribbean Conference of Churches. Caribbean.

Rowan D. Williams (Church in Wales) is archbishop of Canterbury designate, UK. Jesus Christ; theology, European.

Roger Williamson (Methodist Church of Great Britain) is a peace researcher and social ethicist currently working at Wilton Park, a conference centre of the British Foreign and Commonwealth Office. He writes in a personal capacity. Disarmament; pacifism.

H.S. Wilson (Church of South India) is Wilhelm Loehe associate professor of world mission at Wartburg Theological Seminary, Dubuque, IA, USA. Asia: South; Asia: Southeast; Oriental Orthodox-Reformed dialogue.

John Witte, Jr (Episcopal Church) is Jonas Robitscher professor of law and director of the law and religion programme at Emory University School of Law, Atlanta, GA, USA. Parties, political.

Hugh Wybrew (Church of England) is vicar of St Mary Magdalen, Oxford, UK. Anglican-Orthodox dialogue.

†John H. Yoder (Mennonite Church) was professor of theology at the University of Notre Dame, IN, USA. Conscientious objection; peace.

Ralph C. Young (United Church of Canada) was Geneva secretary for the World Methodist Council, Geneva, Switzerland. World Methodist Council.

The 700 entries in this Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement have been written by 370 leading figures in the ecumenical movement from every Christian confession and all parts of the world. Entries are fully cross-referenced, and many of the articles are enhanced by short bibliographies.

Entries cover the areas of faith and order, dialogue, mission and evangelism, communication, church and society, moral theology, theological education, institutional histories, relations of Orthodox, Protestants and Roman Catholics within the ecumenical movement, ecumenism in the regions. Biographical sketches outline the contributions of some of the individuals who have furthered the cause of ecumenism in the 20th century. Cross references direct the reader to more detailed information or to matters of related interest, and the bibliographical items have often been chosen precisely because they yield further information.

For anyone involved and interested in the issues, history and events of the ecumenical movement, this book provides a wealth of up-to-date information available in no other single source.

"An astonishingly thorough and eminently useful reference book... I cannot imagine that anyone who has to deal with relations between the churches could do without this work."

Jaroslav Pelikan, Yale University, on the first edition

"A highly useful resource of solid and concise material with a welcome update on the recent period. The Dictionary is uniquely valuable, covering a range of items not available elsewhere."

Archbishop Anastasios of Tirana, Durrës and All Albania

"The Dictionary has been indispensable to our libraries in Latin America and the Caribbean. Its accuracy, clarity and historical wisdom have opened new ecumenical horizons within our theological institutions as well as in seminars for lay leaders and congregations."

Ofelia Ortega, Principal, Evangelical Theological Seminary in Cuba

"This second edition of the Dictionary is an amazingly informative and up-to-date reference work. Anyone interested in religious issues and the Christian church will find this book comprehensive and reliable."

Tinyiko Sam Maluleke, Dean, Faculty of Theology and Biblical Religions, University of South Africa, Pretoria

2-8254-1354-2

9 782825 413548

World Council of Churches

